

KIT

A WEBNOVEL BY FEL (JAMES GALLOWAY)

Copyright © by James Galloway

All Rights Reserved

This free ebook is a work of fiction. All characters, names, places, and incidents are either products of the author's imagination or used fictitiously. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior written permission of the author. The author prohibits the monetization and profit of this ebook by any third party. This ebook is provided free of charge and is for entertainment purposes only, without any representation or warranty of any kind, either expressed or implied. The author assumes no responsibility for errors or omissions in the contents of this free ebook.

Enjoy the story.

www.sennadar.com

Table of Contents

Prologue
Chapter 1
Chapter 2
Chapter 3
Chapter 4
Chapter 5
Chapter 6
Chapter 7
Chapter 8
Chapter 9
Chapter 10
Chapter 11
Chapter 12
Chapter 13
Chapter 14
Chapter 15
Chapter 16
Chapter 17
Chapter 18
Chapter 19
Chapter 20
Chapter 21
Chapter 22
Chapter 23
Chapter 24
Chapter 25
Chapter 26
Chapter 27
Chapter 28
Chapter 29
Chapter 30
Chapter 31
Chapter 32

Chapter 33
Chapter 34
Chapter 35
Chapter 36
Chapter 37
Chapter 38
Chapter 39
Chapter 40
Chapter 41
Chapter 42

Prologue

Silence.

The wind had died down, leaving only the echo of silence, a memory of sound, as if motion had been quelled in a moment of respect. The soft snow muffled all other sounds, leaving a strange void, a disjunct wrongness, almost eerie in its totality.

But only for the briefest of moments. The sound of someone sniffing shattered the silence, and Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan III opened his eyes and remembered where he was.

It was cold. So cold. His fur was even cold against his skin, and the wind again picked up, slicing through his exposed fur, causing him to huddle deeper into his coat, shivering his tail.

Cold day for a funeral.

They were all there, of course. The entire family, friends, acquaintances, employees, lawyers, hangers-on, golddiggers, the whole nine yards. The entire Vulpan line stood out in that meticulously preened cemetery, the private Vulpan cemetery, attending the funeral of their patriarch. Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan II, caretaker of the Vulpan dynasty of Vulpan Shipyards and Vulpan Steel built by his grandfather and father. He'd died a rich fox, worth hundreds of millions of dollars. One of the richest furs in America, on the top 500 list, dead of a heart attack at 49.

He could hear the crying. How much of it was real, and how much of it was just a show? He always wondered that. He always wondered how much that bitch of a female pretended to care when she looked into his eyes, and how those eyes changed when they looked at him. Like he was...an inconvenience. Oh, his father didn't care about that. He didn't care about love. After the death of his first wife, Kitstrom's mother, he married that cold, vicious witch because she was the daughter of a rich British noble, a true blue-blood and a fox. Cybil Whitmore Vulpan stood there, by the casket, crying uncontrollably, leaning against her father, Count Chester Whitmore. No doubt lamenting the loss of all that money.

The priest went on with his long-winded soliloquy, talking about rebirth and repentance, eternal happiness and heaven. His voice was somber, deep, the big elk raising his hands from time to time as he read from the bible in his paws, his antlers dipping and bobbing with his speech.

Empty words at a time like this. The bastard didn't deserve such comfort.

He sighed, seeing a cloud of misty breath waft in the cold air before him. He knew what was coming next. All those eyes would turn to his sister, Vilenne. She was the heir, four years his senior and just back from England, she was the one his father had given his stocks, just before he died, she was the one that would have control. All the gold-diggers, all the toadies, all the sycophants, they would descend on her like flies, trying to ingratiate themselves to her, trying to leech off from the family fortune.

It was his father's greatest shame, handing over the family dynasty to his daughter rather than his son. For the first time in the century-long history of Vulpan Shipyards, a male Vulpan wouldn't be sitting at the head of the executive table. It would be Vilenne Vulpan, honor graduate of Harvard Business School, Oxford scholar, and upon her would fall the herculean task of guiding both the family business and the family itself into a new era.

She could have it.

He'd never gotten along with his family. Ever since he was 12, he and his father had barely spoken and usually only in anger, when the young Kit told his father he wanted to join the Air Force and be a fighter pilot. That was when he found out that his father was a ruthless bastard. His father made life hell for him after that, forcing him to learn about business, driving him, trying to force him to do something he didn't want to do. His father had wanted his male heir to take the reins of the family, a fact that put considerable pressure on the relationship between his father and sister. But Kit had not budged from his adamant position. He did not want to go into business. He did not want to run the family. His sister was brilliant and motivated, she would be a much better family head than he would ever be. Years of continuous badgering, force, and heated arguments had eventually led to his outbursts, disobedience, three occasions of him running away, and even several arrests. It all culminated on his sixteenth birthday, when his father had told him he either took his place as the head of the family, or be disowned.

Kit walked out the front door with nothing but the clothes on his back and never looked back.

His father would break out of that coffin and strangle Vilenne if he knew that Kit was at his funeral. Kit didn't want to be there himself, but he promised Vilenne, and he could never break his word to his sister. Besides, in a way, he had to be here. He had to see them put him into the ground, and know it was over.

From that day forward, his father was his greatest enemy. Not content to simply allow Kit to leave, he had done everything in his power to ruin Kit's life. No matter where he went, his father's greasy fingers followed. From utilities being shut off to his bank accounts being closed or monkeyed with to police harassing him, even to his apartment being repeatedly vandalized and his bike stolen any time he left it unattended, everything that happened had his father's stain all over it. His father wouldn't let him go, trying to punish him as much as possible for rejecting the family, but Kit stood up to it tremendous tenacity, refusing to allow his father to neither run nor ruin his life.

It wasn't all bad. Vilenne sympathized with him, and she helped him after he was disowned, even at the risk of being disowned herself. She secretly lent him some money, had a friend of hers pay for an apartment in Boston for him, and helped him finish school. His hope of going to the Air Force Academy had been shattered by his ejection from his family, for his father had to ensure that his son couldn't get in. One letter to the Secretary of the Air Force made sure of it. So he went into the ROTC at the University of Massachusetts instead, enduring even more of his father's attempts to destroy his rebellious son's life as his father tried to get him kicked out of school. He learned how to fly a plane while in college, advancing his dream to fly fighter jets, but then it all crashed down on him in one moment, and his father hadn't had to lift a finger.

It was just dumb luck, he supposed. The wrong place at the wrong time. The ocelot driving the minivan never saw the light and ran right through it, plowing him and three others over. Two of the others died, the third was paralyzed from the waist down, and he spent nearly four months in the hospital with a broken back. And that ended his hopes of flying in the military. That kind of injury was an automatic blackball, because his back couldn't withstand the stress of flying high-G maneuvers.

And that was that. His dream was dead. He guessed his father probably danced around his office when he heard the news. The bastard wouldn't even pay for his medical bills. Vilenne had to help him pay them, since he didn't have insurance, which his father didn't try to stop when the scandal hit New England that the son of Kitstrom Vulpan had been critically injured, and couldn't even pay the medical bills to stay in the hospital while in a full body cast. The social backlash of his father's cold-heartedness had forced him to relent and allow his sister to pay his bills. He washed out of ROTC because of his injury, and drifted through school until he graduated with a degree in history.

Graduation was last week, since he graduated in the fall semester because of his injury. No doubt the old bastard had kicked when he found out that Kit had managed to graduate from school despite all the roadblocks put in his way.

He could feel their eyes on him. Dozens of Vulpan eyes, glancing at him, some of them, like Uncle Zach, glaring at him. He knew they wanted to know why he was there. Was he there to try to worm his way back into the good graces of the family? Was he there to apologize? Was he there to see cousins and aunts and uncles he hadn't seen in over five years? He let them wonder. He was there for only one reason, and that was to see them put his father into the ground. To see it, to know he was dead, and know that when he left that cemetery, he was free.

He blinked, realizing that the priest was done talking. The widow put a single rose on the casket, and then they watched as it was placed in the marble crypt at the base of a thirty foot tall monument. The old bastard, he even had to be gaudy and ostentatious in death.

And it was over.

He sighed, a sigh of relief. It was over. The bastard was dead, dead and buried, and he was forever out of Kit's life. He could walk away now, walk away and know that his bastard of a father wouldn't be behind him, stalking him, trying to destroy him. That he was dead, and may he rot in hell.

He sensed that they were looking at him, for he'd stepped out from the throng when they lowered the casket down into the crypt and looked down at it, resisting the urge to unzip his fly and piss down onto his father's casket as a final act of defiance. His ears twitched, both his whole right ear and his damaged left ear, the top half of which was missing, the remnant border ragged and evil-looking. He turned away from the casket and looked at his family. The lot of greedy, haughty, arrogant, stuck up, useless wastes of carbon-based life forms that ever slithered across God's green earth. He glared at them, Vulpan eyes staring into Vulpan eyes, but he didn't say a word.

He took his paw out of his pocket, then quite deliberately flipped off the entire Vulpan family.

Then he walked right through them, to a tumultuous array of gasps and angry growls, even a few of his uncles trying to barrel through the clan to get their paws on him, being held back by other family members that didn't want the battery of paparazzi camped outside the cemetery's fence to get pictures of the Vulpan family brawling over the grave of their family head like backwood hillbillies, like hungry piranha denuding the corpse of a hapless victim.

The faster he could get away from them, the better. If anything, being disowned had been the best thing that ever happened to him. He hated his family, except for his sister, he hated the way they treated people, he hated the way people sucked up to them. Vilenne was the only Vulpan outside of himself that didn't think they were divine royalty, five rungs up the evolutionary ladder from all other furs. There wasn't a single non-fox anywhere in their family tree, and his father had been a radical purist, obsessed with keeping their bloodline pure and strong. Only the most elite and richest fox families who could trace their ancestry back hundreds of years even had a chance to get their children a date with a Vulpan, because of the vehemence of the elders of the family about purity and bloodlines.

"Kit," came a familiar call. He stopped and sighed, then turned around. Vilenne was coming up to him, and he looked away from her when she put her paws on his shoulders. "I'm glad you could make it, little bro. I know that couldn't be easy."

"Just be glad Clancy took my flamethrower at the front gate," he said in a humorless tone. "Or I'd have nuked that old bastard."

"I should have let you have it," she grinned. "But only if you fried Cybil along with him."

"Amen."

"I want to talk to you later, okay? After the reading of the will. Once everything's all settled."

"You mean after they read the part that says that anyone caught giving me money or assistance forfeits everything given to them in the will?" he asked bluntly.

“Yeah, that’s one of the parts they’re going to read,” she said with a wink. “But that’s just legal hogwash. He’s dead now, little bro, and I’m the one that’s going to be making the decisions now. I just don’t want you to think that you’re all alone.”

He looked into her eyes. Vulpan eyes. Her left eye was amber, but her right eye was green, the same as his, the same as her father’s, the same as his father before him. That unique trait had bred true through every descendent of Arthur Vulpan, Kit’s great-grandfather and the founder of Vulpan Shipyards. In a way, it was a Vulpan calling card. All of Kits’ cousins, aunts, uncles, great uncles, and great aunts all had the same eyes, left amber and right green. If anything, it had been quite a convenient means of squelching frivolous paternity suits brought against Kit’s grandfather back in the day, for he was a notorious skirt-chaser, and no child that didn’t have the Vulpan eyes would even be taken seriously as a bastard child of Kitstrom Vulpan Senior.

Back before the days of DNA.

“I like being alone, sis,” he said evenly, looking down into her eyes unwaveringly. “Aside from you, this family turned its back on me years ago. I wish I could say I was a better fox than them and forgive them, but it’s just not in me. Now that the bastard is dead, I can live the rest of my life without worrying about him coming up behind me to destroy it.”

“I can’t blame you, little bro,” she sighed. “But I’d like to try to put things right.”

“Nothing can put things right now, Vil,” he stated.

“Well, I can,” she said flippantly. “Suzy told me you packed up your apartment and gave her back the keys. Where are you going?”

“West,” he replied. “Far from here. Now that he’s dead, I have nothing to worry about.”

“You got a job?”

“Not yet. I’ll just keep going til I find a place I like, and settle in.”

“Have money?”

“Sis, I love you, I really do, but I don’t want any money from this family. Ever. Except for you, they turned their backs on me, too afraid of losing their trust funds and inheritances. They don’t care about me. All they care about is their fortune and their delusions they’re better than everyone else. Well, I want nothing from them. If I have to pay my way by washing dishes, well that’s money I know I earned.”

She gave him a long look, then chuckled softly. “If father found out you were washing dishes, I think he’d roll over in his grave.”

“No, he’d probably dance,” Kit grated. “That bastard did everything he could to ruin my life after I walked out. He’d see me washing dishes as some kind of just desserts. Then he’d try to have me fired.”

“And stain the Vulpan family honor? Inconceivable!” she said melodramatically, putting the back of her paw to her forehead and looking away.

“Let it be stained. It’s about time this family was stained, if only to show the blackness that boils inside their souls.”

She chuckled, then rose up on her toes and kissed him on the cheek. “Well, you have my number, little bro,” she told him. “If you ever need help.” She fidgeted with the front of his coat. “If you ever need to talk.” She smoothed out the lapels, then patted him on the shoulders. “If you ever need a friend, just call me. But don’t call me collect. I don’t think I could afford it,” she said with a grin and wink.

“You’re the only thing I’m regretting leaving behind, Vil,” he admitted, pulling her into a tight embrace.

“You’re only leaving me behind if you forget about me, Kit,” she said, patting his sides. “Go out there, bro. Find your place. Live. And if you ever need me, you know where I am. I’ll never turn my back on you.”

“That means a lot to me.”

“When are you leaving?”

“Now. My bus leaves in two hours. It’ll take me that long to walk down to the bus stop and catch a metro to the bus station, then change. I don’t think I want to ride the bus in a suit.”

“Walk? Bro, I’ll have Rogers drive you.”

“No. Six years ago, I walked out out the front door. I’ll walk again. That way, I can leave this place with my conscious clear.”

She sighed, then nodded. “It’s a long walk.”

“I’m used to walking.”

“Send me postcards?”

“Every time we stop,” he promised.

“I’d really like that. Kit...are you sure you don’t need any help?”

“Well, you could buy the postcards. I’m on a tight budget,” he smiled.

“Done,” she chuckled. She opened her tiny purse and took out a hundred dollar bill, and pushed it to him. “It’s the smallest I have, bro, so deal with it. And I expect a hundred dollars’ worth of postcards,” she winked.

“You’ll get them. I promise.”

He leaned down and gave her a long kiss on the cheek, then hugged her one last time. “I have to go, sis. Keep it real, okay?”

“I know Boston is nothing but a bad memory, but always remember that this is your home, little bro,” she told him. “And I’ll always be here when you need me.”

“Just promise me one thing.”

“Anything.”

“Don’t turn into him.”

“That is my solemn vow, bro,” she said, pushing away enough to look up into his eyes. “If I do, may God make my fur fall out.”

He chuckled. “Be good, sis.”

“I expect to see a postcard in the mail soon.”

“You will. I promise.”

He turned and walked away, towards photographers snapping hundreds of photos, his face resolute, her face regretful.

Just more fodder for the tabloids.

But finally. Finally, it was over. The bastard was dead, and he was free.

Chapter 1

The restaurant was busy, loud with the clatter of dishes and conversation, and thick with both smoke from cigarettes and the smoke wafting from the open grills. It was Friday night, and that was always busy at the Double J Steakhouse, just outside the Northcross mall in Austin, Texas. Customers could see their steaks sizzling on open grills in the back of the dining area, the kitchen doors just beside the grill array where red-shirted waiters and waitresses rushed back and forth to bring orders to their tables. There was quite a long line of customers waiting to get in, and that put the manager in a knot to get the tables turned over and ready for the next customers.

Kit wiped his brow, blew out his breath, and heaved up his large basin of dirty dishes, then set it on his hip as he wiped the table down. Bussing tables was a harsh business, but on Fridays it was murder because they were so busy. He hefted the full basin over his head and threaded his way through a narrow aisle mined with the tails of the patrons jutting out from their open-backed seats. He apologized his way through the throng and then hurried back to the kitchen, narrowly avoiding a ferret female waitress with brown hair who almost crashed into him carrying a tray of dishes, then set the basin down on the track and started feeding dishes through the opening and back to the dishwashers.

Fifteen more minutes. Fifteen more minutes, and he was done for the day. He kept telling himself that over and over again.

He caught his reflection in the chrome of the freezer by the dish window, and frowned. His reddish hair was all wild again, sticking to his right ear, and he still couldn't help but look at the void where the tip of his left ear should have been. Even after two years, he still wasn't used to seeing it gone. It was because he could only see it in a mirror, he reckoned, since was used to seeing the jagged white-furred scar on his right arm, just below his elbow and running halfway to his wrist, and the two white streaks of fur in his left arm where his fur had grown back over the wounds, but had come back in white instead of red.

Ancient history.

Vil had offered to pay for reconstructive surgery to replace the tip of his left ear, but he'd declined. He couldn't afford it, and he'd be damned if he took a penny of money from his family where his life didn't hang in the balance. He let her pay for the hospital bills when they put him back together, but he wouldn't allow her to pay to fix his ear.

"You better get moving before the Blimp catches you daydreaming," Candice teased as she came up to him. Candice was a rather cute doe with pretty brown eyes and a darling smile.

"I only have fifteen more minutes," he answered. "And two more days."

"Yeah, I heard about that. I'm gonna miss you, hon," she said, putting her paw on his shoulder. "Sure you can't hang around?"

He shook his head. "I put back enough money to move on," he told her. "I haven't run out of west yet, so I'd like to keep going."

She laughed. “Well, there’s only desert from here west,” she grinned. “Til you hit the Pacific, anyway.”

“Yeah. I’m kinda looking forward to seeing it.”

“I wish I could do what you’re doing,” she said as she started unloading dishes from her own basin. “See the world, one odd job at a time.”

“Do it,” he prompted.

“Not til I finish school, I won’t,” she laughed. “I’ve only got one more year to go! After that, I might look at doing it.”

“It’s been fun so far,” he told her, hefting his empty basin. “Let me get out there. I can do one more sweep before quitting time.”

Out on the floor, he worked quickly and efficiently, collecting up plates and glasses, and enduring the occasional stare. His eyes were unusual, he knew it, and he was a little used to people either staring at his eyes or gawking at his left ear and the white hair and fur around it. The Blimp, a fat bear that served as the night manager, prowled the area, watching him and the waitresses to make sure they were doing their jobs, but it didn’t really phase him. Kit did his job and he didn’t slack. He put in effort for the time he was paid, unlike some others in the restaurant. He moved to another table and quickly started clearing it, slipping aside as Alice, a cute little black mouse, grabbed up her tip from the table before moving on to check on her other customers. He cleared five more tables, then hefted his heavy burden up onto his shoulder and picked his way back to the kitchen, then started unloading the dishes onto the conveyer. Once that was done, he saw he had five more minutes, so he stacked some clean plates into the dish drolley for the waitresses, then stacked a few carts of clean glasses onto the pallet. But when the clock hit 7:00pm, he threw his towel over his shoulder and headed straight for the time clock. He punched out, went back and washed his hands, then changed out of his red shirt in the bathroom. He retrieved his backpack from the office, then headed out the employee's door in the back.

He usually didn't bail that fast, but he had an appointment today.

He walked the two blocks to the Java Joint, an internet café where he'd applied for a job but never got a callback, ordered a cup of tea, then sat down and opened his laptop. It was the only really expensive thing he owned, a gift from Vil for Christmas not two weeks after he left Boston, but he was glad she sent it. Using the laptop, they could correspond via email and video, using a videoconferencing program she'd had installed on the laptop before she sent it to him. All he needed was a broadband connection, and lucky for him this café was a wireless hotspot. He did more than just that on it, though. He started keeping a journal of his travels, people he'd met, things he'd seen, writing it all down, and he had to admit, a game of Solitaire or Hearts or Civilization made monotonous days go by a little faster. He started up the videoconferencing program, flipped the cover on the built-in webcam open, then waited for a connection, then smiled as Vil's face appeared in the window. He seated the headset on his face a little, then cut in the audio as he adjusted the microphone that hovered near his muzzle.

"Hey sis," he greeted. "You get my postcard?"

"Sure did," she answered. "Is that thing real?"

He laughed. "Sure is. I saw it. It's made out of plaster."

"I'm not surprised," she grinned. "So, how's life been treatin' ya, little bro?"

“Oh, same as always,” he told her. “I just got off work.”

“Oh? Where you working?”

“Bussing tables at a steakhouse,” he answered.

She sighed. “Bro, you have a degree. Couldn’t you at least try to get something a little more, well, dignified?”

“It’s hard to get those kinds of jobs quick, Vil,” he told her. “They like to interview, then call, and then interview. At least at the Double J, I had a job ten minutes after I filled out the application. I needed the money.”

“And whose fault is that?” she teased, giving him a grin.

“All mine,” he said immediately. “I didn’t budget very well, and it didn’t help that I got fired from that Wendy’s in Houston.”

“You got fired? Why?”

“Because they were breaking health regs, and I blew the whistle on ‘em,” he answered.

“Isn’t that illegal?”

“In the real world it is. For us wage slaves, there’s nothing we can do about it. What are we gonna do, hire a lawyer?”

She shook her head. “Don’t get me started, Kit,” she warned. “You know how I feel about that.”

“That’s your problem,” he grinned, then he scratched the side of his muzzle. “Just to warn ya, I’m moving on again next week.”

“You never gave me your address there,” she complained. “How can I keep up with you?”

“It keeps you from sending me any packages without my consent,” he teased.

“Well, you can’t blame me for being worried about you, little bro.”

“I appreciate that. How’s work?”

“Bleh,” she grunted, sticking her tongue out, which always made him chuckle. She had a habit of doing that when she was thinking about something unpleasant. “I fired Bundowski yesterday. That little bastard was trying to sell off the Baton Rouge foundry without my approval, probably some kind of kickback scheme. So he’s toast. Want his job? All yours.”

“No thanks,” he said with a shudder.

“Outside of that, it’s going pretty well. I’m looking at buying a shipyard in New Orleans called Avondale right now, and the New Hampshire shipyard just won a new Navy contract.”

“Sounds risky. I passed through New Orleans a few months ago, and it’s still kinda crazy down there, even after all this time since the hurricane.”

“Yeah, but they’re offering a pretty attractive price, and the shipyard comes with quite a few Navy contracts. I could send down some people from the New Hampshire and Virginia yards and get them restaffed quick. I’d just have to ram the merger approval through the Department of the Navy. They have to approve shipyard transactions where there’s active contracts.”

“Sounds like you more or less made up your mind.”

“Yeah, I’m kinda leaning towards buying it,” she nodded, then she adjusted her microphone a little. “Just waiting for the cost benefit analysis to see if the numbers crunch the right way. So, met anyone lately?" she winked.

"What is this? The Ice Queen, asking about my love life?" he teased.

"Oh, bite me, bro," she said, sticking her tongue out at him. "I'm busy now. I had my flings in college, I'll have you know, but I'm too busy right now to date."

"I haven't really dated either. Most femmes aren't too keen on going out with a fox like me, who'll be gone next month."

"You'd be surprised," she winked. "Aunt Sarah is sure trying to push me off on Steven Vastonne," she said, her tongue peeking out again. "What a stuck-up, insensitive, pig-headed prick."

"But he's got the blood," Kit said with a frown.

"And so Aunt Sarah keeps pushing him," Vil sighed with a nod. "I think I'm gonna marry this cute raccoon I saw down at Wal-Mart the other day," she mused.

Kit almost spewed tea all over his laptop. "Half the family would die of a heart attack!"

"Yeah. Almost makes it worth doing, doesn't it?"

Kit laughed. "What were you doing in Wal-Mart?" he asked curiously. "Isn't that a little lowest common denominator for you?"

"Hey, I needed a new blackberry battery and it was right there," she protested, tapping her muzzle with her forefinger.

"They have everything made in China, if it's cheap," he grinned. "I shop there all the time."

“If you show up with a yellow smiley face sticker, I’ll disown you myself,” she warned.

He laughed.

“Kit,” she said, a bit more seriously. “I want to send you something.”

“No.”

“Hear me out,” she said, putting her hand up. “I want to send you a cell phone.”

“I don’t really need one, sis. I have the laptop.”

“Yeah, but you can’t use it everywhere. I, I don’t like the idea of you out there without some kind of way to contact me in an emergency. I promise I’ll only send you the phone, and I’ll take care of the bill. That way you can always call someone if you have an emergency. Me, the cops, 911, whoever you need to. Will you let me?”

He turned it over in his mind, then finally nodded. “Alright. I’ll let you send it. But if there’s anything else in that box, I’ll come back up there and spank you.”

“Well, now I know how to get you to come home,” she teased. “Let me get a pen so you can give me your address.”

“Won’t work, sis, I’m staying in a mission,” he warned. “They don’t take deliveries.”

“Hmm. Give me the address anyway, and also where you’re working now. I’ll take care of it.”

“How?”

“Think like a Vulpan, silly boy,” she winked. “The mission may not take deliveries, but you will. I’ll run a messenger down there with it. If I have both addresses, that way he can find you no matter where you are when he arrives.”

“You’re gonna make someone fly down here just to give me a phone?”

“Sure am,” she grinned. “It’s the Vulpan way.”

“I’m glad I’m out of that family,” he grunted, which made her laugh.

“Hey! No insulting your big sister!”

“When you’re deserving of it, you will be insulted,” he teased.

She stuck her tongue out at him. “I’ll try to get it down there tomorrow morning. That work for you?”

“I have to be at work at ten.”

“Well, I know you’re not much of an early riser. Mind if he gets it to you at work instead?”

“That’s fine.”

“Okay, give me the address.”

“I’m not sure of the exact street address, sis. But it’s the Double J Steakhouse just across from the Northcross mall here in Austin.”

“That’s all I need. He’ll find it,” she promised. “Where are you going from there?”

“I really don’t know. I’ll jump on the bus and get off when the mood hits me.”

“Sometimes I wonder how you do it.”

“It’s actually not that bad. I’ve been keeping a journal of it on the laptop.”

“Oooh! Send it to me! I wanna read it!”

“Well, sure, okay. I’ll email a copy to you tonight. That okay?”

“Fine, fine. Now I get to see the world through your eyes,” she grinned. “It should be really cool!”

He laughed. “No wonder you drove that old bastard crazy. You sure don’t speak like a Vulpan. Six years of private school and proper English lessons, down the drain.”

She laughed brightly. “At least you haven’t lost your Boston accent!” she teased. “I should send a cah down for you, bro!”

“It’s not that bad,” he said defensively. “Six months in the south has taken the edge off of it.”

“But I can still hear it,” she winked. “Hate to say it, little bro, but I’m gonna have to cut this short. I have some reports to go through before bed, and it’s getting late here. What time is it there?”

“Around eight. It’s, what, nine there?”

She nodded. “I’m looking at three hours of boring reports before bed. And I want to read some of your journal too.”

“Alright. I’ll look for that messenger tomorrow.”

“Okay, bro. Send me those files, okay?”

“They’re on their way as soon as we finish.”

“Then start sending it,” she grinned. “Okay, next appointment,” she said, holding up her blackberry. “Wednesday, any time after six. That work for you?”

“I’ll be on a bus.”

“Damn. Well, I’ll just call ya, okay? Since you’ll have a new phone,” she winked.

“Heh. Alright, sis. Talk to you later. Love you.”

“Love ya, bro. Be good.”

Her picture vanished from the window, replaced by a big black screen with DISCONNECTED blinking within it. He put his black-furred paws together over the laptop and laced his fingers, then set his muzzle atop them, lost in thought. A phone. He couldn’t disagree with her reasoning, and that was the only reason he accepted it. It would be a little safer. And knowing his sister, it would be one of those phones that would work anywhere in the entire world, like hers. That global plan deal. Although...it would give the family a means to get in touch with him, if they ever wanted to bother him.

Not that would happen, really. The old bastard’s hand kept reaching out from the grave to keep Kit separated from the others. The aid clause was still in the will. Anyone caught giving him anything they got from their inheritances could have it taken away. Vil was the only one who dared to go against the will, but that was because she was the one in control of the family business, and she’d already threatened to take the entire family to court to have the will invalidated and make her executor if anyone in the family dared try to get her cut out.

She could do it. Vil was a sweet femme, loving and considerate, but she could be as tenacious as a wolverine when she was angry, she was a genius, and she had the Vulpan ruthlessness when it came to business. That's how she got the nickname "The Ice Queen," because she could be a cold bitch when dealing with people she didn't like, and when she was at work, she was all business. The family was afraid of her, because they knew that if she threatened to do it, that meant she was confident she could pull it off. And none of them were particularly keen on the idea of having Vilenne Vulpan, the Ice Queen, in control of their money.

Such a misleading nickname, he often thought. Vil got that nickname while in school because of her icy demeanor when dealing with boys looking to try to woo a rich femme, a Vulpan no less, and some reporter had latched onto it when she took over as the CEO of the family business. It was an indication of his sister's personality. In private, she was warm, funny, kind, and sweet, but in public, she was every inch a Vulpan. Cool, calculating, dangerous, and almost ruthless. For the first few months, she needed that cold nature to sweep out the lackeys and sycophants from the company and weed out the backstabbers like Bundowski, those who wouldn't accept the young female as their boss, or thought they knew better than a wet-nosed little kit that was just out of college. She cleaned house quickly, and now had the company running smoothly the way she wanted it. But under it all, she was still Vil, his big sis, who had been a shoulder to cry on when their mother died when he was eight, and the reassuring, steady presence in his life that served as more than a sister. She'd become more protective of him after their mother died, more like a mother herself than a sister, and she was still the only member of his family that he could honestly say he loved.

The rest of them could go to hell.

He blinked, and remembered he made a promise. He sent the files holding his journals as a series of emails to her, one for each state he'd visited since leaving Boston, then shut down the laptop and closed it. He finished his tea, then simply sat there a moment and listened to Bunvayne playing over the speakers as the song finished up.

“Oooh, look at him, JD!” Sandy squealed in a low whisper, elbowing her and pointing. The chinchilla leaned in close to her, almost cheek to cheek. “That missing piece of his ear makes him look so dangerous, doesn't it? I wonder if he's one of those rough types.”

“Sandy,” Jessie sighed. “The last thing I need right now is another rough type.”

“Yeah, well, it was just a thought,” she said, a little less enthusiastically.

That was really the last thing she needed. Burke had been cute too, with rugged wolf looks and a good bod, but the instant he dared to slap her during an argument, it was over immediately. She wouldn't put up with that kind of treatment, and besides, her brother would have killed him if she ever told him it happened.

Really. Why did some males think that hitting a female was a way to win an argument?

She hadn't really wanted to come out, but Sandy could be a real pest sometimes. She knew what happened, and she felt it was some kind of moral obligation to help her sorority sister.

A lop bunny sat down on the far side of Sandy and started making small talk. Sandy was insufferably cute and perky, and she could talk to strangers like that. She was so fearless! But, it gave Jessie a moment to secretly look at that fox again, without Sandy pointing out body parts and making all kinds of lewd observations. Something about him... tickled at her. He seemed vaguely familiar to her, somehow. She didn't know how. Had he stood behind her in line down at the cafeteria? Had he been in one of her classes? She'd seen him before, she was certain of it.

Well, he was kinda cute. He was a bit more rugged than most foxes, with a slightly broader muzzle, and looked a little taller too. And his furry arms were a little bigger than the usual college student. This guy worked out. He shifted his arms, and she realized he had a jagged white stripe in the fur of his forearm, ending just before the color of his fur changed to form the dark mittens on their paws common among foxes.

"Scars," Sam said as she sat down beside them, adjusting her round-lensed glasses.

"Huh?" they asked in unison.

"The white stripes on his arm. Those are scars. Probably gotten the same time he lost that piece of his ear."

"Says you, miss Pre-Med," Sandy grinned. "And who says we were looking at him?"

"Mmm-hmm," the skunk intoned, staring directly at the small gray chinchilla.

Sandy's cheek fur ruffled slightly, which made her eyes flash. Somehow, Sam could always do that to Sandy, despite the fact that Sandy was one of the most fearless femmes Jessie had ever met in her life.

“We should go say hi to him,” Sandy said with a conniving grin.

“You mean you want me to go say hi to him,” Jessie corrected.

“Sure, go for it! He’s cute, and now we know he’s not a rough type!”

“He’s got some money, too. That’s a Sabletech DV laptop. Those things are expensive,” Sam reasoned.

“That’s just another good reason!” Sandy said in an excited whisper. “Go on!”

“I,” she hedged. He was cute, that was for sure, but something told her...he didn’t want to be bothered. “No. He seems like he’s just fine. I don’t think we should bother him.”

“You are such a chicken!” Sandy said, then she got up, adjusted her tanktop, and then marched right towards him.

“Sandy!” Jessie said in a strangled whisper, her fur already ruffling out. She was going to do it! She was really going to go over there and try to set them up!

Lost in the rhythms of the song, imagining in his head the chords he’d have to use to play the guitar component of the song, Kit was oblivious to the world. Music had been one of his few escapes from reality since he left home. The hammering of the drums, the melodic rise and fall of the lead instruments, the angst and anguish in the voice of the lead singer, they merged with the haunting lyrics to form a ballad of loss and dejection.

Nobody knows me.

Nobody cares.

Nobody sees me.

Nobody stares.

I'm lost in the world.

I'm lost in my head.

I've lost my girl.

I've no tears to shed.

Come back to me;

My Dark Angel.

We were meant to be;

My Dark Angel.

Take my soul with you.

Before you return

Before you return.

.

Return to hell.

The lyrics were vague, but Kit could see the heart of them. A male had lost his soulmate, not to a breakup, but in death, and he mourned and hoped for death so they could be reunited. The artist's use of non-rhyming lyrics in the chorus was unusual, holding the rhymic finishing lyric until the very end of the song, but it provided extra impact, more emphasis on the core of the song's meaning.

It was very clever.

He really needed to practice more with the guitar. He could play it some, but he was nowhere near good enough to play in public and not feel like an idiot. Besides, singing had always been his strong suit. His family said he had a good voice, and he actually rather liked it. Too bad he was born to a father who thought music was a waste of time and energy, and refused to allow him to take band or join a chorus or anything like that.

“Hi!”

Kit started, almost knocking his teacup off the table. He found himself staring up at a gray-furred chinchilla with large brown eyes, round ears with three piercings, and a huge grin. That grin slipped off her face when he looked up at her, and then she suddenly clapped her hands and gave out a little squeal.

“Your eyes are beautiful!” she exclaimed, reaching down and putting her paws over his wrists. “I’ve never seen anyone with two different colored eyes before that weren’t faked with contacts! Were you born that way?”

“I, uh, yeah,” he said, trying to get his bearings. She talked a thousand words a minute, and it was hard to keep up with her. “Uh, thanks for the complement.”

“You come here often?”

“Just a few times. It’s the only place I can use the internet.”

“Aww, nuts, I thought you were in U.T.” U.T. was the University of Texas, which was down on the south side of Austin, right by the state capitol.

“No, I went to U-Mass,” he corrected with a shake of his head.

“I thought you were a Yankee,” she teased, patting his wrists. “I can hear it in your accent.”

“Guilty,” he said with a chuckle.

“So, can I sit a minute?”

“I guess so,” he shrugged.

She seated herself across from him. “It’s nice to meet a guy first, without him coming over and laying all kinds of corny lines on us,” she grinned. “Sorry I scared ya.”

“I was listening to the music. I zone out sometimes when I’m doing it.”

“My sis does the same thing. Then again, she’s a music major. I think she’d marry some of those classical composers if they were dug out of their graves.” She gave him a devious little grin. “Now, let’s get down to business.”

“Business?”

“Yeah. My friend over there just broke up with her asshole of an ex-boyfriend,” she said, pointing to his left. “She’s cute, and she’s available.

You're cute, you don't look like you're attached, and I thought you might like to ask her out."

He glanced over. In a booth against the wall, just under a movie poster of Star Wars, two femmes were sitting. One of them was a rather serious looking skunk, with large round glasses, kinda cute in a studious sort of way, and the other was a cream-furred female cat, but she had blond hair, black ears, and black mittens on her paws. Her blue eyes were wide, her face fur was virtually standing on end, and she looked mortified.

She was gorgeous.

In one glance, he took her in. She was wearing a blue designer shirt and a silver bracelet on her right wrist. Her hair was perfectly cut and styled in a long side-parted poof that hovered over her eyes, tucked up under her opposite ear. She was very shapely from what he could see of her, filling out her shirt nicely.

Though she was the most beautiful femme he'd ever seen, he just wasn't sure he was ready to even try to talk to her. He wasn't just worried that he wasn't ready to enter the dating scene, but there was a very real fear about how his family would react if their disowned embarrassment started taking up with a cat. He may not be a part of the family anymore, but he could still be a liability to their reputation.

"Well, her boyfriend must have been an utter idiot to let someone like her slip through his fingers," he said evenly, looking back at the chinchilla. "She's beautiful."

"So, that's even more reason to go introduce yourself," the chinchilla pressed, grabbing his paw. "Come on, I'll introduce you!"

“No thank you,” he said, with sincere regret. “I’m leaving in a few days, so I’m afraid I’m not exactly what she’d be looking for.”

“Aww! You’re leaving? Going back to Massachusetts?”

He shook his head. “I’m going west.”

“Where?”

“I don’t know yet. I’ll go until I find a place that, well, invites me to stop. Then I’ll stay there a while and try to find out why it wanted me there,” he said, a distant look in his eyes.

“How romantic! So you just go until you find a place to stop?”

He nodded.

“Wow, what a way to live! Imagine everything you get to see and do. It’s like living a vacation!”

“Until you get hungry or need someplace to sleep. Then this little issue called money shows up and spoils it,” he chuckled.

“Well, why don’t you go over there and talk to my friend JD,” she offered. “Maybe you can sweep her off her feet and take her with you,” the chinchilla purred to him.

“Girls like her won’t have anything to do with people like me,” he said evenly, but with a hint of finality. “She has a life and friends. All I have is the road.”

“Well, if you sweet-talked me enough, I might break up with Bobby and tag along,” she winked.

He chuckled. He patted her paw, then leaned in and kissed her lightly on the cheek. “It’s a tempting offer, but I’ll have to pass. And it’s time for me to go. Thank you for a wonderful chat, uh…”

“Sandy,” she said, taking his paw and shaking it.

“Kit,” he smiled.

She giggled. “Kit? Your parents named you Kit? That’s like JD’s parents naming her Kitten, or—“

“Why does everyone always say that,” he sighed, throwing his paws up in exasperation.

“Well, because—“

“I know why,” he cut her off, which made her giggle again. He stood up and picked up his laptop, then smiled down at her.

“Why would they do something like that to you?”

“It’s short for something that’s even worse,” he said with a shudder. He hated his name, and he wouldn’t go by his middle name because that’s what his bastard of a father was called.

“Oooh, what?”

“Never in a million years,” he said with finality, then he pushed in his chair.

“Maybe you can come back tomorrow and we can talk some more?” she asked.

“I work up until I leave. I doubt I’ll have time. Night, Sandy. It was nice meeting you.”

“You too!”

And with that, he extricated himself from the talkative chinchilla. He passed right by the booth holding the skunk and the cat, and he couldn't help but look at her one more time. Her cheek fur poofed out almost instantly when she looked at him, but he just gave her a genuinely compassionate smile, and said not a word to her. Lord knows, her friend probably embarrassed her half to death already.

Such a beautiful cat. The sad part was, most of him really wanted to sit down next to her in that booth and talk to her, but he knew that that was something he'd better not visit on some poor unsuspecting girl. If she knew about him, she might consider him to be lying, just pretending, then the awful reality would hit and she'd be besieged by tabloid reporters and angry Vulpans threatening her to stay away from one of their own. Even if he was disowned, he was still blue-blood, and no feline tramp should even dare look in his direction, they'd tell her.

He wouldn't drop that hell on her, no matter how beautiful she was, or how much he might want to sit in that booth and talk to her.

“So, what did he say?” Sam asked with uncharacteristic curiosity as Sandy came drifting back to the table.

“He's so romantic! He's working his way across the country, just stopping wherever he pleases. He said he knows to stop when the town invites him to stay. Wow!” she gushed. “Did you see his eyes? Weren't they gorgeous?”

“I’ve never seen anything like that before,” Sam said clinically. “At least not in person. I’ve seen pictures of it in my medical journals, though. It’s a genetic mutation.”

“Oh, stop trying to make it all science-y!” Sandy complained. “Can’t you see the beauty just for beauty’s sake?”

“JD? JD? Hello?” Sam said, waving her white-mitted paw in front of the cat’s face. Jessie blinked, then glanced at the skunk.

He was so handsome. Even with the scars and the missing ear, he was a handsome fox, and his eyes were—wow. They were beyond gorgeous. She looked at him, and she wasn’t even able to talk. It was almost, well, intimidating. But that wasn’t new for her, since she was naturally shy to begin with.

And again, this strange, nagging feeling that she’d seen him somewhere before.

“Oh yeah, she likes him,” Sandy grinned. “I should have asked where he works!” the chinchilla said, smacking herself in the forehead.

“I’ve...seen him before,” Jessie said slowly, blinking and looking at the table. “I don’t know where. But I have.”

“Probably bumped into him at the Circle K,” Sam noted.

“Maybe.” Or maybe not, she mused to herself.

Early shift at the Double J was busy in one way, relaxing in another. It was their job to set up the restaurant to open, which was pretty easy. Kit did whatever needed to be done, from setting out chairs to cutting up vegetables in the kitchen to vacuuming the carpets. The Blimp didn't work days, instead it was Sheila, a mongoose with a pretty laid-back disposition, so much so she brought a Game Boy with her to work and often played it in corners during lulls. Unlike the Blimp, she trusted her crew and knew everything would get done, and she allowed them to go about it without trying to loom over them and micro-manage. That was why Kit always smiled when he saw he was on dayshift.

He was a little distracted today, though. He'd already warned Sheila that someone was going to come see him and he might need about ten minutes when they arrived, and she was alright with it. He kept an eye on the door while they were getting ready to open, but got busy in the kitchen helping them change out a gas cylinder for the fountain drink machine, because the fitting was stripped and they couldn't get the hose off.

Saturday was slow at first, but it got busy quick after about one o'clock, so it was important to get all the little things done before they got slammed. They also usually had a short-handed staff until about one o'clock, which was why Kit worked wherever he was needed when there weren't any dishes to clear.

"Hey, Kit!" Sheila boomed from the door to the dining room. "Those people you said were coming are here to see ya!"

"Sure, hold on a minute!" he called back. "We almost got this fixed! Okay, hold it steady, Lucy, let's try one more time." His arms quivered as he struggled to unscrew the fitting, then the nut cracked and it turned with a light squeal of protest.

"My hero!" the cougar said with a laugh, patting him on the shoulder. "I can get it from here, cutie. Go take care of whatever that boss wants."

Kit came out of the back cleaning his hands on a rag, then almost fell over!

There, flanked by two large panthers in dark suits, wearing a serious gray dress skirt and blazer and holding a briefcase, was Vil!

“Sis!” he said in surprise as she lowered her sunglasses, showing him the family eyes.

She laughed and slammed into him, giving him a rough hug. “Little bro!” she called. “It’s so good to see you!”

“I never dreamed—“

“That’s why I did it,” she grinned. “You’re so thin! And look at this!” she said, picking at his red uniform shirt. “Red does not look good on you, bro. You need to talk to whoever gave you this.”

He laughed. “I seriously doubt they’d listen,” he said. “What are you doing here?”

“Do you have any idea how hard you are to track down?” she complained. “I haven’t seen you in six months either!”

“You see me every week.”

“Well, I can’t hug you ever week,” she added, giving him a little squeeze, but careful not to put any pressure on his back. “Now give your big sister a kiss!” she ordered, tapping her cheek imperiously.

He laughed and did as he was commanded, kissing her on the cheek.

“Where’s your boss? I want to talk to him.”

“Her. And don’t you dare,” he warned in a serious tone.

“I won’t say a word,” she said, sticking her tongue out at him. “Just go have a seat. I want to make sure you won’t get in trouble if you sit down and talk with me a while.”

“Well, alright,” he acquiesced. He went over and sat down at the nearest table, but Vil’s two panther escorts didn’t move from the front door. Vil stood near the kitchen door with Sheila for a few minutes, chatting with her, and they both looked over at him once. Then she laughed and nodded, then went back into the kitchen.

“There, all taken care of,” she said, putting her briefcase on the table. She opened it and took out a box holding a Motorola phone. “Here you are,” she told him. “It’s on a satellite plan, bro. It’ll work almost anywhere. Use it however you want. The number for the phone is on a post-it stuck to the phone inside the box. I have my work, home, and cell numbers in its address book, and a few other numbers you might want to have.”

“Like?”

“Like Clancy, for one. He basically helped me raise you, bro. He’s been really worried about you.”

“You mean you helped him raise me,” Kit grinned.

“Technicalities,” she said with a dismissive wave of her paw, which made him laugh. “Now, I’ve totally murdered my entire schedule for next week, so let’s make it worth it.”

He did. They talked over nearly two hours, about anything and everything. He told her all about his travels and what he’d seen and done, and she went into exhaustive detail about work and home. She told him all about the little war going on in the family over the will, and there were already a couple of lawsuits filed over this or that cousin that felt he was unfairly cut out. It also turned out that their bastard father's brothers and sisters also felt a little upset that they weren't given the company to operate, going instead to his daughter, and she felt that two of their uncles, Kitstrom Jacob and Kitstrom Zachary, might try to challenge the will in court.

"They don't have a prayer, but it could be a little distracting," she snorted. "There was an executor clause in his power of attorney that transferred all the shares over to me before he died. Hell, the board at the company approved it long before it happened. I was the next in line way before dad's health started going on him. That torpedos their lawsuit right there. The way I was given the shares makes it impossible for them to try to get them through the court, and I've already hired Ursus and Vorick to look into invalidating dad's will."

Kit whistled. "Expensive."

"Yeah, well, Clancy brought me a copy of an email Cybil sent to her father looking at the possibility of getting me cut out through the back door, because of you, and also a way to try to invalidate the pre-nup so she can lay a claim on the inheritance. So I'm going to beat her to the punch. And since the family's all pissed off over what they didn't get, I guess I'll just have to void Dad's will and take control of everything myself. And since I was given control of the company while he was still alive, there's not a damn thing Uncle Jake and Uncle Zach can do about it."

"I'm sorry to hear about that, sis. I knew that would be a shitstorm when he died, but I was hoping it would pass you over."

"Watch your language, young man," she teased with a wink.

"I'm an adult now, sis. So bite me."

She laughed. “Well, the firm feels they have a viable case to invalidate the will, because of you,” she winked. “Dad’s obsession with you indicates a lack of sound mind, in their opinion. After all, a man has to be crazy to do what Dad did to his own son.”

“Heh. I’d love to see that. I know it would make that bastard roll in his grave if I was un-disowned, but at least in that regard, he’ll get his wish. I’m never going back to Boston, Vil. They turned their backs on me when I needed help the most, and I won’t ever feel like I’m a part of them again.”

“Well, as long as you don’t turn your back on me, I can live with that,” she told him seriously.

“Never.”

“Good,” she smiled. “I read your journals, bro, and they’re incredible! You should publish them!”

“They’re not that good,” he said dismissively.

“Bro, the way you describe people and things, it’s like I was there,” she told him seriously. “I almost peed myself when I read about that rabbit in New Orleans and the soup can!” She broke out into a gale of delighted laughter.

“Well, it was his story, not mine,” Kit chuckled.

“That’s just it, bro. It was like he was there telling me the story, not you just writing down what you heard. It was amazing! Do me a favor.”

“What?”

“Keep doing it. You always wondered what your calling was...well, I think you found it. I really think you could make it as a writer.”

“I don’t think I’d be a good writer. I could never make a deadline, and I’m not that good at making things up. All I can really do is write about what I’ve heard, or seen.”

“Not every writer is a fiction writer, Kit. At the very least, you should put these up on a blog. And write your journal as a blog. You could call it ‘A Poor Little Rich Boy’s Experiences In America’,” she said grandly, putting her hands out as if seeing her title in lights.

“I think Richie Rich would come after me with a switchblade for stealing his nickname,” Kit mused, which made Vil erupt into laughter.

“You should think about it.”

“I will,” he promised.

“So, you have, what, three days?”

“About. I’ll be a little sad to leave.”

“Why is that?”

He glanced at her. “I saw a femme I wanted to get to know better,” he admitted.

Her eyes brightened and she leaned over the table. “Okay, now we’re getting to the good stuff!” she giggled. “Tell me all about her! Where did you meet? Is she pretty?”

“I didn’t really meet her,” he said, then described the circumstances in the café the night before. “I wanted to sit down and talk to her, but all I could see was that bastard and the family, just waiting to bury her if they knew I was going out with a cat. Can you imagine what would happen if they found out a Vulpan was going out with another species?”

“Yeah,” she said, frowning a little. “That would be a little messy, but nothing that couldn’t be worked out. But was she pretty?”

“She was the most beautiful femme I’ve ever seen in my life.”

“Even prettier than me?” she said with mock rejection. He slapped her on the arm, which made her laugh. “That’s okay, if you thought I was pretty like that, I’d start getting worried,” she teased. “Did you get her name?”

“No, her friend called her JD, but I seriously doubt that was her name,” he said, with a little sigh, putting his elbow on the table and leaning his cheek into his paw.

“Well, we need to get you fixed before you see her again,” she said, reaching up and tweaking his half-missing left ear.

“Eh, I’m kinda used to it now,” he told her, letting her do something he wouldn’t let any other fur do, touch his injured ear.

“I hate it. When will you let me get it fixed for you?”

“When I can pay for it myself.”

“Bro—“

“No, Vil. And that’s final.”

She sighed, then nodded. “You hungry? I think I’d like to try some of the food here.”

“Food?” he said, then he gasped and looked at the clock. “Aw, crud! We’ve been here talking for hours!”

“It’s alright,” she laughed. “Your boss said you have the rest of the day off.”

“But I need the mon—“

Vilenne grabbed his muzzle, clamping his mouth shut. “Don’t you dare say that five-letter word in front of me,” she told him with serious eyes. “Now, when I take my paw away, you’d better not say anything but yes. Got that, young fur?”

He nodded silently.

She released his muzzle, but he just gave her a sly grin. “Money,” he completed, which made her both laugh and haul off and slap him on the shoulder.

“Now, I’m sure they’ve been watching us all this time, so let’s at least use it.” She looked back towards the kitchen and waved her arms. When no one came out, she put her fingers to her muzzle and gave out an ear-splitting whistle. Even now, he had no idea how she could do that. He’d tried to learn how she did it for years.

Seconds later, Amanda, a rather cute german shepherd, rushed up with a order pad. “I take it you wanted to see me?” she said with a bright smile.

“Amanda, this is my sister, Vil,” Kit introduced.

“Oh, we heard who she was,” she winked. “If you don’t mind me saying, I think your eyes are lovely, miss Vil. I didn’t know you had them too.”

“It’s a kind of family trait,” Vil winked. “Everyone from our great-grandad down has the eyes. It’s how we know each other in a room full of foxes.”

Amanda chuckled. “Hungry?”

“You bet! What’s good?”

“Everything,” she answered. “Want a menu?”

“Please.”

“Good. Don’t trust this one’s food choices. All he ever eats are hamburgers,” Amanda teased.

“Well, some things never change,” Vil laughed.

Amanda brought her a menu, and she spent a long moment looking at it. “Oh, yeah. Marcus! Stav! Go ahead and get something to eat, on me!” she called to the two panthers who still stood silently in the entry foyer, near the receptionist’s podium.

The two panthers took a table near the two foxes, and Amanda brought them menus as well. She came back and gave them a bright smile, lingering her glance at Kit. “Ready?”

“Yup! I’ll take the ribeye, rare,” she answered. “No potato. Put this shrimp bowl here on the side in its place.”

“We can do that, no problem. What do you want to drink?”

“Milk please,” she answered.

“What do you want, Kit?” she grinned.

“I’ll just take a hamburger. Jimmy knows how I like them,” he answered.

“You bet. I’ll get it out to you as quick as it’s done, ‘kay?”

“Sooooo,” Vil sounded after Amanda hurried off. “Think you’re gonna go, or maybe stay a while?”

“My head and my conscious tells me to go. Another part of me is trying to change their minds.”

Vil laughed. “Would that be your heart, or perhaps something a bit further south?”

“I’m not sure yet.”

She giggled.

“I dreamed about her last night,” he admitted, his words without their usual crispness as he started to zone out, usually something he only did when a song he liked was playing on the stereo. “I don’t usually remember my dreams, but I remembered that one.”

“What happened? Something you can’t mention to your sister?” she teased.

He blinked. “No, nothing like that,” he said, his cheeks ruffling slightly. “I just had the guts to sit down and talk to her, that’s all. And she told me her name.”

“What was it?”

“I don’t remember. It’s one of those things where you hear, but you don’t hear, and it’s like you heard. If you know what I mean.”

“Well, maybe you should think of hanging around a while, then,” Vil urged. “Find an apartment. Get a better job than this. Maybe get into a position where you do have the guts to talk to her.”

“But the family—“

“Bro, you said it yourself. They turned their backs on you. You’ve been your own fox since you were sixteen, and no thanks to them. You don't owe the family a damn thing. Don't let them run your life now. Do what you want. If you want to chase after this cat and see where it goes, then by great-grandad's green right eye, do it!"

"I'd love to, but...I dunno. I wouldn't even know what to say. How could I explain it, sis? 'Oh, by the way, I'm one of the Boston Vulpans, but I'm as poor as a church mouse and my family might want you dead if they knew about you.' Not quite the kind of smalltalk that's gonna get us on the right foot, is it?"

"Just be yourself, bro. That's all you need to be, and all you should ever be."

"That's the problem," he growled.

"Hey, never know til you try," she teased. "What's the worst that could happen?"

"Uncle Zach could have her killed," Kit said with a serious look. "You know how maniacal he is about our bloodline."

"I don't think it would go quite that far."

"Well, I do."

"Then I'll just have to do something about that, I suppose," Vil said dismissively. "Once I have the will voided and they find me holding all their purse strings, let's see how creative they get."

"I'd be careful about that, sis. If you back them into a corner like that, they might surprise you when they come out swinging."

"It won't be a bother at all, bro," she shrugged. "I'll just remind them that they turned their backs on you years ago, so what you do now is none of their damned business. You've already been disowned. If any of them thinks they're going to put themselves in our father's shoes where you're concerned, I'm going to bust out the sledgehammer and start bashing some toes."

"Nothing would make me happier. The day I wake up and don't remember who I am and where I came from will be the happiest day of my life."

"You're so mean to me," she teased.

"Well, not counting you, sis. Never you." He took her paws in his own and squeezed gently.

"Now, where is that food?" she complained. "I need to start thinking of going back."

"It won't take long," he promised.

Five minutes later, their food was on the table. Vil took one bite of her steak and almost quivered. "Mmmmmmmmm, oh wow, you weren't kidding! This is better than any steak I've ever had in Boston!"

"They don't know how to make steak north of Arkansas," Amanda teased as she put platters down in front of the two panthers. "If you want real steak, you have to come where we take making steak as seriously as a pastor takes God."

Vil laughed, almost losing her mouthful of steak.

Kit enjoyed his hamburger as his sister devoured the steak, then went through the shrimp quickly. "Mmm, I wish they delivered, but it'd be cold by the time it got home," she giggled. "Amanda! Can you have them grill me another one and put it in some foil? If it microwaves and tastes half as good as it does fresh, it's still better than what I can get at home!"

"One more steak, coming up!" she called from near the kitchen doors and hurried inside.

"It is very good steak, madam," one of the panthers agreed. "I'll go talk to their chefs, if you'd like, and take some notes for Deward."

"That's a great idea!" she said with a nod.

The panther stood up and took a small notepad from his inside pocket, then approached the kitchen door. He opened it and called out. Sheila peeked out and gave him and Vil a curious look, but both of them just waved her on. She nodded, and the panther disappeared into the kitchen with her.

"Stav is always so thoughtful," she chuckled. The two panthers were unknown to him in person, but her emails told him who they were. They were bodyguards, and had worked for her for about a year. She described them as utterly professional, discrete, and quite intelligent. They were twin brothers, with twenty years of impeccable service as the personal bodyguards of some of the biggest names in the world.

Kit endured several more minutes of his sister trying to subtly sway him into doing what she said, but he was quite adamant. The only area where he showed any signs of wavering was in his decision to leave Austin or stay. "I, I just don't know," he sighed, leaning his head back. "I'll have to think about it."

Amanda returned with a large styrofoam box. "Here we are, Miss Vil," she said. "One rare ribeye, double foil wrapped. It should stay hot for a while. Jimmy said if you nuke it, just pour some water or marinade over it and cook it in a sealed container. That should keep it from drying out as it heats up.”

“I’ll keep that in mind,” Vil said as she took the box from her. “May I have the check for us and my panther friends please? Oh, and if you wouldn’t mind, separate Kit’s burger from it. I have to pay for that separately.”

“They still watch the bank accounts even after the old bastard died?”

“Like a hawk,” she nodded, finishing her milk. “But they can’t make a mouse’s squeak about what I pay for in cash earned from my boutique. That’s my money. It has nothing to do with the family.”

The boutique was indeed just that. It was something she had to set up as part of her work in Harvard, to build a business from the ground up, and do it for real. She had taken a two thousand dollar initial investment and parlayed it into a successful boutique in downtown Boston, where it made a tidy profit every year. The success of Blue Buttons Boutique was one of the reasons why the board of Vulpan Shipyards had agreed with his bastard father to allow Vil to succeed him as head of the company. When it came to business, Vil was every bit a Vulpan.

God, he wished he could have been there when the bastard made that announcement. He must have chewed on his own tongue before saying it.

The old bastard’s will was quite specific. It stated that anyone that helped Kit using family assets would forfeit their inheritances. Vil’s outside income from her boutique was no part of the will, so she could spend that money to help him if she so chose. But he still resisted it when she did so, because he knew his family would try to find some way to twist it to try to get Vilenne cut out of the will...more for them.

Amanda returned with two checks. Vil handed her a platinum Visa for one, and a hundred dollar bill for the other. "My and my panther friends' dinners on the card, his dinner with the cash, please."

"Yes ma'am," Amanda said with a nod. "I'll be right back.

"Okay, bro, last chance. Is there any way I can convince you to come home?"

"Absolutely none," he stated adamantly.

She sighed. "Alright. You have the phone now, bro. Please, please, use it, okay?"

"Well, you have the number, so I'm sure you'll make sure to remind me when you think I'm not keeping in touch," he chuckled.

"You bet your furry butt I will," she grinned.

Amanda returned. Vil signed for the card, took the change, then pushed fifty of it back to the startled waitress. "Because you've earned every penny," Vil winked. "And here, take this and give it to the cook, for being so considerate to me," she added, handing her a twenty. "And give this to Sheila for being so kind to give me and my brother time." She handed her the other twenty, leaving nothing but pocket change in her paw.

"Ohmahgawd, thank you, miss Vil!" she said, then she ran excitedly back towards the kitchen, waving the bills in her hand. "She tipped us!" she squealed as she vanished into the kitchen.

Vil handed the box holding the steak to one of her guards, then picked up her briefcase and stood up. Kit too stood up, and he shared a long embrace with her. “You be good down here, bro,” she told him. “And think about that cat. All I can say is don’t leave. Find her. Chase her. See where it can go. Don’t let the family deny you any chance at happiness.”

“I’ll, I’ll give it serious thought, sis,” he promised. He was always honest with Vil, no matter what.

She pushed back to look up at him, and patted his shoulders. “Well, I’m proud of you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan,” she said with a grin. “And I’m proud to say that my brother washes dishes.”

He laughed, then leaned forward and put his forehead against hers. “You always were a nut.”

“That just proves we’re related,” she teased back. “I love ya, bro. I’ll see you soon. Bye.” She kissed him on the cheek, then turned and walked away. He watched her go around and to the entry foyer, and then her guards opened the door for her and escorted her out into the parking lot.

He sighed. He missed her. She was the only family he had, and thank God she had never given up on him.

He glanced around. Some of the customers were looking at him, and six faces were crowded into the doorway to the kitchen, staring at him with silly grins. “Kitstrom! Oh, Kitstrom! Wash dishes for me!” Sheila called loudly. “If it doesn’t chafe your delicate, noble hands!”

His day manager ducked into the kitchen with a squeal when he threw a full napkin roll of silverware at her.

But the surreal day was over now. He pocketed the new phone and went back to work. There was still four hours on the clock, and he owed that and more to Sheila for being such a wonderful boss.

Outside, Vilenne Vulpan stood with Marcus as Stav brought the car around, putting her sunglasses back on. “Marcus,” she said in a cool tone, as the business vixen in her began to reassert itself, now that she was back in public.

“Yes, madam?”

“I have a job for you. And it won’t be easy.”

“I thought you might, madam.”

“Did you hear?”

“Yes, madam. It’s not much to go on, but it’s enough. Once I find the chinchilla named Sandy, I’ll find this JD.”

“It can’t be obvious. If the family finds out—“

“I can do it all from my Boston office, madam. What I do on my own time is none of their concern.”

“I’m glad you understand the situation. Just be discrete on this side as well. If Kit finds out I’m putting a paw in, he’ll beat me up.”

“We’d never allow that, madam,” Marcus said with a slight smile.

“Remember, be discrete, but this is important. I only want to find her so I can be there in case he can’t. We’ll let him try first. If he can’t find her, he might get discouraged and move on. I can’t let him do that.”

“I’ll have a complete file on her by Tuesday. That is a guarantee, madam.”

“There’s an extra ten thousand added to your and Stav’s quarterly bonus if you do.”

“You’ve always been a generous employer, madam.”

“It’s how I keep you here.”

“True,” he agreed honestly.

Chapter 2

Thuk-thud. Thuk-thud. Thuk-thud.

The tennis ball hit the wall, then bounced off the rickety floor, and then dropped into Kit's waiting paw. There wasn't much room in here, and even less to do, but a male with a tennis ball always had a means of entertainment at hand.

He was sitting on the floor in front of his World War II surplus cot, in a tiny closet that passed as a room here in the Lone Star Mission, a place for furs like himself to come and find shelter. There was a homeless shelter on one side, but since Kit had a job, he qualified for these private rooms. He wasn't guaranteed a room, though. Every week, on Monday, he had to sign up for one and prove he still had a job. And so long as he got signed up before they ran out of rooms, he was set for another week. And it wasn't free, either. He had to pay fifty dollars for a week, but that was a whole heap cheaper than he'd find anywhere else. It was enough for him, though. The room wasn't too clean, but it was dry, the door locked, and he had access to a shower.

He often did that as he thought. He rather liked playing tennis back when he was younger, and though he lost his racket long ago to a thief, he did like to keep a tennis ball around. Bouncing it off the wall was a rhythmic activity that kept his paws busy and gave him time to think.

And all his thoughts were on her.

He dreamed about her again last night. It was almost the same dream, but this time he met her in the Double J. He was working, and she came in to eat. She smiled when she saw him, and he sat down and talked to. Then the Blimp came by and started screaming at him, so he tore off his work shirt and left paw in paw with her....then he woke up.

Why couldn't he get her out of his mind? He never even talked to her, for crying out loud! She could be a ditz. She could be crazy. Hell, she could be some psycho serial killer in cahoots with Sandy and that skunk, trying to lure him off to a private place so they could kill him.

One thing was for sure. He couldn't leave now. If he left, she would haunt him for weeks, months, maybe even years. Vil was right about that. He had to find out. If he left and never even tried, then there was no telling what he might be missing.

And that's why he sat there on the floor, bouncing the tennis ball off the wall just under the window, because had a lot to do. He had the next two days off, and he had things to do.

Today, he would go get a Sunday paper and look for a job and start looking for apartments. He'd also go back to the Java Joint and surf the help-wanted websites. Tomorrow, he'd start filling out applications and start sending out resumes. He was a college graduate, after all, with a degree in history. But he was also good with his paws and very healthy and strong, thanks to his time in ROTC and his habit of exercising ingrained into him after the physical rehabilitation after his accident. He could find a job where his degree would help, but he could do almost any job.

He was basically just waiting for the Java Joint to open, really. And sitting there wondering why he was going to all this trouble over a femme, but part of him just couldn't try to talk to her without being in a better position. How would it look to her to be asked out by a dishwasher who lived in a homeless shelter? She'd laugh in his face! Such a beautiful cat wouldn't even entertain being asked out by a scarred, broke, nothing like him. He had to prove he was worth it to her. He had to find a job. He had to find a place to live. He had to show that he wasn't a waste of her time.

Thuk-thud. Thuk-thud. Thuk-thud.

"Would you cut that out!" the guy in the next room shouted, banging on the wall. "You and that damned ball! You're worse than a dog!"

"Sorry!" he called, blinking. He palmed the ball and stood up, figuring it was about time to get moving. By the time he got down to the Java Joint, it would probably be open. It was nearly noon, and he wanted to get a seat before the church crowds were on the streets. He put on a clean shirt and a pair of jeans that only had one hole in them, the left knee torn out, shouldered his backpack, and headed out.

He passed by others like him in the hall. The destitute, the out-of-luck, the young trying to get on their feet and the old looking for a second chance. There were a thousand stories in places like this, most of them sad but some of them hopeful, and many of them were stories told in the journals he kept. Doing what he did, Kit met all kinds of people. He'd met European royalty in a bar in New Orleans, and had a chilling brush with an escaped murderer in Hattiesburg, Mississippi. He'd sit down and strike up conversations with people, and they'd just talk to him. They'd tell him stories. They'd answer his questions. They'd show him who they were deep down inside, and then he'd write it down in his journals.

That made his inability to sit down and talk to that cat even more maddening. He wasn't a shy person. He would have had no trouble sitting down and talking with her, but it was different. He was looking for more than just to talk, and the spectre of his family had risen up and made him afraid. If he'd not wanted to do more than talk, he'd have had no problem sitting down and coaxing her story from her.

Everyone had a story to tell.

It was a half hour walk to the Java Joint from the mission, but for him it was a chance to think things through a little more. He got a plan set up in his mind about what he needed to do, a course of action to maximize his efficiency and minimize the time it would take to get it done. It was a typical Texas day in August, dry and already starting to get hot, and by midafternoon it would be broiling outside, much too hot for a New Englander.

It was with relief that he found the Java Joint wasn't busy yet, so he got his favorite table near the small stage they had for open mic nights, pulled out his laptop, and got to work. With a cup of green tea, a bagel, and a Sunday paper, he started hunting through the want ads, both for apartments and for jobs. There weren't many interesting jobs in there, and since this was a college town, there were tons of apartments but many of them were outrageously expensive. He transcribed all the ads into his computer by hand, making a detailed little spreadsheet of apartments available, sorted by price and location, then started listing the available jobs in the want ads in order of desirability. Later he'd cross-reference the two spreadsheets by addresses, so he could focus on apartments near jobs and jobs near apartments.

All those years of being forced into business schools did have some benefit, he supposed. He could make Excel get up and dance across the table.

Once he was done with the paper, he turned to the internet. He surfed several help-wanted websites, searching for jobs in the Austin area, and got quite a few promising leads. His major was history, but that kind of degree also meant that he knew how to write, and he was very good at research and editing, because of all the papers he had to write. There were two jobs posted for researchers, both for local magazines; one a college magazine aimed at the U.T. students and the other a local scene magazine. There was also a job being posted for an internship for a local TV station, but that was aimed more at journalism students from the university than someone like him. But, it was listed, so it was worth at least a look.

He realized he had email. He opened it up and found a message from Vil, a short little note.

Hey Bro.

(512) 555-3924.

That's Lone Star, a magazine based there in Austin. They're looking for a researcher. I know that's something you'd be good at doing.

Give them a call.

And I swear right here and now that I haven't meddled a bit. You'll have to earn that job yourself.

But I reserve the right to help you any way I can, both with what you'll let me do and what I can get away with where you can't see me.

Vil

Kit looked at the number, and realized he'd already written down that ad and had it in his spreadsheet.

He had to chuckle. That damn meddling female, but he loved her for her concern. She was going to let him live his life, but she was still gonna stick her paw in when she wanted to.

He shot back a reply thanking her for something he'd already found himself—just to tweak her a little bit—and promised he'd call first thing tomorrow morning, just as soon as he got his resume printed out down at Kinko's.

“This is stupid,” Jessie complained, mainly to herself, crossing her arms before her in the passenger seat of Sandy's Festiva.

“No way!” she said. “I'm hungry!”

“And we're driving all the way up to North Austin to get a bite to eat? Sandy, you're being silly.”

“Okay, well, maybe I am going back to that café,” she winked as they stopped for a red light. “I want to see if he shows up again!”

“I have homework to do!” she protested. “I can't be out all day.”

“Well, seeing as how I’m the one with the car keys, I think you’re going to stay out til I decide to go home,” she teased, flashing an evil little smile.

“Sandy!”

She laughed. “Come on, it’ll be fun! Think of the excitement waiting to see if he shows up! We can grab some lunch there, then go hit the mall and get you some new clothes! You’re available again, hon, you gotta advertise!”

“I have enough advertising clothes already.”

“I’m almost thinking you’re sick,” she grinned. “Turning down the chance to shop?”

“I, I just want to go back,” she hedged.

“Afraid he won’t show up? Or afraid he will?” she pressed.

“I’m not answering that,” she said primly.

“Riiight. And who was it making all those cooing noises and saying his name before I woke her up this morning?”

The cream-colored fur on her cheeks ruffled.

Sandy laughed. “You’re almost cute sometimes, you know that?” she grinned. “Such a prig.”

“I was raised to be a lady,” she protested. “Besides, if my mom found out I was even going out on dates, she’d have a cow.”

“She’s that bad?”

“She thinks I should get married before I even go out on a date.”

Sandy laughed. “How can you find a guy to marry if you can’t date?”

“Well, that hasn’t quite worked itself into her head yet. And she’d go on a three hour rant telling me how much she disapproves if she found out, then threaten to cut me off and make me come home and go to Cincinnati or Ohio State, where she can be close and keep an eye on me.”

“Wow. She sounds like a real bitch.”

“Why do you think I came here to go to school? It’s a thousand miles away from Cincinnati.”

“Well, you’ve certainly come a long way since we hazed you,” Sandy said with a naughty tickle in her voice. “It only took us a year to get you a boyfriend. Too bad we picked such a jerk.”

“Eh, it was fun with Burke, at least until I found out what he was really like.”

“Well, I’m sorry about that. We’ll find someone better this time. We just gotta get you laid, and everything will work out just fine.”

Jessie’s entire face poofed out. “Well, why are we doing this if he’s just going to leave?”

“Because he was cute. And hell, girl, you can have a one night stand with him and never have to worry about seeing him again!”

“That was not what I had in mind when you got me in this car,” she said primly.

“Well, it won’t hurt just to see, will it?” she asked with a naughty smile as they got off the interstate.

They pulled up into the parking lot and piled out. The place didn't look very busy, but then again, it was early on Sunday. Jessie went in first, but she stopped dead near the door, causing Sandy to crash into her back.

He was here!

His back was to the door, but there was no mistaking him, not with that piece of his ear missing.

“What? Oh, he's here!” Sandy said in an excited whisper.

“Oh my God,” Jessie said fearfully, smoothing her hair, kicking herself for wearing nothing but an old pair of jeans and a U.T. tee shirt. She smoothed her shirt, put her paws on her cheeks. “Do I look okay? I must look terrible! I didn't do my hair or anything!”

Sandy laughed. “You're dressed the same way he is,” she said, putting her hands on Jessie's back and pushing her forward.

Kit was about to start rearranging the want ads to put Lone Star on top, taking a drink from his tea, when a shadow passed close to him. “Hi!” came a cheery, loud voice, which almost made him choke on his tea.

He knew that voice. It was the chinchilla, Sandy.

He lowered his mug of tea and looked over, then he almost dropped it. She was with her! She looked embarrassed half to death, but she was even more beautiful seeing her a second time. She hadn't preened herself, hadn't dressed up and dolled up. He was seeing the real femme under the veneer, and it was even better natural than it was carefully prepared.

“Fancy meeting you again. Sandy, isn't it?” he asked.

“You bet! And this nervous little kitty here is Jessie, but we all call her JD. It makes her sound cool,” she grinned.

“Nice to meet you,” he said, trying to sound casual and friendly. She was clearly quite nervous, and he didn’t want to put her off. “I’m Kit.”

“Um, h-hi,” she said nervously. She didn’t quite know what to do with herself, standing there wringing her black-mittened paws, then she stuck one paw out towards him.

God, she was gorgeous. He just had to look at her again. Slender but well curved, with a long-haired tail that made her look very sensual, a tail that was the same cream color as her fur but had a black tip. In a way, her color markings were almost fox-like, with the ears and the mittens and the black tip on her tail, but she was definitely a cat.

He took her hand and shook it gently, but didn’t let it go. He just looked up at her, silent, and she looked down at him with that same nervous expression. But she didn’t try to pull away.

“Hey, can we join ya?” Sandy asked boldly, giving her friend a sly look.

“Sure, I don’t mind,” Kit said, shaking out of his reverie. “Please, have a seat.”

“Thank you,” she said, seating herself on his right. He was almost disappointed when she pulled her paw from his, putting her paws together on the table before her and looking very, very unsettled. No doubt her friend had put her up to this, and now she was at a loss as to what to do next.

“I’ll go order us something, JD. Don’t run away!” Sandy said with a wicked tilt, then hurried off.

“Umm, so, Sandy said you travel around?” the cat said hesitantly.
“And you’re getting ready to leave again?”

“Travel around yes, but I’m gonna stay here a little while longer,” he answered. “I’ve been looking for a new job this morning.”

“On a Sunday?”

“It’s the best day. New ads in the paper, new job listings posted on Saturday night.”

“What, uh, do you do now?”

“I bus tables at the Double J,” he said immediately, looking her in the eyes. “It’s not much, but for someone like me, it’s usually enough to let me put enough back to move on. But, since I’m gonna stay a little while longer, I need something that pays a little better.”

“Oh. What’s it like?”

“What?”

“Moving from place to place.”

“Sometimes it’s not so bad,” he answered. “I’ve met a lot of really interesting people. Not all of them have been nice, and it was scary there a few times, but on the whole it’s been worth it.”

“Is that how you—“ she said, then she put her paw over her mouth.

“How I lost my ear?” he finished. She nodded, her face frizzing in a blush of embarrassment. He chuckled. “No, I was hit by a car when I was in college, that’s where I lost my ear. It wasn’t from being mugged in some dark alley,” he said with a light smile. “Though that did happen a couple of times when I first started out, before I knew how to get around on my own.”

“You were in college? Where?”

“U-Mass. I graduated last December.”

“Why didn’t you get a job instead of roaming?”

“That’s...a long story,” he said, a little distantly. “Maybe someday I’ll tell you about it. Now, why do they call you JD?”

“Because there’s another Jessie in the house,” she said shyly. “Since she was there first, they all call me JD instead.”

“Well, I kinda like it.”

“Thank you,” she said, her cheeks ruffling in a very pleasing manner. “I think it makes me sound like a male, though.”

He chuckled. “No one could ever say that after they see you. You’re beautiful.”

“I’m a mess,” she complained, patting her hair and smoothing out her face fur.

“No, you’re you,” he told her. “Sometimes you can see more about a person when they’re relaxed than when they’re ready. Pretty clothes and makeup and professional hairstyling can often cover up what’s underneath. That’s what’s always interested me, what’s inside. The outside is just a shell, a front.”

Jessie immediately had an image in her mind of Burke, a handsome wolf whose true nature was hidden behind his handsome face. He had been a rotten person wrapped in an attractive package. This fox, he was very insightful, and he seemed very wise. Much wiser and smarter than most males the sorority girls had thrown at her. All they cared about was how cute they were and how good they were in bed. But there was more to this fox than just a handsome face. The more she looked at him, the more handsome he seemed, even with his unusual dual-colored eyes and the missing piece of his ear. They were almost like beauty marks rather than mars to her, part of what made him handsome.

There was a long silence. She just looked at him, and he just looked at her, and she didn't even realize it. She was lost in looking at him.

“So!” Sandy said loudly, startling both of them. Jessie gave Sandy a dark look as she plopped down in the other chair, holding a platter of bagels and coffee for her, and soda for Jessie. “When’s the big moving day, Kit?”

“Well, I was going to leave on Wednesday, but I think I might hang around a while longer,” he said, glancing unconsciously at Jessie, a little move she didn't miss. “Something about Austin just invited me to stay a while longer.”

“Do tell,” Sandy purred, leaning on her elbows and looking directly into Kit's eyes. “So, you want JD's number? We're roomies.”

“Sandy!” Jessie said in shock.

“Well, as nice as that sounds, I'm not going to have much time for the next couple of weeks,” he said. “I need to find somewhere to live. I've been staying in the mission since I've been here.”

“The mission?” Jessie asked. “What is that?”

“A homeless shelter,” he answered directly, looking right at her. He wanted to see how she reacted to that news, she was sure of it! “They rent out cheap rooms if you have a job.”

“Kinda like the Y?” Sandy asked.

“More or less, yeah,” he nodded. “But if I’m gonna be here more than a few weeks, I’d like something a little...cleaner,” he said with a hilariously distasteful face.

Sandy laughed, and Jessie tried not to giggle. The way he said it was so funny, but she didn’t want him to think she was laughing at him.

“You should pick up one of the campus mags,” Sandy told him. “There’s a ton of listings of people looking for roomies, and it’s way cheaper than getting an apartment.” She glanced at Jessie. “And most of the apartments are close to the campus,” she added.

“You know, that’s a good idea,” he said honestly. “I’ve been going through the apartment listings around here, and ugh.”

“Yeah, they’re expensive,” Jessie agreed.

“And people are still trying to fill up houses and apartments. We’ve only been back for two weeks, so the dust is still flying,” Sandy added. “This is a good time to look.”

“I’ll have to look into it.”

“So, what do you do when you’re not washing dishes and sitting around in here?” Sandy pressed.

“Not much. Just live, I guess. There’s not much to do, really. All you can really do is hang out with a bunch of smelly homeless guys, but sometimes that’s actually kinda cool. Some of the have some pretty interesting stories to tell.”

Sandy took a big bite out of her bagel, then kicked Jessie under the table. Jessie glared at her for a quick moment, then took a sip of her soda. What was she supposed to say? What should she do? She wanted to learn more about him, but she was so nervous! What if she said something that got him upset?

“You gotta excuse JD, Kit. She’s kinda shy, and she’s from a sheltered family,” Sandy said after she swallowed. “She’s really interested in you, but doesn’t quite know what to do about it.”

“Sandy!” Jessie gasped, her face poofing out. She almost felt like she wanted to die, she was so embarrassed!

Kit looked right into her eyes and smiled. “That’s okay, I’m a little nervous too. Sometimes I’m not quite sure what I should say or do when I’m around a beautiful femme.”

She looked away, both embarrassed and flattered. He thought she was pretty!

“And it’s a little different for me. I mean, I’m effectively homeless, rootless. What can I really say or do that covers that over? Kinda makes it hard to talk to femmes, really. You know that old rap song, got no money and you got no car, you got no female, so there you are.”

“You’re not homeless,” Jessie blurted. “You just have a different way of living, that’s all. I think you could get a real home if you wanted to. You’re just living outside the box, as it were. You know, living life your own way, experiencing it from a different perspective than most other people. There’s nothing wrong with that!”

“Well, thank you,” he said, smiling at her. “And I see there’s a bit of poet lurking in there somewhere.”

“And literature. My major is English,” Jessie admitted.

Kit chuckled. “Listen. Wanna go do something?”

“What ya have in mind?” Sandy grinned.

“Have you ever been ice skating?” he asked. “They have a rink right there in the mall.”

“Sure!” Sandy said loudly. “If you don’t mind a third wheel and all, but I’m also kinda JD’s ride home,” the chinchilla winked.

“I, I’ve never skated on ice before,” Jessie said shyly. “Just on roller skates.”

“It’s a little different, but you can get the hang of it if you try,” he promised, holding out his paw. “What do you say?”

“You don’t mind?”

“Not at all. I’ll even pay,” he smiled.

“Naw, you’re gonna need your money!” Sandy told him. “I’ll treat! You two walk on over, and I’ll go move the car. See you at the rink!”

The chinchilla jumped up and rushed out, leaving her alone with him. She felt her cheek fur ruffle slightly when he looked at her, and she kicked herself for being so shy. Come on, you silly femme! You know you want to talk to him, so talk to him! she thought to herself. “So, what’s it really like, doing what you’re doing?” she asked.

“It’s been very interesting. I’ve been keeping a journal of it as I move from place to place. Things I’ve seen, people I’ve met, the stories they’ve told. Everyone has a story, and it’s been really interesting going out and finding them.”

“Sounds like you want to be a reporter, or a writer.”

“I really have no idea what I want to be,” he said as he packed his laptop in his backpack and stood up. He offered his paw to her, and she took it as she stood up. His paw was warm. Strong. His pads were rough and hard, a sign he worked for his dinner, but his grip was gentle and inviting. “So, what are you going to do with an English degree?” he asked.

They walked out of the café, and her paw was still in his. It felt kinda nice, and she hadn’t thought to take it out. “I want to be a teacher,” she said. “I’m going to teach while I earn my Master’s, then be a full-time teacher.”

“Ah. What level were you looking to teach?”

“I was thinking middle or high school,” she said. “I haven’t decided yet.”

“How long have you been at U.T.?”

“I just started my junior year,” she explained as they walked towards the mall. “I’ll probably stay and get my Masters here too. I kinda like it here.”

“Where are you from?”

“Cincinnati,” she answered. “You’re from New England, somewhere, aren’t you?”

He laughed. “Boston. It is really that obvious?”

“It is noticeable,” she giggled. “Everyone but you and me has that drawl. Goodness, Sandy’s from Utah, and even she speaks with a drawl now. I swear, it must be viral or something.”

He laughed. “Hopefully I won’t catch it.”

“You and me both. What did you study in college?”

“Well, I started in ROTC working towards a degree in political science, but after I was hit by the car, I was washed out medically,” he said with a strange, wistful sigh. “I wanted to join the Air Force and fly planes, but I can’t even pass the physical.”

“You look fine to me.”

“My back was broken,” he said simply. “That kind of injury is a blackball.”

“Oh. Are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” he told her, squeezing her hand gently in thanks for her concern. “Sometimes it’s a little stiff in the mornings, but I’m just fine. Anyway, I changed majors to history after the accident and graduated last December. While I was recovering, there wasn’t much for me to do but read, and I got kinda interested in history. Reading about ancient history kept my mind occupied, and after I got back in school, I decided to study it for real.”

“What did you do your capstone on?”

“I compared ancient Rome to modern America,” he answered. “I compared the societal conditions between the two, with the thesis that America is following Rome's path. And if something doesn't change, we'll meet the same fate."

"Wow," she breathed, looking over at him. He let go of her hand and opened the door, then held it open for her. "Thank you. That's pretty deep."

"It was an interesting concept. My department head said it made her think about it for a while. I guess I couldn't ask for anything better than that."

"I wouldn't mind reading it."

"Just go to U-Mass' website and search for the title America and Rome, two civilizations, one fate. They keep all capstones and dissertations in the library, you can read it online." He winced a little.

"What?" she asked as he opened the inner door for her.

"Well, my name's on the capstone," he said. "My name is...I don't like it," he admitted. "That's why I go by Kit. It's awful."

"Well, it can't be any worse than Desdemona," she said with a slight ruffle of her cheeks. She couldn't believe she told him her middle name!

"Ah, so that's where the D comes from?" he said with a smile.

She nodded.

"Your folks were big Shakespeare fans?"

She laughed. "My father's an English professor at the University of Cincinnati. My sister's middle name is Ophelia."

"Following your dad in the family footsteps?"

“I guess. He used to read me stories when I was kitten, and I just got interested. I’m more of a modern femme, though,” she said with a smile. “I’m more into modern literature. If the authors are dead, it’s not as interesting to me.”

He laughed. “I hope Vonnegut isn’t on that list.”

“You read Vonnegut?” she asked excitedly. “He’s one of my favorite authors!”

They got involved in talking about Vonnegut as they walked to the rink in the center of the mall, but their discussion was interrupted by Sandy, who crashed into them from behind. “It’s about time, you two! Okay, Kit, show us where to go.”

He took them to the rink, rented skates, and stuffed his backpack in a rental locker as they put them on. Sandy looked a little shaky on the thin blades, and Jessie herself was quite unstable when she first stood up. Kit, wearing a pair of hockey skates, stood up rock stable. “I shoulda known you’d know how to skate, being from Boston!” she laughed.

“Every winter,” he grinned. “Come on, I’ll teach you,” he said, offering his paw to her.

She felt strangely vulnerable out on the ice. She knew how to roller skate, but all her weight was on those thin blades, and it made her ankles feel dangerously wobbly as she tried to balance on them. She was almost leaning against Kit as he led her out onto the ice, where others were also skating with different degrees of mastery. Most were shaky and unsteady, like her and Sandy, but a few furs were zooming around the rink as effortlessly as could be. It felt strange to be out of control, and she felt very self-conscious trying not to look like a fool in front of him, but he just smiled at her and seemed to not notice at all that she was trying her best not to fall down and embarrass herself. Sandy, on the other hand, had no such reservations. She flopped down on her butt almost immediately after getting on the ice, and just sat there and laughed loudly about it. But, the chinchilla was keeping her distance, and for that, Jessie could kiss her. It wasn't half as embarrassing trying to talk to him without her there mortifying her.

He kept hold of her paw as he explained how to move without falling down. They started out slow, and she had trouble concentrating on what she was doing with him holding her paw. He smelled so nice, and he was so strong and sure of himself! But he pushed out to arm's length once she was a bit more stable, and she floundered along beside him as he glided with almost ridiculous ease.

She felt like a pregnant cow, but he seemed oblivious to her clumsiness. He just glided along with her as she stumbled, then swung around and took both her paws in his and guided her. "Easy, easy," he said. "It's just like roller skating, JD. Push off with one foot, then again, then again."

"It feels weird."

"I know, it's because you don't have four wheels. Now push off with your foot and do it just like roller skating."

After three circuits around the rink, she was starting to get a little more sure of herself. It wasn't easy, because all she could feel, or think about, was his strong paws holding hers. "See, you're a natural," he told her as he let go of her paws and drifted back, skating backwards in front of her.

"At least I'm not falling down making a fool of myself," she said ruefully.

“You should never be embarrassed about learning,” he said sagely. “We all can’t be experts at everything we do the first time we do them. I didn’t expect to see you come out and start doing triple axels,” he added with a grin. “Then again, if you did, I’d have felt really stupid,” he laughed. “Let me teach you,” I said, then you’d come out and make a fool out of me.”

“I wouldn’t do that,” she said impulsively.

“I’m glad you wouldn’t. I know I’d feel way nervous right now if I was the one that looked silly cause I didn’t know how to skate, but that’s okay. I just hope you don’t think I did it to you on purpose, that’s all.”

Was she really that transparent? He seemed to know that she really was nervous, and she was feeling a little self-conscious because he was so good at it, so graceful, and here she was clunking along like she had a ball and chain locked to her ankle.

“Well, at least I’m not that bad,” she said with a laugh, pointing at Sandy. She was on her butt again near the rail, laughing.

“Let me go take care of that,” he chuckled. “Wait for me, okay?”

“Sure,” she said, coming to an unsteady stop the way he taught her. He circled around Sandy, then reached down and helped her up. Jessie watched as he did the same for Sandy he did for her, holding her paws and skating backwards as he explained how to move to get going. She saw how gentle he was, how he guided her, just laughed with her when she remarked how dumb she looked, but then immediately squelched any further attempts at self-deprecation by giving her an encouraging little pep talk. She stood in the middle and turned to watch as he guided her around the rink a complete circle, then let go of her paws and skated backwards in front of her as she stumbled uncertainly. He slowed down a little and reached his paws out to her, but she caught her skate on the ice and pitched forward, slamming into him and driving both of them to the ice.

Sandy rolled over on her backside and laughed, but Jessie realized that Kit wasn't laughing. He had his back arched, almost unnaturally so, sitting on his hip with his left elbow down to steady himself, as his other paw was held behind him. He was grimacing in pain.

Oh God! He'd told her he broke his back when he got hit by a car! Sandy must have hurt him!

"Kit!" she said in shock and concern, rushing to him as quickly as she dared. She stumbled to a stop and kneeled beside him. "Are you okay?"

"Just give me a minute," he said, sucking in his breath. "That was just bad luck. I hit exactly right. Well, exactly wrong, that is."

"Aww, I'm sorry, Kit!" Sandy said, scooting over to him. "I didn't realize I hit you so hard. You okay?"

"I'll be alright," he said, taking a few cleansing breaths. "And it wasn't your fault, Sandy. I just landed the wrong way. Would you two mind if I go sit down for a minute?"

"Here, let me help you," Jessie said in worry, taking his paw in both of hers.

Sandy helped her lead him over to the empty gateway to the lockers. He sat down on the closest bench and leaned far back, both paws on the small of his back. "No, I'll be fine, really," he said to them as he saw two concerned faces. "Just give me a minute. Get back out there and practice, you worry-hens!" he said, brushing them away with a paw.

She realized he didn't want to concern them...that, or he didn't want them to see him like that. Either way, she just nodded to Sandy and went back out on the rink with her. "I'm sorry, JD, I didn't realize I hit him so hard," she apologized.

"No, he told me how he lost that piece of his ear," she explained. "He was hit by a car, and it broke his back."

Sandy blanched. "Ohmahgawd, I musta—"

"I think he's okay. I guess it's still tender, that's all." They both looked back to the benches, and saw him massaging his back with both paws. He saw them looking, then smiled and waved. They waved back, and floundered along together.

"So, like him?" Sandy asked.

"Yes!" she said instantly. "He's really interesting!"

"He's gorgeous," Sandy said, giving her a lascivious grin.

"He's smart," she countered.

"Glad we came looking for him?" she grinned.

"Yeah, I guess I am. Thanks, Sandy."

"Anytime, hon, anytime. Did you see how he was looking at you when he said he decided to stay?" she whispered. "I think he was going to stay just for you!"

"I don't think so," she said demurely, but she remembered how he glanced at her. Was he really going to stay just to go out with her? If so, that was so romantic!

“I think he really likes you,” Sandy said with a sly smile. “You gotta give him our number, JD!”

“Our number?” Jessie protested.

“I live in the house too,” Sandy grinned. “Besides, if you two don’t work out, I might take a shot at that hunk of fine fox.”

They went around twice on their own, then they saw him stand up and stretch his back, bend side to side, then start back out onto the ice. He glided over to them easily. “Sorry about that. Hope I didn’t upset you.”

“Naw, JD told me what you told her about the car. How long ago was it?”

“About two years ago,” he answered. “The docs told me my back would always be a little tender. Stuff like that’s happened before, it’s no big deal. I’m fine.”

“Well, that’s good to know. You guys want something to drink? I’m thirsty.”

“I’m fine, thank you,” he said.

“No thanks, Sandy,” Jessie said.

“Okay, lemme stumble over to that concession stand and get something. Be back in a bit.” Sandy gave her a wink where he couldn’t see, then went towards the opening.

“You okay? Really?”

“Really,” he chuckled. “It’s just when my back gets jarred in certain ways, it hurts, that’s all. Hitting the ice like that was one of the ways.”

“Well, I’m sorry about that.”

“No reason to apologize, JD,” he said dismissively. “I know it would never have happened if Sandy knew.”

“That’s nice of you.”

“Eh, I kinda like her. She’s silly, and boy does she talk fast.”

Jessie laughed. “She reminds me of my little sister. She talks a mile a minute.”

“Ophelia?”

Jessie laughed again. “Don’t ever call her that or she’ll rip out your liver,” she said. “Her first name is Jenny.” She was quiet a moment. “Do you have any sisters?”

“I have a sister,” he said. “She’s probably my best friend.”

“That’s nice. It’s not often you hear a brother say that about a sister,” she said with a smile.

“Me and Vil went through a lot,” he said. “After our mother died when I was eight, she was more like my mother than my sister. Even now, she always tries to mother me.”

“I’m sorry to hear about your mother.”

“Thank you.”

“What about your father?”

“He’s dead,” Kit said, his voice turning flat and hard almost out of reflex.

She looked away, a bit chagrined that she seemed to have ventured into dangerous territory. “I’m sorry.”

“No, no, it’s okay. Me and my father had a very long and very ugly history,” he explained. “He threw me out of the house when I was sixteen. After that, my sister was the only family I had. She risked a lot to keep in touch with me, because my father—well, let’s just say that he forbade the rest of my family from having anything to do with me, and the rest of them were too afraid of him to go against him. Everyone but Vil, anyway.”

Jessie could sense...evasion. There was much more to this story than he was letting on. Was he only telling her what he felt comfortable saying, or was he trying to hide something? What had happened between him and his father that had caused him to be thrown out at sixteen? What kind of fox was he that he kept the rest of Kit’s family away, and what kind of vixen was this Vil that she was willing to defy their father to keep in touch with him? There was something...intriguing about what he wasn’t saying. Maybe someday, he’d trust her enough to tell her.

“Anyway, Vil helped me find a place to live, she’d sneak me money, she helped me get into U-Mass after I graduated from high school, and when I was hit by the car, she was the one that was there for me. If it wasn’t for Vil, I’d be dead now.”

“Well, I’ll have to thank her when I meet her,” Jessie mused impulsively, then she looked away from him, her cheek fur ruffling.

“Geez, will she want to meet you,” he chuckled. “I talked to her yesterday, and I made the eternal mistake of telling her about you.”

“But, but we’d never even spoken!”

“I know, but...” he trailed off, looking at his skates. She looked at him, and could see that he was trying to think of what to say, and then his cheek fur ruffled a little. He was nervous! Finally, his veneer of confidence was stripped away, and she saw that he wasn’t as strong or self-confident as he seemed. “I told her about how Sandy dropped in on me, and made the mistake of saying that you were beautiful. She was all over me at that point. She knows I don’t make observations like that unless I really mean it.”

Jessie’s heart seemed to flutter a little. He really did think she was beautiful!

“She’s the one that talked me into not leaving. She talked me into hanging around, try looking for you, and seeing if there was something there when I did. She had to talk—” he sighed, then he glanced at her. “I guess I should explain something to you.”

He stopped them in the middle of the rink, and she was starting to get a little nervous, and also a little curious. “This isn’t easy for me to explain,” he said, looking at her with sober and earnest eyes. “Mainly because it’s so outlandish sometimes I don’t think even I’d believe it if I heard someone else say it. So please understand that what I’m about to say isn’t the whole truth. It’s just a part of the truth that puts everything in a rational perspective.”

“I—okay.”

“Alright. Here goes,” he said, taking a cleansing breath. “I’m from what you might call a very eccentric family. They have very extreme views, and most of them are rabid, fanatical purists. To them, the purity of the family line is more important than anything else. If they found out that I was out on a date with a cat,” he said, then he shuddered. “But the sad thing is, I've been disowned, and I'm still so afraid of them, that it, well, I'm afraid of anything that might happen, that's all," he said with a sigh. "When I saw you in the booth with the skunk, all I wanted to do was sit down and talk to you, but then I saw this spectre of my family hovering over you like a ghost, and I was afraid to do it. It's almost sad. I've been disowned for six years, and still they can reach out and run my life," he sighed. "But even me being disowned wouldn't be enough for them. They'd see me and you as an insult to the family, and I'd be afraid of what a few of them would do, especially Uncle Zach."

And that's why you roam around like a vagabond, isn't it? she realized to herself. Because you're still running from a family that hates you, but you're still afraid of. How would I feel if Mom and Dad turned their backs on me? I'd feel totally lost. I'd be devastated. Oh, God, you poor fox.

She reached out and put her paws on his shoulders, her heart pounding in her chest. It was an instinctive move, a need to comfort what she could see was obvious pain. "I'm not afraid of them," she told him in a gentle voice. "Kit, I," she started, then she looked down. "I just met you, but I'd like to see you again. I'm not afraid of your family. After all, they're all in Boston, aren't they? And you roam around. How could they know? How could they do anything?"

"My family has a very long arm, JD," he said honestly. "A very, very long arm."

"Well, let's see if it can reach all the way to Austin," she said daringly, sliding a little closer to him. She looked up at him, and before she had any idea what happened, he was kissing her.

She tensed up, but his kiss was gentle, inviting, not forced or hungry. She closed her eyes and wrapped her arms around his neck, and began kissing him back. Burke had never kissed her that way. It was so, so, so... warm. And sensual. And almost intoxicating!

Just as she started surrendering to the kiss, he pulled away. She looked up at him in confusion, and saw his eyes were chagrined. "I had no right to do that," he said in a growl, mainly at himself, she realized. "I'm sorry, JD. It was wrong."

"No, no, it wasn't wrong," she said, a little out of breath. "If I wanted you to stop, I'd have kneed you in the groin."

He gave her a curious look, then laughed. "Well, I'd have deserved it."

The magic of the moment faded, and she put a paw to her muzzle, realizing they'd just kissed right out in the public, where everyone could see! She felt her face poof out in a blush, but all he did was smile down at her. "I think this is about the time when I should be saying goodbye," he said. "I've just done something entirely too forward, and did it out where your friend could see. And, I need a little time to think, okay?"

She could hear the pent-up fear behind his voice. Even with her blessing, he was still afraid of his family. Who were they, and what kind of furs were they that could instill such fear in him like this?

"I understand. I can give you my number, and you can call me later, okay?"

"No, that's not proper. I'm not sure you're going to still be this happy to see me after you think things through. I'll give you the number to the cell phone my sis makes me carry around for emergencies. That way you can be the one to decide if what I said and did here was alright enough with you to want to see me again. That way there's no pressure on you at all. Come on, I need to get the phone. I don't really know the number off the top of my head. I'll have to look it up."

He took her paw and guided her back to the benches, leaving her a little confused. He didn't seem cold or angry, it was almost like he was so afraid after what he said, and what he did, that he wanted to back off and think. But did he want her to think or did he want to think himself? Usually Jessie was pretty good at reading other people, but right now she wasn't sure. All she could really tell was that he was kicking himself for kissing her, he was really upset with himself, and maybe he was afraid he lost all the ground he'd made with her up to that point by doing something so rash.

Sandy kept her distance, hovering at the edge of the concession stand with a cup of soda in her paws as Kit opened the locker he used, took out his backpack, and pulled out a brand new and very expensive-looking black cell phone. He flipped it open and pulled a little post-it note off of it, and handed it to her. "That's the number of the phone," he told her, folding it into her paw. "But please, don't rush. Think about it. Think about what I said, and think about what it means. And after you decide, if you can forgive me for being an idiot, and if you're really ready to take a chance on someone like me, then call me. I'll be waiting for you. I promise."

His eyes were so earnest. He was so upset. He was so afraid. How much different he seemed now than just a few minutes ago! But as soon as he started talking about his family, his entire demeanor changed, and now he was very unsettled and unsure. She realized that even if she didn't think he was being serious about his family, he sure was. His fear of them was very real, even if it was misplaced.

He hesitated, then he seemed to screw up his courage. He leaned down and gave her a quick kiss on the cheek, then quickly hurried away. She watched him go, saw him strip off his hockey skates in almost record time, then all but throw them at the clerk at the rental window as he rushed away.

“What happened?” Sandy asked quickly as she hurried over. “Did he grab you or something?”

“No, he,” she said, then she sat down on the bench and tried to sort it all out. “He told me about his family.”

“And that scared him off?”

“Yeah. It did,” she said, opening her paw and looking at the telephone number. The area code was unknown to her. “He’s really afraid of his family, Sandy. I think that’s why he lives like a homeless vagabond. He told me that he was afraid of what they’d do if they found out we were dating. I could hear it in his voice. He was really serious.”

“What are they, terrorists or something?” Sandy asked curiously.

“I don’t know,” she said. “He gave me his number.”

“Well, it’s not a lost cause, then,” Sandy said with a smirk. “Call him when you get home.”

“No, I think that’d be too soon,” she said. “I think it’s best if I wait until tomorrow. If I just called him so fast, he wouldn’t think I thought about it the way he asked me to.”

“Femme, you gotta explain this to me. Let’s go ahead and go back to the house.”

“Yeah. That’s a good idea. I forgot I have that homework to do.”

“But, was he a good kisser?” she asked, elbowing her in the ribs.

“It curled my toes,” she admitted with her cheeks ruffling, which made Sandy laugh.

“That’s what’s most important,” she teased.

He was kicking himself.

Stupid, stupid, stupid!

How could he do that? How could he kiss her! He could tell she was nervous, he could tell she was a little shy. That was the most idiotic, stupid-assed stunt he could have possibly pulled to totally wreck what was such a wonderful afternoon!

He went back to the mission and paced around his room angrily, for over two hours, his tail swishing back and forth behind him with sharp, jerking movements. He worked so hard to make her feel at ease. He worked so hard to seem as un-intimidating as possible. He could sense that she was shy, he could sense that she was nervous. He didn’t want her to be nervous. He wanted her to feel comfortable, to talk to him, to show him the true person inside. And there for a while, she was opening up to him. She was smiling, she was laughing—

God, was her voice lovely!

And then came the question. He had no choice but to tell her, because she’d told him about her family. He knew he was going to screw that up, that he couldn’t possibly explain it to her in a way that she’d believe, but still convey how he felt about it. But she looked up at him, and her eyes was so beautiful, and he just, just couldn't help himself. He was kissing her before he even knew what the hell he was doing. And right when he realized it, she put her arms around him, and he lost all rational thought when she kissed him back.

That female could kiss!

He groaned, flopping down to the floor, feeling his back protest the hard impact and the unforgiving surface. Stupid, stupid, stupid! The only female that had ever turned his head, a female so beautiful he even dreamed about her, so gentle that he felt almost giddy when she touched him, so compassionate he could feel her concern like a palpable thing, and he blew it.

The phone in his backpack rang, almost startling him out of his wits. Was it her? Was she calling him back this fast? He scrambled to his knees and tore it out of the pack and flipped it open. "JD? JD? I'm sorry—"

"Nobody's ever called me that before," Vil laughed from the other end. "Did you find her, bro?"

Kit groaned and flopped back onto the floor. "I'm an idiot, sis!" he said loathingly. "I think I totally blew it!"

"Whoa there, bro, calm down. What happened? How did you blow it?"

"I kissed her, Vil! Right on the mouth!"

"On your first date? You move fast," she teased.

"It was a disaster!" he lamented, putting his free paw over his eyes. "It was the worst thing I could have done!"

“Well, walk me through it, little bro,” she said, sitting down in her Boston apartment on the sofa near her work desk in her study. “This may not be as bad as you think.”

He glossed over most of their outing, up until he got to the point where he had to explain his concern. “How could I tell her, Vil? How could I explain it? I just couldn’t! I have no idea what I said, but it must have sounded totally ridiculous. She didn’t seem to take it seriously. Then she looked up at me, and God was she so beautiful, I, I just don’t know why the hell I did that!”

“Okay, bro, first thing. Calm down,” she called in a steady, cool voice. “Just calm down. Working yourself into a seizure isn’t going to help right now.”

He took several breaths, then began again with a less hysterical voice. “At least she didn’t slug me,” he finally said.

“Well, that’s a positive outlook,” Vil chuckled, leaning back on the sofa. “Now, what happened after you kissed her?”

“I apologized,” he said immediately. “And I broke off the date. I gave her the number to this phone, and told her to call me if she wasn’t angry with me, and if she decided that seeing a homeless bum making minimum wage who’s too much of a chickenshit to stand up to his own family was worth her time.”

“Watch your mouth, Kit,” she scolded.

“Sorry,” he said with a sigh. “I don’t know what to do, sis. I feel so stupid.”

“The first thing you can do is get off the floor,” she told him.

There was a startled silence. “How did you know that?”

“I know you better than you think, little brother,” she told him seriously. “Now get up and sit down on a chair or a bed or something. Do not flail about on the floor like a madman.”

He did as she ordered, getting up and sitting on the bed.

“Alright, now, think about it. Did she do or say anything to you that hinted that she was angry?”

“Well, no,” he said after a moment. “But it was so out of line—“

“Stop that!” she barked. “This isn’t about you. Did she say anything after you kissed her? Anything at all?”

“No, she didn’t say a word. I think I scared her half to death. She’s very shy, Vil. She’s shy, and she was nervous. That’s why it was like the ultimate bad thing to do to kiss her. I must have scared her out of her mind!”

“Stop it,” she warned in a dangerous voice. “Just repeating things over and over gets us nowhere, and it just works you up.”

“No, wait. After I kissed her and said I was sorry, she said that she woulda kneed me in the balls if she thought I was out of line,” he remembered.

Vil laughed. “I think I like this girl,” she said. “So, she joked about it after you kissed her, but didn’t make any indications she was angry?”

He thought for a minute. “No, not that I can remember.”

“Did she kiss you back?”

He blew out his breath. “I thought I was going to pass out right there in the rink,” he said thickly.

“So, she did,” Vil chuckled dryly. “And it sounds like you enjoyed it.”

“I thought my heart was going to stop.”

“Okay then, bro, just relax a little. A girl never kisses back if she feels put upon or forced. If she kissed you back, she was definitely into that kiss. You may have ambushed her with it, but she wasn’t entirely opposed to the idea of it, from the way it sounds to me. I think you surprised her when you backed off and then broke off the date. If I was just kissed by a guy I liked and he ran away afterward, I’d be surprised too.”

“Awww!” he groaned. “I never thought of it that way!”

“It’s alright, it’s alright,” she said soothingly. “If you want my advice, just wait a while. She’s going to call you, baby bro. That’s a guarantee. You said she was shy, so it might take her a little time to work up the courage to be so forward, but she will call you. Just wait for her.”

“I...okay. I can do that. I’ll wait as long as it takes.”

“Is she worth it?”

He answered her immediately. “Hell yes,” he said fervently. “She’s not just beautiful, sis, she’s really smart, and she’s fascinating. She’s gentle, and kind, and considerate. And she loves Vonnegut!”

“Then wait for her, bro,” she told him seriously.

“Until hell freezes over.”

“Good. Now, I want you to listen to me,” she said, very seriously. “I want you to forget about the family. I will keep them the hell away from you. Don't let that affect your decisions about this femme in any way. Do you understand?"

"I wish it were that easy," he sighed.

"Kit, have I ever lied to you?"

"No."

"Do you trust me?"

"Of course I do."

"Then trust me now. I promise you, I'll take care of it. I'm not going to let them interfere in your happiness. You deserve it."

"I'm not making any promises, but I'll try."

"Okay, now that that's settled," she said, not giving him time to beat himself over it, "did you start looking for apartments, or did you just go out with her today?"

"I have a few good leads on some places," he said. "And no, I don't want your help," he declared.

She laughed. "Well, I can get you something that doesn't come with its own forms of life lurking in the fridge, Kit. Trust me, I've seen what some people try to pass off as apartments."

"I can guarantee you I've both seen and lived in worse, sis," he said calmly.

"I guess you have," she chuckled. "But the offer's there, Kit. You're a phone call away from a decent apartment, whenever you need it."

“I’m happy you’re thinking of me, Vil, but I’ll manage. I’ve managed all this time on my own just fine. Trust me.”

“Alright. I think I’ll let you go, baby bro, but you’d better not brood or sulk. If I catch you doing it, I’m gonna fly down there and spank you.”

“I’ll try not to,” he chuckled.

“Okay, bro. I have some work to finish up before tomorrow, so I’ll talk to you later.”

“Love you sis.”

“I love you too, bro. Bye.”

Vilene turned off the phone, silent a long moment, tapping the antenna of the phone against her muzzle. She then got up and went to her desk, and sat down. There, in an open manila folder, was the entire life history of one Jessica Desdemona Williams.

Marcus had been both efficient and speedy. In just one day, and on a Sunday, no less, he had found a girl whose name he did not know and dug up absolutely everything there was to know about her. Family history, her school records, her health records, everything. All of it was right there for Vilene to peruse, an entire life rendered down into a series of records and reports. Dean’s List student at the University of Texas, pursuing a Bachelor’s Degree in English. Honors student who graduated fifth in her class from Southside High School in Cincinnati, Ohio. Daughter of John and Hannah Williams, both cats, but Hannah’s father was a fox, which meant that Jessica was a mixed species. It certainly didn’t show, from looking at her picture. She looked like she was all cat.

There was nothing in that folder that dissuaded Vilenne in any way about wanting to see her brother chase her. But, that wasn't why she'd had Marcus find out about her. All the other reports were just Marcus being thorough, the only thing that Vilenne had really been after was the girl's address and telephone number.

Not yet. If she called out of the blue, it might scare this girl away from her brother, and she wouldn't allow that. Her brother had had a very hard life, and she'd be damned if she would screw up his chance to find a little happiness.

She knew exactly how to play it.

She punched up a phone number with her thumb and put the receiver to her ear. "Hey Vicki, how you been? No, I'm afraid this isn't a chitchat call. I need a favor," she said. "It's going to be a bit strange, but humor me, okay?" A pause. "Cool beans, Vicki. Now listen. I need you to run a story for me, but it's important you put my picture in it with color. No, I don't know what kind of story. Make something up. Dig something out of the files or call the shipyards or something. What's important is that my picture is in the paper, the picture is in color, and the article is somewhere where a college student will find it. You have a close-up color picture of me in your files? Good." A pause. "No, Vicki, it has to be in color. It does no good at all if it's in black and white." A pause. "Well, tell your editor if you do this for me, Vilenne Vulpan will owe your paper a big favor. And if that doesn't work, then tell him to call me and tell him I'll pay for it. Say, double your normal advertiser's fee for the space taken up by the article?" A pause. "Since when has journalistic integrity had anything to do with the newspaper business?" Vilenne laughed after a pause. "This is important to me, Vicki. It's very important. More important than money." A pause. "It has to be either tomorrow or Tuesday. I can't stress it enough, Vicki. It's really important." A pause. "No, this has nothing to do with business. This is personal."

She leaned back in her chair and sighed. "Well, I guess it is too late to get it in tomorrow's paper. No, Tuesday works just fine. I guess I can do an interview if you want to do something real. Sure, bring a photographer, he can take a shot of me in my office. But can you guarantee it's in by Tuesday? Thanks a ton, Vicki. You're a lifesaver." A pause. "Well, I think I could swing that, but I'll still owe you a big favor on top of it." She laughed. "Yeah, it's that important to me, Vicki. You too. Send me the a copy of the paper when you print it, okay? I'd like to see it," she chuckled. "You too. Take care, hon. Bye-bye."

There, that should get the ball rolling down there in Austin.

Kit had tried to explain his family to her, but didn't think she'd believe him. Well, let her see just who Kit was related to, and it should all fall right into place.

There was a lot to do and not much time. Besides, it kept him from carrying the phone around with him in his paw all the time. He kept himself completely busy, doing his best to try to not think about JD, even though everything he was doing was directly because of her. She was the only reason he wasn't getting ready to get on a bus for points west, points unknown. She was the only reason he wanted to stay in Austin, because it was where she was. And he had a lot to do. A femme that beautiful, that sweet, that wonderful needed someone much better than the fox he was right now. After all, he was homeless. What kind of embarrassment would he be to her when her friends asked about him? After all, she'd have enough to worry about when he eventually broke down and told her the whole truth about him and his family.

If she didn't run away screaming at that point, or laugh in his face.

He still had no idea how he was going to explain it. It was just so, so, ridiculous. He could hear himself now: "Oh, by the way, JD, I'm from one of the richest families in America, but I've been disowned and I don't even have a home. And by the way, my family would probably want to kill both me and you if they ever found out I'm dating you." Oh yeah, that was going to go over so well.

But he'd have to find a way. She deserved to know the truth, and she was worth the effort. God, was she worth it.

Monday morning was very, very busy. He was up at five, before dawn, and hit the floor running. His first stop was Wal-Mart, where he bought clothes that he felt looked decent enough for him to go job-hunting; a white dress shirt, a pair of black slacks, a nice tie and belt, and a respectable pair of shoes. Then he stopped by a Staples near the mall and picked out a cheap yet tasteful portfolio to carry his laptop and whatever papers he needed or collected. After he got his business clothes all in order, he banged out something of a decent-looking resume on his laptop and ran it down to Kinko's and had them print him ten copies on good quality gray paper.

All that was done before 9:30am.

As soon as 9:30 hit, he was on the phone. He'd always felt that 9:30 was the best time to make these kinds of calls, since it gave the people in the offices a chance to settle in, but got to them before they got too busy with other things. His first call was to Lone Star, the magazine looking for a researcher. The receptionist was a male, which surprised him a little, and directed his call to the fur in charge of hiring.

“Uh, yes sir, I was calling about the ad you placed on Monster for the researcher’s position. Is it still available?”

“Yessir, it is,” he said in a heavy Texas drawl. “Pardon my pointing this out, but you don’t sound like you’re local, son.”

Kit chuckled. “I’m in Austin now, sir. Might I come and hand in my resume today?”

“You certainly may. When you get to the office, just tell the fluffy fella at the front desk you’re here to see Rick. That’s me. I’d rather you hand it to me yourself, that way I know it don’t get lost or nothin’.”

“Rick,” he said to himself, writing it down on a little memo pad he kept in his backpack. “Thank you very much, sir. I should have my resume to you in an hour.”

“I’ll be waitin’.”

It wasn’t wise to put all his eggs in that basket, but that was also the only company for which he’d gotten a phone number. The rest were all faxes, post office boxes, websites, much less personal means of contact. But, now that the phone call was made, it was time to get busy with all that other stuff. It was nearly an hour’s bus ride down to the south side of Austin, near the university. Lone Star Magazine was headquartered on Congress Avenue, which was the main avenue that ran right up to the capitol building. In fact, it was only two blocks from the capitol to the south, only five blocks from the south end of the U.T. campus. It was a very old building, he could see, done in late 19th century architecture with heavy stone blocks and sculpted corners, with tall, narrow windows on all five stories. It was a multi-office building, with some oil company on the first floor, Lone Star on the second, and some trading company taking up the top three. The security guard in the lobby directed him to the stairs—he never rode in an elevator unless he had to, he hated them—and found himself in a large receiving room with bright red carpet, blue walls, and the Texas flag painted on the wall behind the reception desk along with LONE STAR MAGAZINE blocked above and below it. The receptionist was a sheep, his woolly fur meticulously combed and organized, and the male was actually wearing makeup.

Well...he was indeed “fluffy,” but now he saw that the male he talked to on the phone meant the word in a much less literal sense.

“May I help you?” he asked in an effeminate voice.

“Yes, I’m here to see Rick.”

“Down the office, last door on the left.”

The office to which he’d been directed was a nightmare of clutter. Books, files, sheafs of notes, they were stacked almost everywhere. An oil painting of some badger in an old uniform was on the wall, and there was an antique desk made of mahogany on the far side of the office, with two chairs between it and the door. Behind that desk sat a dog with very unusual, almost calico-like fur pattern, a riot of reds, whites, browns, and tans all looking like some mad painter had used him as an easel. He had a patch of white over his left eye, and a streak of brown over his nose and crossing over his right. His chin fur was a little shaggy, showing his age, and he glanced up just slightly. Then he did a double-take and gave Kit a long look, probably either looking at his eye or his ear, Kit supposed. He was used to it. “And what can I do for you, sir?” he asked.

“I’m here to turn in a resume,” he answered. “May I come in?”

The dog laughed. “A resume? Really? Is this some kind of joke?”

“Uh, no, sir,” Kit said uncertainly. “We talked on the phone just a little while ago.”

“Well,” he hummed, leaning back in his chair and tapping his fingertips together. “Well, well, well. I always wondered what happened to you. I’ll admit, I’m a bit surprised to see you standing at my door.”

“Excuse me?”

“Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan the third,” he said with a slight smile, then he put his paws behind his head and clunked his feet up on his desk. “The disowned rebel of the Vulpan family.”

Kit blanched, almost taking a step back. Of course he might have heard of his family, he was in the magazine business! “I, uh, I... You’re not going to hold it against me, are you?” he asked, almost pleadingly.

The dog laughed. “Of course not! So, you have a resume to hand in, do you? Can I see it?”

Kit stepped in and opened his portfolio, and took out a manila folder holding a copy of his resume. He stepped up and took it out, and handed it to the dog.

“Have a seat,” he said absently as he put his feet down and started reading. Kit seated himself, grabbing hold of the end of his tail and wringing it nervously as he tried to calm down. This guy knew about him, knew that he'd been disowned. When people did that, knew who he was, they either asked him a million questions or treated him like a live snake. Even when they said it didn't bother them, it still did anyway, thinking that Kit just wasn't like them. But how was this male going to handle it? Was he going to give Kit a fair shake?

“So, despite the fact that you obviously wrote this this morning, tell me. What brought you to Austin? And why do you want to work here?”

“I've been traveling around since I graduated from college,” Kit answered. “Just staying in a place a while, then moving on. And when I got here, something about the town just told me I needed to stay for a while. There's a lot to see here. So I'm trying to find a real job instead of what I've been doing. You know, restaurants and such.”

“I see. History, eh?”

“Yes sir. I'm used to doing extensive research. It's kinda necessary in the history business.”

“That's a definite plus. You have some copies of your research work?”

“Not with me, but I can give you a website that has it all archived. U-Mass keeps it all in their E-library.”

“I'll definitely want to look it over before I call you back,” he said, his voice professional. “What we are, Mister Vulpan, is a college magazine, about the college crowd, and for the college crowd. I'm the main editor of this little expedition. I also own the magazine. Lone Star is circulated mainly on campus and in town, College Station, and we just started shipping to San Antonio. I like to have my reporters and staff to either be young or understand the college lifestyle, and I think you fit both bills in that regard. Though you're not familiar with the University of Texas, you are from a pretty big school, so you know what it's like."

"Yes sir. I lived in the dorm when I was at U-Mass, and I played my share of Half Life."

He chuckled. "Good. Now, what kind of research you'd do if I hired you is both normal research and also field work. You'd do your share of hunting down facts and statistics, but I'd also send you out to the college to gather information directly from the students. You have any problem talking to strangers?"

"None at all, sir."

"Good. Since we're also rather small, there's a chance I might ask you to do some writing, maybe even some photography. I only have six people on staff, so we all do what we can, when we can. But none of my people are accomplished researchers, so that would be your main focus. Since you're a history major, you know how to put together an essay and make it logical, but have you done any other writing?"

"Well, I kept a journal when I was out on the road," he said. "If you want, you can use that to judge my ability to write outside of the college format."

"Excellent. You need to send it to me."

"I have it right here," he said, reaching into his portfolio and pulling out his laptop. "Do you have a wireless network?"

"It's firewalled against outside machines, but I have a flash drive handy," he said, reaching into his desk and taking out a small USB flash drive.

Kit turned on the laptop and kept half an eye on it as Rick Sanders kept talking. “You ever done any photography?”

“Not professional, sir. But I can take normal pictures.” His laptop finished booting, so he inserted the flash drive and prepared to copy the 7 journal files over to the flash drive, one for each month he was on the move.

“Do you know how to use Word?”

He nodded. “Both Word and Excel.”

“You have any experience with Photoshop?”

“No sir, the most computer work I did was making Powerpoint slideshows for my presentations.”

“Do you have any skills you think I might find useful in a magazine publishing environment?”

“Well, no, not really, sir,” he admitted honestly. “Well. I took some accounting and business classes, but I don’t think they’d be much help here. And I do have a pilot’s license. I’m not sure how much help that’d be around here, but if you ever get an airplane, I can fly you somewhere in it.”

“What kind of hobbies do you have, Mister Vulpan?”

“Well, I can play a guitar a little and I like to sing. I love to read, anything and everything, and I enjoy listening to music.”

“what kind?”

“ABR, sir. Anything But Rap.”

Sanders laughed. “I’m a country man, myself.”

“I’m not all that big on modern country. It seems like it tries too hard to be like pop music,” Kit noted. “I like older country, from the 80’s back. That’s when country was best.”

“Son, you just made a friend,” Sanders laughed. “Who’s your favorite old timers?”

“My favorite old musicians are probably Alabama and Tammy Wynette,” he said.

“You like any of the new groups?”

“Well, Big and Rich are kind of interesting,” he noted. “It’s country with a sense of humor. That’s fresh. Outside of them, it’s all sort of cookie-cutter music.”

“Amen, amen,” he nodded. “Now, you have to answer a question for me. It might be a little personal, so if it offends you, I’m sorry in advance.”

“Go ahead, sir.”

“What happened to you?”

“Excuse me?”

“The accident. I remember reading about it in Furs. You were hit by a car, and your father refused to pay for your hospital bills. It said in the story you’d been disowned since you were sixteen. Did that all work out?”

Kit sighed, scrubbing the back of his head with the short claws on his fingers. “Well, mostly,” he said. “My sister paid my bills, and the scandal basically embarrassed my father into not doing anything about it.”

“That wasn’t what I was asking, son,” he chuckled. “Did it all work out between you and your family?”

He looked down. “It did after my father died,” he said bluntly. “I was at the funeral. I watched them put that old bastard in the ground, and it was the first time in my life I ever felt free. It worked out for me, sir. I’m through with them.”

He was quiet a long moment, and Kit felt a little stupid and chagrined for saying that. Oh, sure, that was a way to try to impress someone that could give you a decent job.

“Well, we all have family problems at one time or another,” he said with a slight smile. “I’ll look over your papers and your journal and see what kind of work you do, and give you a call back either tonight or tomorrow.”

“I, thank you, sir,” Kit said, standing up. The dog stood up as well, and they shook paws.

Kit left feeling a little uncertain. He asked that question, Kit answered before he thought about it, then he was hustled out the door. He had a feeling that Lone Star was a bust.

The rest of the day was busy. He spent a great deal of time of it in the Austin Public Library, using and abusing their computers and their fax machine. He sent out resumes to 29 different companies in the Austin area, jobs ranging from researching at Lone Star to an apprentice welding opening for Cubrin Metalworking, anything that paid a decent salary that he was even remotely qualified to do.

And he sent them out, he wondered how many of the people who read his resume would recognize his name, and immediately throw his resume in the garbage thinking it was either a joke or there was no way they'd hire someone like him, some rich kid that they couldn't depend on because he didn't need the money.

His name. He should have changed the damn thing, but that was like a thousand dollars, and there was no way he could afford something like that. So he was stuck with it, at least for now.

He kept himself so busy that he didn't realize that it was sunset when he left the library. He hadn't eaten all day, so he stopped at the first fast food joint he came across, a Burger King on Congress Avenue, across from the campus. Kit had a thing for hamburgers. They were his favorite food, and if there was a hamburger on the menu no matter where he went, that's what he got. After growing up eating the exotic food of the rich, he had a love of the simple food of normal people, food that didn't have French names, or served on gold-laminated china in geometric patterns for artistic flair.

Food that wasn't tiny.

He dropped down at a table near the counter and dug in, eating with a haste that came with hunger. He was almost finished with his burger when the phone in his pocket rang, and he literally threw it down, his heart leaping. Was it JD, finally calling him back? "Hello?" he called in excitement.

"Heya, Rick Sanders here," came the voice on the other side of the connection. "I looked over your papers and your journal, Vulpan, and it's good stuff. Your capstone was very well done, but I was much more impressed by your journal. It's what I'd expect my journalism graduates to put out."

“Thank you, Mister Sanders,” he said, trying not to sound so giddy.

“Rick. Only my pastor calls me Mister Sanders. You said that research was a job requirement for a history major, and you proved it. And you have the writing skills to do some actual writing if I need it in a pinch. So, why don’t you drop by the office tomorrow and we’ll hammer out the details.”

“Excuse me?”

“I’m offering you the job, son. Anyone who can dig up ancient Roman manuscripts to use as references for a capstone certainly knows how the hell to do research. But I still say you went into the wrong major. You’d have been one hell of a reporter.”

“Really? That’s great!” he said explosively, almost standing up. “And I thought I’d butchered it when you asked about my family,” he admitted.

“Actually, that’s what convinced me. It proved that you were serious about living your own life, son, away from your family name. I didn’t want someone that was gonna pack up and run home as soon as the job got hard. What you said showed me you’re in it for the long haul.”

“Well, I’m in it for a couple of years at any rate,” he said impulsively.

“Be here at nine, Mister Vulpan. We’ll talk about your salary, and if you take the job, we’ll get your paperwork done.”

“Kit, sir. Everyone calls me Kit.”

“Kit it is,” he chuckled. “See you tomorrow.”

“Thank you, Rick,” Kit said with total sincerity. “This chance means a lot to me.”

“Well, let’s see what you can do with it. I’m on my way out the door, son, so have a good evening. Bye.”

Kit closed the phone, and had to resist the urge to let out a whoop right there in the restaurant. He had a real job! He threw away the burger he’d thrown on the table, not hungry anymore, and speed-dialed Vil as he was rushing out of the restaurant. “Hello?”

“I got a job, sis!” he cried loudly and happily, almost bowling over a skunk femme and a coyote male as they were walking into the restaurant. “Lone Star Magazine hired me to do research!”

“That’s great, bro!” she said happily. “What kind of salary?”

“We’re gonna talk about that tomorrow,” he answered, stopping on the sidewalk near the parking lot. “But it’s gotta be better than the Double J!”

She laughed. “No doubt. Don’t just cave, bro. You’re good at what he hired you to do, so don’t settle for his first offer. You know how to research, so research. Find out how much other researchers make, and take it to ‘em! Show ‘em how good of a researcher you are!”

“I’ll do that,” he promised. “God, it feels good. Now JD won’t be totally embarrassed about me.”

“Has she called you back yet?”

“Not yet,” he said. “I hope she calls soon, though. I’m like dying here waiting for her to call.”

“She will, baby bro, just be patient. Well, you got a job. Now find a place to live.”

“I’ll get on that first thing tomorrow after I’m done at the magazine. I need to go find a wireless hotspot, sis, so I can dig up that research. I’ll call you tomorrow, okay?”

“You bet. Give ‘em hell, bro!” she said enthusiastically.

He said his goodbyes and closed the phone, then almost ran down the street. He had to go back to the Java Joint and get on that, so he could walk into Rick’s office tomorrow armed with all the facts to get a good salary out of him.

He’d show them just how good of a researcher he was.

“Sam? Sammy, hello?” the coyote called, poking the female skunk in the shoulder.

“Oh, sorry,” she said, watching the fox tear down the street.

“You know that guy?”

“I kinda do, yeah,” she answered. “He went out with one of my roommates yesterday. It didn’t end very well.”

“What happened?”

“From what JD told me, he kissed her, and he backed off and left, when she didn’t want him to. She said he seemed scared to death about something, but she wouldn’t tell me what.”

“Sounds a little weird.”

“Yeah, so far everything about that guy is weird.”

“You heard what he said, didn’t you? He said JD wouldn’t be embarrassed about him now.”

“Yeah, he did say that,” she said musingly, putting a finger to her muzzle. “Hon, mind if we call it a little short? I think I need to go talk to JD.”

“Sure, I don’t mind, sweets. How about tomorrow?”

“Tomorrow sounds just fine. Thanks for being so understanding.”

“I know that a femme just can’t sit on juicy gossip,” he grinned. “I can’t compete with I have got to get home and tell JD all about this.”

Sam laughed, patting him on the arm. “Call me, okay?”

“You know it.”

The phone stood there, mocking her.

Jessie sat on her bed, wearing nothing but an oversized Alpha Xi Omega sorority nightshirt, staring at the wireless phone on her nightstand, both desperately wanting to pick it up and too nervous to actually do it. Her stereo was on, tuned to the local pop station, but she really wasn’t listening to it. All she could hear was his voice, going over everything that happened the day before.

He asked her to think about it. Well, that’s all she did all day. She’d been totally lost in classes today, spaced out and distracted, because all she could think of was him. Every part of the time they’d been together, every word he’d spoken, how nice his paws felt when he held onto hers...how warm and wonderful his kiss was....

She groaned and flopped back on her bed. Why couldn't she do it? He liked her, she knew he did! It wasn't like she didn't know what to expect from him! He gave her his number, for crying out loud!

Ever since she was a kitten, she'd always been like this. She was a very shy kitten, and though her career choice had made her start facing that shyness, when it came to personal things like this, she was just as shy as ever.

It was so silly! He gave her his number, because he didn't want to pressure her. She understood that, given that really strange thing about his family that made him afraid, and after he kissed her like that. It was actually very sweet of him to let her be the one to decide and make the next step. But it meant taking initiative, being bold like Sandy. If it was Sandy, she'd have called him back like ten minutes later! But as more and more time went by, she got more and more nervous.

Sometimes being shy was just a damn curse.

It was easy. All she had to do was get up and go to the phone. The post-it with his number was sticking to her mirror, right there in plain view. Just pick up the phone and dial the number. That's it. Pick up the phone, dial the number. Get up, you silly cat! she thought to herself. Get up! Isn't he worth it? Do you want him to think that you're not interested in him? Do you want him to think that he scared you so much you don't want another date? He didn't, and it's not fair to him to let him think that! So get up right now!

She blew out her breath and did get up. She walked over to the phone, and spent a long moment staring at it, her paws trembling slightly. Then she snatched up the phone and looked up at the number.

Her door banged open, and Sam was there, with Sandy right behind her. She'd been out on a date with her boyfriend, but she shouldn't have been back so soon. "We gotta talk, JD," she said with a slight smile.

"Can it wait? I was about to, uh," she said, holding up the phone slightly.

"So you finally worked up the guts to call him, eh?" Sandy teased. "Be glad, I was coming up here to do it for you!"

Jessie's face ruffled a little, and she glanced away.

"Well, this is about him. I ran into him down at the Burger King a few minutes ago."

"Really?"

"Yeah, he almost ran me over," she laughed. "We heard him talking to his sister on his cell phone. He said he got a new job at Lone Star magazine," she said, then she looked back down the hall quickly, "and from the way it sounded, he got it with you in mind."

"Huh?"

"He said, and I quote, 'maybe now JD won't be embarrassed about me.'"

"See, I told you he was staying in Austin because of you, JD!" Sandy said smugly. "Isn't that romantic? He's giving up on his trip just to be near you!"

"It's almost like a stalker," Sam said. Sandy punched her in the arm. She was not gentle.

“Stalkers don’t give out their numbers, Sammy,” Sandy said. “I think it’s romantic. He took one look at JD, and he decided to stay because he wanted to go out with her, so he went out and got a better job than being a dishwasher, just to impress you.”

“Well, I think it’s a little strange,” Sam noted, rubbing her chin with a single black-furred finger. “But, I do have to admit, from what I heard yesterday, I think he’s okay. He told his sister he was dying for you to call him. I think he’s maybe trying a little too hard, but he’s okay. I’d be careful til you get to know him a little better, JD. Once you’re sure he’s not a space case, anyway.”

Jessie laughed. “There’s something he’s not telling me,” she told them. “He even admitted it. He tried to tell me about his family, and said that I probably wouldn’t believe him. And you shoulda heard how he said it! It was something like what I’m about to tell you isn’t the whole truth, but a part of it that’ll let you understand what I’m trying to tell you.”

“He wouldn’t be the first guy that didn’t like to talk about his family.”

“Well, what he said about them wasn’t very good.”

“Yeah,” Sandy agreed. “JD told me he said that his family is a bunch of purists, and they’d have a conniption if they found out he was dating a cat.”

“That’s what he said, but it was the way he said it,” Jessie said musingly. “That wasn’t the part he wouldn’t tell me, just the part he thought was important for me to know.”

“Does it bother you that his family is a bunch of purists?” Sam asked.

“Not really. They all live in Boston, and we’re down here. But, it really bothered him,” she noted, almost clinically. “I could hear it in his voice. Even see it. He’s terrified of his family. I, I think that’s why he lived like a homeless vagabond, really. To get away from them, to hide from them. If you don’t have an address and move from town to town, how can they keep track of you?”

“Yeah, maybe,” Sandy mused. “So, we’ll get outta here, and you call him,” she prompted, pushing the phone in her paw towards her face. “And take notes,” she grinned. “I wanna know! Especially if you two start talking dirty!”

“Oh, out, you!” she commanded, pushing both of them out the door, then slamming it Sandy’s face.

But she didn’t hesitate this time. She immediately started dialing his number.

It was like Sammy’s information broke the wall of her shyness. He was dying for her to call him. He really wanted to see her, she was very impressed with what he was doing where she couldn’t see, trying to get a better job just so she wouldn’t be dating a dishwasher, and it made her feel wanted, and very, very happy. There was no nervousness at all now.

The phone rang. It rang again. And her heart leaped a little when she heard it pick up. “Hello?”

“Kit?” she asked.

“JD! Hey! I was hoping you’d call...but would you please call me back in about a half an hour? I’m on a bus right now, and I’m the kind that thinks it's very rude to talk on a phone in a public setting. It's disrespectful to the others on the bus."

She giggled. "Sure, I can do that, but you have to do something for me."

"Anything!"

"Don't call me JD unless you're asking for me here at the house. Call me Jessie."

"Jessie it is. Half an hour?"

"Half an hour sounds good to me. I'll be waiting."

"Heh, I'll be sitting here staring at my watch," he said ruefully. "I'm so glad you decided I was worth a second chance, Jessie. Talk to you in thirty. Bye-bye."

"Bye."

She put the phone down, feeling a little giddy. She had talked to him without being shy, even asked him to call her by her name! And he was so polite! He could have just asked her to call him back, but he explained why he wanted it, and his reason was so chivalrous. He was so considerate, even to complete strangers!

She carried the phone back to her bed and sat down on it, pulled her legs up to sit cross-legged on it with her longhaired tail wrapped around her legs, and started staring at her alarm clock.

Thirty minutes....

Chapter 3

She almost overslept.

The other girls in the house were both a little peeved at her and intensely curious, because she stayed on the phone almost all night with Kit.

They talked about everything, the slightest things that would cross their minds. They talked about likes, dislikes, movies, books, TV (though Kit didn't watch TV). She talked about school. He talked about living on the road. She talked about Cincinnati and her family. He talked about how life had been just after he'd been disowned. The only thing he wouldn't talk about was his family, and she didn't press him. She could tell that he was very uncomfortable with the subject. All she really learned from him was what little he revealed while talking about other things. He had a sister named Vil, who ran the family business. His father and him had been fighting since he was twelve, and he was disowned at sixteen because he refused to go into the family business. She had no idea what that family business was, but given he was from Boston and was from a stuck-up, purist family, she was betting that his family had some money and ran something like a jeweler's shop or something.

His sister seemed to have money. That expensive Sabletech laptop was a Christmas present from her, he'd told her.

They talked, and talked, and talked. For hours, they talked, and the more they talked, the more interesting he was to her. He was very smart, and he was very kind and thoughtful, and though he hated his family, he loved his sister deeply. He loved hamburgers and scary movies. He was a strategy game fanatic, from chess to computer games. He loved to read. He loved to sit and listen to people tell stories, and write them down. And he really loved music. He was learning to play the guitar, he'd said, and he liked to sing karaoke and at open mic nights. She could tell that he was a very strong fox, strong convictions and willful, but not stubborn or obstinate. He had his opinions, but would listen to the opinions of others, then loved to debate the points of those opinions. They'd spent almost an hour arguing about Vonnegut's works, and though he was hard to sway from his viewpoint—which was all wrong!—he listened respectfully to her point of view.

He was such an enigma! Strong, yet willing to bend. Opinionated, yet open to others trying to sway him. He was very laid back, but had very strong views about politics and government. He was a delight to talk to, an intelligent, well-traveled fox who could tell a sad story about some of the people he'd met, then make her laugh herself silly telling stories he was told from those very same people.

They talked until after midnight, and the only reason they had to quit was because Kit's cellphone battery was almost dead! If not for that, she felt they would have talked all night long. After she reluctantly got off the phone, she realized she'd not done a whit of homework!

It made for a long night, and almost no sleep. She dragged herself out of bed and saw she was a fright, but it was too late for a shower. She resorted to a female's best friend...lots and lots of hair spray. She threw on whatever she had at hand and rushed downstairs, where Sandy, Sam, and two other sorority members, a gray wolf named Charlotte and a rabbit named Lisa were sitting at the kitchen table, eating breakfast. As usual, Sam had her USA Today at hand, reading the news. It was a morning tradition for her. “Hold it right there!” Sandy boomed. “You tie up the phone all night, and think you’re gonna sneak out of here without a word? What did you talk about?”

Jessie giggled. “What didn’t we talk about is the better question,” she grinned coyly. “The only reason we stopped is cause his cell battery died!”

Sandy laughed. “I’m sure it’s charged back up by now,” she hinted.

“Yeah, but he’s starting a new job today,” Jessie said with sincere regret. “He’s already out and about, and I don’t want to disturb him. He said he had to go to an internet hot spot and do some research for work before he got there, so he can haggle a good salary out of his new boss.”

“Ooh, where’s he working?”

“You ever read Lone Star?”

Sandy nodded. “I’ve seen some copies of it on campus. It looked pretty good.”

“That’s where he’s working. He said that his main job is going to be doing research, but it’s a small staff, so he might have to write articles sometimes and act like a reporter. When they need it.”

Sam snapped her paper, then looked carefully at the new section she picked up. “JD,” she said seriously. “What did you say his sister’s name was?”

“Vil,” she answered.

“As in Vilenne? Vilenne Vulpan?”

“He never told me his last name,” she said. “He said it’s one of those things he’d explain later, when he was more comfortable with it. But he never called her Vilenne. He just said her name was Vil. Why?”

“Because I think she’s in the paper,” she said seriously. “Look at this.”

Jessie leaned over Sam and looked where she was pointing. It was a picture of a vixen sitting on the edge of a glass top desk, a computer monitor behind her, legs crossed demurely and leaning on her right paw. She was a very attractive vixen, Jessie noted. “So?” she asked.

“Look at her eyes.”

Jessie did, and she gasped.

Her right eye was green, and her left eye was amber. Just like Kit’s!

The caption of the photo read Vilenne Vulpan, 4th generation CEO of Vulpan Shipyards, in her Boston office. The title of the article was New Blood In An Old Chair: The Youngest Fortune 500 CEO.

“It can’t be!” Sandy said in shock. “Kit’s a Vulpan?”

“Who are Vulpans?” Lisa asked.

“The Vulpans are one of the richest and most powerful families in America,” Sam answered her. “They have more money than some third world nations. You’ve heard of the Kennedys? Well, the Vulpans are like the Kennedys, but they never got into politics.”

“Wow,” Lisa breathed.

She remembered what he said on Sunday. It’s not the whole truth. It’s just a part of the truth that will help me explain things rationally, he said.

Because the truth is so outlandish that even if I heard it, I wouldn't believe it.

Outlandish. Kit, the son of one of the richest families in America, but he was disowned, homeless, and up until today was washing dishes for a living...that was outlandish alright.

Then, in a flash, an image. Months ago, a magazine. She remembered seeing a picture of a fox with two different colored eyes, missing his left ear, walking out of a cemetery. Was that where she thought she'd seen him from?

It could have been the funeral of his father, the father he hated. I just had to be there, he told her last night. I had to see them put him in the ground and know that he was dead and buried.

“Sam. Can I borrow your laptop a minute?” she asked.

“Why?”

“Kit gave me a website where he said I could read his capstone, and he was kinda embarrassed because he said his capstone had his full name on it.”

“Oh. Ohh! Sam!” Sandy said in excitement.

“On it!” she said, literally running out of the kitchen. She returned a moment later and plopped it on the table. “What’s the address?”

“He didn’t say exactly, just that U-Mass kept all capstones in their E-library. And I know the title of his capstone.”

“Easy enough. Google is a femme’s best friend,” she said with a chuckle. The four others crowded over her shoulders. A few mouse clicks brought up the University of Massachusetts main page, and she quickly found her way over to the library page. She clicked the search box and cracked her knuckles. “Alright, JD, what is it?”

“Two nations, one fate, Rome and America.”

She typed that in and hit enter. Immediately they got a response. Sam clicked on the link, and they were looking at a .pdf file showing a cover page of a capstone paper, the title reading America and Rome: Two Nations, One Fate.

“Well, you were close,” Charlotte laughed as Sam scrolled down.

There it was. Kitstrom Vulpan.

“Oh my GOD!” Sandy gasped. “He really is a Vulpan! God damn, femme, you hit the jackpot! He must be worth millions!”

“No, he’s homeless and broke,” Sam said evenly. “JD said he said he was disowned, but that does explain the laptop,” she said clinically, rubbing her chin with a finger. “That’s a pretty damn expensive laptop.”

Jessie looked at his name on the capstone, then looked at the picture of Vilenne Vulpan, with her smart gray skirt and blazer, her slight smile, sitting in the lap of luxury while her brother washed dishes for a living. But then she remembered how Kit always seemed to speak of his sister so warmly, so lovingly. He said she’d always been there for him, that she had been the only member of the family to help him when he got hit by the car, and if she sent him the laptop, maybe she did try to look out for him. Maybe it was Kit that refused to take what she offered, but she was always there to help out if something went very wrong, or he was in dire straits. She even remembered what he's said about his phone, my sister makes me carry it around in case I have an emergency.

“Wow!” Lisa sounded. “Jessie, where did you meet him?”

“By sheer luck,” Jessie answered. “In that coffee place by Northcross Mall.”

“I wonder what it was like for him,” Charlotte breathed. “From having all that money, then bam, on the streets. How did he make it? I mean, think about it. He wouldn't know what it was like to live like normal people, not living in his mansion with all his servants.”

“Damn, you're right,” Sandy said quietly, her eyes drifting to the rabbit.

“It woulda been hard, that's for sure,” Sam noted.

It fit. That's why he was so afraid of his family. He said they had a very long arm. Well, if they were that rich, then they probably did. No wonder he was so afraid. The poor fox, he could never feel like he would be free of them!

She went through everything she remembered from last night. Everything he told her fit together neatly with this new little bit of critical information, and everything became more clear. It explained his love for his sister, who had literally saved him from dying on the streets. It explained his almost rabid hatred of his family, who had turned their backs on him and not helped him when he needed it most, when he'd been hit by that car and broke his back. It explained why he was so afraid of his family, because he feared they would lash out at him if he dared to stain the family honor, disowned or not. And since he was no longer part of the family, destitute, he had no real protection from them, no safety. All he had was his sister, who was his lifeline and also his only defense against the rest of his family.

She put her clasped paws to her muzzle and sighed. Oh, God. What a hard six years for him, but he'd come through it a better fox for his hardships. He hadn't lost his kindness to others, and he could still smile and laugh.

What a male!

“JD? JD? You okay?”

“I'm fine, Sandy,” she said with a little smile. “This actually makes it all make perfect sense to me now. It explains everything. He was trying to tell me, but he didn't think I'd believe him. I guess I wouldn't have,” she admitted honestly. “He was trying to lead me into it, but he was afraid to be honest with me.”

“I can see why,” Charlotte laughed.

“I need to talk to him,” she declared. “Can I have that, Sam?” she asked, pointing at the Money section of the paper, the one with the article. “I think I'll need it.”

“Sure.” She handed it up and over her shoulder.

“Thanks. I need to go, I'm gonna be late for class.”

“Where can I buy that paper, Sam?” Sandy asked quickly.

“Anywhere,” she shrugged in reply.

Jessie didn't pay much attention in her morning class, her mind preoccupied with Kit, and what she wanted to tell him. She had to let him know that she knew, and she understood, and it did not bother her. She wanted to see him, wanted to get to know him. She wanted to go see scary movies with him and hide her face in his chest when the monsters jumped out of the shadows. She wanted to walk along the river park with him, paw in paw, talking about nothing in particular. She wanted to go to a bar with him and be embarrassed to death when he pulled her up on stage and made her sing with him.

She wanted to kiss him again.

She waited until lunch before she called him, from a cell phone borrowed from the other Jessie from the house, who had the same European Literature class with her. "Hello?" he answered.

"Kit?"

"Jessie! Hi, how are you?"

"I'm fine. Listen, I know you're busy right now, but when do you get off work?"

"I'm actually off already. When my boss found out I have no home or car, he kicked me out so I could find a place."

"That's nice. Did you get a good salary?"

He laughed. "He was a bit shocked when I went in there with a spreadsheet of researcher's salaries. I made a few concessions to get some immediate help, but all in all I think I got a good salary. Nineteen thousand a year to start, which is about midstream given I don't have any experience, with an adjustment meeting in six months, and a thousand dollar advance so I can afford to get a place of my own. The main thing is, Rick, my boss, he's going to let me use his wife's old second car until I get something of my own."

"That's good. Listen, I want to see you. Can you meet me somewhere?"

"Right now?"

"No, later. I have two more classes today. Do you know the campus well?"

"Not really."

"Okay, here on campus we have a big bookstore, kinda in the middle. Right outside of it, facing the old bell tower, there's this little square that has benches along the sidewalk. Can you meet me there around five thirty? I'll be sitting on one of the benches."

"Sure, I can do that. I should be in the area, I'm concentrating on finding a place within walking distance of the office. That way I can give Rick back his car."

"Okay. Maybe after we talk a while, we can go get some pizza or something?"

"I'd love to."

"Good. I'll see you then."

"I'll be waiting. Bye Jessie."

"Bye-bye." She handed the phone back to Jessica. "Thanks Jessie."

“No, keep it for now,” the tiger grinned. “If he gets lost, you might need to call him and guide him. Just put it on silent and don’t answer any calls, okay?”

“Sure. Thanks, you’re a lifesaver.”

“We’ve been trying to get you a boyfriend for a year, you silly kitty,” she laughed. “The whole house has already agreed to do whatever it takes to get you two together.”

“Gee, thanks,” she said with a slight ruffle of her cheeks, which made Jessica explode with laughter.

Research.

That’s what Kit was going to do for a living, and that was exactly what she needed to do.

She started with the article. She read it completely. It was about Vilenne, how she was the youngest of all CEOs running the Forbes 500 list of biggest companies. She was the fourth Vulpan to run the company that was named after her family, Vulpan Shipyards, the biggest shipbuilding corporation in America, and fifth biggest in the world. They built every kind of ship, from speedboats up to aircraft carriers, and had branched out to other areas that mainly supported building ships. Vulpan Steel was the ninth largest steel company in America, its own company, but it was folded into Vulpan Shipyards in some business way Jessie didn’t completely understand. She operated both companies, even though they were technically separate from one another. The article focused on the challenges Vilenne faced being both very young and also a female in a the male’s world of high-ranking corporate executives, but she'd been groomed for the role. Valedictorian of her class in Harvard, third in her class in Harvard Business College, one of the most prestigious business colleges in the world, and she was also an Oxford scholar. She was a sharp businesswoman, and she'd already increased profits at Vulpan Shipyards in the six months since she'd been at the helm.

There was no mention of the rest of the family or Kit in the article.

After her second class, she hit the computer lab and made Google her best friend too. She looked up the Vulpan family in google, and was stunned to get back over a hundred thousand replies! Googling Kit himself brought back over ten thousand replies! She narrowed down her search, and more or less pieced together what had happened to Kit, using old news stories, gossip columns, and blogs. And everything she found on the internet fit exactly with everything Kit had told her. His being disowned, the accident that broke his back, all of it. And oh my God, how the gossip columns went to town over Kit and his father! They speculated on what had caused Kit to be disowned, and it was was all the gossip columns talked about for like a year after it happened. They even sent out photographers and reporters to get pictures and details of the disowned Vulpan trying to make it on his own afterwards. How rude of them, and how cruel, to make his personal pain some kind of sick real-life soap opera to drool over every morning in the paper! It proved he wasn't lying, but it also reinforced his declaration to her that she wouldn't believe him if he told her the truth, that he wouldn't believe it himself if someone told it to him.

After that, she looked into other members of the Vulpan family. It was a pretty big family, with lots of aunts, uncles, grand-aunts and uncles, and cousins by the platoon. And all of them, every single one, had the same eyes as Kit. Their right eyes were green, and their left eyes amber. There was even an article on google about it, calling it the “Vulpan Eyes,” a very distinctive family trait that made a Vulpan very distinct from other foxes. Sam would have loved to read that article, it was all about genetics, how it was some kind of dominant genetic trait that bred true through the Vulpan line.

Out of curiosity, she looked up Kit and Vilenne’s father, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan Junior. The obituary said he died of heart failure at 49, and was survived by brothers and sisters, aunts and uncles...and only one child.

God, what a heartless man. Even in death, he wouldn’t acknowledge that he had a son.

She ran out of time and had to go to her Fundamentals of Education class, needed for her teaching certificate, but her mind wasn’t much on the class. She had all the facts now, so it was just a matter of talking to Kit about it. She knew him pretty well now, after their marathon talk last night, so she had an idea of how to break the subject with him. Direct, to the point, yet with gentleness and tact.

After class, she went down to the bookstore and picked a nice empty bench within sight of the bookstore, but out of the hot August sun. She picked at her blouse and smoothed her jeans, going over it all in her mind over and over. She was impatient, but she was willing to sit there and wait all night for him, knowing that he would be there.

He was late, but he made it. About ten minutes to six, just before she was about to call him, she saw him all but running along the sidewalk by the bookstore. He stopped and looked around, and she waved to him. He waved back, and padded up to the bench quickly. "I'm so sorry," he said, a little out of breath. "I couldn't find a place to park!"

"It's okay," she smiled. "I'm glad you made it. Sit down please?"

"Sure. How was your day?"

"It was...distracting," she told him honestly.

"It was for me too," he said, leaning back on the bench and brushing his hair back. Then he looked at her. "Jessie? Is something wrong?"

She reached down into her backpack, and pulled out the newspaper. She handed it to him. "Kit. This is your sister, isn't it?"

He looked at the picture, and his eyes widened, and he seemed to stiffen up.

"You're Kitstrom Vulpan," she said gently. "From the family that owns Vulpan Shipyards."

He sagged. He buried his face under his paws, and he was almost stock still.

"Kit," she called, putting a paw on his shoulder.

"I'm sorry, Jessie," he said, not looking at her. "I didn't know how to tell you. I couldn't figure out a way. I didn't think you'd believe me, that a homeless dishwasher was a Vulpan. I was afraid you'd think I was lying to try to impress you, or I was just nuts."

"Well, I'll admit, I was a little shocked when I found this, and then I looked up your name on your capstone and put it together. I remembered that you told me your name was on it. But Kit. Kit, look at me."

He didn't move. She reached under his paws and lifted his head, and she almost melted when she saw that he was tearing up. "Oh, Kit, I'm not angry," she told him immediately. "You warned me yourself that you didn't know how to tell me without sounding outrageous. Outlandish, I think you said," she said with an encouraging smile. "Remember what I told you when you said how your family would react if they knew you were seeing me?"

He nodded silently.

"I haven't changed my mind," she smiled. "I understand, Kit. You're afraid of your family because they're rich, and they can reach down here all the way from Boston and make our lives hell. Well, I'm not going to let them stand in our way, and neither should you. I don't care if you're broke and homeless. I don't care that you're from a rich family. And I really don't care what they think of me."

"I'm, I'm glad you feel that way, Jessie," he said, sniffing a little, leaning down with his elbows on his knees. "Do you know how it feels to like someone, but be so afraid of your own family that you don't do anything about it? To be ruled by a family you hate, but you can never get away from? It makes me feel helpless sometimes, frustrated. Impotent. I've been on my own for six years, but I'm still so afraid of them I won't live my own life because they might disapprove."

"But you did do something about it," she told him. "You went ice skating with me," she said with a smile. "And we talked all night, and I really liked it. And I want to keep seeing you, Kit, no matter what your family thinks of it." She reached out and clasped his paw, and he put his other paw over hers. "I told you I wasn't afraid then, and I'm not afraid now. Even though I know that you were serious, it doesn't matter to me.

You're worth the risk. You're worth it. Can you meet me halfway and share the risk with me, Kit?"

He looked over at her, his eyes earnest. "I'd carry you."

"We'll talk about carrying me some other time," she giggled. "Are you okay with it? I know your secret, but I don't care who you were. All I care about is who you are right here, right now. I think you're a handsome, intriguing, wonderful fox, and I want to go out with you, I want to get to know you."

"And I want to get to know you too," he mirrored.

"Well then, I think there was a promise of pizza somewhere in here," she grinned. "But, before we get to the pizza, I think I owe you one more thing."

"What?"

She put her paw on his muzzle, pulled him so he was facing her, then she screwed up her courage and leaned over, and kissed him. She felt him tense up a second in surprise, then lean into her and kiss her back with gentle, sensual enthusiasm. The paw on his muzzle looped around his neck, and she felt him put an paw on her knee and his other paw on her shoulder, but all she could really feel was the warm charge running through her from his kiss.

She broke the kiss slowly, then pushed back to gaze into his eyes for a long moment. Then she smiled. "Well, I'm not going to run away on you like you did on me," she winked. "Unless you think I was too forward," she giggled.

“No, forward away,” he said, a little breathlessly. “You’re a fantastic kisser, Jessie.”

She laughed, leaning against him. “So, how does pizza sound? My treat.”

“That sounds great. Uh, isn’t that Sandy?” he asked, pointing.

She looked over by the bookstore, and saw all her sorority sisters over there, in a big group, all of them clapping and cheering. Her cheek fur stood straight out, and she buried her face in his shoulder. “Oh my God!” she cried. “This is so embarrassing!”

He laughed. “You certainly weren’t very shy a moment ago.”

She looked up at him. “You know, it’s the strangest thing. Last night I was scared to call you, because I was too shy. But then Sam comes in and says that you nearly knocked her down in front of Burger King, and said that she overheard you talking to your sister on the phone, that you were so excited about getting the job, and you mentioned my name and were dying waiting for me to call you. I was touched, Kit, really. And then I wasn’t nervous at all about the idea of talking to you. I don’t know why. I would have been mortified at the idea of kissing some other male, but not you.”

“I’m honored you feel that way about me,” he said sincerely. “Now, there’s one thing we can talk about over pizza.”

“What?”

“Getting even with your friends for spying on us,” he said, standing up and offering his paw to her.

She laughed, and took it. “I’m sure you have a few ideas?”

“If you want them to hate you forever, sure, I have a few,” he winked.

She laughed even harder. Kit picked up her bookbag and slung it over his shoulder, then he turned and gave her friends a Bunny Hill salute, complete with a goofy expression on his face, which made several of them bend over laughing. He put his arm around her shoulder, and she felt just fine being snuggled up close to him as they walked away.

Life was wonderful.

Kit woke up at the mission at seven, and just laid there replaying last night over and over in his mind. Jessie was, she was...wow. They sat in John's Pizza and had dinner and talked, then, after two wonderful hours, he walked her back to her sorority house. She invited him in, but he felt that it would be best not to get grilled by all her friends, so he declined. They kissed again on the porch, a long, passionate, soul-engaging kiss that made his knees a little rubbery when she showed mercy on him. She admitted with a laugh that he was murdering her grades, so he told her to call him only when she felt comfortable. He was patient, and he'd be there when she was ready.

She called him before he even got back to the mission. They talked until nearly eleven, when the cell phone's battery squealed in protest, almost out of power.

What a special femme. She knew his secret, and she understood why he felt the way he did. That really meant something to him. It showed she was willing to see it through his eyes, see that his fear was very real. And she wasn't afraid, even knowing the truth. It was so humbling. She was a shy femme, shy and demure, but she had real strength in her, a powerful strength that gave him the courage to finally stand up and shout to the world

I WILL LIVE MY OWN LIFE, MY FAMILY BE DAMNED!

He felt humble and honored that she was so interested in him. That she was willing to go out with him, talk with him, be his friend, despite the fact that she knew he had nothing, but was willing to work hard to be something she could be proud of. She was taking such a big chance on him, a homeless dishwasher with a terrible family that would hate her, but she didn't care. He could learn a lot from that female about courage.

But, he had work to do. He had a job, now he needed a home. Rick told him he'd start on Thursday, which gave him a couple of days to track down a place to live. He had to make something of himself. He would not let people say that Jessie Williams was going out with a homeless bum!

He was up and about by eight. He had to walk a while to get to where he'd parked Rick's car, but everything was safe and sound. He drove back to the magazine's office and went up and checked in with Rick, and told him what he had planned, where he was going to go to look for apartments that day.

"You needed to see me, boss?"

"Yeah, here," he said, pushing a box on his desk. "Your business cards."

Kit opened the box and looked at them. There, with the Lone Star logo in the background, was his name. Kit Vulpan, Lone Star Magazine, along with the magazine's telephone number and his very own email address, kit@lonestarmagazine.com.

"Wow, thanks, boss. I've never had business cards before."

“They come in handy. What’s with the clothes?”

“Well, this is an office.”

“Wear anything that won’t get you arrested, we don’t care,” he grinned. “There’s no dress code here. Now, about a place to live. You should look at the area around Bergstrom International,” he suggested. “Ever since the base closed and they turned it into an airport, there’s some pretty cheap housing out that way.”

“It’s kinda far out,” he said. “And I don’t have a car yet.”

“I told you you can use mine til you get one.”

“I know, but, well, I’d like to live close to U.T.,” he said. “I have a good reason.”

“There’s some fine fur strutting around on that campus,” Rick grinned.

“Well, there’s only one there I care to look at,” he explained.

“Ah, say no more.” He leaned back in his chair. “Say, since you’re here, I have a favor to ask.”

“What?”

“I’m gonna run short in next week’s print, and I was looking at your journals. I’d like to take the first one and break it up into article-sized pieces and run it every week, kinda like a running story of sorts. I’ll pay you for it. That okay with you?”

“Fine with me,” he said. “Do you want me to do the editing?”

“Naw, I’ll have Barry do it,” he said. “But I’ll make sure you approve before it goes to press.”

“That’s fine, Rick. I work here now, I’ll do whatever I can for us to make money.”

He laughed. “That’s the spirit! Now go find a place to live, ya homeless bum!”

“Yes sir!” he said, snapping to attention and saluting Rick outrageously.

He spent most of the day going from apartment to apartment, and blackballing each one. Too small. Too run down. Too many whores strutting up and down the sidewalk outside. Roommates that were too obnoxious. Too far from campus. Too scary. He went through nearly his entire list for the day, when he came across Westwood Apartments, just off Guadalupe. It was only about six blocks from the campus, about nine blocks from the office, and it had assigned parking. He went in and talked to the manager, and to his delight, they had two apartments available, but both of them were two bedrooms. He was about to say his goodbyes, but the manager, a dusky chihuahua with big eyes named Lupe, stopped him. “Well, think about taking on a roomie, friend,” he coaxed. “You ain’t even gonna find a one bedroom for seven hundred twenty five anywhere this close to U.T., long as you don’t mind not having all the perks some other apartments offer, like broadband and gyms. We may not be cutting edge, but our units are clean, they’re big, we have parking, and you won’t find nothin’ broken in any apartment.”

“Well, I could use the other bedroom as an office,” he mused. “And seven twenty five is a bit steep for my salary, but I can manage it. And it is close to work.”

“You’re not a student?”

He shook his head. "I work at Lone Star magazine." He took out one of the business cards that Rick had printed for him and handed it to the chihuahua.

"Aw, really?" he asked, then he reached under his desk and pulled out a copy of the magazine. "I read it every week," he grinned. "Now, since you work for a magazine I like, friend, how say I knock it down to six fifty a month, long as you promise not to throw no wild parties or be one of those kinds of tenants? I'll put you in the unit across from the rental office, so any prospective tenants see a young professional living here, not a beer-guzzling jock. I'll save money in the long run just cause I don't have to repair nothin'."

"You got a deal," he said immediately.

An hour later, Kit had an apartment. A six month lease at six hundred fifty dollars a month, water included, but he had to pay the other utilities himself. Lupe let him use the office phone book to call to get the electric turned on in his name.

"What, no cable?"

"I don't really watch TV," he answered. "I might talk to them about a cable modem, though. I'll need internet access to do my work."

"They bundle cable TV in with the modem around here," Lupe told him. "You gonna call the phone company, or you use a cell?"

"I use a cell," he affirmed. "Why pay for a phone when I already have one?"

"That's the smart thing," Lupe grinned. "When you gonna move in?"

“Right now,” he answered immediately. “The furniture’s gonna take some time to filter in, but I’ll be honest. I just got this job, and I’m kinda living out of a hotel right now. I’ll sleep on the floor as long as it’s in my own place.”

“Been there done that, bud,” Lupe nodded sagely. “I got an extra bed in the show unit. It ain’t much, but it’s softer than the floor. I’ll let you borrow that til you get one of your own.”

“Hey, that’s nice of ya, Lupe. I really appreciate it.”

“Hey, no problem. I get the feeling you’ll be the kinda tenant we like around here. Quiet and not blowin’ crap up.”

Kit laughed. “I’ll do my best,” he grinned. “And I’ll make sure to try to work in how cool you are somewhere in the magazine,” he added.

Lupe laughed. “Hey, any publicity is good publicity. Let’s get it moved into your new place.”

And so, Kit was officially no longer homeless. 1642 Guadelupe Avenue, apartment 1-B, with nothing inside it but an old bed with a worn-out mattress with no sheets, blankets, or pillows. But it was his apartment. He wandered around the place, with its tired beige carpeting and vanilla walls, the venetian blinds on the windows, its fifteen year old appliances in the kitchen, but Lupe was right. The rooms were big, the place was spacious and clean, and his apartment was directly facing the office and show unit. No doubt Lupe was willing to give him a break on the rent to put a tenant he could trust in the unit facing the office, where potential renters could get a bad impression if a visible apartment was occupied by a party animal.

A trip to Wal-Mart fixed some glaring problems. He bought bedding, a pillow, a cheap nightstand table, and an alarm clock. He also bought some food to put in the fridge, cereal and milk, hamburger, tea in coffee maker bags, a coffee pot he could use to make either tea or coffee, and a gallon of spring water to drink. He even remembered the paper plates, bowls, and plastic silverware to hold him over until he could get real ones. He got home, put it all away, then set up the alarm clock, made the bed, and flopped down into it contentedly. He stared up at the ceiling for a long moment, then pulled out his phone to spread the good news.

The first call was to Rick. “Rick here,” he answered the direct line that bypassed the receptionist, the gay sheep named Marty.

“Rick, this is Kit. The house hunt’s over.”

“Great! What did you get?”

“An apartment on Guadelupe. Westwood.”

“Ah, they’re old, but hey, it’s what you wanted. Walking distance.”

“Hell yeah. I signed the lease and everything, so I’m golden, but we might have to sneak in a blurb about the apartments for the landlord. He gave me a break on the rent cause I work for the magazine, so we kinda owe him a little,” he chuckled. “I’ll bring your car back when I get started to work tomorrow.”

“Eh, keep it for a bit longer. You’re gonna need to move some stuff around for a few weeks. Get all that settled, then you can give the car back. But you will be at work tomorrow. Time to start earning that advance.”

“I’m looking forward to it, boss,” he said earnestly.

“Nine o’clock, but I’m in the office by eight every morning, so don’t feel bad if you show up early,” he chuckled.

“I’ll be there.”

“I got a workstation all ready for ya,” he declared. “And bring your laptop, so Mike can add it to the network.”

“Will do.”

“Now settle in, and I’ll see you tomorrow morning. Be good, son.”

“Thanks, boss. Night.”

“Later there.”

Kit hung up, then speed-dialed Vil. “Hello.”

“Sis, I got so much news for you,” he said immediately.

“Baby bro! Ooooh, I’m all aflutter. So, let’s start with the important part. JD?”

“She called me back!” he declared.

“I told you she would!”

“And she saw your picture in the newspaper and guessed at who I am,” he declared.

“Oh, she did? What happened?”

“Much to my surprise, she’s okay with it,” he told her, which made her audibly sigh in relief over the phone. “She told me that she’s not afraid of my family, even now that she knows just who they are. I swear, sis, what did I do to get a chance to go out with a femme like her? I guess God's starting to give me a break."

"It's about time he did," she said seriously. "So, have you gone out on a real date yet?"

"Not a date date, but we did go have pizza after she sat me down and told me that she knew."

"Did you kiss her?"

"Yeah. I think I lost track of a few hours afterward."

She laughed. "That's great, Kit, it really is. I'm very happy for you."

"And the other good news, sis, is I am now officially no longer homeless," he announced. "I am talking to you inside my very own apartment."

"That's wonderful!" she said brightly. "What's it like?"

"Not too bad. It's really old, but nothing's on fire, all the appliances work, and there's no holes in the floor."

She laughed. "Furnished?"

"I wish. The landlord's letting me borrow one of the beds out of the show unit til I get my own. He's a pretty nice guy. He even gave me a break on the rent cause I work at the magazine, and I won't be some insane party animal. He put me in the apartment right in front of the rental office, so I can make a good impression on the visitors."

She laughed. "Don't blow it, bro. A landlord scorned is almost as bad as a vixen scorned."

“I’m not about to. I start my first day of real work tomorrow. Rick, my boss, he even printed me some business cards.”

“Speaking of that, bro, I need your address and number for work, and for your new place,” she told him.

“Yeah, sure, hold on. I need the card and my lease. I haven’t memorized them yet.” He retrieved them. “You ready?”

“Go.”

He gave her the address and number of the office, then the address of his apartment. “I’m warning you right now, sis, no surprises. No packages, no nothing.”

“I wouldn’t do that.”

“Bull—“

“Kit! Watch your mouth!”

“You would so do it,” he teased.

“Alright, I would do it, but if it bothers you that much, I won’t.”

“I want to make it on my own, sis,” he told her. “I want to see if I can do the real life thing on my own as well as I made it doing the homeless drifter thing.”

“I can understand that, bro, I really can. Oh, speaking of money, did you sock it to your boss when you discussed your salary?”

He laughed. “I had a spreadsheet ready for him,” he said, which made her laugh delightedly.

“That’s my brother!” she told him. “How much?”

“Nineteen thousand a year.”

“That’s it?”

“For a researcher with no experience, that’s more than the average,” he said defensively. “And I wrangled some other perks out of him, like him letting me borrow one of his cars for a while.”

She giggled. “Good. You didn’t tell him your license expired last year, did you?”

“Of course not,” he said with a naughty chuckle. “Now that I have a place to live, I’ll go get a new license. One with my address on it,” he said with a dreamy kind of contentment.

“A great feeling, eh?”

“Ohhh, yeah,” he all but purred.

“Kit.”

“Yeah sis?”

“I want to come down and see you,” she announced. “And I want to meet her.”

“Uh, well, she already knows about you, so I guess that wouldn’t hurt,” he said. “But sis, if you come down here, they’re going to know. And they’ll find out about her.”

“It’s going to happen sooner or later, bro. Which would you prefer, now or later?”

“I’d prefer never,” he grunted.

“Don’t wish for what can never be, bro. Just trust me. I promised you I’d keep them off you, and I’ll do just what I promised. But I want to meet this female that has you so smitten she’s making a respectable fox out of you.”

He laughed helplessly. “By God, I guess she did at that.”

“So, I can come down?”

“I can’t really stop you if you did.”

“That’s right. I’m kinda tied up right now, so it won’t be until next month. Find a couple of days off and tell me, and I’ll work my schedule around it.”

“Alright. I guess that gives me a month to get Jessie ready for it.”

“Jessie?”

“She doesn’t really like me calling her JD unless I’m asking for her on the phone,” he chuckled.

“Do you have her number?”

“Yeah.”

“Give it to me.”

“What? Why?”

“Because I want it,” she stated. “If I ever have to find you and you’re not answering your phone, I’ll have it. And besides, you know I’ll just get my hands on it the other way if you don’t.”

He grunted. “Who’s saying you didn’t already?”

There was a long pause. “I refuse to answer that question, on account of the grounds that you’ll beat me up.”

“You did, didn’t you! You’re asking for it just to cover your ass!”

“Well, I did dig a little,” she admitted, a little ruefully.

“You’re terrible!”

“No, I’m a sister who wants her brother to be happy, even if I have to put a paw in myself,” she said simply. “I didn’t use it, little bro. And I wouldn’t have unless she didn’t call you back within five days. That way I could find her and lead you to her if she didn’t call you back.”

He wanted to be angry with her, but he knew her, and knew she was saying exactly what she meant. “You’re too damn nosy.”

“You bet your ass I am where you’re concerned,” she said without a hint of shame.

“Watch your language,” he teased.

She laughed. “So, I’m forgiven?”

“I guess so.”

“I’m afraid I’m about out of time, bro,” she sighed. “I got a ton of work here to go through. I’m really happy things are starting to work out for you. Really.”

“Thanks, Vil. You’re the reason I’m here. If not for you, I’d be getting on a bus tomorrow.”

“I’m just happy you’re happy, Kit. I’ll call you this weekend so we can work out when I come down.”

“Okay.”

“Be good, baby bro. I love you.”

“I love you too, sis. Bye.”

“Bye-bye.”

He closed the phone and dropped it on the bed beside him, then laid back and stared at the ceiling. Maybe things really were working out for him. He had a decent job now, his own apartment, and about a half a mile away, there was a gorgeous cream-colored cat with black ears and mittens that was thinking about him, who knew his secret, and was not afraid of his family.

God, he never knew life could be this good. And there was only the potential for it to get even better.

No matter how enthusiastic he was about his first day of real work, certain ugly realities managed to put a serious damper on his mood.

The first one was the bed. That bed and his back did not get along. He woke up feeling like a pretzel, and it took him almost a half hour to get to the point where he could move without wincing. Clearly, the first thing on the list of things to buy was a heating pad.

The second damper on his day was the fact that he had never considered the possibility that the bathtub wouldn't have a shower curtain. That made a shower out of the question, removing the possibility of aiming the shower head at his lower back and letting the heat work out the pain, and sitting in the tub wouldn't work as well.

So, being that he was out of options for a soothing way to ease the pain, he opted to stop at the Circle K near his apartment and buy a little single-dose pack of Advil. He downed it with a bottle of iced tea, and drove on to the office for his first day of work.

He arrived a bit after eight, wearing the only pair of jeans he had that didn't have a hole in them and a clean tee shirt, and found that the lights were on but only Rick was there. He stopped by Rick's office to announce himself, and Rick gave him the dime tour. The magazine's offices were split into a large central room with workstations around the walls, a large circular table with an inset LCD computer monitor for displaying the magazine layout, and two tiny offices on the far side from Rick's office in the hallway leading to the central room.

To Kit's surprise, one of those offices was his. It was a tiny cubicle-sized space surrounded by boxes and boxes of papers, articles, files, magazines, and books. There was a desk in there with a workstation on it, and a very old leather-bound chair, probably a holdover from the original tenants of the office. "A researcher needs a separate space for all the resource material, and a quiet place where he can dig without distractions," Rick explained. "Besides, until yesterday this was a storage room, so why not put you right in here with the stuff you might have to dig through?"

Kit chuckled. "True."

"The boxes do have a kind of order to them. You'll figure it out as you get the hang of it. You okay?"

Kit grunted, putting his paws on his sides. "The bed my landlord lent me is too soft."

"You have problems with your back?"

He nodded. "It's not really a surprise, if you think about it."

"Yeah, true. You gonna be okay?"

"I need to go buy a heating pad. That helps out quite a bit."

"Say no more. Go ahead and go get one. There's a Target about six blocks from here. Just turn left out of the parking lot, you'll see it on the right. You're just spinning your wheels til Mike gets here to set up your laptop anyway."

"Thanks boss, I appreciate it."

He returned with a heating pad, a new coffee mug, and an empty picture frame he fully intended to fill with pictures of Vil and Jessie. He set up his heating pad and sat down in the chair, testing it, when Rick opened the door in front of a dusky raccoon. "Kit, this is Mike Belcher," he said. "He's our resident tech-head, and he runs the website for the magazine. If you have any computer problems, he's the raccoon to see."

"Nice to meet you," he said, standing up and shaking Mike's paw.

"You too. Boss said you have a laptop for me to add to the network?"

"Yeah, hold on." He dug it out of his portfolio and put it on his desk.

"Wow, a Sabletech DV 900! You know your rigs!"

"No, I have a sister who knows people who know about computers," he chuckled ruefully. "She gave it to me for Christmas."

"Well, your sister made a good buy. A little expensive, but it's one serious piece of hardware."

"I'll tell her you said she made a good buy."

“A damn good buy,” he said, taking out a memo pad. “It’ll just take a second. This run on wireless G or N?”

“No idea.”

“I’ll look it up,” he chuckled. “Don’t know much about them, eh?”

“I know how to click on the pretty little pictures, but once you start throwing jargon at me, I’m lost.”

Mike laughed. “It’s not that hard. I’ll teach ya.”

“Sounds like a deal to me.”

Mike looked up some settings on his laptop and wrote them down on his memo pad. “Alright, it’ll be added in about ten minutes.”

“That’s quick.”

“When you know what you’re doing, it doesn’t take long,” he grinned, then he scurried out.

“Mike’s damn good,” Rick told him as Kit sat back down. “Here.”

Rick handed him a file folder. “Ooh, my first assignment?”

“Yep. I want everything you can get on the company and its board. And look up the history of the land in the file, too, so Barry has some good background to go on when he gets his interview.”

“You got it.” He turned and looked at his monitor, saw the icons for the programs he needed to research, as well as the web browser that would get him to rich data sources like the library and the courthouse. “Shivers,” he said with a chuckle. “My first real job since college.”

“Welcome to the real world, Kit,” Rick grinned. “Now prove I made a good decision when I hired you.”

“I’ll do my best.”

Mike was a chatty fellow, friendly and outgoing, which Kit rather liked. Mike’s primary job was maintaining their computer network and the website for the magazine, but he also dealt with the publishing programs, did some photo editing, and basically handled little things the office needed, since he was the fur that usually had the most free time on his paws.

Rick too he liked, because he was intelligent and kind, and had been very good to him. Rick was the main editor, working with his graphic artist Savid to lay out the magazine every week. It was Rick that decided what went into the magazine, and he also dealt with the outside, dealing with advertisers and such. Rick was a very, very busy dingo. It would almost be overwhelming with him deciding to print a weekly magazine, but the magazine only had about twenty pages on the average every week, and they usually had no trouble filling the pages with both content and advertising. That was because Lone Star had a good circulation in Austin, and was just starting to test the waters in College Station and San Antonio. Rick told him that they had enough work backlogged to fill three issues. When Kit called him on it about his journal, he just laughed and admitted that he fibbed a bit, and just thought that running the journal as a weekly feature would be a good draw.

He met Marty later that morning, and found the sheep to be flamboyantly gay, but also a pretty smart guy with a wicked sense of humor that Kit immediately liked. Not only did Marty work as the receptionist, but he also did a lot of the editorial work in conjunction with Rick, proving that Rick wasn't lying when he said that everyone in the office wore more than one hat. Marty's part of the magazine was the mailbag, printing reader letters, going through submissions and deciding which ones would be printed, then editing them a little if they needed to be cut down or had objectionable language that had to be removed.

Barry was one of the two journalists that worked on the magazine. He was a black bear, with an intimidating visage but a soft voice, who was sober, diligent, and from what Rick said, a damn fine reporter. Barry did the "real" news articles that went into the magazine, but also did some lifestyle articles dealing with college life. And now that Kit was there to help him research, he'd get even better. Barry had been doing almost all the research for the magazine, and Kit was there to take the load off of him and let him focus on reporting. Barry was the fur in the office he'd be working with the most.

Lilly was the only female working at the magazine. She was a graduate student in journalism, taking her master's classes at night, cutting her teeth in the industry at Lone Star. She was a red squirrel, with about fifty piercings in her ears and dressed goth, but with a good nose for a story and a finger on the pulse of college nightlife. She was the one that knew what was hot and what wasn't. Lilly handled the magazine articles that dealt with college culture and lifestyle, maintained The Scene section of the magazine that listed all the current hot spots, and she kept track of all the bands that came through town and listed where they were playing. Lilly was also the best photographer they had, and was the one that took most of the important pictures.

Savid was an Indian mongoose that was the assistant layout editor and head graphic artist. He had an atrocious accent, but he was a very good-natured fellow that had a stunning eye for what was artistic. He was the only artist Kit had ever seen that could draw a nearly perfect circle using a computer template board, free-handed.

Jeffrey was a white-furred mouse that was the junior graphic artist. Where Savid focused on designs and graphics, Jeffrey did most of the illustrations and other detailed work. Jeffrey was a talented artist, working mainly on paper and scanning in his work where Savid worked mainly with a template and graphics programs. Jeffrey also wasn't bad at photography, and Lilly was training him in the art so he could more or less take over that role...though Rick was considering hiring a dedicated photographer, much the same way he hired Kit to be a researcher.

Eight furs printing out a weekly magazine. The office was always busy, always a little hectic, it seemed, but the seven furs he was just getting to know all seemed to get along well with each other, and knew what they were doing.

Kit did his best. He finished his Aguavo Construction research job by lunch, of interest to Lone Star because they were going to build a new dorm in an annex just off the campus grounds. He laid down on Rick's desk a sheaf of information about the company, its board members, the land they were about to develop, the blueprints of the proposed building and its past history of the building that had stood on the lot before it was demolished, all neatly cross-indexed and with a table of contents. All it took was a phone book, a pleasant voice, a couple of hours of surfing the public records, and a masterful command of Microsoft Excel and Microsoft Word.

Rick opened it up and started leafing through it, and he just kept nodding. “Holy hairballs, Kit, this is damn nice work. And fast.”

“Well, everyone goes a million miles an hour around here, boss,” he chuckled. “I didn’t want to look like I was slacking.”

“Son, you’re gonna fit in here just fine,” he winked. “Lunch!” Rick screamed, startling Kit a little bit.

“Chinese!” Mike called.

“Fast food!” Lilly screamed in reply.

“Lunchbox!” Marty shouted with a funny lilt.

“Uh, what does that mean?” Kit asked.

“What they want for lunch, of course,” Rick grinned. “What are you up for?”

“Anything that doesn’t squeal when I stick a fork in it,” he said.

Rick chuckled. “You can either go out and get something, or call something in and have it delivered. If you do go out, it’s policy around here to see if someone wants something brought back, and bring it. Just pay for it and bring the receipt, they’ll pay you back. When you get back from lunch, I need some research done on a fraternity on campus that’s on probation.”

“You got it.”

“Rick, advertiser on line one,” Marty’s voice came in over an intercom on his phone.

“Dammit, work calls,” Rick growled, picking up the phone. “You going out for lunch?”

“I think so.”

“Pick something up for me. I don’t care what. I’m not picky when I’m hungry. Rick Sanders,” he said into the phone after pressing a button on its face.

He waved to Rick, then poked his head out into the main office. “I’m going out. Any orders?”

“Chinese!” Mike called. “Little Dragon on Congress, best takeout. Kung Pow chicken and two eggrolls, please.”

“I have to go out myself, so I’ll pick mine up,” Lilly told him.

“Okay. Jeffrey? Savid?”

“No thank you,” Savid said with his thick accent.

“I’ll go later, but thanks,” Jeffrey said with a wave of his paw. He and Savid were bent over looking at a monitor built into the main table, a page layout from the look of it. They went back to discussing something about it.

Kit decided chinese worked for him too, and picked up lunch. He ate in his office, paging through the file Rick had sent him about the fraternity on his desktop, his chopsticks blurring as he wolfed down beef pepper steak stuffed in the little square cardboard box. He worked through the material. The fraternity was on probation for a party where they allowed underage students to drink, and they got busted by an Campus Police undercover officer. He tossed his garbage, then started working through it to get the information Rick wanted about the members of the Rho Chi Epsilon fraternity. He started with the fraternity website, then called the national headquarters for the fraternity and fished for a list of members. After that, he dug up phone numbers for the parents of some of the members and called around. He didn't ask anything invasive or combative, simply explaining he was doing research on the fraternity that their sons belonged to, and he wanted some honest opinions from them about it.

He worked through the list of information Rick wanted, then cross-indexed it and dumped it into Excel so he could array it and set up a table of contents. Once it was all organized to his satisfaction, he exported it back to Word, then sent the file to Barry's computer. "Barry, that fraternity material's ready!" he shouted from his tiny closet. "I sent it to your desktop!"

"Thanks, dude!"

Rick pulled him out of his office after that and had him work with the others, basically just watching what they did. Rick put him with Mike first, who occupied the other tiny office that hosted five computers and a bunch of computer manuals. Kit sat down with him, and Mike showed him around the website, showed him the page he was building for Kit's bio for the magazine. "We won't come out and say you're a Vulpan Vulpan," he grinned. "Oh yeah, I need a pic of you for the page. He picked up a camera from his desk.

"Rick told you about that, eh?"

"Yeah, you'd think he'd have to, if you think about it," he nodded. "But that's okay, we're cool with it. You do good work for a disowned ex-rich kid," he grinned.

"Thanks."

"Let's take the pic in your office," he said. "Sitting at your desk."

"My office is a mess."

“Yeah, but your office is the office of a researcher. Researchers are supposed to be surrounded by books and junk like that.”

Kit laughed. “Point.”

Mike snapped a few pictures of him sitting at his desk, turned to look at the camera, then uploaded them into his computer. Kit watched as he threw the picture into Photoshop and cut it down, made a few tweaks to it to make it internet-friendly, then dropped it into the webpage. “There, just that easy,” he said with a nod. “Barry’s gonna write a bio summary about you that’ll go down here,” he added, pointing at the empty area to the left and below the picture.

“Cool. I’ve never seen a webpage being built before.”

“It’s not that hard. I’ll teach you. You seem to know your Microsoft Office. I think you’d do well playing with HTML.”

“The legacy of a mis-spent youth,” he grinned.

“I doubt that,” he chuckled.

He was put with Barry next. Barry showed him some of the reports he’d done, and walked him through the open projects he had going. “I’m done editing what we’re gonna put first in the new piece,” he said, bringing up a document. It was from his journals. “We’re gonna call it ‘through my eyes,’ and pick out some of the stories and things you wrote about in the journals. I think it’ll do well. You’re a pretty good writer.”

“Wow, thanks for the complement,” Kit said with a slightly goofy smile.

“Rick had me drum up a bio summary on you for the website. Read it over and tell me what you think,” he said, tabbing to a new window.

Barry had been kind to him. The bio made no mention of who he was. It simply said he was 22, a graduate of the University of Massachusetts, and he was from Boston. It said that he’d spent time after graduating from U-Mass traveling the country to experience what America had to offer before coming to Lone Star, which was his first real job after college. The bio listed him both as a researcher and a staff writer for the magazine.

“It’s really nice. Thanks for kinda not mentioning that.”

“They’d think we were lying if we did,” Barry grinned, showing off a mouth full of sharp carnivore teeth. Barry had had his teeth sharpened. It was a custom in some parts of the south and west for carnivore furs to sharpen some or all of their teeth, to look more like the carnivores they were. Kit himself didn’t do it, but like most foxes, he did have a pretty impressive set of canines. He could deliver a brutal bite if forced to defend himself to that degree. “I think it’s kinda cool that you managed to find your own place despite that. I think it was pretty rough going from being a trust fund rich kid to fending for yourself.”

“It wasn’t fun,” he nodded. “But I made it.”

“Someday I might have to do an interview about that with ya.”

“Well, maybe someday,” Kit hedged.

“Hey, no pressure. Whenever you feel like doing it.”

“Thanks.”

He was placed with Savid and Jeffrey after that. They showed him how they built the basic layout of the magazine in a computer program using the magazine's template style, which Rick would come out and check over and correct from time to time. Savid showed him his graphics he kept on his computer, and Jeffrey drew a quick sketch of Kit and showed it to him. "Wow, that's good for how fast you did it," Kit noted.

"Thanks," the mouse replied. "I do the editorial cartoons we put in the mailbag section, so I have lots of practice."

"Rick, he say you were from Boston," Savid said. "What it like there?"

"Cold in the winter," Kit chuckled. "With lots of trees and gentle rolling hills. The harbor is very pretty in the fall, when you look down from Breeder's Hill and see the riot of fall colors bending with the buildings, and then the blue sea stretching out like a blanket."

"It hot here, like India, but winters are cold."

"Cold cold, or cold for India cold?"

Savid laughed. "Cold to me cold."

"They're not that bad. It can drop below freezing from time to time, but we don't get snow or nothin'," Jeffrey added.

"Rick say you have rich parents before breaking from family to live by self. You travel to my country?"

"No, I never did get to India," he shook his head. "I did go to Hong Kong and Australia, though."

"Ah, I been to Hong Kong. Amazing city, yes?"

"Yes, it was awesome," Kit agreed.

He sat with Lilly after that, as she showed him The Scene page of the website. “Basicly what we put in the magazine gets thrown up here, too,” she explained. “This is the only page that Mike doesn’t handle himself. I’m still learning the advanced HTML stuff, so he helps me make it look just right, but I do all the content.”

“It looks nice.”

“Thanks. You like to club?”

“I like to go out sometimes, but I’m not a clubhopper,” he answered.

“Too bad. A handsome fox like you? You’d never go home alone, that’s for sure.”

He laughed. “If I did that, the cat I’m seeing might not be too happy.”

“Damn, the cute ones are always taken.”

“That’s because there’s more competition for us,” he grinned playfully.

“Least you’re not one of those ‘not outside my species’ types.”

“Hell no.”

“Good. My last boyfriend had purist folks, and they had a fit when he told them he was dating me. They rode him so hard, I broke up with him just to get them off his back. But we still see each other in secret,” she grinned.

The most intersting sit-in had to be with Marty. The sheep had pink streaks in his wool, and he painted his nails. Kit didn’t feel self-conscious sitting beside the gay sheep as he showed him his section of the magazine. “I go through the letters people send and decide which ones to print,” he said. “I’m a big believer in free speech and different views, obviously,” he said with a tilt to his voice that made Kit laugh, “so I like to put as many viewpoints as I can on the page. It’s a pretty cool gig. Rick hired me just to be the receptionist at first, but he gave me the mailbag and told me to run with it. He’s a great guy. Too bad he’s married,” he mused. “And not interested.”

“He’s got an interesting coloration. I’ve never seen that many colors all random like that on anything but a calico.”

“His mother’s a dingo and his father’s an African wild dog. Can you say clashing fur, honey?”

Kit laughed.

Marty snapped his fingers. “But it does look good on him,” he noted. “Just like that eye of yours looks good on you.”

Kit chuckled and unconsciously put his paw to the right side of his face. “People do love to stare at it.”

“I read that your whole family’s the same way.”

“Yeah. Everyone descended from my great-grandfather.”

“Must make for some killer family pictures.”

“It makes the family stand out,” he agreed.

“Mmm-mmm-mmm, I should look into a colored contact lens,” he noted. “I’d knock ‘em dead if I had a blue eye!”

“At least you could take out the lens when you don’t want to attract attention.”

“Oh, honey, since when does Marty Wexler not want to attract attention! Bring it, honey! I’m a drama queen!” He struck a Madonna-like pose, looking imperiously up at the ceiling, which made Kit nearly fall out of his chair laughing. “So, you coffee or tea?”

“Tea.”

“Chinese or italian?”

“Italian, naturally.”

“Treadmill or weights?”

“Treadmill.”

“Long walks on the beach, or snuggled up by a fire?”

“Hmm, I’d have to go for the fire.”

“Oh, baby! Too bad you’re not gay! We’d sync!”

Kit chuckled. He didn’t feel self-conscious at all. “Well, you are kinda cute, in a sheep sort of way. If I did swing that way, you’d get a second look.”

Marty laughed. “We could play the hunter and the hunted,” he grinned. “Oh Kit baby, come raid my chicken coop!”

Kit laughed.

“And I’m glad you’re not one of those gay-o-phobes,” Marty grinned. “Usually males start shying away when I say things like that.”

“Nah, it’s cool. I’m not interested and you know it, but that doesn’t mean I can’t take a joke.”

“Oh yeah, we’re gonna get along, honey, that we are,” Marty said with a nod.

He sat in with Rick after that. Rick talked with him about the magazine for a while, how it made money by relying heavily on advertising, since the magazine was distributed free on the campus and only cost a dollar on news stands out away from the campus and out of town. “Our main income is the advertising,” he said as he showed Kit the layout of a page from next week’s issue. “The sale price off campus basicly just covers the costs of shipping it out. We contract with a printer that’s only about a mile from here, and they ship the issues out where I pay to have them sent. They have a few other customers, but we’re their biggest, so they go a little further with us than they do with their other customers. If they lost our account, they’d probably go under.”

“What kind of fees do you charge?”

“Not that bad. But advertisers are willing to pay for space, because we have a good circulation. Sometimes I have more ads than I have space for them,” he chuckled, “but I won’t let the magazine get cluttered up with ads. If I did that, I’d lose readers cause they’d feel like they were reading a commercial. I try to keep the fees down so I don’t scare the advertisers off. It’s something of a juggling act sometimes, and some months the magazine barely breaks even. But hell, as long as it pays all our salaries, that’s what matters.”

“Amen,” Kit chuckled. “Do Savid and Jeffrey do ad work?”

He nodded. “Sometimes they design ads for some of our clients, Jeffrey mainly. Savid’s specialty is computer graphics and design, but Jeffrey’s much more of an artist than a designer. He’s talented.”

“I noticed. He whipped out a sketch of me in about five minutes.”

“I have him do editorial cartoons and other sketches,” he said. “I asked him if he thought he could do a three panel comic strip serial to run in the magazine. He can do it, but he’s not very good at writing it. Say, maybe you and him could get together and work something out. You’re a good writer, and he’s a good artist.”

“I wouldn’t know how to do something like that,” Kit laughed.

“So? It’s not like you’d lose anything if it bombs.”

“Well, if you want us to try, boss, we’ll try.”

There was a knock at the door. Kit and Rick looked up, and Kit’s heart lurched a little. It was Jessie! She was wearing a U.T. tee shirt, Longhorn Orange, with University of Texas emblazoned across it in white letters, and a pair of jeans with a wide belt hitched over one hip. “Hi,” she said with a smile. “I hope you don’t mind.”

“Of course not!” he said happily. “Rick, this is Jessie Williams. We’re going out. Jessie, this is Rick Sanders, my boss.”

“It’s nice to meet you. Sorry to drop in like this,” she said shyly. “But Kit told me where he works, and I wanted to see his office. Is that okay?”

“That’s just fine, my dear,” Rick said easily. “Come in, come in!” She stepped in, and he shook her hand fondly. “My, you’re very beautiful, my dear. Kit can certainly pick a femme.”

She looked away with a shy smile, her cheek fur ruffling.

“Show her your office, Kit,” Rick urged. “We’ll pick this up after you’re done.”

He gave Rick a grateful smile. “It’s not much, Jessie,” he chuckled. “Here, it’s just across the hall.”

“Leave the door open!” Rick called as he led her out. “I’ll have no shenanigans going on in the office!”

Jessie’s entire face poofed out, and she put her paws to her cheeks. “He didn’t!”

“Be glad it wasn’t Marty. It would have been worse,” Kit laughed.

“You bet it woulda been, honey!” Marty called from the reception desk.

“Well, here it is,” he said, showing her into the tiny room. “Sorry that I can’t offer to have you sit down, but I’m not sure if there’s even another chair under all this mess,” he said ruefully.

She giggled. “That’s alright. How is your first day?”

“Pretty cool,” he said as he sat down at the desk. “I’ve already got some work done, and I’m learning my way around the office and learning how they put the magazine together. I’ve never done work like this before, but at least the researching part isn’t that bad.”

“How do you do that?”

“The internet and a phone book,” he answered. “Rick or Barry or Lilly asks me to dig up information on a person or a place or a thing, and I go find it and arrange it so it’s easy for them to read and they can find the facts quickly. It’s just like writing a paper in school, really. But instead of spending all my time in the library, I spend my time looking things up online or making phone calls.”

“And he’s good at it!” Barry called from the main room.

Kit chuckled. “Thin walls and an open door. And no doubt they’re all in there being quiet so they can eavesdrop on us.”

“Busted!” Lilly said melodramatically.

Jenny giggled. “Well, I’m sorry I barged in on you,” she apologized. “I should have waited until you were off, but I didn’t know when that was.”

“Five or so,” he told her. “Maybe later if I’m working on something.”

“Well,” she said, sitting on a box near the door, then squeaking in surprise and jumping up when it shifted under her. “Want to go get something to eat after you’re off work?”

He scratched his muzzle. “It might not be a good time, Jessie,” he said, with obvious disappointment. “I just got an apartment yesterday, and it’s totally empty. I have to go get some stuff for it after work.”

“You did? That’s wonderful!” she exclaimed. “What’s it like?”

“It’s a bit old, but it’s actually kinda roomy,” he said. “The landlord me cut a deal on the rent because I’m not a typical college party animal. Right now, it’s totally empty. If not for my landlord’s kindness, I woulda slept on the floor last night. Though I might do that tonight,” he grunted, putting a paw on his back. “The bed he lent me is too soft. I woke up this morning bowed over like an old geezer.”

“Your back, huh?”

He nodded.

“Well, I can go with you,” she offered. “Males sometimes forget some of the little things you need to make a home.”

“Well, that would be nice. Not much of a date, though,” he smiled.

“Who says we need to go out on a date to have fun together?” she challenged. “Spending time with you is spending time with you, Kit, whether we’re watching a movie or shopping for dishwasher detergent.”

“Point,” he chuckled.

“You said you don’t have anything at all in the apartment?”

He shook his head. “Just a bed, a nightstand, and an alarm clock.”

“Does it have a dishwasher?”

“Yeah. I assume it works.”

“Okay. Does it have a shower curtain?”

He laughed. “Nope. And boy did that surprise me when I went to take a shower this morning.”

“Okay. I’ll go sit down and make up a list of things you’ll need, and we’ll go get it after you’re off.”

“Thanks, Jess, really.”

“Jess?” she asked.

“Sorry.”

“No, no, you can call me Jess,” she said with a smile. “It’s just nobody ever has before. I kinda like it.” She went to the door. “Mister Sanders? Is there somewhere I can sit down?”

“Certainly, my dear, and please, call me Rick. Go pick a chair in the main office. We have a nice big table right in the middle you can use. And don't mind the staff. If they start bugging you, just smack 'em."

"Hey!" Lilly called. "No fair, boss! How can we scope her out if we can't bug her?"

Jessie laughed, her cheek fur ruffling slightly when she looked back to him. "I'll be waiting."

Kit leaned back in his chair, feeling very...content. Jessie was a wonderful femme, caring and thoughtful. Rick beckoned him for his own office—they could see each other from their offices when sitting at their desks—and he went back to his boss' office.

"She's beautiful, son," he said quietly. "And she's very charming. Don't blow it."

"Believe me, I'll do my best not to," he answered vehemently. "You can say that me being here is because of her. I was about to move on when I met her. And, well, here I am."

"Well, if you work out, I'll have to thank her."

"My sis said she's making a respectable fox out of me," he laughed ruefully.

"Nothing wrong with that, Kit," he chuckled. "Now, let me show you our master template. It's the basic layout the entire magazine follows."

In the main office, Jessie had a glowing smile.

So, she was making a respectable fox out of him, was she? Well. She guessed she'd have to make sure he stayed respectable.

“Jessie! Jessie!”

She looked up, then blinked as the red squirrel female with a zillion earrings in her ears snapped a picture of her. “Nice,” she beamed, looking at the image captured in the tiny screen on the back of her digital camera. “Kit has an empty picture frame in his office. I’m gonna give him something to put in it.”

She smiled shyly. “He does, does he?”

“You bet. Mind if I give him your pic?”

“I’d like that, thank you.”

Shopping with Jessie was fun.

She was very thorough. She had a long list of things he’d need for his apartment, from obvious things like a shower curtain and soap and toilet paper, to little things he never considered, like cleaning supplies, a flashlight, a laundry basket, a vacuum cleaner, and a pair of scissors.

“Scissors?” he asked curiously, looking at the list.

“There’s nothing worse than not being able to find something you should have,” she said simply. “The first time you need those scissors, you’re gonna thank me.”

“Can’t argue with that,” he nodded.

They prioritized the list based on his money and his needs. Between the advance Rick gave him and the money he had saved up, he had about six hundred fifty dollars available to spend after paying his rent and deposit for the apartment and the electric company, and holding back the money he needed to live on until his first paycheck. The first thing he needed was a new bed, and for that, they went to Value City Furniture. Kit tested out several beds, which Jessie fretted over the cost. Some of them were more than he had!

“This is a necessary expense, Jess,” he told her seriously as he tested a queen-size. “Because of my back. If I don’t get a bed my back can handle, I’ll wake up every morning feeling like I was tied in a knot.”

“Well, yeah, I guess so,” she acceded. “I didn’t realize they were so expensive.”

“Yeah.”

What he eventually settled on was a queen size mattress and box springs that ran him nearly three hundred dollars. Instead of a proper bedframe, he instead bought bedrails. The furniture store promised to deliver it to him tomorrow afternoon, which he wasn’t too happy about, but that was the best they could do. “I guess I can live with one more night in the other bed,” he grunted. “At least I already have a heating pad, and I’ll be able to take a hot shower in the morning.”

After that, they hit Wal-Mart. Instead of buying sundries, instead, Jessie pushed him straight to the male’s wear department. “You can’t wear the same jeans every day,” she challenged. “You need more clothes!”

“Heh, I need clothes because almost everything I own that I could wear to work is dirty. It’ll be expensive to wash clothes that often if I don’t expand my wardrobe. My apartment has hookups for them, but they also have a coin-op laundry room for the efficiencies I can use until I get my own.”

“Well, I can take your things to my house and wash them for you so it doesn’t cost you so much, until you can get a washer and dryer.”

“Jessie, you don’t have to do that for me.”

“I don’t have to, but I want to,” she told him firmly. “Now let’s pick out something nice for you.”

After he had three more pairs of jeans and a pack of tee shirts, they tackled the list. They filled a buggy with all manner of things he needed, the top item on the list being a cheap microwave oven. After that important item was secured, they started down the list, from towels to a TV tray and folding chair so he could use his laptop, all the little things one might find in a junk drawer, to clothes hangers for his closet. Kit used a piece of paper to keep careful track of the total cost of everything in the basket so he didn’t go over budget, and it was almost like they were a married couple. He got to see what she liked and didn’t like as they roamed the aisles, and he found that he liked her taste. She was elegant, yet understood the need for thrift and picked a happy medium between taste and price.

When he got within fifty dollars of the cap, he reined it in. “Alright, we’re close to the edge here, Jess,” he called. They both leaned against the handle of the cart, looking at the list, noting all the items crossed off of it. He could smell her fur, that lovely scented soap she used, and it was hard to concentrate on what they were doing.

“Well, it’s not even half of it,” she complained. “That bed really hurt.”

“Yeah, but the bed mattered more than the rest of the list,” he grunted, scratching his cheek. “Or I’d be showing up at work every morning very grumpy.”

She giggled. “Well, it’s a start, anyway. Do you cook?”

“I can cook for myself, that’s about it,” he answered.

“Have you bought any food for the house yet?”

“A little.”

“A little isn’t going to cut it, mister,” she told him with a slight smile.
“What is it, cereal and beer?”

He laughed. “Cereal, yes. Beer, no. I don’t like beer. I drink wine. I bought cereal and some hamburger, mainly.”

“Did you get bread? Or eggs? Did you get some of those disposable salt and pepper shakers to hold you over? Did you buy cooking oil?”

“Uh, no.”

“Males,” she sighed. “Come on, let’s go get you stocked with the necessities,” she announced, pushing the cart forward.

“I’ve been scolded,” he remarked with a rueful chuckle, then he followed behind that gorgeous long-haired tail of hers. “At least I remembered the coffee pot!” he called.

“But you didn’t buy a frying pan!” she challenged, pointing at the cheap frying pan that was in the basket. “How were you going to cook that hamburger you bought, Kit?” she asked, looking back at him.

He laughed. “Point.”

Using what little money he had left, she outfitted him with the bare necessities he’d need to hold him over until he got paid. She picked out basic staples, bread, cheese, lunch meat, cooking oil, and some little cups of yogurt which he rather favored. She told him what he needed, and he picked the brands he preferred.

When he announced they were at the red line for his finances, they stepped back and regarded the shopping cart, which was absolutely full, and rather heavy. She put a finger to her muzzle and regarded it, then brushed her hair back away from her blue eyes. “It doesn’t look like three hundred dollars, does it?” she remarked.

“I’m gonna be eating out of a brown bag until I get paid,” he chuckled.

“Well, at least now you have what you need to do that,” she said, giving him an amused sideways glance.

“Thanks to you, Jess. You were a lifesaver.”

“I’m glad I could help.”

The cheetah that checked them out was a little intimidated by the cart they pushed up in front of his counter, but he tackled the order with no complaint. Kit watched the prices go by, checking them against his figures, making sure he didn’t forget anything and would go over budget. After nearly ten minutes of checking out items, the total came up to $297.38, which was only two cents off what he estimated, because of rounding the sales tax.

“Wow, you were almost dead on,” she noted, looking over his shoulder at the notebook.

“Well, anyone in my family is good with numbers,” he said modestly as he dug up the cash to pay the cheetah.

“You two must be setting up a new home,” the cheetah noted as he took the money.

“Well, I’m helping him settle into a new apartment,” Jessie answered with a demure smile. “Males don’t know how to shop.”

Kit laughed. “I’m glad she came along to hold my paw,” he admitted to the cheetah. “I woulda never thought of half of this stuff until I needed it.”

“Told you,” she grinned.

“You did at that,” he agreed with a chuckle.

The one thing they didn’t consider was bulk. Rick’s second car was a Chevy Cavalier, and it only had so much cargo space. Kit and Jessie had to do a little stuffing to get it all into the car, because of the microwave oven and folding chair taking up so much of the trunk and the garbage can dominating the back seat. In the end, Jessie had to share the footspace of the front seat with the groceries, and had the bag holding the clothes he’d bought in her lap.

He stopped to think a minute. Shopping with her was...wonderful. It was such a mundane thing, and they didn’t do much but talk about what they were buying, comparing it, but it was an interesting window into how her mind worked, and he’d had a great time. It just felt, natural, palling around with her as she made fun of his sense of style, and he complained about how expensive some of the things she was putting in the basket were. It wasn’t a date, hell, they hadn’t really gone on a real date yet, but in some ways, it was even better than a date. He couldn’t see who she really was, what kind of female she was, sitting in a movie theater. Going shopping with her had been much more educational.

“What is it, Kit?” she asked, adjusting the bag in her lap as she looked at him.

“Nothing. I had a wonderful time, Jessie. That was almost better than a date.”

She laughed. “Well, I had fun too,” she told him, reaching over and putting a paw on his shoulder. “But I hope our dates aren’t quite that expensive, or you might have to ask your sister for a loan just to go out with me.”

He laughed richly. “Knowing my sis, she’d foot the bill herself,” he chuckled as he started the car. “Vil likes to try to mother me, Jess. She keeps trying to send me things and send me money between attempts to make me come home, but I won’t let her.”

“Why not? She’s only doing it because she loves you.”

“Yeah, but it’s also risky for her to do it,” he said. “If my family wanted to get anal about it, they could try to claim that she was violating the terms of my bastard father’s will. There’s a clause in the will that states that any member of the family that’s caught helping me forfeits everything they got from him.”

“Wow,” she breathed, putting a paw to her mouth.

“Yeah. They can’t touch the company, though, because she was given the shares that gives her control while he was still alive. And she does have some money that has nothing to do with the family fortune. But she does have a lot of money from the inheritance, and her house, and lots of other things. They all came from the will. If she got dis-inherited, she wouldn’t be homeless and broke, but it would cause a serious disruption in her life, and I won't allow it. I love my sister, Jess, and I won't let her end up with her life turned on its ear because she's been helping me. I'm a grown fox, I can make it on my own. I appreciate her concern for me, I really do, but I have to look out for her as much as she's looked out for me."

"That's very noble of you, Kit."

"Nobility has nothing to do with it," he chuckled. "All I care about is that Vil doesn't ruin her life because of me. So I have to watch out for her."

"Well, I think it's sweet."

"She wants to meet you, you know," he told her.

"I'd like to meet her too."

"That's good, because she wants to come down and see me next month."

"Really?"

"Yeah. She's not sure what days yet. She'll call me back this weekend and set it up."

"That's fine with me, Kit. I'd love to meet her."

"Oh, and I should warn you. She has your telephone number."

"That's okay. I don't mind," she assured him.

They talked about little things as he drove them back towards campus, but she looked around as he turned onto the street on which her sorority house was located. "Where are you going?"

"I'm taking you back to your house."

“Oh, no,” she challenged. “I’m not making you carry all this around yourself! Besides, I want to see your apartment.”

He chuckled. “Alright, but I’ll say now that I warned you.”

It wasn’t far to his apartment, barely more than a mile. He pulled into his space, and motioned. “Well, here we are,” he said. “Home sweet home, or something like that.”

“Okay, you go unlock the door and I’ll get started.”

They took turns ferrying bag after bag into the apartment, storing it up against the walls of the bare domicile for the moment. Jessie carried the trash can he’d bought as he carried in the microwave, then she wiped her brow and looked at the roomy living room. “It’s pretty big.”

“Yeah, it’s a two-bedroom. It’s old. I guess they built this place back when space mattered.”

“How much?”

“I got a deal on the rent. Six hundred fifty a month, as long as I behave. As you saw, we’re right in front of the rental office. The manager, Lupe, he said as long as I don’t throw wild parties or blow things up, we have a deal.”

She laughed. “I guess I can see his side of it because of all the U.T. students,” she agreed. “Well, let’s get this mess organized.”

She didn’t have to help him, but she did. She put the groceries away while he put up the shower curtain. She set up the TV tray and little lawn chair in the corner of the empty living room while he put away the towels in the linen closet and put the fur soap and shampoo in the shower, then set a roll of toilet paper on the spindle by the commode. She seeded a junk drawer in the kitchen with the little odds and ends while he put hangers up in his closet and took the tags off his new clothes. He heard the radio he bought come on in the kitchen, as she tuned it to the local pop station, but he let her go on about it as he unpacked the new sheets for the bed they'd deliver tomorrow and put them in the linen closet. He put the light bulbs she had him buy on the shelf above the sheets, then went back into the living room to start working on the cleaning supplies. He heard a sizzling from the kitchen, and smelled hamburger. He peeked in and saw her standing in front of the electric stove, singing along with the radio as she tended two hamburgers that had just started to brown in the new pan.

“Jessie, you don't have to do that!” he protested.

She looked over at him and smiled. “I'm hungry, you haven't eaten, and I don't know if you know how to cook,” she said with a smile.

“Uh, you know, there's only one chair, and I don't have a table.”

She laughed. “We can stand and use the counter,” she winked. “Can you make us some tea?”

“Of course.” He busied himself with setting up his coffee maker to brew a pot of tea, and she pulled the ice trays out of the freezer and filled them with water, her tail ghosting over him and she went around him to put them back. It felt really strange being in the kitchen with her, just making dinner, but hell, this was ten times better than anything else he could have imagined. It just felt right to him to be around her, when it was just the two of them, when he was just being himself, and she was just being herself, and he loved it.

She finished frying the hamburgers, and put them on pieces of bread laid out on styrofoam plates. “Ketchup?”

“Please,” he answered as he poured to plastic cups full of hot tea, and she dug the brand new bottle of ketchup out of a bag and squeezed tight little circles of ketchup onto both burgers.

There was a knock at the door, which surprised him a little bit. He went over and opened it, and found Lupe at the doorway. “Hey, I was just checking to see if you needed anything,” he said. “I saw you take all that stuff in, and figured by now you’d know if you forgot somethin’.”

Kit laughed. “No, I don’t think so. But thanks a lot, Lupe, I appreciate the concern.”

“Hey, no prob,” he said, putting his paws in his pockets. “Is the cute kitty-cat gonna be rooming with you?”

Kit’s fur ruffled a little. “Uh, no, she’s just helping me settle in,” he answered.

Lupe grinned. “Ah, I got it. I’ll leave ya to it, then,” he said, then turned and walked back to his own apartment, which was beside the office.

“Who was that?” Jessie asked as he came back to the kitchen.

“My landlord, just seeing if we needed anything,” he said.

“That was nice of him,” she said, handing him a styrofoam plate.

“Yeah, he’s a pretty good guy,” he nodded. “Well, my first real meal in my own place,” he said, looking around.

“A little threadbare,” she laughed.

“But with wonderful company,” he said honestly, looking into her eyes.

Her cheeks ruffled slightly, and she smiled at him. “To independence,” she said, holding her hamburger out like a glass of wine.

He laughed and bumped his own burger against hers. “To independence,” he agreed, and they both took a big bite out of their burgers.

It was nearly nine when he took her home. They’d enjoyed a plain meal of hamburgers and yogurt cups, with hot tea to wash it down. Then she actually did the dishes for him, washing the pan and spatula she dirtied making dinner while he set up the trash can and threw away their plates. Then, they just roamed the apartment and talked for nearly an hour, about what kind of furniture he wanted, how much it would cost, how he could use the second bedroom as an office for when he brought work home from the magazine, and then she went on a thirty minute tear about the windows, talking about curtains. But, then she realized it was late, and she had homework to do, so he offered to take her home.

All in all, it was a wonderful evening.

He pulled up outside of her sorority house in his boss’ car. She unbuckled her seat belt, then looked over at him. “I had a great time, Kit,” she told him with a bright, sincere smile. “It was really nice to just hang around with you.”

“You were a lifesaver, Jess,” he told her. “Thanks for all the help.”

“Hey, I can’t let my guy run around looking for a pair of scissors when he needs them,” she grinned playfully, then she leaned over and kissed him.

He literally hummed in his throat as he kissed her, feeling his tail shiver, then she broke her kiss and leaned back with shimmering eyes. “Bring your dirty clothes to work with you tomorrow, and I’ll pick them up after school and take them home to wash them for you, okay?”

“You don’t have to do that.”

“No, but I want to,” she said, putting her paw on his shoulder and neck. “I’ll see you tomorrow, Kit,” she said. She leaned over and kissed him on the cheek, then she opened the door and climbed out. He handed her her backpack, and she lingered her paw over his as she took it from her.

“Have a good night, Jess. And thanks again.”

“Any time. Drive safe now. Remember, this isn’t your car,” she said with a playful wink.

He watched her walk up to her sorority house, a large affair with columns in the front that supported a balcony, upon which he saw Sandy and a collie standing at the rail, looking down. God, she was so beautiful. The door opened before she reached it, and the skunk he’d seen before and a rabbit pulled her inside excitedly.

“Hey Kit!” Sandy shouted from the balcony.

He leaned down so he could see her through the open passenger window. “Hey, Sandy!” he shouted in reply.

“So how did it go?”

“We had a good time!” he shouted in reply.

“What did you two do?”

“We went shopping!” he called, which made her laugh. “I’ll talk to ya later, okay? I gotta get home!”

“Sure, see ya later!”

He put the car in gear and pulled away. Yes, he’d had a great time. A fantastic time. A wonderful time. And tomorrow, he’d see her again.

He already couldn’t wait.

Chapter 4

“You went to Wal-Mart? What the hell kind of date is that?” the other Jessie protested, then she laughed.

“It wasn’t a date date,” Jessie remarked as she put her backpack on her shoulder. She’d been ambushed in the living room, where Jessie, Charlotte, and a gray vixen named Sherry were watching TV when he dropped her off. Sam and Lisa had opened the door for her. “Kit just got an apartment, and he didn’t have anything at all. It was totally empty. So I helped him buy what he needed for it.” She laughed. “That poor male, he had no idea what he needed. He’d bought food to cook, but didn’t buy any pans to cook it in!”

Sherry and the other Jessie laughed, but Charlotte looked over at her with a curious look on her face. “So, he got an apartment, eh? I hope he had a bed,” she said with a sultry look.

“Not one he was going to keep,” she said primly, ignoring that bit of lewd innuendo. “The one his landlord lent him was hurting his back, so he bought a new one.”

“Did you sit on it? You know, try it out?” she asked.

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled slightly. “I did no such thing!”

“You shoulda,” she winked. “Getting you laid before you graduate is the driving goal of this entire sorority.”

Jessie's face frizzed out as the other females laughed. "We thought we had you taken care of with Burke, but he turned out to be a first class bastard. We're sorry about that," the other Jessie apologized.

"Well, it worked out. If it wasn't for him, Sandy and Sam would have never taken me to that movie, and we wouldn't have met Kit in that café."

"Well, he was good for something at least," Lisa grinned.

"Well, details, girl!" Sam pressed. "What did you do? What did you talk about?"

"Details have to wait," she told them. "I haven't done any of my homework yet!"

"Oh, no!" they all said. Sam and Lisa grabbed her by the paws and dragged her into the living room, then pushed her down on the couch between Sherry and Charlotte. They forced her to go over the whole day, from going to Kit's work to their shopping venture into Wal-Mart to going to his apartment. They kept grilling her over everything he did, most everything he said, and musing over it. They all knew who he was, that he was the disowned son of a rich family, and they kept harping on how he didn't seem like a rich person, that he seemed like a normal guy. More and more femmes came down as they were talking, until nearly the entire sorority was packed into the living room, some twelve females.

"And he never tried anything forward once?" Sandy demanded.

"No, he was the soul of courtesy," Jessie answered.

"Someone needs to smack some hormones into that male," she said, which caused some giggling. "I've never met a male that didn't at least try after the third date. I hope he's not a eunuch or something."

“He doesn’t kiss like a eunuch,” Jessie challenged. “He just knows I’m shy, so he’s being considerate. Ever since we went ice skating and he kissed me, he’s been going very slow. He told me then that he was letting me be the one to take the steps. I think he’s still doing it.”

“Hon, you may be shy, but you’re not timid,” the other Jessie noted with a grin. “I think it’s about time you started inviting him to take a couple of those steps.”

“Well, I’ve been thinking about it,” she said, her cheeks ruffling a little. “He is handsome.”

“God is he!” Sandy said with a lustful sigh. “I even love that half-missing ear, it makes him look like a rogue!”

“So, JD, are you gonna make that invitation?” Sam said with an uncharacteristic grin. Sam wasn’t the type to be too much into gossip.

“Well,” she hedged, her cheeks ruffling, which made them all laugh.

“The house virgin thinking about a male. It’s about time!” Denise, a fellow cat, called raucously. “Finally, the mission will be accomplished!”

“I wouldn’t mind at all,” Jessie admitted with a demure glance down. “But since our first date, and now that I know who he is, I want to be careful. He’s had a very bad time of it, and I, I don’t want to blow it, you know? Something tells me I have to be careful with him. He’s still terrified of his family, and I’m afraid if I push him too fast, too hard, his fear of his family is going to drive him away. He’s not going anywhere. He has a job now, and an apartment. He likes me, he likes to be with me, and that gives me time to work him out of his fear. I’m thinking about it. God, am I thinking about it, I can't lie. But I have to make sure he's ready, or it could ruin everything."

"I've never met a male that wasn't ready," Sandy said with a dirty grin.

"His body might be ready, but his mind might not be," Jessie said immediately. "I don't want to lose him, Sandy. If that means I have to go slow and be careful, then that's exactly what I'm going to do. I've gone twenty-one years without having sex. I can wait a couple more months."

"And it'll make bagging him that much sweeter," Sherry giggled.

"Well, it sounds like you've thought about this," Sam noted.

"I've seriously thought about this," Jessie nodded. "Kit is very special, but he's also very delicate. If I don't handle this the right way, I'm going to ruin it, and what's worse, it's going to make it that much harder for him if he ever tries again. If I hurt him too much, he may never try another relationship with a female again. He'll just use his fear of his family to push females away."

"I never thought of that," Charlotte said soberly, and several females nodded.

"I guess those psychology classes actually aren't a waste of time," Lisa said with a rueful chuckle.

"So, if you think I'm not moving fast enough, or I don't want to—you know, you're wrong," she stated, feeling her cheek fur itch a little. "I'm going to reel my catch in slowly, because he's very special and needs special attention."

“Well, we’re here if you need help,” Sandy grinned. “It’s still the greatest and most sacred mission of this sorority to get you laid.”

“You femmes,” Jessie said, her face frizzing.

That bed was going to kill him, but then again, it had had its last chance.

Kit woke up at 6:00am, unable to sleep any longer, and staggered out of the borrowed bed with his back screaming in protest. He went straight for the shower, now that he could take one, to let the hot water massage his back and soothe out the pain. Fifteen minutes under steaming hot water began to untie the knots in the muscles of his lower back, and he sighed in contented relief when he felt the pain drain away.

God, Jessie had been a gift. Thanks to her, he actually had a towel to dry off with, food to eat for breakfast, a place to sit down to eat it, a radio to listen to—at least after he changed it to a classical music station—and lunch to take to work.

He finished drying off and put on his new clothes, then remembered to pack the dirty clothes in the basket and take it out to the car. Then, with almost sadistic glee, he stripped the bed, took it down, and stacked the mattresses and rails by the wall to make room for the bed he was getting today. Then he locked up and went to work.

The second day was just as hectic as the first, but he found that he actually enjoyed it. They would bring him things, and he’d track down the details. He also got his first lesson in using Photoshop, and he got to see the team interact. They were like a bunch of teenagers, laughing, playing, joking with each other, but it was clear that they had fun working for Rick. Rick too wasn't above joking himself, old in body but young at heart, and Kit felt very at home among them. They worked hard and did good work, but they also remembered that they were all friends in addition to being co-workers.

At the end of the day, after five, he attended his first staff meeting. This was the issue-ending meeting, as Rick went over the issue that would be printed on Friday, which had been finalized a while, and asked for any last-minute input. Kit saw with some surprise that they'd put his picture on the article they were running that was taken out of his journals, and Rick announced that Through My Eyes was going to be a weekly back-page article.

He was even more surprised when Savid turned it to the second page, where all the credits were listed, and Kit's name was added...and there was a small box article beside it, with the headline Lone Star Welcomes Kit Vulpan To the Team. The picture of him in his office was under the title, with a short paragraph under it:

Lone Star is growing! We welcome Kit Vulpan to the crew!

A graduate of the University of Massachusetts, Kit has joined the team as the lead researcher and a staff writer. He'll be penning a new series of articles for us, and making sure we keep our facts straight!

Be nice to him, Austin! He may be a Yankee, but he's a great fur!

“I’ll need a new picture to replace our group shot,” Mike said. The group shot was on page two of every issue, over the listed credits, a picture of the crew sitting around the big table. Then he grinned. “I think she can take it for us.”

They all looked to the hallway. Jessie was standing there, her backpack over her shoulder, a little embarrassed. “I’m sorry,” she apologized. “Mister Marty wasn’t at the front desk, I thought Kit was just working late.”

“Oh, honey, don’t call me Mister!” Marty said morosely. “If anything, call me Miss Marty!”

Jessie giggled.

“No problem, my dear,” Rick smiled. “Since you’re here, mind taking a picture for us?”

“I can do that,” she nodded. Lilly got a camera and showed her how it worked, and she backed up to the hallway. “Alright, gather in everyone!” she called.

Lilly draped herself into Kit’s lap and threw her arms out, grinning at the camera. Everyone gathered in around them, making funny gestures or pointing to each other. Kit grabbed Lilly’s bushy tail and reached over and stuck it under Savid’s chin just as the flash went off. Savid sneezed, and Mike collapsed in helpless laughter.

“That was great!” Barry laughed. “Tell me you got a good picture!”

“I think so,” Jessie said, advancing into the office. Mike looked at the image on the screen, then grinned broadly.

“Fantastic! This is our new group shot, no doubt!” He uploaded it to the network, then replaced the old group shot with the new one, and everyone laughed when they saw it. Savid had a surprised look on his face in the picture, but he just laughed when he saw how silly he looked.

“It is good! It shows how much fun we have making the magazine!”

“Alright, folks, it looks like it’s a wrap,” Rick said. “Any objections?”

There was silence.

“Alright, it’s off to the printer. Kit, for us, Friday is a late day. I don’t expect you to be in until one, and we tend to work until about eight or nine, but if you want to come in earlier, you’re welcome to.”

“He always says that,” Barry grinned at him.

“So, that’s it, people. Good work.”

Kit got up and came over to Jessie. Rick went around them, then stopped and turned around.

“You know, if you want to hang around here, you’re welcome to, Jessie,” Rick told her with a smile as Kit came over to her. “We’re not stuffy or picky, and you wouldn’t be the first girlfriend to come hang out with us.”

“Or boyfriend!” Marty called.

Rick chuckled. “So for the record, you never have to knock around here. You’re always welcome in the office.”

“Thank you, Rick, that’s kind of you.”

“Hey, you’re a very attractive young cat, and at least you don’t have fifty earrings in your ears like Lilly,” he winked.

“Watch it, you old dingo!” Lilly called with a grin.

Kit was blinded by a camera flash. Lilly had the camera in her paws, taking pictures of the three of them. Jessie leaned over and kissed Kit on the cheek, and Lilly caught it on her camera. She looked at the picture on the screen, and laughed. “Oh, that’s a good one!”

“Let us see!” Marty called. They gathered around her, and Kit saw him smiling, Rick smiling, and Jessie kissing him on the cheek with one foot raised behind her, her eyes closed but her expression mischievous.

“That’s a keeper!” Mike announced. “Website fodder!” He snatched the camera from Lilly and rushed for his office.

“Checks are on my desk, people,” Rick called. “Good work, you earned it!”

“Next week will be better!” everyone shouted in unison, which startled Kit and Jessie, and that made them all laugh.

“They’re a pretty funny group,” Jessie noted as she waited in his office as he packed his portfolio.

“I feel at home here, even after only two days,” he told her honestly. “They’re all great. I feel blessed that Rick gave me this job. Do you want to go out tonight? You know, we haven’t had a real date yet.”

She giggled. “No, I’m afraid I can’t tonight. I have a test tomorrow in English Lit. You’ve been killing my grades, Kit, I have to study!”

He chuckled. “Don’t blame me for that,” he said with a wink.

“It is your fault,” she accused, crossing her arms beneath her breasts and giving him a cool, yet amused, look.

“Careful there, hon, or he might prove you right,” Rick said as he came up to the door. “You’ve got a check on my desk, Kit.”

“I’ve only been here two days!”

“You’re on salary, silly fox,” he said. “You get the same pay every week, even if you did only work for two days. Besides, I get the feeling that you might need the money.”

“Well, I can’t deny that,” he admitted.

“I think you’re gonna work out here, Kit. The crew really likes you, and you’re a damn good worker.”

“Thanks, Rick. I really like it here. This place is awesome.”

“Have you opened a bank account yet?”

He shook his head. “I was going to go get a Texas license tomorrow, so I can just swing by a bank and open an account when that’s done.”

“Sounds like you have a plan. How goes the apartment?”

“Well, I’m set on the niceties, and I should have a bed being delivered in, oh, about half an hour,” he noted. “The rest of it’ll fall into place. The bed’s the important part.”

“Good for your back?”

He nodded.

“I know that feeling,” he chuckled. “But mine’s from age, not an accident.”

“You don’t look that old, Rick,” Jessie protested.

“I’m forty-three, my dear,” he grinned.

“No way!”

“I know, I aged well,” he chuckled. “I’m heading out, so you need to clear outta here, Kit. Unless you want to be locked in. My wife takes a dark opinion of it when I’m late getting home on Thursdays.”

“I’m getting ready to go right now.”

“Don’t forget your check.”

“I won’t.”

Kit retrieved his check and he and Jessie were herded out of the office by Mike and Barry. “So, you wanna go grab a drink with us, Kit?” Barry asked. “We always go down to The Pit on paydays. It’s a local bar.”

“I’ll have to pass,” he answered. “I have to get home, they’re delivering my new bed.”

“Ah, well, maybe later.”

“See you tomorrow then, Kit. Have a good one!”

“You too,” he said as they pushed past him and started down the stairs.

“Did you bring your laundry, Kit?” she asked.

“Yah, but I’ll tell you again, Jess, you don’t have to.”

“Hey, I’m helping you out. Besides, if I have your clothes, you have to come see me,” she winked.

He laughed. "I'd do that without holding my clothes hostage. May I drive you home?"

"Sure."

He drove her back to her house, and got out with her. The laundry basket was in the trunk, and he opened it up.

"This is it?" she asked.

"You said my work clothes," he said in confusion.

"I said dirty clothes," she responded. "You have to have more than this!"

"Well, yeah, but I don't want you turning into my maid, Jessie. It's just not proper."

She laughed. "Kit, stop being silly! Let's go back to your place and pick up your laundry."

"Well, alright, but I'll have to find some way to pay you back for your help."

"Well, do you have Sunday off?"

"Yeah, Sunday and Monday."

"Then let's go out on Sunday. A real date. Dinner and a movie."

"It's a deal," he said with a nod. "But dinner and a movie is just too cut and dry."

"What did you have in mind?"

"Dinner and something better than a movie," he answered.

“What?”

“Well, you’ll find out on Sunday, won’t you?” he said with a mysterious smile.

“Ohhh, okay, if you wanna play it that way. I’ll just wait and see what you have in mind,” she said with a beautiful smile.

He drove them back to his apartment, and she followed him in. “We have got to get rid of this ‘no furniture’ echo,” she said with a look around.

“Eh, I’ll get there eventually. I have the clothes piled up in my room. We only bought one laundry basket, I had nowhere to put them,” he chuckled.

She came in and stood beside him. “That’s it?”

“That’s it. I don’t have many clothes, Jess. That’s all the dirty clothes I have. It’s just about all the clothes I have,” he chuckled ruefully.

She sighed, then she laughed. “Well, I guess you’ll fix that eventually too.”

There was a knock at the front door. “Go ahead, I’ll gather it up,” she told him.

He answered the door and found himself staring at a huge panda, almost a head taller than him, stood in the doorway, taking it up. A thin meerkat was at a large truck in the parking lot, opening the rear door. They had blue coverall uniforms with Value City embroidered on them. “Kit Vulpan?” the panda asked.

“Yeah, you have my bed?”

“A-yup. We’ll bring it in for ya.”

Kit stood aside as they brought in the mattresses, then the panda removed the plastic as the meerkat brought in the rails. Then they very quickly put the rails together and stacked the mattresses. Kit returned to the living room with them and took the clipboard that the meerkat handed him. “Sign right here,” the meerkat said in a Texas drawl.

“Looks like you might be a repeat customer,” the panda noted, looking around.

“Probably,” Kit chuckled. “As you can see, I’m just getting settled in.” He finished signing and handed it back. “It won’t be quick, that’s for sure,” he grinned. “It’s gonna be a ‘what can I get with this paycheck’ kinda deal.”

“Well, you won’t beat our prices, so come on back. We’ll get you all decked out.”

They left, and he saw Lupe coming out of the office across the way. “Lupe, I’m done with the bed!” he shouted to the next building. “Wanna come get it?”

“Tomorrow’s fine!” he called back.

He went back in, and wandered back to the bedroom. He stopped in the doorway and leaned against it, crossing his arms and kicking one foot up onto his toes behind him as he watched Jessie. She’d put all the clothes in the basket, but now she was sitting on the edge of the bed, both paws down beside her, bouncing on it just slightly as she looked down and behind herself, away from him. She ran one paw along the bed, tracing her padded fingers along the new material, then she looked to him. Her cheeks ruffled a little, and she gave him a shy smile.

He didn't say anything. He'd only known her a few days, but in that very short time she'd seemed to have shed much of her shyness around him. But that, that was a shy smile. Was she thinking dirty about him?

God, he hoped so. He'd been thinking that way about her since the first time he saw her, but was always very careful never to let stray thoughts like that taint things when she was with him. He saved those kinds of thoughts for when he was alone, because she was shy, and he didn't want to scare her off. After that disaster of kissing her on their very first pseudo-date, he didn't want to give her any reason at all to feel uncomfortable with him.

"I take it it meets your expectations?" he asked with a teasing smile.

"Well, I'm not sleeping on it. I was curious how firm it was, because of your back."

"Firm, but not like a board," he answered. "You ready to go?"

"Sure."

He took her back to her house, and got out of the car and went to the trunk. "What are you doing?" she asked.

"I'm going to take this in," he replied. "I'm sure your friends are all kinds of curious about me. May as well run that gauntlet now, rather than make you have to run it by yourself."

She laughed. "Oh, they are at that. They're like a bunch of nosy sisters."

"How did you end up in a sorority?"

"Well, my mom was in this one," she said as he picked up the basket, and she closed the trunk. "I didn't really want to join a sorority, but I really didn't like my roommate in my freshman year, so I worked up the courage and pledged. They all like to make fun of me because I'm shy and I come from a really traditional family, but that's okay," she giggled. "When they need help with their homework, or when they want something they don't make in a microwave, they always run to me or Sam." She led him up the sidewalk. "Sam's the skunk you saw that first day. She's in pre-med. She's really smart. Was valedictorian and everything."

"Do you like it?"

"I do now," she nodded as they reached the door. "The others are all nice femmes, and we get along really well. Last chance to run away," she winked. "If you go in there, they may not let you out. Oh, and they know about you," she warned. "So don't be surprised if they ask about it."

"That's good to know," he said with a nod. "Alright, lead me into hell, Charon."

She laughed and opened the door.

It wasn't as bad as Jessie let on. He wasn't allowed past the living room—house rules—and not all of the sorority members were home. Jessie took the basket from him while Sandy and a gray cat converged on him from the couch. "Kit!" Sandy called. "You're bringing laundry?"

"I kinda don't have anywhere to do it right now," he said ruefully. "Jessie agreed to help me out. She's great."

"You know, you owe her if she's gonna do your laundry," Sandy teased, poking him in the shoulder.

"I know. I really have to make it up to her," he agreed.

“Kit, this is Danielle. Dan, this is Kit.”

“Hi,” she said. He shook her paw cordially. “JD’s gone on and on about you.”

“Well, I hope she left out all the bad parts,” he grinned.

“Are you kidding? The bad parts are the good parts!” Sandy protested. “So, how’s the magazine?”

“I love it there,” he said honestly. “The people are great, and the work is fun and challenging. If you want, come down to the office and look around after classes,” he offered. “See how a magazine is put together.”

“Cool, I might do that!” Sandy nodded vigorously.

“Just don’t all come at once. Rick said he doesn’t mind when people come to the office, but I think three or four pretty young femmes might cause too many distractions.”

“That’s what’s fun to do,” Sandy grinned.

“And you have to behave. I’ve only been there a few days. If you come in there and turn the place upside-down, I might get fired.”

“Now it’s no fun at all,” she said with a toss of her hair.

Jessie returned. He stepped up and took the empty laundry basket she offered him, which had a spare laundry bag in it. “Listen, Jess, I really appreciate this,” he said sincerely. “You’ve only known me a few days, and you’re doing my laundry. That’s kinda...weird.”

She laughed. “I don’t mind at all, Kit,” she told him with an honest smile. “You’re in something of a weird position here. And if I can help you get on your feet by doing laundry, and it doesn't cost me anything when I can just throw your laundry in with mine, well, why shouldn't I?"

"And we get to check out what kind of underwear you wear!" Sandy added.

Kit reached behind himself and raised up his shirt, then pulled the waist of his jeans down a little to reveal a waistband of his briefs. "Looks like Fruit of the Loom to me," he noted, which made Sandy laugh.

Jessie, however, wasn't laughing. She looked behind him, then gasped and put her hands on the tail of his shirt and pulled it up a little more, exposing his lower back. It was crisscrossed with white streaks of fur. They were scars.

"Oh, those are from the surgeries," he explained as Jessie, Sandy, and Danielle looked at his back. "They operated on me three times. First time they put in steel rods, the second time they added some screws, then the third one they took the rods out." He put his paw on his lower back, in the center of those stripes of white fur. "This is the exact height of the hood of a Ford Aerostar," he remarked, flattening his paw and chopping his thumb and finger against his back lightly. "Or so they always told me in the hospital," he chuckled, gently pulling his shirt down. "I actually don't remember anything from that entire day. The docs said that was normal. In my memory, I went to bed the night before, and next thing I know, I wake up two weeks later in the hospital, in a full body cast."

"Ouch," Danielle said compassionately, her expression riveted. "Well, I'm glad you're better, Kit."

"Thanks. The happiest day of my life was the day I got out of that cast, and I could go to the bathroom by myself. Even after months of it, I never got used to having a nurse, help,” he added.

“I can imagine. It wouldn’t be easy doing something like that with an audience,” Sandy reasoned.

“You have no idea,” he noted fervently. “Well, I hate to say it, but I’m gonna get going. I don’t want Jess complaining that I’m wrecking your grades too,” he winked.

“I can wreck my grades all by myself,” Danielle laughed.

“Remember, Sunday,” Kit told her. “Dress casual.”

“I’ll call you and tell you when you can come get your clothes,” she promised. “Can you tell me exactly when you’re picking me up?”

“I’ll have to see what time it is,” he grinned. “I’ll let you know by tomorrow.”

“Okay. Have a good night, Kit.” She reached over and put her paw on his shoulder, then kissed him. It was little more than a quick peck, but on the lips nonetheless, which put a little shiver in his tail. “Talk to you tomorrow.”

“I’ll be waiting. Bye you two. And thanks for letting me get out of the house unscathed. Jess made it sound like I’d be tied up and interrogated,” he grinned.

“Oh, that’s coming,” Sandy teased. “There’s just not enough of us here to hold you down.”

Kit laughed. “Then I’ll run away now,” he said, then he literally ran to the door, which made all three femmes laugh.

Friday was busy, because it was the first day of the new cycle, and it was like starting over. Though Rick and Savid already had this week's issue planned out, there was a lot of work to do to put it all together, and Friday was a huge day for Lilly, because it was the start of the weekend and Lilly was the one that kept up on the current hotspots and trends in U.T. student society. Lilly spent Fridays out of the office, roaming the campus during the day, and hitting the clubs at night to review bands and keep track of the "in" things.

Kit could knock out any reasearch they threw at him relatively quickly, so he spent a lot of time working with everyone else, doing anything he could both to learn the tricks of the magazine trade, and to make sure Rick felt he didn't make a mistake when he hired someone like him. He and Jeffrey talked about trying to make up a comic strip to run in the magazine, debating if it should be comedy or melo-comedy-drama, stand-alones or serialized with an ongoing plot. Jeffrey sketched out a few ideas for characters for the strip, and they worked out something of an idea that they'd pitch to Rick after Jeffrey whipped up a few episodes of it.

And he got to see the magazine in printed form. Rick brought him a copy around four, while he and Jeffrey were talking things over, and Kit paged through it. It looked just as it did in the editor program, but it did feel kinda nice to actually hold onto it, to be able to read it without having to click on a mouse. He had to laugh when he saw the group picture, and Jeffrey turned to the page holding his first journal story, showing a huge closeup of his face, only his eyes, right beside the title of the article, Through My Eyes. Beneath the title was his name, and a boxed caption explaining the article to the reader.

"Oh, that's downplaying it right there," Kit said with a rueful chuckle.

“Hey, it’s your most striking feature,” Jeffrey laughed.

“I kinda thought this was,” he said, pointing at his half-missing ear.

“Hell no, your eyes just reach out and grab someone,” Jeffrey countered.

Kit read the caption under the title:

Kit Vulpan spent six months traveling from New England to Austin after graduating from college, working his way across America. These articles are excerpts from the journals he kept of his experience. The furs in these articles are real, though the stories they tell may not be. This is America, seen through his eyes.

“Not bad,” Kit noted. “At least Barry picked a good piece to introduce with. If he went with one of the sob stories, it might turn readers off.”

“Yeah,” Jeffrey agreed. “Was that guy really like that?”

Kit nodded. “Sure was. He sat at that stool every night. It took me almost a week to get him to where he’d talk to me, then he told me that story. Trying to butter up the waiter, I guess,” he chuckled.

“Musta been cool to do it.”

“It had its moments. But I’m glad I’m here. For more than one reason.”

Jeffrey laughed. “She’s gorgeous. You’re a damn lucky fox.”

“Amen. Now I just have to not blow it.”

“What, she’s emo?”

“No, she’s just a little shy,” he explained. “And I really screwed up on our first date. So I’m kinda walking on eggshells around her. She was very gracious and gave me another chance, and I don’t want another strike. I think after the next strike and I’m out.”

“She didn’t seem shy to me. She even kissed you for that picture.”

“I know. That surprised me a little. But if you want to see if she’s shy, try talking to her. She’ll blush at the drop of a hat.”

Jeffrey laughed. “I think demure is a better term,” he grinned.

“I just call her perfect,” Kit said honestly.

“Then don’t blow it,” he teased.

“I’d better not anytime soon. She has almost all my clothes,” he chuckled.

“She’s washing them?”

“Just this once,” he affirmed. “I don’t have a washer and dryer yet.”

“Be careful, you may get everything back pink.”

“Only if I make her mad,” he laughed.

About five, Jessie called on his cell phone. “Kit, your clothes are done,” she told him. “You can come pick them up after work.”

“Jess, thank you. Really. You didn’t have to do this for me. It was very kind of you.”

“Well, I expect to be wowed on Sunday,” she giggled.

“I’m buying the tickets right now,” he told her...and he was. He was on the website, reserving tickets for them to an outdoor Austin Philharmonic Orchestra performance in a place called McKenzie Park, which was on the south bank of the river that ran through the city. “I’ll be picking you up around two, Jess. We’ll go eat dinner first, then go. I suggest that you do not wear a skirt. Actually, jeans or shorts would work best.”

“What kind of date is this?” she asked, her voice both a little concerned and amused.

“The best kind,” he told her. “Just trust me.”

“I trust you,” she assured him. “When will you get off work?”

“Around eight,” he answered. “Me, Jeffrey, and Savid are the only ones in the office right now. Everyone else is out working.”

“Oh, looking for stories and such?”

“Yeah. Lilly and Barry are working on stories. Marty and Mike are helping them, and Rick’s over at an advertiser talking to them. I get my turn outside tomorrow.”

“What are you going to do?”

“I’m being sent down to the campus to gather some information from students face to face,” he answered. “Sometimes research takes more than a phone and a computer.”

“Hey Kit,” Rick’s voice called. He turned and saw him in the doorway of his tiny office.

“Rick needs me, I gotta go. See you soon.”

“Okay. See you soon. Bye-bye.”

“Bye hon,” he said, then he closed the phone. “Yah boss?”

“I remember you saying you play the guitar, and my wife dug this out of the attic,” he said, showing him a dusty guitar case. “It belonged to my son, one of a long line of interests that died as soon as he realized he’d have to work at it. If it still works, it’s all yours.”

“Wow, thanks, boss,” Kit said in appreciation. “I haven’t played in a couple of months, since my guitar got smashed at the bus station in Mobile.” He put the case in his lap and opened it, and found an old acoustic guitar inside. He took it out and put the case on the floor, then pulled it up and tested it. It was out of tune, but that wasn’t a problem. He tuned it up with practiced ease, then played a series of chords to test the tuning.

“I thought you said you were still learning!” Rick laughed.

“Well, I am,” he said modestly. “What I just did is easy.” He began to play a tune, then began to sing the lyrics almost immediately.

Would you know my name,

If I saw you in heaven.

Would it be the same,

If I saw you in heaven.

I must be strong, and carry on,

‘Cause I know I don’t belong here in heaven.

“Woah,” Rick breathed.

“What?”

“Damn, son, you said you liked to sing, but I didn’t know you could sing,” he said seriously. “What song was that?”

“It’s called Tears in Heaven,” he replied. “It’s one of my favorite songs, and one of the few I can play all the way through on a guitar, even though I’m just playing basic chords, not the real guitar melody that goes with it,” he added, then closed his eyes and picked it back up, unable to just stop without finishing the song.

Would you hold my hand,

If I saw you in heaven?

Would you help me stand,

If I saw you in heaven?

I’ll find my way, through night and day.

Cause I know, I just can’t stay here in heaven.

Time can bring you down, time can bend your knees.

Time can break your heart, have you beggin' please.

Beggin' please.

Beyond the door, there's peace I'm sure.

And I know, there'll be no more, tears in heaven.

Would you know my name,

If I saw you in heaven.

Would it be the same,

If I saw you in heaven.

I must be strong, and carry on,

'Cause I know I don't belong here in heaven.

He finished, and opened his eyes. He saw Rick, Savid, and Jeffrey all standing in the doorway, amazed looks on their faces. "What?" he asked.

"Well, I know who we're taking to the Pit for open mic night contests," Jeffrey said, then he laughed.

"You sing very beautiful," Savid told him.

“Thank you,” he said modestly, putting the guitar in his lap. “Just another legacy of my youth,” he said. “I really liked music, but my bastard father refused to let me enjoy it. It was all business with him. He had no soul for art, no ear for music, and considered it a complete waste of time. To him, there was only money.” He strummed the guitar absently. “I was starting to learn to play a guitar. Clancy smuggled one into the house for me,” he remembered, his eyes distant. “My father found it, and he broke it right in front of me. Then he told me that a Vulpan didn’t waste time on such ridiculous nonsense.”

“That’s raw,” Jeffrey noted.

“That, was my father. May he rot in hell,” Kit said with utter conviction. “After I was disowned, I was too busy trying to survive to learn how to play,” he told them. “But once I got into U-Mass, after the accident and I washed out of ROTC, I bought a new guitar and took lessons from a music major friend of mine. I used to be a lot better, but I got rusty. I need to practice more.”

“Well, you should have time,” Rick told him. “Just not around here,” he added with a grin. “I’m not running a karaoke bar here.”

“Of course not,” he laughed, putting the guitar away in its case, then propping it up against some boxes next to his chair.

“If you never got to do music, where did you learn to sing?” Jeffrey asked.

“Well, singing is something you can always practice, unless you’re gagged,” he chuckled.

“True enough.”

Kit swung by the sorority house after work, and found it almost deserted. Almost all the femmes were out, with only Sam and Jessie inside. He brought his laundry basket, and Jessie went to go get the laundry while he sat on the couch and waited. Sam was sitting in a recliner across from him, a biology book spawled in her lap, but she closed it when he sat down. “So.”

“So?” he asked curiously.

“Where are you going on Sunday?”

Kit gave her a grin. “What, do you tap the phones?”

“JD is something of the house’s little sister,” Sam said seriously. “We all watch out for her, and that means we drag these things out of her, because she’s shy, and maybe a little naïve. How someone as pretty as she is got to college like that is beyond me. Fanatical parents, I guess,” she mused. “You can expect anything you tell her that’s not personal to be common knowledge in this house.”

Kit laughed. “She warned me that I’d face the third degree, but I didn’t expect you to grill her too.”

“She’s the kind of femme we rarely let out of the house by herself,” Sam told him. “Not because she’s not an adult, but because she’s a total sweetheart and we love being around her. Everyone in this house loves her. So, if you hurt her, you’ll have a whole mess of angry sorority sisters breathing down your neck.”

“Understood,” he said immediately and honestly. “Believe me, that’s the last thing I’d ever do. I already screwed up with her once. I won’t do it again.”

“And how did you screw it up?”

“When I kissed her. That was way out of line. I’m just glad she gave me another chance.”

Sam gave him a slight smile. “That wasn’t as much a mistake as you think it was,” she told him. “She thought it was a good kiss.” She opened the book again. “And you’d better think of kissing her again, very soon, or she’ll think you’re not as interested in her as she is in you.”

“I’m looking forward to it, but I’m not going to rush it,” he said calmly. “Jess isn’t the kind of girl you let slip through your fingers. I’m willing to take things at her pace. She’s worth waiting for.”

“I’m glad you understand that.”

“Jess said you’re studying pre-med.”

“I want to be a doctor,” she affirmed.

“What year are you in?”

“I’m a junior. Me and JD pledged together.”

“Nice. How long have you known her?”

“Since pledging. We’re roommates.”

He glanced towards the stairs, looking for Jessie, then leaned forward. “Are her parents as bad as she said?”

Sam chuckled. “Yes, mainly her mother. JD calls her Momzilla. Her mother calls here at least three times a week to check on her. If she’s not here at night, her mother pitches a fit over the phone. And she’s relentless.

She knows that JD's seeing you, and had a complete meltdown last night over the phone since JD hasn't been here the last two times she called."

"Because of me?"

"Because you're male period. Her mother thinks she shouldn't so much as kiss a male unless it's at the end of a marriage ceremony."

"Well, how is she supposed to find someone like that?"

"Her mother doesn't think that way. JD is the oldest child in her family, but she's the first one to leave home. Both of her daughters are out of high school now, and both left home. JD is here, her sister is going to Ohio State. So her mother is having some separation issues with letting her children go. She said that since her sister left home, her mother's been off the deep end. The funny thing is, she isn't half as nuts about her brother Ben. She's only crazy over protecting her daughters."

"Her brother can't get pregnant," Kit noted.

"Yeah, I'm thinking along the same lines. Her mother is ultra-traditional. Marriage before sex, behaving like a lady, yadda yadda yadda. She's a relic of a forgotten time, if you ask me. She should have been raising her children in the fifties, not the new millennium."

"Stop bad-mouthing my mother, Sam," Jessie said as she came down the stairs, carrying a full laundry basket. "I know I complain about her a lot, but she does mean well."

"And this defense will cease the instant she calls," Sam noted calmly, which made Kit chuckle. He stood up and took the basket from her, then put it on the couch.

“Listen, Jess, let me thank you again. It was very good of you to help me out. I really owe you one.”

“Well, I think there’s something you can do to repay me,” she said, tilting her cheek up towards him and tapping it.

He laughed. He leaned down and gave her a very loud kiss, which made Sam giggle.

“I’d better get a better kiss than that on Sunday,” she told him with a teasing, but inviting smile.

“Sam, I might need to practice, so I can live up her expectations. You available?”

Sam’s book fell out of her lap as she erupted into laughter. Kit grinned at Jessie, but got a face full of couch pillow for his trouble when she whacked him. That nearly made Sam fall out of her chair.

“I wash your clothes for you, and you try to get a date with my roomie? Out, you ingrate!” Jessie said, pointing at the door, but she couldn’t suppress a grin.

“I’ll pick you up at two,” he said with a playful smile.

“I’ll be waiting,” she promised as he picked up the basket. She stepped up and gave him a real kiss, a light, inviting kiss on the lips, then she stepped away with a little smile on her face.

Sam gave him a knowing look as she went back up the stairs, and he couldn’t help but watch that gorgeous cat with that amazing long-haired tail swaying back and forth behind her, almost hypnotized. Sam cleared her throat, and he realized he was staring. He blinked, then pulled the basket up to his hip. “Uh, thanks for the chat, Sam. It was fun.”

“I’ll see you later,” she said with a nod, picking up her book. He let himself out, and Sam found her page, took a sip of her soda, and chuckled to herself.

“Oh yeah. She’s got him hooked, alright. Now just comes the reeling in.”

The last thing he expected to find on his desk on Saturday morning was a note, and a key.

Kit:

I don’t work on Saturdays. This is your key to the office. The code for the alarm is on the post-it on your monitor. If you’re the last out, don’t forget to set the alarm before you lock up.

Your assignment is on my desk. When you’re done, you’re done, go home.

Rick.

Well, he guessed it was a show of trust that Rick would give him a key to the office before he’d even been there a week, and give him an assignment without any kind of supervision at all.

He wouldn’t allow that trust to be misplaced.

Rick wasn't the only one that had Saturdays off. Jeffrey, Marty, Savid, and Mike were all off on Saturday. The only ones that worked were the writers, it seemed...but, they had Monday off where the others had to work. At least Rick made sure everyone had two days off...that was nice of him, given they had such a small staff, and producing a magazine was a tough business.

His assignment actually took most of the day. He researched available Saturday facilities on campus, both for school and for student recreation, using a press pass secured for him by Rick for the research. He studied the facilities, both the quality and variety, and interviewed students using them to gauge their satisfaction. Since he didn't know much about the campus, it actually gave him quite a tour of the campus, and he got to meet quite a few of the students. A couple of them recognized him from the magazine. One of them even startled him with a question. "Dude, who was that gorgeous cat that was kissing you?" the lemur asked.

"Huh?"

"On your mag's website, he said. "There's a pic of a kickass cat hottie giving you a kiss. Who is she?"

"That's my girlfriend," he said with a laugh.

"Damn," the lemur muttered. "You lucky bastard."

Girlfriend. He'd said it impulsively to defend his turf, but after sitting down and thinking about it, he realized that was exactly how he wanted to think about her. She was beautiful, she was smart, she was kind, she was gentle, she was funny, she was...she was amazing.

She was what he'd been looking for all his life, and his family be damned.

It was at that moment. For the first time, probably ever, the spectre of his family began to fade. He was already overcoming that fear, wanting to go out with Jessie, be with her, but the fear had still been there, just suppressed. But for the first time, for the first time ever, he wasn't afraid.

He wasn't afraid.

He couldn't be afraid. If he was afraid, he would lose her. If he was afraid, he'd drive her away when she was finally ready to take the next step, and he wasn't prepared to meet her there. If he was afraid, the best thing that ever happened in his life would slip through his fingers, and he would spend the rest of his life in bitter regret over losing his chance at happiness.

He'd been such a coward. It wasn't courage that got him through life after he was disowned, it was his sister's kindness. It wasn't courage that got him through college, it was his sister's help. It wasn't courage that got him through nearly six months in a hospital bed, it was tons of painkillers. It wasn't courage that got him through six months of living as a drifter, it had been fear. Fear of settling down where they could find him, fear of getting too attached to people because of his family, fear, fear, fear.

If he wanted her, he had to have the guts to tell his family to go to hell, and mean it. Not just mouth it in bitter anger over how they had hurt him. Not just scream it as a front for blaming them for what happened to him. Not growl it in his throat when he found something good, something special, but something of which they'd disapprove. He had to mean it.

He had to mean it.

He stood up. “The Vulpan family can go to hell,” he declared with utter sincerity, meaning it. “Well, except for Vil,” he added with a sardonic chuckle.

He walked away from that spot.

And he felt like a new fox. He felt like a new life was waiting for him just over the horizon.

A new life. He had a job now, and a home. He had new friends, and he had a female who seemed interested in him, and a female he’d walk through fire for if she asked it of him. He didn’t need to hang off the end of his sister’s string anymore. She didn’t need to mother him anymore. She would be his dear sister, his good friend, and his only family, but he didn’t need her protection anymore. He could stand on his own feet. He could be his own fox, and make a new life for himself without needing her help.

And the rest of his family could go to hell.

If anything, Vil was usually punctual. She said she’d call him that weekend, and it was almost dead middle of the weekend when she kept that promise. His phone rang when he returned to the office, and transcribed his notes from his reasearch he’d been writing in his laptop to his desktop.

“Hello,” he hummed absently as he started transferring files.

“Hey, baby bro,” Vil answered. “How you doing?”

“I’m doing great,” he told her. “I’m getting settled in here at work. I’m about to leave now.”

“You don’t have weekends off?”

“Sunday and Monday,” he answered.

“Ah, I see. Well, doesn’t change what I have to tell you,” she chuckled. “I’ll be down next weekend. I’ll be arriving on the third and be leaving on the sixth.”

“Labor Day weekend?” he asked as he called up the calendar on his laptop and switched it to September.

“Yeah. I was aiming at three days with you, but I’ll take two and two evenings.”

“Well, one evening. I work evenings on Friday. It’s a very busy time for us.”

“What do you do on a Friday night for work?”

“Vil, this is a magazine aimed at college kids,” he reminded her. “Friday’s a big day for students, so that’s when we do a lot of our work. Lilly, one of the reporters, is usually out almost all night gathering info for her pieces.”

“Ah, true,” Vil mused. “Well, I can just wait for you, I suppose.”

“I’ll give you what time I can, sis, I’d love to see you again. But I just got this job, and I can’t blow it. So you’re gonna take a back seat.”

“I’m not used to being out of the spotlight,” she teased.

“Well, welcome to the real world,” he told her in a tone that made her laugh.

“So, how’s it going with Jessie?”

“We have our first real date tomorrow,” he answered, saving his work and then closing his laptop.

“That’s nice, but it doesn’t answer the question.”

“It seems to be going fine,” he answered. “I’m not rushing it, sis. When she’s ready, we’ll take the next step.”

“And what step is that?”

“Whatever she wants,” he answered immediately.

“Where are you going on your date?”

“Orchestra,” he answered. “Austin Philharmonic’s performing Beethoven.”

She laughed. “I should have known,” she teased. “It’s not the Boston Pops. You’ll have to tell me if they’re any good down there in Texas.”

“Here’s hoping.”

“Here’s hoping she likes classical, or it’s going to be a bad date for her,” Vil laughed.

“Well, there’s always opera, I suppose. Femmes are supposed to like the opera.”

“Kit, she’s a normal girl. She’d probably be more interested in going to see some rock band.”

“True, but I think she’ll like it.”

“I’m rootin’ for ya, bro. And I hope you’re right.”

“Yeah, me too.”

“Remember, I want to meet her, so expect me to invite her out with us at least one day.”

“I already warned her. She’s okay with it. She’s curious to meet you.”

“Well, I’m curious to meet her,” Vil mirrored. “By the way, I love this picture of you with your magazine crew.”

“What? How did you get that?”

“I had a copy of your magazine Fed-Exed,” she said. “And I see you took my advice about your journals. Good for you!”

“Actually, that was my boss’ idea,” he admitted. “He read through my journals with the other material I gave him when I applied for the job.”

There was a short silence. “What is this?”

“Huh?”

“Where is the request not to let the others see the magazine?” she teased.

“Let them,” he said immediately. “I don’t care. Maybe it’ll piss them off that I’m building a life for myself without them and their money.”

Vil laughed. “It probably would. I’m looking at it right now. Ah, so that’s the Lilly you mentioned. Your boss is kinda cute,” she told him. “He has some wild fur, doesn’t he?”

“He’s a great guy.”

“Maybe I can come visit your work. I’d love to meet your boss.”

“We could probably manage it. He knows who I am, so it wouldn’t be a big shock for him. They all do at work. And all Jessie’s sorority knows.”

“I’m glad you’re not hiding from it, bro,” she said seriously.

“No, I guess I’m not. I’m not gonna shove it in people’s faces, but I won’t hide from it either.”

“Good for you. I’ll get off of here and get some work done, bro. “I’ll call you before I leave and give you some specifics.”

“No prob, sis. I need to lock up the office and head home, I’m done for today.”

“Good luck tomorrow,” she said.

“Thanks, sis. Be good.”

Kit was actually nervous.

This was unusual for him. He wasn’t the kind to get nervous over something he understood. She liked him, and he knew it. She was looking forward to this date, and he knew it. So was he. But he was still nervous. Maybe Vil was right and she didn’t like classical music. If so, this might be a very long and unpleasant date. Maybe it was a good thing they were going to go eat first.

He was there at exactly two, and he saw six of the sorority femmes sitting on the balcony over the front door, no doubt there to scope him out and spread the warning through the house that he was there. He told her jeans and tee, and he mirrored his own suggestion, wearing his new jeans and a simple white tee, with a short sleeve white linen shirt worn over it, left unbuttoned. He didn’t even get a chance to ring the doorbell when he got to the porch. The door opened, and Jessie was there, with several femmes behind her.

She was stunning.

Her hair was done to perfection, looking breathtaking. She must have spent hours combing her fur, for there wasn't a hair out of place anywhere. She had the tiniest bit of eyeshadow on her eyelids, and just the tiniest touch of mascara, and she wore a simple pair of gold chain loop earrings in her ears. She wore a tan tank top and a pair of shorts, with a delicate little leather belt and a small beige purse on a thin leather strap on her shoulder. He stepped up to her, literally gawking, and he could smell a faint flowery perfume about her. Her makeup, her dress, even her perfume, it was subtle, delicate, enhancing what was already there instead of trying to hide it. God but was she a wonder!

“You like?” she asked demurely, stepping out and looking up at him with her gorgeous blue eyes, the bright sunlight making their pupils contract down to vertical slits.

“I'm afraid to take you anywhere,” he told her. “I'll have to beat the other males away with a stick.”

She giggled, her cheek fur ruffling slightly, and the sight of that drove him wild. He held his paw out to her, and she took it. Just the touch of her sent a shiver through his tail. “Well, I'll protect you, Kit,” she smiled.

“I might need it,” he said heavily, then he blinked and remembered they weren't going to spend the entire date standing on the porch. “Shall we go?”

“Where do you want to eat?” she asked as he walked her to the car Rick was letting him use.

“Anywhere you want,” he told her.

“Well, there’s this nice place just down the street from my parents’ house in Cincinnati,” she suggested with a teasing smile.

He laughed. “By the time we get up there, you might be in a little trouble with your professors.”

“Well, in that case,” she said with a mock sigh, “I guess I’ll have to settle for Red Lobster.”

“Red Lobster it is,” he said as he helped her into the car, then closed the door for her.

She had to guide him to the restaurant, and they spent the driving time talking about whatever crossed their minds, as they tended to do. They had the same freedom of words they had that first night when she called him, talking about just about anything. Their issue of discussion, talking about post-Civil War literature, continued into the restaurant, and held firm all the way through ordering dinner. “I can’t stand Chesnutt,” Jessie said, shuddering her shoulders. “That dialect he uses is the written equivalent of nails on a blackboard.”

He laughed. “Well, if you can read through it, it’s kinda interesting,” he protested, taking a sip of his tea.

She looked at his cup, then she laughed. “I guess you can’t take a Bostonian away from his tea,” she grinned.

“You can’t take a Cincinnati away from their terrible football team either,” he retorted.

“Oh, now you’re getting personal,” she teased. “Here comes a half hour schpiel glorifying the Patriots,” she complained, throwing her paws up.

He laughed. “I didn’t know you were that much of a football fan.”

“My parents are football freaks,” she told him. “Pro, college, high school...they’d even show up at peewee games if they knew where they played them,” she said, which made him chuckle. “My dad is so funny,” she giggled. “He’s this little slip of a cat, barely taller than me and even thinner, and come Sunday he paints himself up in Bengal stripes and screams like a maniac. He hasn’t missed a Bengal home game in like twenty years.”

“Season tickets?”

“He saves for them every year,” she laughed. “I guess football rubbed off on me. I even played in the 12 year league.”

“You played football?” he said in surprise. “How could anyone on the team concentrate?”

Her fur ruffled in a very appealing manner. “Well, I hadn’t filled out quite yet then, and besides, even now, put this under football pads, and it’s not very noticable,” she said, motioning at herself.

“I’d notice it,” he said honestly.

“You’d be looking,” she winked.

“Damn right I’d be looking,” he retorted instantly.

The hyena waiter brought them their dinners. He had crab legs, she had lobster. “I haven’t had lobster in months!” she said happily as the waiter put her plate down. “Burke hated seafood!”

“Anyone who takes a cat out had better expect seafood to be on the menu,” Kit teased.

“Too right,” she agreed pleasantly, picking up the shellcracker.

It had been years since he’d had crab legs, and he found them to be rather good. Jessie seemed quite happy with her lobster, going through it faster than he’d ever seen a femme eat. “Hungry?” he asked teasingly.

“I haven’t had anything but a slice of toast all day,” she answered. “The others wouldn’t let me eat lunch, either.”

“Why not?”

“They’ve been making me get ready since ten,” she answered. “And I was too nervous to cook this morning. They didn’t want me burning myself at the stove, and I don’t trust any of them to cook.”

“You were nervous?”

“A little,” she admitted, looking over to him.

“I was too. I still am, a little.”

She smiled gently. “Well, me too. I’m not sure where we’re going.”

“I’m not sure if you’ll like it.”

“Well, I promise to keep an open mind.”

“I’m just glad I’m not the only one who’s nervous,” he said with a relieved sigh.

“Of course I’d be nervous, Kit. This is our first date, and I don’t want to look like an idiot.”

Her honesty took him off guard, and he laughed ruefully. “I was thinking the exact same thing.”

“Well, since we’re being totally honest here,” she said, giving him an adorably sly little look, “would you think I’m a pig if I asked for one of your crab legs?”

He laughed delightedly. “Be my guest,” he said, breaking one off and offering it to her.

After dinner, he drove her to the park. She was a little curious when they arrived, and was even more curious when she saw all the other cars. He got out and helped her out, then opened the trunk and pulled out a blanket and a small cooler he’d bought the night before. “And here we are,” he said.

“What are we going to do?”

“We’re going to a concert,” he told her.

“Oh! What kind of music?”

“Classical.”

“Really? I’ve never been to a live classical concert before. Do they always have them out at the park?”

“Sometimes they do,” he said. “The Boston Pops has this huge outdoor theater where they perform quite a bit, in the summer. So, you don’t hate classical music?”

“I’ll admit, I don’t listen to it all the time, but I don’t hate it. This should be interesting.”

“Well, next date, it’s your turn to surprise me,” Kit told her as he put the blanket over his shoulder.

After giving his tickets to a raccoon standing at a roped-off area, he proved he had no glass bottles in his cooler, received a program, and they moved in. He spread his blanket at what he felt was the optimal distance from the stage, just behind most of the others who had arrived before them, then helped her sit down. He sat down himself beside her. “What are we going to listen to?” she asked.

“Your program has it all,” he said, opening it. “Three Beethoven pieces and a violin concerto,” he told her. “Movements from the Third, Fifth, and Ninth symphonies, and Brahms’ violin concerto in D major,” he told her. “Hmm, I’m not familiar with that piece. This should be nice.”

They filled the time waiting with idle chitchat, as the orchestra took the stage and began to tune and prepare. “So, what’s going to happen?” she asked as those around them began to quiet down a little.

“Okay, they’ll spend about fifteen minutes or so getting ready, on the average,” he explained. “Then the conductor will come out, and we’ll applaud. He’ll get the orchestra ready to play, and then they’ll play. Usually, we don’t applaud until they finish the entire piece on the program, because sometime there are pauses between movements. But, if a soloist does a really fantastic job, sometimes the audience does applaud between movements, but they try to keep it brief so it doesn’t interrupt the flow.”

“Do they tell you what they’re playing?”

“They’ll follow the order in the program,” he said. “If you’ll notice, there aren’t any microphones up there. The conductor will never say a word.”

“Ahh, okay.” She looked around, and saw their blanket was surrounded by other blankets. “I didn’t realize this was so popular.”

“Popular with some.”

“Umm, did you see where the restrooms are?” she asked.

“No,” he said, standing up. He looked around, then sat back down. “Over there,” he said with a point.

“I’ll be right back then,” she told him, standing up. “Watch my purse for me?”

“Of course.”

“Thanks,” she said, patting him on the shoulder as she got up. He watched her walk away, watched that gorgeous black-tipped tail of hers, and he almost shuddered. She was so damn sexy!

He leaned back after she hurried off, trying to get his heart back under control. Sometimes he thought it was unfair, her being so beautiful. It was so hard to keep his attention focused, because she was so smart, and he had to keep his wits about him to keep up in conversation with her. He couldn’t just stare at her and say “duh.” She might not appreciate that. He had no doubt that she had males staring at her all the time, and he didn’t want to be just like all the other males. He wanted to be different to her, special. But it wasn’t easy. She was so pretty, he had no doubt that she could afford to be shy, because she had no end of males that tried to talk to her. She could be picky. That was one reason why he felt so honored that she seemed so interested in him, that out of all the males out there that would jump if she snapped her fingers, she chose him to go out with.

A homeless dishwasher with only half of an ear, a bad back, and a very dark and unpleasant family history.

She returned and seated herself demurely beside him, sitting on her legs. He looked over at her, and couldn't look away. She was radiant, the picture of loveliness. She glanced at him, then looked to him with her blue eyes, and she smiled.

He sighed in contentment, and that made her cheeks ruffle. "So, what are you thinking?" she asked in a low voice, leaning close to him.

"That I must have won God's lottery," he answered, gazing into her eyes.

"Oh, do tell," she said with a throaty chuckle. "I didn't realize I was a prize."

He blinked, not quite sure how to answer that. But her eyes were expectant, so he just blurted out the first thing that came to mind. "Not a prize. A treasure."

Her eyes seemed to soften, and she bumped her shoulder up against his.

The conductor came out onto the stage, and those around him began to applaud. He blinked when he realized she'd been leaning closer and closer, until their noses were almost touching. She pulled away a little as they both clapped, then looked down at him in curiosity as he leaned back on his paws and closed his eyes. "What are you doing?"

"Don't listen to the music, Jess. Feel it. That's the big difference with classical music. You listen with your heart and your soul, not your ears."

The concert began. Kit tried to lose himself in the music, like usual, but he just couldn't. She was right there beside him, and that was all he could think about. He kept opening his eyes, kept glancing over at her, both to see if she was enjoying the music, but also because he couldn't think of anything else but her.

He lost all manner of conscious thought halfway through the second movement of the Ninth symphony, when she leaned against him. He had his arm around her before he was even thinking, and she began to purr.

God, that was incredible! It filled his ears, and it seemed to vibrate through him like a thousand symphonies. All he could do was think oh God, she's purring! and he didn't even dare to move, afraid that she'd stop, that he would ruin the moment, when she was so content and happy that she would purr for him. He closed his eyes, then, and lost himself not in the power of the music, but in the power that Jessie's purr had over him.

He was honestly shocked when the concert was over. He didn't remember the end of the Ninth. He couldn't recall a single bar of Brahms' concerto. He just looked up and realized that others were getting up and folding their blankets, and the concert was over.

He'd totally zoned out!

"Uh, Jessie?" he asked softly. She was still against him, her head leaning against his, and she was still purring.

"Mmm?"

"I think the concert's over."

"Mmm," she hummed, her purring going right on.

“But you can keep right on,” he said with a soft chuckle. “That’s the only music I’ve been listening to since you started.”

Her purring stopped, almost immediately, and was afraid that he’d offended her. She looked at him, then she smiled. “I’ll perform that music for you whenever you like,” she told him in a low, sensual whisper.

Her eyes...invited him. Subconsciously, he started leaning down towards her, slowly, hesitantly. He could see the invitation, but he remembered what happened the last time. He hesitated, but she made his mind for him by leaning up and kissing him. Again, he found himself all but paralyzed by her. The entire world melted away, and there was nothing but her.

She pulled away, looking into his eyes, and she was smiling. “That was nice,” she hummed.

“When I can move my tail again, I’ll let you know,” he said breathlessly.

Jessie giggled like a teenager. “I guess we should go,” she said with a little regret.

“We don’t have to go home yet,” he offered. “This is a big park. Would you like to go for a walk?”

“Yes,” she nodded.

They walked along the river, holding paws, and they talked. They talked for hours, wandering the park aimlessly, but always coming back to the river. Jessie seemed to be digging for something. She kept guiding their conversation to his personal life, asking about U-Mass, asking about his sister, asking him about living alone after he was disowned. He wouldn’t dare lie to her, so he told her the truth, the honest truth, telling her what it was like, and how it made him feel. She was silent a long moment, then she stopped them by a bench and sat down. “Kit, I have to ask you something. And you might not want to answer it,” she told him.

“I’d answer any question you asked me, Jess.”

“Do you love your family? Did you ever love your family?”

He sighed, leaning back on the bench. “I think there was a time when I did,” he said. “When I was very young. They were always around, always visiting, and I had lots of cousins to play with. Uncle Zach used to carry me around on his shoulders,” he said, his voice a little wistful. “But then my mother died, and everything changed. Dad became distant, and basically gave up raising us to Clancy and nannies. And as I got older, I realized that my aunts and uncles and cousins, they were being nice to me because they wanted something from me. At that time, my sister wasn’t interested in business because she was raised as a debutante, and, well, everyone just assumed I was going to be the next Vulpan that ran the company. It had passed from father to first son through three generations. I guess everyone assumed it but me. After mom died, all Dad did was work. It was his entire life, and I hated it. I hated how it took him away from me, and I hated how everyone wanted to be my friend just because they thought I’d be the one running the family after Dad died,” he said, looking down at his paws. “I resented it, and then I began to resent him, and them. So I started to rebel. Ever since I was twelve, me and my father had something of a family war. He was dead set on training me to be his heir, and I’d have nothing to do with it. I’d tear up the books he gave me. I ran away several times. I even set fire to his Bentley once,” he chuckled humorlessly. “Then I turned sixteen, and Dad told me flat out I either start getting my act together, or I was disowned.

“He never got the chance to disown me. I walked out. I never looked back. I decided right there that I’d rather die on the streets living my own life than live trapped in the hell of that family, where money was the only thing that mattered, and marriages were based only on how rich and how pureblooded the spouse was.” He sighed. “A life where all I did was obsess about money, and come home every night to a vixen I didn’t love. I couldn’t stand the idea of it.

“Vil explained what happened after I left. There was almost a rift in the family because my uncles kept trying to get their sons into the CEO’s chair, but my dad was totally honked off. See, Dad was the oldest, and he didn’t want to give up the prestige of being the one that passed the company to his own son...and all he had left was Vil. Vil does love business, so she proved to our father she could be a good CEO. She went to Harvard, then graduated from business school. After she graduated, she talked him into giving her the company, and he was desperate. By that time, he’d found out his heart was bad, and he had to start thinking of succession. So the company’s board met, and they voted Vil to be the next Vulpan. That pissed off my uncles something fierce. They didn’t want a female running the company and having control of all the money. As you can tell, they have some pretty Victorian views...guess it goes paw in paw with their purist mentality. So, my dad compromised by dividing up the family fortunes among all my aunts and uncles after he died, and cutting Vil out of most of the money. All she really got out of the will was her house in Chelmsford, a few cars, and her trust fund. She’s rich, don’t ever doubt that, but she has a lot less money than the rest of the family. Most of the family fortune is in the hands of my aunts and uncles, but they still hate the idea of Vil running the company.”

“Because she’s a femme?”

“That, and because she never stopped defending me,” he grunted. “My family hates me now, Jess. I’m a traitor to them. I put myself above the family and I got disowned, and I didn’t have the courtesy to just die in some gutter like a failed excuse for a fox. I’m a walking embarrassment to them, an eyesore. And I certainly didn’t help my case at the funeral,” he mused. “After they put the bastard into the ground, I flipped off the entire family right there at the gravesite. A paparazzi got a picture of it and everything,” he chuckled.

“I, I saw a picture of you when you were there,” she told him. “I hadn’t remembered it until a couple of days ago. You were wearing this long overcoat, and you were walking away from your family. There was a short vixen behind you, looking away.”

“That was my sister Vil,” he told her. “I guess I shouldn’t be surprised you saw a picture of it. They put it in Furs. Anyway, since Vil has always been on my side, it’s made her something of a pariah in the family, but she’s a pariah my family has to be nice to, because she runs the company,” he said with a humorless chuckle. “They have their fortunes, but Vil is the one that controls the family legacy, and all the power that comes with sitting in the big chair at Vulpan Shipyards. It makes her a global power player. When Vil snaps her fingers, the President of the United States jumps. Whichever Vulpan sits in the company’s chair is the most powerful member of the family, money or no money. She has all the prestige, all the power, even though her aunts and uncles have about fifty times more money than she does.”

“The first time I saw you, I had this feeling I’d seen you before. After I remembered that picture, well, that explained it.” She giggled. “Too bad.”

“Huh?”

“Well, you seemed familiar to me,” she explained. “That was why I was so interested in you. Maybe I thought it was fate or something.”

“I think it was,” he said honestly.

“You think so?” she asked, looking at him.

“There can’t be any other explanation why a femme like you would go out with a male like me.”

“There’s nothing at all wrong with you,” she protested. “You’re handsome, and you’re very smart and charming and polite. A femme couldn’t do much better than you, Kit Vulpan. And don’t you forget it.”

“That’s very flattering,” he smiled.

“It’s the truth. Do you know what I see when I look at you?” He shook his head. “I see a wonderful male who’s trying to find a place for himself in the world. I see a male who’s shaken off some things that would have crushed weaker males and still came through it with his sense of humor and his compassion for others. I see a male who’s brave and courageous, because he’s willing to defy his family to go out with a cat. I see a male who’s lived in the shadow of his family for so long that he’d forgotten what the sun looked like, but still keeps yearning for the light.”

They were silent a long moment. “Kit,” she said.

“Yes?”

“I think I know you pretty well now, even though this is only our first week together,” she told him, nuzzling his cheek with her muzzle, reaching out and taking his paw in her own. “Kit, there was nothing to forgive when you kissed me in the skating rink. I was a little surprised, but I really liked it. I wanted you to kiss me. I keep wanting you to kiss me. And I keep wanting to kiss you. And I’ve been thinking about you the same way you think about me,” she breathed huskily in his ear, which made his tail shiver. “I’ve been waiting because I knew your fear of your family would push you away if I tried too hard. And I’m not sure you’re entirely over them yet, so I’ll keep waiting. When you can look at me and not see the spectre of your family hovering over me, then we both know it’s time,” she intoned sensually.

His tail straightened out behind him, the fur standing straight out, and the paw holding hers trembled a little bit.

“God, you know how to motivate a fox,” he said nervously, which made her giggle.

“How do you think I feel? Kit, I’m a virgin,” she told him. “And I mean a virgin. I don’t know much at all about males, or what I’m supposed to do, or how I’m supposed to act. If my mother ever heard me say that, she’d chain me to the wall in the basement until I was thirty. I’m nervous too.”

“Could you at least show it? Here I am trembling, and you’re as solid as a rock.”

She laughed. “It makes a femme feel good to know she can make a male tremble. I spilled my secret. Time to reciprocate,” she teased.

“Well, you can’t ever expect a rich kid to be a virgin,” he told her. “There’s just too many opportunities. But I haven’t been with a femme since the accident.”

“That’s a long time.”

“Not as long as you.”

“Well, I don’t know what I’ve been missing,” she said, squeezing his paw.

“I guess I can’t counter that one,” he chuckled ruefully.

They sat there for a while in content silence, watching as the sun began to set over the western hills. “Jessie.”

“Hmm?”

“Do you believe in love at first sight?”

She looked at him. “Not really. It’s a romantic idea, but I don’t think it really happens. But I do believe in love at first kiss.”

He looked at her. “So....”

She just smiled, all mysterious.

“Mean kitty,” he accused playfully.

“I have to keep you guessing,” she winked. “You might get too complacent. Aunt Penny always says that once a male hears you say I love you, he stops trying.”

“Love isn’t a game that has a finish line,” he protested. “If it did, then it would be finished when you got there.”

“That’s romantic,” she said.

“So, if I promise to never stop trying, will you answer the question?” he asked.

She laughed. “Mmmmaybe,” she teased, tracing her finger in circles on his shoulder.

“And you said you had no idea how to talk to males,” he laughed ruefully. “You liar,” he teased with a grin.

“Alright, alright,” she acquiesced, scooting up against him. “I’ll tell the truth. When you kissed me, I was surprised. I thought there was something there, but then you confused me when you backed off. At first I thought I did something wrong, then I realized you thought you’d done something wrong, and I thought it was so sweet. You were thinking of me before yourself.”

“It’s because you’re so shy, and you were nervous. I, I couldn’t help myself when I kissed you, and I realized I went way over the line.”

“I could tell you knew I was nervous, and you were still being so kind to me, trying to make me feel comfortable,” she told him. “And then, when you kissed me, I didn’t feel you being forward, I just felt what you were trying to say without words.

“So, was it love at first kiss? I don’t really know. My dad always says you’re never really sure when it is you fall in love, you only realize it later. But, from the way I feel right now, I’m thinking that it might be a distinct possibility...” she trailed off, looking into his eyes.

He could not look into those eyes and resist the overpowering temptation. He leaned down and kissed her, kissed her with pure, unrequited passion, trying to tell her without words just how he felt about her. She pressed against him, her arms looping around him, even felt her long-haired tail wrap sensually around his. It was sheer bliss, and he was almost disappointed when it was over. She looked up at him, a little breathless, and he chuckled.

“What?”

“I see I’m going to have to start saving money.”

“For what?”

“For a ring,” he said earnestly.

She gave him a wild look, her cheeks ruffling out, then she laughed. “Slow down there, my fox,” she told him with a smile. “You have to meet Momzilla before you decide to become part of my family.”

He laughed. “I’ll make sure to wear my armor.”

“You’ll need it,” she grinned, pushing herself into his arms, tapping him playfully on the nose. Then she leaned in and kissed him again. “Mmm, well, one thing’s for sure.”

“What?”

“I’m going to enjoy this game you call love.”

“Me too,” he grinned, and he kissed her.

He got her home at nine. Both of them were a little out of sorts, for they’d spent over an hour on the bench, kissing and nuzzling, and being totally frank and honest with each other. Some pretty dark secrets were traded on that bench between them, acts of trust offered and taken with sincerity. Though neither of them came out and said I love you, it was there. Oh, it was there.

He helped her out of the car, and she wrapped her arms around his waist and kissed him lingeringly, sliding her fingers up and down the scars on his back lightly as he held her close, then dared to slide his paw down and press it against her very attractive backside. She squeaked a little, but just kissed him with a little more passion, more than happy to allow him to paw her in a place that a respectable male had no business putting his paws.

“I’ll save you the torment of going in,” she giggled into his neck as she nuzzled him. “Call me tomorrow?”

“I’m off tomorrow. I’m going shopping for a couch. Want to go? I like your sense of style.”

“Sure, I’d love to. Pick me up at five?”

“I’ll be waiting.”

“Mmm. Kit, I had a wonderful time.”

“So did I. I’m going to go home and take a cold shower.”

She grinned. “If that’s the case, then maybe you should take your paw off my butt,” she teased. “It can’t be helping.”

He laughed, moving the offending appendage.

“But don’t worry,” she said, raising up and whispering to him, close to his ear, “I think you’ll be ready very soon. Like you said, you have motivation now.”

He slid his paws up her back, until they were resting on her shoulders. “I’ll do my best.”

“Don’t make me wait too long. I want to know what I’m missing,” she purred.

“And who’s not helping now?” he protested.

She laughed, then lunged in and gave him one more kiss, a chaste kiss on the cheek. “You be good, my handsome fox,” she told him. “And I’ll see you tomorrow.”

“Have a good night, my pretty kitty,” he smiled in reply.

“Only if I dream of you tonight,” she said throatily, then she pulled free of him and sauntered up the sidewalk.

He watched her walk up to the door, open it, look back at him, then go in. Once she was out of sight, his knees wobbled, and he blew out his breath.

Good God, what a female!

He got back in the car, started it, then leaned against the steering wheel for a minute. Cold shower. Yes. Cold shower would be good. He pulled out, heading for home, thoughts of Jessie dominating his every second.

He wasn’t joking. He was definitely going to start saving for that ring.

Neither he, Jessie, nor the femmes watching from the sorority house saw the telephoto camera pull back into the window of a dark sedan, and then pull off in the opposite direction.

Inside the house, every femme was in the living room. They watched her come in, then lean against the door as she closed it and let out a long, contented sigh.

“Oh, tell me you did!” Danielle said expectantly.

“No, but we will soon,” she literally purred, putting her black-furred paw to her cheek. “I think he’ll be ready soon.” She gave them all a huge grin. “I’m going to marry that fox,” she declared with a little hum.

They all squealed and clapped, then swarmed her, demanding a second by second account of the entire date.

Chapter 5

Kit's apartment slowly began to resemble a home, rather than an empty dwelling.

Jessie helped him pick out a nice couch, a light tan one with deep cushions and flared armrests on the ends, covered with thick upholstery. It was kind of pricy, but she liked it, and since she liked it, he bought it. He also bought a cheap desk for his laptop, a rolling chair, and one of those flimsy metal tables to put in the large living room right by the kitchen, a dining area, that gave him something to eat on. He completed his bachelor's dining room suit with two very cheap and unmatching chairs. A tablecloth covered up the cheap flimsiness, but at least now he had somewhere for him and Jessie to eat.

Jessie had told her friends about his apartment, and Tuesday, when he got home from work to await the delivery of his couch, he found almost half of her sorority waiting for him. While Sandy was flirting with Lupe, they pulled a TV stand, endtable, and an old TV out of their cars. They were letting him borrow them until he could get his own, some of the cast-off furniture that was in the basement of the house and a TV donated by Danielle, who'd just bought a new TV, one of the LCD ones she could hang on the wall of her rather cluttered room. The TV she lent him was an old tube TV, but it was a 33 inch model that must have taken up a huge piece of real estate in her room.

He didn't really watch TV all that much, but it was kind of her to let him borrow it, so he'd take it with gratitude.

Jessie stayed over after her sisters went home, and she cooked him dinner, and they spent nearly three hours sitting on his new couch, talking, which led to making out. He got her home about ten, after he realized it was either take her home or take her back to the bedroom. She told him when he could think about that and not see the spectre of his family, when he could think about making love to her without a single worry about his family crossing his mind, then it was time. It wasn't time yet, but he managed to go quite a while before he had a single thought about his family. And he had too much respect for her to do anything other than what she wished, when it came to that. When that time did come, and it would come, he would be able to look into her eyes and tell her so with utter honesty.

He had to agree with her, regardless. She was right. He had to be free of his family before they got intimate, or it would be a weight dragging them down into the bottomless pit. God knows, he didn't want to share his bed with his entire family, and that's what it more or less would be if he slept with her with his family hanging over him.

The loaned TV also gave the cable guy something to do when he arrived to install Kit's cable modem. The cable modem went in the spare bedroom, but the leopard also hooked up the cable to the TV. It was indeed a package deal, basic cable for just fifteen bucks a month with the cable modem subscription, anything he could get without using a converter box. It gave him about fifty channels, which was about forty-seven channels too many. He rarely turned it on, and when he did, it was either on a news channel, the Weather Channel, or A&E, Discovery, or National Geographic.

He wasn't quite sure how to handle the modem, so he asked Mike for some help. The raccoon came over after work on Wednesday, then they hit the tech stores. Mike had him buy a good wireless router, then hooked it up for him, isolated it so only Kit's computer could use it, and showed him how to add new computers to his wireless network when he bought a desktop. Kit rather liked the wireless part, though. He could use his laptop anywhere in the apartment, even sitting out by the door outside on his tiny porch, and Mike had fixed it so he could get to the magazine's network from home to move files back and forth. That would let him take work home with him, since he could do some of his research from home.

By Thursday, his apartment almost looked normal. He had a couch, TV, coffee table, dining table, desk, and a bed. Hell, he was almost there, even if some of it wasn't his. Not only furniture, but he had cable, internet, and a radio, too. All he needed now was a DVD player, a good stereo, and some music and movies to play in them, and he'd be set.

Well, and a car. He was still using Rick's wife's car, so he had to start looking for his own.

He was initiated into the Lone Star custom of going to The Pit after work on Thursday, but he didn't go alone. Jessie joined them, and they spent a few very fun hours palling around with the crew, basicly just moving their fun from the office to the bar.

Vil called while he was at the bar and gave him her arrival time. She'd get in before he went to work, and when he offered to pick her up at the airport, she scoffed.

“Oh, please. I already have a limo arranged that'll take me to the Austin Regency. I'm also going to do a little work there. There's a steel company there in Austin, and I want to give it a once-over to see if it's worth buying. I'm also going to talk to one of the smaller oil companies about a contract with the Galveston repair facility. I told them I'd talk to them about it there in Austin. Their CEO is going to fly out and meet me tomorrow afternoon at a satellite office in Pflugerville."

"You just had to turn this into work," he accused lightly.

"Hey, that's how I write off the trip on my taxes at the end of the year," she teased. "This is a business trip. The fact that you're there is just a convenient coincidence. They don't have to know that the only reason I'm going to talk to the company and look over the steel mill is to give me that front of officiality for when I come see you."

He laughed. "You're terrible!"

"That's how a Vulpan does business," she teased with a smug little trill to her voice. "I'll pick you up after work, and we'll go meet Jessie at her house. I want to give it a look."

"You can tell her that yourself," he told her. "She's here with me."

"Oh, really? Put her on!"

"Jess!" he called. She laughed and looked away from Rick and Marty, and he held the phone out to her. "My sister wants to talk to you."

"Really?" she asked, taking the phone. "Uh, hello? Vilenne?"

Kit winced.

"Vil, Vil," she said placatingly.

"You're learning," Kit grinned at her.

“Oh, hush, Kitstrom,” she told him with a charmingly insulting expression, then paid attention to the phone. “Sorry, I was chastising your brother. Oh, yes, he deserved it.” Then she laughed.

“Dude, she goes for the throat, doesn’t she?” Jeffrey laughed from across the table. “Straight to the full name!”

“I enjoy the punishment,” he mused, just enjoying watching her talk to his sister without listening to what she was saying.

Vil kept Jessie tied up on the phone for nearly a half an hour. Jessie’s body language relaxed visibly as they talked, as she got over being nervous over talking to someone as imposing as Vilenne Vulpan to giggling and carrying on like she was talking to an old friend. “Here, she wants to say goodbye,” she said, handing him the phone.

“Hey sis,” he said into the phone.

“I like her,” she said immediately.

“Well, so do I. Why do you think I ask her out?” he challenged.

Vil laughed. “So, tomorrow when you’re about to get off work, call me. I’ll come to your work to pick you up, meet your co-workers, and we’ll go get Jessie and get some dinner.”

“Sounds like a plan to me,” he agreed.

“Cool beans, bro. See you tomorrow.”

“See you tomorrow, sis. Have a good flight.”

“Thanks. Bye-bye.”

“Bye.” He closed the phone and looked at Jessie, who was talking to Rick. She glanced at him, then turned and looked at him curiously.

“What is it, Kit?”

“Vil said she’s going to come pick us up tomorrow after I get off work,” he told her. “She wants to see the office too, so I think I’d better call her a little early,” he mused.

“What was that? You’re gonna bring your sister up to the office?” Rick asked.

“Yeah, she wants to see it. Is that okay?”

“Hell, son, that’s fine.”

“Do you think she’d mind giving me a very brief interview? It’d be a major scoop if we got an article about Vilenne Vulpan into the magazine!” Barry said.

“Yeah, but then people will find out she’s my sister,” he protested. Then he closed his mouth and thought a brief moment. “No, nevermind. Go ahead, Barry. I shouldn’t be ashamed that my sister is rich and successful,” he grinned. “And though I don’t bring it up, I shouldn’t really hide the facts about my family either.”

Jessie put a paw on his arm. He looked to her, and saw that glorious smile on her face. “What?”

“Oh, nothing,” she said, then she leaned in close to him. “Let’s go back to your apartment,” she whispered huskily in his ear.

“Uhh, sure, if you want,” he told her. “Sorry guys, but Jess needs to head out, so I’m going to take her home. See you guys tomorrow.”

“No, our secret weapon for the open mic contest is bailing!” Marty said with mock outrage. “We bet money on it!”

Kit laughed. “Well, do your best,” he grinned as he stood up, then helped Jessie out of her chair.

He drove them back to his apartment and let her in, but Lupe intercepted him after he went to check the mail. His new checks had arrived. “Yo, Kit,” he called. “The UPS guys dropped a package off at the office for you.”

“UPS? I wasn’t expecting anything.”

Kit went to the office with Lupe, and inside against the wall there were three boxes stacked neatly. One of them was fairly large, but the other two were medium sized. He recognized those boxes almost immediately. They were the original boxes he’d used to store all the stuff when he left Suzy’s apartment in Boston. Vil had shipped it all to him!

“Oh, cool!” he said in surprise. “I almost completely forgot about this stuff!”

“What is it?”

“It’s my stuff from home,” he answered. “From when I was in college. I told Suzy to do something with it all, but she musta sent it to my sis, and my sis mailed it to me.”

“Cool deal. Lemme help you carry it home.”

“Thanks, I appreciate it, but be careful. The two small boxes are mostly books.”

“I get one, you get one, no prob.”

Kit and Lupe carried the three boxes over to his apartment and stacked them by the door. Lupe looked around, and chuckled. “Damn, dude, this place looks like a real home now,” he said. “All you need is some pictures or something for the walls and some curtains, and you’re set.”

“Yeah,” Kit said as he put down the largest box. “Thanks for the help, Lupe.”

“Hey, no prob. Don’t forget, you gotta pay rent next month!” he teased with a laugh.

“Like you’ll let me forget,” he grinned.

“Jess, come look at what Vil sent me,” he called as Lupe left.

She came out from the bathroom and looked at the boxes. “What are these?”

“It’s my stuff from when I went to U-Mass,” he said. “After the accident, Vil didn’t want me living in the dorm because of my back, so she helped me get an apartment just off campus, a little one bedroom efficiency. After I graduated I put all my junk in these boxes and told Suzy to get rid of it. I’d totally forgotten about it.”

“Suzy?”

“A friend of Vil’s. She helped us out by acting like a middle-fur so Vil could pay my rent without anyone knowing.”

“Ah. What do you want for dinner?”

“Jess, you don’t have to cook for me,” he protested.

“I don’t have to, but I want to,” she answered. “You need to eat.”

“Well, if you really don’t mind cooking, I can’t very much demand anything specific,” he chuckled. “Just surprise me. There should be an X-Box in here,” he said eagerly. “And I have a bunch of DVDs too.”

He unpacked his old life in the living room while Jessie cooked. Old knick-knacks, some of his old schoolbooks, some sketches his roommate did before the accident and he moved out, and yes, his old X-Box was in there, as well as a bunch of games and quite a few DVDs. He had the DVD player add-on for his X-Box, so he had something to play them on. He dug out the little Transformers toy that Paul had given him on his birthday as a joke, but he’d kept, some thing he’d bought on Ebay called Sky Warp, which turned into an F-15 fighter. It was an inside joke between them, because he was taking flying lessons and wanted to be a fighter pilot.

And books! Lots and lots of books. Fiction and nonfiction, but mostly non-fiction. History book after history book after history book, most of them about the Roman Empire, which was his favorite field of study in history. His cookbooks were in there too.

He put the little toy out on the TV ostentatiously, and taped the sketches up on the wall in the eating area, then went about hooking up the X-Box. By the time he had it hooked up, he realized the batteries in the DVD add-on remote were dead, so that was something he’d have to go buy.

“Heh, well, you guys need an extra alarm clock?” he asked as he opened the final box and found his old alarm clock on top, the most of the remainder being books.

“I can take it home with me,” Jessie called, coming out of the kitchen. She didn’t have much food to work with in his kitchen, but she’d managed to make a salad and some Hamburger Helper he’d bought the other day.

“We need to talk about your shopping habits, mister,” she teased. “There’s not much I can do with what’s in there.”

“Hey, us young guys aren’t known for cooking,” he chuckled.

“Well, come get something to eat,” she told him. “I’ll make us some tea.”

They enjoyed the simple meal, and Kit was getting a strange feeling. Jessie was...watching him. He enjoyed being with her, and over the last couple of weeks, he’d gotten to know her, and what she was doing wasn’t entirely normal for her. She was eating too, but she kept her eyes on him, almost all the time.

The good thing about plastic dishes was not having to clean up much afterwards. He washed up the pan she’d dirtied while she wrapped the salad and leftovers in plastic and put them in the refrigerator. He noticed that she was humming to herself. Sheesh, did that one beer she drank have that much of an effect on her? He made a mental note not to take her into anymore bars...or, well, maybe taking her to bars if it made her this agreeable afterwards.

They sat on the couch, and almost immediately she cuddled up to him in a way he found incredibly pleasing, which went up by exponential degrees when she began to purr. He put his arm around her and just listened to her purr for a long, long time. She patted him on the shoulder. “Kit?” she asked.

“Yes?”

“May I use your phone?” she said, looking up at him. Her eyes were absolutely smoldering.

Those luminous blue eyes put him out of sorts. “Uh, sure,” he said, digging it out of his pocket and handing it to her. She flipped it open and hit the speed dial for her own number, and put it to her ear. “Hey Linda, it’s JD. I’m fine. Listen, can you tell Sam that I won’t be home tonight? I’m staying over at Kit’s.”

Kit’s tail almost broke when it tried to snap straight out behind him, driving into the back of his couch.

“Hush, you. No. No, no, hush up a second. Just tell Sam what I said. No. Linda—Linda. I’m going to hang up on you. I mean it! Okay. Just tell her, and so help me, if I come home tomorrow and find anything like that, I’m gonna have Ben come down and beat you up! I swear I will!” She snorted. “Fine. Fine. Linda, you are keeping me from Kit,” she said in a voice so intense it surprised him. “If my mom calls, make something up, stall, do something, can you do that for me? Thanks. Okay. Bye.” She leaned forward and put the phone on the coffee table, then leaned back against him and began to purr again.

He was quite out of sorts. “Uh, Jessie, we’re gonna—“

“Mmm-hmm.”

“But what about—“

“You’re over it,” she told him sedately. “When you told Barry you weren’t ashamed of your sister, I knew you were over it.” She was quiet a moment. “Remember when I told you we’d have to talk about you carrying me later?”

“Yeah.”

“Well, why don’t you carry me somewhere?” she asked, giving him a glowing smile.

She didn’t have to ask twice. He swooped her up and carried her over to the door, and she laughed as he locked it. Then he turned and carried her back to the bedroom. “I think this is entirely too soon,” he told her seriously, but he wasn’t stopping. “We’ve only been going out for two weeks!”

“I’ve been waiting my whole life for this,” she said huskily in his ear. “And I don’t want to wait anymore.”

“Your wish is my command, my Lady,” he told her as he carried her through the bedroom door.

Some things are worth waiting your whole life for.

It was morning, 6:42am, but his alarm hadn’t gone off yet. Not that he really had to set it, because Friday was his late day, but Jessie had morning classes and he didn’t want her to be late. He lay on his stomach, paws under his pillow as he looked at the clock. She was awake too, propped up on her side, her paw sliding up and down his lower back, over the scars from the surgeries. It was that gentle touch that had awakened him. His back was aching from last night, but her gentle hands seemed to seek out the pain and soothe it with a light, delicate touch. She didn’t know his back was hurting him...or at least he didn’t tell her. But her fingers just seemed to know exactly where to go, and her touch was magical.

He’d slept with other girls, but it had never been like that. It was... absolutely indescribable. And though she was a virgin, she was in no way shy or timid. She was beyond ready to be deflowered. She was very... enthusiastic. And very curious. Even afterward, she spent a long time doing what she was doing right now, exploring his body with her eyes and her paws, getting to know every inch of him.

He still felt this was a little too soon. He wanted to take his time, lead her to this point slowly, gently, carefully, but she seemed to want nothing to do with his schedule. But then again, he should have expected it. She'd made her intentions quite clear on Sunday, but he didn't expect her to feel that he'd reached that level quite so quickly.

She was right though. Not once, not once all night, did he have a single thought about the possible consequences they might suffer from his family. Even now, those consequences meant absolutely nothing to him. He didn't care if they went ballistic once they found out he was dating a cat. Hell, he wanted them to know. He wanted to shout it from the rooftops, put it on the internet, that he was in love with Jessica Williams. He was in love with a cat. They could all go to hell. It was his life, and he'd live it any way he damn well pleased. They lost any right to have a say in his life when they turned their backs on him, more concerned about their money than one of their own family.

They were like sharks, turning on each other the instant there was more in it for them to do so.

"Does it hurt?" she asked, caressing his back. "I never really thought about if I might hurt you when we were doing it. I was a little... preoccupied," she added with a laugh.

He turned his head and looked at her. "No, it doesn't work quite that way," he told her. "It only hurts if I sleep on it wrong or I get jarred or hit the wrong way. I know how not to move and what not to do to keep from hurting it. I can satisfy your demands without hurting myself,” he grinned.

“That’s good, because I think I’m going to have some more of those demands,” she giggled, leaning down and kissing him on the muzzle. “Thank you for an absolutely wonderful evening, sir,” she grinned.

He laughed and rolled over on his back, and she snuggled up with him. “It’s too bad it’s almost time to get up and get moving. What time do you have your first class?”

“Nine,” she told him.

“Hmm,” he said, looking over her and to the clock. “You know, we have about a half an hour,” he told her.

“Not long enough,” she complained. “I want to experience it, Kit. It’s too new, too wonderful to me to be something we try to do before the alarm goes off. Thirty minutes for my second time? Nuh-uh. We’d never make it in time. It would take me that long just to kiss you properly.”

“Ah, it would technically be your third time,” he pointed out.

She laughed. “Well, I stand corrected, and you’re supposed to be a little more caring and considerate giving I’m entering an entirely new stage of my life here,” she said, poking him in the chest with her finger.

“The old A.S., eh? After Sex?”

She laughed. “And here I thought you’d still respect me in the morning.”

“Oh, we might have to talk about that, I suppose,” he said off-handedly, which earned him a face full of pillow. He pushed it away from his muzzle, laughing. "I can't respect you, you're just too adorable," he added. She laughed and pulled the pillow away, looming over him, then she quite deliberately reached out and touched him in the only place she'd avoided all night.

She very gently pinched the ragged edge of his left ear.

"Did it hurt when you lost it?" she asked.

"I don't remember it at all," he reminded her.

"Oh yeah. Did it hurt much after?"

"They had me on too many painkillers for me to feel much of my ear, when it felt like my back was on fire," he told her honestly.

"You know something?"

"What?"

"I can't imagine what you'd look like with your ear whole," she told him, covering his entire ear with her paw and rising up and away to look down at him critically. "It's like this was how you were meant to be to me. Doesn't that sound silly?"

"Not silly at all," he said gently. "You know something?"

"What?"

"Your claws are very sharp."

Her cheeks ruffled and she gave him a contrite look. "I'm sorry. Did I hurt you?"

"Nothing I wasn't willing to endure," he grinned. "I've never slept with a cat before. I didn't expect that Vulcan Death Grip."

She laughed helplessly, burying her head in his neck and shoulder. “I’ll try to be more careful next time.”

“If you’re not, I’m going to make you wear oven mitts.” She rose up and gaped at him, and he winked. She erupted into gales of laughter. “That’s some pretty formidable weaponry there you have, ma’am,” he told her. “Have you ever had to use them?”

“Once,” she answered, still giggling a little. “When I was in high school. Boys don’t harass cats or skunks. We can do very mean things to them if they get fresh.”

“Remind me never to be fresh with you,” he smiled.

“Well, I think I could let you be a little fresh, given you’ve done all those other things with me,” she winked, then she flopped down on his chest and kissed him. “Mmmm,” she hummed, then she began to purr. “Well, their mission is accomplished,” she noted.

“Huh?”

“My sorority. They’ve told me it was their mission in life to find me a boyfriend that would take my virginity.”

“Remind me to thank them. I hope they like kisses,” he mused.

She growled in her throat, a very surprising sound. He laughed and put his arms around her. “Understood, ma’am,” he grinned.

“And don’t you forget it,” she smiled, then she began purring again as she kissed him.

Oh, God. She was a good enough kisser as it was, but her purring just vibrated right through him in the most exotic, unbelievable manner.

“Mmmrraaahhhh,” he hummed as she snuggled in with him. “Are you sure you were a virgin? I’ve never met any femme who can kiss like you.”

“You just bring out the vixen in me,” she teased.

“I’d rather bring out the cat in you,” he countered. “Do all femme cats kiss as good as you?”

“I don’t know. I’ve never kissed a femme cat that way.”

He chuckled. “Point.”

“Come on, if we stay in this bed I’ll just get bad ideas,” she told him, rising up. “Can I take a shower?”

He laughed. “We make love, and you ask me to use the shower?” he noted. “Jess, love, my house is your house. After last night, I think you can do whatever the hell you want.”

She dropped back down and gave him a toe-curling, passionate kiss. “My, what was that for,” he said breathlessly.

“For calling me love,” she grinned. “There’s other rewards for good behavior, too,” she said in a purring voice, playfully nipping at his right ear.

“I think I’m going to like this training,” he mused as she got out of bed and sauntered towards the bathroom, as he watched that tail of hers sway back and forth.

Despite his brave front, his back was stiff. While she got the shower ready, he lay in bed for a minute, then sat on the edge of the bed with both paws on his waist, working out the kinks. He wasn’t used to that kind of... exertion. Hopefully he’d build up either some endurance or some resistance to it. That, or taking Advil before bed was going to become a ritual.

He stood up and stretched, then gathered up the sheet to make the bed...and realized he'd have to wash the sheets. And he hoped that her first time hadn't hurt. He bent down to pull the sheet and felt his back sting, and rose up with both paws on his back, arching it as his tail slashed back and forth.

He jumped when her paws touched him. "I thought you said your back didn't hurt."

"Well, it's a little stiff, but nothing serious," he hedged.

"Kit," she said seriously, wrapping her arms around him and pressing up against his back. "I'm a little disappointed in you. You can be honest with me."

"I just didn't want to worry you, that's all. Last night was your night, Jess. I wasn't going to do anything to take away from it. Besides, I wasn't about to stop either, back or no back."

She hummed in her throat. "But you'll be honest with me from now on?"

"Even if it's what you don't want to hear?"

"Especially if it's what I don't want to hear. Now, does your back hurt?"

"A little. But don't you worry about it."

"I will worry about it. I don't want to hurt you."

"Love, this isn't something you can hurt me like that. If that makes sense."

"Not really."

“Alright, then just trust me when I say it’s nothing you need to worry about. You didn’t hurt my back. It’s just sore, that’s all. After either a hot shower or a little bit with a heating pad on it, and I’ll be just fine.”

“Mmm, a shower, eh? Then c’mon,” she purred, turning them around. “Let’s get this back all better.”

She virtually babied him. She massaged his back in the shower, her magical paws soothing away the pain, then he washed her hair and her tail for her. He ruffled her tail dry, pausing to tweak that black tip. “God, I love this tail. Almost like a fox.”

“My grandfather’s a fox,” she winked back at him. “I inherited his black tips,” she added, holding up her black-mitten paws, and wiggling her black-backed ears.

“Well, I think it looks wonderful.”

“You’re a fox. You’re biased,” she giggled.

“Then call me biased. Do you like Honey Nut Cheerios?”

“Sure do. Now turn around, mister. Someone’s tail looks like Sandy when she gets out of the shower.”

His back was completely pain-free by the time his tail was dry and combed. He got dressed and went to the kitchen, and poured cereal into plastic bowls for breakfast while Jessie dressed. She came in while still combing her hair, and took the bowl from him with a smile and a nod. “Not quite what I had in mind, but I guess we’ll have to make do,” he noted.

“What did you have in mind?”

“Something a little better than plastic spoons and styrofoam bowls,” he sighed. “You’re much too important to me.”

She gave him a radiant smile, and laughed. “Oh, Kit, it could be gruel served on a toilet seat, and it wouldn’t matter. The company is much more important than the accessories. You may be from this super-rich blueblood family, but I much better like the Kit that likes to eat hamburgers on pieces of bread and doesn’t complain about Hamburger Helper.” She leaned in and nuzzled his neck. “I do appreciate the thought, but I’m much more interested in this,” she told him, putting her paw on his shoulder, “than some perfect fantasy. Reality was much sweeter than anything I dreamed about.”

He felt his tail shiver at that. “Pretty kitty,” he said in a quivering voice. “Don’t make me regret having to go to work. Cause you’ll regret going to school.”

She laughed. “I’m already regretting it. But there’s always tonight.”

“Well, there is that,” he said. He took up his spoon. “If we can keep Vil from talking all night, that is.”

“That’s alright. I’m looking forward to meeting her.”

“Oh, she’s gonna love you,” he chuckled.

After breakfast, he drove her back to her house. He got her home around eight, which would give her more than enough time to go in, change, and get her books for her classes. He helped her out, and she gave him a long, lingering, sensual, intimate kiss. “Jessie.”

“Mmm?”

“I know this is crazy. We’ve only known each other two weeks, for crying out loud. But, I love you.”

Her claws dug into him painfully. “I think maybe it was,” she breathed.

“Was what?”

“Love at first kiss,” she said, looking up at him. He was lost in her eyes for a long moment, then she kissed him again, passionate, fiery, which almost made his knees unlock. He had to lean back against the car, and she chased him relentlessly, making him completely surrender to her. “Mmm, start saving for that ring, Kitstrom Vulpan,” she whispered in his ear. “Keep going the way you’re going, and you won’t be disappointed when you ask that question.”

She was evil. She hurried away after saying something like that, and all he could do was watch her and wonder just how much of it was a joke, and how much of it was serious. He blew out his breath, ran his paws through his hair, then lightly slapped himself on the cheeks. For a moment, he forgot where he was and what he was doing, then vaguely recalled that he had to go deposit his check in the bank, and start researching cars so he could find a good bargain.

He got in Rick’s car and got to work. He had things to do today, and it was time to get back to reality after that blissful night of heaven on earth.

Jessie didn’t even make it to the stairs. She was hoping that she could sneak into the house and get to her room before anyone noticed her, which wasn’t hard given her room was the first door on the right upstairs, but clearly they’d been looking for her. The other Jessie, Sandy, and Danielle ambushed her not five steps from the front door, the big tiger grabbing her in a huge hug and picking her up off the floor. “We’re so happy for you, baby!” she called.

“Yo, ladies! MISSION ACCOMPLISHED!” Sandy screamed at the top of her lungs. Jessie’s face poofed almost straight out, even her tail frizzed, and she thought she was going to die of mortification when loud cheering and clapping came from upstairs and the kitchen. “Now, give us the low-down, JD!” Sandy said as the other Jessie put her back down. “The lower, the better!”

“I’m going to be late for class,” Jessie said primly, heading for the stairs.

Sandy erupted into laughter. “Playing innocent doesn’t work anymore, you naughty femme,” Sandy teased. “You’re not innocent anymore!”

“Well, maybe not, but still, it’s just not the proper thing to do,” she said.

“Oh, stop playing coy,” Danielle grinned. “You know you wanna talk about it.”

“Well, maybe a little,” she admitted, her cheeks ruffling. “But can it wait a little while? A night like that isn’t something you just talk about. It was wonderful.”

“See, now you’re talking,” Danielle laughed as they started up the stairs. “How was it?”

“You know very well how it was,” she answered, a touch priggishly.

“That depends on the male,” Sandy said with a dirty grin.

“Did his back cause any problems?” the other Jessie asked. “My dad hurt his back a few years ago, and mom said he has trouble, performing.”

“Your mom talks sex with you about your dad? Ewww!” Danielle shuddered, which earned her a swat from the tiger.

“Well, he was sore this morning, but he seemed to get better after he got up and moving,” she answered. “I never even thought about that until this morning, when I woke up. he was laying on his stomach, and I could see the surgery scars on his back.”

“Is he as cuddly as he looks?” Sandy asked. “His fur is so soft and gorgeous. He must be nice to hold.”

“He snuggles well,” she giggled in reply as they reached her room. Sam was already gone, for she had an eight o’clock class on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

“I have to say, I’m a bit surprised,” Sandy said with a laugh. “We try to get you laid for two years, and you go and jump in the sack with a guy you met two weeks ago! And after you put on all this aire about waiting for the right time!”

“It was the right time,” she said calmly as she pulled her shirt off, changing for school. “I was waiting for him to lose his fear of his family. Well, he lost it.”

“That was fast,” the other Jessie chuckled.

“Well, on Sunday, I kinda hinted that the as soon as he did that, I’d be more than receptive to sleeping with him,” she said with a little giggle. “He had...motivation.”

The other three femmes laughed as she took off her jeans, and fished clean clothes out of the dresser.

“Sure he wasn’t faking it?”

“I’d know if he was. I know him very well, Sandy. I could tell if he wasn’t sincere. No, he lost his fear of his family. I guess I just offered him something worth facing up to it.”

Sandy gave her a wicked smirk. “Oh, you offered something, all right. Something about any male would have wanted.”

“Only one male will ever get it,” she declared as she put on clean underwear, then stepped into a fresh pair of jeans. “I’m marrying that fox, femmes. Mark my words. I couldn’t find a better male if I searched all my life. I found my husband.”

“I hope he knows this,” Danielle giggled.

“Oh, he knows,” she stated, giving Danielle a glance. “He knows. All that comes now is the waiting. He’s much too much the gentlefur to ask me now. He feels like we’re moving too fast, and he’ll want to slow down a little. He’ll get secure in his job, feel out how I feel about it, and I guess I’ll have to take him to meet my parents,” she said with a shudder. “But as soon as he feels like he’s ready, that he can give me a stable home and can take care of me, he’ll ask me.”

“And you’ll say yes?”

“I’d say yes right now,” she declared. “But he won’t ask me right now.”

“You’re sure about that?”

She nodded. “I know him very well, Sandy. I’ve only known him two weeks, but...but I know him. I’m sure of it.” She began to pack her bookbag for her two classes. Friday was something of her short day. Her 1:00pm class didn’t meet on Fridays, so that gave her a class at 9:00am and another class at noon. On Mondays and Wednesdays she also had a class at 1:00, but that was a two hour class. But instead of going to class on Fridays, she worked as a tutor in the study center from 2:00pm to 3:00pm, tutoring in English. It was good practice for her, she felt, getting her used to teaching students. “Now, if you guys will excuse me, I gotta get to class.”

“Oh, put aside some time on your calendar after you’re done, femme,” Sandy declared in a teasing voice.

“You may have to wait. Kit’s sister is coming today, and she wants to meet me.”

“Ooh, bring her here! We need to meet her!”

“It must be nice to be so rich she can fly down whenever she wants,” the other Jessie noted with a chuckle.

Kit was right about one thing...A.S. It really did have an impact on her. She was kinda lost most of the day, ghosting through her first class, forgetting to eat lunch, nearly forgetting her homework assignment for her second class. She kept thinking about Kit, and last night, and Kit...and last night. And Kit. Oh, and last night.... It was almost embarrassing, because she’d never had those kinds of thoughts with that kind of intensity while sitting in a public area. At one point, she was purring while lost in one of her reveries, and a weasel male made a rather direct comment about it from the next table. That about mortified her.

She struggled through her last class, trying to think of some way to keep her mind on school when it was somewhere else, and was blissfully thankful when it was over. Not because she could go see Kit, but because she wouldn't feel ashamed that she wasn't really prepared for class. Her grades had come way down since she met him, so much so that her European Lit professor had pulled her aside and asked her if anything was wrong, and that was something she had to correct. She just had to learn how to concentrate with this new distraction in her life.

When she came out of class, she was a bit surprised to find two huge panthers standing in the hallway. They were watching the students leave, but when Jessie came out, one of them approached her. "Miss Williams?" he called.

"Uh, yes, that's me," she replied uncertainly. Who were these two, and what did they want? Were they cops? They were certainly dressed up like they were official, with their black suits.

"We work for Miss Vilenne Vulpan," he told her. "She's downstairs, and would like to give you a ride."

"Really? She's here? How did she know?"

"When Miss Vulpan wants to know something, it's our job to find out," the panther told her right up front and evenly.

"Oh."

"Follow us, please."

She followed the two panthers downstairs, and to a teacher's parking lot that was right beside the building. Jessie stopped in surprise when she saw a limo sitting in the parking lot! "You shouldn't be surprised, Miss Williams,” the other panther told her with an amused tone. “Miss Vulpan is wealthy.”

She laughed. “Well, after spending time with Kit, I guess I didn’t expect it.”

One of the panthers went ahead and opened the door of the limo, and Vilenne Vulpan stepped out. She was actually rather short, a few inches shorter than Jessie, but she looked almost regal. She had a calm, cool expression, and was wearing sunglasses. Her gray skirt and blazer were made of silk, and she wore a conservative dress shirt beneath her blazer. She was short, but she was also slender and sleek, with curvy hips and a slightly smaller than average bust. Jessie came up to her, and the fox offered her paw. “It’s nice to meet you, Jessie,” she said with a slight smile. “I’ve been looking forward to it.”

“It’s nice to meet you too, Vil,” she said, taking her paw. Jessie was a bit surprised when the short fox pulled her into an embrace.

“I think I’d rather have a hug than a handshake. You are dating my brother, after all,” she laughed. “Now please, get in, get in! We have a lot to talk about outside of Kit’s earshot.”

Jessie had never been in a limo before. It was huge! There was room for eight furs back there, in its facing seats, and there was a TV set into the side of the limo. It was clearly a rental, but it was meticulously clean and very snazzy. Vil seated herself by the door, and put Jessie in the seat facing her, so they could see each other while talking. “Now, pardon me dropping in on you like this,” she started. “I finished what I was doing faster than I expected, so I had Stav track you down so I could pick you up.

“No, that’s alright,” she assured her, feeling a little nervous.

“You’re not quite sure what to expect, do you?” Vil asked, leaning back and putting a finger to her muzzle, then she winked.

“Well, no, not really.”

“I’m the same femme you talked to on the phone last night,” she grinned.

“Yeah, but it didn’t really hit me that you’re you until just now. The limo,” she said.

She laughed. “Well, I’m not like my brother. I like the little perks that comes with money,” she winked. “So...you’re going out with Kit. First thing, honey, thank you. He’s totally crazy about you, and you’ve given him the first happiness he’s had probably since he was eight.”

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled, and she looked away shyly. “He’s a wonderful male,” she said. “I love him, Vil. I know I’ve only known him for two weeks, but I love him.”

“Ooh, really?” she asked eagerly, sitting on the edge of her seat. “And what makes you think that?”

“I don’t have to think it,” she replied. “I just...know.”

“Well, far be it from me to doubt something you believe in your heart,” she said with a mysterious smile. “How do you think he feels about you?”

“I know he loves me.”

“You’re sure?”

“I’m positive.”

“Hmm. What do you think he’s going to do?”

“Marry me,” she said, looking directly into Vil’s eyes.

“There’s a lot of baggage that comes with a ring in this family, honey,” Vil said seriously. “That’s one of the things that I’m here to talk to you about.”

“Kit told me all about it, Vil, and it doesn’t worry me at all,” she said calmly. “I know that his family will hate me, and that since they’re rich, they might even try to break us up. But I’ve found the fox I’m going to marry, and I’ll dig these in and I won’t let go,” she said, holding up her paws and extending her claws.

Vil laughed. “Kit might not appreciate that.”

Her face poofed out a little. “He’s already complained a little,” she admitted. “Vil, I slept with him last night. I think you deserve to know.”

“Really!?” Vil gasped, then she laughed. “Good for you! I’m happy for you!” She looked at Jessie’s claws, she laughed even harder. “Oh my, did you stripe him?”

“Not where anyone can see,” she said demurely.

“I think I might have to send him a monthly shipment of Neosporin,” Vil mused, which made Jessie’s tail frizz out. “So, was it good?”

“That’s a strange question for a sister to ask.”

“He may be my brother, but he’s also my best friend,” Vil told her evenly. “Call it curiosity. You’ll find that we foxes are just as curious as cats, and we don’t like to have that curiosity denied. That’s why Kit’s in a good job where his curiosity is a job asset,” she grinned.

“Well, he was my first,” she admitted with a bit of a ruffle. “So it’s not like I can compare it with anyone. But it was wonderful.”

Vil gave her a curious look.

“What?”

“You were a virgin? And you’re that pretty? Good God, femme, did your mother keep you in a box in the basement until you graduated from high school?”

Jessie erupted into helpless laughter. “Something like that,” she admitted. “My mom kept me away from males. She’s an ultra-traditionalist who thinks I shouldn’t even date until after I’m married.”

“And that’s why you went to school far, far away,” Vil mused.

“I see you see to the heart of the matter,” Jessie said with a small smile.

“Alright, so, where are we going?” Vil asked. “We can’t sit here in the parking lot. No doubt we’re attracting attention.”

“Uh, could you drive me home so I can drop off my backpack?”

“Certainly. Marcus, take us to her sorority house.”

“Yes, madam,” the panther behind the wheel replied.

“It’s—“

“He knows where it is, honey,” Vil cut her off. “And that’s something that you’d better get used to, pretty quick. I know a lot more about you than you’d expect. When Kit told me about you, I got curious, and I looked you up. Does that bother you?”

“Well, it’s surprising. And a little disturbing.”

“Yes. And that’s something that the others will do when they find out that Kit’s dating you. So, I had Marcus dig to find anything about you they might try to latch onto. And luckily, he couldn’t find anything. Thank that mother of yours for keeping you as clean as a saint, honey. You’re an angel, and that takes away one angle of attack that my uncles might try to use if they go after Kit.”

Jessie frowned. The way she said it...it was as casual as if she were talking about mowing the lawn. Were the lives of normal people really nothing but something to be used to her family?

“But that’s the other reason I’m here, honey,” she said, reaching over and patting Jessie’s knee. “I promised Kit that I would keep his family off his back if he pursued you. I’m here early to talk to you to make you that same promise. I swear to you, Jessie, that I will do everything in my power to keep Kit’s family out of your life. Well, except for me, of course,” she said with a grin.

“I, that’s very nice of you, Vil.”

“Kit’s my little brother, but ever since mom died, I’ve felt more like his mother than his sister,” she told her. “Kit took it really hard, and it didn’t help that our father all but abandoned us after Mom died. Dad took it even harder than Kit did. I guess that most of what happened between them all goes back to that,” she sighed. “I think it would have been much different if Mom had lived. Anyway, Kit’s had a very rough time of it, honey. I’ve done what I can to make it as easy as possible, but I have to be careful, and Kit’s very independent. He doesn’t like it when I meddle. If he’s found happiness with you, you’ll find me to be the strongest ally you’ve ever had. I’d do almost anything to make Kit happy, Jessie. I owe it to him at the very least,

I want to at the very most. If you ever need anything, and I mean anything, I want you to call me. If you ever just want to talk, hey, call me.”

“I will, I promise,” Jessie assured her.

“I think I’m going to like you, Jessie. You’re not just good for my brother, you’re also a sweet femme that’s fun to talk to.” Her smile faded. “Now, as to that other thing. Just because my family knows I’ll come at them like a pissed off bitch if they interfere with Kit, that doesn’t mean that they might not try behind my back. That’s where you come in. Hon, Kit will never tell me if his uncles start trying to interfere. He’d try to deal with it himself, and keep me out of it to prevent me from having any issues with the rest of the family. But you will tell me. If you notice anything unusual, people taking pictures, cars that seem to hang around, I want you to call me. If anyone ever contacts you with strange messages or you get any threatening letters, call me, and save those letters. If any of your sorority sisters or friends see anything unusual, you need to tell them to tell you about it, and if it happens, call me. I can’t step on the family if I don’t know they’re up to something.”

Jessie nodded. “I will.”

She pulled a piece of paper from her pocket and handed it to her. “Here. There are two numbers there. The first one is the number to my personal cell phone. That’s the number you call if you ever need to talk to me. See that second number?”

“Yeah.”

“That’s the number to Vanguard Security. That’s a private security firm. I’ve hired them to keep an eye on things around here, to keep a passive watch over Kit and you and make sure my family doesn’t try anything funny. Now, they are going to keep an eye on you, but do it from a distance. If they do it right, you'll never notice them, and they're not going to be planting cameras in your rooms or anything like that. Their job is to stay deep in the background and serve as a discouragement for my family, because I will tell them that I've put men down here to protect you. They'll just be keeping an eye out for any shenanigans my family might try, but they'll also be available to you in case you ever need them. If you ever feel like you might be in trouble, call 911 for sure, but also call them immediately. They'll come to help you. They're at your service, hon, even if you just don't feel comfortable walking alone across an empty parking lot. They will always come if you call, and they will help you. So if you're nervous about walking across campus after dark, call them. They'll send a guard to escort you."

Jessie laughed. "Kit did say you like to mother," she stated.

"He wasn't lying a bit," she grinned. "You're important to my brother, so you are important to me. And you'll find that I'm the ultra-protective member of this family. Here, I want you to have something."

"What is it?"

"It's a cell phone," she answered, reaching into the bag beside her and pulling out a Motorola phone box. "This phone will work just about anywhere, hon, and don't you worry about the bill. I'll take care of it. The phone's inside, but it's already charged, and I already have mine, Vanguard's, and Kit's cells on its speed dial. Now, if you'll give me your old phone, I'll have Marcus take care of moving everything to this one. You're going to lose your old number, but hey, you can make all the calls you want for free," she said with a wink.

“I don’t have a cell phone, Vil.”

“What? Hon, that’s not good. Thank God I got here, then. A femme should not go around without a phone. It’s not a good idea.”

“I usually don’t go out alone. One of my friends is almost always with me.”

“Well, still, I don’t want you going around without a phone. You matter to me, honey.”

“You’re very thoughtful. Thank you,” she said with a nod, taking the box.

“I was going to give you this phone and have you get rid of your old one, but since you don’t have one this works just as well. Just don’t give that number to your mother,” she winked.

“I appreciate it, but you really don’t have to give me anything, Vil,” she said demurely. “Kit likes to make it on his own, and I can understand why he does. He wants to completely split from his family, to where he doesn’t feel like he needs you to mother him anymore, and he can’t do it as long as he feels you’re gonna be there to bail him out whenever he gets in trouble.”

Vil gave him a serious look. “You really do know my brother,” she said with a sober nod.

“I understand him, Vil. I think he’ll get mad if you’re giving me things, so you might not want to do it.”

“This isn’t a gift, hon. This is a necessity. If you need to call someone and don’t have a phone, you’re gonna be in serious trouble...and I’m not just talking about my family. A college femme should not be going around without a phone. It's just not a good idea."

"Well, thank you again."

"It's just the first of many gifts," she grinned. "I'll tell a secret."

"What?"

"I'm going to buy him a car."

Jessie laughed. "He's going to fight you over that," she told him.

"He can fight all he wants, because he's going to lose," she said with confidence. "I'll explain it to him in simple terms. He'll fight, he'll yell, he'll argue, he might even threaten to not see me again while I'm here, but I'll win. I have the one thing on my side he can't ignore."

"What is that?"

"Logic. My brother is very practical, Jessie."

"I've noticed."

"I'm sure you would have. He'll see that he needs his own car. It's not really a matter up for debate. I'll let him pay me back for it if it makes him happy, but I'm not going to let him go around without a car. If he loses his job, well, he'd have to give that car back his boss is letting him borrow. I'm not going to let him stay in that kind of a position."

"I doubt that'll happen. His boss likes him, he likes his job, and he does good work. All the furs at the magazine are great. I like them a lot. They're almost like a family."

"Does Kit fit in with them?"

“Like a glove,” Jessie giggled.

“So, you have a license, hon?”

She laughed. “Oh, no, you’re not gonna talk me into a car.”

“Why should I talk you into it? This is another of those logic issues here, hon. Given who you are and the kind of family Kit has, I don’t like the idea of you not having a way around if you have an emergency. I don’t want you to be at the mercy of someone else.”

“Well,” she said, putting a finger to her short muzzle in thought. “When you say it like that, it does make a kind of sense. And I’ve never had a car of my own before,” she mused.

“See? That wasn’t hard at all.” She reached into the bag, and produced a pair of two keys. “Here you go. One’s for your new Corolla, the other goes to Kit’s Pathfinder.”

Jessie laughed helplessly. “You already bought it?”

“Like I said, this was an argument I knew I was going to win. Besides, if he wakes up and finds it in the parking lot, what’s he gonna do? Give it away? My brother’s practical, and besides, I think he wouldn’t put up a fuss about it in private,” she grinned.

“You’re terrible!”

“Kit tells me that all the time,” she hummed pleasantly. “It doesn’t change anything, though.”

Jessie just couldn’t help but laugh. She’d known Kit’s sister for all of a half hour, and she’d already proved she was everything Kit said she was. She was friendly, warm, funny, kind, and caring, but she was also very nosy, very protective, and very loose with the idea that she needed to keep her distance from her brother. That she'd go out and buy cars for her brother and his girlfriend because she felt they needed them, without any kind of consultation, said much about Vil's personality...both the good and the bad.

"I hope you don't mind stock," she said. "I took what was on the lot, but I did go for ones with some extras on em, like CD players and car alarms and such. I don't know if you can drive a stick, so I got you an automatic, but Kit's is a standard. He might have to teach you how to drive it. Your car is white, but Kit's Pathfinder is charcoal gray."

Jessie laughed. "Vil, why on earth would I complain about it when someone who gives me a car?" she said. "That's a huge gift!"

"Well, it's nothing to me," she said dismissively. "If you don't like it, let me know. I'll talk to the dealer about letting you trade it for something you do."

"No, no, I'll be just fine. I just hope that Kit won't be too mad, or that you're trying to subvert me or something."

"I'll explain it to him, honey. And don't expect any other gifts," she winked. "I only gave you the phone and the car because I honestly believe that you need them. I won't be giving you anything unless I feel it's a necessity."

They pulled up to the sorority house, and she pointed at a white Corolla sitting at the curb a little ways down. "My, they already delivered it so you could give it a look over. Nice," she noted.

One of the panthers got out and opened the door for them. Vil climbed out, and Jessie followed her, holding her backpack. She was torn between wanting to look at the car and trying to keep her sense of decorum. She was actually thrilled at the idea of getting a new car, but she wasn't sure she wanted to be too excited about it until she saw how Kit felt about it. She might have to give it up. She wouldn't keep it if it bothered him that much, she knew how he felt about how his sister meddled.

She'd hold her excitement. She had to talk to Kit first and see if she could keep it.

“Want to come in? My sorority sisters are curious about you. They know about Kit.”

“Sure, I can do that,” she said.

There were only five femmes home when the panthers escorted Vil and Jessie inside. They stood by the door while Jessie introduced Vil around, then she ran up and dropped off her backpack while Vil chatted with the femmes in the living room.

“What's it like running a big company?” Sandy asked excitedly.

“Lots and lots of paperwork,” Vil laughed. “And you don't get much free time. A lot of people depend on me to keep the company profitable for their jobs and their livelihood, and it's been getting harder and harder with so many jobs going overseas.”

“You won't do the same?”

“We can't,” she answered. “We have naval contracts, and those demand that the ships be constructed inside the United States. It's just a good thing that my grandfather was visionary when it came to business and branched us out so we have companies that produce everything we need to build ships. That keeps our costs low and keeps us very competitive, because we can build them cheaper than anyone else in America, but produce the best quality possible for ships that might enter combat. Trust me, femmes, the shipyard considers quality to be the most important product,” she said proudly.

“Does being so young and a femme cause any problems?” Sam asked.

Vil laughed. “Oh, yes. I’m called ‘the baby’ by others in my circle, but most people in business call me the Ice Queen,” she winked. “Because when it comes to business, I’m a cold bitch. And I’m proud of it.”

That produced quite a bit of giggling. “My major is business. What do you think I should look into doing when I graduate?” Charlotte asked.

“Tech,” she answered instantly. “If I were you, I’d either get on board a tech sector company or start your own. Or, you can send me your resume when you graduate, and I’ll see if you’re Vulpan material,” she winked. “But I’m very picky about who I hire, and I have a high standard. If you work for me, you will work. But I’ll take good care of you in return.”

“I’ll have to do that.”

“Well, ladies, I’m afraid I don’t have time to hang around. I have to go drop in on my brother,” she grinned.

“Well, say hi for us,” Sandy said. “We like Kit. He’s a sweet male.”

“He is at that,” Vil agreed with a nod.

As they drove to the magazine, Vil seemed a little preoccupied, but she had this strange smile on her face. When the limo stopped outside and one of the panthers opened the door for them, she gave Jessie a smug look.

“Now watch and learn how to handle my brother,” she told her.

Jessie broke into a fit of giggling.

Jessie introduced Vil to Marty first, and all work in the office ground to a halt when Vil came back to the main office. Kit came out of his office and hugged his sister, and Jessie watched as she worked across the room, shaking paws, smiling gently, and being very gracious and feminine. She followed the siblings back to Kit's office after the introductions, and watched as Vil took something out of the bag and handed it him. "What is this?" he asked.

"The keys to your new car," she stated bluntly.

"Oh, hell no," he said immediately, pushing them back at her.

"No," she said strongly, pushing them back. "Listen to me, Kit. You need this car. I can't have you going around in your boss' car. If he needs it back, then you're going to be walking. And my brother is not going to walk."

"There's nothing wrong with my feet."

"That might be true, but—"

"There's no—"

"Listen," she snapped, putting her paws down on the arms of his old chair and getting nose to nose with him. "I know very well that you can walk, and I know very well that you'd rather walk than taking any charity, especially from me. But this isn't about you. This is about what's necessary. If you have an accident, what are you going to do, walk to the hospital?"

"I'll call—"

“Well, I’m sure that Jessie is going to love taking a bus when you go out on dates.”

He looked a little less sure of himself now.

“And what happens if she needs to go somewhere? Do you ask one of her roommates to take her, or do you take her yourself?”

Jessie almost giggled. Vil was sneaky! She was going to browbeat him into taking the car before telling him she bought one for her too, and use his need to take care of her as the main point of her argument for him taking the car!

“Well—“

“And what do you do when you need to go grocery shopping? Carry them? Buy one of those little carts I see old females toting around that has groceries in them? And let’s look at the most important thing. If something happens, if you or Jessie has an emergency, you need a way to get around quickly. No matter how normal you want to be, you do not live in what one might call normal circumstances. Not so long as you carry the name Vulpan. You need a car. There’s no two ways about it. Now, you can either scrape and save and scrimp and buy some used piece of junk that might conk out on you after two months, or you accept that I’m right, you’re just being stubborn, and take what I’ve given you because you need it.”

He was silent a long moment. “I don’t like it. How am I ever going to make it on my own if you’re always doing stuff like this, Vil?”

“I’m only doing what I think needs to be done,” she told him archly, poking her finger in his chest. “If you’ll notice, I didn’t stuff a check in your pocket. I bought you a car. I bought you something you need, and no amount of whining about it is going to change that fact. I bought you your laptop because you needed it. I gave you that phone because you needed it. And now I'm giving you a car, because you need it. But no matter how much you whine, argue, complain, bitch, or moan, at the end of the day you will take that car, Kit. I feel you need that car for your own safety, and I'm not going to back down. So take these keys. Because if you don't, I'll just wear you down until you give in, and you know I'll do it. You talk brave over the phone, little bro, but when you're face to face with me, you know you won't win."

He glared at her, then he sighed and gave a rueful little laugh. "I take it you're not going to give in?"

"I'll clear my calendar," she threatened in a frosty voice.

He was silent a long moment. "Alright," he declared in a growl, but he did reach out and take the keys. He looked at them. "Uh, Vil. These keys aren't the same."

"That's right. The other key is to Jessie's car," she winked.

Kit gaped at her. "You sneaky bitch!" he said hotly.

Vil laughed. "You just got boonswoggled, little bro," she grinned.

"Uh, Kit, about the car. I can give it back," Jessie offered.

"No," Kit said. "What goes on between me and my sister is between us. But if she gave you a car, and you want to keep it, love, then I'd never step on your happiness. Never feel you have to ask me for permission for anything. You know how I feel. You know me. I know you'd never go too far, because I trust you. But Vil's right. If you have an emergency, you may need a car. And I sure as hell would rather you have it and not need it, than have you need it and not have it.”

“Damn right,” Vil said adamantly. She snapped open her phone. “I’ll find out where it is. They should have delivered it by now.”

“What kind of car is it?”

“I got you a Pathfinder,” she told him. “It’s a stick, I know you hate automatics. I felt you might need something that can carry cargo. I bought Jessie a Corolla. It’s the perfect car for a student. It’s small and gets great gas mileage. Hello, this is Vilenne Vulpan. I want to speak to Steve Cruthers.” She tapped her foot. “Yes, this is Vilenne Vulpan. Has my Pathfinder been delivered? Where? I didn’t see it when we pulled up. Ah, very good. Thank you, Mister Cruthers. Good evening.” She closed the phone. “It should be parked just around the corner from the front door,” she told him. “Let’s go make sure it’s there.”

They followed Vil and her panther escorts out and around the corner, and there it sat. It was a charcoal gray Pathfinder, brand new, still with the stickers on the window. “There it is,” she said with a nod. “I gave you a month of insurance, baby bro, it came with the car. So’s the first year of taxes.”

“It’s in my name?”

“Yeah. I know all your vitals, so I had it put in your name.”

“Alright,” he said as they reached it. He opened it and looked inside. “How much did it cost you?”

“Some number between one and one billion,” she said dryly in reply.

“Sis,” he said threateningly.

“I’m not budging, bro,” she stated bluntly. “After the hell the family put you through, the least I can do for you is buy you something you need. Take it and be happy, you little ingrate,” she said with a challenging grin.

“Vil,” he sighed.

“Hey, don’t piss on my parade, baby bro,” she told him. “You’ve never let me do something for you like this. Don’t make me upset.”

“Alright, alright,” he sighed. “Thank you for getting me a car, sis. I’m not too happy about it at this moment, but I’m sure it’ll grow on me.”

She laughed. “See, that wasn’t so hard,” she grinned. “But don’t worry, bro. I know you want to make it on your own, so I’ll back off. I only bought you this because you need it. No more, no less.”

He came up and kissed her on the cheek. “And for that much, Vil, thank you.”

“Hey, I understand, baby bro, no matter what you think,” she winked. “Now let’s go back in. Lock up your new toy,” she reminded.

Jessie found herself being pulled along with Vil as Kit locked his new car. “That’s how you deal with him, hon,” she whispered with a conspiratorial grin. “Kit can be stubborn, so you have to nail him before he can set his feet. He’s more amenable to being swayed before you start arguing with him,” she explained. “As he argues, he rationalizes his points and gets more and more stubborn. Never let him do that. If you do, you won’t move him. Get in his face immediately and throw everything you have at him. Make your entire argument and don’t allow him to argue back. He may love you, but he still has his manners and he won’t interrupt you.

He thinks that it's rude, and he'd never be rude to someone he loves. Use that against him."

Jessie giggled. "You're a bad femme, Vil," she said with a grin.

"I know my brother, hon," she said sagely. "As long as you make sense, he'll listen to you. He's practical, so if you prove you're right, he'll change his mind. It just takes being a little dirty to get him to do it."

Jessie laughed. "Mean vixen."

"I'm not called the Ice Queen for nothing, kitty," she grinned.

They went back inside and spent over an hour with Kit's co-workers. She met with them and sat around the big center table and talked, and laughed, and got to know them. Jessie saw that Vil had a powerful effect on people, and not because she was rich and powerful. She was warm and personable, and she was very...affable. Jessie wasn't quite sure why they called her the Ice Queen when what she'd seen of her was very charming and charismatic...but then again, the way she'd browbeat her brother into taking the car was rather ruthless. Barry took Vil back to Rick's office for a few minutes, probably to interview her like he mentioned yesterday, and Kit went back to his office to finish up some work. Jessie followed him in, and sat down on a stool that he'd put in the office for visitors. A chair wouldn't fit in the cramped space. "Kit?"

"Yeah love?" he asked as he picked up a folder.

"Do you really mind about the cars?"

"I can understand Vil's argument, love, but how can I ever prove to myself that I can make it if she keeps holding my hand?" he asked simply. "But to answer your question, no, love, I don't really mind. Vil was right. I need a car, and I'd be in a world of hurt if I wrecked Rick's car. Not only would I not have a car, I'd have to pay him for the damages, and that'd be a major problem for me. And I'll be honest here, Jess. I'm thrilled she gave you a car. It shows she's not just thinking about me."

"Well, now I can come over whenever I want," she said, leaning in and nuzzling him.

He reached over and put his paw on her cheek. "I'll have a key made for you. And I notice that Vil already thought of that."

"How?"

"She gave me a key to your car."

"She gave me a key to yours," Jessie giggled. "Can you teach me to drive a stick?"

"Oh, my poor clutch," he lamented. "I'll have to apologize to it in advance. Ow!" he sounded when she swatted him on the back of the head.

"I have to go, I have a meeting," Vil called from the hallway. "Come on, Jessie. I'll give you a ride."

"Do you mind, Kit? I'd like to go check out the car," she said with building excitement.

"Go have fun," he smiled. "We still having dinner, Vil?"

"You bet. I'll meet you at your house after you get off work. Can I have the key?"

"Uh, sure. Think you can swing by somewhere and make a key for Jessie?"

“And one more for me,” Vil said with a sly smile.

“No,” he said bluntly. “You’re not taking a copy of my house key back to Boston. That’s just begging one of our uncles to steal it.”

“If they knew what it was,” she said flippantly.

“I mean it,” Kit said in a dangerous tone.

“Alright, alright,” she sighed. “I won’t make an extra key. Just one for Jessie.”

“Thank you.” He gave her the key to his apartment, and Jessie gave him a kiss goodbye, then filed out with her after saying goodbye to the crew.

“Now then, let’s get you a key. Two, actually.”

“But you said—“

“I never break my word, Jessie,” she said calmly. “I promised him I wouldn’t make an extra key for me. I’m going to have one extra made for him. He should have a spare.”

“Ah, okay.”

“I told you hon, I look out for my baby bro. He sometimes doesn’t think of things like that. It’s one of his faults. But I love him anyway.”

Jessie laughed. “That’s true,” she agreed. “I had to help him buy his stuff for his apartment. He had no clue what to get.”

“He’ll learn,” she said simply. “My bro is smart, hon. He’ll learn, and he’ll be wiser for it. Now, let’s go finish up that meeting. I’ll need you.”

“Huh? Why?”

“I could have Kit’s car put in his name because I know all his vitals, and I can forge his signature,” she winked. “But your car will be in your name, and that means you have to sign some papers at the dealership so they can issue you the title.”

“Oh, okay. I guess I’ll have to get insurance for it.”

“Nope. Insurance is all taken care of. You’ve got a month of insurance through the dealership, but you’ll only need it for all of this weekend. That car is a gift, hon, and that means you never pay a dime for anything but gas. Ever. I’ll have the policy Fed-Exed to you by Tuesday. I’ll take care of the insurance. That car is under warranty, and I’ve also set up an account with them for all maintenance for your car. If it ever breaks down, call the dealership. They’ll fix it for free. I also want you to take it there for everything you do to a car, hon. Oil changes, tune-ups, everything. Take it back to the dealership, and it’s free. They’ll take good care of you, or I’ll come back down here, buy their dealership, then close it.”

Jessie laughed, but she saw the look on Vil’s face. “You’re serious!”

“You bet your tail I’m serious,” she said bluntly. “I made it abundantly clear to them that you are very special to me, and I don’t take kindly to people trying to cheat me in a business deal. If they ever try to charge you a dime, you call me, and I’ll eat them for breakfast.”

“Wow, now I know why they call you the Ice Queen.”

Vil laughed. “As long as you do what you promise to do, I’m as sweet as honey, Jessie. But cross me, and you’ll find out how much of a bitch I can be.”

Jessie giggled. “I won’t cross you, I promise.”

“You’re my bro’s girlfriend, hon. You can cross me,” she winked.

They went to an auto dealership called Tucker’s that was just off I-35, and Jessie and Vil were shown into the office of the owner himself. There, as the owner, an antlered buck, gushed all over Vil, Jessie signed the papers for the car. “Now, Miss Williams, Miss Vulpan has set up a special agreement with us over your car. Just bring it to us for everything, and you will be taken care of, free of charge.”

Jessie listened as the owner of the dealership explained everything that would happen in detail, about her license plates, her temporary insurance, and the special arrangement that Vil had set up. She received his personal card, and he told her to call him direct if she ever had any complaints or problems with anyone at the dealership. “Now remember to take your U.T. ID card with you when you go to pick up the license plates. With that, you don’t have to change your license over to Texas.”

“My license is already Texas.”

“Ah, well, then you have nothing to worry about,” he chuckled.

“Thank you, thank you very much,” Jessie said, a little overwhelmed. “I really appreciate it.”

“It’s no problem at all, Miss Williams. Remember, put those papers in your glove compartment as soon as you get back to your car.”

“I will.”

Vil had her panther driver take them first to get a key made for Jessie for Kit’s apartment, then he took them back to her house. She gave Jessie a hug inside the limo. “Now go play with your car,” she grinned. “I’m not going to pick you up, hon. Just drive over to Kit's apartment and wait for us there."

"I can't thank you enough, Vil."

"Thank me? For something you need? It's not a bother, hon. It's a requirement. You have those keys, Stav?"

"Right here, madam," the panther said from the open door, holding up two keys.

"Take those, and give one to Kit, hon. Now go charge up that phone, and carry it with you at all times. And enjoy your car."

"Thank you, Vil!" she said happily. The panther opened the door for her, and she took the box holding the phone and all its equipment and rushed towards the door.

It was the last thing she ever expected...Vil had given her a car!

And what was almost as important to her...Kit had given her a key to his apartment.

Oh, the possibilities....

Chapter 6

Vil was as good as her word, which was par for course for her.

She'd bought him and Jessie new cars, she'd given Jessie a phone because she needed one, and not a single thing more.

She really did understand. She knew he wanted to make it on his own, prove both to his family and to himself that he could survive, even prosper, without the family money and the family name. She loved to mother him and to meddle, but she knew how important it was to him. She would supply him with what she felt he had to have as a matter of safety, but nothing more.

Dinner on Friday was at the Double J Steakhouse. Vil had fallen in love with their steaks, so they went back there so she could indulge herself. Kit watched Jessie most of the dinner, who seemed almost unable to sit still because of the wonderful gift that Vil had given to her. He spent most of the dinner, and the time after, catching up with Vil, and listening as Vil and Jessie got to know each other better.

Jessie was also good to her word. There was tomorrow. When Vil left his apartment, she remained. And she spent the night.

That was why it was so great she had her own key to the apartment and her own car. Kit had to work on Saturday, so he just left her at his apartment, and headed in when she decided to go back to sleep after he got up. She'd lock up and drive home on her own.

Saturday, Vil took them to a Broadway show playing in Austin, then Kit took them to a bar to catch a local band that Lilly said was really good.

And Jessie stayed the night on Saturday.

Sunday, Vilenne and Jessie just hung out with him in his apartment. Jessie seemed totally amazed that Vil loved to play X-Box, and what was more, she totally whipped him in the games they played. Vil certainly made all sorts of comments about his apartment and how slapdash it appeared, but she didn't offer to buy him any furniture. It was a fun day for him, having the chance to just spend a day with his sister and his girlfriend without any kind of activities or pressures. They was just being themselves.

Sunday night, they said their goodbyes. Vil was leaving first thing in the morning, and she wasn't going to roust him to see him tomorrow. She had to get back to Boston. Besides, she confided to him privately, she knew that Kit and Jessie only had one day off a week together, and Vil had taken it from them. Monday was a school holiday, so Monday was for them, not for Vil to interfere.

God, he loved that sister of his.

After Vil kissed them goodbye, they watched from the doorway as she was driven off in her limo. Kit leaned against the doorway as Jessie waved, then he reached out and took her paw. She looked back at him and smiled. "Well, hello there," she told him with a teasing smile. "Think I can stay over tonight?"

He laughed. "Do you have to ask?" They went back inside, and sat down on the couch and snuggled in contented silence, as he listened to her purr. "Haven't you missed like four calls from your mother?"

“Yes, I have,” she answered. “I’m doing it on purpose.”

“Why?”

“So I can maybe send her to the hospital when I tell her the truth.”

Kit laughed. “Don’t be mean to your mother.”

“Momzilla? She deserves it,” Jessie said with a snort. “She’ll have a cow when she finally gets me on the phone, you mark my words.”

“And what will you tell her?”

“The truth. That I’ve met a male,” she answered simply. “That we’ve been going out. And if she asks if I’ve had sex with you, I won’t deny it.”

Kit laughed. “She’ll have a stroke.”

“She’ll threaten to cut me off,” she said. “My parents are paying my tuition, and they send me money so I don’t have to work. Mark me, she’ll threaten to cut me off and make me come home. When she does that, I’ll threaten to go get a job as a stripper to pay for tuition.”

Kit’s ribs started to ache. “Oh, God, pretty kitty, you’re brutal!”

“Oh, it has a purpose, my handsome fox,” she said, looking at him with a grin, then she laid down with her head in his lap, looking up at him. “I want her to see the worst that can happen...at least in her point of view. Once she chews on that for a while, I’ll offer to bring you home to meet her.”

“Oh, so the purpose is to get me killed and buried in a shallow grave,” he teased.

“No, the purpose is to make her think there’s a consequence if she decides to go on the warpath without even trying to be civil to you,” she explained patiently. “I think my folks will like you, Kit, if they just give you a chance. I’ll have to step on my mother to make her give you that chance.”

“And all this time I thought you were innocent,” he laughed.

“You corrupted me,” she winked. “And I know my mother. If I don’t put a leash on her, she’ll instantly hate you, and she won’t ever let go of it, even when we get married. You won’t be my husband, you’ll be the evil male that destroyed my innocence and stole me away from her family.”

“Good God, you’re serious?”

“As a doctor,” she affirmed. “My mom is almost fanatical. She thinks that she will pick out my husband, so she’s sure he’s ‘right for me,’” she said, making ditto motions with both paws. “When he’ll really just be right for her.”

“I can’t believe she’d do that.”

“It’s more or less how she got married,” she sighed. “Though in their case, it worked out. Mom and Dad really do love each other. So Mom thinks that if it worked for her and Dad, it’ll work for her daughters.” She grunted. “Sometimes I wish I was born a male. Ben doesn’t have to put up with Momzilla like we do. She’s really nosy about his girlfriends, but she doesn’t actively try to stop him from meeting femmes like she tries to keep me and Jenny from meeting males.”

“Oh hell no,” Kit said immediately. “Don’t ever say that again.”

“Say what again?”

“That you wish you were male.”

She laughed. “I’ll never say it again, I promise,” she said with a teasing grin, reaching up and patting him on the chest. “Anyway, how would you feel about a trip to Cincinnati over Thanksgiving?”

“Hmm. Well, I’ll have to talk to Rick about it. It’ll all depend on that. But, if I can find the time off, sure. I’m willing to face Momzilla. You know I can’t say no to you, my pretty kitty.”

“Well, it’s going to be important, my handsome fox. Even if you can only swing a two day trip. We’ll have to do it.”

“Now that I think we can do. I can always borrow the money from Vil for some airline tickets, and we can fly up on Sunday and fly back on Monday.”

“Well, that would be you. My folks always have me fly back for Thanksgiving. I’ll be there the whole break. They usually make me stay for winter break too, but I’m going to stay here and just fly back on Christmas. Would you like to come for Christmas too? I don’t think you’ll be going to Boston.”

“No, I won’t be,” he assured her. “And we can always drive up for Christmas. It’s cheaper than flying.”

“Hmm, eighteen hours in a car with you? However will I stand it,” she said with a teasing smile.

“I’m sure you’ll find a way to tolerate it,” he said dryly.

She laughed. “So, you’re okay with it?”

“You told me that facing Momzilla was a condition for marriage. So, let’s get that out of the way.”

Her eyes softened. “What a sweet thing to say,” she said in a purring voice.

“I’m just hoping I’m still going in the right direction to hear the answer I want to hear,” he teased, tapping her on the nose.

She gave him a sultry look. “Well, your chances are beginning to slide. I think it’s because you’re ignoring some of my demands,” she told him.

“Oh, I’ll have to do something about that, I suppose.”

The good mood didn’t last much into Monday, though. Jessie stayed over again on Sunday night, and at least that part was quite nice and enjoyable. Having her around the house made him feel very happy, and not just because he loved to look at her and to touch her...it was just because she was there. She cooked breakfast, he washed up what dishes they had, then they went to go buy some real dishes and silverware. She picked them out, going for the cheapest sets that didn’t look terrible.

It was in the checkout line that the day started to go south.

“Oh. My. God,” Jessie gasped, blushing so hard almost all the fur on her entire body was ruffled, and her tail looked like a pipe cleaner.

He looked at her. She’d pulled a copy of the National Enquirer out of the rack by the register and was leafing through it as the bear at the checkout counter rang up his purchase.

“What?” he asked, looking at her. She turned and held out the paper, opened to an inside page, where there were many pictures of various furs, most of them clearly taken from a distance or in poor quality, paparazzi photographs of unsuspecting celebrities.

There, in a small picture just under George Clooney, was Kit and Jessie, kissing outside her sorority house. She was dressed in the clothes she wore from their first date, when he took her to the park. God damn it! Someone must have followed them, taken pictures, and sold them to the tabloids!

There was a story as well, a short little paragraph mixed in with other such small bits of dirt on other people whose pictures appeared on the page along with theirs:

Kitstrom Vulpan III, rebel of the Vulpan family, has been spotted over six months after he nearly started a fight during the funeral of his father, Kitstrom Vulpan Junior. The details of what happened during the funeral are still secret, but whatever the circumstances were, they caused the renegade Vulpan to disappear after the funeral.

Further attempts to identify the unknown femme kissing him have been met with resistance from the Vulpan family, who aggressively deny any knowledge of their rebel son and any relationship he might have with the femme.

He gave her a stricken look. “Jessie, I’m sorry—“

“It’s okay, it’s okay,” she told him. “When I told you I wasn’t afraid of your family, I knew this might happen. I knew this might happen, Kit. Your family is famous, my handsome fox, and no matter how much we try to run away from it, it won’t change. I just wish they could have gotten a more, well, dignified picture. Not one with me hanging all over you like a wanton tramp. If my mother sees that picture, she might have a heart attack.” She gave him a slight smile. “Let’s buy this. We can cut the picture out and put it in a scrapbook.”

“Well, my pretty kitty, the cat’s out of the bag now,” he said in a grim tone as he paid for the dishes and the silverware, and started pushing the cart out. He noticed that the bear went immediately to another copy of the magazine that Jessie had bought. “There’s no doubt that my family knows by now. They keep an eye on the tabloids.”

“Let them know,” she breathed in his ear. “I’m ready for them. But the question is, are you ready for my family?”

He chuckled. “I think I can handle it.”

“Well, I guess this is one of the things Vil thought might happen when she arranged for those security people.”

“Excuse me?”

“Vil told me she hired a security company, uh, Vanguard I think it’s called, to kinda lurk in the background in case your family starts trouble for us,” she explained. “She said they weren’t supposed to follow us around or anything like that, but they are supposed to be here to play defense in case your family does anything. I guess they’d probably go after paparazzi too, if we told her they’re harassing us. She also told me if I call them, they’ll come help me if I ever feel afraid or anything. Almost like having my little brother Ben around to make me feel safe. I guess if I start getting followed around by cameras, I can call them and have them come help me.”

Kit turned that over in his mind. It was her meddling, there was no doubt about that, but in this case, he was very glad she decided to take that step. Vil was very protective over him, but she knew he knew how to handle things like that. But Jessie might not, and if she could call security to come help her or chase them away, then that was just fine with him.

He meant it when said that what Vil did for Jessie was just fine with him.

“Well, I’m glad Vil was thinking ahead,” he said honestly, using his keychain remote to unlock the Pathfinder, and opening the back door to put in the new dishes.

The tabloid embarrassed Jessie, but it unnerved him a little bit. He was quiet and contemplative as he drove back to his apartment, and unpacked the new dishes and silverware and decided where to put them while she read the material she was assigned for homework, thinking it over. Just saying that he was ready for his family to know was fine, but he wasn’t quite sure he liked the idea of the public getting in on the act. He was kinda used to tabloids and paparazzi from his time as a Vulpan, and then after, when the story broke he’d been disowned and they circled him like vultures, watching him, waiting for him to crash and burn and being there to take pictures of it all. In a way, he guess that really pissed them off, for Vil had made sure that he didn’t end up in a hospital or in jail, taking care of him when he was unable to take care of himself. The tabloids had a field day with it, but then the story faded into memory as time went on and it became disappointingly clear that Kit Vulpan was not going to become a juicy news story. The only real issues he’d had with the press after his being disowned and getting settled into a new life was when he was hit by the car. That was news, and then it erupted into a scandal for the Vulpan family when the press got wind that Kit had no way to pay for his hospital bills. One of the richest families in America refusing to pay for one of their own after he was nearly killed...the negative press was so damning to the Vulpan reputation that his bastard father had relented and allowed Vil to pay for his hospital bills. He wouldn't even do it himself, and he made Vil take that money out of her own trust fund.

That, he had to admit, had been about the only time that the public attention had ever really helped.

It almost made him afraid to open the door to his own apartment. Would there be a swarm of cameras out there, waiting for him? How many people in Austin had seen it, and would piece together that he worked at the magazine? Was the magazine going to be harassed? Would his friends get hassled because of him? Was it going to be like Boston all over again, where people would follow him around, peeking in his windows? He hoped not.

But one thing was for sure. He was calling ADT or some other alarm company first thing Tuesday. He wanted some kind of alarm on his apartment.

He sat down on the couch beside her, leaning forward with his elbows on his knees and his paws under his chin, deep in thought. He was a little startled when Jessie put her paw on his shoulder, then pulled him to lean back on the couch, then wormed her way into his arms, nuzzling his neck. "It's going to be fine, my handsome fox," she told him gently. "I'll protect you."

He chuckled. “My well-armed pretty kitty, I’d like to see that,” he teased.

She raised her paw, and showed him those small yet razor-sharp claws, which made him laugh. “I guess I’m just worried. I never really considered the possibility that the tabloids would care about me. It’s not really news that I’m living a normal life, ya know?”

“It is when it’s a Vulpan doing it,” she answered, looking at him with a grin.

“Well, I’m just hoping they’ll forget all about it when they realize that I’m not glamorous. The only thing I have going for me they might want to take pictures of is you, my pretty kitty.”

“Aww, such a sweet thing to say.”

“Well, they’re not taking pictures of me for my looks, that’s for sure,” he noted.

She laughed. “You’re the most handsome male I’ve ever seen, mister,” she told him, poking a finger in his chest. “Don’t sell yourself short.”

“As long as you find me handsome, that’s all that matters,” he told her. “Does it bother you?”

“It does, but it’s worth it,” she answered honestly. “I’m a very private person, my handsome fox. You know that. So the idea that a picture of me trying to taste your tonsils is plastered in a national tabloid is rather disturbing.”

He almost collapsed in helpless laughter.

“But it’s worth the embarrassment, because it means I’m still with you,” she told him when he recovered. “I don’t care about all the press. If that’s baggage I have to lug around as part and parcel of being your girlfriend, then so be it. I’ll do it.”

“I’m honored you’d do so much for me.”

“I think I’ve done a little bit more than that for you,” she said with an arch little smile.

He laughed. “Well, don’t make it sound like it was a chore now.”

She giggled. “Only for you, because of this back,” she teased, reaching behind him and putting both paws on his lower back, over his scars. “I think I’m going to take some massage lessons,” she mused. “So I can fix in the morning what I broke the night before.”

“I won’t complain. I think you do a good job as it is. As of right now, I’m just glad you’re not cutting your initials into me anymore.”

She laughed, her cheeks ruffling out. “I’m getting better.”

“You are at that,” he said in a husky manner, nuzzling her neck. “What do you want for dinner?”

“Why do you care, I’m the one cooking,” she teased. “I should be asking you that.”

“I can cook!” he protested. “You forget, ma’am, I’ve worked in my share of restaurants. I know my way around a kitchen!”

“Only if you don’t have to stock it,” she teased.

“Ya ya ya, bite me,” he shot back. “Ow!” he gasped when she leaned in and did just that, clamping her sharp canines into the side of his neck, just hard enough for him to feel it but not hard enough to draw blood, which made him jump. He laughed helplessly. “So, it’s my turn to cook for you.”

“It won’t be exotic, will it?”

“I can do exotic, and I can do hamburgers,” he chuckled.

“Well, I was thinking of Italian.”

“Ooo, a kitty after my own heart,” he chuckled. “Lasagna?”

“You know how to make lasagna?”

“Didn’t I just offer to make it?”

“So, who makes it for you? Hungry Fur? Banquet? Betty Crocker?”

He laughed. “I do, you goofy kitty,” he answered. “I’ll have to go buy what I need for it, though. Wanna come?”

“I think I need to get this homework going here, love,” she said regretfully. “Do you mind?”

“Of course not. I’ll go get it and get it started. Hold down the fort.”

Much to her surprise, he did know how to cook, because he had a cookbook and he wasn’t afraid to use it. It had been in the books that Vil had sent him, the stuff from his old apartment. Kit wasn’t a gourmet chef by any means, but he could follow the directions in a cookbook, and preparing lasagna actually wasn’t that hard as far as the actual preparation went. The hardest part was layering it into the brand new baking dish he’d had to buy along with the ingredients. “And there we are,” he announced. “Now we just sit here and smell it cooking and not go crazy.”

She laughed. “Oh, I know all about that. I’m the only femme that really knows how to cook at the house, and I get these vultures hanging around the kitchen when I’m doing it,” she told him. “They eat TV dinners while I cook chicken casserole,” she giggled. “I’ve been teaching Sam and Sandy, and they’re getting the hang of it.”

“Your mom teach you?”

“Yeah, but my dad’s actually a better cook than my mom,” she said. “He likes to cook, but mom thinks that’s her job, so he doesn’t get the chance to do it often. Only when mom’s feeling really tired or he wants to pamper her. It’s not a big shock, is it,” she chuckled. “My mom’s been teaching me and Jenny how to cook since we could walk.”

“I didn’t even know what a kitchen looked like until I was twelve,” he told her. “I think the first time I ever cooked anything was when I was sixteen. Suzy had to send her cook over to teach me,” he said distantly, remembering. God did that femme save his butt.

Suzy was Vil’s best friend. She was a fox too, but she wasn’t in the same social class as the Vulpans, so his father had never really considered her as potential for a wife. Suzy’s family was new money, her father Jack had built a fortune in the electronics business. He was the founder of Yankee Bytes, a chain of computer and electronic stores in the northeast. But, she’d had something of a crush on Kit, so she was more than willing to help out. Suzy and Vil had quite a conspiracy going, as Vil funneled money to Suzy to help pay for Kit’s living expenses. Suzy was the femme who had taken Kit’s virginity, back when he was fourteen and she was sixteen...in an office in the Boston Oaks Country Club. To this day, Kit had very erotic memories of overstuffed leather sofas.

“So you were trained?”

“I was trained how not to blow up the kitchen,” he said. “Actually, the main thing Vince taught me was how to read a cookbook and follow the directions.”

“Smart. At least that way you could teach yourself new recipes.”

“Yup. I learned how to cook what I like to eat, and since I’m not too picky, I’ve never worried much about taste.”

“That’s an odd thing for a rich kid to say,” she grinned.

“Oh believe me, rich people food is not anything to brag about,” he snorted. “It has to be exotic to impress, and made to look like the freakin’ Mona Lisa on your plate. I think I ate every possible edible plant and animal on Earth before I was ten, when all I wanted was hot dogs and french fries.”

“Well, you’ve had a chance to try lots of different things.”

“Yeah, but I got to eat it again about five months later,” he told her.

“Ouch.”

“Yeah. Trust me, pretty kitty, when you’re a rich kid, it’s nowhere near as much fun as most people think it is. Sure, you have toys and servants, but most people don’t see the training and the work. Not many seven year olds are put in front of a table for two hours a day to be taught how to eat properly. Trust me, I busted my butt for all the perks that comes with being rich.”

She leaned against the counter. “You’ve seen both worlds, my handsome fox. Answer me honestly. Which world would you rather be in?”

“Honestly? Right here,” he said immediately. “Money is a curse, my pretty kitty. It’s a curse. I saw it consume my father and turn my family against itself. If a lawyer came down here right now and handed me a check for the entire Vulpan fortune, I’d tear it up.”

“But think of what you could do with it.”

“Yeah, and I also think of what it did to my father. I never want to be like that. I never want to be so obsessed with money that I abandon my own children.”

“I’ve never had money,” she mused. “Well, my folks make a good living and I’ve never really gone without, but I’ve never had the money to do anything I wanted.”

“Most people think if they make enough money, they’ll be free,” he told her. “In reality, you just trade one set of legchains for another. I became free when I gave it all up.”

“Well, I’m not going to complain. It brought you to Austin,” she smiled.

“You want to know what real treasure is, my pretty kitty? It’s right here,” he said, putting his paws on her waist. “You’re worth more than my entire family put together, because true treasure is that which you value the most. To some, treasure is money or gold. To me, it’s you.”

Her eyes softened, and she gave him a glorious smile. “You’re such a sweet male,” she said, looping her arms over his shoulders and kissing him.

Kit helped her work through her homework by allowing her to type up an essay on his laptop, then emailing it to her school account. She surfed the internet while waiting for the lasagna to cook, and Kit made a salad to go with it, then sat down on the couch and practiced with the guitar Rick gave him. His guitar books were among the books in the stuff Vil sent him from his apartment, so he had it open before him, practicing the chords as they appeared in the book he'd been using before he graduated. He was terribly rusty, only managing to get about halfway through material he'd already learned before without making a mistake. The only reason he'd managed to play Tears In Heaven without any mistakes was because it was one of his favorite songs, and one of only about five he'd learned by heart.

“I think it’s cool you’re learning that,” Jessie told him from the TV tray and lawn chair that served as his living room computer desk. “I never learned an instrument. Then again, I never really wanted to, to be honest about it. I’m not that good at music, and I was way too shy to ever think of playing in public.”

“You can learn and never play for anyone but yourself,” Kit chuckled. “I’m certainly not learning this to make it as a rock star.”

“Well, cats don’t do well with stringed instruments,” she said with a smile.

He laughed. “Gee, I wonder why,” he said dryly.

The lasagna turned out pretty well...or at least Jessie seemed to enjoy it. Really enjoy it. She was the fastest eater he'd ever seen, but on the other paw, she ate small portions, and there wasn't even an ounce of fat anywhere on her it shouldn't be. She didn't say a word until she was done with both her lasagna and the salad, then she got up and kissed him on the forehead. “That was wonderful,” she told him. “I think I’m going to like this arrangement.”

“What arrangement?”

“A male that can cook food I like to eat when I don’t feel like cooking,” she told him as she washed off her plate.

“I live to serve, my pretty kitty,” he chuckled. “I think there’s a yogurt cup left in the fridge if you want dessert.”

“Now I get to watch you eat,” she laughed.

“I was trained to eat slow,” he shrugged.

“You never had to compete with a brother and a sister,” Jessie giggled. “When there’s two chicken legs and three kids who want it, someone’s gonna miss out. Besides, the last kid at the table usually ended up getting roped into doing the dishes.”

Kit laughed. “Ah, that explains it.”

Jessie’s phone rang. She went over to her purse and dug it out, and Kit went back to his dinner. “She did what?” Jessie demanded. “No, no, it’s ok Danny. Did he leave, or does he—okay. Hello? No, officer, I’m fine,” she said in a calm voice. “I’ve been staying at a friend’s house, that’s all, and I kinda told my friends not to tell her I’ve been out, because I didn’t feel like having an argument.”

Officer? Kit put his fork down and paid attention.

“No sir, it’s okay. My mom is kinda...protective.” She laughed nervously. “Well, that is one way to say it. It’s not a bother, really. Thank you for understanding. Yes, I’ll call her right now. No, I don’t need to talk to Danny—Danielle. Thank you very much sir. I will. Goodbye.” She closed the phone, then actually screamed! “My mother called the cops!” she said fiercely. “Because I haven’t been at home all weekend!”

“Holy cow,” Kit breathed. She wasn’t kidding about her mother, not a bit!

“I need to call her, my handsome fox, and this will not be a pretty call. I should go home.”

“No, you don’t need an audience, and you’ll have one if you do it at the house. Do it here, where you’re alone. I’ll go down to the store and get some things I need. You call me when it’s safe to come back.”

The look she gave him was one of the most profoundly grateful looks he’d ever seen in his life.

“First, my pretty kitty, use my phone. If your parents have caller ID, they’ll have your number. Trade me phones.” She did so, handing him her phone, and he fished his phone out of his pocket and gave it to her.

“Second, don’t scream too loud. I’m not sure how thick the walls are around here. You might be entertaining my next door neighbor.” He kissed her on the cheek. “You’re on my speed-dial hon. Just be strong.”

“I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan,” she told him sincerely.

“And I love you, Jessica Desdemona Williams,” he smiled.

Kit left her to what was clearly going to be a very ugly business. He knew she was going to be terribly upset when she called him, so he first went down to IGE, the closest supermarket, and bought a bottle of red wine, some tissues, and a large box of chocolates and a bouquet of flowers. When she was finished with that ugly business, she was going to be very upset and hurt, and he wanted to minimize her pain as much as possible. After he had everything he needed, he went down to The Pit, since it was only about a mile away, and basicly nursed a single daquiri for over an hour as he waited in grim silence. He didn't have to imagine what might be sizzling over that phone between them, because he'd had his own share of nasty words with his father. There wasn't anything Jessie could think to say to her mother that Kit hadn't screamed at his father. He knew how he'd felt after those shouting matches...angry, infuriated, disrespected, but also very hurt and very vulnerable, feeling like he'd eroded away one of the foundations upon which his life had been set, even if it was a bad one. That was the curse of fights like that with a loved one...driving the dagger into them sank it just as deep into your own heart.

His phone rang. He sighed and opened it. "Pretty kitty?"

"Come home," she said in a small voice, raw and trembling.

"I'll be right there."

He left the chocolates and wine in the car, and went in with the flowers and the tissues. She was standing near the table when he came in, and when she looked at him, it was painfully evident she'd been crying. She ran across the room and collapsed against him, crying uncontrollably. All he could do was wrap his arms around her and hold her close, rocking her back and forth.

It took her a long time to cry herself out. He sat with her on the couch, holding her, stroking her hair, comforting her as she worked through it, until she settled in heavy silence against him, her head buried in his shoulder. She took in a ragged breath. "Thank you," she said in a weak, weary voice. "The flowers were very thoughtful."

"I have some chocolates out in the car," he told her. "And a bottle of wine."

“Getting drunk right now sounds like a great idea,” she said in a breaking voice.

“No, getting drunk is not a good idea right now,” he told her gently yet firmly. “Don’t drink your problems away, pretty kitty. I’ve seen what happens to those who do. It’s a road best never putting a single foot on.” He squeezed her gently. “But, a glass of wine does help take the edge off of it. Would you like one?”

“Please,” she sniffled.

She wiped at her face and took the opportunity to blow her nose while he retrieved the wine and chocolates. He poured her a little more than he’d usually put in a femme’s glass, poured a glass of equal size for himself, and returned to the couch. “Gently now, my pretty kitty,” he said as she reached for it with a trembling paw. Kit watched with a little dismay as she drained nearly half of it with one swallow. She held it close to her mouth, then finished the rest of the glass with a second. Then she put the glass on the coffee table and reached for his. He considered holding it away from her, but the last thing she needed right now was someone else telling her what to do. She was 21, she was an adult. If she wanted to get drunk, he wasn’t going to stop her. He’d just make sure she didn’t hurt herself while inebriated. He let her have it, and watched her empty his glass as well.

Given how much she’d just drank, she’d be in no condition to drive in about ten minutes. She was so light, that alcohol would hit her like a hammer.

“Give me your keys,” he stated immediately.

“They’re in my purse,” she said weakly. “But I’m not going home tonight. I don’t want to be alone.”

“You’re welcome to stay with me any time, my pretty kitty. Any time. Do you feel like talking about it?”

“She said she was going to cut me off,” she told him.

“Did you tell her about us?”

“I did,” she said, gripping his shirt in her paws. “She made me angry, and I just threw it in her face. I even told her we were sleeping together.”

Kit winced. It was one of those fights.

“Why won’t she treat me like an adult?” she asked in a plaintive voice.

Kit sighed. “Sometimes, pretty kitty, you can just never answer some questions. That’s one I don’t think I can answer.”

“I’m afraid, Kit,” she said in a small voice, almost trembling. “If she cuts me off, I might have to go home.”

“Or become a stripper,” he said with dark humor.

She actually laughed a little. “I guess I should go fill out some applications.”

“That’s my kitty,” he told her with a lighter voice. If you make a joke out of it, it doesn’t seem so bad. But don’t you worry about it, love. Your semester’s already paid for, and I won’t let you starve. How’d you like to have a sugar daddy?”

She looked up at him. “Kit, you can’t afford—“

“I can very much afford to feed and take care of my femme,” he told her strongly. “I have almost everything I need now, Jess. From here out, my pay is just for living. I can easily support both of us for the rest of the semester.”

“I can get a job,” she told him, her expression looking less bleak. “I can help.”

“No, you don’t,” he told her. “School is your time, my love. I’ve graduated, let me do the working.”

“But what about next semester? My scholarship doesn’t cover all of my tuition.”

“Let’s worry about next semester when it gets here. So, rest easy, my pretty kitty. If you want to stay here, I’ll do everything in my power to make it happen. Even,” he sighed, “even if I have to call Vil.”

She gave him a wan smile. “You’d do that for me?”

“I’d do anything for you, my love,” he told her immediately and adamantly. “Even if I have to go to Vil.”

She gave out a sigh and put her head on his chest. “Thank you,” she told him. “I know what that means to you.”

“So maybe now you know what you mean to me.”

Her eyes almost seemed to melt. She leaned in and kissed him tenderly. He waved his paw between them when she pulled away. “You’re gonna be lit up in about fifteen minutes, judging from that,” he said with a gentle smile. “I think we’d better get you settled in before you start dancing on the coffee table.”

“I would, for you.”

“Well, maybe some day when I’m not afraid you’ll fall off,” he told her, gathering her up in his arms and standing up.

“Where are we going?”

“Back to the bedroom. I think you need to rest a little bit.”

“I don’t want to be alone.”

“I’ll be right there until you fall asleep. And that’s exactly what you need right now, my sweet, pretty kitty,” he told her, kissing her on the cheek. “A nap does wonders. Things won’t seem quite so bad when you wake up.”

“I don’t want to sleep.”

“Then we’ll lay there.”

Despite her declaration, she didn’t stay awake long. He laid with her in his arms, a calming, reassuring presence, and the emotional exhaustion from the fight, combined with the wine, lulled her into a calming nap. He disengaged himself from her carefully, tucking her in, then he kissed her on the forehead.

He’d had his own share of what she was feeling now. Sleep was always the best prescription.

Back in the living room, he sat down on the couch and blew out his breath. Poor Jessie. But this was a reckoning that he figured was inevitable. Eventually, Jessie and her mother was going to have this argument...Jessie actually told him that it was coming. But Jessie wasn’t as ready for it as she thought, and her mother calling the police to find her had broken the dam of indignation in her and caused her to go off on her mother.

But, things would be alright. Kit had offered her a way out, a way to feel like her mother didn't have her trapped into a situation where she had no control. She'd feel much better, and would engage in her next argument with her mother from a position of strength. The threat of losing not just her power, but her relationship with her daughter should snap her mother right into line. Because if Jessie didn't need her mother, then her mother had better watch her step for fear of driving her daughter away.

His phone started vibrating across the coffee table. He figured it was either Rick, Vil, or Jessie's mother, calling back to continue the argument. He picked it up and read the number on the display. It was out of state and not Massachusetts.

He spent an entire ring debating, then opened the phone. "Hello," he called.

"Who is this?" came a mild male voice.

"My name is Kit Vulpan," he said evenly. "And you must be John Williams. She called you using my phone," he said quickly, before he asked the question that had to be on his mind.

"Ah. Is she available?"

"No. I put her down for a nap. She was very, very upset."

He actually laughed. "I'd never think to hear someone say that about my daughter," he said. "Is she alright?"

"She will be, after some sleep. I don't know what was said, but she was barely coherent when I came back. It took a whole lot of holding and a glass of wine to calm her down."

“Oh dear,” he sighed. “Well, first off, allow me to apologize for visiting another’s problems on your door.”

Kit was a bit surprised. It seemed her father wasn’t anything like her mother.

“But given these, unusual, circumstances, I would ask that you return my daughter to her house at once.”

Nope...spoke too soon.

“She asked to stay, so I’m letting her stay,” Kit said evenly. “She’s twenty-one years old, Mister Williams. She’s an adult. I’m not going to send her packing home like a child because her father said so. It’s her decision to stay, and so she will stay.”

“I would gather to make note that since you will not produce my daughter, that is a claim you cannot make in good faith.”

Ohhh, this one got formal when he was angry. Kit could hear it rippling behind his voice.

“Then I’m afraid you’re going to have to take it on faith. But as soon as she wakes up, I’ll be happy to have her call you.”

“That is unacceptable. She must return home at once.”

“Might I point out, sir, that you’re in no position to make demands. Jessie is asleep, it’s sleep she needs, and I will not send her home. And there’s little you can do about that, so it’s best to simply concede the matter now so we can move on to all those questions I’m sure your wife is hissing at you to relay right now.”

There was a startled silence. “Well, you’re a very perceptive male, I’ll give you that,” he acceded.

“Very well. Now, since I have your attention, let me make things very clear. Jessie is very special to me. I love her. I love her a great deal. And no matter what you or your wife says or does, you are not going to stop us from seeing each other. That’s a point you’d better just take off the table right now.”

“Ohh, little boy, you had better believe that she is going to stop seeing you!” a female voice cut in, probably from another phone.

“Or what? Or you’ll cut off her money and starve her until she comes home? That’s a pretty nasty way to get your way, isn’t it?”

“You have no right—“

“I have every right, madam,” he snapped quickly, cutting her off. “The one that has no right is you. She’s an adult. She is twenty-one years old. She has the right to live her own life, in the manner she pleases.”

“Not while we pay for her college she does not!” the woman said hotly.

“Fine. Cut her off,” Kit said calmly. “I’m not in college, Misses Williams. I graduated six months ago. I already have a job, and I make a comfortable salary. I can easily support her and pay her tuition. If you cut her off, then I will pay for her school and her living expenses. So go ahead and threaten to starve her into obeying you. You’ll find it to be a hollow threat.”

To call it a stunned silence was a gross understatement.

“Perhaps now you start seeing the big picture?” he asked evenly. “I would very carefully consider what you say to her the next time you talk to her, Misses Williams. If you make her too angry, she’ll have nothing to do with you. And she won’t need you.”

The threat of that hung like a heavy blanket over the phone. He could hear two sets of breathing over there, no doubt each of them on a different phone. He heard one of those phones over there hang up, and he wondered a moment which one of them had done so.

“Is she living with you, Mister Vulpan?” the father asked calmly.

“No. She lives at the sorority house. She’s just been coming over during the holiday weekend. My sister was in town, and I wanted them to meet.”

“I see. What do you do?”

“I work for a magazine,” he answered.

“I fail to see how a reporter can afford to pay my daughter through college.”

“Do you happen to have a computer handy, Mister Williams?” he asked. Perhaps it was time to kill two birds with one stone. They deserved to know the truth of him, and that truth would back up his claim quite effectively.

“Why yes.”

“Then go to any search engine and look up my name. Kitstrom Vulpan.”

“And what does this prove?”

“That I can pay your daughter’s way through college,” he said simply. “Let’s make that clear right now.”

There was a brief silence. “Kitstrom...Vulpan,” he hummed aloud, then there was silence.

And silence.

And more silence.

“You cannot possibly be one of those Vulpan!”

“Afraid so,” he said, a little regretfully. “That’s me. Right eye green, half of my left ear missing. If that’s not enough proof, then go to the website of my magazine. Lone star magazine, all one word, dot com. You’ll see a picture of me in the staff section, and there’s a picture of me and Jessie in the photo gallery, so you can see us together and you can’t possibly deny it. Compare those pictures to all those other pictures of me floating around on the internet, then come back and call me a liar. Now, while you’re doing that, let me explain something. See, I’ve been disowned. That’s why I never had my ear fixed. Honestly, I can’t afford it, and I refuse to take any money from my family. But you see, my sister still loves me, and she’ll do me a favor. Her name is Vil. Vilenne Vulpan, the CEO of Vulpan Shipyards. You can look that up while you’re at it,” he said easily, leaning back on the couch. “Now, usually I stay away from my family. We had a very nasty falling out, which is why I’m disowned. But my sister keeps in touch with me, and she owes me a favor. If I asked it of her, she’d pay for Jessie’s college. To Vil, paying two years of tuition at U.T. is little more than petty cash,” he stated, deciding to rub it in a little harder. “I’ll never take a dime from my family, Mister Williams. As far as I’m concerned, all of them but my sister can rot in hell. But where your daughter is concerned, I'll do anything to make her happy. I'll swallow my pride and I'll beg my sister for a favor. I won't take a dime from my sister, Mister Williams, but I'd be more than willing to beg my sister to give Jessie the money to pay for school. And my sister would do it."

He let Jessie's father chew on that for a second. "I'm not a rich man, Mister Williams. I'm what you'd call lower middle class. I have no money from my family, and I don't want it. I broke from them six years ago, when I was sixteen. But, my sister sympathized with me over what happened in my family, so she'll do me this favor. Vil will pay for your daughter's college, and I'll work two jobs if I have to in order to make sure she has the money she needs to live on."

"You'd do all this?"

"In a heartbeat," he said instantly. "I love your daughter, Mister Williams. I'll crawl to hell and back carrying the Rock of Gibraltar for her."

"That is...quite an emphatic declaration."

"It's truth. As soon as I have enough money saved up, I intend to propose to her. That is how seriously I take this, Mister Williams. That is how far I'm willing to go for her. And she fully knows how I feel about her, and I can only hope she loves me even half as much as I love her. And now that you know this, maybe that will help you understand why Jessie got so angry with her mother earlier."

"She's never mentioned any of this," he breathed, mainly to himself.

"And why does that surprise you, Mister Williams? Your wife rides Jessie relentlessly, and Jessie's told me that her mother didn't want her to have anything to do with males. She calls almost every other day to check on her, and if she's not home to answer the phone, your wife has a conniption."

"She's only worried about Jessica."

"There's a big difference between being worried and being obsessed," Kit said bluntly. "If you were still in college, would you like it if your mother called after you every other day, and called the police to find you when you didn't answer the phone?"

"Well, no."

"Then why are you putting your daughter through something you wouldn't tolerate yourself?"

"Well, because she is a very innocent young lady and it's a parent's right to be worried."

"You have to let her go eventually," Kit noted. "She's twenty-one, Mister Williams. She's an adult. She can walk into any bar and order anything she wants. Take it from someone who came from a broken family, Mister Williams, your wife is doing a fantastic job of pushing Jessie away. And if you don't get your wife to back off, you see what's going to happen."

He sighed. "Yes, I can see it," he admitted. "I would never have believed it, but given that I could hear Jessica screaming over the phone, I can see what might happen."

"Pardon my observation, but this fight was inevitable," he said. "Any child would resent what your wife was doing to Jessie."

“I suppose so,” he sighed. “And I must admit, you’re rather surprising, Mister Vulpan, facing down the angry parents of your...girlfriend.”

“Thank you for conceding that point, sir,” he said with sincere respect.

“Please, call me John,” he said, his voice less hostile, more curious and conversational. “What kind of magazine do you work for?”

Kit and Jessie’s father talked for nearly an hour, as he quietly probed Kit’s life to get a better understanding of this male that was courting his daughter. Kit could tell that John was quite intelligent, and wasn’t quite as fanatical as Jessie’s mother. He’d seen to the heart of the matter quickly, and now he was gathering information, most likely to use it against Jessie’s mother. And he reciprocated. He was an English professor tenured at the University of Cincinnati, whose subject of expertise was Renaissance literature, specifically Shakespeare. He enjoyed to cook, and he was also an avid sport shooter, which surprised Kit. He seemed too mild-mannered to talk about guns, and know what he was talking about. But he wasn’t a hunter, he just enjoyed target shooting and skeet shooting. From John, Kit learned more about Jessie’s family. Jessie’s younger sister Jenny was going to Ohio State, majoring in nursing, and her younger brother Ben was still in high school, where he was a football player and would possibly be courted to play football in college on scholarship.

So, that explained all those times Jessie said she’d have Ben come down and beat someone up.

He glanced up and saw Jessie. She was standing in the hallway leading back to the bedrooms, and she looked a little bleary. He held his paw out to her, and she came over and sat down, immediately curling up with him.

“Your daughter is awake now, John,” he said.

She gave him a strangled look.

“It’s alright, my pretty kitty,” he chuckled. “Hold on, sir.” He held the phone out to her.

“Uh, D-Dad?” she said tentatively. “No, I’m alright. I feel a little light-headed, though. No, Kit had wine here, and I drank some to calm down. Kit already took my keys.”

Kit heard the loud voice clearly. “Keys to what?”

“Go ahead and tell him. I already told him who I am,” Kit told her.

She nodded, then looked down towards knees. “Umm, Kit’s sister came to see him this weekend, and, uh, she gave me a car. Yes, Dad, a car. It’s a Corolla. She said it would be good for a student. Yes, I think it was nice of her too. Yes, Dad, I thanked her,” she sighed, and was silent a long moment as Kit heard the mumbled voice of her father. “Yes, Dad, he did,” she finally answered. “I’m not too happy about the idea of him going so far out of his way for me, especially having to crawl back to his family, but I do think it’s sweet of him. Yes, Dad. Yes, Dad,” she said, with a little exasperation. “Honestly? I want to stay here. This is Kit’s home, and I want to be near him. If I have to get a job to help pay my way through school, then that’s what I’ll do.” Her cheeks ruffled. “Well, I feel the same way, Dad. I love him.”

Kit squeezed her a little bit at that declaration, which made her giggle. “Nothing, Kit’s just being a little silly, that’s all.” She sighed. “No, I don’t want to talk to Mom. I’m still mad at her. No, Dad. No, I’ll be fine. Kit will take care of me. He even knows how to cook,” she said in a warm voice. “Dad, I’m going to go. We’ll talk about this tomorrow, okay? Okay. Okay, I’ll tell him. Love you too, Dad. Bye-bye.”

She closed the phone. He took it and put it on the couch beside them, then wrapped both arms around her. “What did he say?”

“That he has your phone number now, so you’d better behave,” she told him.

He chuckled. “Well, I think everything’s gonna work out, my pretty kitty. I laid down the law on your mom.”

“What did you do?”

“I told her who I was, who my family was, then told her that I’d pay to keep you here if she cuts you off, so she’d better start treating you like an adult instead of a little girl, because you wouldn’t be dependent on her anymore. She hung up on me right about then.”

“That’s Mom, alright,” she sighed. “I’m sorry they called you, Kit. You didn’t have to get involved.”

“I didn’t mind at all, Jess. Those are my future in-laws, after all. If I don’t deal with them now, when am I going to start? I’m a big fox now, hon. I can take it.” He gave her a little squeeze. “I wish they had a webcam. I would have paid money when they found out I’m a Vulpan.”

She giggled. “You know, that might actually help,” she said, looking up at him with a little smile. “If anything, Mom can say I landed a rich husband.”

“I told them I was disowned. I told them the truth, hon. They deserve to know.”

“Ah, well, it was a good idea.” She put her head on his shoulder and chest, and sighed. “And it was such a good day, too. You even cooked for me.”

“Any day with you is a good day, my pretty kitty,” he told her gently.

He held her for a long time, time passed in weighty silence. Kit kept pondering how her parents were going to react, how it was all going to play out, but no matter what, he wasn't going to lose her. He'd make sure she stayed in Austin, that she got her degree, even if he had to ask Vil to make it happen. Whatever made her happy.

He was going to marry her, after all. So her happiness was the only thing that mattered to him.

Strange. He was so worried about his own family...the last thing he expected was to run into an issue with hers.

“Kit?”

“Yes, love?”

“I want to make love to you.”

Not a surprise to him. She'd just suffered major emotional turmoil, and maybe she just wanted to feel safe, and secure, and wanted, and loved. “Of course. But if you throw up in the bed, I'm going to rub your nose in it,” he warned.

She laughed. “I don't feel sick, just buzzed.”

“Well, I'm not usually the kind that takes advantage of drunk femmes,” he chuckled. “Will you respect me in the morning?”

“Well, mmmmaybe,” she hummed.

“Enjoy it while you can, love,” he told her. “Cause you’ll have a hangover in the morning.”

“Don’t remind me,” she grunted as they walked, arm in arm, back to the bedroom.

Kit had Jessie stay over all night, and he got to see her at her worst... bent over the toilet, retching her guts out kind of worst. Hair a mess, eyes baggy, breath that would scare away Godzilla kind of worst...but he didn’t mind. He wanted to know all of her, and seeing her at her worst wasn’t that bad at all. Even with her hair a mess and sick, she was still beautiful, and he considered it a privilege to take care of her through it, not a chore.

She was definitely not feeling well in the morning, but it wasn’t a full-blown hangover. She’d drank enough wine to definitely get buzzed, but not falling-down drunk, so the backlash was only moderate. She had a bit of a headache, and felt a little tired and groggy, but not much more.

“You sure you’re alright to drive?” he asked as they came out of the apartment.

“I’m okay, you big worrier,” she told him. “I have to go back to my room and get my early class books, then I’m off to school.”

“Okay then. Tylenol will do wonders for that,” he said as she winced against the light.

“I have some aspirin at home.”

“I’ll call you tonight, pretty kitty. Even despite last night, it was a good weekend.”

She winced. "I'm sorry. I'll make it up to you, I promise."

"You made it up to me before it happened," he said with a sly smile.

She laughed, then put her paw to her head. "Maybe that was your fault, getting me all excited," she said, then her cheeks frizzed and she laughed nervously when Lupe waved to them from the building across the way, going the fifty feet from his apartment to his office. "Want me to cook tonight?"

"As long as you tell your roomies to tell your mom you're with me," he winked. "I don't doubt that she'll be calling tonight."

"Probably," she sighed. "Maybe you can help me do my homework," she said brightly.

He laughed. "We'll see. I charge a stiff fee for homework."

"I might pay it. I definitely need to borrow your laptop. Mine died on me about a week before I met you, and I've kinda been in the lurch since. Mom and Dad were going to send me a new one. I hate sitting in the computer lab to type out my assignments."

"Buy a flash drive today while you're at school," he told her. "That way you can just save everything to your flash and take it to school with you."

"That's a good idea."

Kit was dead on with his prediction. As they were cooking a dinner of leftover lasagna and salad, his phone rang. Jessie picked it up for him, took one look at the number on the screen, and sighed. "Hello," she said, in a not quite enthusiastic voice. “Yes, Mom, I’m at his house. I don’t have a laptop, remember? I need to use a computer to do some homework, and he’s letting me use his so I don’t have to sit in the computer lab.” She handed him the leftover lasagna from the night before, and he put it in the microwave. “What, you were calling him instead of me, or were you just looking for me?” She growled a little in her throat, that strange sound, and he saw her ears lay back momentarily. So, that’s what she looked like when she was angry. “Kit, I’ll talk to her out on the porch,” she told him.

“Take your time,” he told her.

She was out on his porch for about twenty minutes, no doubt as her mother tried to salvage the situation after Kit effectively knocked her legs out from under her. He heated up dinner and set it out, then picked up her phone and called Rick to talk about some of the research he’d been doing that day, and also to go over the cartoon idea he and Jeffrey had been working on, since Rick was out of the office for the latter half of the day and they hadn’t had a chance to talk about it. She came back in as they talked about the strip in a conference call with Jeffrey, and Jessie held the phone out to him. “She wants to talk to you.”

“No, we werent—sorry Rick. Uh, hold on.” He took the phone. “Misses Williams? Please don’t take this the wrong way, but I’m talking to my boss on the other phone right now. Would it be a bother if I called you back? It shouldn’t take more than ten minutes.”

“I—very well. I’ll be waiting for your call.” Her tone was a bit frosty.

“Thank you. Goodbye.” He closed the phone and put Jessie’s phone back to his ear. “Sorry about that.”

“Troubles, son?” Rick asked.

“Nothing major. Jessie’s mother wanted to talk to me. No doubt to give me the third degree to decide if I’m good enough for her daughter.”

Rick laughed. “We can pick this up tomorrow morning, no problem.”

“No, we’re here and we’re almost done with it, let’s get this done,” Kit said. “Anyway, Rick, what do you think?”

“I like the idea of it. Are you going to introduce more characters later?”

“We’re already designing them,” Jeffrey answered. “We’ll start with Jo-jo, Oxnard, and Buck, and we’ll introduce the others as it goes along.”

“And you’re sure you can maintain a storyline?”

“Well, this is going to be half plotted, half stand-alone strips,” Kit answered. “The main plot will evolve around the three main characters, but quite a few stand-alone strips will involve the tertiary characters. Those will be zingers and comedy, while the main plot will be comedy with a story.”

“We were planning on doing two or three strips an issue for the first month to introduce the strip and establish the story, then cut back to one per issue,” Jeffrey added. “If we have room. Marty might kick our asses for cutting into his mailbag space, though.”

“I think we can juggle a little bit of space on page nine for the extra strip,” Rick noted. “We can cut down Barry’s article about the governor’s tour of the campus and bite a couple of letters out of the mailbag and squeak out the room. How many strips have you finished?”

“We have nineteen strips totally done,” Jeffrey said. “Kit did the writing for six more, I just haven’t done the panels yet.”

“You did that many before even bringing it to me?” Rick asked with a laugh.

“Eh, it gives me something to do at home while watching Mythbusters,” Jeffrey laughed.

“And it fills up that empty time I have between assignments,” Kit added.

“Okay, you busy bees. We’ll have a group meeting in the morning so we can get some feedback on the strips. You know, see if furs other than you two think they’re funny and all. If they think the strips’ll fly, we can work ‘em into the next issue while me and Savid have time to make space for ‘em.”

“Sounds like a done deal,” Jeffrey assented.

“Works for me,” Kit agreed.

“Okay, son, the reprieve is over. Time to face the music,” Rick chuckled.

“I’ll bring a bathrobe for you tomorrow, Kit,” Jeffrey sniggered. “Just in case she skins you.”

“Oh please,” Kit snorted. “But thanks for the votes of support,” he added with a sarcastic drawl.

He hung up, and took in a girding breath. “Alright, pretty kitty, dial it. Let’s get this overwith,” he said like a fox about to do war.

And it was war. Hannah Williams did not like him, and her dislike was all over her voice as she asked Kit relentless questions. She grilled him about his family, about his work, about his personal life, even about his past love life. She was almost brutally direct, and wasn't afraid to ask him literally anything. And her questions were definitely slanted, asking him questions like if he'd ever beaten his girlfriends, did they give him venereal diseases, if he did drugs. She kept asking him what bad things he did rather than asking him about his hobbies or his work or how he felt about her daughter. Jessie sat at the laptop and listened to his side of the conversation, but thankfully she didn't hear the ugly questions he was being asked...for he would only reply to those with yes or no.

Interspersed through the questions were the comments. Snide comments, unfriendly comments, where she made denigrating, hostile remarks about him and his life. Kit ignored them, because he wasn't about to take that bait and challenge her over it. She was dying for him to give her an excuse to yell at him, to prove that he was no good for her daughter, but he wasn't stupid enough to walk into that cave. He was polite and respectful over the phone, and he remained just as polite and respectful no matter how disrespectful she was to him.

She kept after him for over an hour, and he kept getting less and less patient with her...which was probably what she wanted. She was badgering him, probably trying to provoke a reaction which she could then use against her daughter...along the lines of "well, he was rude and abusive to me over the phone!" while leaving out the fact that she provoked it with relentless biting comments.

It all basicly came to a close when she finally asked the question he felt she was probably avoiding. "And just how do you expect to pay Jessie's way?" she demanded.

"I may have been disowned, Misses Williams, but I still have someone in the family who loves me. Vilenne Vulpan. She's my sister, and she's rich.

And she owes me a favor. For her, paying for two years of tuition would be the same as the change in your pocket. She'll give Jessie the money if I ask it of her."

"So you can't even pay it yourself!" she declared. "You have to slink away to your family and beg money out of them like a freeloader!"

"Where Jessie's well being is concerned, I'll do whatever it takes," he said calmly.

"Don't you dare presume to know what's best for my daughter!" she said in outrage.

"Her well being is whatever she wants," he said evenly. "I've told you before, Misses Williams, I'm very much in love with her. What makes her happy is what makes me happy, and I'll do whatever I can to make her happy. Even if I have to go back to my family and ask for money to help her get through school, I'll do it if Jessie asks it. As far as I'm concerned, she's worth it."

She chewed over that, looking for a hole to exploit, but found none. "I have to cook dinner," she declared.

Then she hung up on him.

Well, Jessie was right about the whole "hanging up when losing" issue. That was the second time she'd done it.

He blew out his breath and closed the phone. "She hung up on me," he told her.

"Then she couldn't think of a way to argue with you," Jessie giggled. "Speaking of dinner, it's probably cold by now."

He looked at the lasagna and salad on the table. “Well, we can just reheat the lasagna. Why didn’t you eat?”

“Without you?”

“I don’t need to be spoon fed, silly femme,” he said, which made her laugh.

The whole brouhaha with Jessie’s parents simmered down, and Kit put it out of his mind as the days rolled into weeks.

Jessie and Hannah reached something of an understanding. Hannah detested Kit, but she held her tongue about it out of raw fear over the possibility that Jessie might wash her paws of her mother and accept Kit’s offer to pay for her schooling. That created something of a wary truce between them, and even made it a bit easier on Jessie. Because of Jessie’s explosion on her mother, Hannah seriously curtailed her invasive behavior. She called less and less frequently, until she was down to just once a week, every Saturday while Kit was at work and Jessie was at home, and their conversations were a little strained because her mother so desperately wanted to lay down the law on a child she no longer had any control over, which was an exercise in futility.

It had been a devastatingly effective tactic, and it knocked the wind right out of Hannah’s sails. Jessie was quite happy with the result, even if Hannah was beside herself.

For Kit, though, it was a blissful time. He and Jeffrey began their strip, which they called School Daze, about Jo-jo the raccoon, Oxnard the bull, and Buck the wallaby, and the warped insanity that followed them around while they attended the University of Texas. Jo-jo was a genius inventor of things that blew up in her face or caused chaos on campus, Oxnard was her boyfriend, a star linebacker on the football team who quoted Shakespeare and had a deliciously jaded view of life, and Buck was a foreign exchange student from Australia who mistook the insanity that Jo-jo created to be typical American life. One particular panel that Kit really liked was when Oxnard handed Buck a beer, and the wallaby just stares at it in the next panel with a fearful look on his face, paw hovering over it, trembling. In the last panel, Oxnard gives him an amused look and says, “Forsooth, Buck, normal beers don’t explode,” to which Buck simply replies, “Ah. Got it.” Lilly collapsed into laughter when she read the nineteen panels that they’d finished, telling them that “oops” was going to be the ultimate tagline for Jo-jo. When she said “oops,” everyone evacuated the building.

It was a hit. Jeffrey’s artistry was amazing, and Kit had a dark enough sense of humor to put them into all kinds of evil yet funny situations. Rick ran two strips, then the next week he ran four more, then ran three the next week. The feedback on the strip was mostly positive, with some asking for new strips to run on the website rather than the magazine.

Rick made room for School Daze as a new weekly. It would run two strips a week, for as long as Kit and Jeffrey could keep it funny.

Kit and Jessie settled into a very pleasant routine. They’d meet during the week, keeping it minimal so Jessie’s grades didn’t slip, but Saturday and Sunday they were always together. Jessie would come to the office on Saturdays and do her homework, study, even help out around the office, and Jessie got involved in the writing of School Daze as she offered a femme’s outlook on how new characters being introduced would behave. Her suggestions evolved into her taking control of a the off-plot strips that dealt with two minor characters, Missy the snobby vixen and Cutler the goth doberman and the clash of personalities their differing lifestyles entailed. Jessie had a wicked sense of humor, and her off-plot strips were riotously funny. Jessie's name was added into the by-line for her strips, and Rick even started paying her for her effort.

On Sundays, they just hung around the house most of the time, acting more like a married couple than a dating couple. And Kit loved it.

Not everything was just swimming along, though. For one, there was an eerie silence from his side of the family. By now, he was sure they knew about Jessie, and he'd expected at least a phone call in the middle of the night, telling him to break up with Jessie, or a brick thrown through the window at Jessie's sorority or something. But nothing. Nothing at all. Either they really didn't care about him, or Vil had really stepped on some necks up there in Boston and scared them out of the idea of interfering. Jessie's side of the family, though, was about the same. Hannah's hatred of Fox only intensified, just as Jessie predicted, as she took huge offense to Jessie going out with a male she didn't hand-pick for her, and what was worse, a male that threatened Hannah's vice-like grip on her daughter. The relationship between the two of them became really strained, which often necessitated John to intercede between them during their more vociferous arguments.

As September faded into October, Kit took stock and realized that he'd saved up enough money to start shopping for engagement rings. He was very thorough about it, researching extensively to find the right jeweler selling the right ring at the right price. It took him almost a week to find the ring he wanted, a beautiful pear cut diamond with two emeralds flanking it in an elegant gold filigree setting. Once he found the ring he wanted, it took him nearly three weeks to pay for it. They accepted his down payment, then dropped nearly his entire next two paychecks into paying it off, forcing him to live off ramen noodles and walk to work to save on gas. He showed it to Rick on a windy, rainy October afternoon, two days before Halloween, in a black velvet case. Rick whistled as he examined it, then handed it back to him. “Damn, Kit, that’s a hell of a ring. How much was it?”

“Well, let’s just say that Jess shouldn’t be too attached to our first born,” he said, which made the dingo laugh. “It took me almost a month to pay for it. They’ve had it reserved for me, letting me pay in installments.”

“When are you gonna officially pop the question?”

“I’m not sure yet,” he answered. “I do know that I’m not sure we’ll have the ceremony until after Jessie graduates. I’m not sure I want to do that to her. Getting used to being married on top of school? It might hurt her grades.”

“She might share your view, son. In my experience, femmes don’t like having their males uncommitted. She may insist on the ceremony long before then.”

“It’s all up to her,” he said simply. “I’m happy either way, as long as we’re married at the end.”

“Have you talked about it much?”

“Not really. She knows I’m gonna propose, but she always kinda changes the subject when I talk about specifics. I guess she doesn’t wanna think about things like that until she has a ring on her finger.”

“Never know, maybe,” Rick nodded. “I didn’t give Martha any advance warning,” he chuckled. “I floored her with my proposal.”

“How long did you go out before you proposed?”

“About a year. I’ve often thought that maybe you and Jessie went a little too fast, but now I think it was a silly thought. You two are perfect for each other.”

“What changed your mind?”

“Watching you two around the office,” he answered. “The one part most couples don’t consider when they get engaged is how they’ll gel living in the same space. You and Jessie are compatible in every way. That’s a solid foundation for a lasting marriage.”

“I hope so, cause the idea of a lasting marriage is what I’m looking for.”

“Well, you may be a young couple, but I think you’ll make it. I’ve been married for twenty-one years, and I pray to the good Lord every night that we have fifty more just like them.” He closed a file he was working with on the computer. “Well, I’d say it’s about time to knock off for the day,” he declared. “You walk again today?”

“Yeah, gotta save money,” he grinned.

“You want a ride home?”

“Nah, I’ll be fine.”

“I’d rather drive you, son, that hardware you’re carrying there isn’t something I’d want to risk on a mile long walk through town.”

“Well, when you put it that way, sure, I’ll take a ride.”

Kit packed up before Rick, so he said goodbyes to the crew and went out early to wait for his boss. He stood by the door, spotted Rick’s car down by the corner, and started walking towards it, his mind filled with images of how it would look, how it would feel, when he knelt down in front of Jessie and offered her the ring that occupied his raincoat pocket. He almost couldn't wait. He wanted to take her down to the courthouse and marry her today, but females just didn't do things that way. Besides, he also didn't want their marriage to impact her school. He'd give her the ring, probably on Sunday, and after that they could sit down and talk about the specifics.

He glanced back for Rick, and his eyes took note of a black truck or SUV that pulled to a stop beside him. He didn't much notice anything about it, but as he turned away, his mind flashed an image of the person in the passenger's seat...and the pistol in his paw.

Six months of living in homeless shelters had conditioned Kit. He flinched and whipped around, even as he heard the gunshot. Something slammed into him from behind, making his breath blast out of his lungs. Before he even felt the pain, he knew. He knew he'd been shot. He dove to the ground as he heard another shot, and in a moment of clarity rolled on the wet streets towards the shooter, getting a parked car between them and getting out of his line of sight. He rolled up to the side of the car and tried to put both paws down, but his left arm was hanging limply, and the first thunderclaps of pain was starting to throb through him, making him suck in his breath as he got to his knees. He heard the car door open, and realized the shooter was coming out for him!

He huddled by the car. He'd turn and moved towards the back of the car, against the flow of traffic. The shooter would come around the front of the car to get at him, and he already saw one of the shooter's legs. He had no time to try to go around the back!

He reacted instinctively. When his assailant's leg appeared around the front of the car, he lunged. He slammed into a tall, burly leopard, who seemed honestly surprised, knocking his gun paw high. The leopard grabbed at him, trying to bring his weapon to bear, but Kit used the only weapon he had available to him.

The leopard howled in pain when Kit opened his mouth and drove his long fang-like canines into the neck and shoulder of the larger leopard. He clamped down like a pit bull, grappling with the leopard even as he sawed his teeth back and forth, tasting hot blood in his mouth even as his breath turned to fire in his lungs. But the leopard put his clawed paw into Kit's shoulder, grabbing where the bullet came out of him, and he shuddered as pain overwhelmed his rational mind. He released his biting grip on the leopard, staggering, and then something struck him in the side of the head and he dropped to the ground, his mind consumed in a haze of pain and confusion.

Rick was coming out of the lobby of the office building when he heard it. A loud explosion, a sharp crack, which he immediately recognized was a gunshot. It was just outside! He ran across the lobby and erupted from the door and quickly looked around. He saw it immediately, and it chilled his blood.

He saw a figure crumpled on the wet pavement, and a tall leopard stepping out of a SUV, one paw to his neck and a pistol in his other paw. He stepped towards the twitching figure.

It was Kit!

Rick reacted with the speed of his old training back when he was in the Army. He reached to his concealed shoulder sheath and produced a Glock, and he did not hesitate. As the leopard stopped over Kit's body and raised his pistol, aiming at his head, Rick took aim and fired in a fast motion. The leopard's head snapped to the side, and he dropped to the sidewalk like a gutted fish.

The SUV's tires squealed as the driver took off. Rick raced out into the street, pistol in paw, and the reporter in him took over from the Army grunt that had roared back into his mind, and he memorized the license plate number of the black Grand Cherokee. Then he blinked and raced to Kit, putting his weapon back in its holster.

Thank God for the Texas concealed carry laws!

He was breathing. Rick saw that he'd been shot in the back, high in the left shoulder. The bullet had exited just under his collarbone, leaving a sickening spatter of blood on the wall a few steps further down. Kit's eyes were open, but his expression was vacant, and his tail was twitching spasmodically. He was already in shock!

A quick glance at the leopard was all it took to see he was dead. He'd been shot literally in the ear canal, and it had went through his head to blow a huge hole out the other side.

There was a scream behind him. Marty and Lilly had been just a few steps behind him, and they stood there in shock. "Call 911!" he barked immediately to them as he pressed his paws against both sides of the wound, to stem the loss of blood. "Kit's been shot!"

Lilly screamed again, but Marty immediately went for his cell phone. Rick pushed Kit back down to the sidewalk as he began to move jerkily.

“Easy, easy, son,” he said in a calm voice. “Just lie still. This doesn’t look like a serious wound, but you can’t jostle around. The paramedics are on the way, so just lay back and relax and let me take care of you.” Rick pushed Kit gently yet firmly down to the pavement, laying on his side, his eyes blinking owlshly and his breathing fast and shallow. “Lilly! Lilly! Go get anything we can throw over him to keep him warm! Now!” he barked.

Lilly gasped, literally jumping up and down, then rushed back into the building.

“Marty, where is that ambulance?” he barked.

“The operator says it’s coming,” he said.

“Listen to me! I got the plate of the other guy’s car. Repeat this into the phone for the dispatcher. Black Jeep Grand Cherokee, Texas plates, Whiskey Delta X-ray nine six three three. Say it back!” Marty nodded, and repeated it to the operator on the line. “Tell the operator he’s going into shock, so they’d better get here now!”

Marty repeated that. “He says to cover Kit and try to keep him warm,” he said.

“I’m already one step ahead. Where is that damn squirrel?”

The whole crew appeared on the street, carrying seat cushions, coats, and the quilt that Rick kept on the back of the old leather chair in his office. “Don’t touch him!” Rick snapped when Mike moved to grab the pistol laying close to the leopard’s nerveless fingers. They draped the quilt and coats over Kit as Savid put a pillow under his head, and Rick kept his paws on Kit’s wound to stem the blood loss.

“What happened, Rick?” Jeffrey asked fearfully.

“I have no idea. I heard a shot, so I ran out and see Kit on the ground, and that leopard standing over him with a gun. I don’t even remember pulling my gun. It musta been instinct,” he growled.

“I think that instinct saved Kit’s life,” Mike breathed, as the sound of a siren wailed in the background, getting louder and louder. “Thank God, here it comes.”

An ambulance and two police cars screamed onto the scene. A raccoon and skunk boiled out of the ambulance, running over with a medical kit, and a burly dog and a lioness jumped out of the police cars and hurried over. “Is that the shooter?” the lioness asked as she took in the scene.

“Yeah, officer. I shot him,” Rick said. “My weapon is holstered. I’ll give it to you in just a minute.”

“You musta had first aid training, sir,” the raccoon noted as he knelt by them.

“Army,” he said simply. “I’m keeping pressure on the wound. Tell me what to do here.”

“Okay, go ahead and take your paws off,” the skunk told him. “We’ll take good care of him.” Rick let go and stood up, giving them room, as the two paramedics quickly took command of the situation, cutting Kit’s coat and shirt away to start prepping the wound so they could transport him to a hospital. Rick held his paws out wide, covered in blood. “Left side, officer, you’ll find my weapon in a holster under my coat. I don’t know if I safetied it, so please be careful.”

“You have a permit?”

“Yes ma’am,” he said immediately. “It’s in my wallet. Right back pocket. Excuse me if I don’t get them for you,” he said, holding his bloody paws up.

“We’ll get to that later, I think I can trust your word for now,” she said as her partner started talking to the others. She took out a notepad. “You know the fox?”

“Yes ma’am, I’m his boss. His name is Kitstrom Vulpan. My name is Richard Sanders.”

“Alright. Now explain what you saw.”

Sense returned to him, and with it came pain.

Kit sucked in his breath when a lightning jag ripped through him, and reason returned with sensation. Two paramedics were over him, working on him, and he saw the dead leopard behind the paramedic, as the other one rushed back to the ambulance for something. He saw the gun laying on the ground.

He’d been shot!

“Easy, easy,” the raccoon said soothingly, putting a paw on him when he tried to move. “I just gave you something for the pain, so just give it a minute and it’ll take the bite off. Do you know your blood type?”

“What the hell happened?” he asked woozily.

“I was hoping you could tell us,” a female voice called. He looked up and saw a lioness in a police uniform leaning over him, along with Rick and the paramedic.

“Someone tried to kill me,” he said uncertainly. He was starting to get cold, and his head was pounding, and his shoulder was on fire. “I think he hit me in the head.”

The paramedic produced a light and shone it into Kit’s eyes. “Looks like you might have a concussion on top of this,” he said with a nod. “Can you move your legs?”

“Y-Yah, I’m okay, I think,” he said, then he hissed in pain when a white-hot jag of agony ripped through his shoulder. “Or maybe not,” he said in a weak voice.

“Don’t go Rambo on me now, friend,” the paramedic chuckled as his partner showed up with a stretcher. “Can you feel your left arm? Can you move your fingers on your left paw?”

“I can feel my arm,” he said, then tried to move his fingers...which twitched in reply.

“Good, looks like the bullet didn’t hit any nerves. Do you know your blood type?”

“A negative,” he answered. He’d been in a hospital long enough when he was hit by the car to remember that much.

“Okay then, what’s your name?”

“Kit.”

“Alright then, Kit, here’s what’s going to happen. We’re gonna immobilize you and put you on a stretcher, cause if you were hit in the head I don’t want to take any unnecessary risks. Then we’ll cart you off the the hospital so you can flirt with the nurses.”

Kit chuckled weakly, which made him wince when the pain lashed through him. “I think my girlfriend would kill me.”

“I won’t tell if you won’t,” he grinned. “Officer, I think it’s best to talk to him at the hospital. He’s lost a significant amount of blood, we need to get him stabilized.”

“No sweat, Jack, I’ll follow ya.”

More police arrived as Kit was bundled on a backboard, combing the scene, talking to the others in the crew, and already roping off the area with police tape. The paramedics secured his head to a padded collar so he couldn’t move his neck. “Rick,” he called.

“Yeah, son?”

“Can you take my phone and call Jess and my sister? And could you hold onto the ring for me?”

“I’d be happy to, son. I’ll call them and get down to the hospital as quick as I can, as soon as the police are done taking my statement. Which pocket are they in?”

“The phone’s in my front pants pocket. I put the ring in my raincoat pocket,” he said, his voice slurring as a gray haze began to creep into his vision. It was either loss of blood, or the pain, or the medication they pumped into him, but he was feeling decidedly unfocused.

The raccoon gently and tentatively checked Kit’s pockets, then found the phone and the box holding the ring. He handed them to Rick, who immediately turned his back and opened the phone to start making calls.

Kit was immediately relieved. His precious ring was in safe hands. He closed his eyes, facing down the pain and allowing the paramedics to do their work.

“You’re gonna be just fine, friend,” the raccoon told him. “We’ll have you up and about again in no time.”

“Which hospital are you taking him to?” he heard Rick ask.

“Austin General,” came a reply.

“Rick,” he intoned, in an disjointed manner.

“Yeah, son?” he asked.

“Think I can get a few days off?”

Rick actually laughed. “I dunno, I might have to think about it. But I’m glad you can joke at a time like this. It shows me you’re gonna be just fine.”

Kit tried to relax, but it wasn’t easy. His shoulder felt like it was on fire, but at least from the feel of the pain, it wasn’t deep in his chest or anything like that. It was on the outside of his chest, in the shoulder, and it hurt like hell. He just hoped that Jessie wouldn’t have a fit when she found out.

Chapter 7

They took good care of him in the hospital. He was carted straight into the emergency room, and then he was surrounded by doctors. They asked him all kinds of questions, examined the wound, even X-rayed it to look at the internal damage...which wasn't as bad as it could have been. When Kit flinched when he saw the gun, it literally saved his life. The bullet hit him in the back of his shoulder, near his arm, and had exited just under his collarbone, near the sternum. The bullet had missed everything vital, but the collie that was the attending lead doctor did tell him that he'd be having some surgery so they could repair some tissue around his sternum that had been torn by the compressive force of the bullet as it went through him. "It shouldn't take very long," he told Kit as they applied a temporary bandage to the wound.

The pain medication had really kicked in by then, reducing his shoulder to a dull throb rather than it feeling like someone drove a red-hot spear through him, but the medication combined with what the doctors called a mild concussion made him a little dizzy and made it hard to think. They had him in the bed, sitting up so his shoulder was elevated, when the lioness that had been down at the office came into the treatment room. "They said you're up to answering a few questions now," she said. He nodded. "I'm Sergeant Elizabeth Rivers, Mister Vulpan."

"I wish we could have met under different circumstances...even a speeding ticket," Kit mused, which made her laugh.

“Alright, Kitstrom—“

“Kit.”

“Kit. Let’s start at the beginning. Just tell me what you remember, and take your time.”

He went through what he remembered, having to backtrack a couple of times because his memory was a little fuzzy about the details of that mess. “After I bit him, I don’t really remember all that much. I think he pistol-whipped me or something. Is he dead?”

The lioness nodded. “Your boss carries a concealed weapon,” she told him. “He shot the leopard. You should thank him, Mister Vulpan. He saved your life.”

“Oh, I will, trust me.”

“Now, I have to ask this, Mister Vulpan. Is there anyone you know that might have reason to hurt you?”

“You don’t think it was a robbery?”

“Most robbers don’t kill their victims before robbing them,” she said. “And certainly not in broad daylight on a city street. We think this might be personal.”

He sighed. “Well, I could say that I’m shocked, but not surprised,” he told her grimly. “My family has very extreme views, and I’m violating them.”

“The Vulpan family? You really think one of them would hire a hitman to kill you?” she asked.

“Ah, so you know about my family.”

“We are the police,” she grinned. “It just took a couple of ID checks to dig it up. It’s not exactly hidden.”

“Well, let’s say that I wouldn’t be totally stunned if one of them did,” he said. “I can think of a couple of uncles that might try it.”

“Which ones?”

“Zach and Jake—er, Kitstrom Zachary and Kitstrom Jacob. My grandpa named all his boys Kitstrom,” he explained as he saw her eyebrow raise. “My dad continued the tradition when he named me.”

“Ah. Well, I’ll call up to Boston and ask around a little bit. Just to make sure.”

“Tread very carefully, officer,” he said with absolute seriousness. “The Vulpans own the Boston Police. Expect to be stonewalled.”

“I’ll keep that in mind, at least until the detectives take the case from me,” she said with a smile. “I’ll tell the doc I’m done, and you’re ready for visitors, okay?”

“Thank you, officer.”

“De nada, Kit. I’ll come check on you in a while.”

The doctor returned, and not alone. Jessie and Rick rushed in behind her. Jessie’s eyes were sheened and red, and the fur on her cheeks was matted from tears. She tried to hug him but recoiled when she saw the bandages, so just settled for putting her cheek against his own, nuzzling him. “I’m alright, my pretty kitty,” he told her. “See? Still here and kicking.”

“I was so worried,” she said, her voice trembling. “Are you okay?”

“I’m just fine,” he said.

“He’ll be fine, miss,” the collie told her. “He’ll be going up to surgery in—“ “Surgery?” she gasped.

“It’s alright, they just want to repair some damage to the tissue under the exit wound, miss, ah.”

“Jessie,” she answered.

“Jessie. Like I said, they’re going to fix that, and then he’ll be in a hospital room and well on his way to a full recovery. The bullet didn’t hit anything important, and the injury is easily treated. He’ll be up and about in no time,” he said with a chuckle. “All he’ll have to show for his adventure is a scar nobody will see under his fur and an old arm sling he can hang on the wall and use as a prop for his story,” he smiled.

“Doc, I have enough scars, I don’t need another one people can see,” he chuckled, pointing with his good arm at his injured ear.

“Well, that one’s more spectacular anyway,” the doctor chuckled. “You should play the lottery, Mister Vulpan. This is the second major incident you’ve survived. Now, steal your kisses while you can, Mister Vulpan, you’ll be off to surgery in just a few minutes.”

Jessie nuzzled him tenderly. “I’ll be right here waiting,” she told him.

“You have school tomorrow, little missy,” he told her in a weak but playful voice. “And they’re not going to let me go anywhere.”

“Just try and make me go home,” she said adamantly, taking his paw in hers and holding it.

“I don’t think I have the arm strength for it at the moment,” he smiled weakly.

“Son, I have your things. Do you want me to keep them or give them to Jessie?”

“Give her the phone, Rick,” he said, his eyes steady.

Rick nodded in understanding. “I’ll put the rest of it in your office then,” he said, giving Kit a wink behind Jessie’s back. “They only let two at a time in to visit, and the whole crew’s waiting outside. So I’ll give up my spot so they can take turns until they take you up.”

“Officer Rivers said you saved my life, Rick. Thank you.”

“Any time, son, any time. Thank Martha, actually,” he chuckled. “She was the one that didn’t feel comfortable with me working the hours I do without protection. She’s the one that got me to get the permit.”

“Well, I owe her a big kiss on the lips.”

“I might get jealous,” Rick grinned, but he filed out.

“Vil called me,” Jessie told him. “Right after Rick did. Rick called her, then called me, then she called me. She told me to tell you that she’s already on her way down, and don’t worry about the hospital bills. She already called the hospital.”

“She just needs to take out health insurance on me,” Kit sighed.

“What happened, Kit?”

“I’m honestly not really sure. The police don’t think it was a mugging. They think it was a failed hit, which I guess is possible, if my family decided I committed a sin too grievous to forgive.”

She gave him a stricken look. “You mean they tried to kill you because of me?”

“If they really did do it, they tried to kill me because of me,” he said unflinchingly. “Don’t ever think that this is your fault, my pretty kitty. But, I do want you to call that security company that Vil hired and tell them what happened, and they might want to keep a much closer eye on you. I don’t want you going around alone. Not right now.”

Marty was the first to visit. He looked very grim and serious, expressions that seemed alien on his face, and he patted Kit on the good shoulder. “Keeping the faith, soldier?” he asked in a surprisingly quiet and positive tone, much unlike his usual flamboyant melodrama.

“The docs say I’ll be just fine, Marty, and right now I’m too keyed up on morphine to feel much of anything,” he said with a smile. “Is Lilly okay? I heard her screaming.”

“She was a little freaked, but she’s better now,” he answered. “Don’t you worry, Jessie, we’ll be right here with you. You’ll have lots of friends there while we’re waiting.”

“Thanks, Marty,” she said, giving him a look of profound gratitude.

“Hey, I gotta watch out for the only femme around that looks better than me in pumps,” he said airily, which made her giggle.

Okay, Marty was feeling better now.

Before Marty could send the next person in, two orderlies returned with the collie. “Alright, Mister Vulpan, let’s get you up to surgery. If you two will wait in the waiting room, the receptionist can tell you when he’s done, and what room he’ll be in.”

Jessie leaned in and kissed him on the cheek, her eyes worried.

“Relax, pretty kitty. As you can see, I’m not in any danger, and I’ll be just fine.”

“That he will,” the collie agreed. “Now if you two will go to the waiting room, we can get him going.”

“Come on, Jessie, let’s go tell the others he’ll be okay,” Marty said, patting her on the shoulder.

She gave him a longing look and blew him a kiss as Marty walked her out, and the orderly transferred the IV hooked up to his arm to a stand attached to the bed. “Alright, Kit, away we go,” the doctor said. “You’ll be in and out quick, and we’ll get you settled into your room.”

Kit had been through enough surgeries in his day to know that for the patient, it was a very undignified business.

The first thing they did was shave off his fur. His fur was one of his few vanities, for it was thick and glossy, and it looked quite nice. Not satisfied with just shaving away around the area to be worked on, the doctors had gone on a veritable orgy of clipping, shaving away almost all the fur on the entire left side of his chest, both the white fur on his chest and the reddish fur on the sides of his shoulder and outer pectoral. Not satisfied with peeling his chest like an apple, they also shaved off the fur around the entry wound on the back of his shoulder. As if the half-missing ear wasn’t bad enough, now he’d look like he had mange until his fur grew back in.

The surgery itself wasn’t really that bad. The surgeons were professional and polite, and they had him under within minutes of putting him on the operating table.

It was the aftermath that was the embarrassing part.

For one, anesthesia wasn't quite as serene as most people believed. Every time he'd been put under, when he woke up, he was violently ill. And this time was no different. It was hard to be dignified retching into a pan, and even less so when one did it to an audience. A vixen nurse helped him through most of his indisposition, which had to be as distasteful to her as it was to him.

For another, doctors couldn't operate on one's finger without stripping the patient completely naked, then putting them in a flimsy little hospital gown that would open in the back with the slightest flick of the tail. Being in a bed with a blanket over him didn't change the fact that he knew what he was wearing, which would make any trip to the bathroom more of a show for the nurse than anything else, who would have to help him out of bed and over to the bathroom.

One could manage only so much dignity with one's bare butt hanging out the back of a hospital gown.

But, at least it was over. They had him in observation in a private room in the hospital, and though his shoulder and chest were in pain, it was dulled by the drugs dripping into his arm through an IV. The doctors had given him a glowing report when he was coherent. The repair to the tissues in his chest was done without any complications, and he'd have no movement or health problems at all once he healed. He'd have to undergo some physical therapy once the muscles pierced by the bullet mended, and also because his arm would be in a sling for a few weeks.

It already was, actually. His arm was literally strapped to his side to keep it immobile, to prevent any movement from torquing the wound and possibly tearing his stitches.

But, even though the injury itself wasn't serious, the implication behind it was. Officer Rivers stopped by soon after the surgery, before they allowed anyone to visit him, and filled him in. The leopard that was killed was one Josh Ruger, a.k.a Spots, a mid-level hood in the Atlanta mob. Unless Spots was on vacation in Austin and decided to keep himself in practice when it came to shooting furs, then he was there on business, and his business was Kit. It was a very strong indication that someone tried to have Kit killed...and the list of those who might want that was decidedly short.

Vil was going to blow a blood vessel when she found out...and may God help the family. She'd come down on them like an avalanche. For the first time since he was sixteen, he found a sliver of sympathy for someone in his family other than his sister. Vil was a vindictive bitch when she was angry, and the family was about to see the Miss Hyde that lurked beneath that witty exterior.

Whoever did it certainly seemed to sense that, for they'd dug up someone far, far from Boston to do the deed. And they must have warned the guy. He didn't fly or take any kind of public transportation into Austin the cops could find, and no cars were rented in Austin under any known alias Spots used. They thought he drove in from Atlanta to cover those tracks, and would have driven back after it was done, so they were looking for his car, and had an APB out on his car that covered all of Texas and Louisiana. Austin was pretty much well smack dab in the middle of Texas, so it was going to take anyone driving that car several hours to get to virtually any border, even Mexico's.

So...it seemed that the family did take exception to his relationship with Jessie, and decided to voice that displeasure with the business end of a gun. It was shocking to him, but not surprising. It was shocking that they went straight for that very dangerous and extreme option immediately, without the usual attempts to sway, intimidate, or blackmail him into breaking it off. No, they went straight to the ultimate solution, killing Kit to prevent him from marrying someone that many in the family would consider little better than livestock.

God knows, it shouldn't have been a surprise. Not only was Kit disowned and poor, but he was thriving. That had to be an anathema in their eyes, a cancer on their souls, that Kit didn't just eke out a meagre existence eating out of garbage cans, he instead had built a good life for himself without their money, without their power, without them period. He didn't need the Vulpan family to be happy, and that had to eat at them like acid poured into their eyes.

The collie doctor came in. "And how are we feeling?" he asked as the vixen nurse handed him Kit's chart.

"Exposed, half-naked, and doped up," he answered.

"In other words, normal for someone just out of surgery," the collie grinned. "How much fur did they take off?"

"Too much," he replied with a grunt.

"Yeah, they love to go nuts with that shaver," he chuckled. "Oh, if nobody told you, I'm Doctor Randy Barnett, the chief physician around here. You can call me Doc. I know, it's a terribly unimaginative nickname for a doctor, but if I was more creative, I'd be working in Hollywood instead of Austin."

Kit chuckled. "It's not much more creative than Kit."

"Hmm, well, all these squiggly lines and mysterious marks look all in order," he noted, handing the chart back to the vixen, who was giving him an amused smile. "Now, let's see if they put your heart on the right side of your chest like I told them to." He put the stethoscope in his ears, and probed Kit's chest for a moment, as the nurse took his blood pressure. "Well hell, they didn't do it again. I really need to go down there and straighten the surgery staff out," he said. "But that's a healthy heart, no doubt about it. BP?"

"One ten over eighty," the nurse replied.

"Now let's see if that concussion didn't knock some sense into you," he said in a jovial manner, taking a pen light out and shining it in Kit's eyes. "Well damn, you're just giving me nothing to do. Couldn't you at least pretend that you need me here, Kit?"

Kit laughed.

"I guess I won't be able to keep you locked up in this prison, I suppose. You look ready to handle that pack sitting out in the waiting room. Let me trot out there and sell them some tickets, and they'll be in in a few minutes."

Kit laughed again, which his shouldern't didn't agree with. "I'd appreciate it, Doc." He gave a short wave, and swept out of the room as quickly as he entered.

“Don’t let his Patch Adams act fool you, Kit,” the vixen said with a smile. “Doctor Barnett is one of the best doctors in Texas. You’re in the best care around, and we’ll take good care of you.”

The vixen left him alone for about a minute, then the door opened again. Jessie literally ran into the room, her paws on his face and kissing him all over his muzzle, cheeks, and forehead. He had to laugh at her display, which made her cheeks ruffle as she looked coyly down at him. The whole crew filed in behind her, and as she pulled the stool over to his bed, he shook paws with everyone and got a kiss from Lilly. “You really scared us there, Kit,” Mike told him. “The doc said you’d be just fine though, so that’s good news.”

“Yeah, he told me the bullet went right through and didn’t hit anything vital,” Kit nodded.

“Is it hurt much?” Savid asked.

“They have me on too many drugs right now to feel it,” he answered, motioning with his muzzle at the IV dripping into his right arm.

“If you wanted some time off, you should have just asked for a vacation,” Jeffrey grinned at him. Lilly and Barry gave him a shocked look, but Kit laughed, which broke them of their feeling he’d said something out of bounds.

“Well, Rick complains I don’t get enough rest,” he noted, looking at his boss, which made him laugh.

“We’ll be a little short-handed without you, but we’ll manage,” Rick grinned.

“Well, I hope I’m back at work soon. We have too damn much fun there for me to want to stay away.”

“Shh, don’t tell the boss we have fun!” Lilly protested, giving Rick a sidelong smile. “He might decide to stop paying us!”

“I’d have to stop paying myself, and Martha might have something to say about that,” Rick said with a mild smile. “Have the docs given you a date for getting out of here?”

“Not yet, but hopefully not long,” he said. “If I’m lucky, I’ll be back home in a few days.”

“That soon?” Jessie asked in surprise.

“There’s really not much they can do around here but stick needles in me, pretty kitty,” he told her. “I can sit on my couch at home and watch TV the same as I can sit in this bed and watch TV. Besides, you ever taste hospital food?” he asked with a shudder. “I had almost five months of it, and it’s not something you wish on your worst enemy.”

“We’ll smuggle you in some real food,” Barry promised with a grin.

“That would be nice,” Kit assured with a nod.

Jessie’s phone rang. “Vil! No, I’m right here with him right now. He’s out of surgery, and the doctor told me he’s going to be just fine. Sure, hold on.” She held the phone out to him, and after looking at the IV, she instead put it right to his ear.

“Hey sis,” he said.

“Are you okay, Kit?” she asked fearfully.

“I’m alright. I was shot in the shoulder, and I’m feeling about as good as one can under the circumstances. Until the meds wear off, anyway.”

“I’m on a plane right now,” she told him. “I’ll be there about three hours. We’re somewhere over Tennessee right now.”

“Well, it’ll be nice to see you, even if I’m not quite happy about the circumstances.”

She gave a humorless chuckle. “I’ve already got in touch with the Austin police,” she said, her voice turning icy. “They told me what they think.”

“Uh oh,” he said quietly.

“Yeah, uh oh,” she said. “When I get home,” she said, then was silent a moment. He could almost imagine seeing her bristle in her seat on that plane. “I will find out who’s at the bottom of this,” she declared in a cold, sinister tone. “And then I’m going to skin him with a rusty butter knife and hang his mangy pelt on my wall.”

“Just be careful, sis,” he said seriously. “I’ve told you before. Don’t underestimate the uncles. They will fight back, and they have lots of money to do it with.”

“We’ll just see about that,” she said with a hiss.

Oh, God. Vil was going to be a nightmare. He’d heard that tone before, and she would destroy anyone that got in her way.

“Did they put you in a private room?” she asked, getting her temper back under control.

“Yeah, they did.”

“Good. Don’t you worry about a thing, baby bro. I’ve already picked up the tab for this. I’ll let you get back to Jessie, and we’ll talk when I get there.”

“Alright. Love ya sis.”

“Love ya bro.”

He nodded to Jessie, who took back the phone. “Vil? No, I’m okay. Thanks, that’s sweet. Do you need someone to pick you up? Okay. Okay, see you soon. Bye.” She hung up the phone. “Vil said she’d be here in a couple of hours,” she told the group.

Kit enjoyed the visit with the crew, as they kept probing him over whether or not he was really feeling okay, and joking and kidding him and each other, at least until the vixen nurse came into the room. “Alright, people, afraid open visiting hours are over,” she told them.

“Can I stay?” Jessie asked in a frightened tone. “I don’t want to leave him!”

“Are you family, hon?” she asked.

“She’s his fiancée,” Rick told the nurse.

“Then you’re welcome to stay. But the rest of you, shoo!” she told them. “Open hours are from eleven to eight. Come back tomorrow, eleven o’clock, if we don’t send him home first,” she smiled.

He shook their paws, and Lilly kissed him on the cheek, and then they waved their farewells as the vixen herded them out of the room. “Now, let’s check that blood pressure, Mister Vulpan.”

“Kit,” he corrected as she pulled a blood pressure cuff from a slot on the wall behind the bed.

“Kit. Any sharp pain?”

“No, just a dull ache.”

“Alright,” she said as Jessie moved, and she checked his blood pressure. “Nice and stable,” she said with a nod. “I’ll leave you to your visitor, Kit. You’ve got two hours until visiting hours are over, honey, so get your kisses in now. And no shenanigans in here,” she added with a naughty little smile as she left the room and closed the door.

Kit chuckled as Jessie’s cheeks ruffled, and she sat back down and took his paw in hers. “I’m fine, my pretty kitty. Don’t look so worried.”

“I have every right to be worried!” she protested.

“I know, but look. I’m fine. Really.”

“If you were fine, you wouldn’t be in the hospital,” she challenged.

“Okay, I’m fine in relative terms among people who are in hospitals,” he said with a grin. “You’ll see, pretty kitty, they’ll have me out of here in just a day or two. They could probably send me home right now, but I guess they just want to make sure there weren’t any complications from the surgery.” He frowned. “They shaved off my fur. I look like I have mange.”

She gave him a startled look, and actually laughed. “You’re nearly killed, and all you can worry about is your fur?” she asked him.

“This is nothing compared to what it was like after I was hit by that car. If I seem a bit blasé about this, well, there ya go.”

“And you’re not afraid? I mean, someone tried to kill you!”

“And Rick shot him,” Kit said simply. “I’m not afraid for me, I’m worried about you. Did you call that security company?”

“Yeah, I did. They have someone in the waiting room right now. He’ll escort me home, and they said they’d keep a guard with me if I wanted it.”

“Well, I want it.”

“I know. So I told them that it’d be okay for a few days. Because I knew it would make you worry if I didn’t.” She sighed. “Besides, I’m a little scared, Kit. I feel safer with the guard, but—“

“Don’t worry about it, pretty kitty,” he told her. “Vil is coming, and she’s pissed off. You’ve never seen my sister when she’s angry, Jess. It’s not pretty. You’ll find out why they call her the Ice Queen.”

“Yeah, when she called me back, I could tell she was mad,” she agreed. “She sounded like the clock on a time bomb.”

“That’s a pretty accurate description,” he chuckled. “Vil will find out who tried to kill me. And when she does, well....”

“What?”

“Let’s just say that there’s a good chance the police won’t be bothered about it.”

She gaped at him. “You mean—“

“Yup,” he nodded. “Vil will play at that level.”

“I’m...well...wow,” she said, blowing out her breath.

“This isn’t the little league, my pretty kitty,” he told her. “Vil may decide that the law isn’t good enough. And one thing you need to learn about rich people is that to them, the law is nothing but a minor inconvenience.”

“That’s really surprising.”

“It shouldn’t be, given where I’m sitting right now,” he told her seriously. “Odds are, one of my uncles decided that following the law wasn’t sufficient to get what he wanted, and well, here I am.”

“But to have someone killed?”

“You’re dealing with people who don’t have the same morals as normal people, Jess,” he told her seriously. “I’ve told you before that money is a curse. Well, you’re getting a look at one of the ways that curse works. My uncles think they’re the highest form of life on Earth, and believe they’re above the law of the puny mortals. The only law they really fear is my sister, because she holds the reins of the family’s power. And though I love my sister, Jess, she has the same mindset. She’ll obey the law of us normal people, until it gets in her way. She can be just as ruthless as any other member of my family. In a way, she has to be. You have no idea what really goes on behind the doors of a huge company like the shipyards. Vil breaks the law on a daily basis, I’d wager, and when it’s something personal like this, well, she may throw the law out the window and deal with it in the way she feels is appropriate. Just like whoever tried to have me killed, she’ll be judge, jury, and if needs be, executioner.”

Jessie was silent a long moment.

“Does that surprise you?”

She sighed. “Yes. She didn’t seem that way. I thought she was very nice.”

“Oh, she is, Jess. I love Vil a lot. She’s a sweet, charming, and loving vixen who has a big heart and a kind disposition. She’s the nicest member of the family, and very generous and caring. In that way, she’s much different from the rest of the family. But there’s another Vil lurking behind what you see, a calculating, ruthless vixen who will crush anything and anyone that gets in her way. That is the Ice Queen, and you’re going to get your first good look at it when she gets here. Just don’t let it affect your opinion of her too much. This isn’t a part of you you’d ever see unless it was serious, like right now,” he noted, motioning at his injury with his right arm. “Once her sense of justice has been satisfied, she’ll go right back to the funny, charming vixen you’ve come to know.”

“Well, she’s only doing it because she loves you,” Jessie reasoned.

“Just so,” he nodded, leaning his head back and closing his eyes. The ordeal of the day was finally catching up to him, and he was starting to get sleepy. Before he could even say a word, though, he felt her paws brushing his hair away from his face.

“Getting sleepy, my handsome fox?” she asked in a gentle voice.

“Tired,” he answered. “I’ve had a busy day.”

She laughed in spite of herself. “I remember when you were there for me, Kit,” she said in a low, gentle voice. “Now it’s my turn to be here for you. Just rest, my love. I’ll be here, and I’ll take good care of you. I will always take good care of my handsome fox,” she breathed, taking his paw and squeezing it gently.

“I’m going to hold you to that,” he said with a weary smile.

“Feel free,” she whispered, kissing him on the forehead. “Now get some rest.”

“I will. Have I told you today that I love you, Jessie?”

“I can never hear it enough,” she told him with a gentle kiss.

“Well, I love you, Jessica Desdemona Williams,” he declared in a tired voice.

“And I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan,” she returned, patting the back of his paw.

Her presence soothed him, soothed away the pain in ways the medicine could not, and he fell asleep after a few minutes.

Jessie sat at his bedside silently, holding his paw, relief warring with concern inside her, and more than a little fear.

Jessie was fearful, but she was intelligent, and her mind was already working through what she’d learned. She saw now that Kit’s fear of his family had been totally justified. Though they had no proof of what happened, Kit seemed convinced that it was his family that had arranged to have someone try to kill him, and she’d trust his judgment in the matter. It made her reflect on his family, and him, and even her relationship with him.

She looked down at him and asked herself a simple question. Do I love this fox? she asked, to which the answer was immediate. With all my heart, she answered herself, feeling her heart melt just looking at him, his face composed and looking totally vulnerable laying in that hospital bed. She felt relieved he was going to be alright, fearful for him, worried about his recovery, concerned that there might be complications. But under it all was that simple love. Since their first meeting, she'd been swept off her feet by him.

It really had been love at first kiss, right there in that skating rink. It had just taken her a while to come to see it, just like her father had said. That was when she fell in love with him, when he kissed her.

She didn't believe in love at first sight...but her own experience was making her doubt that position a little.

She stroked the fur on the back of his paw. Now that she knew where she stood, she had to look at the situation. Someone had tried to kill him because of their relationship, and they might try to kill her too. Maybe even her family. Is it worth it? she asked herself, staring down at him. Is it worth risking my life over to stay with him? Is it worth the chance that they might come after my family?

That was a hard question to answer. She loved him completely, and she had no real concern for herself. To her, it was worth the risk to see him, because he was worth it. He was perfect, the male God had put on this Earth for her to find and love. Her devotion to him was unswerving, as unswerving as his own was for her, but her family was a complication. It was more than just her in this, she saw. Was it fair to her parents and siblings to drag them into this?

No. It wasn't fair to them, really. She had to admit that to herself. But, she was an adult. This was her life, this was her choice, and she wasn't going to be afraid of Kit's family.

It won't drive me away, she vowed to herself. I can warn my folks what happened and what it might mean, but I won't run away. I'll just have to take precautions. Vil will help me, I know she will. She can keep my folks safe. I trust her. Kit was willing to risk everything for me. I have to be just as strong as him.

She made her decision. She would stand by him. She would face the future with him together, because she loved him.

And she knew just how to tell him.

The nurses and doctor that checked in on them periodically were quiet and cordial. They didn't wake Kit up when they found he was asleep, but they did check his temperature and replace his IV with a new bottle. Jessie stayed right by his bedside, not leaving him for a second, just watching over him while he slept. Even after even her visiting hours were over, for some reason, they didn't make her leave. As the time and the silence and the energy expended over the day caught up with her, though, she got more and more tired, until she leaned down onto Kit's bed and fell asleep with her head on his stomach.

A light touch on her shoulder woke her up. She sat up blearily, putting a paw over her face. "Do I have to leave?" she asked in a low whisper.

"Not if you don't want to," came a low reply, slightly amused.

Jessie sat straight up and turned around. It was Vil!

She hugged the smaller vixen fiercely, and Vil patted her on the back. "I just got in. How is he?"

"The doctors say he'll make a full recovery," she answered, holding onto Vil's paws as she pushed away a little. "They did surgery on him after he got here.”

“They’ve been keeping me up to speed on that,” she told Jessie, sitting down on the stool, and reaching out and stroking back Kit’s hair, her fingers lingering on the two white streaks in it that were from when he was hit by the car. “Hey, baby bro,” she called in a low, tender whisper. “I’m sorry it took so long for me to get here, and I’m sorry this happened to you. But don’t you worry. Your big sister is here, and I’m going to take care of it.” She stroked the hair back from his face the way a mother would, then rested her paw on his shoulder as her other paw gently squeezed his left paw, jutting out from the sling that kept his left arm immobilized. She bowed her head, and Jessie clearly heard her snuffle. She put her paws on Vil’s shoulders, and much to her surprise, Vil whirled around and grabbed hold of her, crying into her stomach and chest.

To see that kind of emotion from someone Kit said was ruthless when she was angry surprised her a little, but then again, her love for her brother should have told her that that was a stupid assumption. She cradled Vil’s head and comforted her, being there for her, and held her for long moments as she let her grief run its course. Vil’s weeping ceased, and she just held onto Jessie for a long moment, unashamedly showing that she wasn’t as cold as the world believed her to be.

“Thank you, Jessie,” she said in a more composed voice, letting her go. “I guess it didn’t hit me until I could sit down and see him. See what they did to him,” she said, her voice turning to ice.

Maybe Kit really wasn’t exaggerating.

“Are you alright, Jessie?” she asked pointedly.

“It scared me, but I’m okay.”

“That’s not what I asked,” she said, looking at her directly. “Now you know. Now you know just what kind of family he’s from. Now, I’ll ask you again, are you alright?”

She knew what Vil meant, and she nodded. “I won’t leave him, Vil. I’m afraid for my own family, but I won’t leave him. I’m not going to let them win.”

“Don’t you worry about your family,” Vil said in a steely tone. “This is all my fault. I thought I had them all well leashed, but I see now I was in grievous error. I’ll make sure your family never gets dragged into this. They’ll be just fine.” She turned back around to look at Kit. “And thank you, Jessie. Kit really did find his soulmate when he met you. You have the right stuff, femme. You’re strong enough to be the wife of a male like him.”

“He hasn’t asked me yet,” she said, her cheeks itching.

“Oh, he will, Jessie. He will.”

“I hope so. After this...I don’t want to lose him, Vil. I want to marry him.”

“It should happen soon. I can’t wait, actually. I’m as impatient as you are. I’ll be honored to call you sis.”

“That’s very nice of you to say,” Jessie said modestly, her cheeks ruffling.

“Well, I meant it,” she said, stroking Kit’s paw with her fingers. “My brother is my family, Jessie. He’s the only member of it I care about, and the only one that really matters. Before he met you, all he did since college was wander around, looking for a purpose, but having no real desire to find it. Just drifting through life. I thought for a while that it was going to end up killing him. It was a rough life, hon, a lot rougher than he ever let on. I know, I kept an eye on him. Then he met you, and inside three days, he had a job, he had an apartment, and he had hope. That was something he hasn't had any of since the accident that ended his dream to go into the military. You changed his life, Jessie. In many ways, I think you saved it," she said softly. "I think if he would have gotten on that bus and moved on instead of trying to find you, he'd have been dead within two years."

"Well, I'm glad he stayed," she whispered, leaning over Vil and looking down at him. "I think I would have spent my whole life looking for him, and would have never been truly happy."

Vil reached up and patted her paw. "Well, let's give him a chance to get some sleep, hon. Come take a walk with me. We have some things to talk about."

"But—"

"He'll be alright on his own for a few minutes," she said with a soft chuckle.

They walked down the hall, towards the small sitting area for visitors by the elevator, near the nurse's station. While they walked, Vil explained everything the police had told her in greater detail, telling her where the assailant came from, how they were looking for his accomplice, and she theorized about how it came about. "I'm not sure who did this, but I will find out," she declared in a growling hiss, keeping her voice low. "And when I do, God help them."

"Vil," she said, stopping them. "Kit told me some of that, but he also said what you might do."

“What I might do? What I will do,” she said seethingly.

“No,” she said quietly, but firmly. “Don’t do that.”

“It’s what they deserve!”

“Then you’d be no better than them,” Jessie said with quiet dignity.

Vil started to say something, but came up short.

“Please. For me. All I ask is you don’t stoop to their level. I don’t want to wake up some day in the future and feel like I have blood on my paws.”

Vil’s eyes flashed, but she blew out her breath. “You’re asking me to tie my paws, hon. You can’t fight fair against these people. They cheat.”

“I never said be an angel, Vil. I just said don’t kill them over it. Punish them, yes. But do it the right way.”

“There is no right way,” she retorted.

“Yes, there is, Vil. Think about it. If you kill them, what does it prove? Did you ever see the movie Trading Places?”

“I don’t think so.”

“Well, in the movie, a rich boy and a poor boy get humiliated by a pair of rich brothers. In revenge, they make them poor. Don’t you think that would be justice? Find a way to take away their money. Do to them what they did to Kit, just without the guns.”

Vil opened her mouth, then closed it. Then she rubbed her chin with a furry finger, her eyes deep in thought. “Well, I have been exploring invalidating Dad’s will,” she mused. “But that probably wouldn’t work. The other members of the family will just give them money.”

“But what kind of use is all that money when they’re in prison?”

She snorted. “Uh, Jessie, sweetheart...I hate to tell you this. But if a Vulpan ran into a Starbucks and hacked everyone inside to death on live national television, no jury in Massachusetts would ever convict.”

“If Massachusetts is their playground, then perhaps you should look into making them play on your playground, then,” Jessie urged. “Kit once told me that if you snapped your fingers, the President himself would jump. He said you have all the power in the family. Use it.”

Vil’s eyes narrowed, and she gave an almost imperceptible nod. “So, you want me to destroy them,” she said in an offering tone.

“They deserve it for hurting Kit,” she said with surprising vehemence. “Just do it legally. I don’t want to live my life knowing you had someone murdered over me and Kit. I’d never be able to live with it.”

She gave Jessie a long, serious look. Then she put her paws on Jessie’s arms. “I never make a promise I can’t keep, so I won’t promise. But I will promise you that I’ll try.”

“That’s good enough for me, because I know you’ll succeed,” she said with a gentle smile.

“You really are something special, hon,” Vil smiled, then gave her a brief, warm hug.

“Vil...my parents. I’m worried about them. I’m willing to walk through hell for Kit, but they don’t have anything to do with this. My mother would probably have paid half of what it cost to hire that hit man,” she said with a sour frown. “She hates Kit, with a passion that’s almost holy. But I'm worried that me and Kit might cause my family trouble. I don't know what to do."

"Well, I do," Vil said. "Leave it to me, Jessie. I'll make sure they're safe and sound, and they'll never know they were being watched over."

"I appreciate it, Vil, really," she said with a grateful smile. "You're so good to us."

"I'm just being motherly," she winked.

"Well, don't stop on my account," Jessie smiled.

"Well, in that case, see what you can do to talk Kit into letting me mother him a bit more," she said with a sly smile. "I don't like him living in that apartment. You two need a house. A nice big house, with a big yard and plenty of room for your kids, and a maid and cook to free you from all those menial chores, and—"

"Take what you can get, Vil," Jessie teased.

"I'm a Vulpan, dear. I get what I want."

"At least until you come up against another Vulpan," Jessie winked.

"Don't make me not like you, femme," Vil grinned.

"It's too late for that."

Vil laughed, then put her paw over her mouth when the black-furred dog nurse behind the desk gave her a harsh look. "You're almost too good for my brother," she told Jessie with a smile.

"Nah. We're just right for each other."

“True enough,” she agreed as they returned to his room. He was still asleep, sleeping peacefully, and Jessie’s heart melted when she saw him. He was so strong, such a strong fox, but here he was, totally vulnerable, and yet...he still seemed strong. Even laying in that bed, she remembered how he didn’t worry a whit about himself, his only concern was for her. His only worry was for her. He had tried to comfort her from a hospital bed.

How did she get so lucky to have a male like him love her?

“Come on, let’s go watch over the most important male in our lives,” Vil said with a gentle smile and a nudge. “He needs us.”

Kit was very unhappy with Jessie, because she ditched school.

He could understand that she was worried about him and was upset, but still, there was little she could do for him, he was just fine, and there was no real reason for her to miss classes. She should have gone, even if she couldn’t concentrate, because an absence was an absence, and they’d hold it against her. He didn’t want her to mess up her school for his sake.

But it was a losing battle, and he knew it. When he woke up, both she and Vil were with him in the room, Jessie sleeping literally at his bedside, and Vil in a chair by the little table next to the window. Both of them seemed to know he was awake before he even got to put his paw on Jessie’s gorgeous blond hair, and he was smothered in kisses from both his sister and his Jessie. The doctor checked in on him before they could talk, though, taking his blood pressure, and bringing in a nurse to change his bandages. Kit got his first look at the wound, which was now a line of stitches about two inches long just to the left of his sternum and literally just below the edge of his left collarbone. It didn’t look all that bad, but it was oozing a tiny bit of blood after the scabbing that was stuck to the bandage was pulled free. But that bleeding stopped before they even put on the new bandage.

After they left, Vil sat down and talked to him. She told him everything she knew, and speculated on which uncle was the one that did it. There wasn't much more she could tell him that he already didn't know, but what she did tell him was what she promised Jessie the night before.

What surprised him even more was that she agreed to it. "I owe her that much, little bro," she stated. "This does involve her too. If she wants me to play nice, well, I'll try it her way first."

"That's all I want," Jessie nodded. "I know it may not bother you, but it bothers me."

"And that's why I'll try it your way first."

Then came the argument...such as it was. When he realized it was ten, and Jessie's first Wednesday class was in session, he told her she should go to school...and he almost got his head bitten off by both of them. He endured a ten minute tirade from the two of them about how she was worried about him, and her place was there, and so on and so on and so on. He shut up just so they'd give over on the nagging and give him some peace and quiet.

They weren't the only ones playing hookey, though. The entire crew showed up at eleven, when visiting hours began, and they stayed for nearly three hours. Lilly brought a camera and they took quite a few pictures of him, the room, the crew in the room, Jessie and Vil, even the doctor and the nurses that came to check on him. Mike put quite a few of them on a memory card, to add to both the website and two that would go into the magazine.

It had hit the news last night that he'd been shot. It wasn't that big a deal, just a news blurb on the local channels, but on campus it was big news. Lone Star was a popular magazine on campus, and to hear that one of the staff had been shot rippled across campus by ten. He received quite a few cards and even three bouquets of flowers once word got out, and Mike told people on the website where they could drop off the cards.

Kit kept watching Vil. She would spend quite a bit of time over by the window as the others kept him engaged, on her phone. He wondered what she was hearing, what orders she was giving. The Ice Queen was going to rampage across Massachusetts like a tornado, he knew it, and he just wondered how much she was going to adhere to her promise to try to do it legally once she was back home, and no longer had Jessie right there to remind her of it.

The collie doctor from last night showed up around two, and he shoed everyone but Vil and Jessie out of the room. He examined Kit and asked quite a few questions. "Alright, Kit, here's the deal," he said, closing the chart in his paws and looking at him. "We're going to take you down and give you a CAT scan to survey the injury and make sure the surgeons did everything right. After that, if everything pans out and there's no sign of infection, and with luck, we'll probably be releasing you the day after tomorrow."

"Yes!" Kit said happily.

"Don't get too happy about that," he grinned. "Part and parcel with an early release is a nurse that comes twice a day to check up on you and change your bandages, and I'll be stopping by once a day to examine you and make sure you're behaving. You'll also be restricted to your house and put on extended rest. That may not be a big hole, Kit, but it does go all the way through, ya know,” he grinned. “The key to a quick recovery for you is to keep as sedate as possible and limit how much you move. Now, I’m willing to let you go home and do your recovering there, but if I see you’re not healing, I’ll haul your furry butt right back in here so fast your tail won’t know where you went.”

“Understood,” Kit chuckled. “Why two days? Why not tomorrow?”

“The simple truth of it is, we could probably release you right now and you could do alright,” he said honestly. “But right now, we’re much more worried about infection than the possibility you might tear your stitches. We’re keeping you over to make absolutely sure that wound doesn’t get infected, and if it does, you’re already right here so we can stomp on it quickly.”

“Well, that makes sense.”

“What are the chances of that happening, doctor?” Jessie asked.

“Right now? Pretty slim. We’re over the hump as far as the risk of infection goes, but we’re not taking any chances. Sometimes the sneakier bugs take a couple of days to start showing up. Now, have they let you out of that bed today, Kit?”

Kit laughed. “Only to go to the bathroom. Which they won’t even let me do alone,” he added, giving Jessie a cool look.

Her cheeks frizzed when the doctor grinned at her.

“Well, then I think you’ll be up to moving to a wheelchair. I’ll have a nurse come get you in a minute, and we’ll take you down to the CAT room. So, pretty ladies, help him sit up and baby him while I go fetch a wheelchair for his drag race down to the second floor,” he grinned, then he left the room.

Kit had seen TV shows about CAT scanners, but the reality of it was... big. It was a huge machine that took up the back half of the room in which it was placed, looking like some kind of mutant plastic donut. Kit was placed on the moving table in the middle, and a camera-looking device orbited around him behind the cover of the device. It was a rather dull experience, actually, for he had to lay in there and be still for a quite a while. “So, this is like an MRI?” he asked the technician as the machinery hidden inside the machine continued to hum.

“Kinda the same principle,” the rabbit replied from behind his shielded position. “But CAT scanners are actually X-ray machines, where an MRI uses magnetic fields. CT scans are good for what they’re looking for here, damaged tissues around the sternum. Those will show up in the imaging very clearly. They could have used an MRI to do it too, but they won’t put you in an MRI because of the screws in your back.”

“But the screws in my back are supposed to be titanium. That’s not magnetic, is it?”

“Nope, but there’s also some radio waves used, which would cause the screws in your back to heat up,” he answered. “It wouldn’t make them melt or anything, but given where those screws are, I can see why the doctor didn’t want to take any unnecessary risks. If they thermally expanded too far, they might crack the bones they’re in...and those bones aren’t in a very good place for such a thing to happen.”

“Ah. I didn’t know that.”

“Well, now ya do,” the technician chuckled.

The CAT scan took about thirty minutes total, and he was back in a wheelchair being pushed by a rather burly bobcat nurse or orderly, he wasn't sure, who chatted amiably at him while taking him back up to his room. "You should talk to some of the docs about fixing that ear," he noted as they came out of the elevator. "It doesn't look like it would be all that hard for them to make as good as new."

Kit was quiet a moment, recalling what Jessie said about his ear. I can't imagine what you'd look like with your ear whole, she'd said to him. It's almost like this was how you were meant to be to me, you know?

"No," he said as the orderly pushed open his door. "I like my ear just the way it is."

Jessie eventually lost the battle, because Kit cheated. Outrageously.

While she and Vil were down at the cafeteria getting something to eat, Kit called the nurse, who called Doctor Barnett for him. He told them he was worried that Jessie was going to flunk school if something wasn't done, so he asked the doctor to force Jessie out of the room after visiting hours were done that night. She just had to go back to school, she couldn't miss two days in a row. She'd be so far behind that it would take her a week to get back up to speed, and that didn't count the bad grades from missed work, the possibility of doing poorly on tests, and having absences on her record that might cost her if she had another emergency this semester and had to miss more classes.

"So, you want me to step out in front of that semi, do ya?" Barnett laughed over the phone. "Don't answer that. Sure, I'll be the evil meanie for ya. If worrying about her is keeping you from getting your rest, well, something's gotta be done about it."

And so it came to pass. The crew came back after work and hung out in his room for a while. Rick and Savid brought a laptop and showed him the layout of the next issue, including the front page picture of him in his hospital bed, with Jessie and Vil sitting on each side, and him giving a thumbs-up to the camera. Barry had done a story about the shooting, which read almost like something out of Newsweek given its detail and the number of interviews he did with the police and the hospital. It ran three whole pages, which created an issue with 26 pages rather than the usual target of between 20 and 24. He told them he'd be out by Friday, which relieved everyone greatly, and caused Barry to furiously edit part of the story he'd written about it.

They hung around for a few hours, and then drifted out one by one, until Rick was the last one. And much to Kit's happiness, Martha stopped by to see him. Martha was a surprisingly tall great dane, which made her a pretty good match for Rick. But she was a plump as she was tall, a middle-aged woman who enjoyed eating the food she cooked, and had a very matronly and caring personality. She'd raised three sons with Rick, all three out of the house now and two in college. Martha had been a part time worker before their youngest left for school at LSU, but now she'd taken up working full time in a crafts store, for she was exceptionally good at sewing and was a good expert to have about for questions asked by customers.

"Martha!" he said happily as she came into the room.

"Hello dear," she said with a smile, bringing in a fruit basket and a covered box. "I brought you some dinner, I thought you might be about sick of hospital food."

“You’re a lifesaver, Martha,” he said with a laugh. “What is it?”

“Meat loaf, mashed potatoes, green beans, and some homemade rolls,” she answered. “And how are you feeling?”

“Fine, just a little achy, and the bandages itch,” he grinned, his eyes locked on that box in her paw.

She laughed. “I take It you’re hungry?”

“For real food? You bet I am. Jessie won’t leave long enough to cook me anything.”

“Oh, don’t push this on me, you silly male,” Jessie laughed. “You never asked for me to make you something.”

“But you know I hate hospital food,” he said, looking at her. “You should have sensed my hunger and distaste for hospital food and taken action!” He sighed. “And here I thought we were perfect for each other. I’m starting to re-evaluate the foundations of our relationship, pretty kitty.”

She whacked him with the spare pillow, albeit gently and carefully, little more than a light tap to his muzzle.

“I’ll give you foundations for our relationship when I get you home,” she threatened, though she was smiling. “You seem to forget who’s going to be the one taking care of you when you’re out of here.”

“Uh, Rick, think I can borrow Mickey’s old bedroom?”

Martha laughed. “Oh no, you made that bed, young’un, time to lay in it,” Martha warned.

“Maybe they’ll hold me here for a few more days,” Kit mused, which made Jessie laugh.

“Well, it’s good to see you in such high spirits,” Martha said, taking Rick’s paw.

“High spirits is a good term for it,” he grunted. “The meds they had me on made me as high as a kite up until about this morning. I think I’d rather take the pain over that.”

“I kept saying that while I was pregnant,” Martha chuckled. “Then the contractions came. They couldn’t give me enough painkillers after the truth was staring me in the face.”

“My reasoning is a little different, Martha,” Kit said.

“When Kit broke his back, they had him on some pretty strong stuff,” Vil said. “After he started to heal, they had to wean him off of it.”

“Yeah,” Kit nodded. “Martha, this is my sister Vil. Vil, Martha, Rick’s wife.”

“It’s nice to finally meet the legend in person,” Martha smiled, taking Vil’s paw.

Vil laughed. “A legend in my own mind maybe,” she winked.

“I’m sorry it took so long for me to come see you. I was in El Paso yesterday to see Brian. When Rick called and told me what happened, I wanted to come back to see you, but I couldn’t trade in my plane ticket,” she said with a sigh. “And I wanted to make you something nice when I did get back.”

“I’m so glad you did,” he said as Jessie unpacked the box for him, and before his eyes was real food. “How was Brian?” he asked.

“Same as always. Like a big teddy bear. He sent you a get well soon card, by the way.”

“Tell him thank you from me. How did the interview go?”

She smiled. “He hasn’t heard anything solid yet, but he had a good feeling about it. To think our oldest is going to follow his old man into the journalism business. I would have hoped for something better for him,” she said, giving her husband a smile and a teasing poke.

Kit laughed. “Well, tell him congratulations from me.”

“Dear, working at KXEP is a hell of a lot different from what we do,” Rick chuckled. “Brian has a face for television. A mug like mine’s best served staying in print.”

“What is Brian going to be doing? Reporting?” Vil asked.

“Brian’s a meteorologist,” Rick answered. “He’s going to be doing weather forecasts for a TV station in El Paso. It’s his first big break since getting out of college.”

“He’s our oldest,” Martha added. “Our younger boys are still in college.”

“You sent three kids through college? That must have been expensive,” Vil noted.

“It was a challenge, that’s for sure,” Martha said. “You’re looking at the two biggest misers in Texas, Vil honey. We don’t make pennies squeak, we make the beg for mercy.”

“Well, I’m impressed. That’s quite an accomplishment. Congratulations.”

“Well, now I can say I know a TV weatherman,” Kit chuckled.

“He’ll be doing weekends and off hours stuff for a while, but after he’s been there a while he might move up,” Rick said modestly. “Brian’s a handsome boy, and he’s actually pretty good at his job. It just in the TV business, looking good on camera’s almost as important as predicting the weather.”

“Yes, Brian doesn’t look like a patchwork quilt like his father,” Martha said, which made Vil laugh.

“If I recall, dear, my fur is what me got me my first date,” he told her.

“Well, not everyone has good taste like I do,” she said.

Martha got to know Vil as Jessie tried to feed him, and he kept slapping her paw away. “There’s nothing at all wrong with my right arm, you silly kitty,” he told her teasingly.

“Well, excuse me for worrying about you,” she returned with a slight smile.

It was a wonderful meal, almost tasting heavenly after two days of hospital food. Martha was a good cook, and he was ever fond of meat loaf. After he finished eating, Doctor Barnett came into the room. “Well, I hate to break up this little party, including food,” he said, glancing at the plate on the little wheeled tray, “but Kit’s going to need a good rest for tomorrow. So I hate to tell you all this, but his visiting hours are over. For everyone,” he said with a smile, but quite firmly, staring right at Jessie and Vil.

“But he—“

“Doctor’s orders, little lady,” Barnett said firmly. “He’s going to be busy tomorrow, so it’s best to just wait until he’s ready to be discharged before you come back.”

“So that means you will be in school tomorrow, young lady,” Kit said adamantly. “Vil, make sure it happens.”

“I’m not going to be able to concentrate at all,” she complained.

“That doesn’t matter,” he said. “What matters is you show up, so they don’t mark you absent again. I’m sure we can arrange it so they don’t discharge me until after you get out of your last class.”

“What time is that?” Barnett asked.

“Around four,” Kit answered for her.

“Oh, definitely. He probably won’t be discharged until around five,” he said with a nod.

“See? So go to school tomorrow, and Vil can come pick you up and come back just in time to take me home.”

“Alright,” she sighed. She leaned down and gave him a lingering kiss, then Vil kissed him on the cheek and patted him on the shoulder.

“I’ll take her home,” Vil said.

“I drove here.”

“Give your keys to Marcus, he’ll drive your car back for you,” she said. “I’d rather take you home myself. We have some things to talk about.”

“I—okay. See you tomorrow, my handsome fox,” she said. “You can call me if you get lonely.”

“I’ll be fine,” he told her. “I’ll call you before I go to sleep, just so you know I’m okay.”

“You’d better,” she said, nuzzling him.

Barnett herded them all out of the room as they said goodbye, and he leaned back against his pillow and sighed. Truth be told, he’d rather have his sister and Jessie with him, but it was for their own good. Jessie had to go to school tomorrow, and Vil would be too much of a worrier to get much rest. He appreciated their concern, but in this case, it was more of a detriment to them than it was a boon for him to be comfortable to allow them to go on with it. Jessie needed to go to school, and Vil needed a night in a bed so she could get some real sleep. Those two femmes meant a great deal to him, and he’d make damn sure they were both okay.

Fortunately for him, things went very smoothly in the hospital. All the tests they did showed that the surgeons had repaired the damaged tissues around his sternum perfectly, and there was no sign of infection. The wounds were already healing, and things looked quite favorable. Favorable enough for them to return his pants to him—his shirt and coat had been cut off of him and were trash now—and Vil had one of her panther bodyguards bring an oversized shirt she bought for him to put on, his arm lashed to him by a sling under the shirt. He felt a heck of a lot better after he had on real clothes, even if they didn’t want him moving any more than absolutely necessary. He felt a little lonely, that was certain, but he could handle it.

It did make the time crawl by, though. They wanted him to rest, to not move around, and he wasn’t used to that. He was an active fox, and he didn’t realize how active he was until they didn’t want him to move around.

He laid in bed for a while and tried to watch TV, but TV never really interested him and he could only watch so much news before he got depressed about the sad state of the world. After that petered out, he sat at the little table by the window and read newspapers the nurses brought him, then started on one of the books from home that Vil had had her panther guards go retrieve the day before.

Some people watched inane TV. Kit read history books about Rome, Greece, and the ancient civilizations.

But his heart wasn't really in it. He basically drifted through the day, waiting for them to let him go home, waiting to see his sister and Jessie again. He guessed it was a delayed reaction after the fact, but now he felt strangely vulnerable, and being alone was more unnerving than it was restful. All he wanted was to be around his family and friends, to be near them and know they were alright, and know he was alright.

A cat orderly did bring him a present around noon. It was a copy of Lone Star, and there on the cover was a picture of him, Vil, and Jessie, and underneath it read the title He's Okay!

That was sweet of the crew, really.

He got curious, and read the article. The article read much like what he'd heard Rick and the officers say, and it did specifically state that it was Rick who had shot and killed the attacker, and that the accomplice was up to the time of printing still at large.

The last two paragraphs were what caught his attention:

Kit is slated for release from Austin General on Friday afternoon, and is expected to make a full recovery. We hope to have him back in the office keeping our facts straight very soon. Well-wishers are encouraged to drop him an email here at the magazine. Letters can be emailed to kit@lonestarmagazine.com.

A $50,000 reward has been offered for information that leads to the arrest and conviction of the accomplice that participated in the attack. Anyone who has any information about this attack should call the Austin Police, the Texas Rangers, or Crimestoppers.

A reward? Naturally...that had to be Vil. But he wouldn't say anything about it. He wanted that other bastard to be found and thrown in jail, and if there was a big bounty on his head, the chances he'd be caught were much better.

He leafed through the magazine, knowing what was in it but having nothing better to do than read it...until he got to the mailbag. The School Daze strips were gone. In their place was one of Jeffrey's drawings, a three panel comic that took up the entire top half of the page. In all three, there were very realistic sketches of Jessie, in a dark, gloomy kind of background. In the first, she was standing far to the left side of the empty page, in the distance, her head bowed and her paws before her. The caption read I didn't know what you meant to me until I almost lost you. In the second panel, she was closer, her back to the viewer, looking into the distance. The caption read I thought we had forever. In a second, I almost lost forever. In the third, it was a close-up of her, her expression hopeful. Life is too short, and love is too precious, my handsome fox. Will you marry me?

He was stunned.

Either Jeffrey was playing the worst joke in the history of the universe, or Jessie had proposed to him using the magazine.

It took him almost five full minutes to wrap his mind around what he was seeing. When he did, when he finally got his senses, he was on the phone so fast he almost tore his stitches reaching for the phone with his bound left arm, forgetting it was in a sling. He called the office first, and heard Marty's voice answer. "Lone Star," he called.

"If you don't get Jeffrey on the phone right now, I'm going to come down there and strangle you with a mouse cord," Kit said in a deadly voice.

Marty laughed. "I can do that, honey," he beamed over the phone, then he was put on hold. Jeffrey picked it up almost immediately, and Kit could hear that it was on speaker. "Kit, I thought you might call," he said, then Kit heard almost everyone laughing in the office.

"If that was a joke, I'm gonna—"

"No joke!" Jeffrey told him. "Jessie wrote it and asked me to draw it. It's serious, bud. She proposed to you."

Kit was silent a long moment. Shy Jessie had proposed to him...by using a public magazine? That was almost...almost...insane! In both regards! It was insane that she would propose to him, since she was so traditional, but it was even more insane that she would do it literally in the public venue!

"Kit? You there?" Mike asked, snickering.

“I’m here,” he said woodenly, which caused even more laughter. “So, what’s the answer!” they all shouted in unison.

“As if you even have to ask that,” he snorted, then he laughed. “Rick?”

“Yeah, son?”

“Why did you let Jessie go through with that?”

“It was what she wanted, son, and besides, I wasn’t going to say a word. It wasn’t my place.”

Kit sighed. “You realize I’m going to get all of you for this.”

“Such are the declarations of males who can’t do a damned thing about it,” Lilly laughed. “So answer her!”

“My answer is in Rick’s desk,” Kit said. “Can you bring it to the hospital, Rick? I’d like to have it handy.”

“I’ll bring it right now, Kit,” he said with a chuckle, as the others all started demanding what he meant. “Kit bought Jessie a ring,” he said, meant for the others, but audible to him. “A damn fine one at that. He had it with him when he was shot. He was attacked more or less on the way to go propose to her.”

That wasn’t quite the way it happened, but Rick had planted that seed before Kit could even say a word, and he realized that it would be impossible to get that idea out of their minds. They all begged to see it, and Kit relented. There was a pause, and then came gasps from the crew as they must have been looking at it. “My God, Kit, how much did that cost?”

“A lot,” Kit answered. “Why do you think I’ve been walking to work the last month?”

“You sold your truck? Damn!” Barry gasped.

“No, I was just saving money on gas,” he laughed in reply.

“I’ll be there in about fifteen minutes, son,” Rick told him. “Just hang in there.”

“Yo, Kit. I’m saving the original board for you,” Jeffrey added, then he hung up the phone.

Kit spent that fifteen minutes in a bit of a daze. He’d already bought a ring, and if he wouldn’t have been shot, he would have looked for the right opportunity to propose to her. But this, this just overwhelmed him. Jessie had gone against her personality, her nature, even her training as a young lady in what she did. He was amazed. He was astounded. He was...happy. That she would do something like that for him, so much against her nature, it showed how much she loved him. She proposed to him! She beat him to the punch!

God, what a femme!

Rick arrived while he was pondering it. He came in and shook Kit’s hand, then produced the little box holding the ring. “Here it is, son,” he said. “Now, when are you going to give it to her?”

“The first thing when I get home,” he grinned in reply. “Now I want you to back me up if she asks about the ring,” he said. “You’re my witness, boss, I had the ring before today. I had marriage on my mind long before she had Jeffrey draw that strip.”

Rick laughed. “You surely did. And I’ll make sure to tell her when she shows it to me.”

“I knew you were a good guy,” Kit grinned.

Kit’s waiting grew almost unbearable after Rick went back to the office. He wanted to see Jessie. He wanted to see her now, but she wouldn’t be there until after four. And having to remain calm and sedate made it worse. Five separate times, he got verbally spanked by the nurses for too much moving around. At one point, they even called in Doctor Barnett, and they threatened to tie him to the bed if he didn’t either sit down or lay down and remain stationary.

It was an eternity. He almost started watching the clock, waiting... waiting...waiting. The time between three and four was absolute hell, knowing he’d see her soon, but knowing it was so far away. He was like a hyper child waiting for Christmas, unable to sleep, unable to get out of bed for fear that Santa would pass his house by, trapped into an eternity of waiting for the desired prize at the other end of that long tunnel. Doctor Barnett threatened to medicate him if he didn’t calm down around about 3:15, when they gave him a final checkup, took his blood pressure, and drew blood one final time to test for any infection. They sent it off to the lab while the nurses changed his bandage, and Barnett stayed in the room to keep him from pacing while they waited for the reply.

That was the torture. Barnett kept him solidly in his chair, where all he could do was tap his foot and wait for the lab to do whatever it was they did.

A few minutes after four, the answer came. “Well, your white count is normal, no unusual spikes anywhere,” he said. “That’s that, Kit. You’re outta here. Call your ride, and I’ll have the nurse get the papers ready.”

He was on the phone seconds after Barnett left the room. He called Vil's cell, and she picked it up before it could even ring once. "Hello?"

"Sis, I'm being released!" he told her happily. "Can you go get Jessie and come pick me up?"

"I already have her. I just picked her up from school. We'll be there in about twenty minutes."

"Don't be late, I need to talk to Jessie!" he told her. "I mean I really need to talk to Jessie. Put her on."

"I rather thought you might," she said in an amused voice, then hung up before he could press her.

That bitch! Oh, she was gonna get it!

Calling back would be pointless. Vil just wouldn't answer the phone. He was forced to wait.

He did get a little sidetracked when Barnett came back in with a nurse and some papers. He basically allowed Kit to sign out of the hospital, then sign some agreements about his home care. A nurse would come twice a day to check on him and check his bandages, and once a day, about 8:00pm, Barnett himself would be making a house call to check his progress. He'd have to return in two weeks to have the stitches taken out, but that could be done at the outpatient clinic, which was in an annex building across the street from the hospital. Barnett brought him an extra sling, just in case he had to remove the one he had, and explained to him how to put it on by demonstrating with the spare, as his nurse put it on him.

He didn't hear the door open, but he definitely heard her voice. "Kit?"

He turned around, and she hurried to him. She stopped just before him, reaching out but afraid to embrace him, but he didn't give her a chance. His good arm reached out and dragged her into an embrace, and he put his right arm around her, holding her shoulder, and did nothing more. He just held onto her, tightly, his cheek against the side of her head. She put her paws in the only place she felt safe to hold him, low on his back, and just leaned against him contentedly.

“Jessie,” he breathed.

“Yes, Kit?”

“I'm going to murder Jeffrey,” he told her.

She giggled. “So, you saw it.”

“And we're going to talk about that when we get home,” he told her. “There's something I want to say to you, but it can wait until we're in private.”

“An answer?”

“You'll find out.” He let go of her, and looked to Vil. “Take me home, sis.”

And she did. There was a limo waiting in the pickup lane. Vil's two panther bodyguards helped him into the limo, and Vil and Jessie got in behind him. Jessie kept giving him expectant looks, but Vil just sat over there with a little smile on her face. She knew him, she knew him well.

He kept his peace until he was home. They helped him out, and Jessie opened the door for him and led him into the apartment. Vil stopped at the door, but did not come in. She just gave him a knowing smile, and then slowly closed it, leaving them alone.

“Kit, I just—“

“No, my pretty kitty, don’t say a word. We’ve always joked about marriage, and I’ve talked about it, but I’ve never done anything to prove to you how serious I was.” He dug into his pocket. “The day I was shot, Jessie, I was bringing you this. I’d just picked it up that day.”

He held out the box to her.

Her fingers trembled when she took it from him, and then her eyes widened and she gasped when she opened it. “That’s why I was walking to work, pretty kitty. And why I’ve had no food in the house for the last month. I was saving for this. I wanted to propose to you, Jessie, but you beat me to it.”

He put his paw over one of the paws holding the ring box, and he knelt down. “Jessica Desdemona Williams, I love you. I want to spend the rest of my life with you. Will you marry me?”

“YES!” she screamed, dropping to her knees and kissing him passionately, even as she was very mindful of his injury. She put her chin on his shoulder, and behind his back, she took the ring out of the box and slipped it on her finger. “I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan, and I want to be together with you always. I want to have your children, and watch them grow, and grow old with you. I want the forever that was almost taken from us.”

She kissed him again, and he heard Vil chuckling at the doorway. “That’s not something you do on your knees, you two. And congratulations.”

Jessie’s cheeks frizzed, and she laughed helplessly. “Did you buy him the ring, Vil?”

“Nope. If it was me, it would have been a hell of a lot bigger. Rick told me about the ring yesterday, but swore me to secrecy. Kit bought it before he was shot.”

“So now you know, my pretty kitty,” he breathed in her ear. “I was touched by your proposal, I really was. But the traditionalist femme in you can rest easy knowing that I was half a heartbeat from it. If not for being shot, I’d have proposed already.”

“I love you!” she said happily. “When can we have the ceremony?”

“Oh, I don’t know,” he chuckled. “After I heal for one, and after you’re sure you can handle such a big change in your life without it affecting school for another.”

“So, a month?” she offered.

“Oh, hell no,” Vil called. “My little brother’s getting married. You’re not going to run to some judge somewhere and get married in a little office! Oh no, this calls for a real wedding!”

“Hell no,” Kit growled, looking at his sister.

“Come on, I dare you to fight about it,” she said pugnaciously. “You want to deny Jessie a chance at the kind of wedding little girls dream about?”

That bitch. She knew exactly how to attack him. He could reject her help all day, but as soon as Jessie’s happiness got involved, he just had no defense. He couldn't deny her anything.

"Then I'll leave it up to her. Jessie gets to plan the wedding."

"Actually, that's my parents' job," Jessie giggled.

"The way your mother feels about me? It would likely involve machine guns and land mines."

Jessie laughed, then got up and helped Kit back to his feet, but she kept her arm around him and stayed in his embrace. "I'll have to tell them," she said. "Want me to tape it for you?"

"I should be able to hear it clearly if I just go outside," he said dryly, which made both Jessie and Vil laugh.

"I think she might calm down a little once she knows we're engaged, my handsome fox," she said. "Not much, though. I guess I should get used to that," she sighed. "It's going to make visiting my folks a little tense."

"It'll all work out," Vil assured them. She came over and put an arm around each of them, hugging them both. "I'm very happy for both of you," she told them. "And I'm going to go back home now, Kit. You're going to be okay, and I can go home knowing that you're home, you're going to be just fine, and you've done what you should have done a month ago."

"I wasn't ready a month ago," he said, looking into Jessie's eyes adoringly. "I didn't have a ring. I couldn't propose without a ring."

"I would have said yes," she told him with a loving smile. "Ring or no ring."

"I'd never take anything you deserve away from you, my pretty kitty," he said softly.

“Then never leave me,” she told him, her heart in her eyes.

“Never.”

“I’ll make sure of that,” Vil told them with a chuckle. “It’s a guarantee.” She kissed Kit on the cheek, then kissed Jessie on the cheek. “Now then, it’s time for me to go. I have a lot to do, a wedding to plan, and some family members to castrate.”

“Behave,” Jessie told her seriously.

“I promise to do my best to do things the way you want,” she said honestly. “But I reserve the right to deal with them in the way they deserve.”

“Just remember what I said.”

“I won’t kill them. But when I’m done, they’ll wish they were dead,” she said in a cold, deadly voice that made Jessie physically flinch.

Jessie laughed. “I think I can live with that.”

“I’m glad you can. Jessie, call your parents tonight and tell them.”

“I will. I’ll call them right now.”

“Good. Be good to each other, you two. And call me, both of you. Every day.”

“We will,” Kit assured with a nod.

Vil left then, left so abruptly that it surprised him a little bit. He expected her to stay at least until tomorrow...but then again, Vil was still bristling mad, and that made her a little unpredictable. Now that Kit was safely home—no doubt with an army of security guards surrounding Westwood, all out of sight—she felt it was safe to leave him now, and get on to the business of rabid, no-holds-barred, bare-knuckled payback.

May God speed her on that journey.

Kit leaned down and kissed Jessie tenderly, just revelling in the thought of it. They were engaged. They were going to be married...and all he could think was finally!

“Well, what now, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan?” she asked with a light smile but loving eyes.

“Now, you call your parents,” he told her.

“I want to move in. Tonight. Now.”

“I want you here,” he returned. “But your parents need to know.”

She looked down at the ring on her finger, then she looked up at him. “I love you, my handsome fox,” she said simply, nuzzling him.

“And I love you, my pretty kitty.”

Vil settled herself in the limo, feeling very satisfied. It seemed that her gentle nudging had been all it took to get those two together, and now that they were engaged, she was quite content about.

But there were things to do. From what she’d learned so far, the orders had come out of Boston, but so far her investigators had not narrowed down exactly who gave the order. Whoever did it was very, very careful, obviously fearful of being discovered.

Not fearful of the law. Fearful of her. Vilenne Vulpan was fifty times worse than the law.

“Marcus, laptop please,” she called. The panther took her laptop from the front seat and passed it back to her, and she set it on her lap.

“Shall I call the airport, madam?”

“Yes,” she answered as her laptop came up. “Tell them we’re not going straight to Boston.”

“Where are we going then, madam?”

The system came up. She open a file, a detailed report sent to her just in the last hour, showing the current progress on several projects, from shipyard business to her building legal challenge over the will to the search for who shot her brother. “Cincinnati,” she finally answered. “I think I want to meet Jessie’s shrew of a mother face to face.” She went to another file, holding the telephone numbers of certain individuals that the law would very much like to see disappear. “And step on her.”

“Very well, madam,” Marcus acknowledged.

Chapter 8

Judging from the fireworks he could hear over the cell, Hannah reacted to the news pretty much well the way he expected.

He sat on the couch as Jessie paced back and forth through the living room, listening to her. To her credit, she didn't try to hedge or try to work her into it. Jessie knew that her mother would object, so she went right to the point. Within two minutes of making the call, the message was delivered...in surprising terms.

“Mom, listen. Kit proposed to me, and I accepted,” she stated, in an even voice. That was it. No softening the blow, no using more flowery language. The facts, straight up.

The eruption came immediately. Kit couldn't make out Hannah's words, but he could definitely hear her screaming, even from that distance. Hannah raged at her daughter for long moments, as Jessie remained quiet, but then she retaliated when Hannah played out the initial salvo. “Now you listen to me!” Jessie barked. “I don't care how you feel about it, Mom! This is my life! I love him, and I want to marry him! You can either accept that, or you can not accept it. That's your choice. But don't ever think that there is any way you can ever make me change my mind.”

He heard her tone change, from demanding and outraged to wheedling, but Jessie just stonewalled her. “If you're not going to do anything but tell me how I'm messing up my life, mother, than I think I have nothing more to say to you. Allow me to introduce you to your favorite way to end an argument!”

Then she hung up.

Kit laughed delightedly, then winced a little when it sent a little shiver of pain through his shoulder. “That’s giving her her own medicine,” he said with an approving nod.

The phone rang again almost immediately. Jessie opened it, closed it, then deliberately turned it off. “I’m glad she doesn’t have my cell number,” she laughed. “Let’s call Rick and tell him the news.”

The news was spread quickly. It was Friday, the late day at work, so everyone was there when Jessie called them. “He’s putting it on the speaker in the office,” she told him, as she set the cellphone to speaker as well and held it out for them. “Rick? Guys?” Jessie called.

“We’re here, hon,” Rick said.

“All of us!” Lilly called.

“So, what did he say?” Marty asked.

“That’s a stupid question, Marty!” Kit called. “But I had to do it properly. Kneeling down and everything.”

There was a wild celebratory whoop from the office. “Congratulations, guys!” Jeffrey said.

“I’ll put it up on the website!” Mike called happily. “Did you finish that drawing, Jeffrey?”

“I drew up a new board announcing the engagement,” Jeffrey said to them. “It has you two kissing, and just the word yes in big letters across the top,” he added.

“You didn't!” Jessie gasped, her cheeks ruffling.

“Hey, if you’re gonna propose in a magazine, it’s only fair to the readers to see the answer,” Jeffrey laughed.

“Congratulations you two, really,” Rick said. “Son, I’ll drop by in a few minutes and bring you your laptop.”

“Thanks, boss.”

“What did the hospital say?”

“I’m on extended rest at home,” he answered. “Restricted activity, but I hope to be back at work in a couple of weeks at the most. It’s not that strenuous to sit at a desk, after all. I just won’t be typing very fast until I get rid of this sling,” he chuckled.

“Don’t push yourself, bud,” Barry called. “We’ll be here.”

“Maybe I teach you edit while your arm heals,” Savid offered.

“Hey, that’d be cool,” Kit said brightly.

“Only if you can do it here,” Jessie warned. “The doctor told him to rest, and I’ll make sure he rests,” she said. “I’m going to move in with him.”

“You go femme!” Lilly said happily. “Get those claws in him and don’t let go til after he says I do!”

“She’s not going to be dragging me to the altar, Lilly,” Kit laughed. “I’m entering into that nightmare willing and able.”

“Nightmare?” Jessie asked with an arched brow.

“I’ll enjoy the torment,” he said, giving her a kiss.

“I hope so,” she teased, nuzzling him.

“Now if only we had someone there to take pictures of that warm and fuzzy moment,” Mike mused, which made Kit laugh.

“Well, I think we’ll let you get back to work,” Jessie told them. “I need to go buy some groceries and cook him something for dinner.”

“No, no, no cooking,” Rick said. “I’m coming by, I’ll bring you something. What do you want?”

“Pizza,” Kit said hungrily.

Rick laughed. “Pizza it is. What kind and where from?”

“Pizza Hut,” they said in unison “A medium supreme for me,” Kit said.

“Get me something without mushrooms,” Jessie said. “Outside of that, I’m not picky.”

“Got it. I should be down in about half an hour, kids. Don’t start eating the carpet before I get there.”

Jessie laughed. “I may not be here, Rick, I still have to go to the store. There’s almost nothing to eat here. Kit’s been starving himself to buy my ring. And I’m not too happy about that,” she said, giving him a stern look.

“Well, I am,” he told her.

“Uh, you have money for that, hon? I can—“

“I’m fine, Rick. Vil gave me a pre-engagement present.”

“Oh, she did not—“

“It’s alright, Kit,” she said placatingly. “She knew you were broke because you bought the ring. She gave me two thousand dollars to hold us over until you get better. We do have to pay the rent and the bills and eat, you know. And since you don’t have insurance, she didn’t know if you had any kind of workman’s comp to pay you while you heal.”

“Well, I guess that’s alright,” he said. “At least she didn’t try to give you a check. I wouldn’t put it past her.”

“She’s tried,” Jessie giggled. “But I keep telling her no.”

“Well, that was nice of her,” Marty said. “Think she might want to take care of me?”

“You’re not her type, Marty,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, I wouldn’t have let you get tossed into the street,” Rick chuckled. “You’re not just my workers, you’re my family too. And families watch out for each other.”

“Aww, I feel a group hug coming on,” Mike said in a gushy voice, then he squealed when someone must have slapped him or something.

“I’ll get a move on, kids. Be there in a bit.”

“Well, what shall we do while we wait for Rick?” Jessie asked after they said their goodbyes and closed the phone.

“I can think of something, future Misses Vulpan,” he said, pulling her against him. She giggled and cuddled in with him.

“I think I can go to the store after we eat,” she said with a contented sigh, leaning her head against his shoulder and neck, and then she began to purr.

John thought that perhaps Hannah had gone a bit too far this time.

He sat in his chair in front of the TV, turned off, with a book in his paws, trying to focus on reading while Hannah stormed around the house, carrying the telephone with her. She'd been trying to call Jessica back for nearly two hours, hitting redial every few minutes, pacing back and forth and back and forth, from the kitchen to the foyer and back again. She was quite furious and outraged, and John was keeping his mouth shut.

Unlike Hannah, John wasn't half as opposed to the idea. Oh, he certainly felt that Jessica was too young to get married, and that she should have most definitely finished school first...and that might still happen. What little he'd managed to piece together so far was that Jessica was engaged, that she didn't elope. There was time to try to convince her to hold off on the actual wedding until after she graduated from school, when she could more diligently focus herself on the change of lifestyle that came with having a spouse. But where Hannah was violently opposed to Jessica's choice in males, John wasn't. Kit seemed to be a decent, hard-working sort that would treat Jessica well, but no amount of trying to explain it to Hannah was going to move her. For her, this was personal, and it wasn't about Jessica. It was about her own father.

He could see that rather clearly. Hannah's father was a fox, and he had not been a good father to her, nor a good husband to her mother. He'd been a lazy, shiftless sort who cheated on Hannah's mother at the drop of a hat, yet her mother wouldn't leave him because she loved him. It was quite a sad situation, actually. Victor had used Patricia, living off of her, cheating on her, and when Hannah was nine, Patricia had finally reached her limit and laid down an ultimatum to Victor. He would either shape up or ship out.

And he left...but not before cleaning out the bank accounts and taking as much furniture as he could fit in his truck while Patricia was at work and Hannah and her two brothers were at school.

Hannah spent most of her childhood listening to her mother tell her how no-good her fox father was, and it developed a prejudice against foxes in her mind. To her, all foxes were like her father. If Kit were a cat or a dog or something, John felt she wouldn't be quite this adamant about it, though she would still object to it. But since he was a fox, Hannah's personal prejudices were building on her protective impulses.

He almost felt sorry for her. Jessica was a very demure, shy young lady, but she was very willful. If she'd dug her claws in about marrying the fox, she wasn't going to be moved. Hannah could crash against that wall for the rest of her life, and it wasn't going to move. The only thing that would change Jessica's mind was herself, and the harder Hannah tried, the more she was going to alienate her daughter. Jessica loved her mother, but every child had a limit, and Hannah would push her to that limit. Hannah was just as willful as Jessica, and now that they were put on a collision course with each other, a train wreck was a virtual certainty. All he could hope was that the two of them didn't permanently poison their relationship.

He sighed a little as Hannah stormed through the living room, then reappeared immediately, stopped to dial the fox's number, and then she actually cursed and continued on. Ben came down from upstairs as she stormed past, a surprised look on his face. Ben was a very burly young man, tall and muscular, which was perfect for a football player. Ben took after his father in his coloration, with cream-colored fur everywhere but a dark patch of fur on his right shoulder and the right side of his back, hidden under his shirt. “Did Mom just say what I think she said?” he asked.

“Probably, son,” John said evenly, turning the page.

“What’s got her tail under the rocking chair?”

“Jessica.”

“What did Jessie do now?”

“It seems that her boyfriend proposed to her, and she accepted.”

“Woah, really?” John nodded. “Wow, I never thought Jessie would do something like that. No wonder Mom’s trying to claw up the furniture. I guess this is a bad time to ask to borrow the car,” he chuckled.

John was about to chide his son, but the doorbell rang. “I got it, it’s probably Hank,” Ben said, hurrying to the door. John went back to his book as Hannah came out of the kitchen. “Uh, can I help you?”

“I’m here to see your parents,” came an unknown voice.

“Sure. Please, come in.”

“Who is it, Ben?” Hannah asked as she moved towards the foyer, which was around the corner from the living room, just past the stairs. John heard Hannah gasp when she got to the corner. “I don’t believe we’ve met,” Hannah said, in a somewhat unfriendly tone.

“My name is Vilenne Vulpan,” came the reply. The sound of that name made John almost drop his book. Vilenne Vulpan? The boy’s sister, who he said was rich? “Kit is my brother, and I’m here to talk to you.”

“Uh, please, come in,” Hannah said, her voice a little uncertain. John looked up as Ben and Hannah led a rather short vixen into the living room. She was dressed in a plain gray business suit, with a skirt instead of slacks, and a little black tab-tie. Her eyes were just like the pictures that he’d seen on the computer of Kit, with her left eye amber and her right eye green. It must be some kind of shared trait between the two of them. Two huge panther males stepped into the room behind her, dressed in black suits, one of them carrying a briefcase.

John put his book in the chair beside him and stood up, then went over and shook her paw. “I’m John Williams,” he said in introduction. “My wife Hannah, and our son Ben. Please, sit down.”

She seated herself on the couch, her thick tail tucked in beside her, and she gave them a direct look as John and Hannah sat down in their chairs. Hannah looked a trifle piqued. Ben stood by the stairs, not getting involved but curious enough to hang around to listen. “First off. Has Jessie called?”

“Yes, she called,” Hannah said with pinched fury. “Have you talked to her? Do you know what she said?”

“She’s engaged,” Vilenne said simply. “To my brother.”

“And I would assume that your visit concerns this engagement? If I recall, you live in Boston, madam,” John said calmly, cutting off the certainly biting remark that Hannah was about to deliver. “What brings you to Cincinnati?”

“I was on my way home,” she said. “I arranged to stop over here so we could talk. First thing, I suppose. Did Jessie tell you what happened?”

“Not concerning the engagement?”

Vilene shook her head. "My brother, Kit, was shot just outside his office a few days ago," she told them.

Hannah gave her a startled look, and John gasped. "Dear Lord, is he alright?"

"He's home now," she told them calmly. "As far as gunshot wounds go, he was very lucky. His injury wasn't bad, and he's already home and on the mend. He'll be just fine."

"Well, that's good news at least."

"Thank you for your concern. But, obviously, that's not why I'm here. I'm here about your daughter and my brother." She leaned back a little. "Jessie told me that you're not...happy, about them."

"No, I'm not," Hannah finally said, a bit frostily.

"Why?" Vilene asked simply.

"Because she shouldn't be fooling around with boys while in school," Hannah said immediately. "And definitely not with a boy I don't know!"

"Have you tried to get to know him, or did you just immediately decide not to?" she asked, quite conversationally.

Hannah drew herself up, preparing to let this young vixen have it, but John raised his paw. Hannah might be a formidable woman, but this slight little vixen just oozed confidence. If Hannah got into a shouting match with her, she wasn't going to win. "Hannah, dear," he said urbanely.

"Don't you dear me, John!" she said icily. "It's quite clear she's siding with them on this matter!"

“Of course I am,” she said pleasantly. “I don’t think you understand those two very well, Misses Williams. You decided to take a stand without investigating. You don’t know my brother the way I do.”

“And you don’t know my daughter!”

“I know her quite well. We talk at least once a week,” she said dismissively. “Sometimes as often as every day.”

Hannah came up short. “She’s never told me that!”

“That’s because every time you call, all you ever do is nag her about my brother,” she answered.

Hannah took a stiff expression at the word nag. “I’m only doing what’s best for Jessica!”

“What’s best for Jessie? I don’t think so. What’s best for Jessie is to marry Kit,” she said calmly.

Hannah was about to start yelling, but John brought her up short. “And what makes you believe that?” he asked.

“Because Jessie is the best thing that ever happened to my brother,” she answered casually. “He absolutely worships her.”

“That’s no reason why it’s best for Jessie, it’s only what’s best for him!” Hannah snapped. “He’ll just use her and then throw her away when he’s done!”

“Just like a fox?” Vienne asked simply.

Hannah’s cheeks ruffled.

“Stav,” she called, reaching out her paw. One of the two panthers, the one with the briefcase, stepped forward and gave her the briefcase. “You don’t know my brother, Misses Williams,” she said calmly as she opened it on her lap. “I don’t think you appreciate what life has been like for him.” She took out a small pack of papers. “Our mother died when he was eight,” she began. “When that happened, our father pulled away from us. My father suffered from the same curse as my brother, Misses Williams. He loved too much. When my mother died, it destroyed him inside. He lost all interest in me and my brother, he left us to be raised by our butler and nannies. Seeing us reminded him of her, and he couldn’t stand it.

“That set the stage, I suppose. Kit hated our father for rejecting us, and he acted out. It got even worse when our father got over his grief enough to take interest in Kit again, but it wasn’t love. He wanted Kit to train to be the next Vulpan in line to run the family business. I won’t go into the details of it, but it ended when Kit turned sixteen, and he left the family after our father issued an ultimatum. When he did that, my father disowned him, but he couldn’t let it go. My father hounded my brother from that moment on. He couldn’t accept that Kit rejected him, and his obsession to bend Kit to his will became total hatred. My father did everything in his power to ruin Kit’s life after he left, to force him to crawl on his knees back to the family and beg to be taken back in. My father arranged it so Kit’s life was hell. He had people steal his things. He would get Kit fired from any job he could get. He once even had someone set fire to the apartment building where Kit was staying with a friend. Kit had no peace, Misses Williams. No peace, no safety, nothing. Can you imagine that, Misses Williams? A sixteen year old rich kid thrown on the streets, with no inkling of how the real world works, and a father with hundreds of millions of dollars trying to ruin anything he built for himself? Sometimes I'm amazed he managed to survive, but my brother is very strong.

“He wasn't alone, though. I love my brother, Misses Williams. When our mother died, I more or less became his mother. After our father disowned him, I did my best to make sure he could make it.”

“Pardon my curiosity, but what does any of that have to do with my daughter?” Hannah asked coldly. “We all had hard childhoods. So he made it, big deal. From the way it sounds, I'd not want my Jessica to have anything to do with someone carrying so many childhood scars. It just proves he's no good for my daughter.”

“Hannah!” John said in surprise.

“I see you're putting your own scars into this,” Vienne said with surprising calm. She opened one of the files in her paws. “This is the record of your father, Victor Cremeans,” she said, which made Hannah's eyes bulge. “Do you hate my brother because of who he is, or do you hate him because he reminds you of your father?” she asked with direct eyes.

“How dare you!” Hannah snapped, jumping to her feet, but the slender little fox just gave her a long, steady stare, a chilling stare that seemed to suck the defiance right out of his wife.

“You're not dealing with a child you can shout down, Misses Williams,” the little fox said with a biting tone. “I stare down the rulers of nations on a daily basis. You do not intimidate me in the slightest.” She closed the folder, then opened a different file. “I would guess that that's the main reason you hate my brother so much, but I think there's a little more to it. The past is the past, Misses Williams. The days of the Columbus Twenty are long past. Kit fully knows that Jessie is a mixed breed. She told him herself, I believe on their second date. My brother doesn't care about it. All he sees is her, not who her parents are. Or grandparents, in this case. Kit loves her for who she is, Misses Williams, not what she is."

"How did you know about that?" Hannah gasped, dropping back to her chair heavily, her eyes wide.

"I'm a businessfemme, Misses Williams. I never enter into any situation without being fully prepared. It took only about twenty minutes of studying your family to get an idea of why you hate my brother so much, and your history is a simple matter to dig up once one knows your maiden name. Simply put, Misses Williams, my brother is not your father, and her heritage never once crossed his mind. I told you where he comes from so you could get an idea of what kind of fox he is. My brother is strong, Misses Williams. He stood up to everything my father could throw at him, and he came through it. You have no idea how courageous he is. If you ever met my family, you'd understand. My family is not nice, Misses Williams. When Kit was disowned, they abandoned him, because they were more interested in the family's money than they were in my brother. When it was clear he wasn't going to be the heir, and my father was disowning him, they threw him away like so much garbage. When he was hit by a car and nearly killed, I heard my uncles complain that he survived, and my father was going to refuse to allow anyone to pay his bills in hopes that the lack of treatment would kill him."

Hannah's jaw dropped and she gaped at the vixen in shock. John felt his own level of outrage himself.

"Maybe now you understand what my brother faced?" she asked simply. "After that, Kit totally abandoned the family, except for me. He hates them now, and he won't have anything to do with them. He wants to make it on his own, without his family name, and without the family's money. Does that give you an idea how determined he is? Now, the other side of that is simple, Misses Williams. My brother is in love with Jessie. And I'm not talking about puppy love. He loves her. And before you ask how I know, mind that I basically raised him after our mother died, Misses Williams. I know him better than anyone on this planet.

“Before he met Jessie, my brother lived a transient life. He would ride a bus somewhere, get off, and work menial jobs until he had enough money to move on. Sometimes I think he did it to hide from our family, because they still hate him, and a family as rich as mine has a very long arm. Sometimes, I think he was looking for something. He was doing the same thing in Austin, and he was only a couple of days from leaving when he met Jessie. And that changed everything.”

“Within three days of meeting her, Misses Williams, he had a job, an apartment, and was starting to build a real life for himself,” she explained. “And he did it all just so he could date your daughter. He didn't want her going out with a homeless dishwasher, so he got a good job at a magazine, he got an apartment, and he created a stable foundation for himself so he could court her. That's how much he loves her, Misses Williams. He completely changed his entire way of life just to be worthy of her.”

She shuffled through the files in her paws. “I'm telling you this for two reasons. The first is so you can understand just how much Kit loves Jessie. She's his entire life, and he'd walk through fire for her. The second is so you understand my brother a little better. He's strong and courageous, and he won't give up on Jessie. He won't leave her, and he'll always be there for her. All he wants to do now is make her happy, even to the point of letting me do things for her he never let me do for him,” she said with a humorless chuckle. “He never let me buy him a car before he met her, but he didn’t mind one bit when I bought one for her.”

She gave Hannah another of those long, slightly ominous looks. “Now, Misses Williams. Did you have something to say to me?”

It hung there for a long moment. Hannah looked about ready to lay an egg, but then she screwed up her courage and drew herself up in her chair. “I don’t think a child pretending at being an adult should be walking in here telling me how I should think about my own daughter,” she declared with narrow eyes.

“This isn’t about your daughter. This is about my brother,” she said simply. “And I may be young, Misses Williams, but I run a multi-billion dollar corporation. I think that gives me at least the leeway to presume to think I know as much as someone your age, even if you’re almost old enough to be my mother.”

John cut it off before Hannah had a conniption. “I think you’re quite brave for coming here, but I think this is something Kit should have done himself.”

“No, that would have been quite impossible,” Vilenne said simply, staring at Hannah. “Because your wife would have never given him a chance.”

“Why should I give him a chance?” Hannah snapped. “I don’t have to even see him to know what kind of male he is!”

“Hannah, dear, you’re being rude,” John told her, a bit sternly.

“I don’t have to be polite!” she said hotly, whirling on him. “She can’t defend that tramp of a brother of hers! Didn’t you hear her? He’s a bum, a hobo! He'll leave our Jessie the instant he's bored with her!"

"Dear, I think you're only hearing what you want to hear," John said, with more authority. "I've humored you up to this point because I felt you'd eventually come to your senses, but this has gone on quite long enough. From what I know of Kit and what I've heard today, I'm actually quite at ease about the idea of him marrying Jessica."

"You can't be serious!" she gasped.

"Deadly. You took an instant dislike to the boy out of anger because Jessica was going out, and you refuse to let it go, even when it's abundantly clear that this is not Jessie going steady with Jack Singer back in high school. This is our Jessica finding a husband, which is what you've wanted for her all along. Now, you should take a good long look at this, Hannah. If you don't relent, you will push Jessie away. She's not going to give up on this marriage just because you disapprove. I'm rather sure of that."

"Perhaps if you did get to see them, you'd change your mind," Vilenne noted, taking a thick stack of photos out of her briefcase, inside a folder, and putting them on the coffee table between them.

"I don't want to see them! And I will not back down, John! That boy is going to ruin her life, you mark my words! And I will not stand for it!"

"Well, then, I guess my time here is done," she said, putting the papers back in her briefcase and closing it. "Since that's your decision, then now you will listen to mine. Kit and Jessie are getting married. Jessie wanted you to plan her wedding, as is traditional, but I'll be telling her that that's quite impossible. I'll have her plan it herself, and I'll be paying for it. And if I pay for it, you will not be invited," she said coldly to Hannah. "But you're more than welcome to come and give her away, Mister Williams," she said in a much more cordial tone. “And I’ll always be there for them, Misses Williams. If they have problems, they will come to me. When they need advice, they will come to me. When they need help, they will come to me. I will be the one having baby showers for Jessie, and sending their children birthday cards. I will be the part of their lives that you refuse to be. I will always be there to support them and help them, because I love my brother and I love Jessie, and I want them to be happy.

“There was a lesson in my story, Misses Williams, one you seem to have missed. My father’s anger with my brother turned into an obsession of hatred that destroyed Kit’s life and consumed my father like cancer. Before my father died, his hatred of Kit had blackened his soul and turned him into a miserable wretch. I think his heart gave out because it could no longer keep a soul like his alive on this Earth any longer. What I’ve heard from you here tonight is just the same as I heard from my father. Your hate has no rationality. It is hate for the sake of hate. And if you’re not careful, you will turn out exactly like my father. You will destroy everything good in your life, you will drive your daughter away, and your actions will tear your family apart like paper, just like it did mine.”

Hannah jumped to her feet and took a threatening step towards the vixen. Ben almost lunged to intercede, but one of those huge panthers put a big paw in front of him and shook his head. Vienne took a business card from her pocket and boldly stepped past Hannah and handed it to him. “This is my card, Mister Williams,” she said. “The number written in pencil at the bottom is to my personal cell phone. Call that number, and you will get me directly. If you have any questions, or you ever need help, just call me. You’re now a part of my family, and you’ll find that I’m always willing to help.”

“I’ll, ah, I’ll keep that in mind,” he said, glancing at Hannah. “I must say, you’re a very interesting young vixen.”

Vilene gave him an amazingly charming smile. “I’m full of surprises, Mister Williams,” she told him. “Marcus, could you call the car around?”

“Certainly, madam,” one of the two panthers said with a nod, and quickly let himself out.

“I’ll be going back to Boston now,” she told them. “I hope you think about what I said, Misses Williams, and ask yourself if holding on to your hate is worth losing your daughter.” She walked away from them before Hannah could respond, but she stopped in front of Ben, who looked down at her with some surprise. “Ben, is it? Or do you go by Benjamin?” she asked.

“Uh, Ben, ma’am,” he said uncertainly.

“You’re one hell of a running back,” she said with a grin.

“How do you know that?”

“I had Stav dig up some tape of your games. Like I said, I’m thorough when I come to a meeting,” she winked. “I had your entire life histories in those papers I pulled out of my briefcase. You should think about playing college ball. Given your moves, I think you could make it all the way to the NFL.”

“I’m hoping to.”

“Hmm,” she mused. “Which college do you want to play for?”

“Uh, well, I kinda want to play for Ohio State. I’ve been a Buckeye fan for like all my life.”

“Ohio State, eh?” she said with a mysterious smile. “I’m a U-Mass fan, myself. Too bad you don’t want to be a Minuteman, they could use a running game.” She patted him on the forearm. “Don’t worry too much, Ben. As good as you are, I’m sure you’ll get an offer from someone.”

John escorted her to the door, and a look outside showed a limo sitting on the street, the other panther at the door waiting for them. “I should thank you for spending the time and effort to come see us,” he told her. “Even if you didn’t get the outcome you wanted.”

“Oh, I’m not so sure about that,” she said with a smile. “At least you understand.”

“Ah, yes, well, you’ll find that when my wife digs in her claws, she’s almost impossible to move. It may take a few years for her to come around, when she sees beyond any shadow of a doubt that Jessica and Kit will stay together.”

“What she misses in that time is her own fault,” Vilenne shrugged. “All I care about is that Jessie will be unhappy because of her mother’s adamance, because nothing will stop her from marrying Kit.”

“She inherited her mother’s stubbornness,” John chuckled.

“And her father’s mind,” Vilenne added.

“Why thank you.”

“Just try to make it clear to her, Mister Williams. She’s on the losing end, and if she doesn’t admit defeat gracefully, she may miss out.”

“I can only try.”

“That’s all I can ask, Mister Williams.”

“I think you can call me John,” he chuckled.

“John,” she smiled. “My friends and family call me Vil.”

“Vil.”

“It was nice meeting you. Good evening.”

“You too.”

He watched her go, escorted by that hulk of a panther. The other panther opened the door for her and let her in, they got in with her, and then the limo drove away.

That, was a dangerous young vixen, he realized. Young, yes, but intelligent, and absolutely fearless. She took on a hostile Hannah in her own home, and stared her down. And Hannah was not timid!

He leaned against the doorframe and smiled. Well, if anything, he was even more secure in the idea of Jessica marrying Kit. Vilenne—Vil—had made it clear that she would be watching over them like a guardian angel.

A guadian angel with millions of dollars in the bank.

He closed the door and came back into the living room, where Hannah sat in her chair, still holding the phone, a look of fury and indignation on her face. She got up and threw the phone into her chair, then stormed to the stairs. “You can sleep on the couch,” she declared in a cold tone, then stomped up. Her footsteps pounded across the ceiling, and then he heard a door slam.

“Woah,” Ben said in a low tone. “I think Mom’s a little mad.”

“You think, son?” John chuckled. “Just give her time. That young vixen put some pretty convincing truths in front of her, and she’s just too stubborn to admit she's wrong."

"You think she's wrong?"

"I know she's wrong, son," he said simply. "I think Vilenne was right about that. She hates Jessica's boyfriend because he's a fox, not because of who he is. She looks at him and only sees what her father did to her family."

"I never took Mom as a purist," he mused. "Especially since she's a mixed breed herself. She didn't say anything at all when I was going out with Shelly."

"She's not a purist, son, she's just biased against foxes."

"Good thing she looks totally like a cat," Ben chuckled. "Else she'd have some issues every time she looks in a mirror." He grinned. "You know, there's this total hottie vixen at school named Amanda. Maybe she'd go out with me."

"Ben?"

"Yeah Dad?"

"Are you trying to kill your mother?"

Ben laughed. "I have to keep my options open here, Dad. You know, that's something I always wanted to ask her."

"What?"

"What was it like for her when she was growing up? I mean, we got tons of mixed breeds at school. It's no big deal. Heck, America has so many breeds now, it's sometimes hard to even find your own breed to go out with. I think some of them look just awesome, like Zoe. She's half tiger, half wolf, and she has black stripes and her tail—uh, well, I've read my history books. Not many guys can say his mom is in a history book. What was it like for her?"

"It wasn't easy for her, but she was a very resilient young femme," John chuckled. "I remember when she started school, that first day," he said musingly. "It was during the start of desegregation, Ben. Back then, being a mixed breed was just the same as being an African fur. Probably worse, if you really want my opinion. African breeds at least had their pure lines, but mixed breeds like Hannah, well, that was a moral taboo, even among European and American breeds. Back then, son, breeds kept strictly to themselves, and mixed breeds were worse than children born out of wedlock. Children like her had much more to deal with than racial bigotry, because purists are even more fanatical than racists. They were discriminated against by everyone, even the African breeds. They had no place, no status. Slavery ended after the Civil War, but the Mixed Breed Emancipation Act didn't pass until after femme suffrage. Mixed breeds were still little more than slaves until then, they didn't even have the right to vote, all because of the fanaticism of the purists. You should have seen her, Ben," he sighed. "Having to go through all those parents who were yelling and screaming all those nasty things at her, throwing things at her. But she never once lost her temper. She just kept her head high and outclassed them all. I think that's when I fell in love with her," he sighed. "God, were my parents against it," he chuckled. "But Hannah charmed them right out of it. Hopefully, Jessie and Kit can charm her out of her attitude."

"Huh. I've always been afraid to ask Mom about that."

"She doesn't like to talk about it. After all, son, she does look just like a cat. She never had to reveal she was a mixed breed. You'd never tell it from looking at her.”

“Why did she then?”

“Because she had something to prove,” he said. “She wanted to show the world that even though she was a mixed breed, she was still a proud femme who was going to make something of herself. Besides, son, her brothers were visibly mixed breed. If she would have hidden behind a lie of pure blood, it would have been insult to her brothers, and she loved them too much to do that to them.”

“It’s a shame. I woulda liked to have met them.”

“They were very nice,” John told him, remembering those two, with their fox muzzles and cat ears, fox mittens and cat’s claws. “And they loved their big sister. They never deserved what happened to them. But that’s a sign of those times, son. Jeb and Will died because of the stupidity of hate. Don’t ever forget that lesson.”

“You know something, Dad?”

“What?”

“It sounds like Mom forgot that lesson.”

John blinked, and looked at his son. “You know, Ben, I think you’re right. And I think it’s about time someone reminded her of that.”

“So, can I borrow the car?”

“Go ahead. Be back by eleven.”

“Aww, man!” he sighed, then he picked up the keys from the tray where John kept them and cleared out.

John went upstairs and knocked on the bedroom door. “I have nothing to say to you!” she shouted from inside.

“Well, I have plenty to say to you, dear,” he said seriously. He opened the door and saw her sitting on the bed, her arms crossed, looking away from him. And for a brief moment, he saw the young, strong femme he’d known in high school, sitting there with her head held high despite the nasty things the others were whispering to her. That strength had been her salvation back then, but it was working against her now. “I think you’re being totally unfair, and I wanted you to know that.”

“I cannot sit by and watch my oldest girl’s life be torn apart,” she said coldly. “That fox will be nothing but heartache for her.”

“And how can you know that?” he asked. “All you’ve ever done is talk to him over the phone, and as I recall, you were very unfriendly! Is it any surprise you got a bad impression from him, since that’s what you wanted to get from the start?”

“Don’t cloud the issue, John!” she shouted.

“I think you’re the one clouding the issue here, Hannah,” he told her sternly. “I have to ask you this, dear. Did you appreciate the way my parents treated you when you were younger?”

She gave him a startled look.

“Dear, you’re treating him the way they used to treat you,” he pointed out. “They made up their minds about you without ever meeting you, but you changed their minds. Don’t you remember?”

She sighed, then smiled a little. “Yes, I remember.”

“They were wrong about you. They were very wrong about you, and they admitted it. It took my mother a little longer to admit it than my father, but they eventually did.”

She put her paws on her knees and leaned forward, her long-haired tail swishing back and forth behind her. Jessica had inherited her mother’s tail, and it looked good on both of them. “I just can’t accept it, John. I don’t like it. He’s going to break her heart.”

“Dear, she’s an adult. I think she’s more than capable of dealing with a broken heart, if it would come to that. And personally, I disagree with you. I talked to him for a quite a while, and I think he’s sincerely in love with her.”

“So was my father with my mother, at first,” she said pointedly. “You just can’t trust foxes where their hearts are concerned.” She gave a slight chuckle. “And him sending his sister here was just dirty. I thought she was going to put me over her knee and spank me there for a minute.”

“She is a rather formidable young vixen, isn’t she?” John chuckled, coming over and sitting down on the bed, taking her paw in his own. “Dear, I understand you’re worried, but understand that I think you’re wrong. I object to the engagement simply because I think Jessica should finish school before getting married, but I have nothing against Kit otherwise. Once she finishes school, I’d be quite content to see them marry. And despite the fact we disagree, I still love you.”

She gave him a sidelong look, then sighed. “You don’t have to sleep on the couch tonight, John,” she declared.

“Who says I would have? There’s always Jenny’s room. If you can get past all the stuffed animals.”

Hannah giggled. “I’m sorry I yelled at you, John. That was uncalled for.”

“All’s forgiven, my sweet,” he said, leaning over and kissing her on the cheek. “Now, for once, you are going to let me cook. I think you have something you need to think about.”

John left her sitting on the bed. He glanced at her before closing the door, saw her lean back on her paws, looking up at the ceiling, already in thought.

He left her and went down to the kitchen, and busied himself with making dinner. He liked to cook, but Hannah thought it was a scandal if he did, so he rarely got the chance. He decided on something simple, so he started putting out what he’d need for chicken parmesan.

He heard movement in the living room. He peeked his head out, thinking Ben had come back for something, but it wasn’t Ben. Hannah was sitting on the couch, and she had the folder that Vil left open in her lap. She was going through the photos, one at a time. John couldn’t see them from his angle, but he saw Hannah’s eyes soften more than once as she looked at them.

John smiled. Who knows, maybe she will come around, John thought with a little smile as he went back into the kitchen. At least to the point where she can be civil.

Jessie was worse than a mother.

He expected her to be a little protective, but he didn’t expect her to virtually take over his life. When Doctor Barnett stopped in that night just for a quick visit, Jessie and Doc had a long talk about exactly what Kit should and should not do, how she needed to work with him because of the injury. And Jessie followed those instructions to the letter.

She was almost a dictator. She kept him on the couch almost all the time, and she talked to Lupe to have him look in on him when she was at school. She did all the work around the house, she carefully made sure that he took all his medicine, antibiotics and mild painkillers in the evening to take the bite off and allow him to sleep comfortably. She controlled every aspect of his day from morning til night, most of which was spent on the couch either watching DVDs or surfing the internet on his laptop.

Of course, his chances came when she was at school. She wanted to be with him all the time, but he put his foot down at the very thought that she'd leave school. He was just fine on his own while she was at classes, because the nurse came in around ten to check on him, and Lupe was just across the courtyard, who came and checked on him about every hour. When he had the place to himself, he was working. It was kind of hard to type with one hand, but he could pick up a phone and click a mouse, and Rick didn't mind sending him little projects to work on to help alleviate the boredom.

The apartment sure wasn't empty in the evenings. Several femmes from Jessie's sorority came over almost every night to visit with Jessie, see him, and even help out a little bit. Sandy and Sam were Jessie's best friends, and they were over almost every night. They'd helped her move her things to the apartment, and now they dropped in quite often, which Kit didn't mind at all. He rather liked those two. Some of the crew also dropped in on him almost every night as well, as Rick brought him some material to play with during the day, and they just came over to hang out and help Jessie.

One thing was for sure, Jessie had an easy time of it. She had plenty of paws around willing to help her with almost anything.

And not a day passed where Vil didn't call at least once to check on him, and use the video conference program to see him, check on his progress. He could see that she was still furious in those video conferences, but hadn't yet discovered who had attacked him. She voiced her frustration about a week after Kit returned home. "Whoever it was certainly covered their tracks," she growled, throwing a report file down on the table before her computer, out of his sight. "I even took Atlanta apart, and nothing. This guy didn't take this contract through the mob. It was a personal job."

"What did you do in Atlanta?"

"I think that it's best you don't know," she said with a direct stare that shut him up immediately. "You'd think that I'd find something by now," she said with a dark scowl. "I think I'm going to have to start shaking the family tree. If it becomes clear I'll punish the entire family over the actions of one, someone might balk."

"Be careful," he warned again. "If you push too hard, they're gonna push back."

"Let them," she said flatly.

Despite the whole "nurse nazi" issue, Kit loved having Jessie around all the time. After all the visitors went home, they'd sit on the couch and cuddle, sometimes for hours, as he just let the sound of her purring lull him into a sense of total contentment. She moved into his bed as well, though she kept her paws off of him because of the injury. Doctor Barnett had warned against any kind of intimacy, and she showed a hell of a lot more control than he did. He was willing to bend the rules a little, but she wouldn't hear of it. About all she'd allow him were kisses and an occasional feel of all those things he loved to touch that she kept hidden under her clothes. She seemed to have a line, and wouldn't allow either of them to cross it. It was worst at night, when she was right there in bed with him. He'd reach out and touch her, and she'd allow it, but when he started getting frisky, she shut him down like a misbehaving washing machine.

Of course, her parents weren't too thrilled about it. She hadn't told them she moved in when she told them about the engagement, and her parents found out when they called the sorority. Sandy had let it slip that she'd moved in at Kit's, and Kit was the one that ended up fielding that call, since Jessie was at the store.

"Is it true she's moved in with you?" her father asked directly not two seconds after he answered the phone.

"She didn't give me much choice," he answered, a bit ruefully. "But yes, she did."

"I do not approve of this, Kit," he said. "Not only is it completely improper, it might interfere with her school. That is why she's in Austin, not to chase boys."

"Well, sir, you can try to talk her out of it," he said simply. "Best not try until after the docs take this sling off me, though. She's gone completely Nurse Nightengale on me. Right now, I'm not her fiancée, I'm her patient. Actually, can you talk to her? She's worse than a freakin' nanny."

John actually laughed. "That bad, eh?"

"You have no idea," he said with a short growl. "She got these instructions from the doctor, and she follows them religiously. And if I try to object or if I get restless and want to move around, she puts the worst guilt trip on me you've ever heard. And she teases me," he sighed. "She won't—nevermind. I think that's not something you'd care to talk about."

Much to his surprise, John laughed. "I think I can understand what you're saying," he said. "She's affectionate, but she's not being affectionate."

"God," Kit sighed.

"Have you set a date yet?" he ventured to ask.

"No, it's too early yet, and besides, she won't talk about it. She and Vil have been calling each other and talking for hours every night, so I'm pretty sure they're setting it all up. Will Misses Williams budge?"

"She's budging a little, but no icebreaking yet," he answered. "I think she's getting a double shot of reality to the face, and it'll get worse when I tell her that Jessica is planning her wedding. I think that might push her over the edge. If she misses her first child's wedding, I think she'd kick herself for the next ten years."

"I hope she does. I'd like to have her there."

"But she hates you."

"So? It isn't about me, John, it's about Jessie. Jessie will be happy if her mother is there, and that's that in my mind. I'm more than willing be civil to her for Jessie's sake. And the hate is only one way, I assure you. I don't hate Misses Williams even if she can't stand me. She's just being a mother-in-law."

John laughed. “I would much prefer to see Jessica return to her sorority when you’re off doctor’s care.”

“It was her decision, John,” he replied calmly. “And I can’t deny her anything she wants. You’re welcome to try to talk her back to the sorority, but I’m not sure you’ll have much luck. She’s taken over my apartment,” he chuckled. “I’ve never had makeup in my medicine cabinet before, and my shower is now cluttered with like ten different bottles. I have weed through them to find my shampoo and soap.”

“You’ll get used to that. But I would prefer you get used to it after you’re married.”

Jessie came in through the door with Lupe, who was helping her carry in groceries. “Actually, you can talk to her yourself, she just got home. Hold on.” He put his paw over the microphone on his cell. “Jessie, it’s your dad.”

“Hey Dad,” she said after taking the phone. “Yes, I did,” she said immediately. “Why? Because for one, he needs me to be here right now because he’s on bedrest, and for another we’re engaged. No, I don’t think so. Dad, we’re going to be married. Does it matter if I move in now, or after the wedding? It’s not like we’re not already—“ She blew out her breath. “Well, that’s the way it is, Dad. It’s not like it’s going to be too long after the doctors say he’s healed that we get married. No, we haven’t yet. Vil wants a little more time to talk about it. She offered to pay for the wedding, you know, and since Mom won’t have anything to do with it, I’m the one that’s planning it. I don’t know yet. I’m too busy taking care of Kit to think much about it.”

“I’m not an invalid!” Kit protested, which made Lupe laugh as he went back to the door. “And if you burned out my clutch, femme, we’re gonna have words!”

Jessie laughed. “I drove Kit’s car to the store, and it’s a standard,” she giggled into the phone. “I’m not bad, really! It’s not that hard.” She put her purse on the coffee table. “No, Dad. No. No. Listen, it’s not up for discussion. I moved in with Kit because he needs me, and I love him. After he heals, I’m not moving out. This is where I belong. Yes, I know how Mom is going to explode,” she sighed, “but I don’t care. No, Dad, I haven’t forgotten school Kit browbeats me into doing my homework every night. He won’t let me forget about school.” She put her paw over the phone. “Thanks Lupe, you’re a lifesaver,” she told the chihuahua as he brought in another load.

“De nada Jessie,” he replied. “We want him back too. I got nobody to play poker with on Sunday nights!”

“No, I’m here, Dad,” she said, mouthing the word poker at him, which made Kit just laugh and nod. “The landlord was helping me bring in groceries, that’s all. No, you can tell Mom, I don’t care. But if she calls here and nags us, I’m gonna turn off the phone. Make sure you tell her that. Okay. I’ll think about. Dad, I have to go, I have to put away the groceries and cook, and Doc Barnett should be here in a little bit to check on Kit. I will. I love you too, Dad, bye-bye.”

“So, you moving in, Jessie?”

“Yeah, Lupe. Is that a problem?”

“Naw, naw, you’d be moving in when you marry anyway,” Lupe grinned. “Ain’t nothin’ in Kit’s lease about not takin’ on a roomie.”

Surprisingly enough to Kit, Jessie's mom never did call to explode on her. But then again, Kit had the feeling that Hannah was walking on eggshells around Jessie now. She was being pushed out of the wedding, a clear indication to her that her daughter was more than willing to choose him over her, and now that fact was making her seriously reconsider. The times Hannah did call her, she was much less hostile and confrontational, but they did get into some arguments, over him.

As the days passed, some of the restrictions on him were lifted. Doctor Barnett gave him a little more license to move around every day. By his first week back, he was allowed to move about the house freely so long as he got plenty of rest between activity cycles. His wound was healing at a rate that pleased his nurse and Barnett. He spent most of his time doing what work that Rick sent him, and also answering get-well emails sent to him. On Friday, Jeffrey ran the other strip, just a huge drawing of Kit and Jessie kissing with YES! In huge letters across the top, telling everyone that was interested that he and Jessie were engaged. He answered quite a few congratulatory messages after that, and Mike took a picture of the happy couple and put it up on the website for anyone who was curious to see them in the flesh, as it were.

About a two weeks after he came home, Barnett came over and removed the bandages and was quite pleased with the results. "Well, tomorrow the stitches come out, and I think it'll be just fine. It looks like you're healing up just the way you should. Maybe even faster."

"That's because I make him stay on course," Jessie giggled.

"Well, remember, Kit, tomorrow at two at the annex," he said as he put on a new bandage, then helped him back into his sling. "They'll pull your stitches, and I'll come over give you a complete exam and we'll talk about where we go from there."

"Think I can get out of the sling?"

"It'll depend on how well you've healed inside," he answered.

"But I'm having almost no pain now, just a dull ache and itching. I've even stopped taking the pain meds."

"Well, that's a good sign. We'll see tomorrow."

Jessie didn't go to her English Lit class to take him to the hospital, but at least this absence was planned for and excused. She sat with him in the waiting room, and they even allowed her to be there when the nurse and orderly removed the stitches. "I see your fur is growing back," the nurse noted.

"It's kinda prickly," he complained.

"Just let it grow out, and it'll soften up," she said as she carefully removed another stitch.

"How is it looking, nurse?" Jessie asked. "Did he heal well?"

"Well, the cut in his skin is almost healed," she noted. "I doubt that he's in danger of opening it as long as he's careful. I think the doc'll let him go without new stitches."

Barnett filed in wearing a lab coat over slacks and a dress shirt. "Okay then, Kit, now that I have you where I keep all my power tools, let's check out that shoulder, hmm?"

Barnett's examination took over an hour, where Barnett thoroughly examined his shoulder, then had him to quite a few movements and exercises to test his arm and how much pain he felt when moving it. He sent Kit over to the hospital for another CAT scan, and they waited in an exam room there for Barnett to come back. When he did, he was carrying some papers. “Alright, you want the good news or the bad news?”

“Uh, both?” Kit asked.

Barnett chuckled, scratching at his muzzle. “The good news is that you’re healing along quite nicely. I’m not going to replace your stitches.”

“That’s good news, alright,” Kit said. “What about the sling?”

“That’s the bad news, I’m afraid,” he chuckled. “But, there’s some not-so-bad news that goes along with it. I want you to keep your arm in a sling for one more week, Kit, but we’ll forego the straight jacket. I know it doesn’t hurt that much, but the bullet did go through most of the muscles that deal with moving your shoulder, so I’d like to give them just a little more time to heal before you start putting stress on it. But, you’re no longer on restriction,” he announced. “I’ll give you a standard sling, and you’re free to go back to work and engage in light activity. But don’t push it,” he warned.

“How light?” Kit asked, glancing at Jessie.

Barnett laughed. “Oh, I think as long as you’re stationary,” he said with a toothy grin.

Jessie’s entire face frizzed out.

They left with a new prescription for an antibiotic to guard against infection, and a new normal sling. It felt so good to at least be able to move his arm a little bit, not feeling like his left side was tied down. “I can’t believe you asked him that!” Jessie said as they walked to his Pathfinder.

“Well, at least now we have permission,” he said enticingly in her ear, sliding his paw up her side.

She shivered a little. “We’ll talk about this when we get home,” she said sternly.

“I hope so.”

They stopped at the office first. Kit and Jessie visited, and he told Rick that he could come back to work. “I still can’t type til they take me out of this sling, but I’m dying at home, Rick,” he complained. “I need to come back to work.”

“No problem, you can work with me and Savid until you’re back to full strength,” Rick told him. “Since we’re off tomorrow, why don’t you just come in on Monday. That alright?”

“Hell yeah,” Kit chuckled. “I’d rather come in tomorrow, but I wouldn’t mind a weekend with Jess.”

“No pressure, though, son,” Rick told him. “If you feel tired or want to go home, just lemme know.”

“I’ll keep that in mind, boss,” Kit nodded.

They went home after that. “I’m gonna need to borrow your car, my pretty kitty,” he told her as they filed into the apartment. “I can’t drive mine like this.”

“That’s okay, my handsome fox,” she told him. “What do you want for dinner?”

“I know what I want for dinner,” he said huskily, draping an arm over her.

She giggled. "I'm still mad at you for asking that."

"Well, we got permission," he breathed, grabbing her belt buckle.

"I dunno, my fox, I'm afraid I might hurt you."

"You can tie me to the bed," he offered.

"Don't make promises you can't keep, my fox," she giggled, then she shivered when he pulled on her belt buckle, cinching her belt around her. "Alright, I think we can try," she said thickly, reaching up and putting her paw on the side of his head as he nuzzled her cheek from behind. "But if I hurt you, it's your fault."

"I can live with that," he said, pulling her towards the bedroom.

"Wait, I forgot to lock the door!" she said, pulling away. He waited when she went and locked it, then sauntered back to him. "Now, let's talk about this," she said in a purring voice, holding his paw and giving him a smile.

"It's your fault," he complained. "Letting me touch you, then not letting me go any further."

She laughed. "I couldn't help it. I love it when you touch me, my handsome fox," she said with a bright smile, pulling him back to the bedroom. "It makes me feel wanted."

"Well, mission accomplished, because I so want you right now."

She laughed and pulled him into the bedroom, then she closed the door.

Making love while injured introduced some complications to the process, but Kit had no complaints.

She lay with him in bed, with the afternoon sun making the curtains glow, and she was purring in contentment. His left arm was carefully draped over his stomach, but his right arm held her close. She was exquisitely careful, but he did have a little pain...which he'd never admit to.

"Mmm," she hummed, her purring ceasing as she spoke.

"How do you do that?" he asked.

"Do what?"

"Purr when you kiss me, when you can't purr when you talk."

She giggled. "I breathe when you kiss me," she said, snuggling up to him. "Because I know you love it when I purr."

"It's like kissing a vibrator," he said, which made her gasp in surprise. "But that's a good thing," he told her, keeping her from rising up to glare at him. "It goes right through me and makes me knees melt."

She laughed. "Well, now I know how to stop any argument immediately."

"I doubt you'll be purring when we're fighting."

"My handsome fox, I can purr on demand," she said with a giggle, her paw carefully and delicately tracing through the area where his bandages were, in the area of shaved fur. "Sure, I purr when I'm happy, but I've learned how to fake it," she giggled.

"Oh, there goes my self esteem," he said darkly, which made her laugh.

“No, it’s not that I want to fake it,” she told him. “It’s just that when I was a little girl, I couldn’t purr. I didn’t really understand why, so I tried to learn how to do it.”

“Why couldn’t you?”

“I really don’t know,” she said. “Mom always told me I was being silly when I worried about it, but all my cat friends could do it. I guess that was the first time I ever really felt like my mixed breed ancestry was a bad thing. For years, I thought that I couldn’t purr because my grandfather’s a fox.”

“Well, obviously it worked out.”

“Yeah. I guess I just had to grow up a little more before I could purr, that’s all. My cat friends could do it when they were six or seven. I couldn’t purr until I was almost twelve. But, all my trying to do it on purpose kinda taught me how to do it when I could,” she chuckled. “My mom thinks it’s amazing that I can force myself to purr. She doesn’t know any cat that can.”

“Maybe it’s a good part of being mixed.”

“Mom can’t do it.”

“I think your mother only purrs when she’s burning me in effigy.”

Jessie laughed.

“Did you ever have trouble being mixed?”

“Nah,” she replied. “I went to public school, and there’s lots of mixed breeds in city schools. Besides, I don’t look like a mixed breed. I can pass as a purebred cat easily. Now if I’d have been born somewhere in the rural south, I guess it’d be a problem. Why, is it an issue in Boston?”

“Not really, but they’re not very common,” he answered. “It used to be bad, though. Boston used to be the headquarters of the Purity League.”

“Oh, them,” Jessie sighed.

“My family were charter members,” he admitted with a dark grunt. “A lot of Vulpan money funded their lobbying. But then Massachusetts changed the law and redefined them as a hate group, and they were booted. Thank God.”

“I’m lucky that way, I guess. All of Mom’s kids are. None of us have any fox traits but me, and all I got was the coloration. But that’s nothing definitive, ya know?”

“Yeah, there have to be plenty of cats running around with black mittens, black ears, and a black tail tip.”

“Well, some have mentioned that they do look kinda fox-like, but nobody’s ever asked me if I’m mixed,” she told him. “I can imagine you had almost as much trouble as if you were mixed.”

“My eyes? Only in Boston,” he answered. “It’s the Vulpan family trait, so it kinda identified me. Most of the time it was useful, but there were quite a few times when furs wanted to beat me up because I was a Vulpan.”

“I can imagine.”

The phone rang. Jessie had put it on the nightstand, so she reached across him and grabbed it. “Oh, nuts,” she breathed, opening the phone. “Hello? Hey Mom.”

Kit laughed.

“No, this is not a good time to talk. I’m busy. No. No—Mom, you don’t want to know. Mom—Mom. Mom! Fine. I’m in bed with Kit,” she said in a hostile voice. “Yes, you heard me! In bed! Naked! And we just finished having sex,” she said heatedly. “There, are you happy now? At least now you know!”

And she hung up the phone.

Kit laughed delightedly. “You’re getting mean, my pretty kitty.”

“She wouldn’t stop asking what I was doing, so I told her,” she said with a huff, turning the phone off and putting it back on the nightstand. She snuggled back down with him, sighed in contentment, and began to purr.

“Oh, sure, now you purr,” he snorted. “Now I’ll always wonder if you really mean it, or you’re faking.”

She laughed, then slid up and kissed him on the nose with a cherubic grin. “I promise I’ll only fake it when you ask me to,” she winked. “But so far, every purr you’ve heard out of me was genuine. Fiancee’s honor.” She held up her right paw.

He laughed. “There’s no such thing.”

“What are you saying? I have my honor.”

“Not when we slept together,” he grinned. “You’re honorless.”

“Well, that’s your fault now, isn’t it?” she retorted primly.

He laughed and put his good arm around her, pulling her against him. “God, I love you, you silly kitty.”

“Mmm, say that again,” she purred, nuzzling his neck and cheek with her own cheek.

He thought that her kissing him when she was purring was bad enough, but her nuzzling him like that put her throat in direct contact with his neck, and he could feel it vibrating against him. “God, you know how to drive me crazy,” he groaned, twining his fingers through her hair. “You give an entirely new definition for the term necking.”

She laughed against his ear. “This is how naughty kitties do it,” she whispered in his ear.

“I love naughty kitties,” he sighed, surrendering to her attentions.

The new sling wasn’t half as bad as the straight jacket, and it was wonderful to be able to go out again.

They spent almost all day Saturday out, from walking in McKenzie park to going to see a movie, then a nice dinner that Jessie didn’t have to cook. When they went home, they spent a wonderful evening just sitting on the couch, cuddling...at least until her mother called.

Hannah wasn’t too happy about her little stunt from the day before, and it touched off a bit of a heated exchange between them. But then Jessie laughed and cuddled in with him a little more. “Well, Mom, I’m trying,” she said. “Wow...what is that I just heard? Without a single scream?” She laughed. “Okay, okay, thank you for at least trying. I appreciate it. We haven’t really talked about it yet. Vil said she’d pay for it, but Kit doesn’t really like it when she pays for things for him.”

“Oh my God, you’re talking about the wedding? And she isn’t going nuclear?” Kit asked.

Jessie gave him a cool look, and swatted him on the leg. “I guess you’d have to talk to her about that. I can have her call you. You do? How did you get it? She what? Oh my goodness! Kit, Vil went to see my folks!” she declared.

“Huh? She never told me she did that.”

“When did she come see you? When? Hmm, that’s when she left here, after Kit got out of the hospital,” she said, mainly for his benefit. “Well, what did you think of her?” Jessie listened to the response, then laughed. “Yeah, she’s like that, but I really like her. She’s a wonderful vixen. She bought me a car,” she all but purred. “Uh, Mom, since you’re not going crazy, I wanted to tell you something.” She gave a startled look, then laughed. “No, Mom, I’m not pregnant,” she laughed. “I’d love to be, though,” she added impulsively. “Anyway, I invited Kit to come to Cincinnati for Thanksgiving. Would that be alright? I want him to meet you and Ben and Jenny.” She giggled. “No, Mom, I’ll have Dad hide all the guns and knives before he gets there. Now, why did you call?” She laughed. “Mom, you always have a reason to call anymore, usually when you feel like arguing.”

Jessie sat up a little. “Mom! I don’t feel like arguing now. Well, you do! When’s the last time we talked that didn’t turn into an argument!” Her cheeks ruffled appealingly. “Umm, well, I was...busy. And you wouldn’t stop asking! No, Mom, I wasn’t just saying that. We really were in bed. Well, he’d just gotten back from the doctor, and we couldn’t—uh, well, he’d just gotten taken off restriction. Well, you go two weeks and see how you feel!” She gasped. “Oh my God, I’m sitting here talking about sex with my mother,” she realized.

Kit laughed when Jessie's entire face poofed out. "Mom? Mom! Mom, I'm—" she stopped, then she laughed. "No, I'm not trying to ruin it on purpose, but you asked! No, no, that's fine. It'll be nice to hang up the phone without us hanging up on each other for once. Okay. I love you too, Mom. Bye." She closed the phone, and gave out a little squeal and hugged Kit. "I don't believe it!"

"She's not ordering voodoo dolls of me anymore?"

She laughed. "Well, not quite, but she did say she'd come to the wedding. Under protest of course, but she said she'd be there. For Mom, that's a huge step." She snuggled down against him, laying her gorgeous tail over his lap. "She said you're welcome to come to Thanksgiving."

"Should I bring the number for the Poison Control Center?"

She giggled. "Putting it on speed-dial may not be a bad idea. Mom might just be playing nice to get close enough to you."

"Your mom is something else," he chuckled.

"Well, she's just protective."

"Kinda like you," he teased, poking her in the shoulder.

"Now you know where I get it from," she giggled.

"I wonder what got her like that."

"I know what got her like that," she sighed, a little sadly.

"Oh? Feel like telling me?"

"Only if you can promise to keep a secret."

"For you, pretty kitty? You have my word."

“My mom was one of the Columbus Twenty.”

Kit gasped. “Hannah? Hannah Cremeans? That’s your mother?”

“Yeah. When she married and her name changed, she kinda faded into the background. I’m surprised you knew her name.”

“Pretty kitty, I have a Bachelor’s in history.”

“But your focus is ancient history.”

“That doesn’t mean I don’t know my modern history.”

“Well, my mom had two brothers.”

“Say no more, pretty kitty,” he sighed. “I know about it.”

“I guess she doesn’t want to lose anyone else, so she’s majorly protective,” she reasoned. “Grandma more or less picked out my dad for her, which worked out since my dad was in love with my mom. So, now Mom thinks she needs to pick husbands for me and Jenny. Add those two together, and you see why me and Jenny left home to go to school.”

“Why didn’t you ever tell me?”

“Because my mom hates it,” she answered. “Because of what happened to my brothers. She doesn’t like to talk about it. And you can’t ask her about it, Kit. It just makes her sad, and she’ll hate you even more.”

“Wow,” he breathed. The Columbus Twenty, twenty mixed breed high schoolers that integrated the Columbus East High School after the Mixed Breed Civil Rights laws were passed in 1971, which completely ended all forms of breed segregation. Even though mixed breeds were supposedly covered in the civil rights laws of the 60s, the purist movement kept finding ways to exploit the loopholes in the laws to continue to discriminate against mixed breeds. The Columbus Twenty were like the African breed children in the south, the first kids to go to school under the new laws.

Oh yes, that was a dark day in the Vulpan household, he was told.

If Jessie's mom was Hannah Cremeans, then he knew her story. Her younger brothers, William and Jebediah Cremeans, were both killed by a purist mob in October of 1972, the last known furs to have been lynched. Six of the killers were convicted, and they were still in prison to this day.

Damn, no wonder she wanted to forget. Her brothers were killed because they were mixed breed, and they were in the wrong place at the wrong time. But that was also an event that changed public opinions and spelled the death of the purist movement and purist organizations. Those two boys were literally killed on camera, and it caused massive outrage. Kit was surprised that Hannah had managed to vanish from the public eye like that, since she was famous after a fashion. But then again, that was a kind of fame that one would never want.

"I understand, pretty kitty," he said, hugging her tightly. "Did she ever talk about it with you?"

"No. She never talks about it. I learned about it from Dad."

"Well, that does explain a little about why she may hate me," he sighed. "The Vulpans were never very shy about their sympathies."

"No, I don't think she even knew who your family was until after I met you. And her hatred of you started way before she knew who you were. Besides, think about it. I'm a mixed breed, my handsome fox. That you're marrying me might make her feel different. You're no purist," she giggled.

“Well, I’ll have to keep that in mind next time I’m about to be pissed at her. That was one rough road to travel.”

“Maybe now you know why I put up with it for so long. In a way, I kinda understand the way she feels.”

“Yeah, I can understand that.”

Learning the truth about Jessie’s family had actually changed Kit’s opinion of her mother quite a bit.

He thought about it most of Sunday, as he was more or less browbeat to sitting on the couch as she settled into his house—their house—a bit more, making it more of a home for herself. She went out that morning and bought new curtains to replace the ratty old ones donated by her sorority house, and occupied herself with much of the morning and early afternoon with putting them up. Kit helped as much as she’d allow, but he spent much of his time pondering what he’d learned about Hannah Williams.

In a way, she felt kind of like a kindred spirit. She too had faced tremendous hardship in her life, from a different source but with a similar effect, but she’d suffered much more loss than Kit. Kit had never lost anything but his love for his family and material things he could replace. Hannah had lost her brothers, and had been punished, degraded, and humiliated for something beyond her control. And she’d managed to come through it, raise three children, and find a husband who loved her and build a good life for herself. Sure, she was a little extreme, but now that he knew what he knew, he could rationalize her ultra-protective nature. He could understand it. Hannah had lost much in her life, and she wanted to hold on to what she had, a compulsion so powerful that it drove her almost to the point of driving her daughters away from her. But there was also a tremendous acceptance there. Since Hannah never talked about her past, she was keeping her own experiences out of her children's lives, allowing them to grow up without any of her own bad experiences tainting their outlooks. She'd raised them like any normal mother, albeit a protective one, allowing them to be normal kids, giving them the childhood she'd been denied. That she could separate her own bad experiences out of her parenting told much of Hannah's wisdom and strength, and at least in Jessie's case, she raised an intelligent, well-adjusted young femme that, while maybe a little naïve, was just as normal as any other twenty-one year old. And that was an accomplishment.

It was too bad she hated him. He'd love to talk to her, and learn her story.

But he wouldn't do that even if she didn't hate him. Jessie said that her mother never talked about that, never talked about her history, and he'd respect that. It had to be painful, and he knew from experience that there were some parts of his own past that he'd love to never think about again, never have to remember. But he could respect her without ever asking about it.

Monday, he finally got to go back to work. Since he couldn't really type very fast and that hindered him in his usual duties, he instead worked with Rick and Savid, and started learning the business of magazine editing. They started training him in how the editing program worked, kind of like a glorified Powerpoint, and he started getting the hang of it. Mike, not wanting to be outdone, hijacked him for a couple of hours after lunch to show him how a website really worked, teaching him the very basics of HTML and actually relating it in ways to the editing program that made sense to him. Mike also couldn't resist showing off all the pictures of him in the hospital he'd put on the website's photo gallery, as well as Jessie's proposal and the reply on their own special webpage. "That's part of magazine history now," Mike grinned. "The magazine's very first marriage proposal."

"Mike, the magazine's only been in print for two years," Kit protested.

"So? It's still a red-letter day."

Driving Jessie's car was a lot different from his. He'd gotten used to being high up, and driving the Corolla was like riding a motorized sled. But her car was an automatic, and since he only had one arm—at least officially, since he could move his arm quite well now without pain—it was really his only option. He got home and found Jessie not there, so he surreptitiously took off the sling and exercised his arm slowly and carefully. It burned a little when he moved it too far, which he only did carefully for fear of tearing something in there, and there was still a little nagging ache and a lot of itching, but he had a fairly decent range of motion without any pain at all. With luck, he'd be fully healed in just a week or two. As long as he didn't raise his arm over his shoulder or reach too far to the right side or too far behind him, it was more than tolerable.

Jessie came in carrying some Wal-Mart bags, and she gave him an immediate hostile look. "What are you doing!" she demanded.

"The doc told me to exercise my arm out of the sling, remember?" he said mildly, putting his right paw on his shoulder and very tentatively working his left arm back and forth. "He said five minutes a day once I didn't feel any jabs when I took it out of the sling."

"Oh. So he did. How does it feel?"

“Like I’ll be back to playing football soon,” he smiled, then he patted her backside as she went back. “Or the good kind of wrestling.”

She laughed, swatting him with her tail. “I think you’re already up to that point,” she said with a naughty smile at him. She opened a bag from Circuit City, and showed him a small box. “I hope you don’t mind, but I went out and bought something for us.”

“What is it?”

“It’s a camera,” she answered. “You know, we don’t have one, and I’d like some more pictures than what Mike takes.”

“Oh, how much was it?”

“Four hundred dollars,” she said, her cheeks ruffling slightly. “I know it’s a little expensive, but Lilly recommended it. It’s just like hers. She said it takes great pictures, it can even take video, and it’s really tough. She’s dropped hers bunches of times and it still works fine.”

“Well, I don’t mind if it’s what you want,” he told her.

“I know, I’m sorry,” she said, looking down demurely. “But we don’t have any pictures, and I want a camera.”

“Don’t apologize to me, my pretty kitty,” he chuckled. “We’ve managed Vil’s gift very well, and since Rick kept paying me even when I was in the hospital, we had the money to spare. And she won’t mind at all that you used the excess to buy something you think we need.”

“I was going to ask you to save it to help me buy me a new laptop, but I can just keep using yours, if you don’t mind.”

“It’s yours for the taking, love,” he assured her. “I don’t use it at work. We might fight over it a little at home, but I’m sure we can work it out,” he chuckled.

“I know I’m sounding like I’m just taking over all your money,” she said with sudden shyness.

He laughed. “Jess, it’s not my money, it’s our money. You even have an ATM card for my bank account. You don’t have to ask for permission, silly kitty! As long as you warn me so I don’t go thinking I have more money in the bank than I do, you’re more than welcome to it. I trust you, love. You’re a sensible cat who won’t go crazy with our money.”

She laughed sheepishly. “Well, I’ve had a few impulses, but I knew it would be a bad idea.”

“And that’s why I trust you,” he smiled, putting his arm back in the sling. “So, let’s get that camera set up.”

After installing the software on the laptop, they played with it a little bit. Jessie took pictures of the apartment and of Kit, and he took a few of her, then they downloaded a few of them to the laptop. Jessie mailed some of them to Sam and Sandy, and mailed quite a few of them to her father’s university email account, mostly the ones of the apartment.

Kit had noticed before that Jessie was very good at taking pictures, and the pictures she took were actually very well done. Jessie had an eye for it, just like Lilly. Lilly had taught Jessie how to use her camera, and obviously taught her a little about photography, so Jessie had went out and bought the exact same kind of camera so she was working with something with which she was familiar. Kit watched as she mailed the photos off, sitting at the dining room table, with him leaning over her shoulder.

“You know, we need one more thing,” Kit noted.

“What?”

“A video camera. One with a stand, we can set up in the bedroom,” he said huskily, putting his paw around her slender waist.

“You,” she laughed, elbowing him gently. But her breath caught in her throat and she immediately began to purr when he started nuzzling her. “Do you think it would be too much to ask for a laptop, love?”

He chuckled against her neck. “How much money do we have in the bank?”

“I don’t know exactly, maybe a little over a thousand,” she answered.

“We’ll go shopping for them next weekend. And I’ll look at video cameras,” he added kissing her neck. “We’ll give Mike something good to put on the magazine website.”

She laughed, reaching up and putting her paw against his head.

Kit’s idea of shopping for laptops actually never got off the ground. When Vil called that evening to talk about the wedding, he asked her where she bought his. “Why, did yours break?”

“No, Jessie doesn’t have one, and I was going to shop for one for her.”

“She doesn’t have a laptop?”

“She broke hers about a week before she met me.”

“Well hell, I never knew,” she said in obvious surprise. “You couldn’t afford the laptop I gave you, little bro. I’ll send her one.”

“But—“

“Let’s not get into that argument again, brother,” she cut him off. “Jessie needs a laptop, and I’m not going to let you buy her one out of some discount store.”

“You know I hate it when you do that.”

“And I know you can’t say no when I give things to Jessie,” she returned, rather smugly. “She needs a laptop for school, and so she’ll get one. A real one, not a junkbox special out of a blue-light sale.”

“You just make me feel so able to provide for my future wife,” he said darkly into the phone, which made her laugh.

“It’ll be there tomorrow morning. You working?”

“Yeah.”

“I’ll have it overnighted to your office. Now put her on the phone.”

He snorted. “Jessie! My evil bitch of a sister is on the phone!”

Jessie laughed as she came out of the bathroom. “Are you being mean to your brother again, Vil?” she giggled when she took the phone from him. “Really? Aww, Vil, you don’t have to do that for me! We can afford a laptop.” She laughed. “Yeah, well, Kit’s is nice. Aww, you’re so sweet. Thank you!”

Kit stalked away, grumbling under his breath.

He kept thinking about Hannah, kept wondering at the story that she might have to tell, but more worried about her hatred of him poisoning her relationship with her daughter.

He thought about it sitting at work, as he got to design his very first magazine page for the week after next's issue. While he was sitting there juggling article text, ads, and pictures within the magazine's style template, he thought about it. He needed to bridge the gap with Hannah, offer an olive branch now that it seemed that she was starting to come around, at least as far as the wedding was concerned. He shifted a column of text into its spot, nestled in around a picture of a new nightclub that was opening next month.

Text.

It was such a simple, elegant idea! The art of writing a letter was a dead art nowadays, but hopefully someone of Hannah's age might appreciate it.

He finished up the page he was working on, saved it, then wandered back to his office. He sat down at his computer, took his arm out of its sling, and then started up the word processing program.

And he wrote.

His first paragraph summed up the entire letter quite nicely:

Dear Mrs. Williams:

I'm sure that you're a little surprised to receive this, and please pardon the fact that it's not hand-written and was sent via e-mail. But I felt it was necessary to write this. You and I haven't exactly been on friendly terms. I know that there's little I can do to persuade you against your position on me, but I felt that it was necessary for you to understand how I feel about Jessie. So, this letter is for you, but it's about your daughter. I can only hope I can express how much I love her and keep it under the size of a novel.

He wrote simply and from the heart. He told Hannah about how he met her, and how she had captivated him, almost from the beginning. He pulled no punches about himself. He was a homeless dishwasher when he met her, and he admitted as much. He went on to talk about her, how he felt about her, the little things about her that he loved, from her black mittens to the maddeningly adorable way she blushed, to her amazing sense of humor, to her wonderfully caring and compassionate personality. He described her to Hannah through his eyes in honest terms, putting in words what he felt inside, but feeling and admitting in the letter that his words just couldn't do it justice.

And on he wrote, as his left shoulder began to ache from the effort. Members of the crew came to his door and saw him almost totally engrossed in what he was doing, and didn't bother him, not even Rick. Page after page, honest, sincere emotions, observations, hopes, dreams, and plans. He told her about how he hoped the wedding would go, but he was keeping himself politely out of it because it was Jessie's wedding and it was to make her happy. He told her about the children they hoped to have, he told her about the plans he had for the future. His plans completely revolved around Jessie, as he prepared to support her, nurture her, care for her, and spend the rest of his life making her happy.

And he told her about his family. Again, he pulled no punches. He told her about his history, about the history of his family, and about the split that had caused him to leave the family and spurn their views and their money.

How can I explain it, Hannah? I guess I can't. By all rights, I should have grown up just like my father, just like my family. But I didn't. I never felt the way they did. I couldn't understand why they hated so much. I heard all of their propoganda, and I guess I believed it out of blind faith, until I rebelled against my father, and I got to see first hand for myself out on the streets. Do you know that I'd never even seen a mixed breed in real life until I was fourteen? I didn't quite know how to react. I remembered what my family had said about them, but when he talked to me, I just couldn't fathom what on earth they were complaining about. He was kind. He was concerned about me because I was wandering the streets alone after dark, and I was obviously just a kid. When he coaxed the fact that I'd run away out of me, he didn't march me straight home. He took me to a Burger King and sat down and talked to me, something my father had never done. He was warm and friendly, and that night sitting in that Burger King, sharing a box of fries while he let me voice all my pent-up frustrations and anger about my family, was one of the turning points of my life. I guess some children have their illusions shattered by harsh reality. Mine were shattered by a talkative, kind male named Rudy, who was half raccoon, half dog.

I never really told them about how I felt, because I knew that not just my father would come down on me. The Vulpan family is tight-knit around the controlling family, which was mine, because they held the reins of power and the keys to the bank. I was doted on as a kid because I was the heir apparent, but inside all I could do was scream. It wasn't what I wanted to do. I would have been a terrible businessmale. After meeting Rudy, I knew that if I didn't try to find my own happiness in life, I would have wasted the gift God gave me.

I guess I should thank Rudy and my father, and my family. Their actions brought me to Austin, and it was here that I found that happiness.

And the money? I'm sure you might wonder about that. I saw what it did to my father, Hannah. I saw it consume him until money was all he cared about, even over his own children. I saw what money had done to my uncles, and my cousins. Money can make some people happy, but when you have too much of it, it destroys your life. It's a curse, Hannah, a curse that destroys, no matter how much it can be used to build. I was rich, once. But I'm far richer now than I ever was when I had money, because now my life is nearly complete. And when we have our first child, then I'll know what it's like to be truly blessed.

And he wrote on. Friends came and went, but when they called him, he didn't answer. His left arm went beyond pain and settled into an angry numbness, a kind of dull buzzing. He just wrote, and wrote, divulging heartfelt desires, admitting to fears, anything he thought that would help Hannah understand him so she would understand just how much he loved her daughter.

He blinked when the phone rang. He picked it up, then grunted in pain when he carefully rotated his left arm as he opened it. "Hello?"

"Kit? Where are you?" It was Jessie.

He looked at the clock on his computer, and saw that it was nearly 8:00pm. He'd been sitting there three hours after quitting time, working on the letter. "Oh, I'm still at work. I've been working on something that I couldn't quit."

"Come home," she told him. "The doctor said light activity, not overtime!"

"I've been taking it easy, love," he assured her as he started the last paragraph:

Well, Hannah, I'm afraid I'm going to have to end it here, though I feel I've completely failed to try to explain how I feel. I just haven't done it justice. But, your daughter just called me and is nagging at me to come home. I'm still in the office, some three hours after I should have been home, and she's still in nurse mode. Until the doc gives me a clean bill of health, she's going to be my terror of a pretty kitty. I can only hope that you read this letter and at least understand how much I love Jessie, and can only beg for your blessing to be her husband and the father of your grandchildren.

Sincerely,

Kit

He saved the letter, then opened up the email program. "Hon, what's your email address at home?" he asked. "Something I can send to your family at home, rather than your father's office?"

“Umm, try skeetfan at armstrong dot com. That’s my dad’s home email.”

“So, your mother would get an email if I sent it there?”

“Mom? You’re sending email to Mom?”

“She’s put out a cease fire offer, pretty kitty. I’m going to try to get a peace treaty.”

Jessie laughed. “Yeah, just put it in the subject line it’s for Mom, and Dad’ll have her come read it.”

“Well, it’s going to be a file and a message, in case she doesn’t want to try to read it that way.” He copied the entire text of the file into his email client, attached the document that made up the letter, and then sent it on its way. “Alright, pretty kitty, I’m on the way home.”

“I’ll call home and tell her you sent her something.”

“If you do that, she’ll get your number.”

“Well, I guess I should. Like you said, she’s showing signs of asking for a peace treaty, so I guess a little show of faith on my part would help a little.”

“Okay.”

“What did you send her?”

“A letter,” he answered, putting his left arm back in the sling after closing everything out and turning off the monitor. Mike didn’t like them shutting down their computers, he was one of those who believed that letting them run was better for them in the long run than turning them off and on. “A letter explaining how I feel.”

“It took you three hours to write it?”

“I’ve been writing it since after lunch,” he answered. “I hope she has some time. It’s over twenty pages.”

“Woah.”

“I don’t think I did a very good job. It’s hard to put I love you in words that don’t do it justice.”

“Aww, you’re so sweet, my handsome fox.”

“Thanks, my pretty kitty.”

“Come home, baby. I’ll cook you something to eat.”

“I am a little hungry. Gotta hang up now, hon, I need the only paw I’ve got to set the alarm and lock the door. See you in fifteen.”

“Before you go, what do you want for dinner?”

“Anything handy.”

“How does hamburgers sound?”

He laughed. “Since when do I say no to hamburgers?”

Chapter 9

The laptop that Vil had sent Jessie the day before was, quite simply, awesome.

It was a new model, the next step up from Kit's own laptop, and he was just slightly jealous of it. Mike, on the other hand, was almost violently jealous when he came over to help them set up the laptop for their home network. Sam too was quite interested in it, having come over to hang out with Jessie and get some more lessons on cooking. "Think I could get your sister to do me a favor?" he asked with a laugh as they finished setting up the laptop for the network, and Mike went about installing the programs she'd need on it and importing over the work she kept on his laptop into her own.

When Vil called that night to talk about the wedding, he told her that the laptop had come. "Jessie's in love with it, and Mike almost stole it," he chuckled.

"What, you like it?"

"It's a lot nicer than mine," he admitted.

"I didn't even see it. I just told them to send the best they had. I have the same laptop as you, bro, how much better is it?" He told her about the upgrades with the new model, which made her laugh ruefully. "Hmm, sounds like I'm gonna upgrade mine too."

"Mike was drooling over it."

“Oh, he’ll get over it.”

He should have caught the little tilt in her voice that would have warned him that she had shenanigans on her mind. It would have prepared him for what happened at work the next day. As he and Savid worked through the mailbag page with Marty, working out how much space he’d need for the issue, Fed Ex showed up in the office. Two of them, with a dolly of Sabletech boxes. “Which of you is Rick Sanders?”

“I am,” Rick called as he came out of the office. “What’s this?”

“Delivery,” he said. “You got nineteen boxes total here, sir. Where do you want us to stack them?”

“Delivery of what?”

Kit, however, was on the phone almost instantly. “Hey bro,” Vil called in a bored voice, the sound of a computer keyboard’s clicking in the background.

“Vil!” he barked.

She laughed immediately. “Are they there?”

“Vil sent them!” he said, in a little disgust. “What do you think you’re doing?”

“I was looking for a way to pay Rick and your friends back for saving your life, baby bro,” she said pleasantly. “I figured what the hell, why not invest a little in your company?”

“What the hell did you do?” he demanded.

“I bought your office a new computer network,” she replied. “And some other equipment that magazines often need. Did you think I’d forget?”

I don't forget slights, but I also never forget good samaritans. And it's not like I'm down there throwing cash around," she said teasingly. "Tell me that your magazine can't use what I've sent you."

He growled, then sighed and chuckled ruefully. "We probably can," he admitted.

"And it's not a gift. It's an investment. I expect to see a return on the money I've invested in your company. But, I won't be looking for money. I'll be looking for a favor sometime in the future."

He blew out his breath. "What did you send?"

"It's Christmas for Lone Star, baby bro. Open them and see," she actually giggled, then she hung up on him.

Rick gave him a wild look. "Vil sent it all," he repeated. "As a thank-you for what you guys did for me."

"She did?" Marty gasped, as the two delivery drivers waited patiently.

"Stack them anywhere," Rick told them. "Let's see what we got here."

After four more trips, all the equipment was taking up the entire office. Rick talked with the two delivery drivers, a mouse and a rat, signed for it, and then they left. "Well, let's see what's in them," Rick said. "Everyone pick a box, but don't scatter stuff everywhere. And look for a manifest! There has to be a manifest in one of the boxes. They'd never send a shipment this big without a manifest."

Vil was thorough, and she made everyone in the office feel like a little kid. Vil had sent enough cutting-edge desktops to replace everyone's workstation, complete with large monitors, as well as a high-powered new server that could replace the five boxes Mike used for the current website and other jobs. And she also sent eight identical laptops, the same model as Jessie's new laptop, even one for Kit. There were also four video cameras, three high-powered professional digital cameras, five hand-held casual digital cameras, two new digital drawing easels, two new high-powered scanners, four professional-grade color printers, and a huge LCD TV that could be hooked up to a computer and serve as a monitor, which they could hang on the wall and use for meetings. The last item they came across, buried in the box holding all the cameras, was a small box packed with a personal gift to Rick, the fur who had literally saved Kit's life. Inside the box was a stack of envelopes, a little plaque to hang on his wall, and a letter. "There are three personal gifts to each of you," he read aloud to them all. "I've also decided to invest in your magazine by supplying you with equipment you need to do your work. The laptops, the Blackberries, and the envelopes in this box are my personal gifts to you, the crew, who were there for my brother when he needed you. The professional equipment is for the magazine, so you have everything you need to do your work. Except," he chuckled, "for the Toshiba camera. That one is Jessie's. I just had them send it to the office as part of the shipment, and Kit can take it home to her tonight. And to Rick, who shot the fur who nearly killed my brother and saved his life, a personal thank-you, my eternal gratitude, and a small token of my appreciation for saving my little brother."

He looked at the envelopes, saw that his own was on top, and he opened it. He gasped, his eyes wild. "Holy—" he said, breathing fast. "She sent me a check for twenty thousand dollars!"

"Oh God!" Lilly said with a squealing laugh. Rick handed the next one in the stack to Mike, who tore it open, then gave a whoop.

“She gave me ten thousand! I can buy a new car!”

After all of them were opened, Kit saw the ugly truth. Vil had given ten thousand dollars to every member of the crew but Rick, to whom she gave twenty thousand. And there was nothing he could do about it. Outside of the laptop and the Blackberry, she’d directly given nothing to him. She instead went around him and gave to everyone at his job, including the job itself. And there was nothing he could do about it. She only sent him the laptop and the Blackberry, and not because of who he was, but because he was a member of the staff.

He wouldn’t complain too much. He had to admit, Jessie’s laptop was awesome, and he was secretly thrilled that Vil sent him a toy of equal wow-factor. He had his principles about not taking hand-outs from Vil, but the little kid in him couldn’t deny the excitement of having a kick-ass laptop to play with. The Blackberry, well, he could actually see use for that. He did do some work outside the office, and staying in touch was always a good thing. Thanks to Vil, now the whole office had a way to keep in touch through company phones, something Rick couldn’t afford.

And he also had to admit, Vil was right. They could use everything she sent. It was all cutting edge, and they could really get a lot of work done on it.

Mike was in heaven. It would be a lot of work to install all the new equipment, but he looked forward to it with a childlike enthusiasm.

And he got to work. The first thing he did was put all the new laptops on the network, and after that, little got done...so it was a good thing that the next issue was already basicly wrapped up. It usually was by Wednesday, what most of them were working on were pieces and sections for next week's issue. The entire office started installing their programs on their new laptops as Mike went through and started installing equipment. He started with the master computer, which was the main station that handled the actual editing software and files they sent to the printer, and worked down from there, moving on to Rick and Savid's systems, which also handled editing, but Rick's computer also held most of the vital magazine files and documents he needed to run the magazine. Mike was very thorough as techs went, and was able to mirror everything on their original systems into the new ones quickly and efficiently, making it almost seem that they weren't on a new machine. There were some differences, and he'd had to reinstall some software because the new machines were more powerful and had more options, but it didn't take him long, about two hours per box. He drew up a schedule after he finished with Savid's system and made sure everything worked properly. Mike would be installing the new machines at a rate of two a day from there out. Jeffrey and Lilly would get theirs tomorrow, Barry and Kit the day after, and then the day after that, Mike would come in on his day off and install his own workstation and port everything dealing with the website and databases to the new blade server stack.

“Now, since we got all this junk all over creation,” Rick said after Mike told them about the plan, “here's the deal. When Mike finishes installing your new station, if you want, you can keep your old one and take it home. Jeffrey, Savid, you can keep the gear you have installed on your old machines, since you'll use it. Anyone who wants the old printers and scanners can throw their names in a hat and we'll draw to see who gets to keep them. Mike, the machines you're using to run all the network stuff are yours.”

“I’m going to keep two of them here to serve as backups,” Mike told him.

“Mike, think I might borrow one of those?” Kit asked. “I don’t have a desktop at home, and I’d like a platform for doing some stuff.”

“Why not use your old computer, Kit?” Barry asked.

“Kit’s box isn’t set up for dealing with heavy graphics or movie files,” Mike answered for him. “It’s the oldest box in the office, and it just doesn’t have the horsepower. I think I could swing trading you your old box for one of the servers. It has the hardware for it.”

“You can have my old machine, Kit,” Savid told him. “I don’t need another computer at home. I have what I need...but I would like to keep easel. Easel here is better than easel I have at home.”

“I doubt I’ll be doing any graphic design,” Kit chuckled. “But thanks, Savid. We just bought a camera, and with this one that Vil sent Jessie, I’d like to have a single computer we can use for it, not two separate laptops.”

“No problem, Kit. You get good computer for that, mine is graphics machine, it has lots of power and much memory for graphics. I have many graphics programs on it already,” he grinned.

“Well, there ya go, Kit,” Mike laughed. “Savid has all the good graphics software on his box, so you get the whole shebang. I think he even has Moviemaker.”

“Yes, you install off server for me, remember?”

“You can do what you want with them, son,” he chuckled. “I’ll have Mike install the big TV on the wall on Monday, and I think I’ll have cable put in for it,” he chuckled. “Can it run cable and still work as a presentation monitor when we have staff meetings?”

“Hell, easily, boss,” Mike nodded with a chuckle.

“Mmm—mmm—mmm, can you say superbowl party, ladies?” Marty said with a snap of his fingers, which produced some chuckles.

“We’re gonna be a little crowded with all these boxes around, but it’ll work out. Don’t throw them away, Mike. I’ll take them home and stow them in my old storage shed, just in case we need them to ship something back.”

“Got it, boss,” he nodded.

In all, Kit was a little miffed at Vil for meddling, but again, she had him by the whiskers on this one. She didn’t send anything directly to him. She sent things that the magazine could really use. And though she sent money, she didn’t send truly obscene sums. She gave each of them a large amount that they could really use, but not so much that it went beyond the pail. And besides, they were his friends. He couldn’t be angry that Vil had shown them such generosity, for they were all like him, even Rick. They were all squeaking by on lower middle class incomes, but they all loved their jobs and they had a lot of fun doing it. Rick may have owned the magazine, but on some weeks he took home less money than he paid his staff, and he kept paying Kit even when he wasn’t working...so that Vil gave him money seemed like a very proper thing to do for him.

And Kit got an awesome laptop...and a little more. Kit put his name in the hat for the printer, and he won one of them, but he lost on the draw for the scanners. He was happy about that, because those were professional-quality graphics printers, and able to print out high-quality photographs when one used the right paper.

He went home with his old and new laptops, Jessie's new video camera, printer, and Savid's old system. Jessie was in the kitchen, a little apron on over a tank top and shorts, getting ready to cook stuffed bell peppers. "Sam's coming over later, my handsome fox. What is that?"

"You won't believe what Vil did," he grunted as he put his portfolio on the coffee table. "Come out the car, I need your help."

"What?"

Jessie listened as he explained what happened, and laughed when he opened the trunk and showed her Savid's old computer and monitor. "Vil sent you a video camera too, so I figured I may as well take advantage of it. Rick's letting everyone keep their old computers to take home, but Savid gave me his because my old office machine is kinda old. Savid's computer is a graphics machine, so it's got plenty of power. It can handle everything we need to do on it, no problem. We can put all our pictures and movies and such on the desktop, that way it's not scattered across three laptops."

"Hmm...Kit, are you too attached to your old laptop?"

"Why?"

"Because Sam would kill for it. Think you might sell it to her?"

Kit laughed. "Love, she can have it."

"She'll be thrilled!" Jessie said, kissing him exuberantly. "I'll get the heavy stuff, my handsome fox, you get what you can carry."

Even though Kit was sure he could do it himself, Mike still showed up a little after he got home, still giddy and all but dancing around like a kid. “I came to help ya network that desktop,” he grinned.

“I think I can handle it, Mike,” Kit chuckled. “You’ve taught me well.”

“Well, yeah, but this one’ll be a bit trickier. You’re dealing with a machine that was part of another network, so I’ll have to do a little remapping on it. It’s either that or reinstall.”

“And lose all the programs Savid has on it? No way! This is like free Edit Master, Office, Flash, Moviemaker, Studio, and Photoshop!”

“Then let’s get it set up,” he grinned.

Sam came over as Mike was setting up the desktop to be the main part of the their home network. “What?” she gasped from the living room, then she appeared in the doorway of the spare room where Kit had his modem, serving as a little office. “Kit, are you giving me your laptop?”

“My old one, yeah,” he grinned. “My sis sent me a new one, and Jessie asked if I’d sell my old one to you. But you’ve been a big help, and the sorority gave me a lot of my furniture, so it’s only fair to return a favor with a favor. As soon as I get all my stuff off of it, it’s all yours. Just share it with the rest of the sorority,” he added with a chuckle.

Sam charged in and hugged him from behind, “I think I love you!” she shouted.

Kit laughed. “Don’t let Jessie hear you say that.”

It took about two hours. Mike and Sam stayed over for dinner as Mike set up their new desktop. It had all of Savid’s programs on it, and Mike went ahead and set up the printer and attached it to the network so any of the four systems on the network could print using it. Mike even helped him mirror his old laptop onto his new one, then cleared out his personal files and gave the old laptop to Sam, but left the programs on it. They decided to leave it on their home network as well, so Sam could come over and use their printer. Since Sam was pre-med, the ability to print some detailed pictures might be useful to her for her anatomy homework and such.

Sam looked like a girl with a new doll after Mike helped him move all his personal files off his old laptop and to his new one, and he handed the old one over to Sam. She actually cradled it like it was a baby when she waltzed out of the room with it.

“That’s one femme who takes her computers seriously,” Mike chuckled. “And cute, too.”

It took Mike until Tuesday to finish the conversion of the office to the new equipment, and the last station he replaced was Kit’s own. It was a huge upgrade for him, going from that wind-up toy to a cutting edge workstation with the best graphics card and a virtual bottomless pit of RAM. It was so powerful, he could run about ten different programs at once and barely notice a slowdown. It also put them a little behind on their work, because of the sheer giddiness and the disruption of the computer network while Mike replaced everything. They had to roll up their sleeves and buckle down to get the magazine fully laid out and ready for printing on Thursday night.

On Thursday, they held their first staff meeting using the big TV as their display as Rick and Savid went over the issue and looked for feedback or last minute changes. It was a huge difference from all of them crowding around the monitor they had in the table...which was actually still there. Rick rather liked using it when he and Savid were working, since it was fairly large and under glass, which allowed them to lay things over top of it to get a rough idea how things would look.

Getting used to the Blackberry, on the other hand, wasn't quite so easy. He'd never had one before, and had no idea how it worked. He spent the better part of Wednesday afternoon reading its manual and learning how to set it up and customize it, and really saw that he wasn't going to get as much use out of it as he expected...at least until he had it all working. Since Vil had set up the accounts for them, she knew which was his, and she was already sending him messages. Vil was a dedicated "Crackberry," someone who was never without her trusty device, and now that Kit had one, she started using it to email him. The one she'd sent them all was like a bloody swiss army knife. It was a phone, email messenger, text messenger, web browser, video and audio player, integrated camera, organizer, wifi, modem feature that allowed the blackberry to connect a computer to the internet using the device's own phone feature, it even had GPS. He emailed Vil when he got the device up and running, and she called him back using the Blackberry's phone number not a minute later.

"Hey bro," she said with a chuckle.

"I didn't need another phone, Vil," he told her.

"Hey, I wanted to get you a real toy, and Blackberries do it all," she told him. "I'd be totally lost without mine. Look at it this way, bro. Now, when applications ask you for a work phone and you don't want Marty knowing your business, give them the Blackberry number."

Kit laughed. “Well, that is a good point. And it feels kinda businesslike to have a company phone,” he added. “I hope this doesn’t cost too much.”

“Eh, I just had your accounts added into the shipyard account, but your phones are like mine and my higher execs, unlimited, where I have limits on the ones used by my lower execs.”

“Isn’t that a bit dangerous? I mean, that’s documented help you’re giving me.”

“Don’t you worry about that, little bro,” she told him seriously. “I’ve almost taken care of that little problem.”

When he asked her what she was going to do, she refused to answer, and then hurriedly said her goodbyes and hung up.

Rick put a memo out for them all that had all their Blackberry numbers listed, so they could call each other. All of them put the numbers in their phone features, and that wired up the whole magazine.

The Blackberry came in handy the next day, when he was at the annex for his next doctor’s appointment. This time, he was there alone, and Doctor Barnett gave him another exam to check his arm. The exterior signs of the wound were now fully healed, and there was only a little tightness and twinging when he moved his left arm in certain ways. His fur was even well on its way to growing back out. Barnett examined him for about a half an hour, and then had the nurse draw some of his blood. “Well, we’re gonna check for any sign of infection,” he announced, “but either way, I want you to take that antibiotic until it’s gone. That will really discourage any bugs from trying to take up residence in you.”

“Okay, Doc,” Kit chuckled.

“Now, on to the results. Good news, bad news...which do you want?”

“Both,” he smiled.

“Okay, since you’re leaving it up to me. The good news is, kiss the sling goodbye,” he grinned. “I still want you to take it easy, though, and you’re still on light activity restriction. No heavy lifting, no stresses to your shoulder, and if you spend extended periods of time at a computer, I want you to take a five minute break every twenty minutes.”

“Okay.”

“Now, the bad news. Physical therapyyyyyy,” he said in an intentionally melodramatic, spooky voice which surprised Kit and made him laugh. “Three times a week right here in the annex, you’ll have a half hour of physical therapy, to work the tightness out of your shoulder and get your muscle tone back.”

“How long will I have to do that?”

“It’s never a set time, Kit, it’ll depend on how well your shoulder responds to therapy. When I feel your shoulder is rehabilitated, you’re outta there, and you never have to come back. But, I want you back here in two weeks so I can check out the shoulder and see how it’s responding to therapy. Same place, see the nurse at the desk for your appointment and to set up your therapy. Now get outta here!” he said with a grin and a shooing motion with his paws.

Once everyone got used to the upgrades, it just rocked.

The new computers were fast and powerful. The Blackberries actually proved very useful when Barry, Lilly, and Kit were out doing fieldwork, letting them check in with the office and each other quickly, and more than once on the next Tuesday, Kit sent off research information straight to Barry's Blackberry as he was out doing interviews. All in all, by the time they released the next issue, they were fully used to them, and the magazine was better than ever.

He also got an answer from Jessie's mother. After returning to work from physical therapy, he found an email message from her in his work email. He opened it and found a short message:

Kit:

I received your letter and read it. I found it to be surprisingly moving, and I have to admit that you stated your case with emotion and warmth. I can appreciate your candor.

But understand, this is a very personal and emotional issue for me. I have no doubt you love Jessica, not after reading that letter, but what I fear is the future, when you grow bored with her and then abandon her. I know you say you'll never do that, but that's the big difference here. You say you won't do it, but I think you will. And I don't want my daughter to have to raise children alone because you've left her.

I've agreed to come to the wedding. I admit that I can't stop it, that I can't turn Jessica away from what I think is a terrible decision. She's made it clear to me that if I force her to choose between you and me, she'll choose you. I have to accept that fact. All I can do is step back, watch, and pray that I'm wrong. And when you do leave her, I'll be there to help her get her life back together.

I do want you to come to Thanksgiving. You need to meet Jessica's brother and sister, and I'd like to talk to you in person, so we can discuss the marriage. I promise I'll try to be civil.

Hannah

Kit leaned back and read it again, and pondered it. Well, that was... nothing he ever expected. She was afraid he was going to leave Jessie when he got bored with her? It was almost ridiculous! But, since so many marriages ended with divorce—no, that was a silly thought. No, not really. It was a justifiable thought for Hannah, since she didn't know him and she didn't understand how much he loved her.

He was right...he just couldn't put it into words.

She did deserve a reply, though.

Hannah

I'm a little surprised by your reasoning. It had never crossed my mind. But, looking at it from your point of view, I can at least understand it.

That's one of the things we can talk about when I come for Thanksgiving.

But, I do need to warn you. Because I was in the hospital (I'm sure Jessie told you all about it, I won't go over it again), and my boss was kind enough to pay my salary while I was out of work, I can't in good faith ask him for any extra days off. It would be terribly rude. We will be doing an issue on the day after Thanksgiving (our magazine prints once a week, and is released on Fridays), so I'll be working during Thanksgiving week. The best I will be able to do is to fly up on my days off, stay overnight, and then fly back the next day. My normal days off are Sunday and Monday. I'll talk to my boss, but I may end up going that way.

I will get Thanksgiving day off, however. If me coming up either before or after Thanksgiving is too much of a hassle for you, or I'll miss meeting Jessie's brother and sister, I could fly up on Wednesday night, and then fly back on Friday morning. On Fridays, we don't come into the office until 1pm. That would give me enough of a window to fly in, spend Thanksgiving day with you, then fly back early the next morning.

By the way, Hannah, if you ever want to talk to me in real time, please, don't hesitate to call. You have my number, and I'm always willing to talk with you.

Kit

He thought that was a decent enough reply, and sent it off.

He spent most of the rest of the day knocking out some research projects and working with Jeffrey on the strip, and was surprised to have a reply back from Hannah as he checked his mail one more time before heading home.

Kit:

I'd rather keep it in emails for now, since I have time to think about what I want to say. That prevents me from saying something that might get me banned from the wedding. The phone doesn't have a backspace key.

Kit had to laugh at that.

I can appreciate your dedication to your company. Given the choice between a weekend at either end or Thanksgiving itself, I'd much rather have you there on Thanksgiving day. It might make things a little rushed, since I'd like to have a long talk with you and I have a lot of cooking to do that day, but you'll miss Jenny if you come before Thanksgiving and you'll miss John if you come after. John has to go to a conference in Chicago, and will be leaving on Sunday afternoon. I don't think that would give us enough time to talk with you.

So, if you would, please make your reservations for Wednesday evening and a return on Friday morning.

Hannah

Kit typed out a quick reply telling her that he'd do so, then went home.

Jessie was doing her homework at the table when he came in, but the smell of tuna cassrole assaulted his nose in an appealing manner. "Hey pretty kitty," he called as he closed the door. "You mom sent me an email about Thanksgiving."

"She did? What did she say?"

"I gave her the options for me coming out, and she went with Thanksgiving day. I'll be flying out Wednesday evening, and flying back Friday morning."

"You won't get much sleep."

"I'll live. God, that smells wonderful."

She giggled. "You mind some company tonight? I asked Sandy and Sam to come over. I'm going to help Sandy with an essay she needs to write."

"I love how you asked me after you invited them over," he laughed.

She grinned. "It's easier to ask for forgiveness than permission."

"You're terrible," he accused, leaning over and kissing her on the ear as he went into the kitchen for some tea. Jessie always had at least a cup of tea waiting for him when she got home before he did. “Your mom also answered my letter. She gave the strangest answer to it.”

“How so?”

“She said that she thinks I’m going to leave you after I get bored,” he said with a mystified expression as he took a sip of his tea. “But, at least she said she believes I love you now.”

“Well, it’s a small step,” she said. “But I agree, that’s a weird reasoning. I think Mom doesn’t understand.”

“Not at all,” he said with a nod. “I’m a fox that takes marriage vows seriously. When the priest says til death do you part, I take it to mean exactly that.”

“I’m glad, cause that’s the only way you’ll ever get away from me,” she said with a loving grin, reaching over and patting his paw. “How’s your shoulder?”

“Doing fine,” he said. “I didn’t have any pain at all today. So, any movement on the marriage front?”

She laughed. “Some. I don’t want to set a date until you’re completely healed, though. Me and Vil have just been talking about decorations and the reception, and my dress. There is something she wants, though, that we haven’t told you yet.”

“What?”

She seemed to steel herself. “She wants to have the ceremony in Boston.”

“Absolutely not!” he said immediately. “I won’t go within a thousand miles of Boston! Is Vil crazy? Does she want to start a war in the family? If I brought you to Boston, that would be like bringing you into the lion’s den!”

“She’s...serious about it, Kit,” she said. “I’ve been trying to urge her out of the idea, but she doesn’t want to give it up. She wants you to get married at the church where your father and mother married.”

“Well, that’s nostalgic of her,” he said with dark irony. “No. We met here, our life is here, we marry here. I won’t get married in a place that has nothing but bad memories.”

“I think that’s why she wants us to marry there, so you’ll have a good memory.”

“Well, she can just get that idea right out of her mind,” he said adamantly. “She went way over the line this time. I could handle her giving the office and the crew gifts because it made them happy, but she’s starting to get way too comfortable with the idea she can cheese me into what she wants.”

“I’ll tell her—“

“No, I’ll tell her, Jess,” he said, standing up and taking the phone out of his pocket.

She picked it up on the first ring. “Hey baby bro,” she greeted.

“No,” he said with a hiss.

“Ah. She told you, did she?”

“Are you crazy?” he demanded. “You want us to get married in Boston? Are you just trying to kick sand in the family’s face, Vil? This isn’t some kind of game of nose-tweaking! This is our lives, Vil! I won’t bring Jess within artillery range of Boston!”

“Kit, I didn’t want it because I want to rub you in the family’s noses. I wanted to...it’s hard to explain. I wanted to honor a promise. Do you remember Mom much?”

“Of course I do,” he answered.

“Well, it was mom’s wish that we got married at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Kit,” she told him. “I just thought it would be nice to do the one thing I could remember that Mom always wanted, that’s all.”

“She never told me that.”

“Since when do mothers talk about weddings with their sons, baby bro?” she asked. “It’s something that mothers talk about with their daughters. Trust me, bro, I’d never bring you to Boston without a good reason, and I sure as hell would never expose Jessie to the family. I just want to do something for Mom.”

“Well, I can understand that, but it’s still completely out of the question,” he said.

He heard her sigh. “How about a deal, then?”

“What?”

“You have your wedding in Austin, but you also get married at the Holy Cross,” she said. “I can arrange for a midnight ceremony at the Holy Cross. You can fly in, go straight to the cathedral, have a ceremony, then go right back to the airport. That way we honor Mom's wishes and minimize the exposure."

"I...dunno, sis. I'll have to talk to Jess about it. This is something we have to agree to together."

"No pressure, baby bro. Talk about it and get back to me."

"Talk to me about what, love?" Jessie asked after they said their goodbyes.

"Vil explained why she wants us to marry in Boston," he said, sitting back down and taking her paw. He explained Vil's idea to her quickly and simply. "I...I don't know, love. I'd love to give something to Mom, but...."

"But you'd have to go to Boston," she surmised, touching his cheek.

He bowed his head, holding onto her paw.

"I understand, love. I know what Boston is to you. So really, I don't have anything to say. Personally, I don't mind flying in and having the ceremony. We'd only be there like two hours. But I'm not the one that matters here, my handsome fox. Vil doesn't understand why you don't want to go there, does she?"

"She knows that Boston is nothing but bad memories for me," he told her. "I spent most of my life either trying to get away from that place, or trying to forget it. But," he said with a sigh. "But I loved my mother, Jess. If she wanted me to get married in that cathedral, I'd like to fulfil her wish. It just won't be easy."

"I'll be there with you, my love. You don't have to face it alone."

He gave her an earnest look of relief, love, and gratitude. She leaned over and kissed him, then, to his surprise, she urged him down, until he was laying on the couch with his head in her lap. He sighed and closed his eyes as she tousled his hair, and just babied him a little as he tried to get over the fear and anger and humiliation and pain that always came whenever he thought of his life in Boston, both before and after he was disowned. Sometimes Jessie just amazed him. She always seemed to know how he was feeling, and always seemed to know exactly what to say or do to make him feel better.

Clearly, that moment of quiet intimacy was the perfect time to be interrupted. The doorbell rang, and Jessie just sighed. "It's open!" she called, keeping her paw in his hair.

Sandy and Sam came in, Sam carrying her new laptop and backpack and Sandy with her backpack. "I think we're interrupting something," Sam noted.

"Naw, if JD's head was in his lap, then we'd be interrupting something," Sandy said with a naughty grin.

"I think someone doesn't want any supper," Jessie said in a prim tone. He didn't need to look at her to know her face fur was ruffled.

"When will it be ready?"

"When the timer goes off," she answered, twirling his bangs around her finger. "You two can set the table. I'm busy."

"We can see that," Sandy laughed.

"Did we have to let them in?" he asked, rolling over on his back and looking up at her with a light smile.

“Well, given I invited them over, it would have been a little rude to leave them on the doorstep,” she giggled.

“I swear, JD, we must have totally corrupted you,” Sandy grinned as Sam came out of the kitchen holding plates. “You go from the vestal virgin to engaged in like three months.”

“I was just waiting for the right guy to come along,” she said with a gentle smile down at him, her cheeks ruffling slightly.

“Can you find one for me? I think me and Bobby are about done.”

“Mind if I make more tea?” Sam asked.

“Go for it,” Kit called, reaching up and taking Jessie’s paw.

“Hey Kit, your fur grow back?” Sandy asked.

“It’s about halfway there,” he answered her.

“Can I see?” she asked.

“You really don’t want to eat dinner, do you?” Jessie said archly.

Sandy laughed, then laughed even harder when the timer went off. “Oh no, I’d better get it before you kick me out!”

The physical therapy wasn’t much fun.

It wasn’t that Kit minded doing physical labor, since he’d spent months doing manual jobs. It was the mechanical feel of it. He did exacting exercises in a large room filled with other patients and therapists, which made his arm and shoulder ache when he went back to work. He went three times a week, and though he hated it, over the course of three weeks, it did do its job.

Over that time, his fur grew back in, and the pain finally faded away from his shoulder. Doc Barnett proclaimed him fully healed, but continued him on physical therapy to both strengthen his shoulder and arm and also to make sure that he'd have no lingering pain or reduced range of motion from his wound. The latter concern was minimized, Barnett said, because of the excellent work of the surgeons who had repaired the tissues in his chest and shoulder, putting it back together perfectly and allowing Kit to heal with no issues at all.

When he was finally released from physical therapy and completely discharged and proclaimed healthy, his shoulder was as good as new. There was no pain, no stiffness, and much to his eternal relief, no sign he'd ever been shot. His fur did not grow back scarred white like it did on his back and head, mainly because the vast majority of the surgical scars were on his white-furred chest. Only the edges of the incisions wandered into the red fur on his shoulder, and that fur grew back red, not white.

It was nice to finally be free of it. He was back to full strength, back to work, and Jessie was overjoyed that he was fully healthy. She made him a cake from scratch when Barnett gave him his all-clear and discharged him from physical therapy, German chocolate, and even gave him a very private party that night that resulted in him being late for work the next day.

As he'd healed, he continued corresponding with Hannah. It was strange to talk to her over email, like something out of that movie You've Got Mail, but it had a strange quirky charm. Kit wrote her about every day, a page or two as he talked about work and other innocuous things, but mainly continued to tell her all about his life with Jessie and how much he loved her. He told Hannah things that Jessie wouldn't, even delving slightly into their love life when Hannah boldly asked if they were practicing any kind of protection before the wedding. He was honest in telling her no, that Jessie was hoping to get pregnant, and though he'd be overjoyed to have a child, he was secretly hoping that Jessie could finish school before she conceived. He really wanted her to get her degree, and a child would honestly make that much harder. But, he'd written, he could not deny Jessie anything. She wanted a baby, and though he was concerned for Jessie's ability to finish school, he couldn't tell her no. If she became pregnant, well, they'd find a way to make sure Jessie got her degree. Hannah really didn't like that answer, but, he did feel like he scored a few points with his position. She grudgingly complemented him for his wisdom and his dedication to Jessie's education.

But what he liked most was the fact that he was getting to know this enigmatic woman, who had a story he was dying to learn, but knowing he could never ask her to tell it to him. Not only would it be terribly rude, but he'd made a promise to Jessie, and Kit was a fox of his word. Jessie called Hannah "Momzilla," but when he learned the truth of her, and then began to correspond with her, he started understanding her and didn't think she was quite that bad. Sure, she was pushy, willful, cunning, overbearing, melodramatic, and she was stubborn, but at least he knew why she was the way she was, and that allowed him to shrug off the majority of her invasive badgering without getting angry about it. He could see that though her actions were being influenced by her own past, she still sincerely loved her daughter and wanted what was best for her, and in that manner he could not fault her. Jessie was a treasure, the most precious thing in the world, and he'd be just as protective if she was his daughter. The main difference between them, though, was that Kit trusted Jessie, where Hannah didn't.

But that was a fundamental difference between spouses and parents the world over.

He'd just finished up another message for Hannah and sent it off as he sat on the couch, laptop in his lap, listening to classical music on the radio and the wind howl as a freak November thunderstorm raked across Austin on a Sunday afternoon. Jessie was over at the sorority, visiting with friends, and Lupe had just left a bit ago with two other neighbors, Dan the lion and Mickey the lemming, who came over to watch football. Which, for Kit, meant getting ragged on because he wasn't a Dallas fan. Luckily, they didn't watch Dallas play, so the snide comments and Patriots bashing was kept to a minimum.

Kit may have hated the city of Boston, but he was still a loyal Patriots, Celtics, Red Sox, and Bruins fan.

He made himself some tea, and was sitting at the couch, a hot cup on the coffee table as he surfed the web and checked email when Jessie got home. She was in the act of closing her phone when she came in. "Hey, my handsome fox," she called with a bright smile.

"Welcome home, pretty kitty. You're in a good mood."

"Just got off the phone with Vil, we have everything all planned out as far as what we want. And now that you're all healed up, it's time to set a date."

"That is your domain, my pretty kitty," he said with a gentle smile as she leaned down for a kiss.

"Well, I'd like at least a little input," she said to him. "Sometimes I feel like you're a little too accommodating, Kit. Do you realize we've never once fought? That's a little unusual given how long we've been together."

Kit laughed. "Oh, that's not going to last forever, but I'd like to avoid that for as long as possible. And I'm accommodating because I want you to be happy, my pretty kitty. If it makes you happy, then it makes me happy. And since I honestly have absolutely no opinion about what day we should have the ceremony, then what more is there for me to say? It all falls on what day makes you happy, Jess. We can get married tomorrow, we can get married next year, it doesn't matter to me as long as we're married at the end and it makes you happy."

"Really?"

"Really, love. Find the day that works best for you and your family. Since Vil can come down here whenever she wants, and that's the only member of my family I want at the wedding, this side of the aisle is flexible and easy to please."

She laughed. "Okay then, love, lemme call my folks and talk to them about it."

"Think I'll go over to Lupe's."

"Poker?"

"Minimum safe distance," he said immediately, which made Jessie laugh richly. "Who's cooking tonight?"

"I am, silly. What do you want?"

"I've been having a craving for steak."

"Only because I bought some and they've been in the meat drawer," she accused.

“Well, that might have had something to do with it,” he agreed.

“Well, that works for me too. I think I’m gonna be on the phone for a while, and that’s something I can cook with one paw tied up by the phone,” she chuckled, kissing him one more time. “Take your phone, I’ll call you when it’s ready.”

“Surely, love.”

Kit evacuated himself over to Lupe’s apartment to give Jessie the space and privacy to deal with the sure hostility Hannah would present when a solid date was put in her face. Hannah had been rather pleasant and civil. Lupe’s apartment was very much a bachelor pad. It was a little messy, dominated by his TV, and filled with mismatched furniture. And though it was a little messy, it was actually rather clean. Lupe just had a habit of leaving things laying around. “She boot you brah?” Lupe asked.

Kit chuckled. “Nah, just giving her space. She’s setting the date of the wedding, and that means calling her mom. She’s not very happy about Jessie getting married, and Jessie doesn’t like to fight with her mother in company. So I cleared out to give her privacy.”

“Ah, that’s nice of ya, brah,” he noted. “Glad to hear you’re finally getting the ball rolling. Any idea when it’ll be?”

“Knowing Jessie and my sister, the first day that her parents can manage to get here...but probably after Thanksgiving,” he speculated. “She does want them to meet me before the wedding, and I’m going up to her folks’ for Thanksgiving dinner. So, probably sometime in December.”

“Ah, cool. So, you have any of that leftover curry in the fridge?”

Kit laughed. “No, you ate it all. And I was a bit ticked when I went looking for it,” he said, pushing Lupe lightly on the shoulder.

“I can’t help it, brah, Jessie’s an awesome cook. She offered to teach me.”

“She’s trained quite a few cooks, she could make something out of you,” he noted. “I think she gives cooking lessons once a week over at her old sorority.”

Lupe grinned. “So, she have a sister?”

“She does, who lives in Ohio,” Kit told him.

“Damn. Is she cute?”

“No idea. I’ve never seen her before. She does have a brother though.”

Lupe gave him a look, then laughed brightly. “No thanks!”

“Hey, it’s always an option.”

When Jessie called him back home, he was fairly sure she had a firm date, and she didn’t disappoint, nor did she wander too far from his expectations. “We have a date,” she told him. “December eighteenth. I’ll be out of school, Dad’ll be done at work on the fifteenth, but Vil can’t get down here that week until the seventeenth, so we’re holding it the day after.”

“Nice. So, we’re still having it at Four Corners?”

“The reception, yeah. My folks had to be talked down over the church, though,” she giggled. “They thought we were having a catholic wedding. I had to remind them three times it’s not going to be a catholic wedding, just in a catholic church. Our Lady of Fatima.”

“Never heard of it.”

“Vil organized it for us. It’s a new catholic church about two miles from here. The monseignor there agreed to conduct a non-denominational wedding for us, but Vil was kinda adamant about a catholic priest conducting the ceremony.”

“Vil’s a Catholic, pretty kitty. “The whole family is, at least theoretically. I haven’t been to confession since I was fifteen.”

“Well, my family is Baptist, and I didn’t want a holy war,” she laughed. “Vil’s coming down next weekend to finalize the details, and I still need a dress.”

“Go as the most beautiful femme in the world, love. Go naked.”

“I’m sure you’d like that,” she giggled, her cheeks ruffling.

“So would every male in Austin,” he added, leaning over and kissing her on the neck.

“Well, I think I’d have a problem showing my dress to my daughters in fifteen years,” she giggled, beginning to purr almost immediately.

“We can always take pictures,” he offered in a husky voice, wrapping his arms around her.

“Kit! Don’t you dare distract me right now!” she ordered, pushing against his chest. “This is important!”

He chuckled. “Have you got the invitations?”

“The list is done, yeah. Now that we have a date, Vil said they’ll go out tomorrow. She’s the one that’s been doing all the real planning,” she giggled. “After we finalize the details, she takes care of it. So far, we’ve got all the decorations and flowers handled, and Vil's booked the reception for us at the Four Corners. I just need to get my dress and the bridesmaid's dresses, and you need to pick a best man and grooms, and the rings."

"That's easy. Rick will be best man, and I'll dispense with the other grooms because I couldn't pick just two or three. It'd be the whole crew or none."

"That's fine, love. Sam and Sandy will be my bridesmaids. We'll have to get you a tux."

"I can rent one."

"Vil already said no. She wants you to keep your wedding clothes. She said it's an old custom."

"That's why I wasn't going to do it. It's a Vulpan family tradition, and you know how I feel about my family."

"Well, can you humor me? I'd like to have your tux hanging in the same bag with my dress. That way we're always together, just like our wedding clothes."

He smiled gently. "For you, my pretty kitty, of course I will."

"I just hope your tux and my dress get along as well as we do," she giggled.

"They better, there won't be much room in that garment bag. I guess we'll know they do if we open the bag in a year and find baby clothes in there," he agreed, which made her laugh.

"Maybe, if we're lucky, we'll have a baby to put in them," she cooed to him, nuzzling his cheek.

“And who’s distracting who now?” he challenged.

“I have more control than you,” she said teasingly.

“Oh really?” he asked archly. He knew all her little buttons, and he used one of them against her. He put his paws on the small of her back, above and to each side of her tail, and started to massage her. Jessie’s back was very sensitive, and he’d learned that that area was particularly sensual for her. She leaned against him and immediately began to purr, her claws kneading his back and shoulders. But then she caught herself and laughed ruefully.

“You cheater!” she accused, pushing out a little. “I didn’t do that to you!”

“Hey, I’m just arguing my case,” he retorted with a teasing smile. “You said you have more control than me. Well, I think that statement’s been debunked.”

She laughed richly, then gave him a sultry look. “Well, if you want to fight over who has less control, well, I know your on switch, love,” she threatened with a smug smile.

“Oh no, get that throat away from me,” he laughed as she began to purr and leaned forward.

“I win,” she said smugly, letting him go with a victorious smirk.

“And you accuse me of cheating,” he said under his breath as she sauntered back towards the kitchen. “What about the rings?”

“Vil told me to go pick out what we want, and she’d pay for them. She also said if you argue about it, she’ll brain you.”

Kit laughed. "I get the feeling she's going to insist."

"Well, given how much money we have right now, we wouldn't have many options," Jessie answered as she pulled the baked potatoes out of the broiler. Kit moved to make some tea for them, but the combination of the smell of the steaks and Jessie's gloriously shapely backside taunting him as she retrieved the foil-wrapped potatoes made it hard for him to keep his mind on what he was doing. "But I don't think we're going to go buy rings that cost more than our cars," she giggled. "I want to find some rings that are tasteful but not too expensive."

"I saw some good ones at the place where I bought your engagement ring."

"We can go look tomorrow after I get out of school."

"Sounds like a plan."

Knowing that they had a solid date didn't make him feel nervous as much as it made him anxious. He felt like a kid waiting for Christmas. He thought about it all during dinner and while he was practicing the guitar and she was doing homework. They were going to be married, and all he could think was why do we have to wait so long? He watched her as they ate, as pop music played on the radio, and couldn't think of anything else. She glanced at him, then smiled and blew him a kiss, which made his heart flutter. "Did I go too far?" she asked with a little smile.

"Not far enough," he answered.

"Eat your dinner," she ordered. "I didn't slave over a stove just to watch you ignore my cooking. Besides, I get the feeling both of us will need our energy tonight."

He laughed. "Yes ma'am."

Kit spread the news at work the next day, dropping in on them on his day off while Jessie was at school. "We've set a date," he said in the office as Savid, Jeffrey, and Mike were busy preparing pieces for the next issue. "December eighteenth."

He accepted hearty congratulations and pawshakes, and a rough hug from Marty, then sat down at the big table. "I need a best man yet," he ventured. "Think you'd be up for it, Rick?"

"Of course, son!" he said with a laugh. "I haven't worn a wedding tux since Martha dragged me to the altar."

"Oh, I've been dissed! The heartache!" Marty said, putting the back of his paw over his eyes melodramatically.

"Well, you could always ask Jessie if you could be a bridesmaid," Jeffrey chuckled.

"Oooo, I'll have to talk to her," he said. "I just can't clash with the bridal party! We have to color-coordinate!"

"I'll leave that to you, Marty," Jeffrey laughed. "Where can I rent a tux at, Rick?"

"You don't have to wear a tux if you're a guest, son," Rick chuckled. "Just something nice will do."

"Kit, can we invite some folks?" Mike asked. "I'd like to have my folks come and such."

"Well, I don't see anything wrong with it, but lemme ask Jessie before you do," he said. "You should get your invitations in the next couple of days, by the way. They're supposed to go out today, but my sis is handling it, so I guess they'll come from Boston."

"I'll be looking for it. And I need to call Martha, we'll have to go reserve a tux," Rick chuckled.

They went shopping for rings that afternoon. The shop owner remembered him, and showed them several pairs of wedding rings. Jessie gasped in delight when he took out a fifth set, which were amazingly plain. The male's ring was a simple band of gold and silver twisted together, and the female band was similar, but had three small diamonds vertically arrayed across the top, which was similar to her engagement ring's single diamond and vertically flanking emeralds.

"They're beautiful!" she exclaimed, holding up the female's ring. "Look, Kit, the gold and silver bands are just like you and me, two different breeds who come together to make something beautiful. How much are they?"

"The set is fifteen hundred dollars," the little chipmunk said with a light cough. "But since you're a repeat customer, I think we can negotiate over that a little."

"You make it thirteen fifty, I can pay for them right now," Kit said immediately.

"Kit, that'll wipe us out!"

"It's worth it," he said, holding up the male's ring, then slipping it on his finger. "And it even fits as is."

"Well, why not?" the chipmunk laughed. "Thirteen fifty it is. Try it on, madam, let's check the sizing."

Jessie's ring wasn't quite as made-to-order. It was a tiny bit too small, which the jeweler fixed using a very light mallet and a strange little cylinder that was thicker at the bottom than the top, marked with ring sizes. He slipped it onto the cylinder, got Jessie's ring size, then used the mallet to delicately and carefully stretch the ring to fit by tapping it down onto the cylinder. He only had to enlarge it by a half a size, so he was done in just a moment. He carefully inspected the ring to ensure it wasn't damaged in any way, then had her try it on again. "Perfect," he said with a satisfied nod. He nodded again when Kit handed him his debit card, but he pulled it back a second.

"Jessie, remember when I told you it was important to tell me if you took out any money?"

"Let me guess, this is when that counts," she laughed, and he nodded. "I'm positive I haven't."

"We're about to find out," he said, handing the card over. "Cause if you did, it's going to decline."

To Kit's delight, the card was accepted. "Do you want to take them with you, or would you prefer to leave them here until you're ready for them? I can keep them in the safe for you until you're ready to pick them up."

"Actually, that's a good idea," Kit told him. "I'd feel safer with them here."

"Oh, wait, we need some pictures of them!" Jessie said. "Do you have the camera?"

"It's at home."

“Well, let’s go get it!”

Kit laughed. “We’ll be back in about half an hour,” he told the jeweler.

“We’ll be open,” he said, putting the rings into a box and taping a Sold receipt onto it, then taking it into the back room.

They took quite a few pictures of the rings, then when they got home, they sent them to Vil and Jessie’s parents. Vil called back almost immediately and asked how much they’d cost and the number of the jeweler so she could make the call. Kit took great, almost smug satisfaction in telling her they were already bought. “I paid for them myself, Vil,” he said, rather proudly.

“Well, good for you! How much?”

“Some number between one and one billion,” he said dryly. He’d been waiting to get her back for that.

“Oh ho, the little bro wants to get snotty,” Vil laughed. “Just for that, I’m getting you a wedding present.”

“You better not. The wedding is the present, sis.”

“We’ll see about that,” she teased.

“You’re gonna look awful funny standing out in front of the church,” he told her.

She laughed. “Has Jessie started looking for a dress?”

“She’s doing that right now,” he said, looking over to the couch, where Jessie had several bridal magazines stacked on the coffee table. “I’m sure she’s called Sam and Sandy while I was running the rent check over to Lupe, and they're on their way over to giggle and coo at the pictures while I make dinner."

Jessie stuck her tongue out at him, which made him laugh. "I take it you were close?" Vil asked.

"I'd say so, given that face she just gave me."

"You're delving into the female realm here, bro," Vil chuckled. "Females love their wedding dresses."

"Is she going to get hers in time?"

"Kit, Kit, Kit," she chided. "She'll show me the design she wants, and I'll have it either bought or made for her inside a week. Then it's just a matter of having the tailoring company do the final fitting."

"Company?"

"Wentshires, here in Boston. I've already secured a team to go to Austin to do the fitting and alterations."

"Vil, you're sending a team of tailors to Austin? Isn't that—"

"Don't say it!" she barked. "This is Jessie's wedding dress we're talking about, you foolish boy! I don't care what it costs. She'll get exactly what she wants, and it will look smashing."

"If you say so."

"It will. Now, have you thought of a honeymoon?"

"It's not going to work," he sighed. "I haven't been there long enough to ask for time off for a vacation. It's not fair to everyone else. I did ask for Saturday and Tuesday off so me and Jess have a long weekend after the wedding, and a part of that was flying up to Boston to fulfill Mom's wish I get married in the Holy Cross."

"Hmm," she mused. "How about this. You fly back to Boston with me on Saturday and have the ceremony, and I have my private jet fly you two to Florida. You can stay in my condo in Boca Raton and come back on Tuesday. That way you get three days of vacation that almost qualifies as a honeymoon, it's not outrageously expensive, and you'll be back to work on time Wednesday."

"That...that sounds fine to me," he said, looking at Jessie as she paged through the magazine. "I'd love to give Jessie a real honeymoon, but it's just not going to happen."

"It'd have to stay in the U.S. regardless. Jessie said she doesn't have a passport," Vil mused.

"Do I detect a faint hint of attempted meddling over there, sis?" he asked pointedly.

"It was shot down," she laughed. "Give the phone to Jessie, bro, I need to talk to her. And you can feed that poor femme!"

He handed the phone to Jessie with a chuckle, and was surprised when she covered over the magazine. "No peeking!" she said with surprising heat, snatching the phone away from him. "Kitchen! Go!"

"You'd think I barged in when you were sitting on the toilet," he laughed.

"Seeing me naked is no way the same as seeing my dress before the wedding!" she barked at him. "Now clear out, Kit!"

“You haven’t even picked it yet,” he said with a grin.

“Well, I might pick one on that page, and you’re not gonna see them!”

“Okay, okay, clearing out,” he laughed. “Baked salmon okay with you? With asparagus and au gratin potatoes?”

“Fine, fine, just scat, you! This is a no-Kit zone!”

He cooked dinner for five, since Sam and Sandy had also brought Danielle, because her mother was a fashion designer and Danielle was in school for the same thing. The four of them spent the whole time going over dresses in magazines and on websites, and he did his best to ignore them with headphones and his Blackberry, listening to the news webcast.

When the doorbell rang, Kit chuckled from the kitchen. “I guess Lupe can smell it from across the courtyard,” he called as he covered the asparagus and pulled out a bottle of wine. He pulled down wine glasses, and turned when he realized two figures were standing in the boundary between kitchen and living room. One was a coyote male, the other was a cat female with tabby fur, and both were wearing expensive-looking clothes. The coyote wore a gray pinstripe suit, the cat wore a very well cut blue skirt and blazer. He took his earphones out and looked at them curiously. “Can I help you?”

“I’m Delores Kittimer from Marks, Kittimer, and Wilson,” she said by way of introduction. “Are you Kitstrom Vulpan?” the female asked.

“That’s me.”

The male put his briefcase on the table and withdrew a folded sheet of paper. He handed it to the femme, who in turn handed it to him. “Then this is for you.”

“What is it?” he asked, taking the oven mitt off and reaching for it.

“A subpoena,” she answered.

“A subpeona? What for?”

“You’re being subpoenaed to give a deposition as a possible witness in a lawsuit, Mister Vulpan.”

“Lawsuit? What lawsuit?”

“You don’t know?” she asked, in some surprise.

“No, I have no idea what you’re talking about,” he said, in a little irritation. “Who the hell is suing me? And what for?”

“Nobody’s suing you, Mister Vulpan,” she said simply. “You’re being called to give deposition in a rather complicated matter. It’s a case to invalidate the will of Kitstrom Vulpan Junior. This subpoena is for a deposition to be held at our law offices on November fifteenth.”

“Will? Who’s trying to overturn the will?”

“Two parties, Mister Vulpan. Cybil Whitmore Vulpan, and Vilenne Vulpan. Both have filed suit to invalidate the will of your father, and the judge has decided to combine both cases.”

“What?” he gasped. “Vil challenged the will?”

“As well as your stepmother,” she said with a nod. “We represent no one party, Mister Vulpan. We’ve been retained by the state of Massachusetts to host your deposition, rather than call you to Boston. You’ve been subpoenaed to give deposition as a possible witness.”

“Who subpoenaed me?”

“The subpoena is a blanket subpoena for all interested parties to depose you, since you live out of state,” the gray fox said to him. “The last we heard, lawyers for five respondents and both petitioners will be present for the deposition.”

“What? When the hell did all this happen?”

“The suit was filed by Misses Whitemore Vulpan on last Monday, Mister Vulpan. Vilenne Vulpan filed an independent suit on Wednesday, and the cases were merged by the presiding judge in a hearing yesterday afternoon.”

“Well...what the hell do I have to testify for? I have nothing to do with the will. I’ve broken off from the family.”

“Vilenne Vulpan seeks to restore a previous version of your father’s will, where you are a beneficiary of your father’s estate,” the femme told him. “That makes you a party to the proceedings.”

“Vil is dragging me into this mess? I’m going to kill her!” he said with sudden heat.

“You didn’t know?” the male asked, in some surprise.

“I had no idea,” he said, a little overwhelmed. “I sure as hell am not happy about it. I walked away from my family years ago, I want nothing to do with the will, this lawsuit, or any damn money. I don’t see why I have to testify.”

“Well this isn’t testimony, Mister Vulpan, it’s a deposition. They just want to ask you some questions that will pertain to the case, that’s all. You should be done the same day. Just be at our offices Monday morning at nine, and they’ll take your deposition and you’ll be free to go.”

“Good day to you, Mister Vulpan,” the female said, and then the male closed his briefcase, and they both left.

Kit just stood there as Jessie and her friends gave him startled looks. He came over to the table, sat down, then put his head in his paws. God, why did they have to start all this nonsense and drag him into it? They could fight over his bastard father’s money all they wanted. He had nothing to do with it! Why couldn’t they just leave him alone? And what was worse, Vil was doing it too! Why in the bloody blue blazes was she trying to invalidate the will? Was it some kind of twisted attempt to get back at the family en masse for the attempt on him? Was she really going to take it that far?

He could see the nightmare coming. Lawyers, and lawyers, and more lawyers. Answering questions for the next six years, and maybe even being forced to testify in court.

Gentle paws slid over his shoulders, and he felt Jessie hug him from behind. “You okay, my handsome fox?” she asked compassionately.

He blew out his breath, then rose up and patted her arms. “I guess so,” he said with another sigh. “I just want nothing to do with all this.”

“You should call Vil, love,” she urged. “I’ll finish up dinner.”

He took his phone and sat out on the porch in the cool afternoon and called her. “Hey bro.”

“Vil,” he said grimly. “I just got subpoenaed.”

She blew out her breath with a dark curse. “I was hoping they’d leave you out of it. This has nothing to do with you. Who did it?”

“From what I was told, everyone, even you.”

“I told them to leave you out of it,” she growled.

“What the hell is going on, Vil?” he demanded.

“Let me summarize it, it’s complicated,” she said. “I told you that I was keeping an eye on Cybil, that she was looking into trying to invalidate the will and claim the family fortune by means of her marriage to Dad. Well, she’s doing it. She’s trying to invalidate the will and her prenup by claiming Dad wasn’t of sound mind. Hell, bro, she’s even trying to strip me of my control of the businesses. She’s basically saying that everything Dad did in the last two years of his life should be thrown out, and everything given to her because she’s the wife. If she pulls it off, she’ll have effective control over everything.”

“Well, didn’t Dad marry her in that same two year span?”

“She’s glossing over that part, bro,” she told him clinically. “And her angle isn’t to actually get everything. She’s shooting for the moon so she can actually settle for half. It’s a common trick, threatening to tie us up in court for the next fifteen years and wearing us down. Now, I also told you that I was looking into beating her to the punch by suing to invalidate the will with the aim of totally cutting her out. That was my original plan, but after you were shot, I decided to go after the family at the same time. I’ve put Boston through the wringer, and I still don’t know who ordered that hit on you, so I’m going to make the family give him up by going after their money. My suit is a little different. I’m suing to have the will Dad had before you were disowned restored, which puts you back into it...and receiving the vast majority of the money and control of the businesses to boot. In effect, I’m trying to have you installed as the heir.”

“Why the hell are you doing that?” he literally shouted.

“Because that’s how the will was written, no more, no less,” she answered calmly. “It’s all I have to work with here, bro. I gotta play the hand as it was dealt in this case. I know how you feel about this, Kit. I’d never have done this if there was another way, believe me. Now, my angle is to strip the uncles of the majority of their money, and threaten to have you basically toss them out of their homes unless whoever tried to kill you doesn’t own up immediately. The version of the will I’m trying to have instated leaves the uncles and cousins with little more than their trust funds, which is nowhere near enough to support them in the kind of lifestyles they’re living right now.”

“Vil, why did you do this to me?” he asked, almost pleadingly.

“Kit, I never wanted to drag you into this,” she told him. “And think a minute. If I didn’t do it, then you’d be guaranteed that Cybil would have. You don’t think she’d have you dragged back to Boston to testify in the trial? Her entire case hinges on how Dad went crazy after he disowned you. You’re the entire basis of her case. For that matter, what Dad did to you is also the fundamental foundation of my own case,” she admitted. “So what the judge will basically be doing is looking at the will, looking at our cases, and then judging just how crazy Dad was and if it merits altering his will on the basis that he wasn’t of sound mind when he drew it up.”

“You’re both arguing the same point?”

“More or less. But the issue for Cybil is she has to get around her prenup in addition to the will, where I don’t have that kind of a barricade. She’s going to have a major problem with that, because my lawyers have told me they can more or less prove that Dad had little to do with the prenup, that was a creation of his lawyers. The lawyers weren't all crazy when they drew it up, so Cybil has to talk very fast to get around that little problem. It's a strange world when me and that bitch are going to be trying to prove the same legal issue but with different motives," she chuckled darkly. "So, little bro, that's the whole deal. I'm sorry you got dragged into this, but don't blame me. I filed my suit after Cybil. She beat me to it by two days. Yesterday, the judge merged both cases into a single case, and I was going to tell you about it this week...but I didn't expect them to start throwing around subpoenas so fast," she grunted. "You would have been called no matter what."

"Why can't they just leave me alone," he said in a quiet, almost defeated voice.

"Look at it this way, Kit," she said gently. "After this, one way or another, they'll never bother you again."

"That's not very comforting," he told her.

"If I win, you get the family fortune, which you can just throw away," she told him. "If Cybil wins, nothing changes for you. If the uncles win, they'll be too busy dealing with Cybil's appeals to bother you."

"And what's to stop the uncles from deciding that one way to kill your case is to come after me again?"

"That has nothing to do with my case, Kit, and it would do the uncles no good," she answered. "Remember, I'm trying to restore a will. That you're the main beneficiary in the will I'm trying to restore is pointless in the argument. If you were to die and I win the case, then the family fortune would go to an executorship, probably administered by the courts. You really don't matter one bit in the big picture. Unless I win, that is," she chuckled. "Then you will control the family fortune."

"I don't want it, Vil."

"I know you don't. But you can use that as a hammer against the family. Blackmail them into leaving you alone, and you give them back their money."

"That or they try to kill me again."

"Oh, that's not going to happen," she told him heatedly. "You don't know what it's like in Boston right now, bro. I have the whole city locked down, and they know it. If they so much as even confess they did it underwater while speaking German, I'll know in fifteen seconds. Cousin Liza can't even screw her poolboy without a report of it being on my desk in triplicate before they're even finished. If someone tries, I'll know before they even hang up the phone."

"That sounds slightly illegal."

"You don't want to know. Trust me."

"Then I'll leave it there."

"I'm afraid I gotta go, little bro. I'm kinda busy right now. Need any other questions answered before I do?"

"Uh, I can't think of any."

"Well, call me back tomorrow around six, I'll make some time so we can talk about this more thoroughly, okay?"

"Alright."

“I’m sorry, Kit. I know you hate this, but it won’t take long. I’ll talk to you tomorrow, bro. Bye-bye.”

“Bye sis.”

He closed the phone and sighed, putting his elbows on his knees and leaning over. God, it was going to be a nightmare, and it meant that he was going to be right back in the spotlight. He was surprised there weren’t fifty cameras in his face, this was the kind of thing the tabloids drooled over, a rich family in a nasty legal battle over the family fortune, complete with a widow vying to steal the fortune away from the children. Now he’d have to go do this deposition and answer questions for three or four days, then wait and worry that he’d be forced to go testify at the trial. And on top of all that, his wedding was coming up, which was going to distract him from Jessie and her special event, and no doubt that was going to find its way into the tabloids along with the trial. He had this nightmarish image of a pack of paparazzi mobbing them as they left the church, flashes going off in their faces, keeping them from reaching their cars to go to the reception.

What a mess.

He could only hope that Jessie was patient and understanding, because she was about to get thrown into the wolves. His shy and private pretty kitty was going to have her entire life taken apart on national television, and it was all because of him. Hannah’s painful past very well might be dragged out and her secret exposed, all because of him. His friends at work, and Lupe, and Martha, they were all going to be harassed and aggravated. The lives of everyone that mattered to him were about to be disrupted, and it was all because they had the misfortune of being his friend.

He could only hope they'd forgive him for the insanity that was about to descend upon them.

Chapter 10

It was a whirlwind of activity, fear, and anxiety for Kit.

After finding out about the lawsuit, Kit's life was turned upside down. The anxiety over the lawsuit just piled onto the excitement surrounding the wedding, which got closer with each passing day. Kit did his best to try to submerge himself into the preparations, but the lawsuit and all the ramifications surrounding it just intruded themselves into his life.

The first unpleasant action surrounding this news was warning everyone. He started with Jessie, then Lupe, then told the crew, rather grimly. They didn't quite think it was as bad as Kit made out, but they didn't know the press the way he did. He'd been blessed in that they'd not bothered him—or he'd not seen anything—since that one picture that appeared in the Enquirer. Either they saw no reason to keep pestering them after that picture, or he'd not noticed any photographers, since he didn't bother reading tabloids.

The second unpleasant action was telling Hannah and John. He wrote Hannah an email that explained what was going on, warned that there was a chance that they might be bothered by the press, and apologized about fifty times, in very humble terms, for visiting the troubles of his own family upon them.

The third unpleasant action was a justification of his warning. Kit and Jessie were leaving work a few days after learning about the lawsuit, on Saturday, when a vixen approached him with a male skunk who had a camera hanging from his neck. “Kitstrom Vulpan?” the vixen asked.

Kit took one look at the pair, took Jessie’s paw, and shook his head. “No thank you, no comment, no way.”

She gave a start, then laughed. “I guess you’d have enough experience to see us coming. You’ve already been interviewed?”

“I won’t be,” he told her. “I have nothing to do with that insanity, and I want no part of it. I just want to be left alone. You can put that in your report.”

“What about you, miss? Care to comment for the Boston Herald?”

“I don’t have anything to say either,” she said shyly, hurrying past them and pulling in close to Kit as they walked away. “I hope that doesn’t happen again,” she told him nervously.

“That’s a hollow dream,” he sighed sourly. “They’re just the first.”

And they were. Kit had the foresight to hang a sign on the door that read NO COMMENT, don’t even bother knocking, and he stuck to it. Sunday they were left alone, but on Monday, while Jessie was at school, three separate furs rang the doorbell that he didn’t know. The first two were obviously TV reporters of some kind, and the third thought he was being clever by putting his finger over the peephole so he couldn’t see who it was, and knocked and rang the doorbell incessantly. Kit retaliated by calling Lupe, who came over about five seconds after Kit told him what was going on. Kit heard the chihuahua and whoever it was screaming at each other, as the unknown male voice kept yelling about freedom of the press and his First Amendment rights, until Kit heard Lupe threaten to let him tell the cops all about it when they came to arrest him for trespassing.

Jessie, however, didn't fare half as well. She was literally trembling when she unlocked the door and came in, and buried herself in his arms before she even took her backpack off. "Jess, what's wrong?" he asked, putting his paws on her shoulders.

She began to cry. "It was horrible!" she cried.

"What happened, pretty kitty?" he asked, bringing her over to the couch. He took her backpack off of her, and sat her down. She clung to him, her claws digging into him a little painfully.

It took him a while to calm her down enough to tell him. "A reporter followed me around after my education class," she told him. "He kept demanding I talk to him, but I wouldn't even look at him. Then he grabbed me," she sniffled, cringing. "He grabbed hold of my tail and wouldn't let me go until I started screaming. Some other students came and chased him away, but he came back after they walked me to the cafeteria. I tried to get away from him, but he kept getting in my way. When I went into the femme's room, he came in after me!"

"I hope you called the cops."

"I tried, but the reporter tried to take my phone away from me, so I kicked him in the groin and ran out."

Kit chuckled. "Well, I'm glad you left him something to remember you by."

"The cops arrested him. Someone else called them when he went into the girl's room after me."

“Good. I’m so sorry, my pretty kitty,” he said sincerely “I’m so sorry that happened to you.”

“I’m not giving you up, Kit,” she told him, gripping him with her claws. “I was scared, but they’re not going to scare me away from you. I love you so much, Kit.”

“I love you too, Jess,” he breathed, leaning his cheek against her head. “I want you to call Vanguard, pretty kitty. I don’t want you going back to school without an escort.”

“I will. I’ll ask for someone to walk me to class and back.”

Luckily, however, that kind of journalist seemed to be the exception rather than the rule. Kit declined three separate interview requests the next day, and Jessie told him that only one reporter tried to talk to her, someone from CNN, which she declined. “He was polite at least,” she told him when the large bear that was from Vanguard walked her into the apartment and then took his leave. When I told him I wasn’t going to talk about it, he just gave me his card and told me to call him if I change my mind.”

“Yeah, I’ve got like seven cards so far, if you count the ones reporters left at the door yesterday,” Kit growled. “I’m just glad our cell phones are being handled by Vil, so they can’t track the numbers down.”

“How long is this going to last?”

“Until they realize that we’re not going to talk,” he said with a sigh. “Maybe a week or two. They can’t be too pushy or we’ll never talk, unless they’re like that guy that harassed you yesterday, who won’t take no for an answer. I wonder if he was the same one that Lupe had to chase off the property.”

“Probably. How did they find me at school?”

“Probably either hacked into your registrar or bribed one of them for your schedule,” Kit grunted.

“It’s almost scary how they can do that,” she told him. “Do you think it’s safe to ask Sam, Sandy, and Danny over?”

“Odds are they’ll be approached if you do. If they already haven’t been, that is.”

“I’ll warn them.”

The threat of being exposed to the press didn’t seem to bother them. Sandy brought them over in her car about half an hour later, which made Kit very glad. They knew Jessie well, and they quickly had her cutting away and laughing as Kit cooked dinner and they looked at wedding dresses online, going to a couple of websites that Vil had messaged him on his Blackberry that morning. The rigors of the last couple of days were forgotten in the fantasy world of an impending bride.

“Oh wow, look at this one!” Jessie said in delight. “Isn’t it beautiful?”

“It’s very nice,” Sandy agreed. “I love the—“

Jessie slapped her paw over Sandy’s muzzle. “Not with him here!” she warned.

Kit laughed so hard he almost dropped the skillet.

Jessie and the femmes retreated back to the bedroom, leaving him alone in the front half of the house. He was cooking Italian meatballs and rice, but he’d already made up the meatballs the night before, so it was just a matter of browning them and adding in the sauce and spices, and boiling up the rice. His phone rang after a while, when he nearly had dinner ready, and the number on the display was Vil's. "Hey sis," he called as he opened the phone.

"Tomorrow after work, don't make any plans," she told him. "Jessie picked her dress. I've already bought a tux for you, so you're going to be fitted for them tomorrow."

"I figured she might have. She retreated into the bedroom a bit ago with her pack of friends while looking over dresses on some website."

"She picked a design from Wentshire's site, so they already have it reserved. They'll be coming to fit her for it tomorrow, and they'll take care of you while they're there. Got your Blackberry handy?"

"It's in the living room."

"I'm texting you an address for a dress shop that's agreed to host my people," she told him. "I need you two there tomorrow around six."

"How much is this dress?"

"Some number between one and two billion," she teased in reply, then she laughed.

"You know, eventually one of us is going to get tired of that line," Kit noted dryly.

"It's not like it has gold thread or anything," Vil chuckled. "So don't worry too much about it. It is gorgeous, though."

"You'd better not say anything about it or Jessie will kill you," Kit warned, then he sighed. "Well, I hope they don't follow us there."

"Who?"

“We’ve had several run-ins with the press the last two days, sis,” he said wearily. “One reporter got arrested on campus for chasing Jessie into a bathroom.”

“Oh, him,” Vil said with a growl. “That made the news up here in Boston,” she told him. “He’s a gossip columnist for the Enquirer, one of those ambush reporters. Literary paparazzi.”

“He scared Jessie so bad she broke down in tears when she got home. I had her call Vanguard to escort her today.”

“Good move,” she agreed. “I’ll give them a call myself and ask them to tighten up a bit. They’ve been working in the background and have some very specific rules about interfering with your lives, but with you guys being bothered, I think I’d like them to be a little more active.”

“I won’t say no.”

The dress did bring a little lightness to the tension in Kit’s life. The next afternoon, they went to a large dress shop in north Austin called Brenda’s, where a ten fur team of tailors met them and fitted them for their wedding clothes. They were efficient, thorough, and very friendly, putting them at ease, joking with them, even teasing Jessie a little by offering her to do her measurements naked with Kit in the room with her. She surprised Kit with her response, “oh, he’s seen me naked before,” she said brazenly, though her cheeks were a little ruffled. Jessie was usually extremely shy, she’d never say something like that most of the time. The fitting took about two hours, and when they were done, the tailors told them that they’d have the clothes made and ready for a final fitting in about a week. They made another appointment for next week, two days after the deposition, when the finished clothes would be brought down and they'd try them on so the tailors could make final alterations for the wedding next month.

The drive home, on the other hand, wasn't quite so nice. They were in Kit's Pathfinder, and it was totally clear to him after a minute that a white Expedition was following them. "Jess love, call Vanguard and ask them if they've got people following us. Cause someone is."

She nodded and took her phone out of her purse. "Hello, this is Jessie Williams. Yes, I'm okay, but do you have a guard with us? We're being followed. Is that our escort?" She looked at Kit and shook her head. "Umm, I don't know exactly. Where are we, Kit?"

"We're getting on the Mopac up near the mall," he told her. "We'll be going south and getting off at Guadalupe."

She relayed that, looking back, out the back window. "Okay. It's a, umm, Expedition. A white Expedition. No, I can't see the license. Okay. We will. Thank you very much." She closed the phone. "They told us to pull into the Wendy's there at the exit, they'll have a car waiting for us."

"Okay."

"He also said we should carry our camera with us and take pictures of the cars if we think they're following, that it'll help them track them down."

"We can do that."

They did as the security firm asked. When they exited off the Mopac Expressway, Kit pulled into the Wendy's, where a gray-painted sedan with the Vanguard logo emblazoned on its hood and both doors immediately pulled up into the space beside theirs. Another Vanguard car pulled out, and when the white Expedition slowed down as if to turn into the parking lot, then kept going, the second car pulled out in a squeal of tires and chased after it. The two vehicles sped off down Guadalupe, leaving Kit's Pathfinder and the first car. Kit rolled down his window, and a wolf in the passenger seat did the same. "We'll follow you home, Mister Vulpan," the wolf called.

"Thanks, guys, you're a lifesaver."

"You should consider allowing us to attach a guard with you at all times, Mister Vulpan."

"No, not yet. They're just reporters, after all. All they can do is harass us until you come chase them away."

The wolf chuckled. "We'll do our best, sir."

The security car escorted them safely home, and they waved to the two guards as they reached their front door.

"Well, that was a dose of reality to ruin an otherwise good time," Kit sighed as he closed and locked the door. He barely managed to take his things out of his pockets and put them in the dish on the coffee table when Jessie grabbed his paw and pulled him with her to the couch. "What?"

"I need a reason to want to cuddle?" she asked with a giggle, snuggling up with him. "I had a good time. I can't wait until you get to see my dress, my handsome fox."

"I can't wait to see it either, pretty kitty. Do you know what'll be more fun?"

"What?"

"Taking it off you," he said, running his paw up her side.

She shivered a little and immediately began to purr. “I’m surprised you’re feeling frisky after they followed us home,” she told him.

“Let’s just say that I’m enjoying your attempt to comfort me,” he chuckled.

“I have homework to do, and we have to cook dinner yet. But,” she said, then she leaned up and wrapped her arms around his neck and shoulders and kissed him quite intimately.

Kit’s prediction of two weeks seemed to be holding true. The worst of it was at work, since his work phone number was a matter of public record, as was his work email address, but the crew came through for him in marvelous fashion. Marty was the lead blocker for him, taking on the press with his usual melodramatic and funny flair. He’d banter with the reporters that called and the few that visited in person, distracting and engaging them, but being adamant about not allowing them to get past him. On the phone that was quite easy, since he had control of the phone system. In person, his control was more subtle, yet more profound. Marty acted like a pop diva, but he was very smart and had a very quick mind, able to challenge reporters on their level and manage to make them laugh and smile even as he thwarted them. Email for him was easy to handle, for after finding out it was from a reporter, he simply deleted it.

The attention did alter their daily habits. Kit and Jessie stayed home for the most part, only going out to go to work or school, where they knew exactly where they were going and had control over their environments. Their friends came to them rather than going out to see them, and those friends themselves were approached by reporters. But, to their delight and relief, every one of their friends joined the “no comment” bandwagon, saying nothing and being very firm about it.

As the days went by and the time of the deposition neared, he got more and more unsettled. Jessie was the anchor keeping him from having a nervous break, and all their friends seemed to come together and pitch in to try to keep him comfortable and calm. There was almost always someone over for a visit in the week before the deposition, be it one of the crew, Lupe, or one of Jessie's sorority sisters. Those gatherings also started something of a little interaction, too, he noticed. Sandy started becoming quite interested in Jeffrey when she broke up with her old boyfriend, and got even more interested when she found out he was unattached. Kit was a little surprised when Jeffrey asked Kit for Sandy's number. Sandy and Jeffrey wasn't the only interaction, but it was the most dramatic. Sam became very good friends with Mike, and Lilly started palling around with Danielle and the other Jessie on Friday nights as she did her research and rounds for the magazine.

But time marched on, and no matter how much he dreaded it, it came to be the Monday of the deposition.

He woke up two hours early and spent a good hour of it sitting on the couch, nervous and unhappy. But this had to be done, and he didn't have any choice. He's been subpoenaed, and if he didn't show up he'd get into legal trouble. Jessie came in wearing nothing but an oversized sleeping shirt, leaving her legs bare to midthigh, rubbing her eyes, and the shirt was only something she threw on to come out of the bedroom, since she slept nude with him, always joking that it made sure there wasn't anything in the way if they got frisky during the night. Jessie was very modest, she wouldn't even set foot out of her own bedroom without wearing something, but she was almost fearlessly bold around him...but that was one of her little adoring quirks. She was very modest, but she had no modesty at all around him. That made him love her even more, since it showed how completely comfortable she was with him. She wouldn't come out of the bedroom without clothes on in her own house, but she was the same femme that would drop her jeans and use the bathroom right in front of him. That was something she hadn't done with anyone else...but then again, Kit was the only person she'd ever slept with, so her complete ease around him wasn't really too much of a surprise.

“Morning, pretty kitty,” he called. She came over to him, and instead of sitting down beside him, she instead climbed into his lap, straddling him, paws on his shoulders as she kissed him. He almost wished she hadn't done that. When she straddled him that way, it immediately put him in an erotic mood, because all he could think about was when they used that position during sex. He put his paws on her waist and caressed her sides gently, but couldn't resist sliding his paws down, pulling her shirt up, and grabbing two pawfuls of her gorgeous backside, which made her hum in their kiss.

“Do you want me to go with you, Kit?” she asked, for about the twentieth time since last night.

“I want to take you back into the bedroom and take this shirt off you,” he said honestly, pulling on the tail of the shirt, lifting it all the way up to expose her fully to him. He leaned forward and kissed her on the upper chest, on a little cowlick of unsettled fur right on her sternum, then fondled what the lifted shirt revealed, the shirt falling back down over his paws.

“I'll be late for school if we do,” she said with regret, leaning forward and nuzzling him. “How about this. After you get home and I get home from school, I give you everything you want,” she cooed. “And I promise never to sit with you like this on the couch in the morning again,” she giggled against his ear.

“That’s about what did it,” he admitted with a soft laugh. “When you sit like this, all I can think of is when we make love,” he breathed in her ear. “It’s a very similar view, just without this shirt in the way. Besides, no male on Earth could think straight with you sitting in his lap like this, especially when you’re not wearing panties,” he added.

She giggled again. “I’m sorry, love.”

“Don’t ever be sorry,” he told her. “If you were sorry, how would I ever get my cheap looks and easy feels?”

She laughed. “Looks are free. Feels are gonna cost ya,” she winked.

He squeezed her breasts, grinning at her. “And how much was that?”

“You’ll find out tonight,” she said with a throaty purr, whispered into his ear.

“Do you take Visa?”

She picked up the couch pillow and hit him over the head with it.

He truly appreciated Jessie’s attempt to distract him and cheer him up, but reality interposed again. He dressed in a pair of black slacks and a dress shirt without tie, ate the breakfast Jessie cooked for him, drank his tea, saw Jessie off to school, and then steeled himself with a moment of quiet calm before picking his keys up and heading out.

The law office was only about two miles from home, only about nine blocks from work, so it didn’t take him long to find it. It was a very large office, taking up the entire first floor of the office building in which it was located. A husky femme in a blue blazer was sitting behind the reception desk, her thick white fur combed to perfection. “May I help you?”

“Uh, I’m here for a deposition,” he told her.

She looked at him, and when she looked him in the eye, she seemed to recognize him. “Oh! Yes, one moment, Mister Vulpan,” she told him, picking up the phone. “Miss Kittimer, Mister Vulpan has arrived,” she said into the phone. “It’ll be just a moment. Would you like to sit down?” she offered as she hung up the phone.

“No thanks.”

The vixen who’d come to his house before came through the door separating the reception area from the offices. She was wearing a black skirt and blazer, with a soft brown shirt rather than a white one beneath it, and her long hair was done in a curly style was held back from her face by barettes and contained in the back by a comb. When she got close, he could smell a faint whiff of perfume about her. “Mister Vulpan,” she said, offering her paw.

He took it and shook it firmly. “Call me Kit, I hate that name,” he told her.

“Kit,” she corrected. “Come with me, and I’ll explain how this will work.”

She led him into a panelled hallway lined with oil paintings of the furs working in the office, their names emblazoned under them, as well as doors. “This is going to be an open deposition,” she told him as she passed her own painting, the title naming her as Dolores D. “Deedee” Kittimer. “The lawyers from all nine are present, and the representatives from each side will be in the conference room and will ask you whatever questions they wish. So you’re looking at three sessions of questioning. The two petitioners in separate sessions, then the combined lawyers for the respondents.”

“Not separately?”

“No, since you’re a potential witness for each side of the case, they’ve decided to question you as units rather than individually. The lawyers for Misses Whitmore Vulpan will question you first, then the counsel for Miss Vulpan will question you. The way it’ll work during the sessions is simple, Kit. They’ll ask you questions, and you answer them. It’s basically that simple. After either a break or lunch, depending on how long it takes, the counsels for the respondents will have their opportunity. We’ll make sure you have any drinks or snacks you might want, and remember, you’re not under arrest in there, so if you want to take a break for a few minutes, don’t hesitate to ask.”

“Thank you.”

“I’ll be sitting in on the deposition as an observer for the court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts,” she told him. “And since you didn’t bring your own counsel, I’ll seat an associate with you who can warn you if you’re saying something that wouldn’t be entirely wise.”

“I don’t need a lawyer, Miss Kittimer,” he said dismissively.

“When it comes to this kind of a situation, I think you need legal counsel looking out for you, Kit,” she urged. “One misspoken word might bring the threat of a lawsuit against you, and you do have the right not to answer certain questions. Do you know which questions those are?”

“Uh...no.”

“Then you need counsel,” she said simply. “Our firm has already been paid by the court, and you’ll actually be doing us a favor, so I’ll provide you with counsel at no charge. I’ll seat one of our newest associates with you, who can defend your rights, and so he can get some practice. But don’t let that worry you, he’s actually quite a good lawyer. He’s just lacking experience in the practical aspects of being a trial attorney.”

“Well, if it’s free, I’d be stupid to decline,” he said honestly.

She laughed. “Spoken like a wise fur,” she told him. She led him to a large area filled with low-walled cubicles, where most of the legal secretaries worked, he imagined, and the vixen waved over someone near a wall of doors, talking to a short badger wearing a thousand dollar suit. The one she waved over was a tall, thin male skunk with a very odd double white line between his eyes rather than a white patch common on some skunks. “Kit, this is Kevin Simmons, our newest associate. He’ll keep the other sharks in line,” she chuckled.

“It’s good to meet you, Mister Vulpan,” he said, offering his white-mittened paw. Kit shook it. “I promise to do my best to keep them from wandering into territory they have no business asking about.”

“What kind of territory?” he asked curiously.

“Your impending marriage is off limits, for example,” he answered. “That’s your own personal business that has nothing to do with the case, though I have the feeling that the counsels are going to try to press you on it, since one of the petitioners is trying to get you back into the will. They also can’t ask about your personal life. They have to limit their questions to facts pertaining to your past, your job, and they can only ask general questions about your personal life. For example, they can ask if you’re getting married, but they can't ask to whom you're getting married. That has no bearing on the case at hand. If they try to get too personal, I'll make them back off."

"I'm starting to feel a little better about this," he said honestly.

"I'll do what I can to make this as painless for you as possible," Kevin promised.

He was led into a large conference room, where four furs stood up as they entered. Three male badgers and a female mouse, all wearing serious business suits. "We're from Graham, Graham, Graham, and Zychowski," the tallest and oldest of the badgers said by way of introduction. "Has our host explained the process of a deposition to you, Mister Vulpan?"

"They did."

"Very well, shall we get started?" he asked as the female mouse sat back down and opened a laptop computer before them.

And they did. The lawyers from his stepmother were polite, but they asked very personal and invasive questions about his past, his history with his father and family, and his life after he was disowned, focusing on the pattern of harassment he suffered after leaving home. The vixen and the skunk who were sitting in were quiet and attentive, and he thought that they really didn't have much to do with it, until the mouse asked him a question about Jessie. The skunk immediately put his paw over Kit's own and spoke up. "That's out of bounds, counsel," he said in a polite yet firm voice. "That has no bearing on the matter at hand."

"We disagree, counsel," she retorted. "His fiancée might have influenced his decision about this suit."

“What decision? I wanted no part of this,” Kit said, rather pugnaciously. “I got dragged into this completely against my will.”

“So, you have no desire to claim your share of six hundred million dollars?” the youngest of the three Graham brothers asked.

“My family can take that money and shove it up their—“ he said, then blew out his breath. “No. I have no interest at all in the money, my family, or the will. I don’t care one way or the other about this damned lawsuit. I just want it to go away so I can go back to my own life.”

All three of them immediately started scribbling on the memo pads before them.

They didn’t drift back into that area again. After another half hour or so, they wrapped up their questioning. All four took turns shaking his paw, and then they filed out. “It wasn’t entirely wise to tell them you have no interest in the will,” Kevin told him.

“It’s the truth,” he said simply. “I don’t want any of the money.”

“Yes, but that helps their case. They can argue that your sister’s claim lacks merit because you don’t want to be included in the will.”

“I see my sister’s been meddling again,” he growled darkly.

Kevin gave him a curious look. “She hasn’t called here, that would be improper. I just figured you’d be on your sister’s side, given what I’ve read about the history of this case. She’s been the only member of your family to stay in contact with you. I’m not the only one who thinks you want her to win the case.”

“I want her to win the case, but I’m not happy about her bringing me into this,” he answered honestly. “And I swore to tell the truth when we started. I won’t lie, not even for Vil.”

“There’s the truth, and then there’s the truth as presented that keeps you honest without delivering the complete details,” he said with a chuckle.

“Spoken like a true lawyer.”

“I gotta be what I gotta be,” he grinned.

The lawyers for Vil were next. They were much more personable than Cybil’s lawyers, but they were just as hawkish when it came to asking him questions. They questioned him for over an hour, focusing on many of the same things that Cybil’s lawyers did, his history with his father, his treatment of him, and what happened after he was disowned. But where Cybil’s lawyers inferred, Vil’s lawyers came right out and asked him. “If Miss Vulpan was to win the case, what would you do, Mister Vulpan?” the tall jackal, named Terry Assad, asked. “After all, you’d be placed in control of your family’s assets.”

“Give it back to the family,” he said immediately. “Hand it over to someone else and let them deal with it. I don’t want the money. I just want to be left alone and go back to my life.”

“Thank you, Mister Vulpan,” the jackal said. “I think we’re about done here.”

“I think we can break for lunch now,” Kittimer noted, looking at her watch.

“There’s a pretty good Chinese place about a block from here,” the skunk offered.

“I know, I order from there all the time,” Kit chuckled. “My office is only about a mile from here.”

“Well, feel like some company for lunch? We can discuss what’s coming. As you’ve probably figured, the respondents are going to treat you as a hostile witness, so we can discuss what’s coming.”

“That’s a good idea.”

Kit decided he rather liked this Kevin Simmons. He was amiable, affable, and witty, but he was very intelligent and very observant. They ate lunch and Kevin explained what was coming, preparing him for dealing with much less friendly questioning, and Kit got to know the skunk and found him to be a very nice guy. “You know,” Kit said as they walked back to the office, “I know someone that might love to meet you.”

“How so?”

“My fiancée’s best friend is pre-med, and you seem like just her type,” he hinted.

Kevin laughed. “Are you sure we’ve known each other long enough for you to try to set me up on a date?” he asked.

“Eh, you’re not bad for a lawyer.”

“And you’re not bad for a reporter,” Kevin grinned.

“I’m not a reporter, I’m a researcher and writer,” Kit challenged.

Kevin was right about the afternoon. They moved to a larger conference room, that was filled with sixteen lawyers representing the five uncles and two aunts that were opposing the suit. Kittimer, Kevin, and Kit sat down at the head of the table, the two lawyers flanking him, and they began.

The questions were detailed, invasive, and delivered like he was being cross-examined. Kevin repeatedly had to warn them off when they got too personal, when they started digging into business that had nothing to do with the matter at hand. They were blunt and forceful, and more than once they dropped questions on him that shocked him. When the attorney for his aunt Melissa got her turn, who grilled him over his relationship with his sister for nearly twenty minutes, suddenly asked, “are you in a sexual relationship with your sister?” That shocked Kit, angered Kevin, and almost got the little weasel of an attorney punched in the nose, had Kit been within reach of him. It certainly infuriated Kittimer, who threatened to eject the weasel if she didn’t keep his mouth in line. “You can’t do that,” the femme weasel said smugly.

“I am acting as the direct representative of the court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts,” she said in an icy tone. “If you don’t think I can’t throw you out of here, then have your state’s bar drag you into a disciplinary hearing, then try me.”

The weasel backed off at that point, but did question Kit about his relationship with his sister for nearly a half an hour longer.

They went right down the line. They questioned him for four hours, and then they took a half hour break for something to eat, where Kit called Jessie and told him they were running late. After the break, he was questioned for another hour and a half, until the last lawyer finally got his chance and questioned him for nearly twenty minutes. The last question the stag asked startled Kit, but not in a bad way. “Is it true that you have no active interest in this suit?” he asked, the one question none of the others had asked him. They'd probably agreed to only ask it once, at the end. "That you're not actively engaged in your sister's suit to restore the original will that gives you executorship of the estate?"

"That's right," he said. "The first I'd heard about it was when I was given the subpoena to be here today. I had no part of it."

"I see. If your sister and your stepmother lose, what will you do?"

"Nothing," he answered.

"And if one of them wins?"

"Nothing. Well, if my sister wins, I'll just give the money back to the family. I don't want it. I just want to be left alone and live my own life, away from them, and away from all the insanity that surrounds them."

"So, if you win, you won't hand the family fortune over to your sister?"

"I'd have her help me deal with it, if only because she's the only member of the family I trust. As I'm sure all of you know, someone tried to kill me, and I think it was one of my uncles that arranged it. So I wouldn't hand over the family fortune to someone I think might have tried to have me killed."

"You realize that's an unsubstantiated accusation," one of the other lawyers said immediately.

"I know, but that doesn't change how I feel about it," he answered immediately. "Someone sure as hell hired a hitman to try to kill me. And given my history with my family, my family's purist sympathies, and my current fiancée, it's not much of a stretch for me to suspect any one of them."

"So you admit you can't be an impartial executor?" the lawyer asked. "That you're biased against my client and the other respondents?"

"My bias has nothing to do with money," he snorted. "Are you asking what I'd do if my sister won? That's easy. I'd bring the entire family together and make them sign a pledge stating that if they ever interfere with me, badger me, pester me, or try to harass me, my fiancée, or her family, they forfeit their money. Once they sign, they receive an equal share of the family fortune. I'll give it all back to them, and I won't take a single bloody penny of it. I don't want the money. I just want to be free of them and live my own life."

"And the shipyards and other businesses?"

"I'd give it back to Vil—Vilene. Dad gave it to Vil before he died, and the board recognizes her as the heir."

"I see. Thank you, Mister Vulpan. I believe I'm done."

Kit left the conference room as the lawyers all conferred with each other, Kevin just behind him. "I'm surprised you'd make a declaration like that. You'd really just give it all away without taking a cent?"

"Money is a curse," he said with sincere conviction. "It's a curse I want no part of. It destroys people, Mister Simmons. I won't let it destroy me."

"I guess you have reasons for thinking that way," he mused. "And you can call me Kevin."

“Kevin. Say, do you play poker?” he asked.

Kevin laughed. “I’ve been known to do so from time to time. Why, you have an offer?”

“I play poker on Sundays with my landlord and some guys from my complex. We have an empty chair.”

“That sounds like fun. I’m in, as long as it’s not high stakes.”

Kit laughed. “Not if you consider a pot of eighty cents to be too rich for your blood. We play using pennies, nickels, and dimes. So bring two dollar’s worth with you. Two bucks is the buy-in, and we play every Sunday until someone wins it all, but we don’t go any later than eight. If nobody’s won by eight, we all go all-in and play the last hand sudden death showdown style. The winner uses the cash to buy the beer for the next game, and we start over the next week.”

“Okay, now that sounds like fun,” Kevin grinned.

“Then come on over. We start around four.”

In all, he was relieved beyond measure when he got home. He flopped down on the couch and blew out his breath, and pulled out his phone to call Jessie. “Hello?” she called.

“Hey pretty kitty. I’m home.”

“How bad was it?”

“It wasn’t fun. But it’s over now.”

“Do you have to go back?” she asked.

“No, I’m basically done unless I’m called as a witness for the trial... which I probably will,” he sighed. “Where are you?”

“I’m over at the sorority,” she answered. “Want me to come home?”

“You have a promise to keep,” he said teasingly.

“So I do,” she said enticingly into the phone. “I’ll be right home.”

When she got home, he made sure she lived up to her promise that morning. She certainly didn’t object. She showed him again why he loved her so much, for she could sense what he needed, and gave it to him...in this case, a wild romp in bed to take his mind off the weighty issues and stresses of the day. Jessie was the best therapy around. When they were done, Kit laying atop her, Jessie slid her paws across the scars on the small of his back as she purred her contentment, which sounded a little funny because she was still a little out of breath. She sounded like a sputtering chainsaw, which made him laugh.

“What?” she demanded.

“You shouldn’t purr when you’re out of breath,” he teased, nuzzling her neck.

She giggled. “I can’t help it,” she admitted. “So, feel better now, my handsome fox?”

“You know it,” he breathed, rising up on his elbows and kissing her muzzle. “Someday, I’m gonna convince you to let me take some pictures of this gorgeous body.”

She laughed. “I’ll tell you what. You can take them, but not ‘til the reporters all go away. If someone could hack U.T. to get my schedule, then they might try to hack our own computers. I don't want to find naked pictures of me on the front page of some tabloid. Until then, you'll have to settle for looking at the real thing."

He chuckled. "It's a deal. The real thing is better anyway."

"How was it at the lawyer?"

"I got grilled," he grunted in reply, moving to slide off her, but ten claws dug into his back and instantly disabused him of that notion. Kit thought it it was very curious that Jessie had five fingers on her paws, but only four toes on each foot...but that was normal for cats, she'd told him.

"Where do you think you're going?" she asked with a grin, though he couldn't see it since they were literally nose to nose.

"Getting off your ribcage so you can breathe, maybe?" he chuckled in reply.

"You're not that heavy," she told him. "What kind of questions did they ask?"

"You name it, they asked it," he said. "There was like twenty-five lawyers there asking me questions."

"That many? Woah," she breathed. "I'd have been so nervous I woulda thrown up."

"That's one reason why I'm glad you didn't go," he said. "I don't want any part of my screwed up life encroaching on yours, my pretty kitty. As far as I'm concerned, I've done enough damage just from you being with me."

"Don't you worry about me, my handsome fox. I won't let them push me away. I've got my claws in you now, and I'm not ever letting go."

“Good, cause I won’t let you get away,” he hummed, nuzzling her. “I did tell them the one thing they probably all wanted to hear.”

“What, that you don’t want the money?”

“Yeah. I made that clear right up front, in all three sessions.”

“Sessions?”

“They broke it up into three questioning sessions, with each side in the case. Vil’s people, my stepmother’s people, and the lawyers for the rest of my family. Since each side wanted to ask me different things, but the lawyers working on each side were working for the same goal, they just set it up that way so I didn’t have to talk to each lawyer separately. That woulda taken like five days.”

“You’ve never really talked much about your stepmother.”

“I only saw her once in person, at the funeral,” he shrugged. “I was out of the house before my father remarried. He only married her for her family and so he had a wife for appearances. He didn’t love her, and she didn’t particularly care about him. It was more of a business arrangement than anything.” Kit chuckled. “Vil absolutely hates her. She said she’s a shallow, vain, conceited bitch. But she has the bloodline,” he grunted. “She’s from British aristocracy.”

“How is she going to get your family fortune? Didn’t she sign a prenuptial agreement?”

“Yeah, but she thinks she can get around it.”

“What do you think will happen?”

“I really don’t know. Either way, I don’t really care. I just want them to leave us alone.”

“Well, there’s one thing I do want if your sister wins, since you’ll have control of the money.”

“What?” he asked suspiciously.

“A scholarship trust fund for our babies, so they don’t have to worry about college.”

“Hmm. Now that I think I wouldn’t object to,” he mused after thinking a moment. “Thinking ahead, are we?”

“You know I am,” she said, kissing his throat. “I hope we have a baby before our first anniversary.”

“I’d love it, but I’m a little worried about that,” he said honestly. “If you have a baby, how’s that going to affect your school? It’s going to be hard to graduate.”

“I’ll find a way, my handsome fox. I want my degree, but I want to be a mother even more.” She kissed his nose. “I wonder what our children will look like.”

“They’ll be beautiful,” he said simply. “So, can I get up now?”

She nipped lightly at his muzzle. “Maybe.”

“I must need more practice if you’re still frisky after that,” he chuckled.

“Practice? Heavens no,” she giggled. “I’m just getting my second wind, that’s all. Besides, you just had the ‘I want to forget today’ session, now I have to start working on the ‘I’m sorry about Thanksgiving before it happens’ sessions.”

Kit exploded into laughter, dropping his head on her shoulder. “You’re giving me apology sex before it even happens? You’re not instilling me with confidence, pretty kitty.”

“I’m going to still be giving you apology sex a month after our first anniversary,” she said ruefully. “So, up for a little pre-emptive apology?”

“Can I ever say no to you?”

“Not when I know where your on switch is,” she said, and she started to purr.

Jessie’s little present to him reminded him that Thanksgiving was only a week or so away.

After telling everyone about the lawyer, Kit told the crew about his trip, and everyone buckled down to get the magazine put to bed. They had to finish next week’s issue a day early, since everyone would be off on Thursday, but the good part of that was that since it was Thanksgiving week, it was going to be rather light. Their plan was to get more done than usual on the week before, so they could skip Thursday without causing any undue problems. This basically meant that everyone was going to give up a part one of their normal days off. The writers would be working half a day on Monday, and the others would be working half a day on Saturday. Nobody worked on Sunday in Rick’s outfit, since Sunday was the day Rick went to church.

The issues with the press, however, didn't calm down after the deposition. Kit continued to stonewall the numerous attempts they made to get an interview, briskly brushing past several newscrews that tried to stop him outside, as Vanguard kept a car near the apartment to chase off any news vans or reporters that tried to come to their apartment, once their address became common knowledge to the news organizations. Jessie kept a guard with her any time she went out alone, who kept all reporters away with a kind word but a stern warning that Miss Williams had no comment. Kit kept telling himself he was going to kiss Vil every time Jessie came home with a smile instead of tears, because the guard was keeping them away from her.

Kit was busy all week, but Jessie was even busier. She was leaving for Cincinnati on Saturday, on a morning flight out of Bergstrom, and she was making sure to stock up on a week's worth of affection before she left. When she wasn't kissing him, touching him, nuzzling him, cuddling with him, or luring him into the bedroom, she was doing two major projects that were due on Friday. Sam and Sandy came over every night, and Kit did his own bit of matchmaking by quietly hinting that Sam needed to come over the next Sunday both he and Jessie were home, that he had someone he wanted her to meet.

His relief that the questioning was over made the time fly, until he was waking up on Saturday morning to the sound of Jessie in the shower, her suitcase packed and sitting by the door. He scrubbed his face and got up, then wandered to the bathroom himself to relieve himself. "Kit?" she called when he lifted the seat.

"Yeah hon?" he asked.

She looked out from the shower. "I was about to wake you up."

“I’m up. How much time do we have? I didn’t look at the clock.”

“About three hours,” she answered, turning off the water. She opened the curtain and started using her paw to strip the water out of her fur, and he flinched when she flicked it at him with a giggle.

“You make me miss and you’re cleaning it up,” he warned.

She laughed as she pulled the towel off the rack and started scrubbing at her fur to dry it. “What I wouldn’t give for one of those full-body fur dryers,” she sighed.

“This is an old apartment.”

“We should save for one of those portable ones. We can set it up in the corner of the bedroom,” she said.

“That’s an idea,” he nodded as he finished up. He helped her out of the tub, then took the other towel and helped her scrub most of the water out of her fur and hair. “You got your coat ready?”

“Yeah, it’s on the couch,” she told him. “I checked the weather, and it looks like it’s going to be messy. They’re calling for snow. That’s rare in Cincinnati this time of year. I’m gonna miss Austin by tomorrow,” she laughed.

“How cold does it get here in the winter?”

“Sometimes it can get cold, but the daytime isn’t bad. Like the fifties,” she told him. “Last winter we had a stretch where it was below freezing for almost a week.”

“That’s nothing like Boston,” he chuckled. “Usually it goes below freezing in November and doesn’t get back above it until April.”

She turned around and kissed him on the muzzle and cheek. “I’m gonna feel all musty,” she complained. “But I gotta get dressed. The airline said we should be there two hours before my plane leaves so I can get through security.” She looped her arms around his neck and kissed him lingeringly. “Mmmm, God I’m going to miss you,” she hummed as she nuzzled him.

“Baby.”

“Mmm?”

“I don’t think necking naked in the bathroom is getting you ready to go.”

“Spoilsport.”

“If I don’t get you home, your parents will kill me.”

“Five days without touching you,” she said longingly, sliding her paws down his back, then grabbing two healthy pawfuls of his backside as she nuzzled his neck.

“You’ll live,” he chuckled. “I’m the one that’s going to be alone until I fly up. You’ll be home.”

“Fighting with Mom,” she sighed, grabbing the base of his tail with one of her paws while the other caressed the scarred area of his back. Even now, months after they’d become intimate, she couldn’t keep her paws off his scarred lower back.

“Company is company,” he chuckled. “Now let’s get dressed before you make me all musty too.”

She laughed and grabbed hold of him tightly, pressing her damp fur against his front. “If I have to be musty, so do you,” she teased.

“Stop that, young lady,” he laughed, grabbing hold of her, picking her up off her feet, and swinging her around. She laughed as he walked them out of the bathroom and towards the bedroom. “Now then, you little brat, let’s get you ready to go!”

They dressed, and while Kit put her suitcase and coat in the car, Jessie wolfed down a breakfast of toast and orange slices. He doublechecked to make sure they had everything, and went through the checklist as she put on a pair of fur-topped boots. “Purse ready?”

“Got my keys, credit card, phone, and cash in it.”

“Plane ticket?”

“In my purse.”

“Phone?”

“Charged and in my purse, and the charger’s in my suitcase.”

“Laptop?”

“In my backpack. I have the charger in my suitcase.”

“Cameras?”

“Camcorder’s in the suitcase, camera’s in my backpack. And yes, I have extra memory cards.”

“Books?”

“Backpack.”

“Ipod?”

“Backpack, charging base is in my suitcase.”

“Toiletries?”

“Suitcase. Did you find out what it’ll take when I change my name?”

“A copy of your marriage license, birth certificate, social security card, and your driver’s license,” he answered. “We have an appointment on December fifth for the blood test for the license, so don’t make any plans that day.”

“This isn’t a good time to tell me something like that,” she laughed as she pulled on her other boot, then stood up and shuffled her feet a little. “I hate shoes,” she complained.

“I’m not fond of them either, but it’ll be cold in Cincinnati.”

“You don’t have claws on your feet.”

“You got me there. You could always go without them, but cold and wet are a bad combination.”

“I know,” she sighed. “I’m not really used to them now. I don’t think I’ve worn shoes since last winter.”

“They’re a lot more common in Boston. Vil always wears shoes. She’s used to it.”

“Remember to buy a pair of winter shoes before you come up,” she told him.

“I’m going right after work. You know, there are a few places up in Boston that won’t let you in if you’re not wearing shoes.”

“Really?” she asked in surprise.

He nodded. “It’s how they keep tourists out. Most of them don’t pack shoes when they visit in the summer.”

“I guess that’s one way to do it,” she giggled as she picked up her purse and looked inside it. “You about ready to go?”

“Yeah.”

He carried her backpack out to the car, helped her into the passenger seat, locked the house up, then climbed in and started the Pathfinder. It was only about twenty minutes to Bergstrom, which used to be an Air Force base before it was changed into a civilian airport. Kit parked in a short term lot near the terminal and carried Jessie’s suitcase for her as they filed in. She led them through the sparsely populated terminal to the United counter, and an attendant checked her suitcase and directed them to the gate from which her plane would leave. They didn’t have much trouble, at least until they reached security. Jessie seemed a little annoyed when they wouldn’t let Kit through, taking his paw and leading him back a ways as a family came up behind them.

“We still have two hours,” she complained. “I don’t want to wait without you.”

“Let’s talk to security and see how long it’ll take for you to get through since it’s not busy, and we can go grab a cup of tea at that restaurant.”

“Okay.”

It turned out that they promised to get her through in about twenty minutes, so they had a cup of tea at the Dunkin’ Donuts that was in the main terminal. Jessie bought a USA Today and leafed through it, holding his paw as he sat watching the TV hung from a mount in the corner of the restaurant. They were quiet, but the grip she had on his paw told him how reluctant she was to leave him. He just kept hold of her paw, and then urged her to get up. He packed her paper in her backpack, and deliberately started leading her back to the security gate.

“I hate this,” she sighed when they reached it.

“I’ll be fine, my pretty kitty,” he chuckled, leaning over and nuzzling her neck.

“I miss you already,” she said in a poignant voice. “I never thought I’d feel like this before I even leave!”

He kissed her tenderly. “It just shows me how much I love you,” he told her. “I feel the same way, but I know we’ll see each other in five days. It’ll just feel like forever,” he grunted.

“Five days alone in bed,” she groaned. “I don’t if I can get to sleep without you there with me.”

“I know the feeling. But let’s get you going, pretty kitty. Call me when you get to Cincinnati.”

“As soon as I can,” she affirmed, kissing him so hard that he almost felt his knees unlock. He gave her her backpack, kissed the back of her paw, and then shooed her towards the checkpoint. “Did you test that videoconferencing program?”

He nodded. “It works. I have it all set up, and I can walk you through the connection steps on the phone when you use it the first time.”

“At least I’ll be able to see you,” she sighed, leaning her head on his shoulder a moment.

“You have to go, Jess, or you’ll miss your plane before you get through security.”

She sighed. “Alright. Drive carefully when you go home. I’ll see you on the computer tonight.”

“Be good, pretty kitty. I love you.”

“I love you, my handsome fox,” she said, giving him one more longing look, then turning and filing into the checkpoint, around a corner, and out of sight.

He sighed. Five days without her. He wasn’t sure how he was going to survive it.

Kit thought that the time after he was disowned was the closest thing to hell on earth. Nothing could describe the sense of total fear and confusion that came when a rich kid who had never so much as made toast for himself was suddenly thrown out onto the hard, cold streets with no money, no possessions, no home, and no idea what real life was like for normal people.

He discovered that true hell was being separated from the femme he loved.

Talking on the phone just didn’t fill the void. She wasn’t there. He couldn’t reach out and touch her, and cuddle with her. She wasn’t there to tease him when he cooked, or make that silly face when he talked about hockey, or watch her jump up and cheer when her Bengals scored a touchdown. She wasn't there to make fun of her preference for corny teen-femme pop music, or to feel her run her fingers along the scars on his back in her ritual, so well she knew them she could trace every white line without looking at them. He missed her sitting at the table doing her homework while he practiced the guitar, watching her pretty face screw up in a mask of intense concentration as she took up knitting again, something her mother had taught her but she hadn't done in years, since she was a little girl.

He missed every part of her and life with her.

There was only one thing to do about it. Write it out.

He sat at home that night, after talking to her on the videoconferencing program for two hours, and sat at the desktop with his favorite classical music playing, the score to Tchaikovsky's Nutcracker ballet. He stared at the word processor window for nearly ten minutes, then he began. He wrote a letter about how it felt to be separated from her, describing it in stark, somber tones, trying to capture the essence of what he was feeling into words. He spent four pages trying to capture that essence, but never felt quite like he'd managed it. But, as was his custom, he copied it into an email and sent it to Hannah, continuing their practice of emails where he told her how he felt, and she kept trying to convince him to break off the engagement.

He spent that night laying in bed staring at the ceiling for most of the night. It felt...wrong, not having Jessie sleeping beside him. He just couldn't relax, couldn't rest. Every time he started feeling sleepy, he'd reach out and find the other side of the bed empty, and that would just start the cycle again. The only solace he found was at three in the morning, when the phone rang. He didn't even have to look at the number on the display. "Can't sleep?" he asked when he opened the phone.

"No," Jessie said morosely. "You're not here with me. I don't know what to do, I can't rest."

"I know."

"Sing me a lullabye, Kit. I can't get to sleep without you here."

He chuckled and did just that, singing Rock-a-bye Baby to her. When he finished, he could hear her breathing on the other end, but she made no other sounds.

She'd fallen asleep.

Kit spent almost half an hour just listening to her breathing, and it was that music that lulled him to sleep himself.

Work did help. He had no reason to go home, so he hung around work well after quitting time, knocking out just about every project on his schedule for next week's issue, working until nearly ten that night. Jessie called him at ten, and he stayed on the phone with her as he locked up, drove home, and sat on the couch drinking more wine than was entirely good for him. She was falling asleep at two in the morning, and he urged her to hang up the phone this time so she didn't drain the battery, instead having her use the videoconferencing software. She put the computer on her dresser and angled the monitor so the camera got a view of her bedroom. Her parents hadn't changed anything in it since she left, so it looked like a high school femme's room. It had older, sturdy cherrywood furniture, a queen size bed, and posters of music bands on the walls, along with a collection of unicorn figurines on a bookshelf on the other side of the bed.

He watched her climb into bed, her beautiful eyes looking at the laptop, then closed her eyes when he again sang her a lullabye.

Sunday...well, Sunday sucked. Jessie was busy with her family, so Kit was trapped in the house due to the fact that he didn't want to be chased around by determined reporters. Lupe and Dan came over and watched football with him, then they played poker after the first game with the second game on the TV.

Kevin made good on his promise to come play. He called around five to get directions, and showed up about twenty minutes later. He showed up wearing jeans and a Dallas Cowboys tee shirt, and that got him immediate high praise from Lupe and Dan. Kit's first impression of Kevin was totally justified, for Kit found him to be intelligent, funny, good-natured, and quite friendly. He struck up quick friendships with Lupe and Dan as well as himself, and lost in his first outing against the boys in poker with humor and dignity. "Well, y'all busted my poker cherry quick," he lamented with a grin as he tossed down his losing hand.

"You better hope that Dan don't win, he always buys that crappy Milwaukee's Best," Lupe said sourly.

"It may be crappy, but it's cheap," Dan laughed. "Does it matter how it tastes as long as it gets us buzzed?"

"Well, I'll have to bring some Mountain Dew," Kevin chuckled. "I'm driving home, so I can't be going crazy."

"Where do you live?"

"Just outside Austin, near Pflugerville," he answered. "I got an apartment up there. I haven't been working at the firm long enough to save up a down payment on a house.”

“Hey brah, you shoulda came here, I got units open,” Lupe told him. “And I make deals for guys who don’t trash my apartments.”

“Deals?”

“I gave Kit a break on the rent cause he’s not a party jock,” Lupe chuckled.

“Ah, well, I needed a furnished apartment, and what I got isn’t too bad. It has a pool and some other perks.”

“Ah. I can’t compete with that. The only thing these old units can say is they have washer dryer hookups,” he chuckled.

There was a knock on the door, and it opened before Kit could say anything. Sandy peeked in. “Kit!” she called.

“Jessie’s in Cincinnati, Sandy, remember?” he said.

“We know that, goofy,” she laughed, opening the door. Jeffrey and Sam were with her. “We promised her we wouldn’t let you sit around alone!”

“Sandy, it’s poker time.”

“And you keep on playing while I cook!” she announced.

“Uh, is it really okay for us to come over, Kit?” Jeffrey asked.

“I don’t mind, come on in,” he said. “Oh, Sandy, Sam, Jeffrey, this is Kevin. He works at the law firm that hosted the deposition.”

“Hey, how you all doing?” he asked, waving to them as they came into the living room. Kit noted, with a little satisfaction, that he was looking right at Sam, and Sam was looking right back at him.

“Ah, so you’re a lawyer, are ya?” Sandy grinned as she went past them and into the kitchen.

“Afraid so,” he chuckled. “At my first job out of law school, which is little more than being a glorified gopher.”

“We all have to start somewhere,” Sam said with a slight smile as Dan dealt out the cards. “You know, you’ve never asked us to play.”

“Hell, Sam, put down your two bucks and pull up a chair,” Lupe laughed. “We don’t discriminate.”

“We’ll take anyone’s money,” Dan agreed with a chuckle.

“Oh no you don’t! We promised Jessie to cook Kit a meal so he wouldn’t pine!” Sandy protested.

“Pizza Hut,” she said simply, which made Sandy and Jeffrey both laugh.

“I can’t object to that. So, who wants to teach me how you play this game, and lend me two bucks?”

“Hell, let’s just start over, since Kevin’s already been knocked out,” Lupe offered. “Let’s count it all back out so us starters have our two bucks again.”

“Note he offered that when he’s winning,” Dan said with a laugh to Kit. “That’s noble of him, eh?”

“If he was losing, we’d just accuse him of trying to cheat,” Kit grinned in reply.

The three of them bought into the game, and after Lupe went and fetched a couple of chairs from his show unit, they had a very fun couple of hours sitting around playing poker, drinking beer, eating pizza, and having a good time. They almost made him forget that Jessie was in Ohio, but he kept expecting her to come out of the kitchen and tease them for playing poker, since she wasn't too fond of the game. Kevin fit in perfectly with his other friends, and by eight, when it was time for the showdown hand between Sam, Lupe, and Kit—Sandy, Jeffrey, Kevin, and Dan were knocked out—Lupe dealt out their hand of Showdown, five cards dealt face up one round at a time.

“Where did you learn how to play poker, Sam?” Sandy asked, eyeing her sizable pile of change. Sam was the second highest at the table, only a little behind Lupe. “You're pretty good!”

“My dad was a professional poker player,” she said modestly.

Lupe gave her a look. “Your dad is Black Jack Mickleson?”

She laughed ruefully. “Yeah, that's him,” she admitted. “He retired from poker last year, though. How did you know about him?”

“I saw him on one of those poker shows,” Lupe said as he dealt out the third round. “They said he was one of the big winners, that he'd won that big competition in the past.”

“That's why he retired,” she said with a shy smile. “He won the World Series of Poker five years ago, and decided to hang it up when it got so popular and all the new people started flooding in. He decided to chase his other dream while he still had the energy to do it. He opened a bar.”

Lupe laughed. “A man after my own heart!” he exclaimed as he dealt out the fourth round. “Where is the bar at?”

“My mom and dad moved to Florida after I started college. He opened his bar in Jacksonville,” she answered. “They always did like it there.”

Lupe dealt out the last round, and Sam gave a wicked little chuckle when she won with a pair of kings. “Now remember, Sammy, next week you buy the beer,” Lupe told her. “Just don’t buy Milwaukee’s Best!”

“Beer hater,” Dan chuckled. “Alright, let’s get this place cleaned up.”

They all got up and started cleaning up beer bottles and pizza boxes, but left the money on the table. Once the table was cleaned of everything but the cash, Sam pointed at it. “Can you just put that in a jar somewhere Kit? I’ll just leave it here. That way we always have change around if we want to play.”

“No problem, Sam,” he told her.

“Don’t think that gets you out of beer buying duty next Sunday,” Dan said teasingly as Sandy dropped several cans into the trash bag he was holding open.

“I’ll have my Dad ship us something,” she told them. “He gets a bunch of imported stuff from Europe. Want to try some German lager?”

“You just became my best friend, Sam!” Lupe laughed.

“I didn’t know you could ship alcohol,” Kit mused.

“You can if you use the right shipping company,” Sam smiled.

“Well, you’re full of surprises,” Kevin told her. “A premed student who can whoop the lot of us at poker and knows more about beer than most males?”

She laughed. “You should know all about it.”

He chuckled. “Hey, the family is just from Europe. I was born in Delaware.”

“Huh?” Lupe asked.

“He’s a European skunk,” Sam told them. “I’m indiginous.”

“Indiginous? So, your breed met the boat, eh?” Dan asked with a smile.

“You could say that,” Sam said mildly. “So did his. They went back on it.”

“Huh?” Lupe asked.

“Back then, the colonization didn’t go just one way,” Kevin explained. “Some American breeds went to Europe. My family was part of a group that colonized Britain while the British foxes were colonizing New England,” Kevin chuckled. “So, we came to be known as European skunks. We even developed this,” he said, tapping the double white lines between his eyes.

“I’ve never met an American breed that calls themselves indiginous before,” Dan noted.

“There’s really not too many of us who can say that,” she answered. “There’s only a handful of truly indiginous North American breeds. Raccoons, prarie dogs, coyotes, cougars, bison, that’s really about all I can think of. Some, like us, we have cousin breeds on other continents, though skunks came from here first,” she chuckled.

“That’s really interesting,” Sandy said. “I didn’t know that. I just know my family came up here from Chile just before the Great Depression, we were part of a group of Chilean and Argentinan chinchillas that came north and settled in Texas and Oklahoma after the corn blight of twenty-four. My grandpa used to talk about it all the time.”

“What’s your last name?” Dan asked.

“Lopez,” she grinned. “Just like Jennifer,” she said, striking model’s pose.

“Speak Spanish?” he asked curiously.

“Si, si,” she grinned. “Our grandparents and parents taught us when we were kids. That’s an advantage around here.”

“She was our lifeline when we went to Mexico last spring break,” Sam laughed.

“I wonder what it was like for your family to move to England,” Lupe said to Kevin. “That musta been hella culture shock.”

“I guess it wasn’t all that great, since my grandfather moved back to America,” Kevin answered with a grin.

“Well, I can’t say much,” Dan chuckled. “The most I know of my family is we came from Atlanta.”

“We came from Mexico, brah,” Lupe grinned. Sandy chattered at him in flawless Spanish, and Lupe grinned and answered her.

“Well, now that I’ve had my biology, anthropology, and history lessons for today, in addition to losing two dollars to a pretty poker shark, I gotta get going,” Kevin grinned. “I have a lot of work coming up. Thanks for the invite guys, I had a great time.”

“Hey brah, feel free to come back!” Lupe said, and Dan nodded in agreement. “Next week we’ll probably play over at my place, since Mickey’ll be back from Louisiana. I got a bigger table. And you gotta come back, Sammy,” he grinned. “You owe us beer!”

“I’ll be back. Will Jessie be back next Sunday?”

Kit nodded. “I pick her up from the airport at noon,” he answered.

Kevin shook paws with everyone, then said his goodbyes and started on his way home. “We gotta go too, I have some homework to finish,” Sandy said. “Don’t tell Jessie we ordered pizza or she’ll kill us,” she laughed. “We were supposed to cook for you.”

“Now I know what to say when I need a favor,” Kit noted.

Sandy and Sam went back to their house, and Dan and Lupe took the trash out for him on the way out. He sighed and sat down on the couch, turned off the TV, and missed Jessie all over again.

He had a little easier time of it that night. Jessie called him, they talked over the computer, and he again left it running in his room so she could look at her monitor and see him sleeping, and he could do the same. It wasn’t the same as her being home, but it was something.

Hannah was already driving her crazy. Jessie wasn’t lying about the fights, for they’d already had two doozies, both of them over the wedding. Hannah could admit that he loved her, and she loved him, but she was still opposed to the idea of them getting married. And her attempts to be civil about it evaporated when she had Jessie right there under her roof, where Jessie couldn't just hang up on her to end the conversation. Jessie complained about it on Monday night, threatening to un-invite her mother to the wedding, but Kit talked her out of it. "Just stand your ground, love," he told her. "Remember, come Sunday, you'll be back home, and you'll be able to hang up on her again."

"Come Wednesday, you'll be here," she purred, giving him a sultry look.

He laughed. "Baby, if you think your mom's bad now, just try to get frisky with me in her house."

"Oh, go ahead, ruin my fantasy," she said, giving him a pouty look.

"That fantasy could turn into a nightmare pretty quick."

"We'll see."

"Jessie," he said warningly. "I won't be party to murder."

"Huh?"

"If your mom caught us, she'd die on the spot. Then we'd be begging the judge for adjoining prisons."

She exploded into laughter.

He was getting a little used to her not being there. On Monday night, he actually slept more than five hours, and Tuesday he was busy with getting ready to go. He packed a single carry-on for the trip holding a single change of clothes, his laptop, and a couple of books. He put it by the door and picked it up on his way out on Wednesday, told Lupe he'd be back on Friday and warned him that Rick would be there that evening to pick up Jessie's car to take with him back to his house while Kit was in Ohio, then got in his car quickly when he saw a reporter moving towards him and pulled out before she could so much as get a microphone ready.

He'd been working overtime every night since Jessie left, so he really didn't have much to do. He spent most of the day in his tiny office, looking at the clock every ten minutes and waiting anxiously. He'd see Jessie tonight. He'd be able to kiss her, hold her in his arms, smell her hair and fur, feel her fingers tracing the lines of the scars on his back. And, he had to admit, he was very curious, almost excited, to meet Jessie's family. Hannah was a paradox to him, a hostile stepmother who had a rich and enigmatic history, who had a story he was dying to hear but wasn't allowed to pursue. He wanted to meet her mild-mannered father who was a gun fanatic, her good-natured brother who was a football player, and her Barbie-doll cute sister that Jessie said had the mouth of a drunken sailor and a less than traditional personality...which was Jessie "nice-speak" for the fact that Jenny acted out against her parents once she left home by indulging in everything they forbade her when she was there. Jenny was a party girl at Ohio State, and was nowhere near as shy and demure as Jessie was.

Rick took pity on him. He sent him out on some errands, talking to some advertisers, keeping him busy until three. At three, they had their staff meeting and put the issue to bed, and then it was time for Kit to go.

Rick drove him to the airport in his own car. Rick was going to keep his Pathfinder over the holiday, since all the reporters were around and Kit didn't really like the idea of leaving his car out where someone might get some ideas. Rick was going to go get Jessie's Corolla after he got home and picked up Martha and watch over their cars for them while they were gone.

They stopped at the dropoff lane by the terminal, and Kit blew out his breath.

“You got everything?” Rick asked.

“Yeah. Jessie’s car is parked in her spot at the complex. Remember to remind Lupe you’re there for it. I told him you were coming to pick it up today, but he might forget. Oh, and don’t forget about the alarm, Rick. If you do go into the apartment, turn off the alarm. You have the code?”

“In my wallet, but I doubt I’ll have to do that,” he said.

“Just in case,” Kit said simply.

“I’d have to say thank you for trusting me with your cars and your apartment, son,” Rick chuckled. “It means a lot to me.”

“If I can’t trust you, who the hell can I trust?” Kit asked with a smile.

“You’d better get along, son. Remember, you’re only gonna be there one day. Keep telling yourself that when she starts to nag on ya.”

“I’m actually looking forward to it,” he said as he opened the car door. “It’s the last major obstacle to the marriage, so I’m eager to get it out of the way.”

Rick laughed. “Hell, son, you two are already married. The ceremony’s just a technicality at this point.”

“The world is built on technicalities.”

“So it is. Have a good flight, son.”

“I’ll bring you a bit of my in-laws’s bloody fur as a souvenir.”

Rick laughed. “Be good. I’ll pick you up on Friday morning.”

“I’ll be here.”

Kit closed his door and watched Rick drive away in his car. He fished his ticket out of his carry-on bag, then turned and hurried into the terminal. In just a few hours, he’d be with Jessie again.

He couldn’t wait.

Chapter 11

The day before Thanksgiving was one of the busiest travel days of the year...and Kit was caught up in the middle of that hurricane.

Bergstrom was packed. His intent to be there three hours before his 6:00pm flight turned out to be wise, for he cleared security literally ten minutes before his plane pulled away from the gate. All the workers in the airport were surly and short-tempered, and the security guard that screened him was irate and unpleasant. The gate was filled and the plane was already boarding when he got there, putting him at the back of the line. The plane was packed as well, but at least he got lucky as far as seating assignments went. He had an aisle seat at the front of coach, and the seat beside him was taken by a short, quiet female rabbit that didn't feel like talking, who was traveling with a teenage femme rabbit that looked like either her sister or cousin. The younger one had her nose pressed to the window, looking out with silent interest when he stowed his backpack in the overhead compartment and sat down, pinching his tail a little in the narrow seat as he pulled it around his hips so he could sit down.

The plane taxied out fifteen minutes late, and then spent nearly a half an hour sitting at the end of the runway. When they finally did get into the air, the first half of the flight was anxiously boring, as Kit felt like a kid waiting for his parents to wake up on Christmas morning so he could open his presents, and the second half was unpleasant. The plane hit a weather front on the way to Cincinnati, running them through two separate episodes of turbulence. They were delayed again when they got to Cincinnati, as Kit began to get anxious and excited about the idea of seeing Jessie. They had snow there, and they were stuck circling the airport as the ground crew cleared the runway so they could land. Every circle around the airport just made Kit that much more anxious and impatient, and he had to focus on keeping himself from losing his composure. He didn't want to be rude to the politely quiet rabbit sitting next to him, who had been the soul of courtesy during the entire flight.

When the plane finally landed, over an hour late, Kit had to hold onto the armrests to keep himself in his seat. When the plane taxied up and stopped at the gate, he was up the instant the plane came to rest, pulling down his carry-on and handing the two rabbits their luggage with a nod and a polite smile. Since they were in the front of coach, they were the first out after the first class people, and he poured out into a hugely busy and populated terminal, filled with furs of all breeds, shapes, and colors. He was on the phone the instant he was out of the tunnel, calling Jessie. "Hello? Kit?" she called.

"I just got off the plane," he informed her, looking up at the signs hanging from the ceiling to get his bearings. "Where are you?"

"Umm, we're just inside the terminal, between the main door and the United counter," she answered. "We're moving towards the gate where your plane arrived. We'll meet you just outside the security checkpoint, okay?"

"I'll see you in a few minutes. I can't wait to see you."

"I know the feeling," she giggled, then she hung up. Really, there was no reason for her to say goodbye, given she'd be seeing him in person in just a minute.

Kit hurried down a very long terminal, so long it had moving walkways...and of course, his gate was at the very end. Instead of using the walkway, he instead walked briskly beside it, outpacing those on the walkway by almost double. There were too many people on the moving walkway to do anything but stand on it. It took him almost five minutes to walk down to the other end of the terminal, until he reached the security gate that stopped people from coming in. He stepped through it, and even with all the furs crowding the terminal, he saw her. He saw her jump up to look over all the heads, on the far side, and she raised her black-mittened paw and waved vigorously. Kit almost bulldozed people out of his way and he rushed to her, and then she was right there, arms open and rushing towards him. He took her in in that moment, seeing her with her jeans and winter boots she bought in Austin, and a thick downy red vest-coat worn over denim jacket.

“Kit!”

He buried her in his arms, holding her tightly, rocking her back and forth. For a long moment, he just held her, eyes closed, reveling in her presence, feeling five days of longing fade away when he could touch her, smell her long, gorgeous hair, feel her paws gripping his back, hear her breathing. He put a paw on her upper back and gripped her shoulder as one of her paws dug under his shirt and immediately came to rest over his scars.

“I missed you so much,” Kit breathed quietly, nuzzling her cheek and neck with the side of his muzzle.

“I missed you too,” she returned, pulling back just enough to give him a long, sensual, lingering, intimately passionate kiss.

It was heaven...until a polite cough behind Jessie reminded both of them they weren't alone.

Jessie's cheeks ruffled as she let go of him and snuggled under his left arm, then she giggled ruefully. Behind Jessie was a rather short, slender male cat, middle aged, with crème colored fur and a slightly darker patch over his face, almost like a Siamese but not quite, wearing a heavy tan coat and a pair of dark slacks. He was wearing boots as well. Kit had seen a picture of this cat...it was John Williams, Jessie's father.

"Mister Williams, it's good to finally meet you," Kit said, offering his paw to the small cat.

"Please, call me John," he smiled, taking Kit's paw in a firm grip. "How was the flight?"

"Rough," he replied. "And long."

"Well, you're here now, even if you're a little late," John chuckled, and they started out, Kit and Jessie walking arm in arm beside her father. "You might want to consider calling your boss and warning him you might be late getting back," he cautioned. "They're saying we might get up to six inches of snow by tomorrow night, and you can imagine how that's going to snarl things."

"That's not a pleasant thought, but if it buys me more time with Jessie, I'll take it."

"Sitting in an airport waiting is never fun," John chuckled.

They had to all but swim through a sea of other furs as they made their way down the terminal, but when everyone else went to baggage claim, they managed to break free of the pack and get into a little less crowded surroundings. Kit really didn't care now, all he could feel or think about was Jessie, walking along with him, her tail coiling around his own tail playfully as they walked. He did start to care, though, when they got outside. It was biting cold, and all he'd brought was a windbreaker and a pair of winter shoes. Jessie snuggled up to him as John led them along streetlit sidewalks to a large parking lot, and then through most of it to reach a Chevy Impala parked near a parking garage. John opened the passenger side door for him, and there was a momentary confusion on just how they were going to do this. Jessie wouldn't let go of his paw, urging him to the back seat so they could sit together, but he kissed her on the cheek and urged her into the front seat. Kit got into the back, sitting behind Jessie, and he immediately leaned forward and reached over the seat to put a paw on her shoulder. "Hannah mentioned that you're going to a conference this weekend?"

"Oho, you call me 'Mister Williams,' but you call my wife Hannah?" he asked with a slight smile as he backed out of the space.

Kit chuckled. "Well, she gave me permission to call her that a while ago, in our letters."

"You know, I was very impressed by those letters," John told him as Jessie turned on the heater. "You're a fairly good writer, Kit. You did a good job explaining how you feel."

"Thanks. They didn't do much good, though."

"Oh, they did a lot of good," John chuckled. "Now, Hannah doesn't absolutely hate you, she just dislikes you."

Kit laughed. "Well, I'll take what I can get. I hope she doesn't give me the third degree tonight. I'm kinda tired."

“No, I think she’s saving that until tomorrow. Right now, she’s in a huff.” Jessie laughed, and John gave her a sharp look. “That’s enough of that, young lady,” he warned. “I think you did that on purpose.”

“Did what?”

“Jessie and Hannah had a very heated argument over your sleeping arrangements.”

Kit sighed. “Pretty kitty, I warned you—“

“I will not spend another night alone, and definitely not when you’re in the same house!” she protested. “Mom can put our video camera in the room to make sure we behave, but you will be sleeping in my room.”

“Oh, wonderful,” Kit sighed. He wasn’t even there yet, and already Jessie had managed to put him on the wrong foot with Hannah.

“I was saying about the same thing,” John said. “Jessie doesn’t seem to understand that these fights with her mother don’t just inconvenience her. I’m the one that has to listen to Hannah storm over it for hours afterwards.”

“Mom needs to understand that I’m an adult, Dad,” she challenged.

“Kitten, intentionally rubbing your mother’s nose in her perceived failure is not a mature act,” he said patiently.

“Well if she wants to treat me like a kid, I’ll be one when it annoys her,” Jessie said sternly.

“And that’s what we’ve been dealing with since Jessie got home,” John sighed, glancing back at him as they got on an interstate.

“I know, Jessie’s told me about it, and the letter Hannah sent on Tuesday wasn’t like her. She was much more annoyed than usual.”

“They’ve been fighting like their tails were tied together,” John lamented.

“You’re not going to make this easy on me, are you love?” Kit asked with a rueful chuckle.

“I’ve been trying to be civil, Kit,” she said. “But Mom’s been relentless.”

“I’d have to agree with Jessica,” John added. “Her mother has been the one starting the fights. She’s been after her since the minute she got off the plane.”

“Well, then I have an idea of what kind of reception I’m going to get,” he predicted.

“No, I think you’ll be rather surprised,” John said with a chuckle. “Hannah’s gotten it into her head that you’ll do whatever Jessica wants, so she’s focusing all her efforts on convincing Jessica to call off the wedding.”

“Which will never happen,” Jessie said adamantly.

“Which I wouldn’t allow either,” Kit agreed. “I got my ring on her, and she’s going to follow through. Even if I have to drag her down the aisle. A Vulpan never lets someone back out of a deal.”

Jessie laughed, and John gave him a sudden look, both surprised and amused. “I could see that. A shotgun wedding, just with the shotgun trained on the bride instead of the groom.”

“You don’t let a femme like Jessie get away, John. It’d be monumentally stupid. I may get annoyed with Hannah, but the one thing I can thank you and her for is raising the most perfect femme in the world.”

“Aww, you’re so sweet,” Jessie said, looking back at him with a loving smile.

“I’m not so sure I could call Jessica perfect,” John chuckled, “but I do have to admit that she wasn’t a complete disappointment.”

“Dad!” Jessie protested.

The Williams house was inside Cincinnati, near the eastern city limit, on a pleasant little street surrounded by middle class homes, and a little store and restaurant sitting on the corner of their block. They had a two story house of no particular design Kit could identify, painted what looked like a yellow in the illumination of the streetlight on the street before it, and shrubs flanking the walkway leading to the front door. It had a driveway on the left side that went back behind the house, where there was a detached garage on the edge of the back yard, behind a large paved area where cars could park or turn around without having to back all the way down to the street. There was a basketball hoop hanging over the garage door back there, he noticed through a thickening snowfall.

“Strange weather,” John said as he stopped the car on that pad. Kit saw that there was a back door hidden just behind the back corner of the house, with a light turned on over it. “I can’t remember the last time we had a white Thanksgiving.”

“I’m kinda used to snow,” Kit said as he opened the door and got out, dragging his carry-on by the strap and then slinging it over his shoulder. “We get enough of it in Massachusetts.”

“Well, Kit, this is your last chance to run,” John said with a grin. “Once we open that door, you’re committed.”

“The path to the altar is through that door, John,” he said simply. “I’m ready.”

John chuckled and urged him to follow.

The door opened into a laundry room of sorts, with the washer and dryer on the right and a window and narrow table on the left. “Leave your shoes here,” he said as he kicked off his own shoes, setting them under the narrow table. Kit took off the winter shoes he’d bought for the trip up and set them neatly under the table himself, and steadied Jessie as she struggled to take off her boots. After they were unshoed, John led them into a very large kitchen, with a counter in the center that had pans and utensils hanging off a rack suspended from the ceiling. They had a huge stove, with six burners rather than four, and a large stainless steel paneled refrigerator sitting beside a vertical stand-alone freezer. A microwave and toaster oven stood on the far counter, next to a coffee maker, sitting by a small door that led to what was probably a pantry. There were two doorways across the kitchen, one facing them that led into a dining room that had shutters to hide the kitchen from it, and another on the right wall that was an open archway. A tall male came into the kitchen through the open archway on the other side of the counter. He was a very muscular young male, wearing a muscle shirt that showed off his wide shoulders and corded arms, who had cream-colored fur with a dark patch spread on his right shoulder, under his shirt. “Heya, you must be Kit,” he said, coming around the counter and offering his paw. “I’m Ben, Jessie’s little brother.”

“Only by age,” Kit chuckled as he shook Ben’s paw.

“I’m the outcast in the family,” he grinned.

“I still say you were switched at birth, son,” John grinned at him. “I don’t know where he got his height from. Certainly not his parents.”

“Where’s your mother?”

“Upstairs, fussing at Jenny,” he answered, going to the refrigerator and taking out a V-8. “Mom! Jenny! They’re back!” Ben shouted as he went into the next room.

Kit clearly heard the feet pattering on the ceiling, hurrying across it, then the footsteps were on the stairs across the living room. It was definitely the living room of a family, with two chairs in the middle of the floor and a pair of couches flanking them, creating an enclosed space of sorts that encapsulated the TV. There was a piano on the far end of the living room, behind one of the couches, near the stairs. There were pictures everywhere, pictures of the kids and family on tables, in a curio cabinet, on top of the entertainment center, and hanging on the walls. Two sets of feet appeared on the stairs, and as they came down, Kit got his first good look at the rest of Jessie’s family.

The first one down was a little carbon copy of Jessie. She was a touch shorter and her chest was a little flatter, but the resemblance between Jessie and this, which had to be her sister, was profound. She looked just like her sister, except her eyes were amber where Jessie’s eyes were blue. They had the same cream-colored fur as their father, but the younger sister lacked the fox-like markings that Jessie had. She did, however, have a longhaired tail, like her sister, and she had a dark band of fur on her face right over her eyes, almost looking like a mask, which Kit thought looked rather attractive. She was wearing a half-shirt tank top and a pair of jeans with holes worn through them.

The other femme was undeniably Hannah. She was a shorter, more mature version of Jessie, with the same basic facial structure, and she had interesting fur. She had black-tipped ears and tawny, golden colored fur and hair, but just like Kit and other foxes, the sides and underside of her muzzle, as well as the lower half of her face and front of her neck, was white. The boundary between tawny and white fur was very defined and striking. That white streak went down her neck and vanished under her blouse. Her tail was not longhaired, but she had the similar color patterns of a fox at the tip, going from tawny to white to black at the very tip, just like Kit's own tail; the three-colored tail was another Vulpan family trait. Outside of those three features, nobody could look at Hannah and believe that she was half fox. She looked all cat, having only inherited cosmetic fur coloration patterns from her fox parent.

“Well, it's nice to meet you face to face, Kit,” Hannah told him in a surprisingly warm voice, reaching her paw out to him. He took it and shook it warmly.

“I'm glad to be here,” he said.

“I'm sure that opinion will change,” she said with a serious look, which made him chuckle.

“Hi, I'm Jenny,” Jessie's sister said brightly, nudging her mother out of the way and taking Kit's paw between hers. “Jessie wasn't kidding, you really are handsome!” she announced.

“Well, thanks,” Kit said mildly. “But I'm taken.”

Jenny gave him a wild look, then laughed. “Maybe if I'm lucky, you'll have that sisters fantasy.”

“Jennifer Ophelia Williams!” Hannah snapped in shock and outrage, which just made Jenny explode into laughter. That earned her a smack on the bottom from her mother.

“I’m just kidding, Mom, sheesh!” she protested.

“You don’t make jokes like that!” Hannah said hotly.

“It’s alright, Hannah, Jessie warned me about Jenny already,” Kit said calmly.

“Oh? And what did she warn you about?” Jenny asked.

“That,” he chuckled, tugging a little on his bag.

“Let me take you up so you can drop off your bag, love,” Jessie said, taking his paw. That statement got Jessie a white-hot look of anger from Hannah, but Jessie simply stepped past her mother and led him towards the stairs. “We’ll be right back down,” she announced.

Hannah looked about to follow them up, but John put a paw on her elbow and stayed her.

Kit followed Jessie upstairs and to the first door on the right. Within was the room he’d seen through the computer, with the teenager’s posters and the collection of unicorn figurines on the far dresser. “Well, here it is,” she said. “Just drop your bag anywhere, love. Go ahead and test the bed.”

He nodded, setting his bag on the floor and sitting on the bed, then leaning back on it. It felt a little soft, but it didn’t feel all that bad on the average. “I don’t think it’s going to be that bad,” he told her. “A little on the soft side, but I think I can manage it.”

“Manage what?” Hannah asked, standing in the doorway, and her tone was not friendly.

“I told you mother, Kit has a bad back,” Jessie said, rather belligerently. “He can’t sleep on something that’s too soft, or he’s in a lot of pain the next day. That’s only one of the reasons why he’s not sleeping on the couch. He wouldn’t be able to move in the morning!”

“He can sleep in one of the other kids’ beds and they can sleep on the couch.”

“We’re not having this argument again, mother,” Jessie said in a steely tone. “If you don’t recall, we already live together. I’m not going to sleep separate from him under the same roof!”

“Jessie,” Kit warned. “Hannah. I can appreciate your position, but please understand that I’d like to sleep in here. I haven’t had more than three hours of sleep since Jessie came back here, because I got so used to her sleeping beside me. We’ll leave the door open, you can put a camera in here, but please allow us this one indulgence. It’s the only thing I’ll ask you for while I’m here.”

Hannah gave him a long, searching look, then sighed and nodded. “I don’t like it, but I’ll bend on this, at least this time. You do look a little exhausted.”

“You have no idea,” he said wearily. “I haven’t got much sleep, and it’s been a very long day.”

“Well, come down and at least chat for a little while, then you can get some sleep,” she told him.

After they came back downstairs, they did just that. Kit chatted amiably with Jessie's family, getting to know them. They told him about their work, their schools. Ben told him about his football career and his hopes he'd get a scholarship offer from a good school, and Jenny told him about Ohio State and her plans to become a nurse. Kit reciprocated by telling them about his job in Austin, and then, after Jenny pressed him on it, told them about his trip across the eastern half of America as a wandering laborer. "It certainly wasn't all fun and games, but I met quite a few very interesting people, and learned a great deal," he summarized after the tale ended with Austin.

"I'd imagine there's no end of homeless bums and riffraff in places like that," Hannah said.

"Well, yes, but some of them were very interesting people. You'd be surprised at how some of them ended up where they did. Most got there through bad luck, but some of them were like me, there by choice."

"Who would choose a life like that?" she asked.

"You'd be surprised," he said. "I met a fellow who had a doctorate in physics in a homeless shelter in Montgomery, Alabama."

"No way! A Doctorate?" Jenny gasped.

"He showed it to me," he chuckled in reply. "When I asked him why he was standing in a soup line, he answered that he realized that living life in society was living a lie, and giving it all up freed his mind from the distractions of trying to live life by stupid rules that made no sense and just bogged his mind down on frivolous concerns. So he gave it all up. He'd sit outside on the steps and just think, for hours at a time. Just sit there and think. Sometimes the others would sit there and watch him, like it was some kind of spectator sport,” he said, which made Jenny giggle. “The first time I saw him do it, when he finally did move, I asked him what he was thinking about. He answered that he was thinking about what his wife would do to him if she found him.”

That made all of them, even Hannah, explode into laughter.

“The others said they always thought he was sitting there thinking about physics, you know, solving the mysteries of the universe. I guess sometimes he was, but not that day. He told me later that my arrival made him think of the life he gave up, since I was kinda doing the same thing as him. Sometimes I think I’d like to find him and see how he’s doing. He was a very, very interesting guy.”

“Uh, Kit, mind a personal question?” Jenny asked.

“If it involves me taking off my clothes, yes,” he answered.

She giggled. “Jessie told us about the lawsuit. Why don’t you go after your fair share of the money?”

He looked at Jenny steadily. “It’s not something I can easily explain unless you know what it’s like to be rich, Jenny. But the best way I can explain it is this. Money in moderation is a good thing, but when you reach a certain point, money becomes a curse. Money destroyed my family, Jenny. My family isn’t a family. It’s a collection of shallow, vain, hateful, greedy people bound together by money and our family name. Money and power is all they care about. They’ve forgotten what it’s like to be happy. They think money is happiness, and I won’t ever allow myself to become like them. I want no part of that. This is happiness, Jenny,” he said, motioning around himself. “A house full of a family that loves and cares about each other. It's the one thing I wish I had, but all I had was money. Can you understand that?"

"I guess I can, in a way, but it seems a little strange."

He found himself yawning, and covered his maw with his paw.

"Excuse me. I think it might be about time for me to go to bed. I had a very long day."

"Understandable. It was a madhouse at the airport," John chuckled.

Jessie stood up deliberately. "I think I'll go ahead and turn in myself."

Hannah gave Jessie a hard stare, but nodded. "Keep the door open," she ordered.

"We will. Goodnight everyone, see you in the morning."

They said goodnight in return, and Jessie led Kit upstairs and into her old room. "Bathroom's down at the end of the hall," she said before he even asked.

They gathered together into the bathroom and brushed their teeth together, then returned to her bedroom. Jessie closed the door to change clothes while Kit unpacked his carry-on, setting his laptop on her desk beside her own and stacking the few clothes he brought with him on top of it. He was setting out a fresh pair of underwear and a shirt when the door banged open suddenly, startling him. "I told you to—" Hannah snapped, but came up short when Jessie gave out a startled cry and snatched at her bedspread, clutching it to her naked body.

"Mother!" Jessie gasped. "Do you mind?"

"I do mind if you're in here naked with him!" she snapped.

“Mother,” Jessie said in a deceptively low voice. “He’s seen every part of me, from every angle, and every distance,” she said rather bluntly. “We sleep naked, he couldn’t possibly miss it.”

The graphic visual a statement like that could induce played across Hannah’s face. She looked outraged, then embarrassed, then a little sheepish. Then her eyes hardened, and she pointed at her daughter. “I’ll not have that going on in my house!” she warned. “I was willing to bend on this outrageous idea to keep the peace, but if you’re sleeping in that bed together, you’re wearing something!”

“Hannah,” John said, coming up behind her and putting a paw on her arm. “You’re being a touch silly, dear. You can’t change it, and forbidding it now doesn’t change the fact that it’s already happened, and will keep on happening when they go home. Leave them be.”

“John, you can’t be serious!”

“I’m quite serious. Now leave them alone. And for Pete’s sake, close the door.”

Hannah seemed torn for a moment, looking between Kit, who was still dressed, and Jessie, who was nude behind the bed, covering herself with the bedspread, then blew out her breath and gave them a long, flinty look. “There’d better not be any foolishness in here,” she threatened.

“Mother,” Jessie said calmly, “if I decide I want to have sex—“

“Jess,” Kit warned in an authoritative tone. That startled Jessie a little; she almost never heard him speak that way. “Stop baiting your mother. It’s rude.”

“She started it!” she protested. “She’s treating us like children!”

“This is her house,” Kit told her simply. “Now be grateful for what she gives us, instead of trying to take the whole mile.”

Hannah gave Kit a long, searching look, then nodded. “I’m glad at least one of you has some manners,” she declared. “Good night. Sleep well.”

“Good night, Hannah, John. And thanks again.”

“Any time, Kit, any time,” John said from behind the wall, and Hannah reached in and grabbed the door, then closed it.

Jessie growled in her throat and dropped the bedspread. “Now do you see what I’ve been dealing with all week?” she demanded.

“And how many times did you goad your mother into it?” he asked simply as he pulled off his shirt.

“Well a few, but she’s been hounding me since the moment I got off the plane,” she admitted, pulling the covers down.

Kit shed the rest of his clothes and climbed into bed. Jessie slid in with him and turned off the light, then snuggled down into his arms. “Hi there, Mister Vulpan,” she said in a purring, loving tone.

“Well hello there, future Misses Vulpan, fancy meeting you here,” he returned, putting his nose right against hers on the pillows. She inched closer and gave him a long, sensual, tender kiss, filled with the longing of five days of separation, her paws encircling him as she kissed him with gentle love and tenderness, a kiss that celebrated their reunion more than an invitation to make love. He felt quite overwhelmed by her sensual kiss, surrendering to it and to her, then she sighed and snuggled against his chest.

“My, what a welcome,” he said breathlessly. “I’m glad I was already laying down or you’d be picking me up off the floor.”

She giggled. “You know something?”

“What?”

“Right now, I’ll take a good night’s sleep over ticking off Mom by making love.”

He laughed helplessly and nuzzled her. “I’m glad I’m not the only one who was thinking that. Finally, a good night’s sleep,” he said with dreamy contentment.

“Mmmm,” she hummed in agreement, and fell asleep within a matter of seconds.

Kit was just behind her. It wasn’t home, it wasn’t their bed, but she was there. Her warmth comforted him, the smell of her hair and fur soothed him, and the sound of her breathing was like the sweetest music in his ears. Days of frustration trying to fall asleep melted away with her touch, with touching her, and the accumulated sleep deprivation tugged at his consciousness like an anchor. Reunited with her, he was able to drift into gentle, restful sleep in a matter of moments.

Hannah was up early...but then again, she always was. John himself was usually up quite early because of his job, but he did like to indulge in the occasional late morning on holidays. But she was being a little silly, in his opinion. Since five in the morning, Hannah would creep up to Jessica’s door and listen intently, then creep away, every five or so minutes.

It was a surprise to John that Hannah gave in on the matter. Jessica was an adult, and though John personally wished she'd wait to get married until after she finished school, he wasn't opposed to the idea of it. Then again, his opposition to the idea stemmed on the chance that it might disrupt her school, but she seemed to have settled into a domestic life with Kit without her grades suffering, and, well, them marrying now was a simple technicality. They lived together, shared the same bed, and that was the aspect of married life that John feared would interfere with her schoolwork. But he'd been wrong about that, and he could admit it. John could see now that Kit's sister had been right. Kit was good for Jessica, just as Jessica was good for Kit. He kept her on track to get her degree, was just as adamant about it as they were, and Jessica filled a need in Kit, a desperate need to be part of a loving relationship, filling the void in him left when his family deserted him.

Vilene was not kidding when she said that she knew her brother. John had read all the letters Kit had sent Hannah, so he had a very good understanding of the young male now. At first glance, one might think that shy Jessica was the one that was hanging onto Kit, attached to him, but it was the other way around. Kit was almost slavishly devoted to Jessica, a powerful bond that, thankfully, seemed to go both ways. Jessica adored Kit, loved him deeply, and from what he'd seen, seemed to come out of her shell with him. He'd always been worried that his shy yet stubborn daughter wouldn't be able to find her own voice, would just accept her husband's wishes, and then her stubbornness would poison the marriage as she resented his perceived control over her. But it wasn't like that at all with them. In just one evening, he saw that Jessica was utterly comfortable with Kit, and what was most important to him, she was just as willing to give Kit orders as she was to take them from him. John was amazed that Jessica had stood her ground against her mother over having Kit sleep in her room, for she usually avoided conflict. For that matter, John had been perpetually surprised by his daughter since she told them about him. Kit seemed to bring the strength out in her, gently causing her to come out of her shell and be herself, be the adult femme that was hiding within the shy girl who had left home with a suitcase and trembling paws. Vilenne had been right. Kit was what was best for Jessica, even as Jessica was what was best for Kit.

They were a perfect match.

Now, if only Hannah could admit it to herself. John knew his lovely wife, knew that despite her flaws, she was a beautiful femme who he still loved just as passionately as he did when they first met. Hannah didn't want to admit to herself that Kit was the right male for Jessica, which was becoming harder and harder for her. Kit's letters had moved Hannah. That boy had worked miracles when he started sending those letters, letting Hannah get to know him in a passive, non-confrontational matter, and he'd caught her humming to herself when she re-read letters he'd sent to her weeks ago. Hannah liked Kit. She really did. But she still was adamantly opposed to the marriage, because she still feared that he would abandon Jessica when the fire faded from their relationship...which was its own little problem, he could see. Hannah wanted to get to know the boy in person, she wanted to be nice to him, but she was afraid to do it, afraid that she would get burned along with Jessica if Kit left their daughter. She wanted to get to know him, find out how much of those letters were carefully prepared and how much of it was the true him, but the spectre of her father kept getting in the way. Kit's main task here, he could see, would be showing Hannah he was not her father, but that would be an uphill battle. Kit's family was very odd and unpleasant, but to Hannah, Kit had left them, and that made him look unreliable in her eyes. Hannah was devoted to her family, almost obsessively so, and Kit's abandonment of his own family, no matter how much they deserved it, was a mark against him.

And yet, even with that black mark, Hannah still was inclined to like the boy. So did John.

Hannah was there again when John got out of the shower, her ear pressed up against Jessica's door, listening intently. John went past the door to their bedroom and came up to her, and tapped her on the shoulder. "Dear, leave them alone," he whispered.

Hannah was about to say something, but a very faint, muffled sound came out from under the door, and Hannah's eyes went wide. She grabbed the doorknob and opened the door a crack, and John couldn't resist peeking inside himself, looking over his shorter wife.

They were still asleep. Whatever sound John had heard had to be some dream-induced mumble. Kit was laying on his stomach, left paw tucked under the pillow, and Jessica was crowded up against his side with her arm thrown over him, her paw gripping his shoulder. John felt his cheeks ruffle a bit when he realized that Jessica was nude, at least from the waist up, since the covers were only covering them to that point. Thank goodness he couldn't see anything, Jessica's arm and Kit's body were quite conveniently covering what John shouldn't see. It was just the realization that his shy, modest daughter, who triplechecked to make sure she locked the door when she took a shower, was topless and uncovered that got to him.

John urged Hannah to close the door. "Come on, dear, just let them be," he whispered again.

“I don’t want any foolishness going on in there!” she hissed in a low tone.

“Hannah, dear, you’re guarding the back door with the front door wide open,” he told her, putting his paw on her arm and gently yet firmly pulling her from the door. “Admit it, dear. They’re already at that point. Stopping them means nothing when they go home. And they’ll be married in less than a month.”

“Don’t remind me!” she sighed as they went downstairs.

“Answer me one question, dear.”

“What?”

“When they send you pictures of the wedding, what will you do with them?”

Hannah was quiet a long moment as they went down to the kitchen, then she laughed ruefully. “I, I have no idea. I’m still debating if I should object at the wedding.”

“If you do that, Jessica will never forgive you,” he warned.

“I know,” she all but groaned. “Do you have any idea how it feels, John? I can’t object or I’ll lose my daughter, but what she’s doing is the biggest mistake of her life!”

“Then you have two choices, dear. You can live up to the title of Momzilla, or you can do what you can to make sure Jessica has a welcoming shoulder when she needs it.”

“There’s a third option, John. Jessica sees the light and doesn’t go through with it.”

“That’s just wishful thinking, dear,” John sighed as he started the coffee. “Jessica is committed to going through with this marriage. So is Kit.”

“He’s committed now,” she said scathingly. “What about in a year, when our daughter has a baby and can’t go to school, and he finds some other female?”

“Dear, that’s a risk all furs take when they get married. Jessica and Kit are no different. We just have to support them as best we can.”

“We never took that risk!”

“Dear, we’re not special. The reason we endured is because we love each other.”

“But how do we know Kit loves her, or if it’s just a flame that’ll die out with the first stiff breeze?”

“That, my dear love, is the chance we all take. Who’s to say that your flame doesn’t blow out tomorrow?”

“Oh, be serious, dear,” she laughed ruefully. “The only way you’ll pry me off is with a crowbar.”

“But who’s to say?”

“You’re being ridiculous. We’ve been married for twenty-three years, John, but Jessica and Kit haven’t even known each other for four months!”

“So, you admit that if they’d known each other longer, you wouldn’t be half as opposed to this marriage?”

“Well, yes, of course,” she admitted. “They’re jumping into this entirely too fast, John! How do we know Kit will be faithful to Jessica?”

“Well, dear, how do we know Jessica will be faithful to Kit?”

“She’d better be!” Hannah said sternly as she got out eggs and bacon from the refrigerator. “I didn’t raise her to be a tramp!”

“Would you two give it a rest?” Jenny complained as she came into the kitchen. She was wearing a nightshirt that came down to her thighs that had a red star on the front.

“Go back upstairs and put on proper clothes, young lady!” Hannah barked at her, pointing to the archway. “You’ll not walk around half naked when we have a guest in this house!”

“They’re asleep, and I’m not worried about it,” Jenny shrugged, getting a bottle of water out of the refrigerator. In a bit of rubbing it in, Jennifer flicked her tail at her mother as she padded out of the kitchen, which exposed her panties. In Ohio, a tail flick like that one was considered a rude gesture among the younger generation, a snub while walking away, and though Hannah was an older femme, she was worldly enough to understand its meaning.

“Jennifer Ophelia Williams!” Hannah shouted, storming off after her daughter, who had bolted for the stairs as soon as she got into the living room.

John had to laugh. Where Jessica was shy, Jennifer was anything but. She was a very extroverted girl, social and chatty, who had lots of friends in high school and ran with the popular crowd. That had been quite a trial for Hannah, for Jessica had been a model student in school and, which very pretty, was too shy to be part of the “in” crowd. She had quite a few friends, but they weren’t the kinds of friends that Hannah worried would steer Jessica down the wrong path. Jennifer was the exact opposite. Hannah thought she was going to have the same easy time with Jennifer she did with Jessica, but Jennifer was a complete pawful.

Well, this day was already shaping up to be quite interesting.

Kit was startled awake by the sound of yelling.

It took him a minute to remember where he was, in that groggy half-asleep world, then, when he heard a door slam, he heard Hannah's voice shouting, then her heavy footsteps stormed past the closed door. He opened his eyes and saw a wall of posters of pop singers, and realized he was in Jessie's room. He felt her pressed up against him, her arm on his back, and she shifted, her claws digging into his shoulder. "Is it morning?" she asked blearily.

"I don't know," Kit answered in a fuzzy voice. "Let's go back to sleep until we're sure."

"Mmmph, now I gotta pee," she complained, climbing out of bed. He rolled over onto his side and felt his back protest, aching from the unfamiliar mattress. He saw her pull on a nightshirt and then go out the door. He dozed off, and woke back up when she climbed back into bed. She pulled the nightshirt back off and tossed it aside, then burrowed into his arms and snuggled against him. "Mmm, back okay?"

"A little sore, but not bad," he answered, closing his eyes.

"Mmmm," she hummed, and was asleep again.

Kit tried to go back to sleep, but the sounds outside the door told him it was morning. Too many people were up and about, and now that he was awake, the nagging ache in his back was keeping him from falling asleep. He laid there, though, and allowed Jessie to fully fall back into sleep. Besides, he was enjoying the feel of her nestled against him. He waited a goodly while, and then slowly and carefully started extricating himself from her. There was a moment where she dug her claws in to prevent him from moving, a habit she had, and he had to be careful not to get scratched up as he disengaged her claws. He finally got untangled from her without waking her, dressed while sitting in the chair by her desk, and meandered out of her room with a paw on his back. After relieving himself, he went downstairs, and found Hannah and John up and about. Hannah was in the kitchen, doing dishes, while John was sitting in a chair in the living room. "Morning, Kit," he said pleasantly. "Sleep well?"

"A little too well," he said, putting both paws on his back. "Have any aspirin? Jessie's bed doesn't agree with me."

"You alright?"

"Fine, just achy. It's a sign of my old age," he said dryly, which made John laugh. "I slept like a log."

"There's some Tylenol in the medicine cabinet upstairs," John told him. "And coffee in the coffee pot."

"I'm a tea drinker, John. I'm from Boston," he chuckled.

"Jessie bought some tea yesterday. I guess she was thinking of you," he chuckled.

Kit first went and got Tylenol, then invaded the kitchen as Hannah finished up the dishes. "Good morning, Hannah," he said. "I promise, we behaved last night."

She actually chuckled. “Jessica bought you some tea,” she said. “In the pantry, second shelf on the left.”

Kit wandered into the pantry and found it, an opened box next to a half-empty box of Lipton teabags. It was Earl Grey, and was from Twinings, an international tea company that was pretty good, but a little expensive. Kit was fond of Earl Grey from time to time as a change of pace from regular tea, but he hadn’t had any since he left Boston. People outside of New England just couldn’t seem to get it right. He preferred Harmon and Sons, an upscale Connecticut tea company, when it came to exotic or flavored teas. Jessie had been drinking the Lipton, but had gone out and bought him a gourmet tea for his visit. That was rather thoughtful of her. “Hmm,” he said, coming out of the pantry with the box. “She bought Earl Grey.”

“What’s the difference?”

“Earl Grey is flavored tea,” he told her. “It has a citrus taste to it.”

“I hope you like it. Jessie spent a long time looking for it.”

“Oh, I’m fine with it,” he chuckled. “It’s just that she bought Twinings. That’s kinda expensive.”

“She took me to four different stores until she found that,” Hannah said, a bit sourly. She went to the kitchen window and looked out, then sighed. “Look at that.”

Kit came over and looked out, and saw the backyard blanketed in about five inches of snow. “John said that snow was rare for Cincinnati this time of year.”

“I’ve never seen this much snow this early, and I’ve lived in Ohio all my life,” she told him, then she glanced at him and seemed to bristle a little. “I do not approve of this marriage, Kit,” she stated flatly. “I think you’re going way too fast, and it’s bound to end in heartache and disaster.”

“Hannah, I understand your position,” he said honestly. “I think we’ve gone a little too fast myself sometimes. We’ve only known each other for three months, but...” he trailed off. “It’s hard to explain. I look at her, and I just know. You know?”

“No, I don’t,” she said calmly.

“After our first date, I was thinking about the engagement ring,” he admitted in a musing kind of way as he opened the tea package. Hannah took a kettle from a cabinet and started filling it with water. “I spent a month eating ramen noodles and walking to work to save up for it.”

“You should have waited!” she said sternly.

“I waited until I was sure I was stable enough to give Jessie a good home,” he answered calmly. “I wasn’t sure when I was going to propose to her, but after I was shot, it was a moot point. Did Jessie tell you what happened?”

“No, she’s been very tight-lipped about that.”

“Well, the short of it is, Hannah, she proposed to me.”

“What?” she asked in surprise.

“She beat me to it,” he chuckled. “She did it through the magazine where I work. I can show it to you. Anyway, after she did that, I gave her the ring and proposed to her properly.”

“I can’t believe that Jessica was the one that proposed. That’s a scandal!” Hannah said hotly. “A young lady doesn’t do something like that!”

“I think my injury scared her,” Kit said sagely. “After I was shot, she said she realized how transient life really is, and she didn’t want to wait, because who was to say if we’d still be here tomorrow?” He put the box down. “Show me where you keep your computer, Hannah. I’ll show you the drawing that Jeffrey did for Jessie that was her proposal.”

Hannah led him to a den on the far side of the dining room, where they kept their computer. Kit went to the magazine’s website, and brought up the proposal strip that Jeffrey had done. “This ran in our magazine right before I was released from the hospital. I had no idea they were doing it until I read it in the magazine.”

“My,” Hannah said, reading it over and over again.

“You said she didn’t tell you about when I got shot?”

“No, very little.”

“Hmm,” he said, as the kettle began to whistle in the kitchen. They returned to the kitchen, and Hannah offered him a teacup from the cupboard. “Thank you,” he said, then began making his tea. “I’m a little surprised. I would have thought she’d have told you about that.”

“All she really said was that you were shot, that it wasn’t bad, and you proposed to her after you got out of the hospital.”

“That was wrong of her,” he sighed. “I told her that I wanted you to understand the full truth, and that was hiding it.”

“Why? What’s going on?”

“The truth of it, Hannah, is someone tried to kill me,” he said honestly. “The leopard that shot me was a hitman. The cops still don’t know who hired him, and my sister’s trying to find out, but she hasn’t had any luck yet.”

“What do you mean? Why would someone try to kill you?”

“Your guess is as good as mine,” he shrugged. “I think it was one of my uncles, making it clear how much he objects to my relationship with Jessie. I told you in the letters, most of my family are rabid, fanatical purists. The only ones who aren’t are my sister and a few of my cousins. It would certainly be something they’d do.”

“Are you saying my daughter’s in danger because of you?” she asked in an intense tone.

“I’m not entirely sure. I can’t rule it out,” he admitted. “When I tried to explain it to Jessie, she just blew me off. She said that she won’t let them scare her away.” He picked up the teacup and dipped the teabag into the water over and over. “My pretty kitty’s quite adamant about it, Hannah. She’s made it clear that she won’t let anything come between us. Not even my family. I swear, she’s ten times braver than me,” he chuckled. “She beat my fear of my family out of me in about a week. When she made it clear to me that I had to get over my family to be with her, that motivated me. It’s amazing what you can do when someone dangles the right reward at the finish line.”

“I’m a little shocked, Kit,” Hannah said seriously.

“There’s not much I can say in my defense, Hannah,” he said honestly. “All I can say is Jessie understands the situation, and it doesn’t seem to bother her. But she should have told you the truth. She shouldn’t have hid it from you.” He leaned against the counter, feeling his back twitch a little. “All I can say is I’m sorry. I’ll have to have a little talk with her about that, I suppose.”

Hannah was quiet a long time, but didn’t leave the kitchen. Kit stayed, sipping at his tea, waiting for her to either say something or leave. He would make himself available, he wouldn’t hide or run away. “Are you sure that she’s safe?” she finally asked.

“I think we are. Vil went nuts after I was shot, and she’s had security guards watching over us since. They keep us safe in Austin, and Vil’s been putting Boston through the wringer to find who did it.”

“I’m really worried about this, Kit.”

“So am I. You think I sleep well at night knowing someone tried to have me killed? And what’s worse for me is that Jessie is close to it. I’ve always feared that my family would threaten my happiness, but I was very worried when—“ he blew out his breath. “But Jessie has a way of making me forget that. She always tells me that I’m worth the risk. How can I say no to her, Hannah? She means everything to me.” He sighed. “That’s my one weakness, I guess. I just can’t say no to her, ever. If I think it makes her happy, I can’t say no.” He chuckled ruefully. “I guess I’ll have to join Whipped Husbands Anonymous when we get married.”

Hannah actually laughed. “I’d rather you said no to her about this, Kit. I won’t lie about that. You’re too young and you haven’t known each other long enough to get married. It’s doomed to fail. I’m a little worried now even over that because of what you told me, but if you believe you can keep Jessie safe, well, I'll have to trust you on it."

Kit gave her a surprised look. "I thought you'd be a little more, well, vocal about it."

"I have to face the truth, Kit," she sighed. "You're going to get married, and if I try to stop it, I'll lose my daughter. She's very stubborn, and if she pushes me away, it'll take me years to get back to where she'll talk to me. All I can do is make it clear I object to this, then wait and watch."

"I'd rather you do more than that," Kit said simply. "I don't want you to feel that you're not part of our lives. You are. I don't want you to feel like I'm stealing your daughter. I don't want you to vanish after the wedding. I want you to visit, I want to visit you. I want to find out what a real family is like, not that insane mess that I thought was a family up in Boston."

"Well, I appreciate that, Kit," she told him as he took another sip of tea. "I guess I can see fit to invite you to Christmas."

"Hmm," he mused. "We're getting married on Friday the eighteenth, that puts Christmas on Friday. I'm not getting much in the way of time off. Vil's letting us stay at her condo in Florida for the weekend after the ceremony for a honeymoon. I guess we can do what I did, fly up on Thursday night and fly back on Saturday morning. I think Rick'll let me come in late on Saturday."

"You're welcome to."

"Thanks. I'd really like to be here for Christmas. It'll be the first one I've looked forward to since I was nine."

“How do you mean?”

“After Mom died, Christmas didn’t really mean anything to me. Dad left us to Clancy and a procession of nannies, so there wasn’t anything to it but gifts, and well, I was a rich kid. I had everything already. We either spent Christmas alone or with an uncle or aunt, who just tried to buy our favor with gifts, then took us to formal parties where all they ever did was tell us to sit up straight and be quiet while the adults talked. Over the years, it became just another day,” he shrugged. “Then after I was disowned, there wasn’t anything to celebrate.”

Hannah was silent. He glanced at her, and saw that she had a pensive, distant look on her face. He wondered what she was thinking.

“How is the tea?” she finally asked.

“Not bad,” he replied. “When you start cooking, would you like some help? I know my way around a kitchen.”

“Oh no, I’ll have no males in here interfering with dinner!” she declared. “You can watch football with the rest of them!”

“Football eh?”

“Yes, the Bengals are playing today,” she said, rolling her eyes.

“Oh yeah, John’s a Bengals fan,” Kit chuckled. “So, what’s on the menu?”

“Turkey, stuffing, green beans, mashed potatoes, potato salad, beets, salad, and pumpkin pie,” she answered. “If you’re hungry, we have cereal, eggs, bacon, sausage, and oatmeal.”

“I’m afraid I’m going to have to invade your kitchen a little,” he told her. “Jessie will be up soon, and I like to have a hot breakfast waiting for her.”

“Oh no, out!” she demanded, shooing him away. “This is my kitchen! What do you want?”

“I can cook it myself.”

“Not in my house you won’t!” she challenged.

Kit laughed. “Well, scrambled eggs, toast, and bacon then, please. Enough for two. Jessie never sleeps for long after I get up. I’ll make her tea.”

“I’d love to know how you got her hooked on tea,” Hannah chuckled.

“I guess cause it’s always there,” he shrugged as he made her a cup of Earl Grey. “I’m a tea junkie, Hannah. I drink it the way other people drink coffee. I’m glad she’s drinking it, it’s better for her than soda.”

Much as Kit predicted, Jessie came into the kitchen as Hannah was cooking her breakfast. She yawned, showing off her small yet sharp little canines, then leaned against him and kissed him on the cheek. “Mmmm, Morning,” she greeted. “Want some breakfast?”

“I’m cooking your breakfast right now,” Hannah told her. “Now out of my kitchen!”

“Here,” he said, handing her a cup of tea.

“Oooh, is this that fancy tea I bought for you? I wanted to try it,” she said as they evacuated the kitchen. They went into the living room, and as

John greeted his daughter, she sat down on the couch with him and tasted it. “Oh, this is good!” she declared, taking a bigger drink. “What kind is this?”

“Earl Grey,” Kit chuckled. “You didn’t even look at what you bought?”

She laughed. “I’d heard of it somewhere before, and when I saw the box, I thought you might like to try it. I thought it was some kind of brand, I didn’t realize it was flavored. It’s almost like those herbal teas.”

“Did you sleep well, Jessica?” John asked.

“Mmm,” she hummed with a nod. “For the first time since I got home. How’s your back, love?”

“I took some Tylenol, so it’s fine,” he answered. “I had a little talk with your mother, Jess. Why didn’t you tell her everything?”

She winced a little and set her cup down on the coffee table. “I couldn’t think of a way to break it to her without her going nuts,” she told him in an honest voice.

“Tell her what?” John asked.

As Jessie looked a little embarrassed, Kit explained the circumstances of him getting shot to him. He pulled no punches, but also made it clear that they were being well protected. “Vil has people watching over us at home, and she’s been taking Boston apart looking for whoever hired the hitman,” he concluded. “She knows the order came from Boston, but not who. I’m a little worried, and I’m sorry I brought this into my pretty kitty’s life, but there’s not much else I can really do.”

“Why didn’t you tell us this, Jessica?” John demanded.

“Because I thought you’d overreact,” she answered. “Vil has it all covered, and I’m not letting them scare me away from him. If we broke it off or I left him, it would just be letting them win. Well, I’m not going to let them win,” she stated bluntly, putting her paw on Kit’s knee. “Kit is worth the risk. I won’t let them break us up.”

“Well, that does explain one thing,” John chuckled, taking a drink of his coffee. “I was a little surprised you were so willing to stand up to your mother. Well, she’s not really all that scary compared to some other things, is she?”

Jessie giggled, leaning against Kit. “Not really,” she agreed. “I guess after nearly losing Kit, the idea of standing up to Mom didn’t seem all that intimidating.”

“I see,” he smiled.

Ben came downstairs, wearing nothing but a pair of shorts. Jessie’s brother was heavily built, but yet also sleek, the perfect physique for a running back. He was the perfect combination of power and agility, strength and speed. Ben had the body of a player who could fake a defender out of his shoes, then slam into the line and move it a good three yards before someone finally brought him down. “Morning,” he called. “Is mom making breakfast?”

“Not for lazyheads I’m not!” she shouted from the kitchen.

“Aww, come on, Mom, I’m a growing boy!”

“Well get in here and take out the trash, and I’ll think about putting something on for you,” she called.

“Sure,” he said, hurrying into the kitchen.

“Benjamin Franklin Williams!” she shouted in shock. “Go put some clothes on right now, young man! I’ll not have you gallivanting around this house all but naked when we have guests!”

“And so it goes,” John chuckled. “Jenny got a similar shout-down when she came down this morning.”

“Sheesh, it’s not like I’m wearing a G-string,” he protested as he came out of the kitchen.

“Ben!” Hannah snapped.

Ben did go up and get dressed, and Jenny came back down with him. Ben was wearing a tank top and sweatpants, and Jenny was wearing an Ohio State tee shirt and a pair of knee-length jeans. “Hey,” she called, flopping in the opposite couch. She picked up the remote and turned on the TV, and to his surprise, instead of turning it to MTV or something like that, she turned it to ESPN. “So, Kit, you a Bengals fan?” Jenny asked, which made John and Ben laugh.

“He’d better be or we’ll lynch him,” Ben said. “This is a Bengals house.”

“Afraid I’m a Patriots fan,” he admitted. “Growing up in Boston will do that to a guy.”

“Well, that’s a different division, so we’ll let you slide on that one,” John grinned. “If you were a Steelers or Browns fan, we might have had to do something to you.”

“Aren’t the Browns in your own state?”

“That just makes us hate them more,” John told him.

“And I thought Red Sox fans were the only ones that hated,” Kit laughed.

“Oh, were you in Boston when they finally won the World Series?” Ben asked.

Kit nodded. “The whole city seemed to shut down. I think they celebrated for weeks.”

Kit expected Ben to be into sports, but it blew him away that Jenny seemed to be the real sports nut in the family. She knew about every sport, and bantered with Kit over football, basketball, baseball, and even hockey, teasing him over the Boston Bruins’ inability to do much of anything for the last several years. Kit laughed when she said she was a Blackhawks fan. “You’re gonna make some guy very happy, Jenny, at least after he gets over being jealous that his wife knows more about sports than he does.”

“Blame him,” she said, pointing at her father. “He’s the one that dragged us to Bengal games wearing face paint.”

“You know, I’d have expected a little...more, from someone that into football,” Kit chuckled.

“You haven’t taken him downstairs?” Ben asked.

“I’m saving it for game time,” John said mildly.

“What’s downstairs?”

“You’ll see,” Ben laughed.

“Breakfast is ready,” Hannah called from the archway. “Come eat!”

Kit, Ben, and Jessie enjoyed breakfast in the dining room, as Hannah got after Jenny over something, and Kit got to know Ben. Ben was a very large male, strong and powerful, but he was also very modest and down to earth, and friendly. He was also very, very smart, who wanted to major in accounting in college. “Accounting?” Kit asked with a surprised chuckle.

“Why not? I’ve always been good with numbers. I think I’ll be a good accountant!”

“You won’t have much time to do any accounting if you make it into the NFL.”

“Yeah, well, first I have to make it, and second, I have to get there without tearing myself up. When Dad realized I was serious about football, he warned me I shouldn’t put all my eggs in that basket, and he’s right. I’m always just one bad play away from never playing in college. I want to play football more than anything, but it’s a rough sport, and I’d better be ready if I get hurt or I don’t make the cut. I have to have a plan B.”

“I know that feeling,” he sighed. “I wanted to go into the Air Force and fly planes, but when I was hit by that car, that ended that.”

“I’m sorry to hear about that,” Ben said compassionately.

“Eh, it led me to Jessie, so I won’t complain all that much. And I did get a pilot’s license out of the deal too,” he chuckled.

“Hate to sound sadistic, but I’m almost glad you were hit by that car, love,” Jessie told him. “If not for that, we’d never have met.”

“I guess there’s a silver lining in anything,” Kit said sagely. “But you have the right idea, Ben. Always keep Plan B ready in case something bad happens.”

After breakfast, Kit sat and talked more with Jessie's family as a whole, just basic chitchat that let him get to know them, and them him. Jenny was the middle wild child, with a cheeky disposition and an almost mean-spirited enjoyment out of outraging and angering her mother. She was a sports nut, but she was also very, very smart, and talked often about maybe switching over to premed instead of nursing school, but lamenting that that was a heck of a lot of money for her parents to try to put up with Jessie also being in college. It was more interesting to watch their parents interact with them, though. Hannah was definitely the authoritarian between the two, the one to give them orders and call them down when she thought they were being impertinent. John was very mild-mannered and unassuming, but Kit didn't miss that everyone in the family hopped when he said jump, including Hannah. But belligerence wasn't John's style, so he just let things go as they went and only put a word in when they went in a direction he didn't like.

But they didn't sit around in conversation for long. Hannah got up and announced that she had to start on Thanksgiving dinner, and Jenny wandered off to the den to use the computer for a while. Kit and Jessie spent some time with Ben and John, as the two of them told quite a few stories about Jessie, more than one of them making Jessie's face ruffle in a blush. She gave out a plaintive "Daaaad!" when he offered to show Kit Jessie's baby pictures.

"I'd love to," Kit said immediately.

"Kit, those pictures are embarrassing!" Jessie protested.

"Seeing you as a baby is embarrassing how?"

“Dad always shows the picture of me with no clothes on,” she told him.

Kit looked her up and down in a way that made Ben laugh and Jessie’s cheeks ruffle. “And what more will I see in the picture that I haven’t already seen?” he asked directly.

“Kit!” Jessie said with a gasp.

Her indignation didn’t last long, though. John retrieved quite a few photo albums, and they spent nearly two hours going through them. Kit got to see hundreds of pictures of Jessie’s family, around the house, on vacations, pictures of relatives and friends, pictures of their hold house and cars, even pictures of John and Hannah from when they lived in Columbus.

“Who is this?” Kit asked as he held up the album and pointed to a very, very old poor quality photo of a male fox and a dark-furred female cat standing in front of a car that must have been on the road in the fifties.

“Oh, that’s Hannah’s father,” John told him. “I’m sure that Jessica told you she’s mixed.”

He nodded, looking at Jessie. “So that’s your grandfather?”

“Yeah,” Jessie nodded. “I never met him, though. He died before I was born.”

“Which of these are your parents, John?” he asked.

“Oh, this one right here,” he said, turning the page and pointing to a pair of older cats, the cream-furred male wearing a suit and the gray-furred female in a tan dress, standing in front of a window. “This was taken on the day of our wedding.”

“Where do they live?”

“My father passed away six years ago,” he replied. “My mother lives with my brother Jim in Florida.”

“I’m sorry to hear that.”

“Thank you. I have two other brothers and a sister. Sam lives in Seattle, Susan lives in Phoenix, and Bob still lives in Columbus.”

“Wow, your family spread out.”

“Well, Sam went into the Navy after high school, and settled in Seattle when he retired two years ago. Susan got married, and her husband got a job for IBM, and they moved to Phoenix. I didn’t go far from Columbus,” he chuckled, “and Jim moved to Florida after he retired from the phone company. He works part-time down there for a phone company, and his wife retired from working for a county 911 organization to take a job as a disaster preparedness consultant for hurricanes down there.”

“Sounds like you had a full house.”

“Not for long. I’m the baby of the family, three years younger than Susan,” he chuckled. “Sam left for the Navy when I was eleven, and by the time I was in high school, they were all out of the house.”

“Dad, it’s pregame time!” Jenny called from the den.

“Already? My, where does the time go? Let’s go down to the Bengal Den,” he grinned.

John’s Bengal Den was a football fan’s dream. It took up most of the basement, and Bengal memorabilia was everywhere. Bengal posters, Bengal colors painted on the walls, complete with the stripes, pictures of Bengal players, even a Bengal carpet under a pair of couches covered Bengal upholstery covers. Those couches faced a huge theater-style television, one of the biggest he'd ever seen, part of an entertainment center that took up the entire basement wall.

“Wow,” Kit breathed, staring at it in wonder.

“Now this is suitable for watching a Bengals game,” John said grandly, motioning at the TV with his paw. “It’s not as good as being in the stadium, but it’s good enough.”

“This must have cost a fortune!” Kit marveled.

“I saved for it for two years,” John chuckled as Jenny and Ben took seats, and Jenny turned on that mammoth TV. “It took a long time to talk Hannah into it, at least until I promised to buy a home theater to go along with the TV so she can watch movies.”

“It’s great for watching porn,” Jenny noted with a wicked grin at her father. “They can hear the femmes screaming ‘yes!’ all the way down on Wilkerson Street.”

“That’ll do, young lady,” John said coolly.

“Jennifer! Jessica! Come up here!” Hannah called from the top of the stairs.

“Oh, here we go,” Jenny sighed. “Now comes the cooking lessons.”

“I wouldn’t mind a few,” Kit chuckled.

“Then I’ll pass them down when we get home,” Jessie winked as she got up.

“She lets you guys off easy, doesn’t she,” Kit mused as the two femmes went upstairs.

“No, we’ll have to do the cleanup after dinner,” Ben chuckled.

“It’s only fair,” Kit shrugged.

Kit was initiated into a Williams family ritual...football. They watched as the Cincinnati Bengals played the Detroit Lions in the first game of the Thanksgiving double-header, and Kit was submerged under an avalanche of enthusiasm and statistics. John knew every member of the team by name and number, and he spouted statistics and predictions throughout the game, yelling and screaming like he was in the stands with thousands of other fans. It was almost funny to see that small, slim, unassuming cat transform into this screaming wildfur, cheering his team on to ultimate victory.

Kit guessed everyone had a secret side to themselves that only came out in certain circumstances.

Hannah seemed to time dinner with the end of the game, for it was on the table and ready when it was over. They went upstairs and enjoyed one of the best meals Kit had ever eaten, paws down. Hannah was a fantastic cook, and she’d done herself proud with that meal. The turkey was cooked to perfection, the dressing was sumptuous, the beets delightful. Hannah blended spices in with the mashed potatoes, which made them taste exceptional, and when he was stuffed, she put a home-made from scratch pumpkin pie in front of them, and it was unbelievable. He stuffed himself so full he could barely move, and he wasn’t the only one.

“Oh my, you’ve outdone yourself this time, dear,” John said in sated satisfaction, patting his belly with both paws.

“Thank you, dear,” she said with a smile and a nod.

“You should try to impress Kit more often,” Jenny teased, then got up and hurried out of the dining room before Hannah could respond.

“We did our part, gentlefurs,” Hannah announced as she got up. “Now it’s your turn.”

“I hope you tivo’d the game for me, Dad!” Jenny called from the living room.

“Of course I did, silly!” John called back as he stood up. “Alright boys, let’s clean up.”

After the dishes were done and the dining room and kitchen were cleaned, Hannah quite deliberately came and got Kit, and took him into the den. She sat on the computer chair, he sat on a nearby ratty old recliner, and they talked. They talked for over three hours, as Hannah grilled him over everything he’d ever written in his letters, over and over, testing him, pressing him, trying to find out what he thought, what he felt. Kit had expected this, and he answered her honestly and completely. Everything he’d written in those letters was the truth, and that truth shone through as she heard in his voice the same emotion and information he’d conveyed through his letters. He watched her as he answered her questions, watched her eyes. He could see conflict there, and was starting to feel hopeful that he was changing her mind. Hannah’s good opinion of him mattered to him, because she was going to be his mother-in-law, and he also wanted to get to know someone like her and not feel like there was hostility between them.

After those three hours, he just couldn’t resist trying to breach the subject with her anymore. “I have a confession to make, Hannah,” he told her after she asked him for what had to be the tenth time about his plans to buy a house in Austin. He hoped to buy one, but that was going to take a while.

“What is that?”

“Well, I’d have to apologize for Jessie, really. She let something slip to me about you.”

“Let me guess,” she said, leaning back in her chair. “My past?”

“Some of it,” he admitted. “Remember that I’m a history major, so I was able to work the rest of it out myself. I learned about you in college, Hannah. I just couldn’t leave without telling you that. I promised you I’d be honest, and I couldn’t in good faith leave without being honest about that.”

“Well, I appreciate that,” she told him. “Is that why you’ve worked so hard to be nice to me? Because of who I am?”

“Well, it was more along the lines of I could understand your position a little better after I found out,” he answered. “It explained a great deal to me. I realized that where you came from was one of the big reasons why you’re so protective over Jessie, and I saw that I couldn’t really hate you for it.”

She gave him a long, searching look. “And you think I’m that transparent?” she asked pointedly, with a touch of hostility in her voice.

“No! Not at all,” he said quickly. “It’s just—well, hell. I knew I’d mess this up,” he sighed. “When I first heard about you from Jessie, I thought you were a little crazy,” he admitted. “Especially after you called the cops on Jessie because she wouldn’t talk to you on the phone.”

Hannah actually looked a little sheepish when he brought that up.

“But then, after Jessie accidentally told me who you were, I realized that everything you do has a reason,” he continued. “It wasn’t because you were crazy, it was because you had some pretty unpleasant things happen to you, and you just wanted to make sure that what happened to you didn’t happen to her. Once I saw that, well, I couldn’t really be angry with you. I just saw that I had to show you that I’m on your side. So I started writing you the letters, to show you who I am, prove that I’m not who you think I am. I don’t want to be on your bad side, Hannah,” he told her sincerely. “Not only because it will make Jessie unhappy, but because I think you’ve suffered enough.

“I know that I’m not the best choice you’d have made for a husband for Jessie, because of my past and my family, and the fact that my family makes any femme who goes out with me a possible target for the press, for my family, and embroils her in my own problems. That’s the last thing I want to have happen, but it’s something I can’t control, and for that much I apologize. But despite that, I just can’t help myself, Hannah. I love Jessie. I love her so much I didn’t think it was possible. When I first met her, I was afraid of my family, that they’d make trouble for me because I was going out with someone they didn’t approve of, but I overcame that fear enough to ask her out, and to make something of myself so she wouldn’t be embarrassed to be seen in public with me. Then, after we started falling in love, Jessie saw my fear and got me over it, got me to the point where I was willing to risk the wrath of my family to live my own life and go after the most beautiful femme in the world. I won’t give up on Jessie, don’t even ask me to do that, but all I can say is I understand why you object, and I’ll do my best to make sure I make her happy and ensure she never experiences the kinds of things that we did when we were kids.”

Hannah was silent for a long time. All Kit could do was sit there and wait for her to respond, his heart pounding in his chest the whole time. He'd just been as honest as he could have possibly been. He just told her everything, what he knew, why he wrote the letters, and admitted that keeping Jessie away from his problems may be impossible...but he had to be honest. She deserved to know the full, unclouded truth, and part of that truth was based on what he knew of her.

"I think I need some coffee," she said finally. Kit wasn't quite sure what to make of that; it was the second time she'd answered his honesty with a non-sequitor, dodging giving him an honest answer. "Why don't you go watch some TV? I'll bring out some ice cream for everyone."

Kit was being dismissed, but he was completely confused. Hannah gave no indication what she was thinking or what she had to say about his honesty. He wandered out into the living room and found only John there, who sent him down to the basement. Jessie and Jenny were watching a movie on the huge TV. Jessie patted the couch beside her, and he sat down and leaned far back, putting his paws on his face.

"Wow, she really gave you the third degree, didn't she?" Jenny asked.

"I felt like a prisoner of war," he said sourly, which made Jenny laugh.

"My poor handsome fox," Jessie said compassionately, pulling on him until he was laying with his head in her lap. She tousled and played with his hair as he tried to relax. "What happened?"

"She kept questioning me," he said. "I told her everything she wanted to know, and then she just left all the sudden without giving me any kind of indication of what she thought about it."

“Mom’s like that,” Jenny told him. “If she doesn’t want to answer you, or you’re winning the argument, she just hangs up on you or kicks you out or something like that. So, if she kicked you out, I think you scored some points on her,” Jenny grinned. “I’m glad. My sis found herself a cute guy, so I won’t mind looking at your wedding pictures at all.”

“Jenny, you’re talking about my fiancée,” Jessie warned.

“Hey, I can look as long as I don’t touch,” she said with a grin.

“Are you sure you’re from the same family?” Kit asked her.

Jenny laughed. “I know, we’re nothing alike, are we?” she said with a grin. “Jessie’s all shy and traditional and modest and crap, while I’m a proper child of the new millennium. Not a throwback to the fifties like her.”

“Jenny!” Jessie protested.

“No, you’re a throwback to an earlier time, Ophelia,” Kit said casually.

Jenny growled in her throat, then picked up a Bengals pillow and threw it at him. He just held out a paw and intercepted it, causing it to bounce off his paw and land on the coffee table. Jessie laughed, patting Kit on the shoulder.

“You’re one to talk, Desdemona!” Jenny challenged, then she crossed her arms and looked away pointedly. That made Kit laugh. “Sometimes I think I wanna beat Dad with a golf club for giving us those names.”

“At least he gave you different names. Every male in my entire family is named Kitstrom Vulpan,” Kit told her. “Uncles, cousins, all of them. The only things that are different are our middle names.”

Jenny laughed. "I bet that would be fun if you had cousins in your classes," she told him.

"I did. I went to private schools til I was sixteen," he related. "Four of my cousins were the same class as me, since I started school a year early and one of them started a year late."

"Ahh, that explains the math."

"Huh?"

"Well, Jessie told us all about you," she explained. "I couldn't figure out how you graduated at twenty-two when you lost an entire semester when you were hit by the car."

"I started college when I was seventeen," he answered. "And virtually all of my hours from my first major transferred to history when I changed, so I didn't lose a semester taking filler classes to satisfy the new major. I was able to focus on all my major requirement courses in my last year and graduate on time. I was taking seven and eight classes a semester in my last year, but I did it," he chuckled.

"I know that feeling. I take six classes a semester so I can graduate in four years. I'm still trying to decide if I want to go nursing or premed."

"Aren't you in nursing school?"

She nodded. "But all the classes I'm taking right now are for both," she said. "I figured I'd get the common ones done, so if I do decide to switch, I don't lose anything."

"Clever," Kit nodded in approval. "Why don't you go premed?"

“Cause it’s expensive,” she frowned. “And our folks are already putting Jessie through college. I don’t think they could afford it if I wanted to go premed. Hell, I stayed in state so they didn’t have to pay so much in tuition.”

“That sounded like a dig, Jenny,” Jessie said primly.

“A little one,” she grinned, holding up her thumb and finger a little apart. “But I don’t blame you for bolting, sissy, not one bit. Besides, with you in Texas, it keeps Momzilla too busy worrying about you to make my life hell,” she added with a grin.

“Sissy?” Kit asked mildly, looking up at Jessie from her lap.

She looked down at him, her cheeks ruffling a little. “That’s what we call each other,” she explained. “Ever since we were both little girls.”

“Hmm, so, I can call you a sissy, eh?”

“Jenny,” Jessie said, pointing. Jenny laughed, grabbed the pillow, then threw it to Jessie, who then used it to beat Kit about the head and shoulders. Kit laughed helplessly as he tried to protect himself with his paws and arms, until he ended up on his stomach with his face buried into the couch, arms over his head. Kit was laughing so hard he could barely breathe, kicking his feet against the end of the couch.

“Holy—“ Jenny’s voice called, then he felt strong paws come down on his lower back. He could tell almost immediately that they weren’t Jessie’s paws, he knew her touch as surely as he knew his own. Jessie stopped hitting him with the pillow, and he uncovered his head and looked back over his shoulder. Jenny was standing over them, leaning down, her paws on his bare back, bare from where he’d scooted down off Jessie’s lap and made his shirt ride up to expose his scars. “Why are they all white?” she asked, a finger tracing the scars in a manner similar to the way Jessie did it, just not as gently.

“The docs aren’t sure exactly,” he answered. “One of them thinks I had some kind of reaction to the cauterizing scalpel they used when they did the surgeries. Whatever it was, it made my fur grow back in white where they cut into me. Thank God that didn’t happen when they operated on my shoulder after I was shot. I have enough identifying marks as it is,” he said with a rueful chuckle.

“Yeah, that ear’s a dead giveaway,” Jenny agreed as her fingers probed his back boldly. “They put a screw in here, didn’t they?”

“Two,” he nodded. “They’re still in there. I have to carry around a medical waver with me when I get on planes,” he told her.

“I can feel one of them,” she told him, tapping his spine. “Right here.”

“That’s about where one of them is,” he nodded. “From what I was told, the other one’s on the other side.”

“Strange that they left them in there.”

“The doctors felt leaving them in was best,” he said.

“Does it ever hurt?”

“Only when I sleep the wrong way, or when I’m hit in the back the wrong way,” he answered. “I don’t have any pain outside of that.”

“Well, that’s good,” Jenny said, her paws pushing into his back slightly.

“Uh, Jenny. Wanna get your paws off my fiancée now?” Jessie asked in a slightly dangerous tone.

Jenny laughed, removing her paws. “I never took you for the jealous type, sissy,” she grinned.

“I have good reason to be jealous. Males like him are once in a lifetime,” she said with simple elegance. “I’m not about to let him get away from me.”

“You’re assuming I want to be stolen, pretty kitty,” Kit laughed, wriggling up to a sitting position and kissing her on the cheek. “Why would I even look at another femme when they can’t hold a candle to what I already have?”

“Oooh, I’ve been dissed,” Jenny laughed. “Don’t I get some sister points here? We do look a little alike.”

“I’ll take the original, thank you,” Kit said, putting his arm around Jessie. That made Jessie laugh, and Jenny give him a scowl. Then she flipped him off, which made Jessie laugh harder.

“Jennifer!” Hannah said hotly as she came down the stairs. “That’s no way to behave! Now apologize this instant!”

“Nah, I deserved it, Hannah,” Kit laughed. “I was being a jerk.”

“That’s beside the point. A lady does not act so crudely! There are other ways to punish males for being cheeky,” she added. Jenny gave her a surprised look, then laughed.

“Well, Jessie’s favorite method of punishment is beating on me with pillows,” Kit said with a grin at her.

“It gets the job done,” she said without a bit of embarrassment.

“I have some ice cream upstairs if you want it,” Hannah told them. “And you need to think of getting some rest, Kit. John told me your flight leaves at five in the morning. You’ll have to be there in the dead of night.”

“Yeah,” he said with a grunt. “I have to be there two hours before the flight leaves. I hope you have all-night taxi service here.”

“John’s already turned in, he’s going to take you,” Hannah informed him.

“He doesn’t have to do that,” he said. “I can take a cab.”

“We wouldn’t hear of that,” she said brusquely. “Now go on upstairs, so I can tidy up down here.”

Ben was upstairs at the dining room table, eating a bowl of chocolate ice cream. “Hey,” he called as they came in.

“How was your workout?” Jenny asked.

“Freakin’ cold,” he grunted. “I hate running in the snow.”

“How far did you run?” Kit asked curiously.

“I run til I can’t go on,” he replied. “I’m up to about twelve miles. My coach really pushes endurance. He says if I can hit the hole in the fourth quarter just as hard and strong as I can in the first, I’ll really grind out some yardage. I think he’s right.”

“That’s a long walk back once you stop,” Kit chuckled.

“I run at school, and it’s only four blocks from here,” he said. “I have a key to the gate to the football field, the track, and the weight room.”

“Ah. Sounds like they trust you guys.”

“Not all of them,” Ben laughed. “Only two of us have keys and the alarm code to the weight room. We’re the ones coach thinks will make it to college, so he goes out of his way for us. He’s a cool wolf.”

“Well, at least you’re well on your way.”

“I hope so. Here,” he said, holding out a bowl of chocolate ice cream to him.

“Thanks. What kind is this?”

“Breyers,” Ben answered. “It’s the best.”

“Well, I’m partial to Ben and Jerry’s myself,” Kit chuckled.

“It’s really expensive.”

“Not in Boston,” Kit told him as Jenny and Jessie sat down and took up their own bowls. “They make it up in New England, so it’s cheaper up there.”

Breyers wasn’t bad, Kit decided. They sat around eating ice cream and just chatting, feeling more comfortable since they were all close together in age, and Kit had a pretty good time. He really liked Jessie’s family. They were kind, caring, funny, intelligent, and were very open with him...well, everyone but Hannah. They’d seemed to have been genuinely interested in getting to know him, and he enjoyed learning about them. A glance at the clock showed him that it was nearly eight, and since he had to be at the airport at three in the morning, he was looking at a very short sleep if he didn’t go to bed soon. “I hate to say it, but I have to think of getting a shower, and getting some sleep,” Kit told them, picking up his bowl and standing up. “I have to be up at two if I want to make it to the airport on time.”

“Damn, why so early?” Ben asked.

“Because I have to go to work tomorrow,” he said.

“Ah. Well, it was really cool to meet you, Kit. I had fun today,” Ben said, standing up and offering his paw.

“Yeah, me too. You guys are great,” he said. “Jessie’s lucky to have such a cool family.”

“We’ll be in your territory next time,” Jenny told him with a laugh, giving him a hug instead of shaking his paw, which earned her a dark look from her sister. “We’ll all be at the wedding.”

“I’ll be glad to have you there,” he said honestly. “You’ll get to meet our friends and check out our old, run-down apartment,” he chuckled. “God, Marty’s gonna love you,” he laughed.

Jessie exploded into laughter. “Who’s Marty?” Jenny asked.

“One of the guys I work with. He’s...interesting,” he said carefully.

“Cute?”

“Well, he’s cute in a way, but let’s say that you’re not his type,” Kit said.

“Ah, he’s gay?”

Kit nodded with a chuckle. “He’s a riot, though. He’s a great guy, you’ll really like him.”

“Most girls like gay guys. They relate to us better than straight guys,” Jenny said with a grin.

“Hey, you mind if I drop you a line here and there?” Ben asked.

“Not at all. Hannah has my phone number, and knows the email address at my job. Feel free to call or write whenever you want.”

“I think I’ll do that,” Ben promised.

“I’ll be up in a few minutes, love,” Jessie told him.

“You don’t have to go to bed this early.”

“I do if I want to go with you to the airport tomorrow,” she told him. “And not fall asleep in the car.”

“And maybe do some other things,” Jenny hinted with a grin.

“Mmmmmaybe,” Jessie hummed, giving her sister a calm look, which made Jenny burst into laughter.

“I don’t think I’m old enough for this conversation,” Ben said as he walked into the kitchen, which made all three of them laugh.

Kit couldn’t go to bed without saying goodnight. He went back down to the basement, where Hannah was cleaning the coffee table. “Hannah, I’m going to go ahead and get a shower, then head to bed,” he told her from the stairs. “I just wanted to thank you for inviting me. I really enjoyed myself.”

“Well, I’m glad you did,” she told him, putting a pillow down and coming over to him at the stairs. “I’ll probably not make it up in time to see you off, so I’ll say my goodbyes now.”

Then, to his surprise, she put her paw on his shoulder, leaned over, and kissed him on the cheek. “Have a good night, Kit,” she told him. “And a good flight home.”

“Uh, thanks, Hannah. Have a good night.”

If Kit thought he was confused before, he was really confused now... but also a little hopeful. She hadn't been hostile. She hadn't been cold or distant. She'd at least made an attempt to be cordial, and he hoped that maybe, just maybe, she wasn't seeing him as the enemy.

He indulged in a quick shower, and partook in the full body dryer that they had in their bathroom, a single side unit that was built into the wall next to the tub. After remembering what it was like to leave a bathroom with dry fur, he definitely put a portable dryer on the list of things to buy Jessie for Christmas. His hair was still a touch damp when he returned to Jessie's room, and she came in while he was sitting on the bed. “Do you know what your mother did when I went to go say goodnight?” he asked.

“What?”

“She kissed me,” he declared.

“She didn't!”

“It wasn't a kiss kiss,” he told her. “It was just a peck on the cheek. But still, that floored me. I never saw it coming!”

Jessie laughed, then threw her arms around him and hugged him exuberantly. “I'm so proud of you, my handsome fox!” she squealed.

“What?”

“Mom likes you!” she said. “She'd never kiss someone she hates!”

“Well, like or not, she’s still against the wedding,” he told her cautioningly.

“Well, yeah, but at least now it’s not because she hates you,” she told him, letting go of him and pulling her tee shirt off. “Unhook me please,” she said, turning around. He unhooked her bra for her, and she pulled it off and took it and her shirt over to the hamper and dropped them in. “Did you pack yet?”

“Nah, but it’ll take all of five minutes,” he said.

“I’ll help you,” she said, coming over and taking clean underwear and a shirt out of his carry-on and setting them on the desk, then collecting up his other clothes and began folding them to put them back in. He was staring at her, and she glanced at him curiously as she stuffed the shirt he’d been wearing into the bag. “What?”

“You’re sexy when you’re doing housework topless,” he said with a grin.

She laughed. “Sometimes I forget I’m not wearing clothes around you, my handsome fox,” she winked.

“I sure as hell don’t mind,” he said with sincerity as she packed his cell phone and laptop into his carry-on. “Think you can sweeten the view a little?”

She laughed brightly as she finished, then came over and leaned over in front of him, but didn’t give him a chance to ogle her. She kissed him lightly, mischievously, then put a finger under his chin to keep him from looking down at her. “I thought you said we had to behave,” she teased.

“I can look,” he protested, reaching down and grabbing the waist of her jeans, reaching for the zipper and button, undoing them, then pushing them down, giving her a wicked little smile as he undressed her.

“You’re being mean to me, Kit,” she complained, but she was smiling.

“I’m being mean to both of us,” he chuckled as she stepped out of her jeans and panties and stood naked before him. “I just have to settle for what I can see until you get home on Sunday.”

“So do I,” she told him, pulling open his towel. They spent long moments, just looking at each other, not touching, then she reached out and put her paws on his shoulders, leaned down, and kissed him quite seriously.

There was a knock at the door, startling them. Kit frantically pulled his towel back around him, but Jessie had nothing within reach to use to cover herself, so she quickly jumped onto the bed and got behind him, using him as a cover...and not a moment too soon. The door opened, and Hannah looked in, no doubt seeing her naked daughter pressing her chest up against his back, Kit reasoned from that expression on her face. “Kit, you left your toothbrush in the bathroom,” she announced, holding it in her other paw.

“Oh...thanks, Hannah,” he said.

She gave him a long, searching look. “I’ll just put it on the desk,” she offered, coming in and crossing the room, setting it down. They watched her, Jessie keeping very tight against his back, then watched her go back across the room to the door. She stopped in the doorway and turned around to regard them one more time, her expression constrained, as if she was just itching to yell at them...but she didn’t. “I’d better not hear anything out of bounds coming out of this room,” she told them as she took hold of the door and began to close it. “So you’d better keep the noise down,” she added, then she closed the door.

Jessie gasped, and Kit just laughed. “Am I crazy, or did your mother just give us permission?” Kit asked, looking over his shoulder at her.

“I, I’m not sure,” she said uncertainly. “It sounded like it, but she’d never do something like that! I think she was playing with us, or trying to bait us or something.”

“Well, it’s up to you. I’m the one leaving tomorrow, pretty kitty,” he chuckled. “You’re the one that’ll have to stay for two more days.”

Jessie was quiet a moment. “I...I don’t know. I thought about it, but that was just a femme’s fantasy. But my brother and sister are in the house too, and so are my parents,” she said, as Kit heard her modest side take control over her. Then she blew out her breath. “But it’s not like we wouldn’t be doing anything they don’t know we already do,” she purred, reaching down and undoing his towel.

“Oho, already giving up all the secrets of our sex life, eh?” he laughed as she kissed his neck.

“My sister is one of my best friends,” she said huskily in his ear, as if that was all the explanation she needed to give. “I’ve never tried being quiet before,” she murmured.

“Who’s in the room beside yours?”

“Sissy.”

“Well, at least it’s not your parents,” he said a little breathlessly, leaning against her as she kissed his neck.

Chapter 12

The darkness exploded into a million shards of shimmering light. Kit started and half-rose from the bed, blinking and squinting as he tried to get his bearings. For a brief moment, he had this wild notion that someone had broken into their apartment, that he'd forgotten to set the alarm, but then his aching back made him realize that he wasn't at home. He was still in Cincinnati, and it was quite literally the dead of night.

"Time to get up in here," John's voice called softly, but then again, after turning on the light, there wasn't much more that he had to do. Kit got his eyes to work and focused them on the dark-faced cat, and he saw that John was looking away politely as he closed the door. Kit blinked a few times to get his eyes adjusted to the light, then looked beside him and saw Jessie, laying on her back with her paws over her face, when they should have been covering something else with her father in the room.

"You realize you just flashed your father?" Kit asked conversationally.

"Mmph," Jessie grunted, then she took her paws off her ruffled face and laughed helplessly. "I think you're the one to blame for that. If you hadn't have sat up and pulled down the blanket, my pristine modesty would be inviolate."

"So, we're awake enough to throw around the big English teacher words, eh?" he asked. "Not like it's a big deal, he is your dad. He's seen you naked before. Just not quite so well developed."

Jessie whacked him with his own pillow.

“Now, before we have to get up, and I don’t get another chance to see this until Sunday,” he said, grabbing the blankets and pulling them all the way down. She laughed as he looked at her from toes to ears, quite methodically. “There. That should hold me over until Sunday,” he said with a grin.

“C’mere, you tease,” she giggled, hooking her claws in his shoulder and dragging him down into a playful kiss. Their playful mood was broken, however, when a loud knocking issued from the door.

“There’s no time for dawdling, kids,” John’s voice called. “There’s not even time for breakfast! Get dressed and let’s go!”

Kit looked at the clock on her nightstand and saw that it was 2:14am, which really was running a bit late. “Oh crap!” he gasped, jumping out of bed. “He isn’t joking, pretty kitty, we gotta go!”

Dressing was a quick affair. While Jessie threw on her clothes, Kit packed his carry-on, then sat down to pull on the winter shoes he’s bought just for this trip. “I’m gonna go see if I can’t sneak a cup of tea while you finish,” he told Jessie.

She nodded. “Try to sneak two. And there are some travel mugs in the cabinet over the microwave.”

Kit rushed down to the kitchen, but to his surprise, found Hannah there, handing John a cup of coffee. “Morning,” she said in a politely neutral voice. He had no doubt she knew what they did last night, and he could see that the veiled consent she gave last night wasn’t quite sitting so well with her this morning. “I have some hot water boiling if you want tea, but you’ll have to be quick. John overslept.”

“We all did,” Kit said with a grunt. “Mind if I borrow one of your travel mugs?”

“Over the microwave,” she said with a point.

Kit pulled two down and poured water for tea, and was steeping the bags when Jessie rushed into the kitchen. “Dad’s putting your suitcase in the car,” she said. “It looks nasty outside, I hope you can get out.”

“Huh?”

“It’s snowing,” Hannah told him, pointing to the window over the sink. Kit handed Jessie her mug and went to look, and saw it coming down pretty hard through the light on the back porch.

“Bah,” Kit grunted.

“Let me go help Dad, odds are the car’s buried,” Jessie said after noticing the cool look Hannah was giving her, rushing into the laundry room and the back door, leaving Kit and Hannah alone in the kitchen.

“Thank you for last night,” Kit said honestly, leaning against the counter with a slight wince.

“Thank John, not me,” Hannah said abruptly. “I still object to this marriage, Kit, but John used some very frank language when we discussed...what goes on in your house. As much as I think you’re making a big mistake, I guess I can’t deny that you and Jessica are adults, and you’re in an adult relationship.” She sighed. “I had to admit to myself last night that I can’t keep you two separated, and if I try to treat Jessica like the child she is instead of the adult she thinks she is, I might permanently damage our relationship. All I can do is stay back and let her learn from the mistake she's about to make."

"I think you'll be surprised about that, Hannah," he said mildly. "I've only known her for three months, but I know her better than I know myself. She's serious about this marriage."

"That's the only reason I'm going against my better judgment to fight it tooth and claw until my last breath," she said with calm honesty. "She is serious about it, and it's not just some crazy Jennifer-style stunt to kick sand in my face."

"Well, I'm glad you can at least admit to that," Kit chuckled. He came over to her, leaned over, and kissed her on the cheek.

"Hey now, you're not getting your paws on every girl in this house," John said with a chuckle as he came into the laundry room. "We can't wait for the car to warm up, Kit, we have to go. The roads aren't bad yet, but they're gonna be, so we have to get you there before it happens."

"Alright. Thank you again, Hannah. I had a great time."

"Well, remember, you're coming for Christmas."

"I'm looking forward to it," he said with a smile, picking up both mugs of tea.

Outside, he saw that there was already about two inches of new snow on the ground, and it was coming down hard and steady. "You want me to drive, John?" he asked. "I'm used to driving in this."

“Nah, we get enough snow around here for me to be in practice,” John chuckled as he opened the driver’s side door.

Kit got into the back, and Jessie pushed him down and got into the back with him. “Pretty kitty—“

“Hush. I’m about to send you home, I’m not spending what little time we have left with a car seat between us.”

“Just keep it PG rated back there, you two,” John laughed as he put on his seat belt. “Put your seat belts on, kids, no chances.”

“Are you saying you’re a bad driver, John?” Kit laughed as he did as he was told.

“You’ve never driven in Cincinnati, I see,” John said without much humor.

“People here drive like maniacs,” Jessie told him. “I’ll bet you five dollars we’ll see some guy in a four wheel drive doing seventy down interstate.”

“Ah, so you have a lot of Nascar wannabes around here?”

John chuckled. “No, just people who think they know how to drive, mixed in with people who think that driving on snow is the same as driving in white rain.”

“Say no more,” Kit chuckled.

Jessie’s prediction turned out to be true. When they got to the interstate, they were passed by several cars that were going entirely too fast, even despite the fact that the interstate had been plowed and salted. What they didn’t take into account was that salting may clear a road, but as more snow fell on it without cars traveling over it, eventually the salt diluted down and stopped melting the snow. But, thankfully, John was quite content to plod along in the slow lane at a reasonable and safe rate of speed, allowing others to be the ones to gamble with their lives.

John got them to the airport safely and securely, after they passed three separate incidents of car crashes or cars spun out and either sitting against guardrails or halfway down embankments, the attrition of fools who didn't understand that snow was slippery. Despite it being somewhere close to three in the morning, there were quite a few cars in the short-term parking lot, and the terminal was quite busy. The first thing they did was check the board that showed arrivals and departures, and there were quite a few "Delayed" in both columns. Kit's own flight was showing that it was still leaving on time, however. Jessie held his paw as he checked in at the counter, and walked snuggled under his arm as they meandered through other sleepy people towards the security gate. When they got there, he gave her a long, lingering kiss as John hovered nearby. "Well, pretty kitty, I'm afraid this is where we say goodbye," he told her, then he shook John's paw. "It was a wonderful visit, John, thanks for having me," he said.

"We enjoyed having you," he smiled in reply.

Jessie, however, wasn't quite ready to give him up. She kissed him again, deeply, passionately, and he had to grab onto her just to keep his knees from unlocking on him. John chuckled as she basically conquered him, and left him breathless, his paws on her shoulders basically for support as she giggled and nuzzled his cheek. "Now that was a proper goodbye kiss."

"Who are you, and what have you done with my daughter?" John asked teasingly. "I'd never have believed to see my shy little Jessica kissing in public.”

Jessica’s cheeks ruffled when she looked around, then she laughed. “Well, I’d better get used to the idea, we have to kiss at the ceremony.”

“Just don’t kiss me like that, or Rick’ll have to help me off the dais,” Kit said, still breathless, but stable enough to let go of her. He shouldered his carry-on, leaned down and kissed Jessica once more on the cheek, which made her laugh. “I’ll call you when I get in,” he promised.

“I’ll be waiting,” she said. She blew him a kiss as he stepped away, and he waved to them as he passed into the security checkpoint and got in line.

Despite the snow, it didn’t dramatically affect his own flight. By the time he was through security, the airport crews were already hard at work attacking the snow on the taxiways and runway, and the “Delayed” signs on the boards began to disappear. When he reached his gate about an hour before the flight, the attendant assured him that their own delay wouldn’t be very long. Kit passed the time reading a newspaper to keep himself from dwelling too much on another stretch of separation from Jessie. At least this stretch would only be basically two days without her, and he had to work for both of them. That would keep him distracted enough. He had a good feeling that it meant that things would go smoothly until Sunday.

He really needed to learn to ignore those feelings.

It started at the gate. He was in line to board the plane, and to his surprise, he recognized someone rushing towards the gate, a short, slender bear femme whom he knew for a fact was a reporter from CNN. She got in the end of the boarding line, and Kit didn’t think much more about it until she stopped in front of his seat.

“No comment,” he said absently as he turned his USA Today to the sports section.

“That’s nice and all, but can you move so I can get to my seat?” she asked.

Kit glanced up and saw her putting her bag in the overhead, then waiting by his legs. Bloody hell, that’s one dirty trick of a way to get an interview, he thought to himself darkly. She must have found out he was on the flight, and somehow got the seat beside his! He pulled in and she inched by him, and she got in the seat beside him and buckled her seat belt. “I’m surprised you recognize me. Almost no one does,” she chuckled. “I’ve only been working there for a year.”

“Right,” he said dryly, going back to his paper. “Just remember what I said.”

She looked at him, he could see out of the corner of his eye, then she looked at him again, more closely. More to the point, she was looking at his ear, that distinctive left ear of his, then she laughed delightedly. “No wonder!” she said, laughing again. “Well, this is just dumb luck!” she said.

“Sure it is,” he muttered darkly.

“Sure is,” she chuckled. “My folks live in Cincinnati, but I’m being sent to Austin to cover a story. I have an interview with an anthropology professor at the university, then I fly to Alaska on Saturday to finish up the story.” She grinned at him. “I had no idea you were on the flight. I don’t cover furs, Mister Vulpan, I cover science. If you know who I am, then you should know that. I’m a science correspondent, remember?”

Kit considered it a moment, and finally nodded. “So you are.”

“But, I can do another interview,” she grinned.

“No.”

“Well, I had to try,” she laughed.

Her name was Lisa Gilmore, and she was an outgoing, chatty femme who just talked away. Kit basically tuned her out, not getting involved with her for fear she would try to use it as a stealth interview. She did seem to honor his personal space, though, for when the plane pulled out of the gate and it was clear the window seat was vacant, she jumped over to it to put an empty seat between them. Once they were airborne—after only forty-five minutes delay due to the snow—she slid past him again and got her laptop, and happily sat by the window clicking away on it.

“Here, let me show you what I’m working on,” she invited, turning the laptop on the tray so he could see. He glanced over, and he saw a picture of old, very unusual bones, half-buried in ice. “This is my story.”

“Bones?”

“Look at the skull in this picture,” she said, bringing up a very weird, flat-faced skull unlike anything he’d ever seen before. It had a heavy forehead and a sloping face, with no muzzle, no maw, and no lower jawbone. Everything else looked strangely close to a fur, though. “Isn’t that cool?”

“What breed is it?”

“Well, it’s not any breed,” she said with a grin. “It’s a skull from the extinct simean family scientists have never seen before, found in a glacier in Alaska,” she said. “They haven’t dated it, but since it was in that glacier, that means it can’t be any older than the glacier itself, tens of thousands of years minimum,” she said in a distracted yet excited tone. “All the paleontologists say all branches of the simian species all died out hundreds of thousands of years ago, with homo erectus being the last known surviving species of them, but this skull can’t be more than thirty thousand years old,” she said excitedly. “If that’s true, then there were descendents of the simian lines still on earth during the Ice Age.”

“So, maybe it was some isolated little pocket.”

“That survived for hundreds of thousands of years? I don’t think so,” she said, clicking her teeth together. “The scientist I’m going to interview has a theory that the homo branch of the simians actually survived up to the end of the ice age, but we just haven’t found any of their fossils yet because there were so few of them,” she noted. “He thinks that competition with the early furs, the animus proteus, basically drove them to the edges of the earth.”

“Possible,” Kit shrugged. “Wait a minute. Proteus? He thinks there was only one species of fur?”

“Yup,” she nodded.

“But—“

“That’s where it gets complicated,” she winked. “He thinks the original species spawned all the breeds we know today, just like the proto-apes spawned the extinct branches of the homo family.”

“He’s not going to get many fans with a theory like that,” Kit noted simply.

“It sounds a little outlandish, but it does make a kind of sense if you’re familiar with paleontology,” she said. “There’s a geological boundary in the rock history called the Ash Event. It's a layer of thin ash in the rock and soil layers from three hundred thousand years ago. but it's found all over the world, and it's a similar event to the KT boundary in the prehistoric era. The ash boundary marks a mass extinction just like the KT did, where about thirty percent of all species on Earth died out quickly, but where the KT boundary marks the end of the dinosaurs, this scientist thinks the ash boundary was the event that killed off the simians."

"What, a meteor?"

"No, volcanoes," she told him. "This kind of ash is from a volcano. He thinks a super-volcano erupted and choked the entire world in ash, and that event was a trigger that killed off the simians and gave the animus proteus room to evolve without competition. His theory is that the simians didn't die out in the ash event, but it did cut their numbers down to the point where the animus proteus had less competition and was able to dominate," she explained. "It's already been proved that the earliest fur fossils are in Africa. But there are furs on every continent but Antarctica. So...how did they get there?"

"They all evolved," he said, an answer right out of any textbook on the matter. "Evolved from the animals that are still there. If you buy into the science aspect. As a Catholic, I was raised to believe that God simply put us here, but I'm not quite as Catholic as they'd like. I go for the intelligent design idea, that evolution is real, but it was guided by the hand of God."

"Really? Then where are the American smilodon furs? The giant sloth furs? The three-toed horse furs? Why are there no furs of any animal that's extinct in the Americas and Australia? If we evolved from animals all over the world at the same time, then why didn't the intelligent fur live beyond the species that spawned it?"

Kit opened his mouth, but nothing came out. She had a point.

“This scientist’s theory is that the animus proteus spread out from Africa, and contact with the proteus triggered the evolution of all the different breeds, somehow. Even he admits he can’t figure that part out, but he has enough circumstantial data to at least back up his theory. According to his theory, that’s why there are cave bear furs from Europe, while the cave bear itself is extinct, but there are no extinct American furs. He thinks the proteus crossed over into the Americas much later than it spread through Europe, Asia, and Australia, maybe as early as twenty thousand years ago. And since there were no furs here, he thinks that the few simians that survived the ash event and managed to get here first managed to build their numbers up before the proteus fur arrived to compete with them.”

“Well, there’s a hole in that. If there was this protean fur only thirty thousand years ago, where is it now?”

“He thinks it died out in the ice age,” she answered.

“Okay, if the protean fur came over thirty thousand years ago, why is there documented evidence that there were furs in America way earlier than that?”

“Ah, he thinks that what we thought was evidence of prehistoric furs in the Americas was actually this simean race,” she told him. “The bones they’ve found have all been just pieces, shards, they’ve never managed to build even half a skeleton. And there’s just enough skeletal similarities that Doctor Browning thinks that we’ve mistaken prehistoric furs for this extinct simean race.”

“I think it’s reaching a bit.”

“Yeah, well, it’s an interesting angle that does put a different light on this discovery,” she said. “We’ve always wondered if we’re alone in the universe, if we’re the only sentient life...well, there was non-fur intelligence on Earth, it was just a very long time ago. They found tools with the skeleton, stone tools , proving that this creature was intelligent.”

“Okay, now that I’ll buy,” he said. “But that whole to-do about a protean fur, that’s a little too outrageous to take seriously.”

“It is a bit reaching, but there’s a hint of truth about it that tickles at me, and most other paleontologists can’t easily explain away,” she mused. “The earliest documented fur fossils are in Africa, then they spread out from there in a chronological fashion. If you put all the data of where they were found and when they were dated, it shows the spread distinctly. That part of his theory is actually someone else’s theory, that we originated from one point and then spread out, but that theory doesn’t explain why there are so many different breeds of fur. After all, if all furs originated from Africa, then why aren’t we all African breed furs? I don’t think there are any bears in Africa,” she grinned. “But there are foxes, just not red ones. Ever met a fennec fox fur? Their ears are huge!” she laughed. “But think about that. You’re a British fox. How did your ancestors become a British fox if we all came from Africa?”

“I have no idea.”

“It’s just one of the many mysteries of our species,” she said with a bright smile. “Where we came from, why different breeds can intermarry and produce mixed breeds when the animals we evolved from can’t do the same, why the animals we evolved from didn’t evolve with us and are still here, and so on and so on. That’s why so many still believe in the religious explanation...we're here because God did it. If you don't put faith in something, somewhere, it just doesn't make sense."

"Remind me not to become a paleontologist. They sound like their entire careers are exercises in frustration."

She laughed. "They're the most determined furs on Earth," she grinned. "They know there's an answer, and they're willing to dig for it for their entire lives."

"They can have it," he shrugged.

"You mind if I ask a question, completely off the record?" she ventured.

"As long as it doesn't keep leading to another one."

"Nah, this is just for my own curiosity. Someone leaked a bunch of stuff about the trial. I haven't really read much of it, since that's not the kind of work I do, but I do remember that you're not just no part of it, you've said you don't want the money even if you win."

"I'm no part of it."

"Well, you know what I mean. What I want to know is why?"

"Why? Why what?"

"Why give up all that money?"

Kit actually laughed. "Why does everyone keep asking me that?"

"Because us mere mortals just can't understand it. I'd jump all over that money if it was me."

Kit gave the small bear a very serious look. “Money is a curse, not a blessing,” he said seriously. “If you have enough to live on, you’re good. When you have so much that money becomes an end in and of itself, it becomes a curse. I’ve lived on both sides of the money line, and given the choice between the two, I’ll choose what I have now every time. I’m happy. I have a good job that I enjoy, a fiancée I’m madly in love with, good friends, and a great life. And if I had all that money, I’d lose it all. It would change everything, and change everyone I deal with every day. My friends would treat me differently. My co-workers would treat me differently. My fiancée wouldn’t leave me, but it would change our relationship. It couldn’t help but do it. I’m happy without money. If I had money, I’d lose sight of what’s important in life and only worry about money, and all the anchor chain that comes with it.”

She was silent a long moment. “I don’t entirely understand that, but I guess it’s because I can only see it from the low side of the line,” she noted.

“My family’s the perfect example of what I mean,” he told her. “What are they doing right now? They’re fighting over the family fortune. Does that sound like a loving family to you?”

“I guess not,” she chuckled.

“Then you see the point.”

“So you’re saying that love trumps money.”

“That’s an oversimplified way to look at it, but that’s kinda correct. My family forgot what it means to be a family a long time ago. Money poisoned them, and I want no part of it.”

“How does your fiancée feel about it?”

“She doesn’t entirely understand it either, but she does understand how I feel about it,” he told her. “She’s okay with being poor, as long as we’re together, and we’re not living on the street or anything like that.”

“She sounds understanding.”

“She’s the greatest femme in the world, at least in my opinion,” he chuckled. “I’m the luckiest male alive that she wants to marry me.”

“My husband had better disagree with you,” she said in a tone that made him laugh.

“You’re not bad for a reporter.”

“And you’re not bad for a crazy ex-rich kid.”

“We’re called eccentric, not crazy,” he teased.

“Only when you’re rich. You’re not rich, so you’re just crazy.”

“Point,” he chuckled.

All in all, Lisa wasn’t as bad as he feared. She was true to her word and didn’t ask any other questions. They passed the rest of the flight in amiable chatter, and she even gave him her card and told him to call her whenever he felt like talking once the plane landed in Austin, about an hour late.

The second shock of the day waited for him at the airport. He came through the security gate with a large crowd, and as he opened his phone and called Rick to tell him he was back, someone crashed into him and grabbed hold. “Kit!”

He was a bit surprised, he never saw whoever grabbed him do it. He pushed the figure out, a bit roughly, and he gaped when he found himself staring into two eyes of different colors. The left eye was amber, but the right eye was green. He swam in shock for nearly ten seconds, then he took in the entire face. Narrow, short muzzle, high cheeks, large eyes, long red hair done in a wavy, curly style that reached her shoulders. Kit recognized her, it was Sheila, Aunt Sarah's younger daughter and his cousin.

“Sheila!” he said in consternation. “What in the bloody blue hell are you doing here?”

“Kit, I just had to talk to you!” she told him, almost pleadingly, holding onto his shoulders with her paws. “I, I didn't know who else to turn to!”

Sheila, as Vulpans went, was relatively harmless. She was eighteen, the second youngest of the five children of Aunt Sarah, spoiled and shallow, a typical Boston blue-blood debutante. Sheila was very much in love with her trust fund, and was the typical rich girl. Bored, wild, and notorious. She, like Lynn and Bess, was a tramp, a drinker, a partier, indulging herself in all manner of legal and illegal vices because she had the money and had nothing else to do. Sheila had probably never had a serious thought in her life, and had just started classes this semester at Harvard as a legacy student, getting in only because her father was a Harvard alumnus, and she was a Vulpan. Kit had no doubt she didn't even go to classes, yet she had a passing grade point average.

“Turn to? What the hell are you talking about? How did you know I'd be here?”

“Your landlord said you were flying back today,” she told him. “I went to go see you yesterday, but you weren't home! Oh, Kit, you've got to help!”

“Help? I have no idea what you’re talking about, Sheila! And you have a damn lot of nerve to come to me asking for help, after what the family did to me,” he added coldly.

Her eyes darted up, up to his ear, and she looked chagrined. “What could I do, Kit? Lose my trust fund? I’m not like you, I’d never make it without my money.”

Kit couldn’t really argue with that point, and he was surprised that Sheila would lower herself to the point of admitting it.

“Quite a few of the cousins felt sorry for you, but we’re just the kids! We’re not from your family. We don’t have any say. Our parents don’t take us seriously, not like they take you and Vil seriously. We’re not like you two. You’re from Uncle Luke’s family, the important Vulpans. We’re just the nameless masses that fill up the photographs and give the paparazzi targets to chase.”

Kit snorted. “Stop talking like that. Why are you here?”

She clicked her teeth together. “Can we go somewhere and talk about it?”

“I have to go to work,” he told her.

“You work?” she gasped.

“What do you think I do to make a living, girl?” he asked scathingly. “Stand on street corners and beg?”

“I, I never thought about it,” she said honestly. “Can you take me so we can talk on the way? I didn’t rent a car, I’ve been getting around in cabs.”

“My boss is coming to pick me up,” he answered, a little curious now. Just what would make Sheila fly halfway across the country on a holiday to track him down? What was so dire that the only person she could turn to for help was him? Whatever it was, it had to be serious.

Kit put the phone back to his ear after speed-dialing Rick. “Rick, where are you?”

“I’m looking at you right now,” he answered with amusement. “If Jessie catches you with that vixen, she’ll cut your tail off.”

Kit closed the phone and looked around, and saw the dingo when he waved across the crowd. Rick advanced on them quickly, his eyebrow raising when he got a good look at the vixen with him, when he saw her eyes. “My, I didn’t know you came back with a relative, Kit,” Rick said, his voice calm, but Kit knew him well and could hear the question lurking in that greeting.

“I didn’t,” he said. “Rick, this is Sheila Vance Vulpan, my cousin. Sheila, this is my boss, Rick.”

“Hi,” Sheila said, taking her paw off Kit’s shoulder and offering it to him.

“Hello there, young lady,” he said, shaking it gently. “I can’t help but ask, but why are you here? Kit’s situation with his family is something of common knowledge among his friends. I’m a bit surprised to see you.”

“Well, I had no one else to talk to,” she told him honestly. “May I ride with you when you take him back? I really need to talk to him.”

“It’s his car, girl,” he chuckled. “You’ll have to ask him.”

She turned pleading eyes to him. “Kit?”

He looked down at her, his ears twitching, then he sighed and nodded. “Come on,” he said to her.

They were silent as Rick led them back to his Pathfinder, but once she was in the car, sitting in the passenger’s seat, she erupted like a pent-up volcano. “Kit, I think Cybil’s trying to kill me,” she said.

Kit nearly rear-ended the Sentra in front of him in the lane leading out of the airport. “What? What are you talking about?”

“I got deposed by Cybil’s lawyers, just like you did,” she told him as they pulled out of the airport, on the highway that led back to Austin. “But when I got deposed, Cybil was there in the lawyer’s office. After they finished with me, it didn’t take long, I stopped to talk to this cute hedgehog outside an office, and I heard her voice inside. I hushed up and listened, and they were talking about the suit, and how they thought they had a real shot at getting a big piece of the family money. I didn’t think much of it and went to leave, but then Cybil asked about cousin Vil. The male in there with her told her not to worry about Vil, that he had her handled, but then she asked about you. She said something like Is there any chance of getting Kit out of the picture. She went on to talk about the will, and how you being in the one Vil’s trying to reinstate was a major problem. I didn’t understand why, but then the male said that Vil was too alert now, and you were totally out of reach. He said something like there’s no way after that failed hit on him. There was something in his voice when he said that, Kit. It wasn’t what he said, but how he said it. I, I think Cybil may be thinking of trying to kill you.”

Kit gave her a serious look, far too long to be safe since he was driving.

“I know. After I heard that, I hurried off, but she came out of the office. I glanced back, and she looked right at me. Well, to cut it short, three days ago, someone tried to kill me.”

“What happened?”

“I was at a party in Chelmsford, with a few girlfriends, and some guy took out a gun and just started shooting at us when we came out to go back to campus,” she told him. “We just got lucky. Nobody was hurt, and the guy’s gun jammed or something. He tried to shoot us, but his gun didn’t work.”

“Are you sure it wasn’t a mugging?” he asked.

“Kit, he never asked for money. He just pulled out a gun and aimed it right at me. His gun jammed or something, and then he ran off.”

“Why do you think he was after you?”

“I may be dumb, but I’m not stupid,” she said. “Cybil knows I heard them at the door, and not two days later, someone tries to shoot me. She tried to kill me, Kit, I know she did. My parents don’t believe me, and I didn’t know what else to do. I don’t feel safe anymore. Nothing’s stopping her from trying again.”

“Well, what do you want me to do about it?” he asked, a bit archly.

“Kit, you can talk to Vil. I tried to call her, but she won’t even take my call! Please, you have to help me!”

Kit opened his phone with one paw and hit a single button. “Vil,” he said calmly, “someone needs to talk to you.” He handed the phone to Sheila.

“Cousin Vil?” she asked tentatively. “No, don’t hang up!” she all but screamed, then she held the phone away from her ear as Kit heard a string of vile, sulfurous curses issue from his phone as Vil screamed into the phone.

Kit sighed. “Give me the phone,” he prompted. He took it back from her and waited out the loud and long epithets, then grabbed his chance when she paused for breath. “Vil, it’s me,” he said.

“Kit? What the hell is she doing there!”

“Scared for her life,” he answered calmly, which made Sheila give him an adoring, almost slavish look. “Now, you wanna shut up and listen to her? I think you might be interested in what she has to say.”

“Alright, put her back on.”

Kit handed the phone back to Sheila, who nodded and took it. “Vil? You have to help!” she said quickly, and then plowed headlong into the story she’d just told them.

“What are you thinking, son?” Rick asked quietly from the back seat as Sheila continued.

“I think she’s wrong about Cybil trying to kill her, but what I heard does warrant Vil taking a closer look at what Cybil’s been up to,” he said evenly. “I don’t know how much Vil looked into Cybil, but it’s something she can check out. If Cybil wants to try to get me out of the picture, that’s something Vil needs to know. I don’t think Cybil tried to kill Sheila, but it sure sounds like she might be entertaining the idea of sending someone down here to cause me trouble. And that's something Vil needs to know."

"I, well, it sounds a little thin, but from what I've heard about your family, I don't think you should believe in coincidences," Rick told him. "Someone tried to kill your cousin, and though it could have been a mugging, I wouldn't call it a coincidence until it's proven it wasn't. If it wasn't Cybil, then it was someone else. Maybe another cousin looking to thin the number of paws reaching into the pot."

"Yah, that's why I called Vil. Let her worry about it."

Sheila talked with Vil the whole way to the office, and for nearly half an hour after they were there, as he accepted pawshakes and hugs from the crew after he got back. Sheila sat in Rick's office and kept at it while he settled in in his tiny office, and Rick came in. "Martha brought Jessie's car to the office this morning," he said. "Mike's gonna follow me to your house after work so I can drop it off, then bring me back so Martha can pick me up and take me home."

"That's nice of him," Kit said with a nod. "What's this new project sitting on my desktop?" he asked, pointing at his monitor, to an icon on his desktop called Project A.

"Oh, with next year being an election year and all, we're gonna do a series of pieces starting in January about college kids, politics, and whatnot. So, Mister Lead Researcher, you get to earn your pay. There's a lot of ground we gotta cover. Candidates, student attitudes, how many are registered to vote, voting trends among the young statewide and nationwide, and so on and so on. Me and Barry haven't decided which piece we'll run first, but I'd like you to gather up some general data about the points in that file so we have a very rough overview of things and can decide where we want to go first. This should keep us all busy over the winter break. We're all gonna be doing real news work while the college is on break."

"Not a problem," he said easily after he opened the project file and was met with a Word document listing the information Barry and Rick wanted gathered and organized, and spent a brief moment going over it. "Looks like simple work."

"Just a lot of it," Rick told him.

"Simple work is fast work," Kit shrugged. "I'll have to do a few student surveys, though."

"Yeah, but those'll have to wait til after Thanksgiving break. And you'll only have two weeks to get them done before the semester ends."

"I can manage."

"So, what was the trip like? Did Jessie's mom cause problems?" he asked.

Kit laughed. "It actually went pretty well. Me and Hannah had a long talk, and though she still objects to the wedding, at least she admitted it's not because she hates me. She thinks we're too young and haven't known each other long enough."

"Well, a couple of years will show she's wrong about that."

"I hope so. I actually like her, and Jessie's whole family. Ben is very kind, her sister Jenny is wild and funny, and her father is mild, but sharp as a tack. It was a treat spending just one day with them and watching them be a family." He laughed. "You should see their basement. Oh, wait, I have a picture of it,” he said, digging into his carry-on bag. “Jessie took a bunch of pictures of the house and put them on a memory card for me.”

They had to go out into the main office to use the card reader, since his computer didn’t have one, so they borrowed the main editing computer and Kit brought up the pictures. Everyone else gathered around, but Kit realized that Jessie—or Jenny, for that matter—might have put something not entirely public on that card. “Uh, give me a second guys,” he said. “I think Jenny might have put a bomb in this.”

“What do you mean?” Lilly asked.

“Jenny’s...wild,” he hedged. “She might have taken a few pictures that you don’t show in public, as a joke. She’s the kind that’ll snap a picture of you taking a shower then put it on the internet as a joke.”

“All the better!” Rick laughed, reaching over Kit and opening the card with the mouse.

A series of thumbnail pictures appeared, and to Kit’s relief, there was nothing on the card he’d consider out of bounds to show the gang. There were about twenty pictures of the house, and of Jessie’s family. Kit cycled through them, then showed them the four pictures she’d taken of the basement, which made them all gasp and gawk. “John’s like the ultimate Bengals fan, so he made this theatre in his basement so he can watch the away games,” he explained as he showed them the pictures. “He calls it the Bengal Den. I’ve never seen that kind of a setup before. It was awesome.”

“It must have cost a fortune,” Rick chuckled.

“He said it took him two years to save up for it,” Kit answered. He cycled over to the individual pictures. “This is Hannah, Jessie’s mom. This is John, her dad. This is Ben, her younger brother, he's gonna be playing college football next year. This is Jenny, her younger sister."

"She's adorable," Mike gushed. "That black mask makes her look like a raccoon."

"Not when you look at her from behind," Kit chuckled. "She has a longhaired tail that looks almost exactly like Jessie's. Jenny's a trip."

"She sounds like a girl I should meet," Mike mused.

"You will next month, she's coming to the wedding," Kit assured him, showing them pictures of the snow. "This is what greeted me in Cincinnati. It snowed before I got there, and was snowing again this morning when I left. John said it was the earliest he ever remembered seeing so much snow."

"Clearly it was because of you," Jeffrey chuckled. "Just don't bring that snow down here!"

"It's the Yankee curse," Kit teased, using full-out Boston dialect. "And I'll bury Austin in snow by February!"

"Then we'll have to kill you, honey," Marty grinned. "Savid! Bring me, the garden hose!"

Sheila came out of Rick's office, the phone in her paw. "Kit, Vil wants to talk to you," she said, handing him the phone.

"Yeah sis?" he asked.

"I think her story's a little outlandish, but there's a little something in there," Vil told him. "I think maybe I need to take a little closer look at Cybil Whitmore Vulpan."

“And that’s why I called,” he said easily.

“I’ll get to work on it, baby bro,” she told him.

“Uh, what about Sheila?”

“What about her? She’s a grown fur, she can take care of herself.”

“Did you at least tell her what to do?”

“Hell no,” Vil snorted. “She’s an adult. She can figure it out. And I’m surprised you care at all. She’s one of them, bro. She sure as hell didn’t do you any favors, but as soon as she’s in trouble, where does she run to? She runs to us. She can go to hell.”

“Yeah well, a visit with Jessie’s family just rekindled something in me, I guess. I’ll talk to you later, Vil.”

He closed the phone and looked at Sheila, who looked at him nervously. “You going back home?” he asked her.

“No way!” she said fearfully. “Not as long as she’s there! Her thug said Vil had control of Austin, so I’m staying here, where it’s safe!”

“What about school?”

“I put in for a sabbatical,” she said. “I told them I’m going to rehab.”

“That won’t be very far from the truth,” Kit grunted. “Oh, yeah. Gang, this is Sheila Vance Vulpan, one of my cousins. Sheila, this is the gang. Rick you’ve met. Savid, Jeffrey, Barry, Lilly, Mike, and Marty.”

“Uh, hi everyone,” she said, shaking paws. “So, what should I do, Kit? I’ve never been, been alone before.”

“Get a place to live, buy a car, find a job or something,” he shrugged. “Doesn’t matter to me, Sheila. I’m not going to hold your paw.”

“But, but I don’t know how,” she whined. “I don’t know anybody. I don’t know where to go. I don’t know what to do!”

“Welcome to how I felt when I was sixteen,” Kit said, a bit coldly.

“Damn, you really were sheltered, weren’t you?” Barry noted aloud.

“Calm down, hon,” Rick said gently when she began to cry, her paws over her face. He put a paw on her shoulder and leaned over to look down at her. “My boys are all grown and gone, so I have some extra bedrooms. How about you come stay with us for a few days, so you have a nice place to stay until you find something more permanent. Martha, my wife, can help you find a car and an apartment. She’ll even teach you how to cook,” he smiled.

“Really?” she asked, looking up at him.

“Of course. You’re the family of someone I consider to be family, and down here in Texas, we look out for each other.”

“Oh, thank you!” she said explosively, giving Rick a crushing hug.

Kit wasn’t too happy about that. Rick had no idea what he was about to get into. Sheila was a spoiled brat, and she wouldn’t be in his house for two hours before she started treating him and Martha like servants, and getting herself into trouble. The warning look he gave Rick was noticed by everyone else, but Rick just nodded to him as he patted Sheila on the shoulder. “There are, of course, a few rules that come along with that invitation, hon,” Rick told her. “And the first and foremost of them is you behave like a lady while you stay with us. My wife and I may be simple folk, but we're also people who don't tolerate foolishness within our house. If you stay with us, you will remember that you are our guest, and conduct yourself as such."

"I will, I promise," Sheila said immediately. "I just want to be safe."

"You'll be safe with us," Rick assured her. "Come on, let's go back to my office. I'll call Martha and have her come pick you up."

"I don't like that at all," Kit growled when Rick took her back to his office. "Sheila's gonna make life hell for Rick and Martha, I just know it. Rick has no idea what he's getting himself into. Sheila's a rich brat. She's nothing like me."

"Rick raised three boys, Kit," Barry chuckled. "He and Martha are much tougher than they look. I think your cousin might be in for a shock the first time she gets on Martha's bad side."

"I'd pay to see that," Lilly giggled.

"Well, I can't argue with that," Kit mused. Martha and Rick were very kind people, but they did raise three sons, and sons could be unruly. Perhaps his spoiled cousin, who was only being tractable out of fear, would find a little discipline living with Martha and Rick...at least until she got her own place.

One thing was for sure, she was about to get a rude shock. This wasn't Boston, where she could do whatever she wanted without fear because her family owned the cops. She couldn't go party every night and expect servants to wait on her, feed her, do her housework, and so on. But, there was one thing he did have to talk to her about, so he excused himself from the gang and let them look at the pictures and went into Rick's office.

"Sheila," he called.

"Yeah Kit?"

"Did you plan this at all, or just run down here?"

"I just ran down here," she said, her cheeks ruffling a bit. "I already called Higgins and asked him to gather my clothes and some important things and get ready to have them shipped to me next-day air. I don't even have a change of clothes, just my purse," she said with her cheeks ruffling.

"So, you're not broke? Your mom didn't disown you?"

"No, no!" she said. "I still have my trust. I already wrote Rick a check so he doesn't have to pay for me staying with him til I figure out how to get an apartment."

"Does Aunt Sarah know you're here?"

"She will by tonight," she answered. "I'll tell her the truth, Kit. I'm afraid to go home, because of Cybil. Mom knows about the attack, remember? She didn't believe me when I told her, so, so she won't be all that surprised when I tell her I'm here."

"She'd better not cause Rick any trouble."

"Why should she? He's being very nice to me."

"Alright. But if Sarah starts causing problems, I'll boot your tail outta Austin so fast you won't know what hit you. Understand?"

"She won't, I promise. Mom thinks I'm a flake, Kit, but she won't get her tail twisted over this. I'm where you can keep an eye on me, and I'm not dropping out of school, just asking for a semester off until Cybil goes back to England. When Cybil goes away, I'll come back home."

Kit felt it was a bad idea for Sheila to stay with Rick, stay in Austin, but spending time with Jessie's family made him feel like he should at least give Sheila a chance. Hannah and John were taking a chance on him despite his family and the real danger he might cause Jessie, so the least he could do was at least try to deal with his family and see where it went. He wouldn't have anything to do with his uncles and aunts, but he'd at least try to deal with one of his many cousins, especially one that had never said anything bad to him like some of the others had. Sheila had been too busy getting stoned and chasing males to worry much about the important things. The attack on her had scared her badly, so much she ran from her soft life of comfort and fun, but maybe it would be a good experience for her in the end. A few days of living as a normal person might give her a new perspective.

Martha came and collected up his wayward cousin, and it left Kit a little scattered. He called Jessie, finally, and had to apologize for not calling her as soon as he got back. He explained the situation with his cousin, then blew out his breath. "I'm really sorry, pretty kitty, but with her showing up, it totally messed up my day."

She giggled over the phone. "I was getting worried," she told him. "So, what's this cousin like?"

"Sheila? She's a typical Boston debutante, Jess. She gets drunk, gets stoned, and pretends to go to school while she parties every night and screws any guy who'll give her the time of day."

"That's a pretty ugly description."

“It’s the truth. Sheila’s just one of what the Boston gossip columns calls the Party Pack, a group of Vulpan cousins notorious for that kind of behavior. She’s not half as bad as Bess or Lynn. Lynn’s a legend in Boston.” He leaned back in his chair. “Sheila’s a good example of the curse of money, pretty kitty. She’s rich, so she has no reason to work. So all she does is pursue whatever vanity crosses her mind at the moment. She’s flighty, shallow, vain, and petty. Her whole life revolves around nightclubs, boys, and parties. But now she thinks that Cybil’s trying to kill her, so she ran down here where she thinks Cybil can’t reach her. Rick and Martha are gonna let her stay at their house for a few days, so they can teach her how to do for herself.”

“What do you mean?”

“Kitty, Sheila’s a rich brat. She has no clue how to make it in the real world. Her whole life, she’s had others to do things for her. She doesn’t know how to cook, she doesn’t know how to find an apartment, hell, the only reason she made it down here for two days by herself is because she knows what room service is.”

“I think you’re exaggerating a little, my handsome fox,” Jessie chuckled.

“Not much,” he replied. “She still has her money, but she has no idea how to use it for something other than parties and shopping. If she won’t go home until Cybil goes back to England, then she’ll be here for a few months. That means she needs to get an apartment, a car, and so on and so on, and she has no idea how to do that. I can bet that the monthly income from her trust won’t cover servants, so she’ll have to learn how to live on her own, which will be a first for her. She lives in an apartment just off campus her mother rents for her, and she has her own personal butler to do her cooking and cleaning for her.”

“Hmm,” Jessie mused. “If he’s her personal butler, why won’t he come down and take care of her?”

“She probably could, but she’d have to pay to have her butler move down. If he’ll even come. Something like that may not be in his contract.”

“Contract?”

“Yeah, contract. Any Vulpan servant has to sign a contract stating they never talk to the press, but some of them get some stipulations added for their own side. Clancy has a stipulation that states he only serves at Vulpan Manor, and he never leaves, even after he retires. He literally owns his apartment on the manor. Sheila’s butler might have a similar no-transfer clause.”

“You said she’s going to stay with Rick and Martha?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay. I’ll talk to you tonight, love, I’m gonna go.”

“Alright. Be good, love.”

It was Kit’s long day, so he got busy with the new project, and quite simply let Sheila slip out of his mind as he got to work, once Martha came, fussed over her a little while, then took her back to the tiny ranch where Rick and Martha lived. But she didn’t get far out of his mind for long once he got home. Lupe came out of his apartment when Kit pulled up in the parking lot, and met him at his door. “Yo, brah, I got the apartment all ready.”

“What happened? Did the water go out or something?”

“No, no, the other apartment. Your cousin and Rick’s wife stopped by about an hour ago and signed the lease. Jessie set it up,” he said. “For that one bedroom over in building D. Since she’s your cousin and in a fix, I gave her a month to month lease for four hundred.”

“Jessie—meh,” he grunted. “So, Jessie decided to put a paw in, I see.”

“Actually, your cuz was happy about it. She said you’re the only person she knows here, so she’s glad you’re living close to her. Damn, brah, she’s cute.”

“That’s about all she is, Lupe. All body, no brain.”

Lupe laughed. “Hell, brah, I’ll be happy to look at her. Kinda makes me wish we had a pool. She must drop some jaws when she’s in a bikini.”

“Heh,” Kit grunted as he unlocked the door, opened it, then stepped in and turned off the alarm. “Let me call around and find out what’s going on, Lupe. I had no idea about this.”

“Hey, no prob, brah. We still on for Sunday?”

“You bet. I should have Jessie home before the game starts.”

“Dude, you sure you ain’t gonna be busy?” he grinned.

“I pick her up at nine in the morning Lupe. We’ll surely be finished by then,” he grinned, then closed the door as Lupe laughed.

Calling around to Rick, Martha, and Jessie built a complete picture. Jessie had called Martha not long after she got home with Sheila, talked to Sheila, then called Lupe. Lupe agreed to help and let her sign a month to month lease for the only one bedroom apartment he had available, over on the far side of the complex, which Sheila had picked up the keys for just about two hours ago. Martha and Sheila were buying some furniture she'd need, since all Westwood apartments were unfurnished, and Sheila already had a car. Higgins, her butler back home, was driving her Mustang down to Austin for her along with carrying some of her clothes and things, and would fly back home once he delivered. It took two days to drive from Boston to Austin, so he'd be arriving with her car on Sunday. He wouldn't be staying, but Sheila had already hired a maid service to come clean her apartment starting next week, but had taken up Martha on the offer of teaching her how to cook.

Sheila, it turned out, surprised him a little. She did have money saved, and told Martha she was more than able to buy all the furniture she'd need and still have more than enough money to live on. Martha brought Sheila by the apartment about an hour after he got home, and his cousin looked both happy and excited. "You should see the living room suit we found at this place called Value City!" she told him after he let them in. "It was beautiful! You know, I never thought I'd find good-looking furniture in a place like that," she mused.

"Well, I'm glad you're getting set up, but you'd better behave," Kit warned. "Lupe, the landlord, is my friend, and if you cause any trouble or embarrass me, I'm gonna whip you."

"Kit! Why, I'd never do that!"

"Mmm-hmm," he hummed as he sat back down on the couch, with his laptop on the coffee table. "And who did three weeks in forced rehab last year after she got busted with a purse full of ecstasy?"

Sheila's fur ruffled. "Alright, I'll behave," she said with a grumble. "But don't think I'm not going to have any fun!"

"I'm not your mom, Sheila. I'm not going to hold your paw or tell you what to do. But, since you're living in the same complex with me, remember that if you cause trouble for Lupe, you're causing trouble for me too. And I'm not afraid to come over to your apartment and spank you if Lupe complains about you. So keep it legal. There's all kinds of places around to have fun, Sheila, hell, I'll even take you to some of them. But remember, you'd better keep it legal."

"I'd better not hear of anything like that," Martha told her, a bit sharply.

"No, of course not, Martha," she said quickly. "I don't want to cause any problems, but I also don't want to spend the time waiting for Cybil to leave Boston hiding in my apartment."

"Then you need a job, dear."

"A job?" Sheila gasped. "Me, get a job? Whyever for? Even after buying all that furniture and raiding the store, I still have twenty thousand dollars in the bank. I don't need a job!"

"It's to keep you out of trouble," Martha told her imperiously. "Idle paws are the devil's plaything."

"But, weren't you going to teach me to cook?"

"That doesn't take all day," she told her calmly. "I think I'll make a few calls and find you a job."

Sheila looked devastated. “I’m not supposed to work until after college,” she complained.

“Dear, a job isn’t always a chore,” Martha told her. “You just need to find something you like to do and find work that’s as close to it as you can get. Look at Kit. He loves history and reading, he loves digging through a pile of material for the truth, so he found a job where he uses his love of those things to earn money. Rick runs the magazine. Yes, it’s a job, but he loves it, so it doesn’t feel like work.”

“Yup,” Kit nodded. “What do you like to do?”

“Drink, have fun, and talk to people,” she said immediately.

Martha chuckled. “Well, dear, then let’s ask what interests you. What subject did you like in school? Do you have any hobbies?”

“Well, like any Vulpan, I’m good at math, and I’m a business major,” she answered.

“Not any Vulpan,” Kit chuckled.

“Present company excluded,” she grinned.

“Can you type, dear?”

“Of course I can. Who can’t type?” she asked, quite baffled at the question.

“Then I know just who to call,” she said with a slight smile. “And since you don’t need money, well, you can just work for free.”

“Huh?”

“Rick mentioned the other day that it’s always so busy in the office, they could use an intern,” Martha told her. “A job that keeps you busy and doesn’t pay, well, that sounds like it’s right up your alley, young lady.”

“Woah, woah, woah, you mean she works at the office?” Kit asked. “Around me?”

“What’s wrong with that?”

“She’s part of my family, that’s what wrong with it,” Kit answered. “If you didn’t know, I don’t exactly get along with my family, Martha.”

“You seem to get along with Sheila.”

“Jessie moves her in right down the street from me, and now you want to put her in my office? What is this, some kind of conspiracy?”

“If you want to call it that,” Martha said easily. “Come along, dear, we have to get back and start dinner, and your first cooking lesson.”

“Okay,” Sheila said with a nod. “Bye Kit, and thanks again for helping me. I won’t make you regret it, I promise.”

“You’d better not,” he growled in warning.

Clearly, there was some collusion going on around here. Jessie had put a paw in from Cincinnati to put Sheila in the complex with them, and now Martha was going about her own little agenda about his deviant cousin to place her in the office. What the hell was going on?

A call to Jessie didn’t shed any light on it. “She’s alone in a big city and scared,” she said simply, the sound of water pouring in a bathtub in the background. “I thought if she lived close to us, she’d be more comfortable. Besides, I want to get to know her, Kit. You’ve talked about your family, and I want to get to know more of them than just Vil. I want to see what the Vulpans are like outside your immediate family.”

“You’re on the road to disappointment,” Kit warned her. “Sheila is like any of the Party Pack. As soon as she gets over the change and gets more comfortable, she’ll go right back to her normal ways. Booze, drugs, sex, and parties. And Martha wants her to work at the office,” he grunted. “I have no idea what that’s about.”

“Well, Martha looks at her like she’s a little lost puppy,” Jessie giggled, then she changed the phone over to the speaker phone, and he heard water sloshing.

“Are you taking a bath?” he asked.

“Sure am,” she answered. “I put down the toilet lid and put the phone on the top of it, so it won’t fall in or get wet.”

“Be careful when you turn it off.”

“I will.”

“I showed the gang the pictures you took,” he told her. “I was cheated, you know that?”

“Huh?”

“Where’s that picture you promised me?” he teased.

She laughed. “You can take it when you get home,” she purred at him. “Actually, I should make you wait until we’re married. No photographic evidence til you’re officially mine.”

“Oh no, a Vulpan never lets someone back out of a deal. You agreed to a picture, and I’ll get one, even if I have to cheat,” he taunted.

“Cheat? How are you going to cheat?”

“Well, you’ll be easy enough to photograph when you’re asleep,” he noted.

“Kit! Don’t you dare!”

“Oho, that sounds like a challenge,” he noted into the phone as he turned on the TV to catch the news. “I think I’ll have to use the video camera though, to get the whole experience.”

“If you do that, so help me, I’ll beat you up!” she warned.

“Punish me all you want, my pretty kitty, so long as we kiss and make up afterwards.”

“We’ll talk about that when I get home,” she said darkly.

“I’m looking forward to it,” he teased. “Was your drive home from the airport safe?”

“Mmm,” she answered, which for her meant yes. “It snowed another three inches today, but it’s all supposed to melt by tomorrow night. You know it’s supposed to rain and be nearly sixty tomorrow? Sixty degrees with six inches of snow on the ground! I’d say that was impossible if I didn’t see it for myself!” He heard a little more sloshing. “I swear, the weather’s gone all crazy.”

“Global warming,” Kit chuckled. “Jeffrey says it snowed because I came up there,” he laughed.

“I guess so, Mister Freeze,” she teased. “But if you make it cold down in Austin, I’m gonna skin you!”

He chuckled. “Think you’ll get to sleep tonight?”

“Without you here? Dream on,” she sighed. “But the smell of you in the bed might help a little. At least I won’t feel like I’m all alone. I can bury my face in the pillow and smell you and pretend you’re with me.”

“Just don’t let the pretend me take my place,” he asked. “I’d have a lot of trouble competing with your invisible friend.”

She laughed. “He’d be no competition with you in some ways,” she teased. “But at least he’s better looking.”

“Oh, now that’s a cheap shot,” Kit chuckled. “You’re just digging your hole deeper when it comes to my picture,” he taunted. “You’re descending from artful to tawdry.”

“Tawdry? Tawdry!” she demanded.

“Oh, and who doesn’t pant like a dog when I put my paws in the right places?”

“Watch it, buster,” she called, but Kit could hear the play in her voice, something he could easily identify because he knew her so well. “Boys who can’t keep their knees locked when they get kissed have no right to throw stones.”

“You’re just too much femme for me, my pretty kitty,” he told her. “No boy could kiss you and stay upright afterwards.”

“It’s too bad I’ll never find out if my power extends over other boys,” she said lightly.

“I hope not,” he laughed.

He missed her all over again that night. They again used the laptops and the videoconferencing program to see each other, but it didn’t help him at all. He basically gave up on trying to sleep around three in the morning, and spent most of the time waiting for the sun to rise to work on the election project from home, knocking out quite a bit of what he could do on the internet. By sunrise, he had the candidates researched, information on how Texas ran its elections completely researched and organized, and a very thorough article completed on the national election rules and procedures, about the primary system, the conventions, the national election, and the electoral college. Once the sun came up, he decided to fulfill a promise to Jessie and went to Wal-Mart to look at full-body dryers. What he found there didn't fill him with much confidence, so he just went on to work a full two hours early.

He had nothing else to do, and if he didn't keep himself busy, he'd just pine for Jessie, and he knew it.

Barry and Lilly came in together about fifteen minutes before nine, and they popped their heads in his office. "You made coffee?" Barry asked.

"Yeah, in the pot," he answered, taking a sip of tea.

Lilly gave him a single look. "How long have you been here?"

"Since seven or so," he answered, which made her giggle.

"She comes home tomorrow," Lilly grinned with a wink.

"I keep telling myself that," he grunted.

"You got the bed all ready?" she said outrageously.

Kit chuckled. "To sleep, yeah. I didn't sleep at all last night. I just can't without her with me."

"You're doomed, bro," Barry teased. "She has you totally whipped."

“Which is exactly where he should be!” Lilly said, slapping Barry lightly on the shoulder. “Males are too dangerous and silly to go around without a femme to keep them in line.”

“Only in your world,” Barry teased.

“You two in the office today?” Kit asked.

Barry shook his head. “I have an interview with the department of state for Texas today,” he answered. “It’s the first framework for the election series coming up next month.”

“Oh, I’ll send all the Texas stuff to your Blackberry and computer, then,” Kit said. “I finished up the Texas election process. That should give you something to go on.”

“Nice,” Barry smiled. “Go ahead and chuck it to me.”

“I’m in the office today,” Lilly told him. “I need to go through what I collected last night and update the website.”

“Was surprised to see you in so early,” Kit told her with a grin.

“I called it early last night. I didn’t feel like staying out after I checked out the new band playing down at the Quarry. They’re called Acid, they’re pretty good. That, and I have a lot of work to do on the Scene today. Lots of changes since the semester’s almost over, the bars and clubs change their hours and lots of the music acts bug out. It’ll take me most of the day to get everything updated on the site and hand in the new Scene section into Rick and Savid.”

Kit managed to distract himself all day with work. He got a large piece of the project either knocked out or organized so he knew what order to do the rest of it, but it was going to take time. It was a huge project, and he'd have to do some polls and surveys on top of normal research. He'd probably get his part of it done before the wedding, but it'd be close. It was definitely going to dominate his time.

The wedding. It was only twenty-four days away. The rings were bought, the dress was bought, his tux was bought, and they were supposed to come down and do a final fitting on Thursday. They had an appointment on the fifth to get the marriage license blood test, and with that it was just a simple matter of handing in all the paperwork at the courthouse and getting the license. Jessie had to start getting the name change paperwork going after they had the license, so she'd have everything done before the actual wedding. Jessie wanted to walk into the church with her license already giving her name as Jessica Desdemona Vulpan, which was legal in Texas. The marriage license was all that was required, and they didn't put a marriage date on it. Spouses who changed their names could do so before the actual ceremony.

There was a knock at his door right about when he was about to pack it in and head out to the mall to look at dryers, and saw Sandy, Jeffrey, Sam, and Kevin. "Hey, we were gonna go out and wanted to see if you wanted to tag along," Sandy told him.

"Nah, I have to go to the mall and look at full body dryers," he answered. "I promised Jessie I'd get one."

"Ah, cool."

"I bought mine at J.C. Penny, and it's been pretty good," Kevin offered. "It's the Arixx model. It fits in the corner of my bedroom real nice."

Kit held up a printed page of full body dryers, features, dependability reviews, warranty options, and suggested retail prices. Arixx was one of three models that was circled on the sheet for consideration. Sandy looked at it, and laughed. “Shoulda known,” she grinned.

“It’s what I do for a living, silly chinchilla,” Kit said mildly. “Think I don’t know how to do it for myself?”

“I bet that car salesmen wet themselves when they see you coming, Kit,” Kevin laughed.

“I haven’t bought a car yet. When I do, I’ll let you know,” Kit chuckled.

After work, Kit hit the mall. He did take Kevin’s suggestion of looking in J.C. Penny, and found the Arixx model that he’d circled on sale there at a price very close to what was suggested by his research. Two hundred dollars was a lot of money, but this was a justifiable expense, and besides, Jessie wanted one. He bought what he was after, a five foot tall corner model with a raised platform to keep the hot air off the carpet, took it home, and spent nearly two hours putting it together in the corner between the wall where the bed’s headboard was and the wall that held the window. The unit was pretty comprehensive, having to be bolted to the wall and with a large base to give it stability. It had a long, wide central column from which drying ducts radiated to blow over the fur standing on the platform, and it was large enough to let him go through the motions of combing fur or drying with a towel while on the platform without banging his elbows on the unit. It had adjustable fan speeds and fully adjustable temperature, from cold to almost blisteringly hot, and what was most clever, it had a pressure switch in the floor that made it turn off if nobody was standing on it. With that nifty little feature, it could just be left on all the time and set to a comfortable level, and it would turn itself on whenever one stepped onto it.

Jessie would be very happy with it, he was sure.

The effort to put it together, coupled with the sleepless night, did its magic on Kit. He was exhausted when he finished the job, and crawled into bed around eight to rest, but actually fell asleep.

Kit was set to go to Bergstrom at seven, a full two hours before Jessie's plane was scheduled to arrive. She'd called him at three in the morning, but he'd already been awake. She was leaving Cincinnati at seven and was scheduled to arrive at ten after nine. They stayed on the phone until she left for the airport, and Kit was so keyed up waiting for her to get home that he couldn't stay still, couldn't even get any work done. He went for a jog around the neighborhood, took a shower, then used the new full body dryer and found it to be quite satisfactory. He then dressed and was on his way out the door, when Sandy and Sam pulled up into the parking lot. "Hey, you gonna go get her?" Sandy asked.

"On the way now."

"Got room for two more? We'd like to go," Sam said.

"Sure, jump in," he said as he used the keychain remote to unlock his truck. "But mind she's not due in for like two hours. I just can't wait around here anymore."

"We figured, that's why we got here early," Sandy grinned as she locked her car. "I got shotgun!"

After they were on their way, he glanced back at Sam. “So, what do you think of Kevin?”

“I like him,” she said without blinking. “I really like him. He’s smart, kind, considerate, and charming. And I don’t know if I should hit you or kiss you for playing matchmaker.”

“Eh, I had a hunch,” he told her. “I’m glad I was right. How was the date?”

“It was great until Sandy threw up outside the theater,” Sam said, leaning over the front seat and giving the chinchilla a harsh look.

“It was the popcorn at the theater,” she said with an embarrassed look. “The butter they used on it didn’t agree with my tummy.”

“Well, maybe she was giving the future doctor a little practice in front of Kevin,” Kit said with a sly look at her.

“Oh, please,” Sam sighed.

Sam and Sandy did do wonders for keeping him from going nuts while they waited at the airport. Sam had brought her laptop, and showed him a bunch of pictures of her family and the bar her dad owned in Florida. They spent nearly an hour in the little shopping mall and ate breakfast at Dunkin Donuts, then waited near the security gate when nine o’clock rolled around.

At nine fifteen, his phone rang. It was Jessie. “I’m in the terminal and on the way,” she told him excitedly. “Where are you?”

“We’re at the security gate. Sam and Sandy came too.”

“Is Sheila here?”

“No, I haven’t talked to her since Friday.”

“Oh. See you in a few.”

Kit paced outside the security gate, then his heart soared when he saw her. She ran into his arms and crushed him in a fierce hug, then they shared a long, lingering kiss. “Hello there, future Misses Vulpan,” Kit cooed in her ear.

“Fancy meeting you here, Mister Vulpan,” she teased in return, her fingers tracing over the scars on his back through his shirt and light jacket. “Hey guys, thanks for coming to pick me up!” Jessie called, hugging each of her friends in turn. “Now let’s go get my suitcase and go home!” she declared as Kit took her carry-on bag from her and shouldered it.

“I hope you remember that Kit has poker today, Jessie,” Sam reminded as they headed for baggage claim.

“Yeah, so that means that after we get back to the apartment, you two are booted,” she grinned, which made Sandy laugh.

“Wherever did you go vestal virgin,” Sandy teased.

“She met a guy,” Jessie teased. “She thinks he’s the best thing on Earth. She’s going to marry him in twenty-three days, but she was more than willing to give him an advance on the fun parts of being married.”

Sam and Sandy both erupted into laughter, but Kit just pulled her under his arm and squeezed her shoulder gently. “So, how did it go after I left?”

“Not bad,” she answered. “Me and mom still had a few fights, but your visit really changed her. She was fighting over little things, not over the marriage itself.”

“Well, I’m glad for that. Did your family make hotel reservations?”

“Yeah, all taken care of. They’re staying at the Holiday Inn off thirty-five. It’s only about two miles from the church.”

“They flying or driving?”

“Flying. I promised them they could use my car while they’re here.”

“I’m looking forward to meeting that hunk of a brother of yours,” Sandy said brightly.

“What, you’re kicking Jeffrey to the curb already?” Sam asked archly.

“Oh, hell no. Jeffrey’s fantastic, but Ben is just pure eye candy. I want see if he’s as hunky in person as he is in pictures.”

“You sooooo need a life,” Sam grated.

Sam and Sandy said their goodbyes after they got home, and Kit hauled Jessie’s suitcase into the bedroom. She followed him and squealed in delight when she saw the dryer in the corner. “You bought it, you bought it!” she said happily, colliding with him and driving him down onto the bed, kissing him exuberantly. “I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan!” she declared, then she noticed his wince. “Did I hurt your back?”

“My tail’s kinked,” he said with a grunt, pulling his tail out from under him and its uncomfortable position. “There, all better,” he said, gripping her by her waist, near her sensitive spot. “Soooo, you want some breakfast?”

“Later,” she said, driving him down to the bed and kissing him quite seriously.

Chapter 13

With Mickey back from his trip, it made it a full table at poker, given that Sam, Kevin, and Jeffrey had joined them. Jessie didn't like poker, so she wasn't at the table, though she, Sandy, and Danielle were there. Sam had suggested they take advantage of a warm day to grill, and Mickey had dragged his outdoor grill over from his porch to do it. It had turned into quite the little party, where everyone ponied up some cash to buy some hamburgers and hot dogs, Sam brought two cases of European lagers of different brands for them to try, and Jessie, Danielle, and Sandy had offered to do the actual grilling in return for later favors. They were silent as to what this favor was, but Kit figured it would be something interesting.

It was a swift and calming return to the routine. Jessie was back home, and after their rather exuberant welcome home, it was right back to the way things should be. Poker was the Sunday ritual, and Jessie herself wanted to get back to the routine, even if it was her first day back after being gone for a week. Danielle was new to the gathering, and Sam, Kevin, Sandy, and Jeffrey were still settling into the poker group, so it wasn't entirely routine. It was a little big for Lupe's apartment, but he was happy to have them over.

“Man, Jessie, that smells awesome! What is it?” Mickey asked.

“Baked nuts,” she answered as she bent over the oven in the kitchen. “I think you'll like them.”

“What kind of food is that?” Lupe asked.

“It’s an appetizer,” she answered. “Just trust me.”

“How was Louisiana, Mick?” Dan asked as he shuffled the cards.

“Dude, it was hot,” he answered. “It was ninety degrees! In November!”

“Well, they had six inches of snow on the ground when I left Cincinnati on Friday,” Kit chuckled. “I guess the weather’s gone totally screwy on us. How warm is it outside right now?”

“It’s eighty, when it’s usually around sixty for this time of year,” Sam answered.

There was a knock at the door, and before Lupe could call out, Sheila poked her head inside. “Hello? Kit?”

Kit sighed. “Can she come in, Lupe?”

“Yah sure,” he grinned. “Come in!”

“Kit, Higgins just got here,” she told him. “I got my car! Oh, I didn’t realize it was a party,” she said, looking around.

“Party no, just Sunday poker,” Dan said, giving her a toothy grin. “From those eyes, she’s a relative of yours, Kit?”

“Yeah. Everyone, this is Sheila Vance Vulpan, one of my cousins. Sheila, this is the poker crew. Dan, Mickey, Sam, Kevin, Jeffrey, you know Lupe, and there in the kitchen are Sandy, Danielle, and my fiancée, Jessie.”

Jessie rushed out of the kitchen and immediately took Sheila’s paws. Kit couldn’t see Jessie’s expression, but Sheila looked up at the taller femme with her maw open. “I was hoping to meet you!” Jessie told her happily. “I’m Jessica, but you can call me Jessie.”

“We call her JD,” Sandy teased from the kitchen.

“So, you’re the cat Kit’s marrying,” Sheila said, looking at her. “I see why he likes you. You’re a cat with fox markings.”

She laughed. “My grandfather was a fox,” she admitted.

“You’re mixed? Wow, would my mother ever blow a fuse if she knew that,” Sheila laughed. “Then again, they had a meltdown when they heard about you.”

“How bad?”

“Bad,” she said seriously. “The family’s all a bunch of purists.”

“And you? What do you think about it?”

“I don’t matter,” she said simply, a little quietly. “The cousins, we don’t really count for anything in the family. Our parents never listen to us.”

“Well, I will. Does it bother you that I’m a cat?”

“Me? Naw, not really. I date outside my species all the time, and my mother would have a fit if she found out,” she admitted with a slight smile. “If I could only go out with foxes, I’d really be hurting around here,” she noted. “Though it’s not so bad at home.”

“How so?” Sam asked curiously.

“It’s Boston,” she said, like that explained everything.

“Boston is nearly one half fox by population,” Kit explained as Dan dealt. “Because it was a colony, and many of them never left. Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire are predominately fox, while the southern colonies are way more integrated because of the big cities and immigration. But it's cold in Boston, so we didn't get much immigration there, and it shows today in the large segment of foxes that make up the population. In some parts of Massachusetts, you can go to a small town and find nothing but foxes. New England is the most unintegrated part of America."

"It's like that in some parts of bayou country," Mickey said. "Cajuns. You go to a little town and it's all one species, or just two or three."

"That'd be weird," Sandy said. "Living in a town with only one breed?"

"And now you know why purism is so rampant in New England," Kit said to her.

"Well, come to the kitchen," Jessie urged, pulling Sheila's paws as she backed up. "We have to talk!"

"Uh, well, can I come back? Higgins is still here, and I have to get him to the airport. I think he'd poison my tea if I made him take a cab."

Jessie laughed. "Sure! You know where our apartment is?"

"No, but I can just come back here and Lupe can send me in the right direction."

Sheila said her goodbyes and hurried out, and Kit grabbed Jessie's paw as she went back to the kitchen to halt her. "There's a scheme hatching in that pretty head of yours, isn't there?" he demanded.

She laughed. "Scheme? No, I just want to get to know my in-laws, that's all," she grinned.

"Is she like the rest of your family, Kit?" Kevin asked curiously.

“Sheila? No. She’s harmless,” he said dismissively as Jessie kissed him on the cheek and went back to the kitchen. “Sheila’s a party girl. She goes to Harvard, but she doesn’t bother showing up for classes. She just parties every night.”

“Harvard? Wow.”

“Don’t read much into that,” Kit grunted. “She’s a legacy student.”

“What’s that?” Dan asked.

“She got in only because her father’s an alum and she’s a Vulpan. She’ll graduate with a C average, even if she never shows up for a single class.”

“They cheat in Harvard?” Kevin said, with some surprise.

“When the student’s name is Vulpan, and the family owns the city where your college is located, you do what they want or they find ways to strangle you,” Kit said simply. “The rules are different for the rich, Kev.”

“I see,” Kevin said, scratching his muzzle thoughtfully.

The baked nuts were excellent. She coated mixed nuts with a spiced glaze and baked them, and served them while they were still warm. They were great, and went very well with the thick, tasty lagers that Sam brought with her. The Cowboys weren’t playing today because they played on Thanksgiving, so at least he didn’t have to suffer through listening to them harp on the team when Lupe turned on the late game. They put the game on hold when Jessie declared it was time to grill, so they turned off the game, turned on the radio, and moved out onto the porch and courtyard, drank beer, ate hot dogs, hamburgers, and grilled chicken for Sandy and Danielle, and had a wonderful time. They even attracted some of the other tenants, who stopped by to chat—at least the ones that weren't on Lupe's bad side, anyway—and filch a hot dog.

Sheila got back about an hour after leaving, twirling her car keys around one of her fingers. Jessie intercepted her and pulled her into the kitchen, and there the two of them, Sandy, and Danielle talked literally for hours as the poker game raged in the living room. Mickey won the poker game at the showdown, which made Jeffrey laugh since he'd been leading the entire game. After the game, they cleaned up after themselves and said their goodbyes to Lupe. Sheila wandered back to her own apartment, and Kit and Jessie helped take Mickey's grill back over to his porch, then headed home themselves.

“So, you talked to Sheila,” Kit noted as he took the camera into the den to upload the pictures they'd taken during poker into the desktop. “What did you think?”

“I think she has a serious inferiority complex problem,” she called from the living room, then she came into the room. “The poor girl thinks she doesn't matter more than pond scum. No wonder she spends all her time drinking and getting stoned. If I felt I was worthless, I'd do the same thing.”

“Welcome to the Vulpans,” Kit said grimly as he started uploading pictures. “I don't think there's a single sane member of my family. And I'm including me and Vil.”

Jessie giggled. “Well, your insanity was just temporary, my handsome fox,” she told him, leaning down and kissing him on his injured ear. She laughed raucously when he put up an image of Sam swatting Kevin on the muzzle with her paw, his eyes closed and flinching. “When did she do that?”

“When you went out to start the grill. He asked her how far down her white patch goes.”

Jessie laughed. “He deserved it then.”

“She told him it goes as far on her as it does on any other skunk. She whacked him when he dared her to prove it.”

“Now that sounds like Sam,” Jessie giggled. “You know, we should set up a Myspace page for the pictures so everyone can see them.”

“That would be nice. I wonder how those two get along in private.”

“Oh, I know that already,” Jessie said teasingly. “Sam is my best friend.”

“I’m not that curious, just hoping I didn’t do something stupid when I introduced them.”

“Oh, no way,” she assured him. “Sam and Kevin really get along. They’re going out on their fifth date tonight.”

“Fifth date in just a week? Wow. That’s, like, us levels of dating.”

“Yeah,” she giggled. “I just feel sorry for Tim.”

“Who’s that?”

“The guy she was seeing before she met Kevin.”

“She had a boyfriend?”

“She had someone she was dating,” Jessie told him. “He was alright with it, actually. They moved on to just friends after Sam met Kevin.”

“Aww, damn. I never knew that,” he grunted.

“No, it was alright. I don’t think Sam and Tim would have made it, just like Sandy and Bobby. Sam was too smart for Tim. So don’t feel bad about it.”

“Eh, well,” he sighed, then he leaned back and closed his eyes when Jessie’s paws started massaging his shoulders. “Mmm, that’s nice,” he hummed.

“You’re tense.”

“I’m tired. I’ve had about four hours of sleep since I got home on Friday.”

“Well, nothing’s stopping you from taking a nap, love.”

“Yes there is. Did you get your homework done?”

“Homework? That’s a silly question.”

“So, did you?”

“Well....”

“Uh-huh. Go. Work. Do,” he commanded, reaching up and bopping her on the forehead with the back of his paw.

“Don’t make me use those long English words on you,” Jessie teased, leaning down and biting his right ear.

“Don’t make me threaten you with a punishment that we’ll both hate if you don’t do what you’re supposed to do.”

“Oh, and what would that be?”

“How would you like to sleep on the couch?” he threatened.

“Girls don’t sleep on the couch. Boys do.”

“This is my apartment,” he countered. “And my back can’t handle the couch. So, no homework, no bed, young lady,” he said authoritatively.

“Oh, pulling out the nuclear weapons, are we? Threatening to withhold sex?” she giggled, purring in his ear. “You’ll cave before I do. I know where your on switch is.”

“Flirting with me is not doing your homework,” he said coolly in reply. “Go get your homework done, then we can sit on the couch and snuggle.”

“Not for too long. I have class in the morning, and I have other things on my mind,” she cooed.

“Yeah, sleep,” Kit said.

Jessie slapped him on the top of the head.

Sheila decided to come over while Jessie was doing her homework in the den. She was wearing a tank top that ended at her ribcage and a pair of cut-off hip-hugger jeans, showing off as much of her attractive stomach and long legs as possible. She was taking advantage of the balmy Texas climate, when it was below freezing in Boston and would remain so until sometime in April, most likely. It was much warmer than usual, but such warm spells like the one they’d enjoyed today weren’t uncommon. It had started off in the 40s that morning, and had warmed up to the 70s...but tomorrow was supposed to be rainy and in the 50s. “Hey cousin,” she said, opening the door and peeking in. “Can I come in?”

“Yah sure,” he said, then his brow rose when he saw how she was dressed. “That’s one way to attract attention,” he noted.

She laughed. "I had Higgins pack my summer clothes. You know it was twenty degrees in Boston today?" She patted her bare midriff, showing off her white-furred stomach, which was sleek, toned, and very attractive to any straight male with a pulse. "I have to enjoy it while I can." She came in and sat on the couch with him, grabbing a pillow and putting it in her lap. "Umm, I just wanted to tell you, I'm starting work tomorrow. At the office."

"Really?"

"Yeah. Martha said it'll be good for me, but I'm not so sure about that. I have no idea what to expect. What do you do when you work?"

"Well, what are you going to do?"

"Well, from what Rick said, I'll be an intern. Fetch and carry, go run errands, and I'll be doing some typing and stuff for Rick. He wants me to go with him when he goes to see advertisers, he said. I don't know why."

"Rick's a sly one, Sheila. Odds are, you're there to look pretty and distract them."

"Oh, well, that's something I can do," she giggled. "I'm good at looking pretty. It's about all I really know how to do, to be honest about it."

"Don't talk like that!" Jessie shouted from the den.

"Oh, I thought she was sleeping or something."

"Nah, she's doing homework," Kit answered.

"I'm supposed to go with you when you go to do some surveys or something. Help you out."

"I don't really need all that much help."

“Well, Rick said you’ll get more boys to talk to you if I’m there.”

Kit laughed. “Rick is a sly one,” he repeated. “So, there’s your work,” he told her. “You’ll be a gopher, like one of Aunt Sarah’s maids.”

“A Vulpan, a maid,” she said, making a face. “How will I ever live it down?”

“Then don’t do it.”

She looked at him. “No, I think I want to try,” she said. “I have to stay out of trouble, and I guess, working will help me do that,” she said, all but choking on the word working. “Besides, I’m kinda scared of Martha. If I piss her off, she might spank me.”

Kit laughed. “She likes you, I think. She wouldn’t be wasting her time on you if she didn’t, I suppose.”

“Well, do you like me, Kit?” she asked directly.

“I don’t know yet,” he answered honestly. “I’m still very angry at the family, Sheila, and you’re part of that family. No, you’re not Uncle Zach or Uncle Jake or Aunt Maxine, but when the family turned its back on me, I didn’t hear you object. When I got hit by that car, you never visited. You chose money over me, Sheila. After I went to Jessie’s house for Thanksgiving, I guess it made me curious when you came out of nowhere at the airport, and made me forgiving enough to at least be civil to you. But you have a lot of ground to make up if you want to be my friend, Sheila.”

“Well, there’s not much I can say about that, Kit,” she told him. “I was afraid of losing my trust fund. We all knew Uncle Luke would do it. Hell, he disowned you, and you were his own son! We were terrified of having it happen to us too. I, I couldn’t make it without my money, Kit. I’m just a dumb, ditzy party girl, but I'm smart enough to know that much. Hell, when I decided to stay here in Austin, I had no idea what to do. Where to go. There's no way I could make it on my own. My whole life, I've had servants to do things for me, and Mom's always there to bail me out or hold my paw when I get in over my head. I guess that's why she thinks I'm still a child," she sighed. "Every time I have even a little trouble, I always run to her instead of trying to figure out what to do my by myself. So I guess when I ran to her because Cybil wants to kill me, she just blew me off cause I run to her at least once a week over some stupid shit," she sighed, leaning back on the couch. "I'm the girl who cried wolf," she mused with dark humor. "And the one time it mattered, nobody believed me."

"I don't really believe you either," he admitted. "But I can see that since you believe it, then it's important enough to at least act like you're right. Better safe than sorry."

"Yeah, I guess so," she said, her slender fingers digging into the pillow in her lap. "What did Vil say?"

"She doesn't believe you either, but you know her. She'll look into it."

"I just want her to go home," Sheila complained. "I won't go back to Boston until Cybil takes her mangy ass back to England. Then everything can go back to normal. I'll get out of your hair, I can go back to school, back to my friends, back to what's normal."

"Do you really go to school?"

She looked at him. "Yeah, I really do," she admitted. "Does that surprise you?"

"A little. I figured you either blew it off or slept through class."

“I miss my morning class sometimes, but it’s boring,” she complained. “But I’m there for the business and accounting classes.”

“So, business interests you?”

“Well, I’m good at it,” she said. “It’s not much of a question of being interested. I just don’t feel like a dumbshit in those classes. Then I go to computer science class and feel like a dumbshit all over again,” she sighed.

Kit gave her a slight smile. “Then maybe you should talk to Rick, and see what running a business is really about,” he prompted. “What you learn in class is much different than the real world.”

“As soon as I figure out Excel,” she said. “I just can’t wrap my brain around that thing, but that’s all we use in accounting class.”

“Well, I guess I can help you there,” he said. “I know Excel fairly well. I use it at work all the time.”

“You do the books for Rick?”

“Nah, I use it in my research. It does a lot more than just do math.”

“I didn’t know that. Does Rick do his own books?”

“Yes and no,” he said. “He does the books himself, but an accounting agency shadows his own accounting and does the books come tax time.”

“Oh, so he just takes his stuff to them at tax time and they check it over, then do his taxes?”

“Yeah, more or less,” he nodded.

“What’s Jessie’s major? She told me, but I forgot,” she said, her cheeks ruffling.

“English,” he answered. “She wants to teach.”

“Teach snobby, arrogant little brats? No thank you.”

“You are one of those snobby, arrogant brats,” Kit told her pointedly.

She laughed. “I guess I am. You have anything to drink around here?”

“Not for you,” he answered bluntly. “Remember when I said you’d better stay legal? That applies.”

She stuck her tongue out at him. “I don’t want to get smashed, I just want a glass of wine!”

He gave her a glance. “Over the stove.”

“Hig—“ she started to shout, then laughed ruefully. “Uh, guess I’d better go get it.”

“If you want it, you’d better,” Kit agreed mildly.

She bounded into the kitchen, he heard glasses clinking, and she returned a moment later with two glasses of dark red wine. She gave him one and sat back down, taking a sip of it. “Ooh, nice. This a local label?”

“It’s one of those cheap Californian mass produced wines,” he told her calmly. “But, as you can tell, it’s good.”

“Who’d have thunk it,” she mused, taking another sip.

Jessie came from the den and gave them a curious look. “Contributing to the delinquency of a minor, Kit?” she teased.

“Pft,” Sheila snorted. “Vulpans start drinking wine when they’re still in the crib,” she informed her.

“That’s a family-wide trait, I’m afraid,” Kit agreed. “I had my first glass of wine when I was ten. Vulpans don’t believe in the majority age deal. Just an example of what I told you, pretty kitty. Vulpans ignore laws that don’t suit them.”

“Ooh, maybe after we get married I can start running red lights,” she giggled.

“Maybe if you were in Boston,” Sheila laughed. “Want a glass?”

“Sure. Unlike you, I am old enough,” she grinned.

“Like that ever stopped me before,” Sheila said flippantly, standing up. “I gotta get used to being a gopher, so lemme get it for you.”

Jessie sat down, and immediately snuggled up against him. He put an arm around her and gripped her shoulder. “Hey there, future Misses Vulpan. Got your homework done?”

“It’s printing now,” she answered.

Sheila came back out, and Jessie extricated herself from him to take the glass she offered. “Thanks,” she said, pulling her legs up under herself and sitting demurely against his side. “I guess I shouldn’t be all that surprised that your family lets you drink, Sheila.”

“Well, they let me drink something like this, but they frown on me clubbing,” she grinned. “Oh, I meant to ask. Where do you work out? Someone as thin as you has to go to a gym, and I gotta work to keep this figure.”

“I use the university, they have a gym,” she answered. “Every day after lunch.”

“What about you, Kit? Where do you go?”

“Nowhere. I just don’t eat a lot, and my work keeps me pretty busy, even if I do sit a lot. But I’ve been thinking about it.”

“Well, let’s go in with a group package, so I have a place to work out, and it’s cheaper for all of us.”

“You have money, and you worry about cheap?” Jessie grinned at her.

“I have money because I’m a miser,” Sheila said immediately. “Why do you think I had so much money saved up? I go out a lot and party, but I also learned that if I’m careful with my money in other places, I can spend as much as I want when I go clubbing and not worry about it. My brothers and sisters are all broke by the end of the month, but I’m never broke,” she declared, a little smugly.

“How can you be broke when you’re rich?”

“We get checks off our trusts,” she answered. “Mine are set up for every week. Every Friday, it gets deposited in my bank account. My brother Sam gets his every month, but that’s a stupid way to do it, in my opinion. He gets that huge wad of cash on the first, but by the twentieth he’s broke.”

Jessie looked around Kit and gave her a long, curious look. “You’re not as dumb as you think you are, Sheila,” Jessie said approvingly. “I think you’re actually pretty smart.”

“Aww, thanks,” she said, her cheeks ruffling. “We gotta go out and party, Jessie. Then you get to see the real me,” she grinned.

“How about Friday?” she offered.

“Why not tomorrow?”

“Because I have morning classes, and I don’t miss school. No way right now, because finals are coming up,” she grunted. “I get to do finals while we’re getting ready for the wedding.”

“Ooh, when!”

“The eighteenth.”

“Oh, wow, that soon? Can I come?”

“Well, I guess,” Kit said after a moment’s thought. “We have a lot to do on the way up to it.”

“When’s the blood test again? For some reason, I just can’t keep that in my head,” Jessie said with a sour grunt.

“The fifth. We have the final fitting of our wedding clothes on Thursday, and the monsignor wants to have a couple of conferences with us about the wedding, but I haven’t scheduled those yet. You know, when we give him our planned script for the ceremony, he has to know what’s going on. We have two rehearsals, on the fifteenth and seventeenth. What about your side?”

“The florists and decorations are all set up,” she answered. “The church will let them set up the arrangements the day before. The Four Corners is booked and the decorations are picked out. Vil reserved some space at the airport for her plane, and she said our flight to Boston and Florida are both filed and ready. What does filed mean?”

“She filed the flight plans with the FAA,” he answered. “Private planes do have leeway and can file flight plans sometimes literally at the spur of the moment, but the FAA does like to have planned flight plans filed as early as possible.”

“Ah.”

“You still have your pilot’s license, Kit?” Sheila asked.

“I keep it up to date,” he nodded. “That reminds me, I have to find a flight school. I have my logged hours all done this year, but I’ll need logged hours for next year.”

“You could fly us around,” she grinned.

“No, renting planes is expensive,” Kit shook his head.

“Wait a minute, you’re going to Boston?”

“Because both me and Vil promised our mom we’d get married at the Holy Cross,” Kit answered. “I’m going to have my ceremony down here, but afterwards we’re flying to Boston to have a quick ceremony at the Holy Cross before we go on to our honeymoon in Florida.”

“Oh. Well, that’s sweet of you, cousin, fulfilling your mom’s wish.”

“Jessie, wanna go help me find a dress for the wedding after w—work tomorrow?” Sheila asked.

Jessie laughed. “If you keep practicing, you’ll eventually be able to say that word.”

“It’s a four letter word to a Vulpan,” she grinned, elbowing Kit lightly. “Well, except this one.”

“Sure, I’ll go shopping with you,” Jessie answered. “We need to hang out a little anyway. You’re part of the in-laws, I need to get to know you.”

“I’m no in-law,” she said, then she laughed. “And don’t think the family’s like me. I’m just a dumb, ditzzy party girl. I’m harmless. You haven't met the real Vulpans, Jessie, like my mom, or Uncle Zach, or Uncle Jake, or Aunt Maxine."

"How many aunts and uncles do you have, Kit?" Jessie asked. "I've always meant to ask you that, but I guess I've never got around to it."

"I have six," Kit answered. "Grandpa had seven kids, five boys and two girls."

"My mom Sarah's the third youngest," Sheila answered. "Kit's dad was the oldest. Uncle Brian's the youngest. It goes Uncle Luke, Uncle Zach, Aunt Maxine, Uncle Jake, my mom, Uncle Tom, and then Uncle Brian." She leaned over Kit and looked at Jessie. "My mom was like grandma, she had a lot of kids. Mom had six kids. I'm the second youngest. My brother Sam's the oldest, he's twenty-six. My younger sister Christine is fifteen."

"How can you two be so close together in age if your parents are far apart?"

"Because my mom didn't have Vil til dad was like twenty-six," Kit answered.

"And my mom got married and started cranking out babies when she was eighteen," Sheila answered. "The oldest of the cousins are like, what Kit, twenty-nine?"

"Around that. I think Bridgette is thirty."

"Wow, so Vil's not the oldest cousin?"

"No, Uncle Zach was married when he was eighteen and his wife had Bridgette while my dad was still in school," Kit answered. "The oldest male Vulpan cousin is Patrick, he's twenty-seven. He's Maxine's first. Vil is actually the third oldest of the cousins, at twenty-six, with Sheila's brother just two weeks behind her."

"Where are you in there?"

"Me? I'm on the front end of the middle," he answered. "The average age of the cousins is one year younger than me. And they've already started working on the next generation. Bridgette and Patrick both have kids of their own."

"I hope to have our own contribution next year," Jessie giggled, leaning against Kit.

"Too bad our kids'll never see another Vulpan outside of me and Vil," Kit told her.

"Hey, and me!" Sheila said indignantly.

"Seriously, love, if I showed up in Boston with a mixed breed baby, I think it would make the universe explode," he said to her. "When you get pregnant, we just stay very quiet and stay as far from Massachusetts as possible. If we raise a fuss, there might be another hitman coming down here to pay us a little visit."

"He's not joking," Sheila agreed when Jessie was about to discount him. "If you put your baby in Uncle Zach's face, he might try to kill it right on the spot. Don't judge our family by me and Kit, Jessie. Most of them are rabid purists. All my brothers and sisters are purists. My mom's a purist, my dad's a purist, all our aunts and uncles are purists, and virtually all our cousins are purists except for a couple of them. I think I'm not a purist just to rebel against them," she said clinically.

"Which ones said they're not purists?" Kit asked curiously.

“Muffy, Angela, Victor, and Steve. Vil, well, you can never tell anything about Vil anyway. I don’t know about her.”

“Muffy?” Jessie laughed. “Now that’s a rich girl name!”

“Her real name is Eugenia Minerva Vulpan, but she hates it, so everyone calls her Muffy,” Sheila explained. “Then again, she’s forgotten why we call her that.”

“She took it as a badge of honor I think,” Kit nodded, then he chuckled.

“Why did you call her Muffy?”

“She used to go around her house naked all the time, even well into her teens,” Sheila explained with a grin. “Since she showed off her muff to anyone who’d look at her, we called her Muffy. It just kinda stuck after a while. She’s still like that. Muffy just can’t keep her clothes on.”

“Girls who are almost there themselves shouldn’t be ragging on cousins,” Kit noted.

Sheila laughed. “I’m not shy about showing off what God gave me,” she said with an outrageous grin.

“Well, there’s nothing wrong with that,” Jessie said. “I’m not above wearing some nice things that show me off when I’m in the right company,” she said, patting Kit’s knee meaningfully.

“Ah, you two are having sex already?”

“Naturally,” Jessie told her. “We do live together, after all.”

“Good. If you don’t have sex before marriage, how do you know you’re gonna be satisfied after you tie the knot?”

“Interesting position for a Catholic to take,” Jessie giggled.

“Pft, I’m as Catholic as the Dalai Lhama,” she snorted in reply. “Besides, you won’t find a more notorious bunch of adulterers than a Catholic family. After all, when all you have to do is confess, you’re not afraid to sin.”

“That’s an interesting way to look at it,” Jessie noted, taking a sip of wine.

“So, you two have sex, eh? He any good?” Sheila asked, giving Jessie a grin.

Jessie’s face poofed out, then she laughed. “Why am I not surprised you’d ask that?”

“Girls who dress like this aren’t afraid to ask questions like that,” she said brazenly, motioning at her skimpy attire.

“You realize you’re asking about your own cousin.”

“He has to maintain the family reputation, even if he’s not in the family anymore,” she grinned at him. “All Vulpans are good at two things, business and sex. Male Vulpans are notorious femanizers, and femme Vulpans are almost legendary for their availability. So, is he a true Vulpan?”

“Oh, he’s a real Vulpan alright in some ways,” Jessie said with her face poofed out, but giving him a naughty smile. “But if I catch him chasing after another femme’s tail, I’ll cut his off and hang it on the wall.”

Sheila laughed. “No in-law has tamed a Vulpan since Aunt Beth tamed Uncle Luke,” she declared. “Every other Vulpan cheats on their spouses, even my own mom.”

“Well, I’m tamed,” Kit told Sheila. “This is the only femme for me. She’s almost too much femme,” he chuckled, putting his arm around Jessie.

“I just know how to keep my male happy, that’s all,” she purred, nuzzling his muzzle. “He doesn’t have to go roaming to find what makes him happy.”

“You’re part fox, I guess you have a genetic understanding of a young fox’s needs,” Sheila grinned as she picked up her wine glass. “Now if I could just find a male version of you,” she complained. “Clubbing is fun, I meet bunches of handsome guys and I have lots of good sex, but I’ve been looking for something, well, more lately,” she said, a little distantly, swirling her wine in its glass before drinking about half of what was left in one swallow.

“I should introduce you to my brother,” Jessie offered. “You’d like him. He’s big as a barn, but gentle like a teddy bear.”

“That’s incest,” Sheila giggled.

“Not when you’re in-laws it’s not,” Jessie told her. “That way my brother can leech off your trust fund and never have to worry about money, so he can focus all his attention on playing football.”

Sheila laughed. “The true motive revealed! Wait, he plays football?” Sheila asked.

“You just lost your brother,” Kit noted to Jessie.

“I love football!” Sheila exclaimed. “I know that makes me a mutant, a girl that likes football, but I love it!”

“Really?” Jessie asked. “You’re talking to a girl from a football family, Sheila. Our dad’s like the ultimate Bengals fan, so we grew up with football.”

“I just love the game. So, your brother plays?”

She nodded. “He’ll be playing for a college team next year. He doesn’t know which one yet, but he should start getting offers soon. He figures as soon as his high school finishes the playoffs.”

“Cool! They good?”

“They’re very good,” Jessie said proudly. “Won the 4A championship for two straight years, and they play for the championship next Friday. Ben told me that colleges won’t make any offers until the season’s over, and since they’re still playing, he’s just waiting.”

“What position does he play?”

“Running back, but he also sometimes plays linebacker and plays special teams. He’s really strong, but he’s also very fast and he knows how to tackle. His coach told him that the more skills he has when he moves up to college, the more playtime he’ll get in college, and the better chance he has to make it pro when he graduates. So his coach has taught him how to play all three phases of a game, offense defense and special teams.”

“Is he any good?”

“He’s fantastic,” Jessie said proudly. “Whenever the team needs a first down, they give him the ball. He’s got the school and state records for rushing yards. He’ll get to pick which school he goes to, he’ll get a bunch of offers.”

“Sounds like I really wanna meet this guy,” Sheila grinned.

“I have some pictures of him,” Jessie offered.

“Oh, show me!”

Jessie got her laptop and opened it, put it on the coffee table, and dug up her pictures of her family. “That’s him. This is my family, Sheila. That’s my sister Jenny, my mom, and my dad. My cousin George was with us, and he took the picture for us. We were at King’s Dominion when we took this picture, that’s what that tower is in the background.”

“Wow, he’s gorgeous! He have a girlfriend?”

“He’s had a few,” Jessie giggled.

Sheila looked at Kit. “I’m glad I came down here.”

“Why?”

“Because now I have a good reason to look forward to your wedding,” she winked. “I think I’m gonna get to know this fine hunk of cat right here,” she said with a predatory edge to her voice.

“Keep your panties on,” Kit warned. “I have issues with her parents, Sheila. If you start going after Ben, you’re gonna make Jessie’s mom go nuclear.”

“Yeah, it will,” Jessie sighed. “Mom objects to our marriage, Sheila. She’s coming to the wedding under protest, and that’s a direct quote from her. So I’d have to side with Kit here. I’d like you to meet my family, but don’t do anything that’ll piss off my mom.”

“Well, okay, but it won’t be easy,” she said, looking at Ben in the picture again. “Vulpans aren’t used to being denied what they want.”

“Except when another Vulpan wants something else,” Kit warned. “You’re on my turf, cousin. This is Austin, not Boston. You live in my apartment complex, and you’re working in my office.”

“Yeah, yeah, I accede to your ownership,” she sighed. “I promised I’d behave when you took me in, and I’ll honor my word. If I piss you off and get kicked out, I don’t have anywhere else to go.”

“Well, don’t talk like he has his finger over the trigger,” Jessie told her.

She yawned, showing off her impressive canines. Like Kit, all the Vulpans had hybrid teeth, normal fur teeth but with pronounced canines. Some carnivore furs filed their teeth down like Barry did, but some were born with their teeth that way. The Vulpans weren’t like that, and neither was Jessie’s family. “Well, I think I’m gonna head home. Lupe came over and helped me put the TV and entertainment center together. I thanked him by letting him see my boobs through the window when he left,” she grinned. “He was staring at them the whole time anyway, I figured why not just let him get the full experience. I knew he’d look back when he went out the door, so I pulled my shirt off like I was heading back to my bedroom.”

Jessie laughed. “I’d never do something like that,” she said.

“It’s easy. Just pull your shirt up,” Sheila winked as she finished her wine then stood up. “Then stand there and let him worship you like the goddess you are!” She gave them a naughty smile. “Now, if you’re sleeping with the guy, you give all your orders while you have your shirt up. When he’s staring at your chest, he’ll agree to anything you say. Males are powerless against breasts!”

“Go home, brat, before you corrupt my fiancée,” Kit warned.

“Going home,” she grinned. “See you tomorrow at work, then?”

“Not me. I have Mondays off.”

“Oh. Oh, okay. So, I’ll see you tomorrow after work then? We have to go shopping, and I hope you’ll go with us.”

“I can do that. See you tomorrow.”

“Night Sheila,” Jessie said.

“I’ll call you tomorrow before we leave, okay? Can I have your number?”

“Sure,” Jessie said, grabbing the notepad on the coffee table and scribbling down a couple of numbers. “The top one is my cell, the middle one is Kit’s work cell, and the bottom one is his personal cell.”

“Here, this is my cell,” she said, leaning over and writing a number down on the pad. “See you guys tomorrow.”

Sheila left, and Kit and Jessie looked at each other in silence for a moment. “So, what do you think?” he finally asked.

“I like her,” she declared. “I like her a lot. There’s a lot more to her than she lets on, or even thinks herself.” She stood up and squared off before him, grinning down at him. “But I’ll have to try out her suggestion.”

She reached under her shirt and unhooked her bra in the front, grabbed the hem and pulled it up, exposing her breasts to him. “Now, you will do the dishes!” she commanded imperiously. “Then we’ll watch sappy love story movies, then you will give me a foot massage!”

Kit laughed raucously. “It won’t work,” he said with a grin. “I saw this coming the instant Sheila closed the door.”

She laughed. “Another myth debunked,” she lamented, moving to reconnect her bra, but Kit’s upraised paws stopped her.

“Not yet,” he hummed, staring at her perfect glory, which made her laugh raucously.

“Maybe it’s not debunked after all,” she teased, giving him a cherubic grin.

“I can appreciate them without being enslaved by them,” he said, a little tauntingly. “Now, if you want my slavish obedience,” he trailed off, leaning forward and grabbing her belt buckle, “let’s go back to the bedroom.”

“I thought you’d never ask,” she giggled as he stood up and wrapped his arms around her. She laughed as he picked her up off her feet by his grip on her waist. “Now, if only I could get you to obey like this all the time!”

“What fun would I be then,” he hummed.

“You know, it’s not even eight o’clock!”

“Now you know why I told you to do your homework early,” he told her as he carted her off to the bedroom.

Sheila’s addition to the office and his life was surprisingly orderly.

For some strange, mysterious, downright odd reason, she didn’t seem to cause much trouble at work. She did what she was told, and spent most of the first day chatting away with the people there and learning her way around. Kit called about once an hour to check on her, and he was surprised to hear from them that she was an amiable, friendly girl that seemed honestly curious about what they did at the magazine, and was willing to work.

That just about floored him. It made him wonder just what was going on in her head, since it was so much unlike the Sheila he knew that for a little while he wondered if she was a plant or a spy sent down by the family to check him out. Kit hung on to that idea until he talked to Vil to confirm the Thursday appointment for their final fitting, and she told him that what she'd told him had been more or less true. Someone had attacked her, it was a matter of police record and with witnesses.

It was as he was talking with Vil that he felt that he understood what happened. Kit and Jessie, and Rick and Martha, they believed her...up to a point. But the important thing was, they took her seriously. They listened to her, and they moved to help her and protect her. To Sheila, who was an issue of annoyance for her parents because she was a party girl, someone actually paying attention to her, and being nice to her, and taking her seriously was something new to her. That explained why she was so attached to Rick and Martha, and wanted to please them, because they'd been so nice to her. Sheila was a ditz, but she was also starved for attention, and she was getting all kinds of positive attention here in Austin, from both family and from friends of family. Rick and Martha gave her the kind of attention she never got from her own parents. She didn't have to compete with five other siblings, and she was listened to and her opinion was valued, but the relationship was placed in a venue which Sheila could understand and accept, at least to begin with. Rick and Martha treated her like an adult, but also gave her the attention a child would crave, and it was the perfect combination that earned them Sheila's undying loyalty.

It amazed him sometimes. Rick had taken one look at her, and seemed to know exactly what to do to help her in the way that mattered most, to start allowing her develop a little confidence and self respect, both of which she had neither.

There were a few issues, though. Kit's "no comment" policy was something that the gang and the girls over at the sorority also followed, but nobody seemed to tell Sheila. When Kit came down the office after lunch to get something out of his office, she told him what had happened. She was accosted out in front of the office during lunch, and she was more than willing to talk to the Boston Globe reporter that stopped her, who called her by name. Sheila told him everything. She quite happily told him why she was in Austin, getting quite a few digs in on Cybil at the same time in telling the reporter that she feared Cybil tried to kill her, which was why she fled to Austin to seek refuge with her disowned cousin, because Vilenne Vulpan protected him ever since the failed attempt on his life, had control of Austin, and she was staying where it was safe until Cybil went back to England. She told them that Kit was no part of the suit in Boston, and just wanted to be left alone, but she was quite happy to tell them all about him from her point of view. She told them all about him, and Jessie, and the fact that he was very happy and content living in Austin and having nothing to do with the family or its money.

"I can't believe you did that!" Kit growled.

"What, nobody told me not to talk to them!" she protested. "It's not like I said anything bad about you, Kit!"

He stalked away, muttering to himself.

Kit was a bit ticked off at Sheila, but he got over it by the time they went shopping. Kit got to watch Sheila and Jessie interact, but they weren't alone. Sandy and Sam came along with them, as well as Jeffrey and Kevin. They went to the mall, and while the girls took Sheila out to look for dresses, Kit, Jeffrey, and Kevin roamed around. They checked out some clothing stores, music stores, and computer stores. Kit bought Jessie a couple of music CDs, and Jeffrey bought Sandy a digital camera for the wedding. Kevin grilled them about Sam most of the time, asking them what she liked, what she didn't, stories about her, anything they knew about her. "Dude," Jeffrey laughed as they went into the bookstore, "why don't you ask her?"

"Because I want to surprise her," he answered. "Christmas is coming Jeffrey. I gotta find her something good, and the only way to do that is find out what she likes and doesn't like...and even though I know her pretty well, I want to make sure I get her something really, really special. Would you ask Sandy what she wants for Christmas, or would you rather surprise her with something?"

"Oh. Ohhhh, crap, I gotta buy her a Christmas present!" Jeffrey gasped, giving Kit a wild look. "Jessie's their best friend, dude. Have her tell us what they like, would ya?"

"I have to get Jessie something too," Kit sighed. "You could always tell Sandy that camera's her early Christmas present."

"Yeah, like she'll care come Christmas time," Jeffrey snorted.

"Well, you're fellow rodents, what do rodents like?" Kevin asked.

"Dude, Sam's a skunk. What do femme skunks like?" Jeffrey challenged. When Kevin said nothing, he just gave him a smug look. "I thought so.”

“Jewelry, you never go wrong with jewelry,” Kit chuckled. “Buy them some necklaces or something.”

“What are you going to get Jessie?” Kevin asked.

“Not sure. I’ll be pretty much well broke after the wedding and honeymoon, so it can’t be anything big. I need to get presents for Jessie’s family too,” he said, scratching his chin absently. “John’ll be easy. Anything with the Bengals logo on it will make him happy. Jenny and Ben won’t be hard either, but Hannah’s gonna be tricky. Hmm,” he pondered, lost in thought a long moment as he considered the problem.

“So, you got very far with Sam yet?” Jeffrey asked.

“Well, that depends on what you mean,” Kevin answered. “We’ve been out almost every night since we met, so I’m doing pretty well with her. We have a lot of common interests, so our dates are always fun.”

“Yeah, but have you managed to bring it home yet?” Jeffrey asked with a grin.

“Haven’t really thought of it yet,” he answered honestly. “We’re not Kit and Jessie, bud.”

Kit laughed. “I’m not sure if that was a complement or an insult.”

“Dude, three months from meet to marry? That’s like the ultimate fast track. How long was it before you slept together? Two weeks? Three?”

“We’re a special case, Jeffrey,” Kit said calmly. “We were love at first sight. Well, it was for me, anyway. I had to work on Jessie a little to get her to come around.”

“I’d never have believed in that if I didn’t know you,” the mouse laughed. “Okay, so anyway, dudes, we still have a problem in front of us.”

“Christmas,” Kit and Kevin said in unison.

“Which is no doubt why Sam and Sandy wanted to come, and they brought us along,” Jeffrey reasoned as they left the bookstore.

Kit’s phone rang. He saw it was Jessie, and flipped it open. “Yeah love?”

“We’re done. Meet us at the food court, okay? We’re hungry.”

“Be there in a few.” He closed the phone. “They’re finished, but they want something to eat.”

“Food court!” Jeffrey proclaimed, pointing down the mall imperiously.

They met outside the seating area, then split up again to get what they wanted. They gathered at a pair of tables near the edge. Kit and Jessie went to get steak sandwiches, Sam got Chinese, Jeffrey and Kevin got pizza, and Sandy got a salad from The Salad Bowl, a vegetarian specialty restaurant. Sheila came in last with a tray holding a taco salad. “Damn, you gonna eat all that?” Jeffrey laughed as she sat down at Kit’s table.

“Every bite. Wanna watch?” she asked in a way that made Jeffrey’s grayish-white fur ruffle, and he looked at Sandy quite deliberately.

“Be nice,” Kit murmured. “What kind of dress did you find?”

“Oh, it’s gorgeous!” Sheila gushed. “It’s a spaghetti strap dress with a flared neckline and lace, in a beautiful cream color not far from Jessie’s fur,” she described.

“Where is it?”

“Already in the truck,” she answered. “What did you guys do?”

“Looked at possible Christmas presents,” Kit answered. “And we picked up a few little things,” he added, motioning at the bag on the table by his tray.

“Well, I don’t believe it, you did what you were supposed to do,” Sandy said with a grin at Jeffrey. “So, what you gonna get me for Christmas, baby?” she asked Jeffrey directly.

“You’ll find out at Christmas, won’t you?” he challenged. “I did buy you this, though. You said you don’t have a camera, so I got you a little digital one. It’s pretty good, perfect for the amateur photographer.”

“Wow, for me? You’re so sweet,” she grinned across the table at him. “I gotta get ready for the wedding too, and I do need a camera. I gotta take pictures!”

“Lilly and Mike will handle that for me,” Jeffrey chuckled. “God knows, they’ll take about a thousand of them between the two of them.”

“And we’ll have a professional photographers there too,” Jessie added. “They’re gonna make a DVD of the ceremony and some of the reception and take some pictures.”

“That can’t be cheap.”

“Vil’s paying for it, so eh,” Jessie shrugged with a grin. “She paid for everything.”

“Must be nice.”

“Yeah well, she wanted to get really crazy, but I had to keep a leash on her,” Jessie laughed. “She wanted to hire an orchestra to play at the wedding, and was gonna hire Jennifer Lopez to sing at the reception.”

“Wow, that’s extravagant,” Kevin laughed.

“As much as I’d love to have Hollywood at my wedding, I had to put my foot down,” Jessie giggled. “Kit is letting me indulge a little, but he really wants to keep it simple, so I’m riding the fence between him and Vil. I do want a little pomp and circumstance, it is my wedding after all, but I don’t want to turn it into a Royal affair.”

Sheila laughed. “Jess, you’re marrying royalty,” she grinned. “The Vulpanes are the royal family of Boston.”

“I’m not part of them anymore, Sheila.”

“Pft, that’ll last as long as Cybil’s in America,” she said. “I think that Vil’s gonna win the lawsuit, and when she kills Uncle Luke’s will, you’ll be back in the fold.”

“Yeah, if I wanted anything to do with them,” Kit snorted. “I’m happy here, Sheila. Why on earth would I want to go back to Boston? All my friends are here. My job is here. My and my fiancée’s life is here. There’s nothing in Boston for me but bad memories.”

“You can stay here and still be part of the family, Kit. There’s a few of us that miss you, you know,” she said with a smile at him. “Austin can be the southern outpost of the Vulpan family, with you running things here while Vil runs Boston.”

“No thank you,” he said firmly.

“Well, I think I’ll be down here in the winter,” she giggled.

“It gets cold here come January,” Sam told her. “If you want balmy, you have to go to Brownsville or head to Mexico.”

“Trust me, it’s warmer than Boston,” Sheila laughed. “Come May, I’m out in a bikini in fifty degree weather. We Vulpans have thick fur,” she winked.

“Kit certainly does,” Jessie laughed. “I love his fur, it’s thick and soft and cuddly.”

“That’s something I didn’t need to know, Jessie,” Jeffrey laughed.

Kit’s first day of working with Sheila actually went pretty well. She was the office gopher, doing all the fetching, carrying, and running things between Marty, Kit, Rick, and the main office, but she was a refreshing breath of fresh air in the place. She was saucy and sharp-tongued, but she had a pretty tolerant sense of humor when they gang made jokes at her expense. She fit in very well with the group, like a little sister everyone teased but also watched out for.

But she was also everyone’s assistant, and since Kit had outside work to do with Project A, Sheila was tagged to go along with him as he ventured onto campus to take student surveys. It felt a little weird going out alone with her, since she was a member of his family, and she kept wanting to talk about their childhood once she got him alone. Kit and Sheila weren’t close to the same age and would have been in different social groups among the cousins, Kit with the older cousins and Sheila with the younger ones, but there was a special relationship between Kit and Sheila’s families. His father and Aunt Sarah had been very close, and after his mother died, Aunt Sarah was the only one that really came over to check on his father in a personal or intimate sense. That put Sarah's younger kids in the house with him and Vil quite a bit, so he'd gotten to know Sheila, Bill, and Christine better than he knew most of the younger cousins. The three of them were barely more than toddlers when his mother died—well, Sheila was five, Randy was three, and Christine was two. But as the years passed after that, Sarah kept coming over, and Kit sort of grew up with more contact with Sheila, Randy, and Christine than with most of the other cousins. It was why he knew so much about her. If Bess or Lynn or Travis had come down instead of her, he'd have rejected them outright and without question, but he knew Sheila pretty well...as far as the cousins went. Though Suzy was the first sexual encounter he'd had, his first non-normal experience with the opposite gender had been skinny-dipping in the big pool with Sheila. Sheila was the first live female outside of his immediate family he'd seen naked, though since she was age ten, there wasn't all that much to see. He'd been fourteen at the time, and three weeks after the skinny-dipping episode, Suzy would lure him into an empty room at the Boston Country Club and deflower him. Sheila had instigated the skinny dipping, as he recalled, talking him into taking off his swim trunks after she shed her one piece on the poolside, kicking her feet in the water as she basically teased him into matching her bravery. Even at a very young age, Sheila was a bit more bold than the average girl, and not just in a sexual manner. Sheila had been a very brave and daring child, willing to push the limits and test her mother, but after Kit was disowned and things changed, well, Sheila became much more timid once she realized that she could realistically lose everything if she made Uncle Luke angry. She toned it way down after Kit was disowned, and it took a few years before she worked up the nerve to be rebellious again. But her boldness and rebellion were just fronts in a bid to get attention, a behavior that Kit knew very well, as he'd done the same thing himself in the years leading up to his being disowned. He'd also yelled and shouted, broke things, disobeyed, ran away, he even once set fire to one of his father's cars.

The past between Sheila, Kit, and Vil was probably why she thought to come to Austin when she got this wild idea that Cybil tried to kill her. She was one of the few cousins that had a much more extensive understanding of the enigmatic children of Uncle Luke, who were much, much different from the other cousins. Vil and Kit were raised different, had received deferential treatment, and were regarded with quite a bit of jealousy among the cousins, for their parents treated Kit and Vil better than they treated their own children...because they were the children of the family patriarch. Kit was fairly sure that quite a few of them were silently happy when Kit was disowned, glad to see the child that got all their parents' attention get what was coming to him, in their eyes. But Sheila had seen the inner workings, as it were, and knew just how dysfunctional life was in the east wing of Stonebrook Manor, which was the personal abode of the family of the patriarch. Sheila knew Kit and Vil better than most of the other cousins, knew that the bond between Kit and Vil was still strong, was probably even stronger since he'd been disowned. She knew that the key to getting to Vil was through Kit, and knew that since Vil was so protective over her younger brother, safety could be found under the umbrella she opened over the city of Austin.

Sheila was immature. Sheila was flighty, selfish, shallow, and vapid. But Sheila was not stupid. In fact, since she'd crashed into his life on Friday, he'd been starting to see just how clever Sheila really was. He wasn't sure if it was book smarts or intelligence in the classic sense, but she was very clever. Cunning was a good word for it, which wasn't a surprising trait in a Vulpan.

And so she was here, and so far, Kit couldn't really complain very much. Outside of talking to the reporters, she'd been behaving herself, and he kinda liked talking to her on Sunday. But time would tell, and he hadn't passed judgment quite yet.

"So, how do we go about this?" she asked as she tugged at her high-tailed tee shirt. Sheila, like many young girls, dressed in the current midriff-baring style, despite the fact that it was only fifty degrees out. For a Bostonian, fifty was balmy in November, so she was decked out in her waist-ending tee that showed off cleavage and a pair of hip-hugger jeans that showed off a surprising expanse of belly both above and below her navel. She got a ton of appreciative looks from males on campus, but that wasn't surprising. Sheila had a rich girl's figure; toned, sleek, and buxom, and she'd turn any male's head, even Kit's own if she wasn't a blood relative.

"Well, since Rick made us an appointment, what we're going to do is sit at a table in the main rec center and try to get students to stop and answer some questions."

"What questions?"

"Well, we're asking age, if they're registered to vote, if they're registered for a party, and who their favorite candidate is for President," he answered. "When we're done, we'll compare our statistics to state and national statistics for college furs who vote and see if U.T. is mainstream."

"Oh, that sounds easy."

“Yah, it’s not bad. Lots of students know who we are, so plenty stop to talk to us.”

“How do you mean?”

“These are the furs we make the magazine for,” he told her. “College kids. Our pictures are in the magazine, Sheila, a lot of them know my face. And we have a Lone Star banner we keep in the rec center when we use the table that I’ll hang over us so people who don’t know me know why we’re there. When we come on campus like this, it’s because we’re looking for student feedback.”

“Ah, cool.”

The rec center was a huge room filled with tables, couches, chairs, and plasma TV screens hanging on a couple of walls. Upstairs there was a little restaurant and pool room, and downstairs there was a five lane bowling alley and a video game room. There was a bookstore on one side and a food court and a couple of little shops on the other, almost like a little miniature mall. Kit got his magazine’s banner out of the storage shed with the help of a center staffer, found the table near the door which they’d been given for the day, and set it up. Sheila and Kit sat down and he pulled out his laptop, and they got down to business, which usually meant asking passers-by if they had a minute to answer a few very quick questions. It was boring work usually, and Kit spent much of the time just chatting with students that wandered by, or talking with Sheila...but Sheila seemed dissatisfied with the pace of their information gathering. Rick was clever to send Sheila, for she was very cute, and more than one male wandered by and took the survey just to talk to her, just as Kit may have lured a female or two in with his smile to take the survey.

“How many surveys do we need to be done?” she asked after two hours.

“The more the better, that gives us a more accurate overview,” he said. “But a few hundred at least. Just settle in, Sheila, this usually takes a while. Sometimes it takes a couple of days to get a reliable sample we can work with.”

“Well then, let’s pick up the pace a little,” she said, standing up, pulling her shirt up almost to her bra, then pushing down on her jeans to make them as low as possible without getting arrested for indecent exposure. Then, to Kit’s surprise, she climbed up onto the table, turned around to face the huge room, put two fingers to her muzzle, and unleashed an ear-splitting whistle that totally stopped all activity in the rec center in a heartbeat.

“What the hell are you doing?” Kit hissed.

“Getting our surveys,” she said as she glanced down at him with a slight smile, then she looked out at the students. “Lone Star Magazine is doing a quick survey about students and voting for an upcoming article!” she shouted, hitching a hip in a very model-like pose as her tail swished behind her seductively, which no doubt got the attention of every male in the place. “Why don’t some of you handsome guys come talk to us? You’ll be doing your civic duty, and we only ask four questions! You’ll be done before you know it!”

“And that accomplishes what outside of getting us booted from the rec center?” he asked archly as she hopped down off the table.

“Watch and learn, cousin,” she winked as she pushed the chair back so anyone on the other side could see as much of her as possible, then sat back down.

Kit was a little surprised at her tactics, but she did get results. They almost had a line as students, both males and females surprisingly enough, wandered over to take the survey. Both Kit and Sheila were busy asking questions, Kit using his laptop and Sheila marking things down in a spiral, but she also made sure to chat with the males and flirt just a little bit, giving them smiles and smoky-eyed looks through her lashes. So many of them asked if they were related that it almost became annoying, but Sheila was much more cordial about it. “Yeah, he’s my cousin,” she answered for the hundredth time, leaning over and elbowing Kit lightly in the arm. “He set it up so I could come intern at his magazine. He’s pretty cool, for a cousin anyway.”

After two more hours, they had nearly five hundred surveys, because the people at their table attracted more people who wanted to see what was going on, and it kept them busy almost continually after Sheila got things moving. Another hour after that, they had enough surveys for Kit to proclaim they had a viable sample base to use for the statistics they needed.

“So, we’re done?”

“At least here, yeah,” he answered. They did take a few more surveys from some males, or at least Sheila did as Kit took down their banner and took it to the concession stand, then put it in the storeroom when a rec center worker came to help him. Sheila was chatting coyly with three males, one of which Kit recognized was on the football team, being typically flirtatious. Kit cut them short, but not before the football player asked for Sheila’s number. “Oh no, baby, I never give out my number,” she winked at him. “I’m the one who makes the calls, not takes them. So, give me your number, and we’ll see if you get lucky.”

Kit thought that was a bit outrageous, but the football player did it. He gave her his cell number, then the three of them wandered off, glancing back at her repeatedly.

“I thought you wanted to meet Ben,” he noted, a bit accusingly.

“Gotta have a plan B in case that doesn’t pan out,” she grinned. “And a plan C, and a plan D, and a plan E, and—“

Kit rolled up a college newspaper and whacked her with it, which made her laugh.

They returned to the office after lunch, which made Rick a bit curious. “Done already?” he asked as Sheila gave him her spiral and went into the main office.

“Yeah, Sheila decided to be a little...active, in getting surveys,” he grunted. When he described what she did, Rick just laughed. “The little twerp. I almost grabbed her tail and yanked her back down.”

“She’s certainly something,” Rick agreed with a chuckle.

“I hope I’m something good,” Sheila grinned as she wormed under Rick’s arm in the doorway and came into Kit’s office. Mike came up behind Rick holding a camera. “Where do you want me?”

“You’re his cousin, sit in his lap,” Mike grinned mischievously. “An introduction pic for Sheila we’re putting in the next issue,” Mike explained to Kit’s confused look, as Sheila spilled herself into her cousin’s lap for Mike. Sheila hooked an arm around Kit’s shoulder and waved to the camera with the other as Rick moved for Mike, and Mike took two shots. He looked at them on the screen, then nodded. “Got it. Barry’s whipping up a little intro bio on you, Sheila. When they're done, I'll have Savid work it in and you'll get to see it."

"Cool! I've never been in a magazine that wasn't a tabloid before!"

Mike laughed. "Well, now, if you want to let me take some tabloid-esque pictures, we could talk about that," he said.

"Only if you pay me. A minimum hundred dollars per exposed square foot of fur, but there's a white fur surcharge," she said, which made both Rick and Mike laugh. "White fur costs extra. Those are the good parts, you know," she added with a wink, patting her white-furred midriff.

"I'm not that rich, not on what Rick pays me," Mike grinned, then hurried off to his own tiny office before Rick could reply.

"She's a Vulpan alright," Rick chuckled as he went back to his office.

"Was there any doubt?" Sheila called loudly after him.

Kit saw the intro they were putting in page two beside the usual group shot while Sheila was out running an errand for Rick, showing a brightly smiling Sheila sitting in his lap, waving to the camera. Barry had finished the bio as well:

The Yankees keep coming!

Everyone welcome Sheila Vulpan to the Lone Star family! Sheila is Kit's cousin, who is also from Boston, who's come down to intern with us and learn the magazine business hands-on while on sabbatical from Harvard University...and to get away from the cold Boston winter.

So show her some Texas hospitality, Austin. She's another Yankee, but hey, the first one turned out pretty well.

At least this Vulpan is cute! The males of the office are very, very, very, very happy she's here!

Did we mention we're happy she's here? Well, we're happy she's here.

Really.

Pictures of Sheila will be available in the new pay area of the website, at one hundred dollars per square foot of fur revealed, with an additional surcharge for exposed white fur.

Yes, this is a joke. Don't email us asking where it is.

And yes, Sheila approved of this bio before we published it.

Kit chuckled when he read it, and gave Mike a smile.

"Think she'll get her tail in a twist over that?" Barry asked.

"Nah, she'll think it's funny," he answered. "Sheila's not priggish."

Not at all. She thought it was a riot when she read it. "Oh, you gotta put a link for that pay site on the magazine website, and have it link to kid's website like Disneyworld!" she laughed when Savid showed it to him. "No, no, have it link to some anti-porn crusader website!"

Mike stopped in mid-maw opening, then broke out into laughter. "I'll go do that right now!" he said, rushing back to his office.

“Oh, I can smell the hate already,” Barry mused, then the entire office exploded into laughter.

Chapter 14

The ramifications of Sheila's talking to reporters wasn't felt by Kit and Jessie until Thursday, when the dress people came back to Austin to do the final fitting.

They brought a copy of the Boston Globe with the story in it with them, and while Kit tried on his tuxedo, the two foxes asked him all about everything. It was a little surprising how much they knew, and when he finally asked them how they knew all that, if Vil had told them, one of the vixens gave him the Tuesday newspaper to read, but asked to get it back.

The headline read Vulpans Comment on Lawsuit, and there were pictures of four of them in a square by the article. In the top boxes were himself and Vil, but in the bottom two were Cybil and Sheila, all of them obviously old file photographs. Much of the article read almost exactly as Sheila had described when she told him what she told the reporter. It stated that Kit was not an active part of the suit and really had no desire to be involved with it, which was news to most Bostonians. It explained the lawsuit and the players in it, and how the entire family was embroiled in a bitter fight over control of the Vulpan fortune. Vilenne was trying to wrest the fortune away from her aunts and uncles using Kit as a tool and an old will. Cybil was trying to take the fortune for herself using spousal rights and an attempt to declare Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan Junior as unsound when he made the will that disowned Kit. The uncles and aunts were fighting both of them to retain the current will, where the fortune was divided up evenly between the six surviving brothers and sisters of the deceased patriarch. It was an almost a soap opera, a delicious tale of greed and conniving where the Vulpans fought like a pack of wild dogs over scraps thrown from the table, and the whole city of Boston stepped back to watch their royal family act like anything but the social paragons they pretended to be.

Sheila got her digs in as well:

When asked why she had moved to Austin and had left Harvard University, Miss Vulpan answered “It’s not safe in Boston. Someone tried to kill me, and while I can’t prove it, I’m pointing my finger at Cybil. I overheard her talking to one of her lawyers the day I had to give my deposition, and not two days later, someone tries to shoot me on the street. Well, with all the craziness going on about the will and the lawsuit, I’m not going to assume it was a coincidence until it’s proved that it was. After someone tried to kill [Kitstrom “Kit” Vulpan III], [Vilene “Vil” Vulpan] put a lot of protection down here for him to make sure nobody tries again. Since someone’s trying to kill me, I felt this was the safest place to be. Kit wasn’t that happy to see me, but he could tell I was frightened, and he’s allowed me to move in down here until I feel safe enough to go home.”

When asked about what she overheard, she replied, “from what I heard, they were planning on doing something to Kit, almost like they were planning to kill him, you know, get rid of the focus of Vil’s case, since her case is trying to make Kit the executor of his dad’s estate. Cybil saw me at the door, and like I said, two days later someone tried to shoot me. The police said that’s not enough to go on to arrest her, and my family doesn’t believe me, so I came [to Austin], because it’s safe here.”

When asked about the contradiction in information concerning Kitstrom Vulpan III's part of the case, she explained the situation far better than the legal briefs released to the press. "It's really easy. Vil's using the original will that my uncle had before he went crazy and started trying to destroy Kit's life. In that will, Kit's the heir, so if Vil wins it un-disowns Kit. Kit doesn't have anything to do with it. He washed his paws of all of us years ago, and he doesn't want the money. But after Cybil made this grab at money she has no right claiming, I think Vil retaliated with this countersuit to block her, and using the original will was the only option she had to undercut Cybil. If you look at the cases, if Cybil proves her case, it actually proves Vil's case, and it makes her lose anyway because the children have much more of a claim on their father's fortune than a wife that signed a prenuptial agreement before they got married and was only married for like a year."

Sheila Vance Vulpan's observation is widely believed to be an accurate observation by many legal professionals. Dennis Withers of Harvard Law School...."

"Well, at least the reporter didn't get too exotic," Kit grunted as he stopped reading the article.

"So it's right? You really don't want the money?" the vixen asked as she had him raise his arms.

"Nope. I've been a normal fur for years now. I don't want to go back to that life. I'm quite happy here."

“Well, they always say that you have to do what makes you happy and go where your heart leads you,” the vixen said with a smile at him.

“True enough. Say, you could do me a favor and answer a question.”

“What is that?”

“Is Jessie’s dress pretty?” he asked.

She laughed. “Oh, no, I’m not wandering out into that minefield. You’ll find out on your wedding day, sir,” she grinned.

“Well, I brought a camera with me....”

“No!” Both vixens said in unison, which made him laugh.

The clothes were made more or less perfectly, and Kit didn’t need another fitting. His tux was bagged for him and left for him to take home. Jessie’s dress, however, needed a couple of minor alterations, so the tailoring crew was going to stay overnight and complete her dress, and deliver it to her tomorrow. Jessie had already arranged things for the wedding. The day before, she was going to go over to Rick’s house and stay the night, and that was where she’d get ready for the wedding so they wouldn’t see each other on their wedding day before the ceremony, as was tradition. She’d take her dress to Rick’s house, and there it would stay, hidden from Kit, until the day of the wedding.

When they got home, they started a period of unwilling separation. Jessie’s finals were coming up in two weeks, and she had a ten page paper to write for her English Lit class as her final, and that required her to get to work on it. Kit gave her quiet and space to get ready for finals, surrendering the den to her and staying in the living room, cooking for her, and making sure she had nothing to worry about. Kit was almost like her butler for that time, doing all the housework, doing the cooking, making sure she had nothing distracting her from her schoolwork.

There were interruptions, to be sure. Sam and Sandy dropped by every couple of days to vent the pressure from their own finals by catching up with Jessie, and Sheila stopped by almost every day. Kit was helping Martha teach her how to cook, and she was often helping to cook three or four meals a day. She'd go to Rick's house during lunch and get a cooking lesson, then bring the result back to Rick for him to eat. Then she'd go back over and help Martha cook dinner, then come home and help Kit cook dinner, then go home and try her own paw at cooking in her own kitchen, which, if it turned out to be edible, she'd throw in a container and give to Kit for him to eat the next day.

Kit was surprised. Sheila was fascinated by cooking. She enjoyed doing it, and she was learning very, very fast, because it turned out that Martha taught her the basics of reading a cookbook, and she was good at following the directions either Martha or the cookbook gave her. Sometimes her food didn't look quite right, or it was a little burned, but she had the basic idea of it and her cooking wasn't poisonous.

The other main interruption was the wedding. Jessie was disturbed from her finals preparation by it a few times. On the fifth, the week before finals, they had to go have their blood test, and then the day after, they picked up the passing results and went down to the courthouse and got their marriage license. The next stop was the Department of Public Safety, Texas' version of the DMV, where Jessie spent two hours waiting in lines. But the end result pleased her to no end, for they walked out of there with her new license. There, next to her bright, glowing smiling picture, was her name.

Jessica Desdemona Vulpan.

“Well, I guess I can just call you Misses Vulpan now,” Kit teased lightly as she held the license out before them.

“Not quite yet you can’t, Mister Vulpan,” she grinned in reply. “There’s still that pesky ceremony to go do, you know.”

“You’re not married yet and you changed your name?” the badger behind the counter asked.

“It’s legal,” Jessie told him. “I just needed my marriage license.”

“Yeah, I know it’s legal, but most wait until after the ceremony.”

“Well, I’m just making sure he can’t get away,” Jessie told him, giving Kit a teasing look. “This is concrete commitment,” she declared, holding up her new license.

“I’m doomed,” Kit said with mock resignation, and he laughed when Jessie whacked him with a sheaf of paperwork that was sitting on the counter.

Jessie split her time between classes, studying for finals, and the wedding after that. The license was a floodgate of activity for them. Jessie was on the phone every night with Vil as they made sure they had everything covered and everyone would do what they had to do. She got her school I.D. changed to her new name, finalized their wedding cake at the caterer that was doing the reception, confirming the style of cake they wanted and ensuring it would be ready for their reception, then they had their first meeting with Monsignor Duke at the church. Jessie gave the monsignor their scripted ceremony, which was actually a very simple and straightforward affair, a very traditional marriage. They toured the large, modern Catholic church, as Jessie described where all the decorations would go, and they talked about the mechanics of the ceremony, from the anterooms where Kit and Jessie would wait to which direction they'd go after the ceremony was over, since the front of the church was right on the street and their parking lot was actually behind it.

“We can go out the front door then just go around the building,” Jessie offered. “It's tradition to go back down the aisle after the ceremony, you know.”

“Oh, did you bring a copy of your marriage license?” the large bear priest asked. “I do need it for our records. Have to prove it was a legal ceremony, after all,” he smiled.

“I have one out in my car, father,” Kit told him.

“Very good. I'll send off the wedding form to the state after the ceremony, and they'll send you the updated license that shows the date and location of your wedding by mail.”

“Texas has a weird system,” Kit chuckled. “You have to have a license before you get married, then you have to get a new license after you get married.”

“Well, it's the only real way to do it, son,” the priest chuckled. “We can't marry you until you prove the state approves of it, but the state also needs proof you actually had the ceremony and got married. So they use the two-tiered system.”

“Yeah, they explained all that over at the courthouse,” Jessie told him as she stepped up on the dais, looking down at her feet, then looked around. “Oooh, I'm getting tingles,” she giggled. “Twelve days, Kit. Twelve days and we stand up here for real. I can't wait!”

“Me either,” he said, giving her a loving smile from the aisle.

“Now, you said that you wish a more secular wedding?” he asked.

“Yeah, father,” Kit answered. “Jessie’s Baptist, and her parents are kinda touchy. So we don’t want a Catholic wedding. But my mother always wanted me to marry in a Catholic cathedral, and my family’s Catholic, so we compromised.”

“Well, it’ll go against my training, but I think I can make it a generic ceremony,” he smiled gently. “So, when was the last time you went to confession, my son? Have you been attending mass?”

Kit laughed. “I’m a CINO, father. Catholic In Name Only.”

He tutted. “You shouldn’t ignore your spiritual well being, my son. God is forgiving, but it’s always best not to tempt fate, as it were.”

Jessie laughed, but the monsignor was ready for her. “And when was the last time you went to church, young lady? Just because you’re not Catholic, don’t think for a moment I don’t worry for your own soul too. Even if you don’t follow our brand of Christianity, you are a Christian, and you should be attending to your soul’s needs.”

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled. “Well....”

“I thought so,” the father grinned. “Now, since you’re holding your ceremony in my church, I have a request. I want you to attend Sunday mass before your ceremony, just once. It always makes me feel better to know I’m marrying a couple who come with the light of the Lord still shining upon them.”

“Well, I haven’t been to a mass since I was sixteen, but...but I guess I can do that,” he acquiesced.

“I’ve never been to a mass before,” Jessie said shyly. “I don’t know any Latin. I won’t know what to do.”

“We don’t do mass in Latin anymore, child,” the father chuckled. “Just sit in the back and watch, that way the only one who sees you is me, and I won’t say anything if you don’t sit or stand at the right time,” he winked. “I think you’ll be quite surprised. Most people who aren’t Catholic are quite moved by a mass when they attend one.”

“Well, I guess I can. Just don’t tell my parents. They’ll have a conniption.”

Monsignor Duke laughed. “A priest keeps many secrets, child. I’m sure I can carry yours.”

Kit lost track of Jessie after their meeting in the church, for finals started on Monday, and she was very, very busy. He gave her her space, spent much of the time hanging out with Lupe or Sheila, who had, in the short time she’d already been in Austin, gone out with three guys and had sex with two of them, including the football player from U.T. Despite not going clubbing, she found ways to be herself, and it proved that you could take Sheila out of the Party Pack, but you couldn’t take the Party Pack out of Sheila. Kit really couldn’t say much about it. Sheila was an adult, and had the right to do whatever she wanted. But her talking about her sexual conquests while sitting on his couch drinking his wine wasn’t one of his favorite ways to pass the time.

“Sheesh, Kit, it’s not like you’re a virgin,” she protested when he took her to task about it.

“I never said stop, Sheila, just don’t harp about it when you come visit,” he snorted. “I don’t need to know how many guys you’re sleeping with.”

“What fun is it to do it when you can’t talk about it?” she grinned.

“Then go down to Jessie’s sorority and tell them all about it.”

“Hmm, that’s an idea,” she said with a naughty smile. “I’ve been meaning to ask to go over there anyway. I like Sandy and Sam, I’d like to meet the other girls they talk about.” She dug her phone out of her pocket and dialed a number. “Sandy? It’s Sheila. Hey, I’m a little bored, and I’d like to come down and meet your sorority sisters. Yeah, Jessie’s busy studying for finals, and it’s not much fun talking with Kit about girl things,” she said, giving him a teasing grin. “Yah, I know you have finals too, but—okay. Sure, I’ll be down in a few minutes.”

She closed her phone and gave him a smug look. “I’ll see you later, cousin. I’m gonna go talk to girls who care about my sex life.”

“They’ll be overjoyed,” Kit said dryly.

It did, however, solve another problem. Sheila needed friends to talk to, and since she only knew Kit and Jessie, it didn’t give her many options. After going down to the sorority, however, Sheila suddenly had a whole house full of other girls that she got along with almost immediately. Sheila was over there most of the afternoon, and came back well after dark all bubbly and happy. “I had a great time!” she said happily. “Jessie’s friends are awesome!”

“I’m so glad you think so!” Jessie called from the kitchen.

“What are you doing, Jessie?” she asked as she flopped down on the couch.

“Cooking, silly!” she answered. “I’ve missed it, and I’m a little tense, so I’m doing a little cooking to relax.”

“Oooh, what are you cooking?”

“I’m baking some cookies I’m gonna take over to the girls tomorrow,” she answered.

“I don’t smell any cookies.”

“I just started, silly,” she laughed. “Come on, I’ll show you how to do it.”

“You bet!”

Jessie taught Sheila the basics of baking while Kit knocked out the last bits of research for one of the major objectives of Project A, and was ready to start on the next project tomorrow. He had to get it all done before the wedding, because the gang had graciously given him nearly two weeks off for his marriage and honeymoon and Christmas. His last day at work before his vacation was Wednesday the sixteenth, because Rick figured he might need the day before the ceremony off to handle any possible last-minute problems that might arise, and also because Vil would be coming in that day... not that much work would get done at the magazine either. Rick already planned to have the issue put to bed on Wednesday instead of Thursday, and Friday they’d all be at the wedding, which was like an office-wide holiday. Barry and Lilly both already planned to do articles on the wedding, and Mike and Lilly had their cameras all charged up and ready for the event. He had the time off for four days of honeymoon in Florida, arriving on Saturday morning after a detour to Boston and leaving again on Wednesday morning, then they'd go straight to Cincinnati for Christmas with Jessie's family. That would give them all of Christmas Eve and Christmas to be with Jessie's family, and then they'd come home on Saturday afternoon after Christmas. Kit's normal days off were Sunday and Monday, so he'd be back to work on Tuesday the twenty-ninth.

Jessie had it easier. After finals were over, she would be free, and she'd be the one running around like a maniac to make sure all of Vil's plans were executed. She already had a binder full of phone numbers from different companies, florists, the photographers, everyone Vil hired for the wedding, and she'd already started making calls and confirming, double-checking things, making sure everything would be ready on time.

That wasn't until Thursday, though. Jessie had two finals on Monday, one on Wednesday, and one on Thursday.

Kit leaned back and went through some printed material about voting, some work he'd brought home with him, when the doorbell rang. "It's open!" he shouted without looking up, shuffling through the papers in his paw looking for the one that explained how the electoral college worked.

"How...quaint."

Kit jumped up to his feet so fast that papers flew all over the living room, and Sheila gasped in the kitchen, and the sound of breaking crockery followed that sound.

Standing in the doorway, wearing her typical pantsuit, was Sheila's mother and his aunt, Sarah Vulpan.

She looked much as he remembered. Sarah was a short, slender, aloof woman with a mask-like beauty, but she had a very unfriendly demeanor to most people. She didn't show emotion very often, much like his father had been, but she did have emotion. She had been close to his father, and he'd seen her compassionate side...but after he began fighting with his father, Sarah sided against him to try to rein him in and restore order to the house, and he'd had a very rough relationship with her since then.

“Sarah!” Kit barked in shock and almost instant anger. What on earth was she doing here? Did she come to get Sheila, or was there some other motive for her to fly halfway across the country? “What are you doing here?”

“Well, since you have my daughter, I think that's a question you just answered,” she said as she stepped into the apartment. “Is she here?”

There was nothing but silence from the kitchen.

“What do you want her for?”

“To put an end to this nonsense,” she said with a sniff. “Usually, just letting her run away is the best course of action. She always comes back. But this time she's latched onto you, and it's apparent she has no intention of returning anytime soon. I've come to take her home.”

“Home? I'm not going anywhere near Boston while she's there!” Sheila shouted angrily as she came storming out of the kitchen. “She tried to kill me!”

“That's just a child's fantasy,” Sarah said coldly. “Cybil may be a greedy bitch, but it's utter fantasy to think she may have tried to kill you.

There's no earthly reason to hide down here. So let's go gather what things you may want to keep and go home."

"I am not going home!" she shouted hotly. "I don't care what you think about it, mother, I know what I heard, and I know what happened! Someone tried to kill me! Doesn't that matter to you? Don't you care?"

"It was a random mugging, you silly girl," Sarah told her in a commanding tone. "For which you should be grateful you weren't hurt! Now let's go back to your hotel. Higgins said he—"

"Why won't you listen to me!" Sheila screamed.

"Because you're not worth listening to," Sarah said coldly. "Not while you act like a stupid child!"

"Hey, hey, hey!" Jessie said in outrage, stomping out of the kitchen. "How dare you speak to your daughter like that! No wonder she came running down here to Kit. He may not believe what she says, but at least he cares what she thinks!"

"Who are you, little girl, and by what right do you address me in such a manner?" Sarah asked in a dangerous tone.

"That's my fiancée you're about to threaten, Sarah. You'd better think very carefully before you say it," Kit said in a cold, dangerous manner, balling up both his fists.

"Fiancée? Her? My God, they weren't kidding! You really are going to marry a, a, a cat! Have you lost your mind?"

Jessie had to move very fast. Kit was already around the coffee table by the time she realized what he was going to do, and she was there with her paws outstretched, standing between them. “Kit, no!” she barked commandingly. “If you hit her and get thrown in jail before our wedding, I won’t ever forgive you!”

“Hit me? I think not,” Sarah scoffed, slapping Jessie’s paw off her shoulder.

“He was one step from it,” Jessie told her with a surprisingly calm voice, her eyes steady.

“You bet your ass I was,” Kit growled, taking a step back from her. “Now get out of my house!”

“I think you need to leave,” Jessie agreed, in a surprisingly cold voice that made Kit very proud. By God, she wasn’t afraid of his family at all! What a femme!

“I will do no such thing,” Sarah snapped. “I won’t be ordered around by children!”

“You are standing in my house, Sarah,” Kit hissed in a voice that almost sounded like nails on a chalkboard. “In under a minute, you’ve insulted me, insulted Jessie, insulted Sheila, and now you’re making demands? Why don’t you get off of yourself and look around. This isn’t Boston, and your name and your money don’t mean shit here,” he sneered. “Now, you can walk out of that door, or I’ll throw you out. Then I’ll call the cops and have you arrested for trespassing. Take your pick.”

“You wouldn’t dare!”

“Try me.”

It hung there for a long moment, as Sarah's eyes seemed to weigh the situation. Then she sighed darkly and stepped back to the door. "This is not over, girl," she said, pointing at Sheila. "We'll talk again very soon, you mark my words."

"Why don't you try talking to her instead of ordering her around!" Jessie erupted on Sarah, no doubt speaking something she'd been holding back. "She's your daughter, for Christ sake! If my mom talked to me the way you talked to her, I'd slap her!"

"You have no idea what you're talking about, cat," Sarah sneered.

"Do I? You treat your daughter like she's a servant!" she raged at the older vixen. "You don't listen to her, you don't respect her, you insult her and denigrate her, no wonder she acts out against you! If you were my mom, I'd be getting bombed every night and sleeping with any guy with a pulse too! At least that would make the pain go away!"

"Jessie—" Sheila called, but Kit put an arm up to stop her as she rushed forward.

"Let her go," Kit said as Sarah backed up against the door in the face of Jessie's advance.

"You know why she came down here? Because she had nowhere else to go because you wouldn't even pretend to care that she was afraid!" Jessie shouted at her. "Kit's a better fox than your entire family put together! He took in a member of the same family that abandoned him when she needed his help, which is something you would never do! Does Kit believe her story? No, he doesn't. But at least he sees that she's really scared, so he's at least trying to do good by her by trying to make her feel safe and protected! Did you do that? Did you see that she's terrified and try to comfort her? Did you try to assure her she was wrong without treating her like a baby, or did you just tell her what you wanted her to do despite the fact that she was afraid?”

“It was preposterous—“

“THAT DIDN’T MATTER!” Jessie shouted at her, which made her flinch. “The only thing that matters is you didn’t see that no matter what you believe, what you believe wasn’t what really mattered, it was what she believed! All you had to do to avoid all this was say ‘I don’t think you’re right, but why don’t we do something so you feel safe?’ But you didn’t even do that!”

“You have room to talk, cat, telling me to treat her like an adult, but coddle her like a child, in the same sanctimonious declaration,” Sarah told her with narrow eyes.

“Isn’t that your job as a mother?” Jessie snapped. “To make her feel like an adult, but be there to comfort her when she needs it?”

“She needs to grow up,” Sarah said coldly. “And so long as she acts like a child, I’ll treat her as one.”

“Then she has no chance!” Jessie said in exasperation. “The one time she did act like an adult, when she came to you with her worries, you treated her like a child!”

“That was the act of a child, a frightened little girl too stupid to see the truth.”

“You know, when you call your kids stupid long enough, eventually they’ll believe it themselves,” Jessie said curtly, putting her paws on her hips and squaring off against the smaller vixen. “How can she ever prove she’s an adult when all you ever do is denigrate her?”

“I’ll not be lectured by a child of a cat in how to be a parent when it’s clear you have no idea what you’re talking about,” Sarah said coldly.

“Then you can leave any time you like,” Jessie hissed, her ears laying back.

“I will be staying at the Armitage,” she declared in a cold voice. “So don’t for a moment believe that I’ll be leaving without you, Sheila. One way or another, when I fly home, you will be going with me.”

“Not so long as that English bitch is in Boston I won’t,” Sheila retorted.

“We shall see, girl. We shall see.”

She opened the door and swept out as if she owned the place, but she did slam the door as hard as she could.

Jessie turned around, and her paws were trembling, but her expression was a little defiant. “That’s my pretty kitty,” Kit said with absolute pride, giving her a warm hug. Sheila took in a ragged breath, then slammed into both of them. Kit and Jessie put their arms around her, comforting her, and she clung to them for a long moment. “Now you see what I put up with when I was a kid?” she said raggedly, trying hard not to cry. “Sometimes I think she’ll never take me seriously.”

“Well, you don’t exactly help with your clubbing and shenanigans,” Kit said honestly. “But as a former wild child myself, I can say I know exactly how you feel, and why you do it.”

She gave him a long, earnest look, then she did break down into tears, clutching at them. “You’re too good to me, Kit,” she sniffled. “Even after I abandoned you, you still helped me. I can’t thank you enough for that, ever.”

“At least you never set fire to your mom’s car,” Kit told her, which made her laugh. “Now then, let’s take care of your mother,” he offered.

“Huh? How?”

“Silly cousin, this is my city,” Kit told her with a chuckle. “Or more to the point, it’s Vil’s. I think it’s about time for Aunt Sarah to get an ugly lesson in just who’s in control down here.” He patted Sheila on the shoulder and let go of her, then went to the bedroom and got his phone. He called Vil, who picked up on the first ring. “Vil.”

“Hey, baby bro. What’s up?”

“We just got a visit from Aunt Sarah,” he announced as he went back to the living room.

“What?”

“She came down in person to get Sheila. Can you do something about her? She was very, rude.”

“You bet your tail I’ll do something about her,” Vil said in an ugly tone. “I specifically warned them to leave you alone, and bothering you is bothering you, no matter what excuse they have for it. Let me make a few calls. I guarantee you, Sarah will be back in Boston by tomorrow morning.”

“Thanks, sis. You’re a lifesaver.”

“No problem, bro. Let me get on this. Call you tomorrow, okay?”

“I’ll be looking for it.” He closed the phone and looked at Jessie and Sheila, who were still in an embrace as Jessie comforted the young vixen. “Vil said your mother will be back in Boston by morning,” he told Sheila.

“Thank God!” Sheila exclaimed.

“How’s she gonna do that?” Jessie asked.

“You don’t want to know, pretty kitty. You really don’t.”

Vil was as good as her word.

By ten o’clock the next morning, Aunt Sarah was back in Boston.

Kit didn’t know how Vil did it exactly, but whatever she did, it worked. Sarah was on a seven o’clock flight out of the city, and Sheila wasn’t with her. Sarah made no other attempt to talk to Sheila after she left their apartment, but the visit had spooked Sheila so badly that she stayed over at their apartment and slept on the couch. That was something of a shock for Kit the next morning, because they both forgot she was there. Kit heard someone come into the bathroom while he was in the shower, and he turned off the water and threw the curtain back before looking...and found himself staring down at Sheila as she sat on the toilet, wearing a black tank top with one strap hanging down to her elbow and her panties around her ankles.

At least he didn’t react like a little kid. He just calmly picked up his towel and wrapped it around himself, which made her laugh. “Sorry about that, I thought you knew I was here,” she apologized.

“I thought you were Jessie,” he told her, stepping out of the tub.

Jessie just added to it when she meandered to the bathroom door, naked as the day she was born. It was an increasing habit of hers as she settled into the apartment. When she first moved in, she wouldn't set foot out of the bedroom without a towel around herself, but as she got more and more comfortable in the house and with him, comfortable with the idea that the entire house was her personal, private domain, her willingness to leave the bedroom naked and take the six steps required to reach the bathroom from the bedroom door increased. She took no notice of Kit at all, but she gasped when she stepped into the bathroom and found Sheila already sitting on the toilet, ducking back out and peeking in from around the doorframe, using it to conceal herself. "Ohmygod, I'm sooooo sorry!" Jessie gasped, then she blinked and took in the situation, realized Kit was in there with her. "Hey!"

"My fault," Sheila laughed. "He thought I was you. And pardon me if I don't get up, or I'll be showing him what you just showed me."

Jessie's face frizzed out, and she laughed ruefully. "I shouldn't be so embarrassed. You're a girl!"

"Dear God I hope so," Sheila grinned outrageously. "Cause what Kit showed me when he got out of the shower doesn't match what I have down here at all!" she laughed, pointing to her lap.

"Flashing your own cousin? Shame on you!" Jessie laughed.

"I thought she was you," Kit grunted as he edged around Sheila's legs in the small bathroom and got out into the hall. He stopped and looked back, saw Jessie still hiding behind the doorframe as she started talking to Sheila, not seeming to realize that she was hiding yet she seemed to have no qualms about looking at Sheila...not that Sheila would care. Sheila would have no qualms about walking around naked in front of both of them, because Kit was her cousin and Jessie was her friend. Sheila was like that. There was that, and her bare bottom was both a beautiful and inviting target. He took off his towel, snaked it, then snapped it at that pretty posterior. Jessie squeaked in surprise and pain, jumping out into the doorway with both paws on her bottom, and she whirled around and glared at him. “You creep!” she accused as he laughed and ducked into the bedroom and moved to close the door. She charged at him and got to the door before he could close it, and tackled him as he tried to run away, driving him onto the bed. He laughed helplessly as she grabbed a pillow and straddled his back, beating him with it, covering his head with his arms and kicking at the mattress.

“What the hell’s going on?” Sheila asked from the doorway.

“He snapped me with his towel!” Jessie told her, wailing on him with the pillow. “You sneak!”

“Does she beat you up like this often, cousin?”

“Yes!” Kit gasped for breath between gales of laughter. “I give, I give, I give!” he surrendered, putting his arms out. Jessie whacked him in the back of his unprotected head with the pillow one more time, then she gasped and laughed helplessly. He looked out of the corner of his eye and saw she had the pillow pulled up against her chest, because Sheila was standing in the doorway, leaning against the doorframe in her tank top and panties.

“What’s wrong with you, Jessie?” she asked.

“If you didn’t notice, I’m naked, Jessie’s naked, and we’re not used to having an audience,” Kit answered for her.

“That’s the truth!” Jessie laughed nervously.

“Well, I can either go get dressed or meet you on your level,” Sheila teased. “Unlike you two, I’m not afraid to show off what God graced me with.”

“Go get dressed, you exhibitionist brat!” Kit told her. Laughing, Sheila went back to the living room to get her clothes. “Uh, can I get up now, love?”

“Let me think about that. No,” she answered, leaning down to where her muzzle was by his ear.

“I do have to go to work. And you have school in an hour.”

“I haven’t decided how to punish you quite yet,” she said archly, putting her paws on his shoulders to hold him down when he moved to rise up off the bed.

“I’m getting the bed wet.”

“It’ll dry off.”

“Your leg’s on my tail.”

“It won’t break.”

“Uhhh, so, now what?”

“Now you think very quickly how to deflect my wrath,” she told him quietly in his ear.

He laughed. “I’ll just give you puppy-dog eyes until you forgive me.”

“Oh, that’s not going to work this time, baby,” she breathed in his ear. He felt her take her weight off of him, and thought she was letting him up.

But then he yelped when she slapped him on the backside, and she was not gentle. She literally spanked him, the first time in his entire life anyone had ever spanked him, and it wasn't entirely pleasant, even though he was laughing through most of it. "And you call your cousin a brat, you brat! Now get dressed!"

"Yes, mommy," he wheezed, scrambling across the bed. Jessie kept her stern demeanor up until he scampered to the fur dryer with both paws on his posterior to protect it from her, which made her burst into laughter.

Kit dressed and found Sheila and Jessie sitting on the couch having tea when he came into the front part of the apartment. Sheila hadn't dressed yet, and Jessie had put on one of her droopy nightshirts. "You two have a great relationship," he heard Sheila say as he went to the kitchen. "You play like kids, but nobody can look at you and not see the love there."

"We're made for each other," Jessie said with a giggle. "We've only known each other for almost four months, but it's like we've been together all our lives. When I went back home over Thanksgiving, I didn't know what to do with myself when we were apart. I couldn't even sleep."

"So you just jumped right into bed?"

Jessie laughed. "Oh no, that took a while," she admitted. "I had to make sure he was ready."

"Him? Usually it's the girl."

"I had to make sure there was just me and him," she told her. "When we first met, he was still terrified of your family. I had to coax him into declaring independence before I could deepen our relationship. I had to know he was coming to me his own fur, without strings tying him to the family that might pull him away from me.”

“Ah. I can understand that. No doubt he’d get pretty torn up between those strings and your claws.”

She laughed. “You see the points,” she grinned, holding up her paws and showing Sheila her small yet sharp little claws. “I would have dug in and refused to let go.”

“I’m glad you would,” he said with a smile as he came out of the kitchen with a cup of tea.

“So, she let you out of your room, eh? I thought she was going to ground you there for a minute,” Sheila grinned.

“She spanked me,” he said sourly, rubbing his backside with his free paw, which made Sheila explode into laughter.

“You deserved it,” she told him archly, but she was grinning at him.

“Eh, so I did,” he chuckled. “I think I got a little too enthusiastic there. I think Sheila brings out the worst in me.”

“Don’t blame that on me!” Sheila protested.

“Your brattiness is contagious,” Kit winked.

“Pft, what you call brattiness, I call taking what you want when you want because you can,” she grinned. “If that makes me a brat, then I’m a brat. Guilty as charged,” she giggled.

“I wish I could be brave like you, Sheila,” Jessie laughed.

“Oh, I dunno, beating up your fiancée in front of his cousin while you’re naked is fairly brave,” she noted, which made Jessie’s face poof out and caused Kit to laugh.

“You’d better get a shower, hon,” Kit urged. “And you’d better get dressed, cousin, we have work in half an hour.”

“Lemme run over to my place and get dressed. I’ll drive myself in,” she told him as she grabbed her jeans from the floor and started pulling them on.

“Works for me. I’m gonna go ahead and go,” he said, leaning over the couch and kissing Jessie on the cheek. “Do me a favor, cousin.”

“Yeah?”

“Pick up some bagels or donuts or something on the way in.”

“Get it yourself!” she said indignantly.

“You’re the intern. Grab a box and bring it in, the gang’ll love you for it.”

“Oh, well, that’s okay then. I miss The Teacup,” she sighed.

“What’s that?”

“A little tea and pastry shop near Harvard,” she answered. “They had the best tea there, and all kinds of great pastries.” She pointed at the teacup on the coffee table. “Way better than that.”

“This isn’t tea country, cousin. You take what you can get.”

“They gotta have something better. I need to go check out the grocery stores.”

“They do, but it’s expensive down here,” Kit told her.

“So what? I’ll pay through the nose for a good cup of tea.”

“Hell, if you’re willing to pay, get me some,” Kit teased.

“Why don’t you kiss my furry ass?” she retorted tartly. She turned turned her back to him and presented her panty-clad backside, sticking her tail straight up. “You want a road map, or did Jessie at least teach you where to go? Want me to pull my panties down so you don’t get that silky aftertaste?” she added, hooking her thumbs into the waist of her panties, then deliberately pulling them down, mooning him.

Kit laughed. “Now that’s the Sheila I remember from home,” he grinned, then he hurried out the door.

“Hey, everyone else showed me their asses today, it was only fair you got to see mine,” she teased, pulling her panties and jeans up as Kit laughed his way out the door.

The visit from Sarah was smoothed over and basically forgotten in the whirlwind of activity leading up to the wedding, a whirlwind that caught Sheila up with it.

Kit kept mothering Jessie through her finals preparation, and got help from Sheila to boot. Sheila helped him cook all week after coming back from Rick and Martha’s, and on Friday, Sheila took Jessie, Sam, and Sandy out clubbing to help them relax. Kit settled in at home, at least until Lupe came over and told him to keep next Saturday night clear, because they were going to his bachelor party. Kit had honestly never thought about that, but clearly others had been.

“Well, I think I can handle that,” Kit told him.

“Oh, brah, have we got something special in store for you!” the chihuahua laughed. “You’re gonna love it!”

“I’d better, it will be a party, after all,” Kit grinned. “But tell Mickey that strip poker is absolutely out of the question.”

Lupe broke down laughing, pounding on the back of the couch with his paw.

Jessie and Sheila showed up at home around three in the morning, and they were totally smashed. It startled Kit awake because Jessie didn’t turn off the alarm, and Kit had to get that off before ADT sent the police automatically. Sheila tried to get Kit to go back out with them, but she passed out in the dining room while trying to find her way to the kitchen to get some wine. Jessie just swayed in place near the door, her eyes unfocused and jittery, as her tail twitched behind her.

“I don’t believe it,” Kit breathed reverently. “Jessie, you drank Sheila under the table. I’m shocked!”

“Who is Sheila?” Jessie asked disjointedly, then she literally passed out where she stood.

Kit didn’t get much more sleep. He put Jessie to bed and put Sheila on the couch, then had to help Jessie endure the inevitable effect of someone like her drinking so much so fast...nausea. He helped her to the bathroom so she could kneel in front of the toilet for a while, then carried her back to bed and tucked her in. Kit napped a bit, but when the loud sound of Sheila retching in the bathroom woke him up, he gave up trying to sleep and got up and went into the den. “Hey,” Sheila said raggedly from the doorway. He glanced back at her and saw that she was half dressed, in her bra and panties, and that wasn't how he left her. "Sorry about the noise."

"You're coherent," he noted lightly. "I wasn't sure you'd be able to form sentences until sometime tomorrow. I had to scrape you off the dining room floor."

She grunted sourly. "I'm gonna have one hell of a hangover in the morning," she admitted, putting a paw to her head. "I never shoulda tried those Jäger bombs."

"Sheila, Jessie out-drunk you. You're slipping."

"I had about ten times more than she did. She got that bombed off just two daiquiris and a screwdriver. You need to toughen her up, Kit. She's a lightweight."

Kit chuckled. "Did Sam and Sandy get home alright?"

"Sam was the designated driver, so I'm sure they did," she answered.

"I'm glad you thought ahead."

"Sam did," she said, then she gave a slight moan, then put her paw over her mouth. "Sczzmfh," she gurgled, then ran for the bathroom again.

Kit had to tend a pair of very hung over ladies the next morning. He called Rick and told him he'd have to come in late, and when he explained why, Rick just laughed and told him to take his time. Jessie didn't even get out of bed until after ten, and Sheila laid on the couch with a rag over her eyes all morning. When Jessie did appear, she was a mess. Her hair was wildly askew, going off in every direction, wearing a nightshirt and a pair of panties. She clung to the wall for support, squinting through bloodshot eyes.

“Kit?” she asked weakly. “Am I dying? Please tell me I’m dying. I don’t think any fur could live through this.”

“Welcome to the morning after,” Sheila groaned from the couch.

Jessie winced. “Don’t shout!” she admonished, which made her wince from the sound of her own voice.

Kit collected her up and helped her over to the table, then sat her down and handed her a cup of tea. She took it in shaking paws, but didn’t raise it to her lips. “I’m gonna throw up if I drink this,” she warned. “I might throw up anyway.”

“Trust me. People who drink like the Vulpans know how to nurse through a hangover. Small sips, love. Very small sips.”

She raised the cup to her maw with trembling paws and took a very small sip of the tea, then put it down, pushed it away, and sank her head to the table. “I’m dying!” she moaned, her tail trembling.

“You just learned the first rule, love,” Kit told her. “Never try to out-drink a Vulpan.”

“She did this to me!” Jessie accused, her head coming up and pointing at the couch. “I’m gonna kill you if this doesn’t kill, me, Sheila! I swear I will!”

“If my head doesn’t stop pounding, I’ll gladly let you take it off,” Sheila grunted from the couch. “She wasn’t the one I had to out-drink. That little chinchilla was a freakin’ monster,” she groaned. “I’ve never seen someone so small drink so much and still be able to dance, let alone walk!”

Kit just had to laugh. “So, spurred on by some twisted sense of pride, eh?”

“I thought I could put any femme under the table,” Sheila groaned, putting her arm over her eyes. “How the hell did Sandy do it?”

“Odds are, Sandy’s probably in about the same position you two are,” Kit chuckled. “Ones like her don’t get hit until after she slows down.”

“I hope she spent all night with her face in the toilet,” Sheila said spitefully. “I hope she drowned in the damn commode!”

“Such hate,” Kit chuckled. “Come get some honeyed tea, cousin.”

“If I can get there without falling down,” she said, dragging herself up to a sitting position.

“You have to work today, don’t you?”

“No, I have the same hours as Rick,” she answered as she wobbled over to the table and collapsed into a chair. Kit made some honeyed tea for her and put it in front of her, and she took an unsteady sip and then buried her face in her paws. “Aspirin!”

“After you finish the tea.”

Once they had something stable in their stomachs, he banished both of them back to the bed and the couch. “The best way is to just sleep it off,” he told Jessie as he put her back in bed. “You’ll feel better when you get up, trust me.”

“I’m dying, Kit!” she said melodramatically.

“You’re hung over. It only feels like death,” he told her calmly as he tucked her in. “Now, I have to get ready for work.”

“Don’t leave me! You need to give me last rites or something!”

He chuckled. “Oh, and by the way.”

“What?”

“Remember when you spanked me?”

“Yeah?”

“I love it when you get revenge on yourself, and I don’t have to lift a finger,” he said as he leaned down and kissed her on the muzzle, then wandered out of the room humming to himself.

“If I wasn’t dying, I’d beat you up!” she called loudly from the bed, then she groaned when her own voice intensified her headache.

“Promises, promises.”

“Grroah!”

They were both feeling much better when he got home after only four hours at work, though they were still rather indisposed. They were both sitting on the couch wearing nightshirts, watching a DVD when he got back. Sheila was laying on the couch, her feet in Jessie’s lap, who had her own feet propped up on the coffee table. “And how do you two feel?” he asked when he carried his laptop carrying portfolio into the den. He still had some work to do, but he could do the rest of it from home, and Rick knew that he’d get everything done no matter where he was.

“My head isn’t going to explode now,” Jessie said. “But I still feel kinda groggy and queasy.”

“Well, when you’re ready for food, I’ll make something hangover-safe for you.”

“What’s hangover safe?”

“Chicken soup, I’m thinking. Nothing greasy or heavy or spicy,” he answered. “Pasta with it, maybe, depending. A light salad too. Until then, I have some work to do, so I’ll be in the den if you need me.”

There would be a reckoning for his dig on Jessie while she was hung over, and he knew it...but keeping things interesting was just one of the fun parts about living together.

Kit had all his work done on Project A by Monday, which basically gave him little to do and little to distract him from the upcoming wedding. The gang was happy to distract him, though, and Rick gave him a few small projects to do to keep his mind occupied, the main one of which was to do his first bit of real writing.

“What is this?” he asked when Rick handed him a file folder.

“Your first work as a reporter,” he answered. “We’ve been publishing your writing for a while, but I want you to try your paw at doing something more traditional. I got you an interview with the assistant dean about the budget issues coming up next year that might raise tuition. Usually I’d send Barry, but Barry’s working on the election project, and Lilly’s doing a different story about what students will be doing during the winter break, so it’s time for you to cut your teeth on actual journalism,” he smiled. “So, now, instead of just researching what we bring you, think about what you want to ask him, do your research, and then go do the interview and write a report.”

“Hmm,” he said. “When’s the interview?”

“Thursday,” he answered. “If you need any help, I’m sure Barry and Lilly will give you some pointers on how to do an interview and write a report based on it.”

“No, I think I can do it,” he countered, tapping the file to his muzzle as what he needed to do began to collect in his mind. “Oh yeah, Saturday night, my landlord is giving me a bachelor party. Wanna come?”

“Did I hear those magical words?” Mike said excitedly from his office. The thin wall was usually no barrier to hearing what was going on between the two of them. “Did I hear bachelor party?” he shouted.

“Yeah, you heard right,” Kit laughed as Barry, Jeffrey, Mike, and Savid all crowded in the hallway outside the door. “Lupe hasn’t told me where or when yet. I’ll let you know.”

“I hope Lupe knows how to do it right,” Mike grinned. “Strippers, booze, the whole experience!”

“We’ll see,” Kit chuckled. “I haven’t heard anything about a party for Jessie yet, though, but I’m sure her sorority has something planned.”

“Oh, they do,” Sheila called from the office with a laugh. “It’s supposed to be a surprise, so don’t say anything!”

“I’d never do that,” he called. “Are they going crazy?”

Sheila laughed. “They went beyond crazy about five days ago!”

“Oh honey, now that’s my kind of party!” Marty called from the front.

“So, you counting hours yet?” Rick asked.

Kit laughed. “Nine days, seventeen hours,” he looked at his watch, “and sixteen minutes.”

“You’re so whipped,” Mike teased, then he yelped as Sheila slapped him on the rump as she went by.

“So are you,” she told him as she went to Marty’s desk out front.

“You tell ‘em, sister!” Lilly called with a laugh.

Kit had never done his own story from front to back before, and it was a refreshing challenge and also kept him from going nuts with anxiety and eagerness waiting for the wedding. He had two days to prepare for it, and when he did finally talk with the dean, he had a mountain of researched data to use. The ferret was very kind and talkative, but she was also a bit surprised that Kit had dug up enrollment figures and tuitions from almost all the major colleges and collated them into a statistical trend that showed that U.T. was projecting a tuition increase higher than the norm for other major 1-A schools compared to enrollment rates.

“Where did you find all this?” she asked curiously as he showed her the graph on his laptop. “I haven’t seen work this complete out of my own office!”

“I’m a researcher mainly, ma’am,” he chuckled. “So I made sure to come prepared.”

“Wow, did you!” she laughed, patting his wrist.

It was a good interview though. Kit was polite and friendly, he asked in-depth questions and allowed her to answer them fully, and he was sure to give her the chance to highlight what she saw were the good points even as he challenged her over the bad ones.

What was the ultimate complement for a researcher, the dean asked for a copy of his findings to take with her and study, and also to present to the president of the college as ammunition when they talked about the budget that might raise tuition.

When he got back to the office, he spent the rest of the day writing the article. He revised it several times, then had Barry edit it for him to see if he did it right. “Looks pretty good,” Barry told him. “You’ve learned how to write a magazine article pretty well,” he grinned, showing off his sharp teeth. “Go ahead and make those changes I suggested and send both the original and this revision to Rick and let him doublecheck my changes.”

“You got it.”

“So, the big party is on Saturday,” Barry noted as he leaned back in the chair in Kit’s office. “Has your landlord told you about it yet?”

“Only that it’s not at the complex,” he answered. “So it must be in some hotel or strip club. Lupe’s a pretty lowest common denominator kinda guy, Barry. He’s into football, beer, and don’t tell Jessie this, but porn. I have no doubt he has strippers lined up for it.”

“Jessie’s in for a shock with her party,” Barry laughed. “Sheila ain’t telling you about it because she thinks you’ll spill, but she told Lilly, and Lilly told me. Her sorority’s gonna have a big party at their house for her tomorrow, complete with male strippers. The theme is virgin no more. They even went out got a big banner saying that.”

Kit laughed raucously. “Oh, that’ll be awesome. Are you going?”

“You bet I am!”

“Get some pictures!”

“Oh, I’ve got Mister Sneaky right here,” she said, pulling a tiny digital camera out of her pocket, a very, very tiny model. “I’ll get some great pictures!”

“Make sure you get a picture of Jessie giving a tip to one of the strippers,” he said after looking around, then telling her in a low tone. “I have a plan.”

“For what? Divorce?”

“No, no, it’s gonna be a joke,” he told her. “I’m gonna put that picture in what’ll look like an email to Hannah and leave it on the desktop when I go to work. Jessie’s last final was today, so I’m sure she’ll find it next week when she’s using the computer.”

Lilly gave him a look, then erupted into helpless laughter. “Kit, that’s mean!”

“But it’ll be great!”

“She’s gonna skin you!”

“That’s what makes it fun,” he winked. “If there was no threat of getting beat up, it wouldn’t be worth doing in the first place. Besides, I have to keep life interesting for her. If I’m boring, she’ll think our life will be boring too. So I have to misbehave from time to time, to keep her on her toes.”

Lilly laughed and patted him on the shoulder. “You’ll get your picture,” she grinned conspiratorially.

When he got home, he found Jessie in the kitchen, elbow-deep in a mixing bowl and food scattered all over the kitchen counters. “Holy cow, what happened in here?” he asked.

“Finals are over!” she actually sang happily. “I think I did well, so I’m celebrating!”

“Celebrating with food?” he asked curiously, picking up a box of Bisquick.

“I’m making a big dinner for the girls at the sorority!” she told him. “Some of them still have finals tomorrow, so I’m gonna make sure they’re all well fed! Homemade Italian bread, lasagna, chicken curry, a cake, salad, pasta salad, everything!”

“You’ll never finish all this by dinnertime.”

“I will if you help,” she said, giving him a bright, innocent smile.

“And what payment will I receive for this service?” he teased.

“You got that payment last night,” she said archly. “I wasn’t exactly in the mood last night, love, but I’m not going to deny you when you’re feeling frisky. Mom told us that’s one of the fastest ways to poison your marriage.”

“You didn’t seem like you were against the idea,” he protested.

“Well, I wasn’t quite so against it by the time we got going,” she giggled with her cheeks ruffling. “Girls are different than boys, love. Boys are on all the time. You have to get a girl going, and you kinda did, even if I wasn’t ready to go when we started.”

“Well, now that my masculinity has been appeased, let me help here,” he laughed. “What’s left to do?”

“I got two lasagnas in the oven and rolls and a loaf of Italian bread ready to go,” she told him. “Can you chop the salad veggies, get the rotini on the stove, and put on the chicken for the curry?”

“Wow, you are going all-out,” he laughed.

“I’m about halfway done here.”

Kit helped her out, but excused himself to go to the bathroom. While inside, he took out his phone and called Sandy. “Jessie’s coming over to the sorority tonight,” he whispered. “You’d better—“

“She already told us she’s coming to feed us,” Sandy cut him off. “Said she made dinner for us.”

“We’re doing that now,” he affirmed. “So hide everything.”

“Who told you?”

“Silly girl, you’re dealing with a Vulpan. We are omniscient!”

Sandy laughed. “Suuuure you are. Was it Sheila?”

“Nobody told me, you just need to keep better secrets,” Kit teased.

“Does she know?”

“Of course not. You think I’d ruin this for her? She’ll have fun!”

“I’m glad you’re saying that now, cause you’ll change your mind when she tells you all about it,” Sandy laughed.

“Do your worst,” Kit challenged. “Gotta go, talk to you later.”

They finished the meal up by around seven, and it took Kit’s Pathfinder to get it all over there in one trip. The girls were almost jumping around them like happy dogs when they brought in a meal capable of feeding eleven starving college femmes. Kit came back and let her celebrate with her sorority sisters, and went back to pick her up when they were all done and she was ready to come home. While they were pulling out away from the sorority, Jessie hummed and put her elbow on the side of the door. “They’re up to something,” she finally proclaimed.

“What do you mean?”

“Sandy was way too...bubbly. I think they’re up to something.”

“Well, did she finish her finals today like you did? Maybe that’s why.”

“No, I—I know them, love. Sandy’s planning something. I think she’s gonna throw a bachelorette party.”

“I guess that’s always possible. Lupe’s giving me a party on Saturday...then we get to go to mass on Sunday,” he chuckled.

“A week, baby,” she giggled. “Only one more week! By this time next week, we’ll be on a plane to Boston, and I’ll be Misses Vulpan!”

“I can’t wait either,” he said, reaching over and taking her paw, then he had to let go to change gears. “Is everything ready?”

“Yup, it’s all ready,” she said with relief. “There’s not much to do now but wait.”

“We do have two rehearsals, remember. Tuesday and Wednesday.”

“I thought they were on Tuesday and Thursday.”

“The father called and changed them. He has to perform a wake on Thursday.”

“When did he do that?”

“Yesterday. He called me at work.”

“Why didn’t you tell me?”

“Well, you stayed up til after midnight studying, then there was me being frisky,” he said, ticking off his fingers. “Then you were up and at school before I even got up this morning.”

“I wanted to get some cramming done,” she told him.

“And I find you cooking when I get home,” he told her. “So, that’s why.”

“Can’t argue with that,” she giggled, then saw he wasn’t going home. “Where are we going?”

“You just finished the semester, love, and tomorrow’s my late day, so we’re gonna go celebrate in a way that doesn’t involve you working your cute butt off.”

She laughed. “Ooooh, lead on then, my handsome fox.”

The first part of the celebration was something Jessie never expected in a million years, but she didn’t mind at all. When Kit pulled into Northcross Mall, she was giving him a surprised look. “Oh no, you want to make me go home bruised!” she complained, but she was grinning at him.

“We never did finish that lesson,” he smiled as he parked. He pulled a battered old pair of skates out of the back seat. “And these were in the stuff that Vil sent me from my apartment in Boston, so why not see if they’re still good?” He got out of the car and went around to her and helped her out, giving her a warm smile. “And there’s more to do after this.”

“Oh really? And what other activities have you planned that involve things you like to do?” she grinned at him.

“You’ll see.”

They spent about an hour skating, as Kit taught Jessie more about how it was done, then they went back into town and to one of the larger and more well-known coffee bars near campus. Kit brought her in and ordered tea for them, just as a weasel got up to the microphone in the corner and began reciting poetry. “You said you like Milton, well, it’s Milton night,” he smiled.

“Now you’re talking,” she said with a glowing smile, and she held his paw as she listened to the recital. Kit wasn’t particularly into poetry, but being a rich kid, he was more than good at feigning interest and zoning out until it was time to go.

She was excited and animated when it was done and he took her home at nearly eleven, and they shared a glass of wine on the couch in contented silence, Jessie snuggled up against him and purring between sips of wine. “Thank you,” she said.

“Hey, I realized we haven’t been out for a while, you know? What kind of marriage will we have if we just sit around at home all the time?”

She giggled. “Like that’s a bad thing,” she told him. “I like being a homebody.”

“Mind being a teddy bear?” he asked. “Neither of us got much sleep last night, and I’m getting a little sleepy.”

She laughed. “Sure, as soon as I finish my wine.”

“Well, I’m gonna go get ready for bed,” he announced, standing up with his empty wine glass. He put it away, locked the door, and set the alarm, and she joined him just a moment after he got into bed, undressing and slipping under the covers, the snuggling up against his back. “Kit.”

“Hmm?”

“Sandy’s planning something, isn’t she?”

“I have no idea,” he answered.

“Kit, you’re a bad liar,” she chuckled, digging her claws into his shoulder and side.

“I can state with total truthfulness that I have no idea if she’s planning anything, and if she is, what it might be,” he told her calmly. “And even if I did, you think I’d tell you?”

“I thought so,” she giggled, rising up enough to nip playfully at his ear.

“Hey, hey, careful, there’s not much left of that ear,” he warned, which made her laugh.

“Then you’d better start talking if you want to keep it,” she teased.

“In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth,” he intoned, which made her laugh, pick up her pillow, and bop him with it. He rolled over to face her, and she snuggled into his arms and sighed in contentment.

“Now this is better. Hugging your back just isn’t the same,” she said in a dreamy kind of voice, then he could tell she was falling asleep.

He was right behind her.

Though Jessie suspected skullduggery, Kit didn't squeal. Jessie came over to the office that evening to bring an early dinner to him and do some writing for her part of School Daze, closeted with Jeffrey as they discussed strip ideas. She was surprised, but not too surprised when Lilly and Sheila intercepted her on the way out of the office and then dragged her off.

"It must be party time," Savid noted as Kit brought some slices of pie out for the others that Jessie had brought.

"Yup. I guess I'd better go get some honey for tea, cause she'll be hung over tomorrow," he chuckled.

"Your party is tomorrow?"

"Yeah, you coming?"

"I hope to. Any word where is yet?"

"Nope, Lupe said he'd tell us where to go tomorrow after work," Kit chuckled. "He's keeping it all secret."

"How many can I invite to your wedding?"

"Well, from the number of replies we got back, as many as you want," he laughed. "The church won't be half full, and Vil paid for an army's worth of food at the reception. So invite everyone, I'd hate to see all that food go to waste."

"Never tell an Indian that, Kit. I have lots of relatives."

Kit laughed. "Well, as many as you feel comfortable bringing," he amended. "And mind that they'll be serving beef there, in case any of your relatives are devout Hindus."

"Hamburgers even at your wedding?"

“I gotta have one,” he laughed. “They’re making one super-special deluxe hamburger for the reception, and that’s mine. But they’re also serving filet mignon, and that’s beef. But they’re also serving chicken and vegetable dishes.”

“I will sure to warn,” he nodded. “I hope your party has lots of fun.”

“Lupe’s a debased kind of guy, Savid. You’d better check your morality at the door, it’s liable to be wild.”

“Indians love wild parties,” Savid grinned. “Indians are original party civilization. Who wrote the Kama Sutra?”

“Okay, you win that argument, if only for finding a way to mention the Kama Sutra,” Kit laughed.

Kit went home and waited, but wasn’t bored. He finished the last of the work he’d been doing that day, then talked with Hannah when she called looking for Jessie. “She’s at her bachelorette party,” he told her. “Her sorority sisters are throwing it.”

“Oh dear, I hope she doesn’t get too wild.”

“I hope she does. It’s her night, let her have all the fun she wants,” Kit answered.

“I’ve never heard a groom say that,” she noted.

“I trust Jessie, Hannah,” he said easily. “So why wouldn’t I want her to have a night to remember?”

“Because she may never forget it.”

“Pft, if I can’t keep her, I don’t deserve her,” Kit scoffed.

“That’s not what I mean. She might be guilty.”

“There’s nothing she can do that she should feel guilty over.”

“Even if she cheats on you?”

“She won’t,” he dismissed easily. “A marriage is built on trust, Hannah. I trust Jessie.”

His trust was rewarded at five in the morning, when Jessie staggered home. She was absolutely and totally smashed. She was staggering towards the kitchen when he came out from the bedroom, barely able to stay on her feet, and he rushed over and steadied her when she nearly fell. “H-H-Hi,” she stammered, collapsing against him.

“How did you get home?” he asked immediately.

“Caaaaab,” she slurred as he collected her up. “Shoooo, wanna make thish little kitty purr?” she asked, then she literally passed out in his arms.

“Maybe later,” he chuckled.

Kit had nursed her through one hangover, but this one was the mother of all hangovers. She spent nearly an hour staggering back and forth to the bathroom to throw up. When not throwing up, she laid in bed, at least until the headache came. Kit waited until she was more coherent, when the alcohol wasn’t clouding her reason, and came back into the bedroom carrying a baby’s sip cup. “Here,” he said, as she pulled the wet cloth from over her eyes and looked up at him blearily.

“I don’t even want to think about food right now,” she groaned, putting her paws over her face. “I’m so embarrassed! I must look like an idiot!”

“No more than you did when you got drunk with Sheila,” he chuckled. “Drink that as much as you can, it’ll take the bite off.”

“What is it?”

“A mixture of wine, tea, and honey. An old Vulpan family hangover tonic. I won’t taste that good, but it’ll help.”

“Wine?”

“Think of a hangover as fast-track withdrawal shock,” he told her. “Drinking more delays a hangover, but that’s just it, delays it. It doesn’t make the hangover go away. But, a little alcohol during a hangover does at least take the edge off that headache. You’ll go from feeling like your brain is melting to simply having a bad headache.”

“Gimme!” she gasped, taking it in shaking paws and attacking it.

Kit let the small amount of wine in the tonic take the biggest part of the edge off her headache as he got dressed for work. “I’m going to go ahead and go in,” he told her. “Just sleep, love. I should be done by noon, so I’ll be home early, okay?”

“I just hope I’m still alive by then,” she groaned.

“I’m sure you’ll live,” he chuckled, kissing her on the forehead. “Tylenol’s on the nightstand, and I made you a light lunch for when you’re feeling up to eating.”

“I love you,” she said honestly, but weakly.

“I love it when drunk girls tell me they love me.”

“I’m not drunk anymore, I’m hung over,” she corrected.

“Well, be ready to give what you’ve received.”

“Huh?”

“My party’s tonight, so I expect to be nursed through my hangover tomorrow without any nagging or snide comments,” he teased lightly as he turned off the light.

“Girls who get drunk have no right to throw stones,” Jessie managed with a weak laugh.

“See you soon, love.”

“Thanks, love.”

Kit got the lowdown on the party last night from Lilly, who dragged into the office with bloodshot eyes nearly an hour late. “It...was... awesome!” she finally declared, then she laughed. “The sorority must have hired every male stripper in the entire state of Texas, and there were like fifty girls there!”

“How did they fit them all into the house?”

“I have no idea,” she laughed. “It was awesome, though! Strippers, food, a band, and so much beer I thought they emptied out the distributor! They must have saved for months to pay for that bash!”

“So, you get any good pictures?”

“Oh, did I get pictures, or did I get pictures?” she grinned, holding her little digital camera up before her and wagging it like a prize.

“Well, pictures are for viewing!” Kit prompted, dragging her into the main office.

She got about a hundred pictures, and they showed the party in all its ribald glory. It was any college guy's dream; dozens and dozens of pretty coeds, boozed up and excited, posing for the camera when they knew it was there, but the pictures Lilly got by ambush were much better. One picture showed Sandy hanging all over one of the male strippers, who was without his G-string. When Kit made note of that, Lilly laughed. "They paid the strippers to go full nude," she explained.

"That's illegal in Texas," Kit chuckled.

"I don't think they cared," she grinned in reply. She cycled through a bunch of pictures showing the girls at the party going absolutely wild with the strippers, one picture almost making it look like one was having sex with a stripper right on the floor to an audience. "Oh, they weren't," Lilly chuckled. "The guy grabbed her and pulled her down onto the floor with him and pretended. That made the party go nuts!" she laughed. "I bet they could hear us screaming and cheering in San Antonio!" She plugged in a different memory chip with a grin. "This is the one you wanted," she winked. She cycled through quite a few pictures, until she got to the one she wanted. Jessie was sitting on a stripper's lap, her eyes hazy and her fur all disheveled, being handed a plastic cup of beer by a large paw that had to be the other Jessie's. "I couldn't get one of her giving them tips cause she didn't, but there's this one. The stripper tried to get her to pretend to give him a lap dance as practice for your wedding night, so she could give you a really sexy one."

Kit laughed delightedly. "Did she?"

"Nah, even drunk, she was too shy to do it," she laughed. "That's about as far as it went, what you see there." She snorted. "But there was one girl that wasn't afraid to do something like that," she laughed. She cycled through the pictures, and then showed him a picture of Sheila, totally naked, leaning over with her bare butt and tail pressed up against the stomach of a tall, muscular wolf stripper, who had his paws behind his head and his tongue lolling out of his mouth in an over-the-top, theatrical expression. “The strippers issued a strip-off challenge to any girl brave enough to dance naked with them,” she laughed. “Sheila took them up on it!”

“I’m not surprised,” he chuckled. He had to admit, despite being his cousin, Sheila had a hot body.

And damn, was she limber.

“She earned fifty bucks off a bet to boot,” Lilly grinned. “I’ll delete this one as soon as I have a chance, bud. I don’t think your family needs pictures like this drifting around, but I just had to show it to you,” she told him with an evil smile.

“That’s forward-thinking of you, Lilly, but save a couple of copies. Now, whenever Sheila gives us backtalk at work, we just mention the picture and shut her up.”

Lilly laughed delightedly. “Okay, okay, we save two copies, one of your and one for me. Sheila’s not the only one that got caught on camera doing something naughty, though,” she winked, showing the next image in the memory card. It was Sandy, also totally naked, standing straddled over a leopard stripper that was kneeling in front of her, both paws on his head and a surprised look on her face as the leopard bit her belly button. “Sandy couldn’t let Sheila beat her in sheer audacity,” Lilly laughed.

“So, it was a wild party,” he noted. “Oh, you’d better hide that picture from Jeffrey,” he added.

“I will, and yes, it was a very wild party,” she grinned. “They’ll talk about that party on campus for years.”

“Any trouble?”

“Nothing major. A couple of instances of sex in the upstairs bedrooms and a visit from the cops to keep the noise down, but nothing noteworthy. It was wild, but it wasn’t too wild.”

“Wasn’t it femmes only?”

“Well, a couple of girls negotiated some private performances with the strippers,” she winked. “And, not all the femmes that went to the party were straight.”

“Ah.”

“So, I expect pictures of your party.”

“I’m sure Mike’s taking his camera,” he replied.

“Here, take this one. Lemme get you some empty memory cards for it,” she grinned. “I want good pictures!”

“I’m sure they’ll be good.” He stopped her before she went to the desk. “Take all the pictures and put them on a DVD for me.”

“Including Sandy’s?”

“Oh, you know I want that one,” he said with an evil tilt to his voice. “I may need blackmail material.”

Lilly burst out laughing. “Done, as long as you bring back pictures just as good!”

“I can’t make any promises, but from what I know of Lupe, I think I will.”

Kit made two copies of the DVD and left them the office, and took the original DVD back home with him and placed it in a conspicuous place in the den, where Jessie was sure to stumble across it. He then went about nursing his hung over fiancée. Jessie was still feeling poorly when he got home, but she was well enough to sit on the couch in nothing but a nightshirt and her panties, a quilt over her legs and a cup of honeyed tea in her paws. Sheila came over not long after he got home, as he was cooking French toast for Jessie, and she looked haggard but happy. “You look like hell,” Kit noted as she came in.

“It was worth it,” she laughed, sitting at the dining room table. “What are you doing?”

“Cooking,” he said mildly.

“Show me!” she said, hurrying in. “What are you making?”

“French toast, and I saw quite a bit of you this morning,” he said with a slight smile.

“Huh?”

“Lilly took pictures,” he told her.

For the first time in his life, he saw his bold cousin’s fur on her face stand on end. “She didn’t!”

“Oh, you know she did,” he laughed. “She got a great shot of you grinding your tail and naked butt into the stomach of one of the strippers.”

“Oh, God,” she said morosely, putting her face in her paw. “She caught that on camera?”

“Ohhh, did she,” he chuckled.

“Please tell me she destroyed it?”

“Silly femme, and where would that leave us when we want something from you?” he asked mildly, stringing her along.

“Kit, if my mom sees that, she’ll go nuclear! They know I party, but I’ve never crossed that line before!”

“What line, getting wild at a party?”

“No, getting photographed getting wild at a party,” she told him seriously. “If a pic of that like me ever got to the tabloids, can you imagine what Mom would do to me?”

“True. Alright, I promise not to show it around. But I will keep it for blackmail purposes,” he grinned at her.

“Where is it?”

“In an undisclosed location,” he told her. “And I have lots of copies.”

“Bastard!”

“I’ll be sure to bring back some compromising pictures of me from tonight, so you can hold onto those,” he winked.

She laughed then. “Alright, maybe you’re not a bastard. Let the threat of mutually assured embarrassment hold us in check!”

“Sounds like I’ll have to get crazy for my picture,” he grinned.

“I expect nothing less than full frontal nudity and a compromising position with a naked stripper,” she declared.

“He’d better not!” Jessie said sharply from the living room.

“And I have a picture for you, Jessie. It involves a naked dog and an attempted lap dance,” he called teasingly.

“Oh my God! Lilly said her camera had no film in it!”

“Hon, since when does Lilly use anything but a digital camera?”

“I’m gonna kill that squirrel!” Jessie said angrily, then she laughed helplessly. “That’s what I get for being drunk, I guess. I hope you’ll forgive me!”

“Baby, I was hoping you’d have fun,” he chided her. “I’m not so insecure that I’d think some hot stripper with better equipment than me would woo you away. I trust you, Jessie. You could have been naked sitting on his lap in that picture, and it wouldn’t matter to me at all. I know you, and I trust you.”

“Well, I’ll remember that the next time a naked stripper’s trying to get me in his lap,” she teased from the living room.

“Be my guest,” he told her.

Sheila helped him cook, and he brought Jessie to the dining room to eat. She ate slowly, and so did Sheila, but she didn’t look sick when she was done, going back to the couch. “Alright, Kit, show me the picture,” Jessie said.

Kit laughed. “Lilly gave me a DVD full of ‘em, lemme bring out a laptop,” he said.

Jessie's cheek fur didn't flatten itself for the next hour. Sheila laughed and commented on the hundreds of pictures, some of them very naughty, but few matched the downright sexuality of Sheila and Sandy's naked stripper challenge pictures. "I don't remember that!" Jessie gasped, blushing so deeply her tail fur frizzed as she looked at Sandy's picture. "She's naked!"

"Very naked," Kit laughed. "Now I can tell her I've seen her rack, and it's not bad at all."

Jessie elbowed him in the shoulder.

"When you have naked furs dancing in the living room in front of a crowd, it was a good party," Sheila laughed, then her cheeks ruffled when Kit showed her her picture.

"Naked vixen, naked wolf, naked vixen pretending to do the deed in the middle of the living room, cheering onlookers, yup, it was a good party alright," Kit chuckled lightly.

"How do you know we were pretending?" she asked with a grin.

"I don't think that's yours hanging right there," he noted, pointing at a part of the photograph that made Jessie gasp and blush anew, and made Sheila laugh riotously.

Sheila grabbed the front of her jeans, pulled them out away from her stomach, and looked down. "Nope, that's not mine. So I guess he just wasn't in the mood," she noted absently, which made Jessie erupt into embarrassed laughter.

Kit left them to look over the pictures themselves, Jessie making all kinds of surprising comments that made her seem not shy at all...but that was just the company. Jessie was very comfortable around Sheila, almost as comfortable as she was with her sister, and Jessie was much bolder when she was in private. Kit had all kinds of personal experience with Jessie's boldness when they were alone.

Sheila hung out with them for a couple of hours and then went home, but it was a short reprieve. About twenty minutes after Sheila went back to her apartment, Kit saw Lupe bounding towards his door. He opened it without ringing the doorbell, a wide grin on his face. "Yo brah, it's time! Let's go!"

"Where are we going?"

"A warehouse in south Austin," he grinned.

"A warehouse?"

"Trust me, brah," he said.

"Dude, I have friends who don't know where to go."

"Alright, call 'em and tell 'em it's the old Deuce Warehouse, off one seventy and Congress."

"That's not far from here," he realized.

"Then it won't take long to get there! Spread the word, I'll give ya ten minutes brah!"

Kit did that, telling the gang, then calling Kevin and asking him if he wanted to come. "Hell yes!" he laughed. "They got me doing this stupid defamation suit, I'd kill for a breath of fresh air!"

"Alright, know where the restaurant we ate at is? You go about two miles past that, over the bridge, and it's a big warehouse at the corner of Congress and state route one seventy.”

“I’m on the way. It’ll take me a bit to get down there, so save me a beer!”

“Remember cab fare, I don’t want you driving back.”

“Dude, I’m gonna park at the firm and take a cab from there, I’ll be safe,” he assured him.

“Smart male.”

“I’m a lawyer, bud, I don’t do stupid stuff like that,” he chuckled, then hung up.

Lupe drove him there. It was an old warehouse, the parking lot overgrown, but the cavernous interior showed that it was actually a nightclub, with neon chaser strands, a disco ball at the top of a huge empty area, and lots of tables along one side of the warehouse, facing a large stage that had a deejay on top of it. “Welcome to the Underground, brah,” Lupe told him as they entered, his brown face excited. “Dude, you’re gonna love this!”

There were already quite a few males there, already drinking as the music blared in the background. Mike arrived about three minutes after they did, a camera in his paw as he greeted Kit and Lupe. About fifteen more males, and a few females, filed in, many of them Kit didn’t know, and then the lights went low and the music changed to a techno beat. “Alright, guys, give a big welcome to the real stars of this bachelor party, the lovely ladies of the Top Hat Club!” the deejay called from the stage.

It was a mirror of the sorority party, he saw. About fifteen furs of different species sauntered out of a back door by the stage and strutted through the open space between the stage and the tables, all of them wearing skimpy little stripper outfits. One was dressed a cop, one wore a little-girl dress, one wore a sleek black teddy and carried a pair of fans, and other various costumes that were either based on real clothes or professions or were patently revealing and sexy. The males whistled and cheered as they strutted through the open area, then Lupe pushed Kit out into the open area.

“And here’s our doomed male!” the deejay called, which got him some calls and laughter. “Send him into marriage with a smile on his face, ladies!” the deejay prompted. Mike took a ton of pictures of the strippers sliding against him, running their paws all over him, rubbing themselves against him, and then, while the other strippers held him more or less out by himself, one of them began to do her striptease act. She was a cute red fox vixen, a rather well stacked vixen, wearing a hunter’s outfit. Kit smiled and enjoyed the show as she sensually stripped down to a G-string, but he was a bit surprised when she made quite a show out of taking that off as well, taking care to show him everything as she wiggled out of her G-string and bent down to step out of it. She picked it up and sidled around him, her tail caressing him as the other femmes backed off to give her room, then she gave him a grin and took her G-string and dropped it on top of his muzzle, which made the males watching cheer and howl in appreciation. It hung off his nose by its small waist strap, and Mike got a great picture of it.

Kit figured that was that, but she took his paw and dragged him back to his table, then climbed into his lap as the other strippers sauntered into the crowd to tease and mingle before they did their striptease dances, and the music began to play again. “It’s a shame a handsome fox like you is taking himself off the market,” she told him with a throaty purr, leaning back against him, grinding her tail against his lap and stomach. “Am I as pretty as your girl, baby?”

“Dude, this ain’t no legal strip club,” Lupe grinned at him, reaching over and brazenly cupping the vixen’s breast, and she made no move to stop him. “You wanna touch, touch away. She’ll even let you get a taste, but that’s between you and her, and she’ll charge extra.”

“I thought strippers couldn’t let you touch,” Kit noted.

“These aren’t just strippers, brah. This is both a strip club and a whorehouse. These ladies are both available and willing, if you got the money for a ride. And you won’t find ‘em any hotter anywhere in Texas.”

“Where did you find this place, Lupe?” Jeffrey, who had just arrived, asked in surprise. “I always thought this was an empty building! I never knew it was a bordello!”

“Dude, I know people,” he grinned in reply. “And don’t you worry about nothin’. This is all paid for, even the beer. We got four kegs to drain before we gotta start buyin’ drafts, so drink up!”

“I might have to give you a little something for free,” the vixen said seductively, reaching back and putting her paws on his muzzle. “Seeing as you’re about to trap yourself with one femme.”

“Hon, you’re gorgeous, you’re sexy, and I’m quite flattered, but I happen to find the idea of spending the rest of my life with that femme to be the best thing that could ever happen,” he chuckled in reply. “But,” he said. “You can help me with one thing.”

“And what is that?”

“I need a picture,” he said with a chuckle. “A rather, compromising picture. Would it bother you to have your picture taken with me?”

“Ohh, we can do that,” she assured him. “Go find a camera, I’ll give you a picture that gives you wet dreams for the next ten years.”

“Brah, I hope you’re giving out copies!” Lupe laughed.

The stripper was more than happy to give him that picture. Mike snapped it, of her giving him a lap dance, looking right at the camera with a sultry look as Kit held her by her slender waist. Kit wasn’t about to do what Sheila wanted, but a picture like that would satisfy her need to see her cousin misbehaving. The stripper surprised him by twisting around in his lap and kissing him on the side of his muzzle, and Mike caught that in a picture as well.

The party only got going at that point. Each of the strippers performed for them, not on the stage but in the open area before it, and then she would wander naked into the crowd to perform lap dances, mingle, and tease tips and money out of the party-goers...and a couple of them led males through the door by the stage to continue certain negotiations in private, Lupe being one of them. Kevin bought a lap dance from a black cat, which Mike caught on camera, and Jeffrey made a hilarious picture as a fellow mouse stripper who was sitting on his lap facing him, kissed him on the cheek as Jeffrey’s arms were held out, his fingers straight as he reacted to her sudden act. Mike was there to get pictures of a raccoon femme dancing naked on a table near the bar, who kept looking down at him with inviting smiles and ghosting her tail over his face as she undulated atop the table.

They kept pushing beers at him, but Kit wasn’t about to do what Jessie did. He drank in slow moderation, at least for a Vulpan, which got virtually everyone else smashed out of their minds. Vulpans were champion drinkers. Mike could barely keep his camera aimed after two hours, staggering around with a silly grin on his face, then falling into the arms of the raccoon femme who seemed taken with him earlier. She giggled and nuzzled him, whispered something in his ear which made his tail stick straight out, its fur frizzing, and then she gave him a deep kiss that made his tail go crazy.

Kit was sure to get a picture of that.

About midnight, everyone was drunk, and all inhibitions were gone. Kit got a picture of Jeffrey dancing on a table with the mouse femme that had kissed him, and a rather surprising picture of Savid with his paws on the hips of a naked ferret. Savid was happily married, so that was a surprise, and a picture that wasn't going to leave the club. He got a picture of Barry putting his paw on the top of the head of a short lynx stripper, making fun of her short stature since she didn't come up to his chest, but he got another picture of Barry's eyes all but popping out of his head when that short lynx put her paw in his jeans with an evil grin on her face.

Rick was there too, but Rick wasn't about to get tangled up with the strippers, for Martha would rip his fur out. He got there late since he had to finish dinner before joining them, and he sat at Kit's table and drank beer, laughed, talked, and had a good time without getting close to the strippers... but he did enjoy watching their stripteases.

The strippers were fun when they mingled, but the games were funny too. Kit had never seen naked femme wrestling before, nor had he ever seen naked karaoke, but the best part had to be their "let's shoot a porn scene" gig, driving the guys wild with it, then bringing a male from the audience up to join them. They tried to get Kit, but Kit backed out of that...Jessie would tear out his spleen if he went that far. The lucky male was Dan, and the lion had a ball having two sexy femmes hanging all over him, even undressing him. Kit had to snap a picture of that, too.

In all, by the time it started winding down around two in the morning and males started to leave, Kit had to admit that that was, by far, the wildest bachelor party he'd ever heard of. Lupe had outdone himself in spectacular fashion. Lupe was in no condition to drive, so Kit drove them back...though Kit wasn't entirely sure he was legal to drive himself. But he was the safest choice, and Kit was very careful to get them home safely. He walked the singing chihuahua back to his apartment, then went home himself.

Jessie was asleep when he came into the bedroom, but she stirred and sat up, turning on the lamp on her nightstand as he undressed. "How was it?"

"Lupe will be known as the bachelor party god from this day on," Kit said with amused reverence in his voice. "That was the wildest party I've ever attended. And I've been to some real doozies."

She looked at her alarm clock. "But it's only two!"

"We've been at it since seven," he told her.

"Oh. Did, you, uh, do anything wild?"

"No," he chuckled. "Because I knew you'd disapprove. I did get a picture for Sheila, though, of one of the strippers giving me a lap dance."

"Oh. Was she pretty?" she asked shyly.

Kit laughed. "You're jealous!"

"I'm trying not to be," she said quietly, looking away. "It makes me feel rotten to be jealous when you're not jealous."

“I’m a little jealous, I can’t deny that,” he told her, putting his paw on her shoulder. “But that doesn’t mean that I don’t trust you, my pretty kitty. I trust you to honor my wishes, just as I honored your wishes tonight by not getting too wild. I was even careful not to come home too drunk,” he grinned.

“I see. Well, since you’re home, and you’ve been looking at big-boobed strippers all night,” she hinted, sliding her paw down his shoulder and back suggestively, “need to vent a little, love?”

“I thought you’d never ask,” he said, climbing into bed and biting at her neck as she giggled and put her arms around him.

Chapter 15

Kit did have a very mild hangover the next morning, but it wasn't anything a single glass of Vulpan tonic couldn't knock out.

This was it. The last week. The home stretch. In just five days, they were going to marry, and now there was nothing but two rehearsals standing in their way. Kit had a copy of the wedding script before him as Jessie cooked breakfast, humming to herself. Jessie had opted for a completely traditional wedding. The vows were textbook, and there would be no special "speech" vows like some couples gave. The whole time, the only thing they'd be saying were "I do" and "with this ring I thee wed." The monsignor would give a little sermon-like speech at the beginning of the ceremony, which was his own choice (Jessie gave him leeway to create his own, she wanted to be surprised), then came the vows, then the exchange of rings, and then it was done. They would kiss at that point and then go back down the aisle and out the front door, in traditional fashion, then circle the church to the parking lot, and take the waiting limo that would drive them to the reception. It would take about twenty minutes or so, a traditional ceremony, but a little non-traditional in Jessie was hustling them straight to the Four Corners to minimize any chance her mother might have to embarrass her during the ceremony. Kit figured that Jessie would rather deal with her hostile mother there instead of in a church.

Kit saw that he had to make arrangements to get to the church. Rick could probably take him, he'd have to ask.

“Breakfast!” Jessie called from the kitchen. “Crepes and fruit!”

He came over to the breakfast table and sat down, and Jessie set down a plate stacked with crepes, and a bowl of strawberries, blueberries, and bananas mixed in a light syrup. She leaned down and kissed him on the ear fondly, then sat down herself. “Feeling better?” she asked.

“The headache’s just a dull throb now,” he told her as he piled a few crepes on his plate, then drizzles mixed fruit over them. “That’s a lot of crepes, hon.”

“We probably won’t be alone for long,” she grinned. “Sheila—“ There was a knock at the door, which made Kit laugh. “Sheila will probably drop by,” Jessie finished. “It’s open!” she called loudly.

It was indeed Sheila, carrying an umbrella, wearing sweatpants and a sports halter to protect against the rain outside. “Hey, I’m about to go to the Y now that we have memberships,” she told them. “Wanna come?”

“We’re a little busy right now,” Jessie told her. “Want some breakfast?”

She laughed. “Giving me something to work off?”

“I guess so,” she grinned.

“They’re open this early?”

“Kit, it’s nearly eleven,” Sheila told him.

“Really?”

“Yeah, really, you goob,” she told him as she stood her umbrella in the corner and bounded over.

“Aww, damn!” he realized. “We missed mass!”

“We did?” Jessie asked. “I thought those started at noon. That’s why I didn’t wake you up!”

“Dammit, we did,” he sighed. “Well, we can go to evening mass. That way we’re still keeping our promise. We’ll have to leave poker early.”

“I don’t mind,” Jessie told him.

“Oooh, crepes! So, how was the party last night?” Sheila asked as she sat down at the table.

“Wild, as expected,” Kit chuckled.

“You get my picture?”

“I got you one, yeah,” he answered.

“Well, where is it?”

“Can I finish breakfast first?”

“No.”

“Brave words,” Kit chuckled as he took a bite. “Now shut up and eat.”

After breakfast, he dug up the camera and a handful of memory cards and hooked it up to the computer. “Mike took lots more pictures than I did,” he said, “but Mike did give me the memory cards from his camera...or, more to the point, I took them while he was drunk,” he chuckled. “So, let’s see what shenanigans Mike managed to capture.”

Jessie’s face poofed out at the very first picture, showing the raccoon and mouse strippers dancing together on either side of Lupe, who had both thumbs up and a huge grin on his face. “They’re naked!” she accused.

“So were your strippers,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, well, that’s different!” she complained.

“I’ll say,” Sheila noted clinically. “These strippers just don’t do anything for me at all.”

Kit laughed, and Jessie slapped Sheila on the shoulder. “You’re not helping!”

“Why are you getting your tail in a knot?” she asked. “Did you cheat on Jessie, Kit?”

“No!”

“Then there ya go,” she said simply. “Now show me some good pictures!”

“I don’t know what kind of pictures Mike got,” he repeated, and they started cycling through them.

In all, the pictures from his party were much wilder than the ones from Jessie’s, mainly because the female strippers at his party were much more... free-wheeling than the male strippers had been. Jessie gasped more than once when he cycled through them, showing friends and males he didn’t know in all kinds of compromising situations with the numerous strippers, who had been quite happy to be photographed. “He didn’t!” Jessie gasped when they reached the picture of Jeffrey and the mouse dancing on the table.

“He sure did, and it looks like he’s having a blast,” Sheila laughed.

It took a while to find his picture. Oh, Mike had lots of pictures with him in them, but that wasn’t the picture they were looking for. When they finally found it, Jessie’s face poofed out, and she gave him a surprisingly unfriendly look for a moment before she caught herself and forced a more neutral expression. “And here’s yours Sheila,” he grinned. “The vixen was more than happy to pose for it.”

“I’d say she was having fun,” Sheila laughed. “God, I’d pay money to have knockers like hers.”

“I think they’re done,” Kit said, looking carefully at the picture. “So you probably could pay money to get knockers like hers,” he added with a chuckle.

“No thanks. I have an aversion to plastic surgery since that disaster with Bess.”

“What happened?” Jessie asked.

“She had a boob job and got an infection,” she answered. “She was really sick for a couple of months, and they had to do two more surgeries to fix it. She kept the implants though,” Sheila chuckled. “Nothing can stand in the way of Bess and her vanity.”

“Is that the exhibitionist?”

“No, that’s Muffy,” Kit answered for her. “She was a pretty interesting femme,” he told them, pointing at the picture. “Her name is Allison, and she’s a grad student at U.T.”

“You’re kidding!” Jessie gasped.

“Not a bit. She’s a chemistry graduate. She works there to pay her tuition as she earns her Master’s and earn extra money. She said she’ll have so much money saved up by the time she gets her Master’s that she may not even have to work. Very smart young lady.”

“And she gets that stripping? Holy cow.”

“Among other things,” he noted. “The place Lupe took us wasn’t a strip club, it was an illegal brothel.”

“No way!” Jessie protested, but Sheila just had a knowing smile on her face.

“Yup. Every one of these ladies were...for rent.”

“And did you rent one?” Jessie had to ask.

He snorted. “And piss you off? Hell no,” he declared. “Why would I pay for something I can get at home for free with the lady I love, and have a heck of a lot more fun doing it?”

“With her or with me?” Jessie asked archly.

“With you, dip,” Sheila laughed. “You can stop being jealous now, Jess. He had a chance to cheat on you and he didn’t. He passed the test.”

Jessie looked away from her a moment, then looked at the picture. “She’s gorgeous. How did she end up a prostitute?”

“Love, I’ve known a lot of prostitutes,” Kit told her. “Hanging out in homeless shelters like I did brings you into contact with them. Not all of them are drug-addicted runaways like some people think. After she gave me the picture, we talked a while, and I got to know her. You know me, love, she had a story and I had to hear it, so I coaxed it out of her. Allison got into it for the money, and for no other reason. And she makes a hell of a lot of money doing it. When she graduates, she’ll quit. Someone as pretty as she is can make a killing as a callgirl, though.”

“That’s the truth. They’ve got some escort services in Boston where the girls charge five thousand dollars an hour,” Sheila told her. “They’re all drop-dead gorgeous, of course, and they’re all elegant and sophisticated. You’d never know they have sex for money looking at ‘em.”

“They work at a place called the Top Hat Club,” he explained as they moved onto the next picture, showing Barry and Mike being kissed by a raccoon and a lynx. “It’s a bordello that caters to upscales. They have a bar and nightclub there, but they only allow males in who are members, and the girls charge upwards of a thousand dollars an hour for sex. That money’s on top of the tips they earn doing their strip dances and working the floor.”

“Damn!” Jessie gasped. “No wonder this Allison is earning lots of money!”

“Yeah, she’s one of their highest priced girls,” Kit nodded. “You can tell just by looking at her,” he noted. “I just wonder how the hell Lupe managed to get our party there, since most of the guests weren’t members, and a place like this doesn’t stay in business long when the cops get wind of it being there.”

“Cousin, Lupe’s not squeaky clean,” Sheila told him. “He’s got a few mob friends. He may have called in a favor.”

“He had to do something. And it must have cost a fortune. It was a private party on a Saturday night in a place like that. He even bought the beer.”

“We need to ask him,” Sheila grinned.

Jessie seemed a little distant as they cycled through the rest of the pictures, as Sheila made all kinds of comments typical for her, until they came to a picture of one of the wilder moments, showing one of the males Kit didn't know engaged in a sex act with a black cat stripper while males with cups of beer in their paws stood around them and cheered them on.

"Oh my," Sheila breathed, giving the picture a long look.

"Yeah, I told you it got wild," Kit told her.

"God, that wolf's cute," she noted. "Too bad that cat's in the way, I'd like to see what he's sporting down there."

"You never change," Kit accused as he moved on to the next picture.

"Not til I'm married, and maybe not even then," Sheila giggled in reply.

Sheila went on to work out after they finished going through the pictures. Kit took the cards to the den and put all the pictures on a DVD, then made several copies of it. He arranged them chronologically using the timestamps on the pictures from the camera, and put captions under some of them using his picture software before burning them to DVD. Jessie wandered in as he was making copies, and he saw she was still a little pensive. "What's the matter, pretty kitty?" he asked.

"I don't know, I guess I'm a little jealous, but I feel stupid because I am," she told him. "That Allison was much prettier than me, and she sounded much smarter than me and more interesting than me."

Kit laughed. "Now you're being totally silly," he admonished her. "I had her naked in my lap, and what did I do? I came home to you. Who was the one that got ravished last night, hmm?"

She gave him a shy smile. "I guess that was me," she affirmed, "but Kit...did she make you excited at all?"

“Hon, I’m a male. Of course I was turned on by her. No straight male on earth would fail to be excited by that,” he admitted. “After all, that’s what she does for a living, and she’s good at it. She knows how to be sexy and enticing, it’s how she pays for college. But all it made me want to do was come home to you,” he told her, reaching out and pulling her into his lap. “What’s an empty ten minutes with a total stranger when I have this waiting at home for me, silly girl?” he said, nuzzling her neck as his paws slid up and down her sides and back. “Sure, she was sexy, sure, she was pretty. I can admit that I saw that in her. But she doesn’t hold a candle to you. You are the most beautiful, sexiest, most interesting and fascinating femme on the face of this earth,” he told her. “It would take some pretty femme taking her clothes off to make me even look at her.”

Jessie gave a giggling sigh, then pushed out enough to look down into his eyes. “I guess I can’t help it,” she told him. “You’re so...amazing, Kit. I love you so much, I’m afraid of losing you. I feel threatened when you look at other femmes, because I know I’m shy and I’m traditional, and I must not be that exciting to you at all. How can I compete with someone as interesting as Allison, when she’s so pretty, and you’re attracted to her? I’m not wild and exciting like her or Sheila. I’m just a stick in the mud, traditional and shy.”

“Pretty kitty, when we close the door and we’re alone, you are not shy,” he grinned up at her. “No femme who teases her male into bed is shy.” She laughed, her cheeks ruffling slightly. “And don’t sell yourself short, you sexy beast, you’re easily just as gorgeous as she is. Why do you think I want pictures of you out of your clothes? Allison had to get surgery to make herself anywhere near as sexy as you are. And like I said, you are the most interesting femme on earth,” he told her. “You think you’re boring? Ha!” he scoffed. “You’re intelligent,” he said, kissing her neck, “and complicated, and very, very interesting. I can spend all day just talking to you about absolutely nothing, because I love the way your mind works, and it’s a delight to have a conversation with you. So don’t you ever think you’re boring, my pretty kitty. I’m attracted to your body, I’m attracted to your mind, and I’m attracted to your soul. All Allison had was a story. You, my lovely Jessica Desdemona Vulpan, have me. ”

“I love you,” she declared vehemently, wrapping her arms around him and hugging him tightly.

“You’d better, you’re marrying me in four days, one hour, and twenty-two minutes,” he teased.

“How would you like those pictures, love?” she whispered in his ear.

“How about you give them to me when you’re not feeling jealous over my bachelor party,” he breathed back. “I want pictures of you at the height of your own self-confidence, when you’re at your sexiest and most sensual, not pictures you give me because you’re jealous of another. So, I’ll get my pictures on our wedding night,” he breathed in her ear. “When you’ll know beyond all doubt that I’m yours, and what you do is for you, and not for me.”

“That’s a promise,” she told him, running her paws over the scars on his back.

“You bet it’s a promise,” he agreed.

Kit couldn’t let it go without knowing. About an hour before poker, Kit came over to Lupe’s apartment and helped him get it ready. Lupe looked haggard, but he had a silly kind of afterglow about him that came from having such a good time last night. “Okay, Lupe, how the hell did you pull that off?” he demanded as they brought in a new, larger table that Lupe had got for poker night.

“I know people, brah,” he grinned mischievously as they put the extender leaf in the old, scratched-up hardwood table.

“Dude, that had to cost thousands of dollars!”

“Didn’t cost a penny,” he said with a wave of his paw.

“Liar!” Kit laughed. “Renting an upscale illegal bordello and the strippers and four kegs? Not a penny my furry butt!”

“Didn’t cost a penny,” he repeated. “That party was the work of a couple of folks who know you and know of you, who swore me to secrecy. They wanted you to go out in style.”

“Did Vil put you up to that?” he demanded.

“I shall name no names,” he said with surprising adamance. “But don’t feel obligated no matter what. Didn’t cost me anything but a couple of easy favors, and the furs in question also got to enjoy the party.”

“Some of the furs there I didn’t know?”

“A couple of them. Some others were some high-bankroll members of the club that the owners wouldn’t shut out no matter what, so they got to come in. The main backer wouldn’t go for that kind of party, though.”

Kit slammed the extender leaf home. “Sheila!” he realized.

“I shall name no names,” he repeated, but he gave Kit a wink.

“Why that sneaky, dirty little vixen,” Kit mused as they pushed the table together to close the gaps in the leaf. “It must have wiped out her savings! That had to be a five thousand dollar party, at least!”

“I couldn’t tell ya, brah, but she’s the one that paid for most of it.”

“She’s gonna get it,” Kit growled.

“I ain’t complainin’, brah, the distributor gave me a deal on a keg cause of that party! We got a keg of Michelob for poker tonight!”

“Mickey—“

“Mickey gave me the beer money,” Lupe told him.

“That reminds me, Lupe, I’ll be cutting it short tonight,” Kit told him. “Me and Jessie promised the preacher marrying us we’d go to church today. We kinda missed morning mass, so we’re gonna go to evening mass tonight. That starts at seven.”

“No problem, brah, no problem.”

Sheila came over while they were moving the old table out. Kit dropped it, grabbed Sheila, and before she could register much protest, kissed her square on the lips. She laughed when he let her go. “What the hell was that for!” she demanded.

“For being a devious, sneaky little vixen,” he told her. “Thank you.”

“You ratted me out!” she accused Lupe.

“He tricked it out of me, babe,” he said defensively. “He ain’t dumb, ya know! It took him like two minutes to put it together!”

“Well, that’s true,” Sheila acceded. “I’m glad you had fun, cousin. It’s the least I could do after you took me in, and hey, parties and general debauchery are my specialties.”

“Are they!” Lupe laughed. “Having it at the Top Hat was her idea.”

“Didn’t take much to get in, either,” Sheila grinned at Kit. “All I had to do was say the word Vulpan, and they fell all over themselves. Oh, by the way, cousin, you’re now a member,” she winked. “Show up at the door, and they’ll let you in.” She admired her short, manicured claws. “I’m a member too,” she said casually.

“I never knew you were into female strippers,” Kit teased.

“I’m into sex, cousin, and they cater to femmes too,” she answered, giving him a direct look. “They have males working there too. It’s not a whorehouse as much as it is a sex club, but just with some rentals if you don’t bring your own. Didn’t you go upstairs?” she asked curiously.

“No.”

“Well damn, cousin, you missed the good parts,” she told him. “They have another bar upstairs, as well as a huge playroom, full of all kinds of fun things,” she grinned.

Lupe’s tail was twitching spasmodically.

“Males, femmes, gays, lesbians, parties, shows, they do it all. The first floor is just the nightclub with the stuff they show the cops when they come snooping around, and it ain’t nothin’ illegal. The second floor is where the real action is,” she announced. “That’s why the place is members only. Not because it’s a whorehouse, but because it’s a sex club.”

“Allison never told me about that,” Kit mused.

“Who?”

“I had a talk with one of the strippers.”

“Only you would talk with the femmes instead of doing what you were supposed to do,” she sighed in disappointment. “Why should she tell you about stuff she thought you already knew? I’m sure the owner told the femmes you were a new member. Hell, cousin, you had to be a member to even have the party there!”

“I guess. Though I’m not sure being a member of a sex club is something that interests me,” he chuckled.

“Take Jessie to it,” Sheila grinned. “That would be a riot!”

“Lupe, you went upstairs. What was up there?” Kit asked.

“Brah, I just went to a bedroom,” he told him, “and it was on the first floor. Say, think you can take a guest back there when you get back from your honeymoon?” he asked with a grin.

“Ooo, so Lupe got some booty last night, eh?” Sheila grinned at him. “What was she?”

“A ferret,” he coughed.

“Was she hot?”

“She worked there, babe,” he said, his leg twitching. “Did you see those femmes?”

“Yeah, I did,” she grinned. “Kit showed me a bunch of pictures of them. I hope the males are even half as hot as the femmes they got there.”

“You haven’t seen them?” Kit asked.

“I haven’t been there yet,” she admitted with a wink. “I set up most of this over the phone.”

“But you made it sound—“

“I told you what the owner told me,” she answered. “But I am going there. Tonight, maybe,” she said with a leering grin. “Sunday is Ladies’ Night in the nightclub, when the male strippers are featured. But these strippers will take you into a room and boff you senseless if you pay for it,” she said with a dreadful kind of eagerness.

Lupe was almost panting.

“Aww, did I get Lupey all excited?” she asked, reaching out and putting her paw on his cheek, patting it like a parent.

“You’re a bitch, Sheila, you know that?”

“I know I am,” she grinned. “And you’re a horn-dog.”

“I’m Latino, babe, we’re all horn-dogs. Why you think they call us Latin Lovers?”

“I’ll call you a peeping tom,” she winked. “I caught you looking through my window last week when I took off my shirt.”

Lupe’s cheek fur stood straight out.

“Did you like what you saw?” she grinned at him.

“You know I did, babe,” he answered. “But that was an accident. I was on your porch, it wasn’t like I was peeping through your bedroom window!”

“Yeah, that’s why I took my shirt off in the living room,” she grinned. “You’d been staring at my rack all day, I decided to reward you for your persistence.”

“You did that on purpose?”

“Does it make it hotter to know I know you were looking, or did you think it was hotter thinking you were peeking when I didn’t know you were there?”

“Lupe, don’t play with Sheila, you’re not old enough,” Kit interrupted what was surely going to escalate into something Kit didn’t want to hear.

“Spoilsport,” Sheila accused. “Anyway, what I was here for. What am I bringing?”

“Chips and dip,” Lupe told her, a bit unsteadily.

“Got it. I’ll go run down to IGB and pick some up. Need anything else?”

“Plastic cups, we got a keg this time.”

“I’ll get some,” she promised, then she sauntered away, making sure to swing her tail back and forth in a way that made Lupe’s breath catch in his throat.

Kit nudged him, and they went back to the table and picked it up. “Don’t do it, bro,” Kit warned.

“Do what?”

“Get involved with her,” he warned flatly. “Sheila is not the girlfriend type, and she’ll chew you up and spit you out.”

“Brah, I wasn’t thinking that.”

“Don’t do that either,” he warned. “Sheila isn’t even the one night stand type, Lupe. And I’m not saying that just because I’m her cousin. I’d warn any of my friends away from her.”

“Brah.”

“Trust me. You heard her, that’s what she’s like. That’s not a front, and she’s not playing with you. That’s who she is. You’re nothing but her next conquest, and she won’t care a bit when she dumps you and moves on to the next guy. Males don’t have feelings in her world. We’re all just toys for her amusement, and she’s like any child. The instant the doll loses its appeal, she moves on to the next one. Do you really want to get involved with someone like her?”

Lupe gave him a surprised look. “Brah, I never thought of that.”

“Sheila can be a great friend, Lupe, but don’t ever walk into that trap. Keep it where it is, save yourself a whole lot of trouble.”

“I think I’d better.”

“That’s only smart. Oh, and be ready.”

“What for?”

“She knows she gets to you. She’ll keep teasing you.”

“Let her, I’ll handle it,” he said with a grin.

There were some bloodshot eyes at poker, but they were happy ones. They spent more time talking about the party the night before than they did playing poker. Sam and Sandy got to hear all about it, and they spent quite a bit of time glaring at Jeffrey and Kevin, who looked decidedly uncomfortable...which amused Kit. Sandy had been five times wilder than Jeffrey, yet she was offended that he danced with a stripper. He had to turn the tables on them while Mickey dealt. "Well, Sam, I heard some things about the party at the sorority house," he noted. "Naked male strippers? That's not much worse than Lupe's party."

"Well, they didn't touch," she said frostily, looking at Kevin.

"No, but they did bite," he noted.

Sandy's fur stood straight out, and she gave him a strangled look.

"What does that mean, Kit?" Jeffrey asked.

"Uh, nothing, baby, it was just something one of the strippers did," she told him. "It was part of his act."

"Oh. So, was the bachelorette party good?"

"Yeah, we had a lot of fun," Sam nodded. "The house hired the strippers, who did a great job. They were very good. JD was mortified through half of it. We had to get her drunk before she had any fun," she chuckled.

"I didn't have to get drunk!" Jessie protested.

"Your fur was sticking straight out til we gave you those jello shots," Sandy told her with a grin.

"Well, it was entirely improper! Naked males gyrating about in the living room, femmes putting their paws all over their privates! It was disgusting!"

"Spoken like a vestal virgin," Sandy teased. "You weren't half so prudish once you were drunk. She even sat in a stripper's lap," Sandy told the males with a laugh.

“Don’t be embarrassed, Jessie, it was your bachelorette party,” Kevin told her with a smile. “You were supposed to get wild and have a night to remember.”

“I don’t remember half of it,” Jessie said, her cheeks ruffling.

“She got real drunk,” Sandy laughed.

“So did you!”

“We all got drunk,” Sam admitted. “I woke up on Saturday with the worst hangover I’ve ever had. I don’t think anyone in the house even got out of bed until three in the afternoon.”

“It took us four hours to clean up,” Sandy told them.

“Well, I’m glad you had fun,” Kevin said. “We had fun too.”

“A little too much fun,” Mickey laughed. “Lupe, dude, how did you manage to put that together? That was the most awesome party in this history of the universe!”

“A magician never reveals his secrets,” Lupe said with a toothy grin.

“Dude, you can plan my bachelor party any time!”

Kit and Jessie bowed out of poker day early, dressed in nice clothes, and headed for mass. Kit wore the same clothes he’d bought for his job interview, and Jessie wore a gorgeous blue dress with long sleeves and black buttons up the front, that reached her knees, complete with a wide black belt and black pumps...one of the rare times Jessie wore shoes. But Jessie never felt comfortable wearing a nice dress without shoes. It had been a long time since he’d been at mass, but it was like riding a bike. He remembered enough, and Kit explained some of the rituals to Jessie while they sat in the back row. Monsignor Duke was leading the mass, and he looked right at them after he took the altar and began his sermon.

The father couldn't let it go without saying something. At the end of mass, before the benediction, he motioned towards the surprisingly full church. "Before we say our farewells, I'd like to welcome Kit Vulpan and Jessica Williams, who will be giving their vows in our chapel on Friday. Please give them your congratulations," he said. Many faces looked back, and there was even a round of applause, which made Jessie's cheeks ruffle and he could feel her resisting the urge to hide her face in his shoulder.

Kit retaliated when the monsignor stood at the doors to greet and shake paws as they left. "Just couldn't pass it up, eh?" he accused as he shook the father's paw.

"Of course I couldn't, my son," he grinned. "A marriage is a cause for celebration, not something you hide! The congregation will be happy for you, even if they don't know you. After all, you had the foresight and wisdom to have your wedding in our church," he winked.

Jessie laughed. "What time is the rehearsal, father?" she asked.

"Five o'clock on Tuesday, and four o'clock on Wednesday," he answered. "Please have your attendants with you for the Wednesday rehearsal, it's a full rehearsal, and please bring the rings."

"We'll have them here," Kit assured him.

"You know, this will be the first non-Catholic wedding we've held," the monsignor told them with a smile. "I hope you'll forgive me if I seem a little out of place in it."

Kit laughed. “No greeting at the door, no liturgy, no cross-bearer, no flowers.”

“Yes,” he chuckled in agreement. “But there will be a homily, and the ceremony will be close to Catholic tradition. Some of the congregation is a little, unsettled, that I’m performing an out-of-faith wedding in the chapel,” he chuckled with a smile.

“Well, I’m sorry about that,” Kit chuckled. “I didn’t mind a Catholic wedding, but Jessie’s parents, are, well, not happy about it.”

“Well, your sister was quite generous with her offering to the church,” the Monsignor admitted. “So generous that certain...accommodations could be made. But, to be honest, I was happy to help you, even without her donation. I’ve read about you, my son, and after so hard a road, it would be my pleasure to bring some joy back into it.”

“I appreciate that, father,” he said honestly.

“Now, Miss Williams, do remember, please, that it’s long been a custom of the church to keep the floral arrangements after the ceremony. They’ll decorate our church for days to serve as a reminder of your happiness and blessing,” he told her.

“I don’t mind, father,” she smiled. “If they make other people happy, then it makes me happy.”

“That’s a nice thing to say,” he said, taking her paws and shaking them. “You’re a very generous and kind femme, Miss Williams. Kit was lucky to find you.”

Jessie smiled shyly, her cheeks ruffling.

“Now remember, Tuesday at five,” he told them.

“We’ll be here,” Kit answered.

They got home to find Sheila and Lupe sitting on their porch, drinking beer and listening to salsa music on Lupe’s boombox. “How was the salvation of your souls?” Sheila asked with a grin.

“Same old same old,” Kit answered. “What are you two doing?”

“Just passing time, brah,” Lupe answered. “You don’t mind, do ya? Your chairs are better than mine.”

“Nah, I don’t mind,” Kit answered.

“You’re our friend, Lupe, use our porch any time,” Jessie agreed, patting him on the shoulder as Kit unlocked the door.

“Hey, what about me?” Sheila protested.

“You’ll use it whether we let you or not,” Jessie winked.

“Well, that’s true,” she laughed in agreement.

They went in, and Jessie went back to the bedroom as Kit turned off the alarm. He joined her as she was taking off her dress. “I wonder what they’re up to out there,” Jessie giggled. “I hope it’s not more planning for another party. I’m partied out after Friday.”

“Eh, I think they like each other, hon. Not romantically, that is. Sheila’s a rough customer, but Lupe’s not afraid to take her on at that level.”

“I hope he doesn’t get tangled up with her.”

“I warned him off. He’s a smart male, hon, he won’t fall into that trap. I think they’ll just be good friends, and someone Sheila can tease when she's feeling peevish," he added with a chuckle.

"Good. She intimidates all the girls at the house, but they do like her," Jessie giggled as she pulled her slip off. "She's so wild and fearless. Sandy's really jealous of her."

"She's a bad role model for your sorority," Kit laughed.

"She just needs some stability in her life, and someone that'll make her feel special and wanted," Jessie sighed, looking towards the door, where she and Lupe were sitting on their porch. "But not someone who'll try to stifle or control her. She needs someone like you, my handsome fox," she told him, kissing him on the muzzle as she turned her back to him. "Unhook me, love."

"Well, I'm not marrying her," he declared as he unhooked her bra for her, which made her laugh.

"I hate this thing," she complained. "Underwires suck."

"Then don't wear it," he told her as she shrugged out of it.

"Then I don't look right in a dress," she told him patiently as she put her arms through her new bra, shrugged it over her shoulders, then hooked it in the front. Jessie wore front-clasping bras because her claws gave her issues with bras that hooked in the back, which was why she had Kit hook and unhook them for her. "Dresses require a bit more..." she said, making a lifting motion under her breasts.

"Well, that bra does a good job," he noted with a smile.

"No, these don't sit right under a slip," she explained. "Be lucky you're a male, love, you don't have these problems."

“Pretty kitty, you could wear a moomoo and I wouldn’t care,” he told her, kissing her on the cheek as he came to the dresser.

“Oh, you say that now,” she teased.

“I’ve already seen you at your worst, love, and as you can see, I’m still here,” he said, patting her fondly on the bottom. “A moomoo would not scare me in the slightest. It’s what’s underneath it that’s truly beautiful,” he added, sliding his paw up her back as he kissed her cheek, “and that is what I will always see.”

She began to purr, then she laughed. “So you imagine me naked every time you look at me?”

“Why not? What’s wrong with a husband thinking his wife is gorgeous when she’s naked? You are going to marry me,” he teased.

“You bet I am, mister,” she told him with a playful smile, putting her arms around him. “There’s no escape for you now. I’ve even changed my name,” she declared.

“Yes, I know, Misses Vulpan,” he affirmed.

“Aaat, you can’t call me that yet. Call me Mizz Vulpan. You can’t call me that until Friday.”

He laughed. “Technicalities, technicalities.”

“The world is built on technicalities,” she teased, nuzzling his neck as she purred away.

The gang was merciful to him.

Since Jessie was now free to focus on the wedding, Kit was immersed in it, and the office crew gave him very light duties and were very understanding...because his cell rang almost constantly. Everyone was calling him, asking him questions, making confirmations, and the biggest caller was Jessie. She called him almost every hour, giving him updates as vendors and family members touched base with her. She drove him crazy with it, to be honest, running around all over town in his truck with her phone plastered to her ear, touching base with the florist, with the caterers, with the jewelry store owner to pick up the rings, and she called Vil almost every hour, or Vil called her. She continued her whirlwind of activity that night, calling Vil, calling her parents, talking to her aunts and uncles who were also coming, calling everyone even remotely connected to the wedding. Almost Jessie's entire family was coming; all of her aunts and uncles, her grandmother, and all her cousins were coming to the wedding.

And Vil paid for all their air fares.

Tuesday was no better. Kit got a headcount of all the people from work who were coming, and he was rather shocked at the final total; between parents, relatives, and friends, the gang was bringing 27 people to the ceremony and reception. Add that to the 23 members of Jessie's family that would be there, Vil, Lupe and their friends, the sorority girls, Kevin, Sheila, a few people from Kevin's firm, and some advertisers that bought space in the magazine that Rick had invited, that put the total at a whopping 89 people expected to attend. The caterer had prepared food for twice the number they originally given, which was 50, so they were going to be just fine as far as food went.

Vil had been adamant about that. Kit had a feeling that she was bringing more people than he thought.

That afternoon, Jessie picked up Kit from the office and went straight to Our Lady of Fatima. There, Kit and Jessie walked through the ceremony with Monsignor Duke, from where Jessie would wait, then went through the ceremony. Kit got a little thrill out of hearing Jessie say “I do,” and she gave him a dazzling smile when he did the same during the rehearsal. “Now, this is the point where I’d tell you to kiss the bride,” he said with a smile.

“We’d better practice that,” Kit teased, wrapping his arms around her.

“Yes, let’s,” she mirrored, then gave him a lingering, tender kiss.

Monsignor Duke cleared his throat, and Jessie showed mercy on him and let him go. His knees were a little weak, which made her giggle when he put his paws on her shoulders for support. “Don’t do that during the ceremony,” he complained. “I don’t think I want pictures of them picking me up off the floor.”

Both she and the priest laughed. “Now, according to the request the videographer made, at this point you’ll pause for photographs a few moments. When the videographer gives you an all clear, you’ll go back down the aisle, stop a moment in the antechamber for one more picture opportunity for your immediate family, and then you will go out to your car to take you to your reception.”

“Sounds easy,” Jessie said with a nod.

“Now, let’s rehearse it once more, but this time I think we can dispense with the kiss,” he smiled. “I don’t think sending the groom to the hospital three days before his wedding is a good idea.”

Jessie laughed delightedly, her cheeks ruffling in an appealing manner.

They were both anxious and antsy the next day. Kit could barely hold a thought in his head all day at work, but since this was his last day before his vacation, he tried to get as much done as he could. He put a month's worth of writing in for School Daze, helped everyone else as much as he could, and could barely sit still through their issue meeting. They were putting the issue to bed a day early because of the ceremony. It had turned into an office-wide holiday, and everyone had Friday off to attend the wedding and reception, and Rick would be busy tomorrow because Jessie was going to be at his house.

They all went out to lunch at Applebee's, as the gang gave him a little impromptu wedding party.

After lunch, Kit was officially off work, because he had things to do. He reminded Rick to be at the church at four, then picked up Jessie and headed to the airport, for Jessie's family were scheduled to arrive at 12:30pm. They got there almost late because Kit went to the wrong parking lot, going to long term instead of short term, but they managed to meet John, Hannah, Jenny, and Ben before they had a chance to wonder where they were. Kit hugged Jenny, shook John and Ben's paws, then turned to Hannah. She shook his paw aloofly, then smiled and gave him a warm hug. "We thought you forgot us!" she laughed.

"We had a problem in the parking lot," Jessie said with a wince. "I'm so sorry!"

"No matter, no matter," John chuckled. "Now, if you'll escort us to the Avis desk, we have a rental car reserved."

"He got a minivan," Jenny sighed. "You shoulda got a convertible, Dad!"

“A convertible won’t ferry around your grandmother,” John chuckled.

“Aww, come on, Granny Pearl would think it’d rock to drive around in a convertible!”

“At least it’s warm down here,” Ben noted. “Oh, did I tell you, Kit? I got offers!”

“From who?”

“Fifteen schools!” he said excitedly. “Including Ohio State!” he beamed.

“Well, there goes any chance of U-Mass getting you,” Kit laughed, shaking his paw. “Congrats, Ben, you got what you wanted. Have you signed the letter?”

“Not officially, but I did give them a verbal commitment,” he answered. “It wasn’t an easy choice, though.”

“Why? You’ve always wanted to play there.”

“Yeah, but they already have a good running back there, and he’s only a sophomore,” he answered. “A couple of schools offered to start me. I told that to the Ohio State people, and they offered to let me play ironman until I could start.”

“Both sides?”

“Yeah,” he grinned. “I’ll be the backup running back, but also play linebacker in some packages, and of course, I’ll play special teams. I love covering kickoffs,” he grinned. “I really get to hit people.”

“Damn, Ben, you’re gonna be busy. You’ll have to learn both sides of the playbook.”

“I’ll manage. It’s what I want. I want the NFL scouts to see a guy they can put on either side of the ball and be able to make plays. I prefer running back, but I’ll make sure they see I can be a linebacker too.”

“Well, I made my own choice, Kit,” Jenny told him. “I quit nursing school, and I entered pre-med.”

“Is that what you wanted?”

“Yeah, it is,” she told him as Jessie hugged her parents. “I didn’t think we’d have the money, but I lucked out.”

“How so?”

“Your sister Vil helped me get a scholarship we didn’t know about,” she answered. “It’s called the Macon-Foster Fellowship, for medical students. It pays for everything, because I have a three point four-two GPA. As long as I keep it over three point zero, they pay for my tuition, books, and give me a stipend for living expenses. She told us about it, and wrote me a letter of recommendation, and I got it!”

“Well, good for you, Jenny,” Kit told her.

“She just got it last week,” Jessie told him.

“Yeah, I just got all my paperwork done to switch to pre-med,” she added as Kit took Hannah’s carry-on bag and slung it over his shoulder, and they started towards the terminal.

“When are your other family members coming in?” he asked.

“All today and tomorrow. They need to kneel down and kiss your feet, Jessica, you really went to the endzone getting all their reservations,” John beamed at his older daughter. “My mother lives with my brother Jim, but we might be ferrying her around if Jim and Penny are busy.”

“It won’t be that bad, dear,” Hannah assured him.

“So, you only have two days left, Sissy,” Jenny teased Jessie. “Run while you can!”

“I’ll run, all right, straight to the altar,” she giggled. “And I’ll drag him with me!”

“You won’t have to drag me at all,” Kit chuckled.

“So, we were going to go out for dinner tonight, and we’d like you to join us,” John offered.

“It’ll have to be either early or late,” Jessie told him. “We have a rehearsal tonight. Remember? I told you that.”

“You did, you did,” he nodded. “Four, you said?”

She nodded.

“Well, I think if we leave at two, we can go out to eat and then make your rehearsal. We’d like to attend.”

“Well, the priest didn’t say we couldn’t bring visitors, so I don’t see why not,” Kit said, looking at Jessie. “You have to be there anyway, John, you’re part of the ceremony.”

“They can meet Rick, Martha, Sandy, and Sam,” Jessie agreed.

“Where are you staying, dear?” Hannah asked Jessie. It was a casual remark, but there was an edge behind it.

“At home, mother, until tomorrow,” she answered. “I’m going to spend the night before the wedding at Rick and Martha’s and get ready there, then they’ll take me to the church for the wedding.”

“Mind driving us by your apartment? I’d like to see it,” Hannah asked.

“Of course, we’d love to have you,” Kit said, and Jessie nodded. “It’s not very large, though.”

“I hope it’s clean,” Jenny teased, nudging her sister.

“Kit won’t let it get dirty,” Jessie laughed.

They split up. John and Jessie went to the rental car counter while the rest of them retrieved their luggage. Kit listened to Jenny talk about her change in Ohio State, and teasing her younger brother about his imminent entry into her school, which he took with a gentle smile. Kit wasn’t surprised that Vil had meddled with Jessie’s family, but she didn’t do anything overt. She didn’t pay for Jenny’s school, she instead helped her get a scholarship. Kit wouldn’t be surprised to hear that Vil may have dropped a word at Ohio State for Ben, but maybe not...he did get fifteen offers, after all. Ben really was a good football player, and he may not have needed Vil’s help. Ben had his heart set on Ohio State since he was a little boy, but at least he’d had the foresight to consider his career and wrangled some concessions out of the school if they wanted him. That was very wise of him.

“Those are ours,” Hannah called as a pair of black suitcases dropped down onto the conveyor.

“How many total?” Kit asked.

“Five, four and a garment bag,” she answered.

Kit and Ben carried the suitcases as Jenny carried the garment bag, which was a folded soft suitcase often used by women to carry dresses. They met John and Jessie by the Avis counter, where a steward loaded their bags onto a cart for them. “They’re going to take us to the lot,” John told them. “Jessie’s going to go with us to guide me to your apartment, Kit. So we’ll meet you there.”

“We’ll meet you there,” Jenny announced, grabbing Kit’s arm with a grin. “Come on, Ben, this is our chance to ditch the parents and have fifteen minutes of peace!”

“No, you will go with your father,” Hannah told them sternly. “I’m going with Kit. We have things to discuss.”

“It was nice knowing you, bro,” Ben told him with a slight smile.

“Benjamin!” Hannah snapped, which made all three of her children laugh and John smile.

“Come along, kids. I don’t think Kit will appreciate being scolded in public.”

“I’ll do no such thing!” Hannah barked at her husband, which made him laugh. “Oh, get on with you!”

Kit and Hannah separated from the others. He carried her carry-on bag for her as they walked through the terminal in silence for a moment, then she began to talk. “I still haven’t changed my mind about this, Kit,” she told him.

“I didn’t expect you to, Hannah,” he said calmly. “I have a lot of ground to cover before you come to approve of our marriage, and I understand that. Just don't condemn us before we have a chance. That's all I want."

"Well, against my better judgment, I'll give you that chance," she told him as they walked out into the fifty-five degree Texas December afternoon. "It's warm down here."

"This is about normal for December, my friends tell me. The really cold weather doesn't come until January."

"It's been freezing at home since the snow melted," she said as they walked along a sidewalk towards the short term parking area. "Have you and Jessie been getting along?"

"Of course we do," he answered. "We've had what you might call a rather boring home life, Hannah. We haven't been going out very often, but I've been moving to fix that. I guess it's because of the wedding, and the end of Jessie's semester. It's just been so busy," he sighed. "I hadn't taken her out for weeks, but I took her out last week to ice skating and a poetry recital."

"Well, that's a good start. You shouldn't take her for advantage, Kit. John and I still go out on dates, at least once a week. It keeps us interested in each other. If you become static, if everything becomes normal, then the magic fades."

"God, I hope it never does," he said immediately.

"You have to work to make sure it doesn't," she told him, a bit archly. "I'm still not sure you'll stay with my daughter, Kit, but I'll admit it won't be because you don't love her now. I think you'll just get bored with her, the way my father got bored with my mother. I don't want to see Jessie hurt, so...I'll give you what advice I can to help you stay together. I won't just stand back and let you hurt my Jessica, Kit. If you want my help, if you think your marriage is turning stale, then call me. I'll give you what advice I can to keep you together."

Kit stopped them, took her paw, then leaned over and kissed her on the cheek. "Thank you," he said gently and sincerely. "That means a great deal to me, Hannah."

"I still think this marriage is a mistake."

"But you're willing to help me work to keep it together," he noted with a gentle smile.

She coughed uncomfortably. "Well, I don't want you to hurt my daughter, Kit."

"Hannah, I don't want to hurt her either," he told her with complete honesty. "Jessie is my life now. My whole life. I never want to ever hurt her, but I also know that a lifetime is a long time to manage to avoid that. I can only hope that the fights we have are over stupid little things that don't damage our relationship."

"Well, you're wise enough to understand that the honeymoon doesn't last forever," Hannah said with an approving nod. "Relationships are like plants, or pets, Kit. They starve to death if you don't feed them and take care of them. You have to nurture them, care for them, and pay a great deal of attention to them, or they won't flourish. You have to be very careful to mend the injuries quickly, or they fester."

"That sounds quite sensible."

“You also can’t ignore it, Kit,” she told him. “That requires three things. One, you can’t ignore even the smallest problem. Small problems can become big problems. Two, you can’t ever go to bed angry, Kit. Never allow that. Problems must be worked out immediately, or they fester in your minds and can change your marriage. And thirdly, you can’t ever deny Jessica...sex,” she said with a short pause to take in her breath. “Never say no to her, even if you’re not in the mood. Denying her that is a fast way to making your marriage turn stale. You should never deny her, and she should never deny you. Don’t accept any excuses. If she starts denying you, then there might be something wrong. Talk it out with her. That goes your way too. If you ever say no to her, she’ll think there’s something wrong, and she’d better call you on it and make you talk it out. If she doesn’t, then confront her, because that’s not how I taught her to behave in a marriage.”

“That took some courage to say, Hannah. Thank you for being honest with me.”

“They’re simple rules for a good marriage, Kit. I’ve taught them to Jessica, and Jennifer and Benjamin for that matter, and now I’m passing them on to you. Living by them can keep your marriage healthy and fulfilling.”

“Well, I can honestly tell you that Jessie lives up to your teaching,” he admitted. “We’re not married yet, but we do live together, and she treats me the way you’ve described. She always communicates, she’s quick to jump on any problems she thinks she sees, we never go to bed angry, and she has never said no to me...and I’ve never said no to her.”

“Well, you’re young and it’s still exciting. Wait three years, Kit. Familiarity breeds boredom. You have to keep your marriage interesting, different, exciting, and that includes the bedroom. Even after twenty-three years of marriage, John and I work very hard to keep the spice in our marriage. It's necessary to keep both of us happy and interested."

"Really? And would you maybe give me a hint what you do to keep it exciting?"

Her cheeks ruffled when she looked at him. "You're not old enough yet for that," she told him.

He exploded into laughter.

"Teasing me does not put you on my good side," she warned.

"Well, if I don't tease you, you'll think I'm just sucking up," he replied lightly when they reached his Pathfinder. "Vulpans are not timid, Hannah. None of us are."

"Yes, I remember your sister. She was by no means timid," Hannah said as he used his remote to unlock the doors. "This is yours?"

"Yeah, Vil kinda bought it for me," he said, a little self-consciously. "I didn't want it, but she put me on a guilt trip and kinda tricked me into it."

"Oh? How so?" she asked curiously as she got into the passenger's seat.

He went around and got in. "Seat belt please," he urged as he buckled his own belt. Hannah fumbled with it, and got it on as he started the car. "Well, her guilt trip was about Jessie. She told me that I needed a car for her, to take her out, to be there to give her rides, and I needed it in case there was an emergency. She used Jessie like a hammer on me, cause she knows I can't say no to anything that involves making Jessie happy."

"But didn't Vilenne buy Jessie a car?" she asked, in a little confusion.

“She didn’t tell me she did that until after I agreed to take the truck,” he told her, sticking out his tongue a little as he remembered that. “Once I agreed, she had me. Then she told me about Jessie’s car,” he grunted.

“Why didn’t you just back out?”

He gave her a look. “Hannah, a Vulpan never ever ever breaks his word. I may be disowned, but that’s a fundamental tenet of everything I was taught. When you give your word, you honor it. You never make a promise you know you won’t keep, and you never make a promise to someone you don’t think will keep his word to you. When I caved in to Vil and took the truck, I wouldn’t break my word, even if she did trick me into it. Besides, and I’ll admit it, I did like the idea of it. I’d been without a car for a long time, and I was willing to cave in after at least a token fight over it to keep Vil from thinking she could get crazy.”

“What do you mean, crazy?”

“Hannah, Vil would stick me in a mansion if she thought she could get away with it,” he answered honestly. “But I don’t want her help, and I don’t want her money. I appreciate her concern for me, but I want to be my own fox, and live my own life away from my family’s money, and that life is with Jessica. I want to see if we can make it on our own, not with Vil there giving us handouts. Jessie understands how I feel about it. She wonders sometimes what it would be like to be rich, but she can see the hook and line in the bait that Vil puts out for us. She can see the trap in it.”

“The curse of money?”

“The curse of money,” he affirmed. “I’ve described it to her. I don’t think she fully believes we’d fall under that curse, but she understands why I'm so against it. I saw money destroy my family, Hannah. I don't want it to happen to us."

"You're a very wise young male, Kit," she said appreciatively.

"Thank you," he said with a glance at her.

Kit and Hannah reached the apartment first. He walked with her through the courtyard and described the place and their friends. "It's an old complex and doesn't have many perks, but the furs who live here are good furs. Our landlord, Lupe, is one of our best friends, and a few of us get together every Sunday and play poker. It's become a real gathering," he laughed, "because a couple of Jessie's friends and their boyfriends have been joining us."

"I hope you don't gamble."

"Well, each person puts in two dollars," he admitted. "Whoever wins poker that day uses that money to buy the beer for next week. So it's not really gambling."

"Ah. Well, that doesn't sound that bad."

"It's not," he said as he took out his key to unlock the door.

"Kit!" someone called. He looked up, and cursed silently when he saw Sheila hurrying towards them. "Oh, boy," he breathed. "I forgot to warn you."

"Warn me?"

"One of my cousins has come to Austin," he told her as Sheila rushed towards them.

"Jessica told us about her. She said she's very...wild."

“That’s an understatement. Please don’t hold her against me. But Sheila is a good example of the younger members of my family, and the curse of money.”

“I’d like to meet her.”

“She’s right there, so your wish is granted,” he said with a point.

Sheila was wearing a tank top and a pair of knickers, and she hurried up to them. “Hey cousin!” she said. “Oh, are you Jessie’s mom?” she asked Hannah.

“I am. You are Sheila, right?”

“That’s me!” she said with a cute grin, shaking Hannah’s paw. “I hope Jessie didn’t scare you when she described me.”

Hannah gave a slight smile. “She did describe you as being very....”

“Out of control?” Sheila grinned.

“Yes, that’s one way to say it,” Hannah said with a laugh.

“Well, she wasn’t lying,” Sheila admitted boldly. “I do tend to be a naughty vixen from time to time.”

“Sheila,” Kit warned.

“Oh, come on, Kit, I’m just being honest,” she teased. “Kit was kind enough to take me in after his stepmom tried to kill me,” she said bluntly.

“Jessica explained why you came to live here,” Hannah said. “When do you intend to go back to school?”

“As soon as Cybil, Kit’s stepmom, leaves Boston,” she answered. “Though I have to admit, I’m starting to like this place. There are some good people here, and I really like Kit. Kit's been better to me than my own mother."

"Well, that's nice, dear," Hannah told her as Kit unlocked the door and turned off the alarm. "Come in with us, please, I'd like to talk with you."

"Sure!"

"Already taking over my house," Kit sighed.

Hannah laughed. "I'm your elder, Kit. You're supposed to defer to me. And I seriously doubt you've never allowed your cousin into your house."

"I'm housebroken," Sheila grinned at him.

"Barely," Kit snorted.

"At least I sit on the toilet, so I can't possibly miss," Sheila said flippantly. Kit gave her a warning look, Hannah gave her a startled look, then she laughed delightedly.

"I see Jessica was not kidding about you, Sheila."

"Not a bit," she grinned shamelessly. "I'm sure Kit's gonna beat me up for being so forward after you leave, but I gotta be me."

"You aren't what I expected out of Kit's family."

"Well, I'm exactly what you'd expect if you knew them, Misses Williams," she said honestly.

"Please, call me Hannah."

"Hannah. Our parents are all money-hungry boors, and all their children are drinking, drug-snorting, sex-chasing, party-going brats. The Vulpan children are a legend in Boston, Hannah. They call us the Party Pack,” she admitted.

“And yet you’re here.”

“Only because I was afraid for my life,” she admitted. “I am part of the Party Pack, Hannah. I’m actually a bad girl,” she said freely.

“Well, Jessica told me you have a job, and you’re a very good friend to her. So you can’t be all that bad.”

“I love Jessie like a sister,” Sheila laughed. “She’s so sweet and kind. And she’s fun to embarrass,” she added with a grin at Hannah.

“Well, Jessica is a very shy young lady,” Hannah admitted.

“Not all that shy, once she gets to know you,” Sheila grinned with a wink.

“Well, that’s a good thing. We’ve always been worried that she might be a little too shy,” Hannah told her honestly.

“We gotta work on her, though,” she said clinically. “We had to get her drunk at her bachelorette party before she’d even have any fun.”

“Sheila,” Kit warned.

“She didn’t do anything bad,” Sheila protested. “But it’s hard to celebrate the last of your freedom when you’re too embarrassed to look at the strippers your friends went out and got for you!”

“It sounds like you’re a bad influence on my daughter, Sheila,” Hannah told her.

“Well, I’m trying to be,” she said in exasperation. “But she’s hard to corrupt!”

Hannah gave her a startled look, then actually laughed. “Then I must have raised her right,” Hannah surmised with a surprisingly pleased expression.

Jessie and the others arrived, and Sheila hurried off to meet the rest of Jessie’s family. Hannah pulled Kit towards the living room. “Your cousin is very...unusual, Kit,” she said.

“She’s very honest, Hannah,” he said with a sigh. “But despite all her faults, she is my cousin, and I guess I love her. Sort of,” he grunted.

“Well, I think she’s good for Jessica,” she said, which surprised Kit a great deal. “She’ll push her and try to urge her out of her shell, but Jessica will know where the line of impropriety is and not cross it. So I don’t disapprove of their friendship.”

“I’m so glad,” he said with an explosive sigh. “I was sure you’d hate Sheila because she’s...well, she’s Sheila.”

“Is she really an example of your cousins?”

“More or less,” he nodded. “Sheila is an example of the curse of money, Hannah. My cousins never have to work a day in their lives, so many of them are totally absorbed in hedonism. They have all that money, but no purpose in life, so they drift through it pursuing whatever entertains them. But I’m hoping Sheila is going to be different. She’s actually working now, and she seems to have fun at the office. She works at the magazine with me,” he explained. “Maybe Jessie will be a good influence on her. Jessie’s teaching her to cook, and trying to get her interested in doing something with her life that's more than going to parties and chasing males."

"Cook?"

"Sheila's fascinated by cooking," Kit nodded. "She's learning very fast, too."

"Well then," Hannah said, tapping her muzzle. "Kit."

"Yes?"

"If I invited Sheila to Cincinnati for Christmas, would she come?"

"Probably. You can ask her. Why?"

"If Jessie's trying to make something of her, I'll have to see what I can do as well. My fingers just itch at the thought of a girl that wild. She has to be tamed."

Kit laughed. "Oh my, Hannah, you have no idea what you're getting into," Kit warned her. "But if you want to try, I have no right to say no. Just let me say right here, right now, that you were warned."

"Duly noted, Kit."

"At the end, though, I think you'll wonder just who was taming who," he added with a grin. "Sheila can be very...corrupting."

"If my daughter can resist her, she has no chance against me."

"It'll be a fun show, at least."

Hannah elbowed him in the ribs.

“Here’s your first lesson about Sheila,” Kit said, pointing. Sheila was talking to Ben, and Ben was a little unsettled as Sheila ran her paw up and down his bicep, complementing him on his physique.

“She wouldn’t!”

“Yes, she would,” he said honestly. “Ben is fair game in her mind, Hannah. He’s no relation to her.”

“He’d better not!”

“Well, you’d better hope that all your children are just as uncorruptable as Jessie, or Sheila will subvert them in short order. That’s the risk you take if you bring her into your house. As you work to change her, she’ll be working to change you and your family. She might seduce Ben, and just think of what might happen if you put Sheila and Jenny together and left them unsupervised.”

Hannah gave him a look, then laughed ruefully. “You did warn me.”

“I did.”

“I’ll have to think about that, I suppose.”

“It would be a good idea. John, would you like some coffee? We went and bought a can just for your visit.”

“You’re a lifesaver, my boy!” John said with bright eyes. “I’d love a cup!”

As Jessie’s family looked around his apartment and got to know Sheila, he also got another visitor. Lupe knocked and opened the door, “yo brah,” he called.

“Lupe!” Jessie said with a smile. “Mom, Dad, guys, this is our friend Lupe,” she introduced. “Come in and say hi!” she demanded of him.

Lupe came in and shook some paws, smiling and being himself, which was loose and friendly. “It’s nice to meet you guys, Jessie goes on about ya,” he told them. “I’m glad they’re here. Not only are they my best tenants, they’re some of my best friends!”

“You’re the manager here, Lupe?” John asked.

“I own the complex,” he answered. “I didn’t plan on getting into the rental business, but I had an opportunity, and I took it. It’s been pretty cool so far.”

“How long have you been doing this?”

“Six years,” he answered. “I make a decent living, at least when I keep the party jocks out of the complex,” he chuckled. “But things are lookin’ up. Jessie, Kit, I just got word. We’re gettin’ a pool!”

“Really? How?”

“Well, that dentist’s office beside us is closing, the guy’s gonna retire. He already agreed to sell the building and land to me. That land’s just big enough to put a nice pool in there, a big one with diving boards and a slide and everything. I just got the funding for the pool today, just came from the bank. They’re gonna start building it next month, and it should be ready by spring.”

“Well, grats bro,” Kit said. “You’re not gonna raise our rent, are you?”

He laughed. “Not yours,” he grinned. “I gotta keep my friends here, ya know! But I am gonna bump it by ten dollars a month on all the other units.

I think that's a fair increase in return for getting a pool. And that's just one of my plans. Westwood's making good money for me now, brah, and the banks'll loan to me, so I got plans. I'm gonna expand and upgrade the complex, brah." He was grinning broadly. "I'm already in negotiations with the houses on the other side of where the pool's going to buy them out. I wanna expand the complex to take up the whole block, build a new complex on the other side of the pool, move everyone over there, then tear down these old units and replace them with new ones. The banks'd never listen to me before when I tried to do it, but now that the complex has been making a good profit for a few years, they're willing to back the plan."

"Sounds nice," John said with a nod. "You're a shrewd businessman."

Lupe laughed. "I don't look it, I know," he grinned. "I'm from the barrio, jefe. I think the fact that I don't look like I know what I'm doin' is one reason why the banks wouldn't loan to me."

"Lupe, you gotta design some special units, just for us," Sheila grinned at him.

"Way ahead of ya, babe," he laughed. "How'd you like a four bedroom super-apartment, brah? You're gonna need room for your kids!"

"Oooh, that sounds nice!" Jessie exclaimed.

"I'm gonna have everything from efficiencies to four bedroom condo-style apartments," he told her. "And you know you get dibs at them, guys. I can't leave my friends out in the cold!"

"Sounds really nice, Lupe," Kit agreed.

"When you get back after your honeymoon, I'll show you the plans the contractor I hired brought me for the new Westwood," he offered. "It's gonna be awesome, brah! If everything goes well, the pool will be in by April, and we'll start building the new units by summer! Westwood will be the biggest apartment complex in Austin, and we'll have everything! A pool, a workout gym, internet and cable in every unit, dedicated parking, security, furnished appliances, some furnished units in addition to unfurnished units, I'm even negotiating with AMTA for a shuttle bus that'll go to U.T.!"

"AMTA?" John asked.

"Austin Metropolitan Transportation Authority, the city bus," Kit answered.

"Well, we're about to go have lunch before the rehearsal," John told Lupe. "Would you like to come with us?"

"Aww, I'd love to, but I'm kinda busy right now, brah," Lupe told him. "But hey, thanks for the invite! Bring me a doggy bag," he winked.

"We can do that," Kit chuckled.

"Would you like to come, dear?" Hannah asked Sheila. "You are family, after all. Or soon will be."

"I'd love to!" she agreed.

Sheila was added to the procession as Jessie's family got a good look at their apartment, then they all piled into the rented minivan to go to the hotel so they could check in and drop off their luggage. It was a tight fit in the van, because it was designed to hold seven and seven was exactly what they had. Sheila sat between Ben and Jenny in the back seat, and Kit and Jessie sat in the middle row behind John and Hannah up front. Ben and Jenny were a little intimidated by Sheila's raw audacity, but she soon had them laughing and carrying on like kids, turning on her charm...and Sheila had a lot of charm. They reached the hotel and filed out, and Ben joked that soon the Williams clan was going to take the place over. "It's gonna be like a family reunion," he laughed. "The whole family is coming for the wedding!"

"Are you and Vil the only ones from Kit's side coming, Sheila?" Jenny asked.

"I hope so," she said honestly. "If anyone else shows up, they'll probably be carrying guns. They're violently opposed to this marriage, Jen. There's only a handful of cousins I'd feel comfortable having come to the wedding, and no way in hell I'd want to see any of the parents there. They're all rabid purists, all but like four or five of us."

"Sad that furs have to be like that," Jenny sighed.

"Just goes to show you, Jen, that money isn't the same as smarts," Sheila said sagely. "Our great-grandfather was a genius to build the shipyard and turn it into what it is, but the rest of the family doesn't have to be smart. They just get to be rich."

Hannah gave Kit an approving nod at that remark, and it just went to show that Sheila was much more than the party girl she appeared to be.

Virtually the entire second floor of the hotel had been booked for the Williams clan, and to Kit's surprise, John and Hannah's family weren't the first ones to arrive. A portly femme cat with gray fur and wearing a red sweater and red slacks opened a door, gave a cry, and rushed out towards John as they came down the hallway. "Penny!" John said happily, hugging her.

“That’s our aunt Penny,” Jessie told Kit and Sheila. “She’s married to Uncle Jim.”

“How was your flight, dear?” Hannah asked her as Penny hugged her.

“It wasn’t bad at all,” she smiled. “Oh, and this must be Kit! It’s so good to meet you!” she said, giving him a rough, impressive hug. This portly femme was strong!

“Penny, right?”

“That’s me,” she said with a darling smile. “My, you’re a handsome young fox,” she said, holding him by his shoulders and looking him up and down. “I love your eyes, dear, they’re very striking. We’ll have to do something about that ear, though,” she noted.

“You leave his ear alone, Aunt Penny!” Jessie warned. “I like it that way.”

“Penny, this is my cousin Sheila,” Kit introduced.

“Well, it’s good to meet you!” she said, giving Sheila a rough hug but looking at Kit. “But I thought John said only your sister was coming to the wedding?”

“I’m not quite like the rest of our family,” Sheila explained.

“Ah, well, we can talk about that later. Did you just get in?” she asked John as she moved down and crushed Jenny in a hug, the masked cat struggling a bit in her powerful arms.

“We made a detour to go see Jessica’s apartment, but yes, we just got in a bit ago,” he answered.

“John!”

“Jim!” John returned. Kit saw a very tall, lanky tabby-furred cat step out of the open door, with a very short, frail-looking elderly femme cat with gray, wiry fur and wearing an old-fashioned dress behind him. John gave his taller brother a warm hug, then he bent down and hugged the elderly femme. “Mother, you’re looking as radiant as ever!”

“Florida agrees with me, Jonathon,” she chuckled in a surprisingly strong voice. “So this is the young fella that’s stolen my granddaughter away!” she said with a cackle. “Come here, young fella and give us a hug!”

Kit attended to that, trying to give her a chaste hug, but she wrapped a very strong arm around him and crushed him against her. Good Lord, was there something in the water in Jim’s house that made them all so strong? “It’s nice to meet you,” he said with a bit of a wheeze.

“You don’t look like the son of a rich man, young fella,” she grinned at him.

“I used to be, but I’m normal now,” he said mildly, which made her laugh. “How may I call you?”

“Call me Grandma, I answer to that,” she grinned.

“Well, Grandma, I’d like to introduce my cousin Sheila. She’s come down to stay in Austin for a while.”

“Such a pretty young vixen!” she said appreciatively, then she crushed Sheila in a hug. “My, those eyes must run in your family!”

“They do,” Sheila giggled. “All the Vulpans have them.”

“You need to be a little more modest with your clothing though, little missy. That’s almost scandalous!” she said, taking in Sheila’s tank top and knee-length pants.

Sheila laughed. “I’m a scandalous kind of girl, Grandma,” she winked. “I’m a rich girl. We’re bad at heart.”

Jessie’s grandmother laughed delightedly. “Oh, you’re gonna be a fun one, girl, yes you are!” she proclaimed. “Why are you three hiding, you geeses! Come give your grandmother kisses!” she ordered Jessie and her siblings.

“Just letting you scope out Kit and his cousin, granny,” Jenny grinned as she hugged the aged femme.

Kit shook Jim’s paw when his mother got busy greeting her grandchildren. “John’s told me a great deal about you, Kit. Most of it was even good,” he said with a smile.

Kit laughed. “Well, I’m sure John was kind about the bad parts.”

“I’m very curious to meet your sister,” he admitted.

“You will. She flies in early tomorrow morning, and we planned a dinner for everyone tomorrow evening at a steakhouse so your family can meet Vil and some of my friends and co-workers.”

“Ah, yes, John mentioned that. It should be fun.”

Kit helped John and his family push the luggage cart holding their luggage into their rooms. John had arranged adjoining rooms, with him and Hannah in one and Ben and Jenny in the other. Sheila got caught up with Jim and Penny, talking to them with a smile at the door, but Jessie’s grandmother came straight to him and Jessie. “So, Friday’s the big day, eh?” she noted. “Looking forward to it?”

“You know we are, Grandma,” Jessie laughed.

“You found yourself a handsome young fella, Jessica.”

“Aww, thanks, Grandma,” Kit said modestly.

“Pretty broad shoulders for a fox,” she said, clapping her paws on his arms. “Nice and strong. What kind of work do you do?”

“I’m a researcher for a magazine,” he answered. “I sometimes do some writing for it, too. And I help produce a comic strip, along with an artist and Jessie. She’s part of it too.”

“Really?” she said. “I love funnies! Which paper carries it?”

“It’s in our magazine,” Kit told her. “But I can have Jeffrey put paper copies of the ones we’ve done in a binder for you to read if you’d like.”

“I think I’d like that,” she nodded. “I adore funnies. If you can’t laugh, you got no reason to keep on living!”

“My part isn’t that big,” Jessie said modestly. “There’s the main plot, and a little side plot involving two characters, Missy and Cutler. I do the side plot, while Kit writes the main plot.”

“Is it funny?”

Kit laughed. “It’s hilarious!” he exclaimed.

“Then don’t be modest about it, girl,” Grandma Pearl told her. “Be proud of something that’s worth doing!”

“I’m proud of my strips,” she said, a little defiantly. “I work very hard on them!”

“Good, good! I’m looking forward to reading them.”

“I think you’d like them, Grandma,” Jessie told her. “They’re very funny. Jo-jo almost makes me pee my pants sometimes.”

“The main character,” Kit explained when Grandma Pearl looked at her curiously. “She’s something of a ditzy mad scientist, very smart but kinda oblivious to the chaos she causes with her inventions.”

“It sounds interesting, my boy,” she grinned, showing off an upper plate of dentures, but worn lower teeth that were obviously her own.

After dropping off the luggage and chatting with John’s brother and his wife and mother for a while, they went on to eat dinner. John took them to Denny’s, which surprised Kit a little, but the food wasn’t bad and it was nice to sit and talk with them. Kit and Jessie described the city to them, then they talked about the wedding and their honeymoon plans. “We’ll fly up to Boston first to have a little ceremony in a cathedral there to honor my mother’s wishes, then go on to Florida,” Kit told them. “My sister’s letting us use her vacation condo in the keys. We’ll fly up to Cincinnati on Wednesday afternoon and stay with you until Saturday, then fly back home.”

“It doesn’t give us much time for a honeymoon, but we don’t need that long,” Jessie smiled. “Kit has to get back to work. They’ve really been kind to him with giving him time off, given he’s not even been there four months.”

“Yeah, I really owe Rick and the gang for all their help,” Kit agreed. “They didn’t have to be this nice to us.”

“From the way Jessica talks of them, they sound more like family than co-workers,” Hannah noted.

“Yeah, we’re all pretty tight,” Kit agreed. “We are more like a family than a business.”

“Yeah, Lilly’s almost like a sister, and Rick’s like a second father, always there to help,” Jessie agreed.

“I hope I’m not being replaced,” John lamented, which made Jessie laugh and slap him playfully on the wrist.

“Don’t be silly, Dad,” she chided. “But Rick’s very kind, to all of us. We’re like his kids, not his workers.”

“We?” Jenny teased.

“I work there too,” Jessie told her sister, a bit strongly. “I’m not in the group photo, but I get paid for doing the comic strip, and I’m listed in the credits on page two.”

“Hmm, we need to fix that,” Kit noted. “You are on the staff, love.”

“I am too, and I’m not in the group shot,” Sheila complained.

“You’re an intern,” Kit retorted with a grin. “Mike’s just really attached to our old group shot because it’s such a good picture.”

After dinner, they went on to the church, a little early. Hannah and John looked a bit reluctant as they saw the Catholic church but Monsignor Duke was waiting by the side door for them, smiling mildly. “Kit, Jessica,” he said, shaking their paws. “Did you bring the rings?”

“Yes, father, I have them,” Kit nodded.

“Father, this is my family. My father John, my mother Hannah, and my brother Ben and my sister Jenny.”

The monsignor greeted them in turn with kind words and smiles, then he gave an even milder smile when he reached Sheila. “This is my cousin Sheila,” Kit introduced.

“A fellow Vulpan,” he noted. “I thought that Kit had separated from his family.”

“A couple of us still keep in touch with him, father,” she said as she took his paw and shook it.

“Are the others here yet?” Kit asked.

“I’m afraid not, but it’s still nearly a half hour til four. They have time.”

“Well, let me track down my bridesmaids,” she said, taking her phone out of her purse.

“Let me thank you for allowing them to hold the ceremony here,” the monsignor said to John and Hannah. “They’ve asked for a non-denominational ceremony, and I’ve agreed to it.”

“Well, we’re not Catholic,” John said honestly.

“Yes, but that’s just fine. I’ll be honored to join Kit and Jessica in marriage outside of Catholic traditions. Please, come in, and I’ll show you the chapel.”

Rick and Martha arrived as the monsignor showed Jessie’s family and Sheila around the church. Rick and Martha seemed to get off on the right foot with Jessie’s parents immediately, and they were joking and laughing within two minutes of being introduced. Sandy and Sam arrived about five minutes later, bouncing into the church laughing and smiling, and they too met Jessie's family. "So, this is the face behind the voice on the phone," Sandy grinned when she shook Hannah's paw.

"And you must be the saucy-tongued young lady who always gives such impertinent answers," Hannah said with a faint smile.

"She called me saucy!" Sandy said with a happy grin as she hurried over to greet Rick.

A trio of raccoons piled quickly into the church. "Monsignor," the tallest of them called, and he came up to them. "Hello, we're from Tricoon Video Productions," he introduced. "This is the Vulpan-Williams rehearsal, right?"

"That's right," Jessie said, stepping up. "Are you Steven?"

"Yes ma'am," he said with a smile and a nod. "From that voice, you must be Jessica Williams."

"Yes, that's me. It's nice to meet you."

"Glad to meet you too. My brother Tom, and our cousin Violet. We're here to observe the rehearsal so we know how and where to set up."

"Please, join us then," she said with a nod, motioning for them to come up to the front of the chapel.

After everyone got settled down, they rehearsed the ceremony. Sheila, Hannah, Ben, and Jenny sat in the pews and watched as they went over the wedding in detail twice, then staged a full rehearsal from start to finish. When they finished, they paused for coffee and tea the monsignor supplied, and then did it again. "Father, where do the rest of us sit?" Jenny asked him as they prepared for the second run.

“By many Christian traditions, the parents, immediate family, and most important guests of the couple sit in the front row with their families,” he answered. “Your parents will occupy the seats by the aisle, and were Kit’s parents alive, they would occupy the same seats on the other side of the aisle...but those seats will probably be occupied by his sister and cousin, given they’re the only members of his family that will attend. Beyond that, the guests sit in whatever order pleases them, taking up the remainder of the seats. By custom, no one will sit in the first row without being invited to do so. Some weddings have the first few rows with arranged seating, but Jessica’s wedding plans don’t do that. With the lack of an organized plan, it’s just first come first served.”

“I’ll need at least one spot on the front row where I can sit when I’m not taking pictures,” the femme raccoon, Violet, announced.

“You can sit on my side, it’s going to be fairly empty up front,” Kit chuckled.

“The video won’t be a problem. I’m going to have two cameras, both in the back of the chapel. One on the aisle set to zoom for the ceremony, and one in the balcony up there,” Steve said, pointing to the second floor balcony over the front of the chapel. “When will you be opening the chapel for the florists, Monsignor?”

“Oh, whenever they arrive,” he answered.

“Will there be someone to let us in around two so we can set up our equipment?”

“That’s a touch early, isn’t it?”

“I want to have plenty of time that everything is working and the spots we picked to set up don’t interfere with the floral arrangements.”

“Ah. Yes, someone should be here. I have to perform a wake tomorrow, but I’ll make sure someone is here to help you.”

Their final rehearsal went smoothly, except for one little hitch. Just as the monsignor reached the point where they would kiss, Sheila jumped up and shouted “put him on the floor, Jessie!” Kit was about to chide her, but Jessie grabbed him by the neck and planted a kiss on him that made him forget where he was, what he was doing, and why he’d been angry in the first place. Jenny and Sheila burst into laughter when Kit’s knees unlocked.

“Jessica, didn’t we have this discussion already?” the monsignor asked in a mild but amused voice.

“Oh,” she said, showing mercy on him by ending it. Kit wobbled a little, but Jessie just gave him a mischievous smile. “Sorry Father, I was just practicing, that’s all.” Jessie’s cheeks were ruffled, and her eyes were demure, but Kit could tell that she’d enjoyed that moment of being brazen in front of her family and friends.

“Yes. I can see you were,” he said in a voice that dripped with sarcasm.

The rehearsal wrapped up as the monsignor talked to them by the door to the parking lot. “Now remember, you need to be here an hour before the ceremony, at least,” he told them. “If you intend to put on your dress here, Jessica, be here two hours before at the minimum.”

“I’m going to put on my dress before I get here,” she answered.

“Then you need to be here an hour early,” he answered. “And make sure you don’t arrive at the same time if you want to honor the old tradition of not seeing each other before the ceremony.”

“We can manage that,” Kit nodded.

After the rehearsal, instead of going back to the hotel room, Jessie’s family broke up. John and Hannah decided to go out with Rick and Martha, and Sheila gathered up Ben and Jenny and told them she’d take them out in her Mustang and hit some clubs. Kit’s ears burned when she said “oh, I don’t know, maybe we’ll go to the Top Hat,” she said idly, but when he glared at her, she just grinned and winked at him.

“Uh, Sheila, I’m only seventeen,” Ben said in a low voice, out of his mother’s hearing.

“Oh, that’s not a problem,” she grinned in reply. “Wanna go see what adults do for fun, Ben?”

Kit tried to head that off, but Sheila was one step ahead. She’d called a cab, and it was already in the parking lot waiting. She all but abducted Jenny and Ben, and the cab was gone before he could intervene.

“Oh...my...God,” he whispered.

That was not going to end well. Sheila was—she would really do it!

“What’s wrong, Kit?” Jessie asked.

“Sheila just took Jenny and Ben,” he answered quietly, so her parents wouldn’t hear.

“Yes, well, they asked if they could go, and our parents said yes.”

“What? Hannah—oh great,” he sighed. “Jessie, you know Sheila! She’s going to take them clubbing!”

“Have a little faith, Kit,” Jessie told him. “Sheila knows we’d kill her if she did anything like that.”

“Then why didn’t she take us, or Sam and Sandy?” he pressed. “She took them alone.”

“I—oh my,” Jessie realized, putting her paws to her muzzle. “Call her!”

Kit had his phone out and hit her speed dial in half a second, but she wouldn’t answer. “She has her phone off,” he growled when he got her voice mail.

“What can we do, Kit?”

“There’s nothing we really can do,” he grunted in reply. “Just wait until tomorrow, and kill her.”

“We should warn my folks.”

“And listen to Hannah scream all night? No thanks. Let’s hope that your brother and sister have more sense than my cousin and they come home at a reasonable hour.”

Kit didn’t sleep well, because Sheila didn’t come home.

He was up at sunrise and on the phone trying to find his cousin, but she was nowhere to be found. She wasn’t at home, she wasn’t answering her phone, and she wasn’t over at the sorority. He was very worried about it until Hannah called him at about seven to find out when they were meeting Vil at the airport.

“At nine,” he answered. “When did Ben and Jenny get back last night?”

“Around ten,” she answered. “Sheila took them to some of the college hang-outs that Ben could get into, and she dropped them off last night. They said they had a good time.”

Kit blew out his breath explosively. “Well, that’s good,” he said. “We’ll meet you at the hotel around eight-thirty.”

“That sounds good.”

“She took them back to the hotel,” he told Jessie with a relieved sigh, who had just woke up, and was getting out of bed to take a shower. She came around the bed and leaned down and kissed him on the ear.

“I guess we really can trust her,” she chuckled.

“Trust who?”

Jessie started and jumped onto the bed, behind Kit, at that voice. Sheila was standing in the doorway, then she leaned against it with a grin on her face.

“There is this thing called knocking, Sheila,” Kit chastised her as Jessie huddled behind him to conceal her nudity from his cousin.

“The door was unlocked, so I knew you had the alarm off,” she grinned. “I took Ben and Jenny back around ten, so don’t worry. They were back and in bed like good little children.” Then she sighed sensually. “But they’re not children anymore,” she all but purred.

“You didn’t!” Kit gasped.

She laughed evilly. “And get killed? Do you think I’m crazy?” she laughed. “I took them to the mall, and then to a couple of clubs where they’d let me bring them in. But, to satisfy my need to break the rules, I bought each of them one beer,” she grinned. “So, I had to do a little corruption, and before I took them I just had to make you sweat a little bit. Can’t let you think I’m getting tame in my old age,” she winked.

“Shame on you!” Jessie told her, then she laughed. “But I guess one beer didn’t kill them.”

“Jenny’s drunk before, but Ben didn’t like it. He said it tasted like sewer water,” she laughed.

“You kinda wanna go wait in the living room so I can dress, Sheila?” Jessie asked.

“Pft, I’m a girl, you silly femme!” she laughed. “You don’t have anything I haven’t seen in a mirror!”

Jessie blew out her breath, then slid out from behind Kit and scooted off the bed.

“There ya go!” Sheila laughed. “Show it off, baby! Swing that tail! Shake those boobs! Woohoo, shake what God gave ya, sweet buns!” She clapped her paws and gave one of her shrill, ear-splitting whistles as a catcall.

Jessie picked up her pillow and threw it at the vixen. It hit her dead in the face, knocking her backwards and out of the bedroom. Kit heard her fall down onto the floor in the hallway.

“Did that taste too silky for you, Sheila?” Jessie demanded as Kit exploded into helpless laughter. “Now go wait in the living room, you brat!”

“Noooo, I must see you naked!” Sheila wheezed from the hallway, then she too broke out into laughter.

“You wanna look at something? Look at this!” she shouted, then she slammed the door, hard.

Kit literally rolled off the bed, gasping for breath.

Sheila made tea for them as Jessie took a shower, and she was a little nervous. But then again, Kit could see why, since Vil was coming. Vil intimidated Sheila, and most of the other members of the family. Jessie joined them after a while, wearing a white sweater and a pair of jeans, and she took Kit’s paw and kissed him on the ear. “Tomorrow,” she purred happily. “Tomorrow you’re mine.”

“He’s been yours since the first time you screwed him, Jess,” Sheila grinned. “He proves that males are slaves to what a girl keeps in her bra and panties.”

“Stop being nasty,” Jessie chided her.

“Guess I’m just anxious. She is coming today.”

“Vil is nothing for you to worry about,” Jessie told her, sitting down at the table. “You’ve been living down here for weeks, and we love having you. You’re a good friend, even if you’re a bit outrageous sometimes,” she teased with a smile.

“Have to be me,” she laughed. “And I have to honor the tradition of the sorority to make you loosen up! I’ll have you dancing naked in the living room by next year, or I’ll shave off my fur!”

“You’re going to look silly like that,” Jessie noted, which made Kit chuckle. “Are we going to the hotel or are they coming here?”

“Dunno, Hannah didn’t say. We should call.”

“Why is everyone going to the airport to see her arrive?” Sheila asked.

“Because it’s Vil,” Kit responded.

“Well, I guess that explains it,” Sheila sighed.

They went to the hotel, and from there, along with Rick, Martha, and all of Jessie’s family, they went to the airport. Directions from the airport staff sent them to a small hangar at the end of the airport, a private hangar, and there they waited only about ten minutes before the hangar workers informed them that Vil’s jet had touched down and was taxiing to the hangar. The plane taxied in, and then its engines powered down and the hangar workers allowed them to approach. The hatch of the plane opened, and Vilenne Vulpan stepped out of her plane, down the stairs, and onto the concrete. She then laughed like a little girl and ran over to them, embracing Kit with a laugh and a pat on the back. “Hey, baby bro!” she said, kissing him on the cheek. “It’s so good to see you!”

“Hey you,” he said happily, picking her up and swinging her back and forth, which made her gasp and laugh delightedly.

“So, you ready to become respectable, baby bro?” she grinned.

“Him? Respectable? Never!” Sheila laughed.

Vil pushed out of his arms, then embraced Jessie. “Hey Jess,” she said, kissing her on the cheek. “You got everything ready for tomorrow?”

“I think I do,” she laughed. “I’ve been running around like a maniac since Monday.”

“Well, I’m here now, I’ll make sure of it,” she said confidently. She looked at Sheila critically, which made the taller vixen’s cheeks ruffle slightly and take an unconscious step back. “Sheila,” she said calmly. “Have you been behaving?”

“As little as possible, cousin Vil,” she answered with a nervous chuckle.

“Any complaints?” she asked Kit directly.

“Well, aside from an unhealthy desire to see Jessie naked, not really,” he replied, which made Jessie gasp and Sheila laugh. “She’s been behaving, and she actually does her work, and she gets along with the gang.”

“She’s like the office mascot,” Rick chuckled. “We’ve never had a pet before, so we still like her.”

“Well, when she starts peeing on the floor, call me and I’ll take her back to the pound,” Vil said calmly, which made quite a few people laugh.

“You’re looking very well, Vilenne,” John told her as she stepped up to Jessie’s parents.

“I’ve had a good year,” she smiled broadly, patting Hannah’s arm fondly. “A very good year,” she said, almost purring. “Are you ready for tomorrow?”

“I’m prepared,” she said in a neutral tone.

Vil smiled at her. “I guess I can accept that,” she said, stepping away from them. “Rick! How are you feeling?”

“I’m well, Vil,” he smiled, offering his paw. “I’m still thanking you for your gracious gifts. You did a great deal for us.”

“All of it was deserved,” she smiled, giving him a pat on the arm. “And you must be Martha. Rick’s gone on about you in our emails, ma’am.”

“Please, call me Martha, hon,” she smiled. “It’s nice to finally meet the femme behind the mysterious messages.”

“Vil, this is my mother, Pearl, and my brother Jim and his wife Penny,” John introduced.

“A pleasure,” Jim said, shaking her paw. “It’s nice to meet what part of Kit’s side of the family he’s willing to reveal.”

Vil laughed. “Me and Sheila are the only ones I’d allow within a thousand miles of Austin, Jim,” she said with frankness. “But there were a few others that wanted to attend,” she said, looking back to the aircraft.

Kit followed her gaze, and realized that others were also disembarking. The first one was a young, very attractive vixen, her fur a bit lighter in shade than Vil and Kit’s, her eyes amber and her hair black instead of red. It was Suzy!

“Suzy!” Kit gasped in disbelief as she came down the stairs and rushed over to him. She gave him a fond hug, kissing him on the cheek with a laugh.

“How have you been, you pain in my butt?” she asked with a bright smile. “I’ve missed you!”

“Jessie, this is Suzy, Vil’s best friend and someone who’s been very kind to me,” he said, putting his paw around her shoulder and squeezing her. “If it wasn’t for Suzy, I don’t know how I’d have made it since I was sixteen.”

“Kit just doesn’t have the temperament to be alone,” Suzy smiled at Jessie. “I’m so glad he found a femme crazy enough to take care of him!”

“It’s not insanity,” Jessie said with a shy smile. “Any femme who knew him would marry him.”

“I know,” she said, with a bit of a wistful smile, gazing up at him. Then she blinked and gave Jessie a warm smile. “You have to take care of him, hon, he’s very special.”

“I know,” Jessie said with a grave nod.

“Suzy, this is John and Hannah Williams, Jessie’s parents,” Vil introduced, but Kit’s eyes were back on the plane. An old fox male was shuffling down the stairs, one at a time, and Kit almost couldn’t believe his eyes. He hurried over to him and held out his paw, and when the aged fox looked to him, he gave a warm, knowing smile. “Ah, thank you, my boy,” he said fondly, patting Kit’s paw with his old yet steady paw. “These steps are a bit too steep for a fox my age.”

“Clancy,” he said thickly. “How have you been?”

“I’ve been waiting for you to send me letters, that’s how I’ve been!” he complained, then he chuckled. “I’ve been quite fine, lad, quite fine. Retirement is right around the corner for me.”

Kit escorted him over and brought him to Jessie. “Jessie, this is Clancy, the butler that served in our house while I was a kid. He was almost like a father to me,” he said with a fond look at the old fox, with his graying fur and his wrinkled eyes.

“It’s nice to meet you, Clancy,” she said, taking his paw and shaking it. “Kit’s stories about you are funny, but he always speaks of you with the highest respect.”

“Such a beautiful young femme, Kitstrom,” he said approvingly. “Of course, your father must be rolling in his grave.”

Kit chuckled. “This has nothing to do with spite, Clancy. The only furs this has anything to do with are me and Jessie.”

“That relieves me beyond measure to hear, my boy,” he said with a nod. “She may not be accepted by your family, but that’s a moot point by now, isn’t it?”

“Exactly,” he agreed. “They gave up on me years ago. I’m not going to live by their rules anymore.”

“Well said, my boy. Well said. It was quite unusual to ride with them, on the way to your wedding.”

“Huh? Them? Don’t you mean Vil?”

“No, my boy, them,” he said, looking back to the plane.

Kit followed his gaze. There at the door, looking almost cold with fury, was none other than his aunt, Sarah Vance Vulpan, and his uncle Brian Vulpan. Behind them were two of his cousins, Muffy and Victor. Victor was the third of Maxine’s five children, and Muffy was the oldest of Brian’s three children.

Was Vil insane? Did she lose her mind? What in the bloody blue hell possessed her to bring family to his wedding! She knew how they would react to this! Didn't she understand they'd do anything they could to stop the wedding, to prevent a Vulpan from marrying outside their species?

Kit could only gape at them, dumbfounded as they came out of the plane.

“Kit?” Jessie whispered in confusion. “Are those...your family?”

He could only nod mutely.

Sheila literally hid behind Kit as her mother and Uncle Brian came up to him, his cousins behind them. Kit looked at them in confusion, but when they looked at Jessie, his expression became flat and hostile. “What are you doing here?” Kit demanded, all vestiges of his good mood gone in an instant.

“We've come to witness your wedding, Kit,” Brian told him calmly. “And not to interfere in any way. We are only here to watch. That is my word to you.”

Kit gave him a suspicious look. “Sarah?”

She nodded. “We won't cause a scene, Kit,” she affirmed. “We've come only to attend, no more, no less. We will not interfere with your wedding.”

“Why are you here, then?” Kit demanded. “What reason would you possibly have to come to my wedding?”

“That is something you're best taking up with your sister,” Sarah said with a sniff. “She'll explain it to you.”

“You wouldn’t believe us if we told you, Kit,” Brian elaborated. “But if Vil tells you, you’ll believe it.”

“Sheila,” Sarah said sternly.

“Uhh, M-Mom?” she stammered, staying behind Kit.

“You can come out now. I won’t force you to go back to Boston if you don’t wish it,” she declared, a bit unwillingly.

Sheila laughed nervously. “Excuse me if I don’t believe you,” she answered, staying behind Kit.

“So, is this her?” Brian asked, looking at Jessie.

“It is,” Sarah nodded.

Jessie gawked at the pair, and Kit almost moved to intervene when Brian stepped up to her, afraid he might try to hit her or something. “So, you’re the one,” Brian said, looking down at her. “She’s rather cute,” he noted to Sarah.

“For a cat, yes,” Sarah said arrogantly. “At least she has fox-like markings. She’s a mixed breed, Brian, part fox.”

“Well, that explains Kit’s attraction,” Brian nodded. He then offered his paw to Jessie. “I’m Kit’s uncle, Brian,” he said. “A pleasure to meet you.”

“I, I’m not so sure you’re being honest,” she said after a brief hesitation.

She did not take his paw.

“Ah, you’re both well prepared and observant,” he said with a surprising smile. “The family is very much opposed to this wedding, Miss Williams. But, we’ve come to...accept that we can’t stop it. So, since we can’t stop it, at least some of are here to at least try to mend some fences, as it were. Like it or not, Kit has moved on from us and is establishing his own life. We can accept that, but we do have to establish some common ground, some rules of courtesy between the Boston and the Austin Vulpans so we don’t embarrass each other, and stake out our territories that the other side will respect. We object to this marriage, but we can’t stop it. And since we can’t stop it, we have to salvage what we can from this situation to minimize the damage to our family reputation.”

“So that’s what I am? An embarrassment?” Jessie asked icily, putting her paws on her hips and glaring up at his uncle defiantly.

God, what a femme!

“To us, this is an embarrassing situation,” Sarah said with surprising calm. “Our family does not believe in marriage outside our species, Jessica. We are, what some call...purists. That one of our own is marrying a non fox is an embarrassing situation for our family in our social circles back home. But, we are here to admit that this is something we cannot stop or prevent,” she said with contained calm. “We accede that fact, Miss Williams. We hope that in exchange for what will be the closest thing that will come to a blessing from us, we can extract some compromises from you and Kit that allows us to pretend you aren’t here.”

Jessie flared at that rather arrogant and self-centered declaration, but Vil was there, with a paw on Jessie’s forearm, patting it to stall the impending retaliation.

Good thing, too. Hannah looked about ready to slug Sarah in the head. Jim and John had to interpose themselves between Hannah and Kit's aunt and uncle.

“What Sarah is saying, while painting it in the best possible light for her, is you win, Jessie,” she said with a calm word and a smile. “The Vulpans can't deny this is happening, and can't ignore you and Kit. Sarah and Brian are here in hopes of finding...reconciliation,” she said, giving Kit a slight, smug, and knowing little smile.

That smile told him volumes.

The uncles and aunts thought that Vil was going to win the lawsuit, and through that victory, Kit would be installed as the heir and executor of his father's estate, and the Vulpan fortune.

They were here to try to bargain a favorable outcome out of him when he gained control of the Vulpan family fortunes, by acknowledging him and his marriage...no matter how much doing so would burn at their souls like acid. They were here, literally, to beg for their money, and in the mother of all ironies, beg money from the one member of the family that almost all of them had rejected when the one that controlled their money before him had disowned him.

For an awful moment, he considered rebuffing them, doing to them what they did to him, but he discounted that. Money was all they were, and money was both their drug and their curse. Far be it from him to separate them from the source of their suffering and pain.

He was beyond revenge. All he wanted was peace.

He would honor his promise. If his suspicions were right and they were here to beg for their money, he'd give it to them. He didn't want a penny of it. Not a single penny.

Kit nodded to Vil slightly, almost imperceptibly, and she smiled slyly. Such was the depth of communication between the two of them.

He put his paw on Jessie's shoulder. "You know, there was a time when I dreamed of a day like this. But now, I find that it was a stupid wish," he told his aunt and uncle.

"What do you mean?"

"You're afraid Vil is going to win the lawsuit, so you're here to try to bargain your money back from me."

They gave him sheepish looks.

"I'm not an idiot, no matter what you may think. But let me put you at ease, Aunt Sarah, Uncle Brian. I don't want the money. If Vil wins, I'll leave it all just the way it is now. On that, you have my word as a Vulpan... for what that's worth," he snorted. "So, you have what you came for. You can go back home and tell Uncle Zach and Aunt Maxine that your mission was accomplished, and you can kindly leave me the hell alone."

"Well, that does make me relieved to hear that, because the family's been in an absolute uproar this week. But, we are here to attend your wedding, and we will see it through," Brian said with surprising candor.

"I don't want you here," Kit said bluntly.

"We promise to cause no scenes and do our best not to infuriate you or her family," Brian said, raising his paw solemnly. "We only wish to be there at your wedding. That's all."

"Kit, indulge me," Vil said steadily to him. "I'll keep a leash on them. On that, you have my promise."

"I—well, it's not my decision to make, really," he sighed. "This is Jessie's wedding, and it's her ultimate decision. Pretty kitty?"

She looked at Vil for a long moment, then finally nodded. "They can stay. But if they put even one toe out of line, I want them gone, Vil."

"You have my word."

And so, it was a very quiet and tense group that left the hangar, as Hannah and John glared at Sarah and Brian...and walking in the middle of them, in an easy, almost childlike skipping gait, was Vilenne, looking like the cat that caught the canary.

Oh, yes, there was something more going on here. This had scheme all over it. Kit absolutely could not wait to get Vil alone and drag this out of her. She was up to something, and what was more, she knew much more than she'd intimated to him.

And whatever that information was, it was making her almost giddishly happy.

Chapter 16

Things were a little chaotic outside the hangar, and Kit was a little disjointed over the bomb that Vil dropped on him, but his desire to get Vil alone was satisfied almost immediately. Marcus, one of Vil's panther bodyguards, drove their car back to his house as Kit and Jessie rode in a limo with Vil, Sarah, and Brian, and the three cousins, Victor rode in a second limo that had also been hired for them, and Sheila abducted Muffy and drove off with her in her Mustang. That was a lot of people in one limo, but the limo was a huge stretch model, so there was room for everyone to literally lie down on the seats without touching.

Before the door of the limo even closed, Vil held up her paw to quell his impending questions. "Not until we're moving," she told him.

Jessie held his paw nervously as they waited for the other panther to get behind the wheel of the limo, start it, and then pull out.

"Alright, what the hell is going on?" he demanded. "Something sure as hell is!"

"The lawsuit is over," Sarah told him with a sigh.

"Over? It hasn't even started!"

"It's over," Vil beamed. "Well, not officially, but it's over. We have that stuck-up English bitch hanging over hot coals," she declared with a vicious, almost predatory smile.

“Wanna can the dramatics and get to the point?”

“The point, brother dear, is she screwed up,” she said calmly. “I’ve come into...possession, of some very interesting emails and phone records that will totally destroy her case, and send her running to England for fear that I might hand them over to the police.”

“We weren’t the ones that tried to have you killed, Kit. It was Cybil,” Brian told him.

“Cybil? Cybil was the one that did it?” he gasped.

All three of them nodded. “Vilienne unearthed the evidence just a couple of days ago,” Sarah continued. “It seems that my wayward daughter was good for something. When she fled to Austin with her ridiculous story —“

“I started looking into Cybil a lot more closely,” Vil completed. “I never suspected her of it, baby bro, so I didn’t check her out. I had way too many suspects in the family.”

“Unfortunately,” Brian nodded. “Cybil had her claws more deeply into the family than we thought. She had a couple of members of the board under her thumb, and had a mole in the legal firm that Vil uses.”

“She saw what I was planning to do, and hatched her rather clever little scheme to kill two birds with one stone, brother,” Vil continued. “By killing you, it would have seriously crippled my suit to get you back into the family, which also basically blocks her suit. If you’d have been dead before I filed the suit, I’d have had to do it completely differently. Your status only became moot after the suit was filed,” she told him. “If I’d have walked into court trying to get my dead brother named executor of the estate, we’d have been laughed out of Boston. And since your death would have sent me over the deep end, she felt it would tie me up and allow her to waltz in and snatch up a good half of the family's fortune and go back to England before the Vulpans could call a truce and work against her. She wasn't aiming at all of it, just half of it. It was a clever plan. If it wasn't aimed at my own brother, I could admire it for its subtlety and effectiveness."

"When you got involved with...Jessica, it gave her the perfect cover," Sarah told him. "She knew the family would go up in flames when we learned of it, and it was the perfect opportunity. Vilenne would focus on us, and that would only make it that much easier for her. Even with the assassination attempt failing, it was a benefit for her. It angered Vilenne and set the family against itself, which she hoped would cause enough discord to allow her to slip through and go back to Britain with a share of the family fortune beyond what was granted to her by her prenup. Even if that failed, her hope was to tie us up in court and try to force us to settle with her at a fraction of what her suit was demanding, which the family, still in disarray from Vilenne's crusade, would accept just to have it over with...thinking it was better to willingly hand over ten percent rather than risk losing it all. She felt that no matter what happened, she would win, and go home richer for her trouble."

Kit leaned back as Jessie gripped his paw tightly, taking it in. They were right. Nobody would suspect Cybil, who had never even met Kit before the funeral. She had no motive if one looked at the picture Cybil presented, no motive at all. But when one looked at the fact that Cybil did know about Vil's planned lawsuit and how it involved him, then everything just snapped into place neatly. If Kit was killed, then it destroyed Vil's suit and would turn the family into chaos as Vil exacted her revenge against the family. But even its failure was a boon, for nobody would ever suspect Cybil, and it still set the family against itself, as Vil tore into the family hunting for the perpetrator, believing that it had to be the purist family using a hit man to prevent a marriage they would not accept. No matter what happened, it was all gain and no loss for Cybil, and it had been. Vil had gone crazy on the family, and while her back was turned to the treacherous British vixen, Cybil made her move, filing her lawsuit while the family was in disarray. But what Cybil didn't count on was Vil being ready to move herself. She underestimated Vil's resilience and ability to manage multiple complex issues at once. Vil did not go as crazy as Cybil hoped over the attempt on her brother, and was ready to act when Cybil made her move.

“Well...hell,” Kit breathed.

“It does make a kind of sense, Kit,” Jessie said quietly. “You once told me that Vil said that odds were, Cybil was filing the suit knowing she couldn't win just to get something.”

“And she used me against the family,” he sighed. “Even when I just want to be left alone, I just can't get away from this damned family. So, have they arrested Cybil yet?”

“Oh, no,” Vil purred ominously. “She has no idea we have this information. She has no idea. And we're going to use it against her.”

“We're going to allow her to go on with her lawsuit, and then allow her to dig her own grave,” Brian told him. “She'll leave Boston with nothing, and unless she's extraordinarily careful, she'll do it in the back of a police car.”

“Ah, so, this evidence can't—“

“Nope, bro, it can’t,” Vil told him. “I got this evidence illegally. If I could hand it over and get her arrested, she’d already be in jail, because sending her bony ass to prison would be the ultimate revenge,” she chuckled darkly. “Hell, if the cops knew how I got it, I’d be thrown in prison,” she said seriously. “But, if we let Cybil dig her own grave and my lawyers present some select parts of it in court as rebuttal, we don’t have to explain where it came from, and it doesn’t fall under the same rules as criminal evidence. It will destroy her case, and put her in a spotlight she does not want to be in,” Vil said with bright eyes. “Then, after she gets her ass kicked in court, I drop the rest of it on her and blackmail her into giving up everything she gained out of the marriage, or I take it all to the British tabloids. I’ll get her convicted of your attempted murder in the court of public opinion, and for British aristocracy, that’s a deahtknell. It may not be admissible in a criminal trial, but once people find out what she did, she’d be totally ruined, and facing investigation after investigation on both sides of the Atlantic. She’ll avoid all that and knuckle under, so she can go back to England with at least a modicum of dignity...at least until I start on her on that side of the pond.”

“But that doesn’t punish her!” Jessie protested. “She tried to kill my Kit!”

“Jessie, there are punishments, then there are punishments,” Vil told her seriously. “Prison would be a punishment for Cybil, there’s no doubt about that, but what I’ll do to her goes way beyond simple punishment. I will destroy her. I will take her reputation, her status, her wealth, and her good name.”

“Then that’s what you should do, not buy her off with blackmail!”

“Jessie, remember what I promised you when Kit was shot? That I could punish people far beyond the pitiful reach of the law?”

“I remember.”

“Did you trust me then?”

“Yes.”

“Well, trust me now. I can destroy Cybil Whitmore, in ways the law could never manage. Will you allow me to do that?”

“Only if you do to her what she did to Kit,” Jessie said vindictively.

“Not literally, but I’ll crush her, Jessie. Just leave it to me.”

“Make her hurt.”

“She’s going to hurt, Jessie. She will hurt.”

“Good,” she said with a nod, leaning against him.

“My little barbarian,” Kit chuckled, kissing her on the cheek.

“They tried to hurt you, Kit,” she said with surprising calm. “She tried to kill you, and for no reason other than to run home with a little more money in her pocket!” She looked at him. “I mean, I could understand if you raped her baby sister or something, but that’s just cold-blooded murder, and over nothing but money. Now I understand what you’ve been saying, love. I understand the curse. You’re very smart to want nothing to do with it.”

“Curse?” Brian asked.

“The curse of money,” Kit said calmly to him. “The cancer that destroyed this family.”

“Well, I’ll respectfully disagree with that opinion, Kit,” Brian said. “I see nothing wrong with having money.”

“There’s nothing wrong with having money. But when money becomes your entire life, then it becomes a curse instead of a blessing,” Kit told them. “And from my point of view, it has destroyed this family. We’re not a family anymore, not the way a family should be. We’re a collection of vain, arrogant, greedy, hedonistic foxes sharing a common name as we fight over money and reputation, even among ourselves.”

“That’s a silly concept,” Sarah snorted.

“Really? Then here’s a question for you, Sarah. Am I a Vulpan?”

“Of course you are,” she answered.

“Even though I’m disowned and poor?”

“Your eyes show us who you are, nephew.”

“And I’m a member of this family?”

“In a way, yes. Unofficially, as it were.”

“Fine. Then where the hell were you when I was laying in a hospital bed with a broken back?” he asked directly.

Sarah looked away.

“If you were family, you would have come to see me. You would have helped me when I couldn’t pay my hospital bill. But I didn’t see any of you. Not once. Why?”

“You were disowned,” Brian told him.

“And?”

Sarah sighed. “And Lucas threatened to disown anyone who helped you,” she admitted.

“So, you chose money over me, one of your own family, in my hour of greatest need.”

She was silent a long time. So was Brian, for that matter. “We did,” she finally admitted.

“I rest my case,” he said eloquently. “The only family I have is Vil. The rest of you can go to hell.”

Brian gave a rueful chuckle. “You went into the wrong profession, Kit. You’d have been one hell of a lawyer.” He slapped his paws on the knees of his suit pants. “And we need to do something about that, nephew. I for one am starting to think that Lucas was very wrong about you. I’d like a chance to get to know you a little better.”

“Well, you can just stuff that wish up your ass, Uncle Brian,” Kit said flatly. “When you leave this city, I pray to God I never see you again. The time for apologies passed a long time ago. You didn’t just burn your bridge with me, you nuked it. You can take your damn money and get the hell out of my life.”

“Well, I can only hope your opinion of me will change the same way it did for Sheila.”

“My opinion of Sheila never changed,” he retorted. “Sheila is harmless. She’s a self-absorbed hedonist who lives only for the pleasure she gets out of her trust fund, and when I was disowned, she was too young to really understand what was going on. She was only twelve. Later on, she was too afraid of losing everything she knew to help me, and I can’t really blame her for it. Sheila couldn't survive without her money, and surprisingly, she's wise enough to admit it to herself. You, on the other hand, are one of the uncles. You aren't like the cousins. You know what's going on, and you don't live for the next bottle of vodka, hit of ecstasy, or cute fox you can lure into bed. When you turned your back on me, you did it fully knowing what you were doing, and fully understanding that I might die because of it. You threw me away, Uncle Brian, and I can never forgive you for that."

"And now you hold our futures in your paw. Fate has a dark sense of humor," he said with a chuckle.

"I see it as justice, not fate," Jessie told him bravely. "If Kit does end up holding the key to your fortune, then you have to look at him and remember what you did to him, and I think that's going to haunt some of you for the rest of your lives. Not because you care about him, but because you drove away someone who came back to hold power over you, and there was a time, however brief, when you had to look at yourself in the mirror and see what you did and what might happen because of it. You had to face the consequences of your actions, maybe for the first time in your whole life. You had to face the prospect of being poor, just like he was, of having him do to you what you did to him. But Kit's not like you. Kit's kind and gentle and caring, and he wouldn't do that to you, no matter how much you deserve it. And when he was faced with helping a member of his family, despite what your family did to him, he helped. That's something you would never do." She patted Kit's paw. "You may have the money and the power, but right here is the best part of your family, and it's just one reason why I love him so much."

“I do believe we’ve just been spanked by this little femme, Sarah,” Brian said with a rueful chuckle.

“You deserve it,” Vil said bluntly. “I risked my ass to help my brother, Uncle Brian. It was possible to help, you just didn’t care to help. Even after I begged it of you.”

“I know, I know,” he sighed. “I can admit that that was a huge mistake. And I can’t say I’m sorry enough times.”

“The only person you need to apologize to is sitting right there, and it seems he just told us he won’t accept it,” Vil told him.

“If Kit wishes to be recalcitrant, then let him,” Sarah told her brother simply. “We told him why we’re here, and we offered our apology. If he rejects it, that’s his affair, not ours. At least we tried.”

“Way to stay on his good side there, Sarah,” Vil said with dark humor.

“I will not grovel and beg like a dog,” Sarah said with pride staining her voice. “If that leaves me broke and homeless, then so be it. At least I’ll still have my self respect.”

“Brave words since he already gave his word,” Brian told her, a bit acidly. “I was hearing quite a different tone from you on the flight up. It sounded strangely like raw panic. Admit it, sis, you’re just as helpless and afraid as the rest of us.”

“Now see here, Brian—“

“That’s enough,” Vil growled in a low voice, that instantly silenced her elders. “Fighting just proves Kit’s point. Act with a little decorum,” she told them, looking out the window. “Ah, we’re almost there.”

Kit looked out, and realized they were on Congress near the capitol building, going to their apartment.

“So, brother, you’ve heard the truth. What do you think?”

“I think you need to kick Cybil’s ass,” he answered immediately.

“Yes!” Jessie agreed fervently.

“So you’ll let me handle it?”

“I trust your sense of moral outrage,” he told her with a nod. “You’ll do what needs to be done.”

“And I’ll enjoy it,” she grinned. “Oh, keep your calendar somewhat clear in late January. That’s when the trial starts. I’d like you to be there to watch the beginning of the end for Cybil Whitmore. I want her to be able to look into your eyes when she realizes that we know she tried to have you killed. And, you’ll need to be there to sign some papers once I win the suit, so you can wash your paws of it and come back home.”

“I’d be happy to. The sooner I can get rid of you, the happier I’ll be. Well, not all of you,” he corrected.

“I love you too, baby bro,” she said, sticking her tongue out at him.

The limo pulled into their parking lot a few moments later, and he saw that one of the panthers was waiting by his truck, having driven it back. He opened the door of the limo, and Kit urged Jessie out. He followed her, but Vil didn’t exit the limo. Kit and Jessie looked in at her as she grabbed the door handle. “I’m going to drop them off at the Armitage, then go on to the church to make sure everything is to my satisfaction,” she told them. “I have my phone with me, so call if you need anything. Remember, we’re going to dinner at the steakhouse at four. Do you have any other plans for today?"

"We're going over to the hotel a little later to meet more of Jessie's family," Kit answered.

"Alright. Drive everywhere. Don't take any rides. Keep your car with you, just in case I need you to come to me."

"We can do that," he nodded.

"Alright then. I'll see you two later. Be good."

"See you soon, Kit," Brian offered.

The panther closed the door to the limo, gave Kit his keys, then got into the front. They watched the limo back out of the lot, and then drive off.

"Well, that was...informative," Jessie said, which made Kit laugh helplessly. "Can you believe the nerve of your uncle to act like nothing they did to you mattered?" she flared indignantly.

"I'm so glad I wasn't the only one that felt that way," he chuckled, putting his arm around her.

"I can't believe them! They're so stuck up, they must walk around on their tiptoes because of the steel rods in their butts!"

Kit laughed. "Wow, that's the closest thing to a dirty remark I've ever heard out of you in public," he teased as he turned them towards their front door and started for it. "They must have really made you angry."

"Oh, slightly," she said with vast scorn. "And not just me. Did you see Mom lunge at that vixen in the hangar when she said that horrible thing to me?"

“We should have let your mom get to her,” Kit grunted as he unlocked the door. “Getting her ass whipped might be just what Aunt Sarah needs.” Kit turned off the alarm, and Jessie filed in behind him. “Who were those two younger ones?”

“Victor and Muffy.”

“Oh, the nudist is here?” Jessie giggled.

“Yep, she’s here,” he answered. “Here’s hoping she keeps her dress on during the ceremony...if she attends, anyway. I hope they don’t. Muffy’s harmless, but Victor’s a nasty bastard. He thinks he’s God’s greatest creation, and he has a temper.”

“He’s that bad?”

“He doesn’t get physical, but he’s ruined people in Boston over imagined slights,” he answered. “He once got a waiter fired for dropping a fork. He got the manager at Castle Cinema fired because the movie he was watching melted during the show, and they had to give the people refunds.”

“Oh, he’s like that,” she sighed.

“Yeah. Anyone who does not cater to his every whim must be destroyed. Sheila may be a brat, but Victor is the spoiled brat to end all spoiled brats. If anyone disrupts our wedding, it’ll be him...and probably because he’s bored and wants to leave.”

Jessie had her phone open almost immediately. She hit two buttons and put it to her ear. “Vil? Jessie. Listen, that Vulpan boy that you brought with you, Victor? He’s not invited to our wedding. No, no, Kit just told me about him, about what kind of male he is. I don’t want him anywhere near our wedding. Okay. Okay, I will. See you at the steakhouse. Bye-bye.” She closed the phone. “Problem solved,” she told him with a slight smile.

“I love you, Jessica Desdemona Vulpan,” he laughed, swinging her back and forth in his embrace.

“You’d better, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan, you’re marrying me tomorrow,” she grinned, then she began to purr as he caressed her back. But she was startled out of her purr when he laughed richly. “What?”

“As soon as Victor hears that he’s been banned, he’ll be on the phone to his mother instantly. He’ll throw a tantrum, and Maxine will try to get him into the wedding,” he said, laughing again. “Banning him will make him want to come, if only because someone is denying him something. Of course, he’d cause a scene and ruin the wedding out of revenge, but he won’t be able to tolerate not being invited.”

“Well, then, sounds like he’s about to learn that you don’t get everything you want,” she winked.

“That’s blasphemy in the Vulpan household,” he teased, leaning down and kissing her.

“Mmmm, let’s do that again,” she said, and she began to purr as she laced her arms around him and kissed him again. She kissed him for long, wonderful moments, then nuzzled his neck. “You know, this might be our last chance before it’s moral,” she breathed in his ear.

“I will bet you a thousand dollars that if we do, someone will come over or call us before we’re done,” he said with a rueful, lamentful chuckle.

The doorbell rang, and Jessie almost fell down, she was laughing so hard.

“Who is it?” Kit called loudly, a bit irritated.

The door opened, and Sheila peeked in. “Hey, cousin,” she called, opening it fully. Behind her was Muffy. The older Vulpan cousin was nineteen, a little taller, but thinner and more built than Sheila. Muffy’s red hair was cut short, in a pixie style, and she was wearing a tank top-style halter that ended just under her breasts and a pair of very tight spandex workout pants, clothes Kit recognized...they were Sheila’s. She had three piercings in her left ear and two in her right, which was rather unusual for a Vulpan. Most Vulpan femmes only had one piercing in each ear. “We just got back from the airport, and I’m gonna take Muffy down to the Y so we can work out in advance of all that food we’re gonna eat.” She stepped in, and then looked back and motioned. “Come on!” she urged.

“But it’s his house, Sheila!” she said fearfully.

“You can come in,” Kit called as Jessie steadied herself, and he let go of her. “I only bite the aunts and uncles and older cousins, Muffy. I don’t have too much against the younger cousins.”

“Oh, well, better safe than sorry,” she said with a grin, fluttering the lashes of her Vulpan eyes. “Oh, you’re Jessie, right?”

“That’s me. And I’ve heard a few things about you,” she said with a bright smile.

Muffy’s fur started to rise. “Well, I’m sure they’ve told you those stories,” she said, elbowing Sheila knowingly.

“With every deliciously naked detail,” she answered brazenly, slapping her cousin on the rump.

“They’ll never let me live it down,” she sighed morosely.

“What fun would that be?” Sheila grinned.

“Why didn’t you go to the hotel, Muffy? You need to get settled in,” Kit noted.

“Kit, my stuff is already there. They sent it on in the second limo,” she answered. “When Sheila offered to take me to work out, I came with her so we could change. Her clothes fit me pretty well,” she said, patting her chest. “A little tight, though.”

“Just the way you like it,” Sheila teased.

“So, there any fun places to go in this town, guys? I hope we can go have some fun before I go home, it’s warm down here!”

“Oh, I have a couple of places in mind,” Sheila grinned in a predatory manner.

“Sheila.”

“What? She’s a cousin, cousin! You think she hasn’t done all those things?”

Kit was about to say something, then he chuckled. “Point. I won’t say a word.”

“A word about what?”

“Oh, where I want to take you,” she grinned. “It’s called the Top Hat, and it’s pretty awesome.”

“What makes it so awesome?”

“It’s members only. And bring lots of cash with you.”

“Oh? Oh. Oooohhhhhh,” she said, her eyes brightening. “Can we go tonight? We can take Jessica, give her a last gasp bachelorette party!”

“Oh no, don’t drag me into this!” Jessie laughed. “I’m going to be busy tonight. And if you guys show up at my wedding hung over, I’ll strangle you with my veil!”

“Well, damn, I forgot about that,” Muffy sighed. “If we have to be at the church at noon, well, that’s just not enough time to have proper fun. I’ll have to pass tonight, cousin...but there’s always tomorrow night.”

“Yeah, there is,” Sheila grinned. “Ready to hit the Y? Now that I think of it, this is the last chance Kit and Jessie will have to be alone til after the wedding. We should really give them some half-dressed quickie sex time.”

Jessie’s cheek fur stood straight out. “Out, you hussy!” Jessie demanded, pointing at the door.

Sheila laughed. “Just remember, Jess, it only takes about five or ten minutes when the only thing you do is drop your pants and bend over.”

“Maybe it does with your boyfriends,” Jessie retorted, crossing her arms beneath her breasts in an aggressive posture. “Now go work all that energy out of your system so you’re too tired to be nasty.”

“All exercising does is turn me on, but I have until four to get satisfaction,” Sheila grinned, and she herded Muffy out, who was waving goodbye, then closed the door after locking it for them and giving them a knowing little grin.

“She has a one track mind,” Jessie sighed, leaning against him. She looked up at him. “What?”

“Ten minutes,” he said with a speculative hum.

She laughed and pushed him playfully, then she saw the look on his face. “Wanna try?”

“She did lock the door for us.”

“I am so not just pulling my pants down, though!” she declared as she laughed and hurried past him towards the bedroom.

“That’s not half as sexy as you naked,” he laughed as he followed her quickly.

Fortunately, nobody bothered them for a while, which allowed them to fully experience enough pre-marital bliss to hold them over until their wedding night. When they were finally bothered, they were sitting on the couch, snuggling in silent contentment, with Jessie’s purring the only sound Kit cared to hear. It was their last hurrah. They’d had their last fling as singles, their last instance of living in decadent, sweet sin, and now they were enjoying their last moments of quiet, private intimacy before the events of the day and the near future got them too busy to enjoy one another’s company. At the dinner tonight, they would go their separate ways. Jessie would be going home with Rick, and Kit would be spending tonight alone in advance of the wedding. Jessie was traditional, and she believed that they shouldn’t see each other on the day of the wedding until she was walking down the aisle. Kit could respect that, but he was going to miss her in their bed tonight.

But tomorrow...tomorrow it would be official. They were going to marry, and they’d begin their happily ever after a little after one o’clock tomorrow afternoon, the time of the ceremony. She wouldn't be his girlfriend, she would be his wife. She'd be entwined completely and irrevocably into his life, bound together with ties that he prayed would never fail. He wanted to spend the rest of his life with her, he wanted to grow old with her. She was his match. She was his soulmate. She was the femme God put him on this earth to find and love for all his life.

He couldn't wait.

Many grooms were nervous about their weddings, but Kit wasn't in the slightest. He was looking forward to it, like a kid and Christmas, the chance to finally claim this femme and cry from the rooftops that they were a pair, they were a couple, they were married, that he was the lucky male that would have her on his arm for the rest of their lives. He was the one that would have children with her, he was the one that would hold her paw when she was frightened, cower from the wrathful blows of her deadly pillow when he teased her, hold her in his arms as she cried out in ecstasy while they made love. He would love her, and take care of her, and want her and need her, for the rest of his life.

But that all started tomorrow. Today, well, today was the day before the rest of their lives, and it would be filled with family. Kit was certain that they wouldn't leave them alone before the planned dinner at the Double J. Someone was going to call or stop by to see them, but that was alright. They'd had their time to be alone, and the marriage was about more than just them. It was about family, about the coming together and celebrating the happiness of one of its members. It was a time for the two families to meet more deeply—which in his case was just Vil and Sheila—and a time for them to be together.

But, surprisingly, they were left alone until nearly noon, when Jessie's phone began to ring.

"Do we have to answer?" she asked quietly as she just snuggled deeper against him.

"Yah, I guess we do," he sighed, reaching down and picking her phone up off the coffee table, and handing it to her.

"Hello?" she called after opening it. "Hi Mom. No, not really. Me and Kit are just enjoying a little peace and quiet before all the craziness starts." She giggled. "No, you didn't interrupt, we did that already," she said, poking him in the side gently, then she laughed. "I'm surprised you'd dare to ask me that, Mom. No! Well, it's just not you, especially since you keep saying you don't approve of us." She traced her finger along his stomach as she listened; Kit could hear Hannah's voice from the phone by her ear, but couldn't make out her words. "Let me ask." She put her paw over the phone. "Did you finish your Christmas shopping, love?"

"Kinda. I still haven't bought a gift for you or Hannah yet."

"Brave words to say this close to Christmas," she teased.

"Well, have you finished?"

"It's been so crazy..." she hedged, her cheeks ruffling.

"Then hush, Miss Kettle."

She laughed. "No, Mom, he hasn't. I haven't either, to be honest." She looked up at him. "Mom wants to know if you'd like to go shopping with the family. They're going to go out and do some Christmas shopping, and you can also meet Aunt Susan and Uncle Sam and Uncle Bob. They just got in a bit ago.”

“Sure, we can do that,” he nodded.

“Okay, Mom, we’re coming. No, she and one of her cousins went out, so they’ll have to pass. No, that’s okay. Sure, we’re on our way. Bye.” She closed the phone. “She wanted Sheila to come too, but she’s not here to ask, so....”

“Yah, she and Muffy will probably hang out all day. They’re friends.”

“I could tell when they came over earlier.”

The doorbell rang. “Kit! You two done yet?” Sheila shouted from outside.

Jessie laughed. “Guess we can ask now,” she amended.

Kit got up and opened the door, and saw Sheila and Muffy. Sheila was in a sleeveless half-shirt that was barely more than a halter or glorified bra, that showed off her sleek stomach and a pair of low-rider jeans, with a white linen shirt thrown on over it and left unbuttoned to give her some protection from the fifty degree air. Muffy was wearing a black miniskirt with a white blouse that had the sleeves rolled up to her elbows. “We were about to go hit the mall, cousin, wanna come?” Sheila offered. “We got Christmas shopping to do.”

“Actually, we were going to ask you along with us,” Jessie said as she came to the door. “My mom invited us to go shopping with my family, they’re going looking for Christmas presents.”

“Umm, what about me?” Muffy asked.

Jessie was on the phone before she finished. “Mom, Sheila just got home, and she still has her cousin with her. Is it alright if we bring her too? Okay, see you soon.” She closed the phone. “You’re welcome along, Muffy.”

“Cool!” she said with a grin.

After getting their stuff together and packing an overnight bag for Jessie, who wouldn’t be coming back to the apartment tonight, they were in the Pathfinder and on the way. “What’s your family like, Jessie?” Muffy asked her.

“You’d find them boring, but I do need to warn you about one thing.”

“Don’t spew any purist crap around them,” Sheila told her. “Jessie’s a mixed breed, so you’ll offend her family.”

“Wow, you are? You don’t look it at all,” Muffy said in surprise.

“I know, but my grandfather was a fox,” Jessie answered her. “That’s why I have these,” she added, holding out her black-mittened paws.

“Yeah, you do have fox markings,” Muffy nodded after looking at her ears.

“What do you do, Muffy?” Jessie asked. “Do you go to school or work?”

“Work?” she said with a laugh. “No, I don’t work! I go to Yale. I’m a Business major. When I graduate, I want to open my own nightclub in Boston!” she said excitedly. “I’m going to call it The Fox Den, and have a big bar on one side and glass-bottomed stage, and—“ “We’ve heard that description a million times,” Sheila interrupted her.

“So, you actually want to do something after you get out of school?”
Jessie asked curiously.

“Yeah. Most of the family goes to work at the shipyards after they graduate, or don’t work at all, but I want to do something different. I love to club and party, so the best thing I could ever do is open a club that I think is perfect, so I have a place to go where I have fun and I can provide fun for other people!”

“It’s a lot of work to run something like that.”

“I know, but think of how cool it’ll be when it’s up and running!” she said with a trill in her voice. “I’ll hire a manager that knows the business and runs the little details, and I’ll handle the big stuff, so it also gives me time to enjoy it.”

“Sounds interesting,” Jessie noted. “You have bigger plans than this one,” she said, poking her finger towards Sheila.

Sheila laughed. “Hey, I’m getting better!” she protested. “I’m actually thinking of doing something after I graduate now.”

“Really? What?” Kit asked.

“Well, Rick told me the other day that if you do something you like to do, it’s not really work. Well, I doubt I could make a career out of partying, but I really like cooking. I never thought it could be fun, but it is. Maybe I’ll open a restaurant.”

“Just so long as you don’t do all the cooking,” Kit noted, which earned him a slap on the top of his head.

Jessie teased more out of Muffy as they drove to the hotel, and learned more about her. Muffy was smart, as smart as Sheila, but the difference between them was that Muffy actually had a plan for what she wanted to do after college, she had a dream she wanted to chase, and that was hugely different from most of the other cousins. As Kit listened he realized that Muffy's idea was simply to basically hire people to do all her work for her, so she could sit in her office and just be the boss, and then go down and party in her own club. But, for a Vulpan cousin, she had a different outlook and plan, and that set her apart from the rest of the Party Pack. It was actually surprising to hear it, a Party Pack member actually talking about doing something with her life...such as it was. She was just going to build her own nightclub so she had a place to go to party every night, her perfect party place. But it was a start. Muffy would find out that there was real work involved in her dream, but on the other hand, Kit felt that she could handle it. She'd do that work to recognize her dream of owning her own nightclub, and in the bargain she'd be actually producing something, being a contributing member of society rather than a leech. Sheila was starting to come to see things the way Muffy already did, that there might be something productive she could do out in the world that would keep her occupied. Muffy wanted to open her own nightclub, an extension of her love of partying and fun. Sheila could open a restaurant, an extension of her growing interest in cooking. For both of them, they'd be doing something they liked, something that would make their parents respect them for at least trying to live up to the family name by trying to establish their own businesses.

“Just make it members only, so you can dance naked as much as you want,” Sheila teased.

“See, she never lets me live it down,” Muffy said, her cheeks ruffling.

“She has a point, though,” Kit chuckled. “You were an exhibitionist when we were kids.”

“She still is,” Sheila laughed. “When we party together, she wears miniskirts with no panties so she can pull them up and flash boys in the clubs. She’s not wearing panties now,” she declared.

“I don’t like panties, the elastic seams rub the my fur off my waist, bikini lines, and butt,” Muffy said, a touch primly. “My fur is thinner than yours, Sheila, and it’s a little brittle, so tight clothes rub my fur off. That’s why I go without them, not because I like to show off my equipment. I don’t even own any panties.”

“None at all?” Jessie asked in surprise.

“Not a single pair,” she nodded.

“Hon, miniskirts with no panties is...dangerous.”

“Now you’re getting the idea of it, Jess,” Sheila laughed.

“The only reason I wear bras is because I don’t want my boobs below my belly button when I’m fifty,” she added. “If it wasn’t for that, I wouldn’t wear a bra either, cause it rubs the fur off my back.”

“I had that problem too til I switched to Silk Sensations,” Jessie told her. “For some reason, that brand doesn’t chafe the fur off at all, and it does it while providing lift and support.”

“Really? I’ve never heard of that brand.”

“Well, you don’t find them in upscale boutiques,” Jessie laughed. “I buy mine at Wal-Mart.”

“Wal-Mart? Can we stop by and show me today?”

“Sure.”

“We can do that right now, we’ll pass one on the way to the hotel,” Kit offered.

They did just that. They detoured to a Wal-Mart and Jessie showed her which bras she bought, and Muffy bought several of them before they went on to the hotel.

The second floor of the hotel was crowded now, almost like a convention. Doors were left propped open as members of Jessie’s family visited each other. Jessie waded into them with kisses and hugs, and Kit and his cousins were introduced to Jessie’s cousins, aunts, and uncles as they went to her parents’ room. “Mom, Dad, we’re here!” she called as they entered the room. It was a fairly small room with a pair of beds, like most hotel rooms, with it clear that the pair were only using one of them. Hannah hugged her daughter, then hugged Kit. “Mom, this is Muffy, one of Kit’s cousins,” Jessie introduced.

“Muffy? Is that a nickname, dear?” Hannah asked directly.

Muffy laughed. “Yeah, cause my real name is even worse,” she answered as she shook Hannah’s paw.

“Eugenia Minerva,” Sheila teased, which earned her a murderous look from Muffy.

“Minerva? I’ve always adored that name,” John said as he shook Muffy’s paw. “Had Ben been born a girl, it would have been his middle name. It’s a traditional British name, dear, nothing to be ashamed of. There are many women named Minerva.”

“And I’m sure they hate their parents as much as I do,” Muffy declared, which made John and Hannah laugh.

“Well, we need to get everyone’s attention to find out who’s going shopping and who’s not,” John said.

“You want attention? No problem,” Sheila winked, marching out the door. Outside, she put two fingers to her muzzle, then unleashed an ear-splitting whistle that stopped all conversation and made furs look out their doors at her. Just how did she do that? “John needs to know who’s going Christmas shopping!” Sheila shouted once she had everyone’s attention. “Come on, shake your tails, we don’t have much time before the dinner tonight!”

“I knew I liked that girl,” Grandma Pearl cackled as she came through the adjoining door from the other room.

“She’s always been fearless,” Muffy said, a little jealously. “Ever since we were both little girls.”

“So, where are we going?” John asked. “You’re the resident expert on Austin, Jessica.”

“The mall,” she shrugged in reply. “We can go to Northcross. It has the skating rink and a video game arcade in case the kids get bored while we’re shopping. The steakhouse is right beside it, too. That way if we run late, we don’t have to go far to get to the dinner.”

“That’s not a bad idea, pretty kitty,” Kit nodded.

“Okay, show us where it is on the map,” John said, picking up a street map of Austin. “I’ll spread that information so everyone knows where to go in case they get lost.”

“Maps? Clever.”

“Everyone has a copy of one, just in case. The Williams clan is always prepared, Kit,” he chuckled. “Oh, I’d like to swing them by the church along the way, so they know how to get there.”

“It’s not far out of the way.”

Kit ended up leading a procession of sorts out of the hotel. Six rental cars followed him as he drove them by the church, then went back to the interstate and took them to Northcross. Kit had a warm spot in his heart for the area, since he’d met Jessie at the Java Joint, and they’d had their first kiss on the ice in the skating rink in the mall. Once they were there, the fifteen adults and children that came with them split up, as did Kit and Jessie. He wanted to get her a Christmas present, and he wasn’t going to do that with her along. He ended up with Hannah and Muffy, as Sheila went along with Jessie and John to get Kit a Christmas gift. They paused at the rail overlooking the ice skating rink, and Kit had to chuckle. “This is where me and Jessie had our first date,” he told Hannah. “Right there. I took her ice skating.”

“An unusual choice, cousin,” Muffy noted.

“It was a date of opportunity,” he answered. “We were at a coffee shop just outside the mall, it was close, and it was something for us to do. I just asked her out of the blue, and she accepted.”

“You could have taken her to a restaurant.”

“I was homeless and broke then, Muffy,” he told her evenly. “I didn’t have the money to do anything else, not really. And it would have been so impressive for me to ask her to wait with me so we could take the bus to get there.”

Muffy giggled and nodded. “Ah, I can see why you did now. I should have brought my skates, I didn’t know they had ice skating in Texas.”

“You skate, dear?” Hannah asked.

“I’m from Boston, Misses Williams,” Muffy laughed.

“Call me Hannah, dear.”

“Muffy’s actually pretty good. She took lessons when she was a girl.”

“Yeah, I was crazy about figure skating when I was a little girl, so I took lots of lessons,” she answered. “So I’m a pretty good skater.”

“Maybe we should take a try at it,” Hannah noted.

Muffy’s cheeks ruffled. “Umm...maybe some other time? I’m not really dressed for skating, Misses Hannah.”

“I doubt wearing that skirt would cause you too much trouble. It’s not tight.”

“Umm, it’s what I’m not wearing under it that might,” she said in a low tone, almost a whisper.

“Really?” Hannah said, her eyebrow raising.

“I, uh, kinda have some issues wearing underwear,” she said, giving Kit a look. “They chafe off my fur, so I kinda don’t wear them.”

“And yet you’re wearing a miniskirt?” she asked pointedly, looking down at her black skirt.

“I didn’t think I’d be ice skating,” she said delicately, putting an unconscious paw over her skirt, as if a sudden breeze at any moment might lift it up.

“Well, this is a mall, dear. I’ll find you something that won’t rub your fur off,” she said quite forcefully, taking her paw and marching her towards J.C. Penny’s. She gave Kit a strangled look as Hannah took charge of her, but Kit just smiled and shooed her along.

Kit took advantage of the isolation to do his shopping. He bought Lupe some new lounge chairs for his porch since he said his own were too old, and started hunting for something for Hannah and Jessie. Jessie was not easy to shop for. She didn’t really like jewelry, and was actually quite content with things. But she loved books and reading, so he went to Borders and bought quite a few books for her from many different genres. He bought her a sexy bikini at a boutique for their trip to Florida, with tiny little cups on the bra and what amounted to a G-string for the bottom. It was part joke, part tease for her. He wanted to see her in it, but he knew she’d never wear it in public. She’d die of embarrassment if she wore that in public, despite the fact that she had a body that could make that bikini look awesome...or would look awesome in that bikini. He could imagine the look on her face when she took it out of the box and realized it wasn’t a frayed napkin. He bought her a new blouse and a skirt, too, for he knew her size and he knew her sense of style, and felt comfortable buying clothes for her.

Hannah was trickier. He looked around for quite a while until he found something he felt was suitable for her. He spent a great deal of money on her. He bought a new food processor for her, since he remembered that the one she had at home was fairly old, and she’d complained about it. He also bought her a knitting set for advanced knitters; Jessie was very good at knitting, and had told him that Hannah was the one that taught her. Unable to resist a little joke present, though, he bought her a Cincinnati Bengals jersey nightshirt, like the thigh-length nightshirts that many femmes wore for sleeping in them. He also bought her a pair of Bengal colored panties, really sexy tiger-striped orange and black panties out of Spencer's that would probably make John quite excited to see her wearing, given his... fetish for his football team.

The only bad thing about that joke was he'd be there when she opened it, and she could get him for it...but it was worth it.

And the beauty of them was they were tie-on panties, the waist cords of the panties tying together at the hips, so he didn't have to guess her size and potentially mortally offend her.

He bought a bunch of little knick-knacks and such, small gifts for the gang, he bought a couple of cookbooks and a spice rack for Sheila, and realized he really should get Muffy something, since Jessie seemed to like her. He got her a little music box with a little vixen ballerina in a pink tutu that spun when it was wound up and played. It was cheap, but Muffy had always like figure skating and ballet, so it would appeal to her.

He took his gifts to a wrapping booth in the mall and had them all professionally boxed and wrapped. Hannah and Muffy tracked him down not long after that, laden down with shopping bags, and Muffy looked a little skittish. "There you are," Hannah told him. "When we came back to the rink, you were gone, dear, so we went ahead and did our shopping."

"I had to buy your presents, Hannah," he chuckled. "So, you're all done?"

“I have a few yet to buy, but I’m done with her,” she said, nodding at Muffy. “Did you know this girl did not own a single pair of panties?”

“Yeah, I knew,” he chuckled. “You should ask her why we call her Muffy. Well, actually you don’t, now that you know that little piece of information.”

“Kit!” Muffy gasped.

Hannah gave him a sharp look. “That’s totally improper, so we found her some panties that won’t chafe off her fur,” she said, giving Muffy a steady look. “And you had better wear them,” she added in a flinty tone. “It’s a scandal for a pretty young lady like you to go around wearing a skirt like that with nothing under it!”

“I will!” she squeaked. When Hannah directed them to a jewelry booth, she fell in by Kit and whispered “at least while I’m in Austin.”

“I heard that, young lady,” Hannah said curtly, looking at them and wiggling her ears. “They don’t just decorate my head, you know.”

Muffy laughed.

As Hannah drifted away from them looking at necklaces, Muffy pulled him to a bench and they sat down. “Jessie’s mom is really pushy, but I kinda like her,” she giggled.

“She’s a great femme,” he nodded. “I just wish she liked me more,” he sighed. “She objects to the marriage, you know.”

“Really?”

He nodded. “She thinks we’re jumping into this too fast. I just wish I could explain to her how I feel,” he sighed. “If she knew how I felt in my heart, she'd see we're not going too fast at all. We're going at just the right speed."

"Well, tell her."

"I've tried, but I just can't find the words."

"I think you're being too critical of yourself, cousin," she told him. "She does like you."

"Yeah, but the marriage is there in her face, and it's hard not to hate the messenger in this case." He looked over at her. "I'm surprised you're taking all this so well. No trouble at all talking to me, eh?"

She laughed. "Well, Sheila told me about you after she came down here, and I was curious. So when I overheard my mom and dad talking about you, and Dad said he was coming to the wedding, I asked to come along. I wanted to see if Sheila was just blowing smoke out her butt or if you really were nothing like what the elders say you are."

"What do they say I am?"

"Depends on which family member you ask, Kit," she told him. "Uncle Zach says you're a miserable scumbag who betrayed the family, so you were disowned. Dad always told me that you were a pretty brave kid who stood up to his father and tried to live his own life, even after it cost you your money and place in the family. Dad's always been pretty impressed by you, you know. You get disowned at sixteen, and not only did you make it, you graduated from college and got a good job and made something good for yourself. He always told me that you're a true Vulpan, rolling with the punches and coming out on top, just like our great-granddad did when he built the company."

“Well, it’s nice to know I’m not universally despised. What do you think of Jessie?”

“I think she’s beautiful. The family hates her, though,” she giggled. “Even my dad does. Says no Vulpan should marry outside the species, even a disowned one.”

“Well, I expected that. But I don’t really care. I don’t answer to the elders anymore, Muffy. I’m my own fox now.”

“Yeah, I’ve seen that,” she said, nudging him with her shoulder. “I think I have to get Sheila for spreading those stories of me,” she noted.

“You’ll have to get me too,” he chuckled.

“You didn’t!”

“Muffy, you really did do those things.”

“And you won’t let me live it down either!”

“You still do it.”

She laughed. “Well, I guess I do, but do you have to tell every fur you come across?”

“What’s the point of being an exhibitionist if you don’t want people to know?”

She gave him a look, then laughed helplessly. “I’m not an exhibitionist! I just like not wearing clothes. There’s a difference,” she said primly. “Exhibitionists show off. I just like being nude. I like being nude at home, but I do put on clothes when I go out. If I was an exhibitionist, I’d have no problem going ice skating in this skirt without underwear, after all,” she pointed out.

“So you’re a nudist rather than an exhibitionist. Pretty fine line there,” he smiled. “Guess there’s nothing wrong with that as long as you’re not too nuts about it.”

“Well thank you so much for not finding me to be a freak,” she teased, nudging him.

“All the cousins are freaks, Muffy, even me and Vil. You can’t be raised in that family without being a freak...at least when compared to normal people.”

Muffy laughed. “Well, at least we have each other. And now you have more than just Vil. If Dad’s right and they invalidate the will that keeps us from contacting you, I’d like to see more of you, cousin. I think Dad’s right about you. I’d like to get to know you.”

“I came to realize recently that I have nothing against the younger cousins, Muffy, not really. You all were too young to really understand what was going on when I was disowned, and you’re still under your parents’ thumbs, even now. But your dad and the older cousins, well, I want nothing to do with them. I’ll never forgive them, Muffy. Not after what they did to me.”

“I, I can understand that, I guess,” she said. “I’d be totally pissed off at them too if they did to me what they did to you. I’m just glad you’re not blaming all of us, I’m glad you see that when that happened to you, I wasn’t even in high school yet.”

“Well, when I was hit by that car, I didn’t get any visits from you either, Muffy,” he said pointedly.

She looked away. “I was terrified, Kit. Uncle Luke made it very clear, anyone caught talking to you or helping you would be kicked out of the family with absolutely nothing. We were scared to death of him, even Uncle Zach was. You know what it takes to scare Uncle Zach?” she asked pointedly. “He threatened to strip us naked and toss us out the front gate, Kit. Literally. What would you expect me to do? Risk everything for a cousin I barely knew, and risk the wrath of someone who did something like that to his own son?”

He sighed. “I guess not,” he said. “But it still hurt.”

“I can imagine it did,” she said compassionately, putting her paw on his knee and patting it. “Does it matter at all if I tell you I’m sorry?”

“It does matter, Muffy,” he said after a moment, putting his paw over hers and squeezing it gently. “And thank you for that.”

“Hey, no problem. So, what did you get me for Christmas?” she grinned.

“Absolutely nothing,” he retorted.

“Aww! I bought you something!”

“Well, I guess I’ll have to stop by the claw machine in the arcade and get you something.”

“You jerk!” she laughed, slapping him on the shoulder.

Kit and Muffy were joined by Penny and Susan, John’s sister, on their way to a music store so Hannah could buy some CDs for Ben. “Ah, so you ended up herding the Vulpan kids, Hannah?” Susan asked with a grin at Kit.

“Herding is a good word,” she said, glancing back at Muffy.

“Oh, stop teasing the poor girl, Sue!” she laughed. “This poor vixen has been teased by about everyone today! Don’t let them bully you, sweetie, I’m on your side,” Penny grinned, patting Muffy on the shoulder.

“Penny, right?”

“Good memory, hon!” she grinned. “You only saw about fifteen new faces today, you know,” she added with a pat on her shoulder. “So, where are you headed?”

“Tower Records,” Hannah told her.

“Well, mind if we tag along? We’re all done,” she declared, holding up her eight shopping bags from various stores.

“Please, we’d love to have you,” Hannah said, and they fell into step with them. “How is Arizona, Sue?”

“It’s been pretty good. Jack got moved to a new office last month, and he’s just settled in at his new department.”

“A promotion?”

“Not technically a promotion, just a transfer to a new department.”

“What does he do?” Muffy asked.

“He works for IBM,” she answered. “He’s an engineer, dear. They moved him from small business computer to mainframe production. It’s not technically a promotion, but it’s a better position.”

“He’s a hardware engineer or a software engineer?”

“Ah, I could learn to like you, hon,” Susan laughed. “He’s a hardware engineer. He designs circuit boards and electronics. What do you do, hon?”

“Me? I go to Yale,” she answered. “I’m a business major.”

“Yale? Wow!” Susan said, her voice obviously impressed. “You’ll make a pretty penny when you get out of school, young lady!”

“Me Nah,” she laughed. “Most of us Vulpan cousins go to Harvard or Yale, and it’s not because we’re good students,” she said modestly. “I don’t want to work at the shipyard, like most of my family does. I want to open a nightclub!” she said enthusiastically.

“My, that sounds exciting, dear,” Susan told her. “What kind of nightclub?”

“Oh, the best kind!” she said, getting very animated. “It’ll have three floors. I’ll have dance floors on two of them, and the top floor will have a restaurant, bar, and a lounge. I’ll have different styles of music on each floor, and the first floor will have a stage big enough for popular bands to play to large audiences! The second floor will have a huge bar on one wall, and a big dance floor, with a stage for bands or a deejay with a glass floor that has lights in it.”

“You’ve put a lot of thought into it,” Susan said with an approving nod.

“It’s been my dream since I was sixteen,” she said. “And since I don’t matter, nobody cares if I do it.”

“What do you mean, don’t matter, dear?” Hannah asked.

“I’m the second of three, and I’m a girl,” she said simply. “Boys follow in the family footsteps in our family, Hannah,” she explained. “Victor, our cousin that came with us, he’s an example. He’s dumb as a stone, selfish, and whiny, but he’ll be a vice-president somewhere in the shipyard when he graduates from Harvard, probably for some unimportant division, what they call a graveyard department. Where they put the stupid people,” she explained. “If he even works. He doesn’t have to, but the boys are expected to work. Not like they do much, really. Cousin Vil, Uncle Zach, Uncle Jake, and my dad are the only ones that really do important work at the shipyard. Uncle Zach and Uncle Jake are on the board, and my dad works in the Navy liaison office as one of the main foxes who deals with the Navy about our ship contracts.”

“What does your cousin Vil do?” Susan asked.

“That’s Vilenne, Sue,” Hannah said.

“She runs the company, Miss Susan,” Muffy said, a bit proudly. “The first female CEO of Vulpan Shipyards!”

“What do the other femmes in your family do?”

“Get married and have kids,” she answered. “Work if they want to, but they’re never put in any important jobs. If I worked at the shipyard, my uncles would make sure I was the vice president of the south drydock mail room or something. They think girls can’t do male work, not even Vil. That causes a lot of problems. They keep trying to take away her power in the company, but she keeps them all on a tight leash, and that drives them nuts. My family’s still in the stone age, Miss Susan. Girls aren’t supposed to do anything important. It was a major shake-up in the family when Vil became the CEO, but Kit kinda made that necessary. He was supposed to be the new CEO, but he didn’t want it. When he left the family, the only kid Uncle Lucas had left was Vil. He either had to have Vil replace him, or give up his chair to one of the other uncles.”

“Which he’d never have done,” Kit added. “Dad was all about power, and he wouldn’t give up any of it. He wanted his family to keep control of the shipyards, so he broke three generations of tradition and named his daughter to succeed him after I was disowned. The rest of the family wanted Uncle Zach to take his place, because they didn't want a femme to control the company."

"My, your family sounds..."

"Bigoted. You can say it, it won't offend us," Kit told her evenly.

Muffy laughed and nodded. "So, instead of going through all that, I want to open a nightclub. I love to go to clubs, and opening my own club will give me the chance to make what I've always dreamed of in the perfect nightclub." She shrugged. "But I don't even have to do that. We all have trust funds, Miss Susan. I never have to work a day in my life if I don't want to. My weekly allowance from my fund is more than enough to live the lifestyle a Vulpan is accustomed to, and still let me go out and party every night. Some of my cousins, like Bridgette and Bess and Lynn, they've never worked a day in their lives, and they've all been out of college for years."

"Idle paws are dangerous paws," Susan said calmly.

"Yeah, I guess they are," Muffy giggled.

After Hannah bought a few CDs at the music store, they found themselves with about an hour to kill. "Let's go ice skating!" Muffy urged as they walked back towards the rink. "Now that I can, anyway!" she added with a laugh.

"Sure, let's go put all these in the truck, and I'll skate with you," Kit told her.

They put all their bags in his Pathfinder and then they went to the skating rink. She rented figure skates, and he first asked for hockey skates, but Muffy talked him into figure skates. Hockey skates allowed a fur to be more agile than figure skates, tighter turns and more control, as well as faster skating, but figure skates let a fur do some other things like spins. She stowed her purse in a coin-op locker, then darted out onto the ice. Muffy had taken skating lessons, and she was damn good, floating on the ice like an earthbound angel. The others on the ice, most of them novices or worse, stopped and watched the willowy vixen whiz by them, turn sharply, turn around and skate backwards, then curl up in the middle of the rink and perform a spin that lasted nearly a minute, starting off slowly and ending so fast her tail kept trying to stick straight out. A few furs watching from the rails over the rink actually applauded, which made Muffy laugh and give a little curtsy in reply.

“You still skate I see,” Kit noted as he skated up to her.

“Every week,” she nodded, holding her paw out. “Let’s do some laps!”

They weren’t by themselves long. Sheila appeared on the ice about five minutes later, weaving between some kids who were floundering near the entryway and whizzing by them, then turning and skating backwards in front of them and slowing down so they could catch up. “You guys finish?” she asked.

“Yeah, we’re done,” Muffy answered. “How about you?”

“We finished too,” she nodded. “I was with Jessie and her grandmother. Damn, that old lady’s a riot,” she laughed. “Uh oh, someone’s coming to challenge our superiority on the ice,” she grinned, looking back to the entryway. Kit looked, and saw Jessie coming out onto the ice. She was about the same as most of the others in the rink, but to him, she looked beautiful and graceful, even as she staggered towards them before remembering how it worked and settling into a more easy and graceful stride. Ben and Jenny came out just behind her, along with a couple of the young children that the Williams clan had brought to the wedding. Ben looked like he'd never been on ice skates before, but Jenny zoomed right by her sister with ridiculous ease. Jenny knew how to ice skate.

It seemed quite the surprise to Jessie. "Hey, where did you learn that!" she demanded as Jenny negotiated the turn easily.

"They got a rink right by the campus at school!" she called across the ice as she went by on the other side.

"Well, someone in their family is civilized," Muffy said, which made Sheila burst into laughter.

"Well, excuse me while I give someone a private lesson," Sheila said with a leering grin, looking at Ben floundering at the rail. "If I'm lucky, I can grab his butt."

"Be nice!" Kit called as she skated across the rink to him. He and Muffy came around and picked up Jessie from behind, and they skated backwards in front of her as she tried to look as graceful as her younger sister. "Hey, pretty kitty," he said, "doing okay?"

"I need to learn how to do this," she said competitively as Jenny blew her a kiss teasingly as she skated by.

"You're talking to the right foxes," Muffy grinned. "If there's anything any Vulpan can do, it's ice skate!"

“Kit’s told me that before,” Jessie laughed. “You make it look so easy!”

“It is easy if you do it enough,” Muffy answered her calmly, taking her paws, pulling her ahead, then getting behind her and putting her paws on Jessie’s waist. “Okay, feel my paws? I’ll put pressure on you, up or down, just follow by putting your weight on that side. You’re moving your feet the right way, but you just need to get a sense of balance. And don’t fight the skates, hon. Figure skates are flat on the bottom, remember that. You’re going to go in one direction until you push an edge into the ice to alter your direction. You can literally skate sideways if you do it right, because they have no edges to catch on anything and things move in a straight line on the ice. You’re going to have a little play, hon, they’re not hockey skates that bite into the ice all the time, or roller skates that change your direction with the tiniest shift in your weight. I notice you try to correct every time your feet move sideways. You don’t have to do that, just slide your feet back the way you want to go and use the edges of your skates to gently turn you back in the direction you want to go. Now follow my paws. Left...and right... and left...and right...” she urged, helping Jessie get a feel for the way it felt to skate comfortably.

Jenny zipped up to his side and slowed to his speed as Jessie started going faster and faster under Muffy’s professional tutelage, at least until they reached the turn. Muffy had to teach her how to make a turn skating at anything faster than a crawl. “Wow, your cousins are pretty good,” Jenny told him as she looked to Sheila, who had Ben by the paws and was coaxing him out onto the center of the ice.

“It’s cold in Boston, Jenny, so ice skating is popular. You’re not bad yourself.”

“Eh, the rink was a cheap way to have fun,” she shrugged. “I used to skate every weekend, cause it kept me out of the clubs and it was decent exercise.” She slapped him on the shoulder. “Let’s see what you’ve got, you pansy! Real males don’t wear figure skates!”

“Brave words, femme,” Kit teased.

“The Bruins should wear figure skates, at least then they’d look pretty while they lose!”

“Hey, them’s fightin’ words, you infidel!” Sheila shouted, pointing at Jenny threateningly. “Don’t you rag on our Bruins! We’ll kick yer butt!”

“Go Blackhawks!” Jenny shouted, pumping her fist in the air. “The ‘Ruins suck!”

“I’m sorry, but we have to kill you now,” Muffy told her, letting go of Jessie and moving to cut Jenny off.

What happened next almost got them thrown out of the mall. Jenny tried to evade both Sheila and Muffy, but she was in no way prepared to out-skate those two. Jenny was good, but she was nowhere near as good as Muffy. Jenny knocked a few other skaters down, and a few others fell down out of terror when Muffy and Sheila whizzed by them and weaved through them, until the two of them had Jenny cornered at the far end of the rink. Muffy caught her and dragged her to the center of the ice, where Sheila spanked her with her paw as Jessie’s sister laughed almost uncontrollably. “Who’s the best team in hockey?” Sheila demanded before every strike, and when Jenny didn’t answer, Sheila whacked her on the rump. A rink employee scrambled out onto the ice on his sneakers and broke it up, gave the three of them the rough side of his tongue, then threatened to have them kicked out if they didn’t behave themselves.

Jessie came up and stopped by Kit, and she laughed when the wiry bobcat femme lambasted the three of them, pointing her finger in each of their faces and read them the riot act. “Do your cousins even know who the Bruins are?” she asked Kit.

“Oh, yes,” he chuckled in reply. “Jess, love, hockey is huge in New England. They know their hockey. Any native Bostonian who doesn’t know who Bobby Orr is would be lynched.” He put his arm around her. “The Vulpans own a luxury box at the garden, I’m sure they’ve been to games. Actually, I know Sheila has. I remember going to game once with her and a few cousins and Aunt Sarah,” he recalled as the bobcat stalked off the ice, leaving a few of the Williams kids to giggle at the chastised trio.

They were pulled off the ice not long after that, because it was about time for the gathering at the Double J.

It was a quick affair to move the truck to the steakhouse, and he saw two limos already sitting at the back of the lot and quite a few rental cars parked out front, as well as several cars he recognized. Lupe’s pickup was there, and all the gang’s cars were here, as well as Sandy’s Festiva and Kevin’s Acura. Kit helped Jessie out of the passenger side as Sheila and Muffy started for the front door. She looked back into the cargo area and laughed. “Look at all that,” she said, motioning at all the gifts. “How much did you buy?”

“A few of those bags are ours,” he said, taking her paw. “Now let’s go eat, I’m starving.”

The steakhouse was jumping. Fully half of the dining room had been reserved for the party, and most of it was occupied. There was quite a bit of applause when Jessie and Kit became noticed, and they were herded to the table where Vil, Clancy, Sarah, and Brian were sitting. “Save room for Jessie’s parents,” Vil warned when Sheila and Muffy looked to join them. Sheila stuck her tongue out at Vil, then the two of them moved to sit with Ben and Jenny as they looked for a place.

Kit looked around, and noticed someone missing. “Where’s Victor?”

“On a plane back to Boston,” Vil answered. “The little punk threw a tantrum when I told him he wasn’t going to the ceremony, so I sent him packing.”

Jessie laughed, and Kit gave Vil a curious look. “Any trouble?”

“Just the usual ‘my mom will fix you’ crap,” she answered, which made Brian chuckle. “He didn’t want to get on the plane until I had Stav take him by the ear and drag him in.”

“That might have been going a touch too far, Vilenne,” Sarah noted. “You know how Maxine coddles him. She’ll be upset with you.”

“Let her,” Vil shrugged.

Amanda, the German shepherd waitress with whom he used to work, hurried up. “Kit! It’s great to see you!” she smiled. “How have you been?”

“Wonderful, Amanda. How’s it been going here?”

“It got great when the Blimp quit,” she grinned. “Our new night manager’s really cool!”

“Well, that’s great to hear.”

“So, what can I get you?” she asked as John and Hannah took seats on the far side of Jessie. She took their orders, using up several pages of her order pad, and then hurried off to get them started. “So how did your shopping go?” Vil asked John and Hannah.

“It went quite well,” Hannah answered. “At least after I had to take that young one, Muffy, in paw.”

“Muffy’s harmless,” Sarah noted. “Whatever did she do?”

“I had issue with her choice of dress,” Hannah said in a way that made Jessie giggle.

“I hope she didn’t cause you any problems. I’m her father, Misses Williams, if she did, just let me know.”

“Please, call me Hannah. Well, then perhaps you should be the one to keep a foot on her. That young vixen doesn’t wear underwear,” she said in a low tone, leaning over the table.

Brian laughed. “Oh, that? It’s what you can call one of her little quirks. She doesn’t cause any trouble with it. She’s been like that since she was a little girl. She says it rubs her fur off, and she’s always been a little obsessed over her fur. Her coat’s not as thick as most, so she’s compulsive about keeping it looking thick and healthy.”

“I’m surprised you don’t see such scandalous behavior as unusual, Mister Vulpan,” she noted.

“It’s not scandalous, and please call me Brian,” he smiled. “It’s just a quirk. She doesn’t run around naked, well at least not anymore,” he chuckled. “We had trouble keeping that one in her clothes when she was a child.”

“Yes, we had the same problem with Jenny, as I recall,” John agreed with a smile.

“Your youngest?”

“No, she’s our middle child.”

“So is Muffy. It must be some middle child thing,” Brian said absently.

Quite a few friends and members of the Williams clan came over to their table and talked with them for a while, introduced themselves to Kit, or were introduced to Vil, Sarah, and Brian. Kit wasn’t too happy to be sitting with them, but he kept his peace. He only had to put up with them until tomorrow, and then he could leave them behind forever. He didn’t directly speak to them, though.

There was no talking once the steaks arrived, though. Vil’s eyes lit up when she saw her huge porterhouse set before her, and rubbed her paws together eagerly. “You’re in for a treat,” she said. “This place serves the best steaks I’ve ever had. I’ve been looking forward to this,” she hummed, then picked up her knife and fork and got down to business.

“I’m impressed!” Sarah called after the first bite. “This is better than any steak I’ve had at home!”

“They really know how to make steaks here,” Jessie told her. “Grilling steaks is a Texas tradition. They take it seriously.”

“And to think, I’d never stop to eat here if I were alone,” Brian chuckled as he took another bite. “It just goes to show, I guess, that diamonds aren’t always cut and polished.”

They ate their dinners in happy silence, and after many of them were done, they began talking among themselves again, or moving to visit other tables. Lupe and Rick came over to their table, and Kit introduced them. “This is my friend Lupe and my boss, Rick,” Kit said.

“I’m surprised to see other members of Kit’s family here,” Rick said, shaking Brian’s paw.

“Well, a few of us would like to try to reconcile with him,” Brian said simply.

“Well, you can keep dreaming,” Kit told him bluntly.

“Kit, that’s rude,” Hannah said immediately.

“Sorry, but it’s how I feel,” he told her.

“We’ve got a room all ready for you, hon, and Martha’s almost as giddy as a schoolgirl over the idea of getting you ready tomorrow,” Rick chuckled. “We don’t have any daughters, only sons, so she’s getting to experience a wedding from the femme’s side this time, and she’s in heaven.”

Jessie laughed. “Did you give the directions to your house to my parents?”

“He did,” John told him. “We’ll be arriving early in the morning. You’ll have both Martha and your mother fussing over your dress.”

“That may not be a good thing,” Jessie said with a laugh.

“Oh hush, Jessica,” Hannah said with a slight smile. “Even if I object to this marriage in principal, at least I can enjoy the idea of helping my oldest put on her wedding dress.”

“We didn’t know you had reservations about this, Hannah,” Sarah said.

“They’re too young and haven’t known each other long enough,” she answered immediately. “But I’ve agreed to at least give them the benefit of the doubt and allow them to try to prove me wrong.”

“That only took a month,” Jessie grunted under her breath.

“I’ll make sure Kit don’t oversleep, brah,” Lupe grinned, patting him on the shoulders.

“Dude, I don’t have to be there until noon,” Kit protested.

“Yah, like you’ll sleep much past six,” Lupe grinned. “But I’ll make sure you’re ready to go.”

A lioness wearing a manager’s uniform approached their table. “Miss Vulpan,” she said, almost bowing, handing her a small clipboard.

“You’re sure everyone’s done, Miss Lewis?” Vil asked.

She bobbed her head. “I’m sure if someone orders something by now, we can just let it go,” she answered.

“You’re paying?” Kit asked curiously.

“Of course I am,” she said dismissively. She took a credit card from her small purse and put it on the clipboard, then handed it to her. “I’ll handle the tip with cash,” she added. “Could you have our servers come see me at once?”

“I’ll be right back with them, ma’am,” the lioness said, taking the card and clipboard and hurrying off.

“Your sister is very generous, Kit,” Rick said with a smile at her.

“I am where he’s concerned,” she grinned, pointing at Kit. “Did you send your projections for next year?”

“I’m not done with them yet.”

“Projections?” Kit asked curiously, looking up at his boss.

“I told you, Kit, I’ve invested in the magazine. All that equipment wasn’t free. Rick keeps me up to speed on the magazine’s business health. I watch over it the same way I do my other business investments.”

“But she doesn’t interfere,” Rick said quickly.

“Oh no, never that. So far, I’ve seen an increase in profits since I invested in the magazine, and that’s what I want to see. Soon, the magazine will be ready to expand.”

“I’ve been considering it,” Rick said. “Increasing our circulation, maybe taking on another new hire and expanding our pages per issue. We’re almost ready for it.”

“Well, I know you’ve been considering it. Hell, I’ll be first to admit that we needed Sheila. She took a lot of pressure off the office.”

“I’ll need to replace her soon, she’ll go back home after your stepmother leaves Boston, so I’ve talked to the journalism department at U.T. over offering internships for the students that gives them capstone credit.”

“That’s not a bad idea,” Kit noted. “You get a free worker, and they get real experience.”

“There is one problem, though,” he grunted. “Our current office is going to be too small. I’m afraid we’ll have to move to a new office.”

“And get out of my closet? I’d love that,” Kit laughed.

“Be glad you have that closet,” Rick said. “You and Mike are the only ones with your own offices outside of me. The gang doesn’t begrudge you two for it, because of what you do, but still, be thankful.”

“You’re talking to the right vixen, Rick,” Vil said. “I’ll make some inquiries and see if I can’t find you new office space that gives you room to grow and won’t cost you an arm and a leg. My name might take a little off the rent.”

“I’ll miss our building,” Rick sighed. “We’ve been there since we started. But the rest of the building is completely full. I already talked to the building manager about expanding or moving to new offices there in the building, but there’s just nowhere for us to go.”

“Well, we’ll get you going, Rick,” Vil smiled. “You’re one of my investments. I have to make sure you remain profitable.”

“I’ll call you about it after the wedding.”

The manager returned with the three servers that had been working their tables. Vilenne stood up and complemented them on doing a good job, and gave each of them a hundred dollar tip. Amanda looked ready to faint, thanking Vil about twenty times a second and all but bowing as they were herded away by the lioness. “Well, it’s about that time,” Vil said. “Are you ready to go, baby bro?”

“I guess so. It’s going to be lonely at home without Jessie.”

“Well, I think we can manage one more night alone, cause after tomorrow, we’ll always be together,” she said teasingly, kissing him on the cheek.

Kit again saw that look of disapproval flash through Aunt Sarah’s expression, but she said nothing.

They began filing out of the steakhouse, and Kit pulled Jessie aside by Rick’s car after they put her overnight bag and the things she’d bought at the mall she didn't want him to see in Rick's car. He held her close and kissed her lingeringly, then nuzzled her cheek. "This is it, Jessie," he breathed in her ear. "The next time we see each other, it'll be at the wedding."

"I can't wait," she whispered in his ear. "Tomorrow, you will be mine, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan."

"I've been yours since the day we met, Jessica Desdemona Vulpan," he answered honestly.

"Well, you'll be officially mine," she giggled, kissing him on the nose playfully, then she pulled his left paw up between them. "There's going to be a little something on this finger," she winked.

"I can go put it on right now," he offered.

"Don't you dare!" she laughed. "No jinxing!" She kissed him one more time, lingeringly, longingly, then she let go of him and got in the back seat of the car as Rick and Martha approached. Martha gave him a little hug and assured him it would be over before he knew it, then he stepped back and watched Rick back out of the parking space. They all waved to him as they pulled out, and he waved back and watched them go. She was on her way, and their separation made it clear that they were truly in the home stretch. By this time tomorrow, we'll be married and at the reception, he thought to himself, and that thought only made him smile eagerly.

He couldn't wait.

A paw touched him on the shoulder. He looked and saw that it was Vil, sliding it up until she had her paw around his shoulders and back. "We're almost there, baby bro," she told him. "Just a little bit more."

“I can’t wait,” he said honestly. “Thanks, sis.”

“For what?”

“For everything. And especially for keeping your meddling where I can’t see it.”

She laughed. “I told you I don’t take no for an answer,” she grinned. “I’ve been dealing with Rick for a good couple of months now, and he naturally keeps it hidden from you. I don’t do anything outrageous,” she assured him. “He keeps me up to speed on what he’s up to, basically.”

“Did you meddle with Lupe?”

“Huh?”

“He got a loan to expand the complex.”

She laughed. “Nope, I had nothing to do with that. I didn’t even know about it. He got that all on his own. But, I’ll have to look into it and see if I can’t make it smoother for him,” she winked.

“Well, that makes me strangely proud of him,” Kit laughed.

“I’d rather see you in a house.”

“Vil, we’re happy there,” Kit told her. “We have friends there, and I don’t have to mow the lawn or fix anything.”

“You don’t have to do any of that if you just say the word.”

“And give up my independence? No,” he said simply.

“You always were a headstrong young man,” Clancy chuckled as the aged fox came up to them.

“Ah, gonna talk now, Clancy?” Kit teased.

“You know your aunt and uncle consider me to be the hired help, my boy,” he said simply. “Vil had an argument with them just seating me at their table.”

“I should have guessed,” he grunted.

“Now, I need to go see what kind of horrible conditions you’ve put yourself in, Kitstrom. Take me to your apartment. We can sit down and talk and help while away the time until your wedding.”

“I’d love to,” he said. “Mind riding with me, Clancy?”

“It would be my pleasure.”

“I’ll be along in a bit,” Vil told them. “I can’t miss out on a little family reunion. There’s a few furs I want to talk to first.”

“Just don’t invite Sarah and Brian,” Kit warned. “I don’t want them anywhere near me.”

“I won’t,” Vil nodded.

Kit brought Clancy to his home, and after he inspected their apartment with a disdainful sniff, they sat down for tea. They talked of old times, happier times, and then Clancy told him what it was like in the manor now that everyone was gone from it. “It’s been taken over by your uncle Zachary,” he sighed. “Vil lives in her home in Chelmsford, and since it’s still owned by your family, there’s no one there for me to serve, as Zachary keeps his own staff in the west wing. There’s little he can do to us really, since the manor is still owned by your family. He’s brought in his staff to take care of the manor, but we are still charged with the upkeep of the east wing, so he leaves us to our amusements. So we keep your old apartments clean and the manor hosts some Vulpan family events, such as your cousin Travis' wedding in September. But the staff and I have little to do, really. We keep it clean and wait for Vil to decide when she will evict your uncle from your ancestral home."

"I'm surprised she hasn't done it already."

"Zachary wants to force Vilenne out of her position of power in the family, so he fights her in court over Stonebrook. He wants possession of it. As you know, whoever lives within Stonebrook has always been considered the head of the family, so Zachary tries to hold the manor for the status it gives. Vilenne prefers her home in Chelmsford because it is to her tastes, but she will not give the manor to him."

"Typical for the family," he sighed. "I'm glad I left it sometimes."

"Well, for one, I miss you, my boy," Clancy told him with a smile. "You certainly made life interesting around the manor."

"I missed you too, Clancy. You, Vil and Suzy were really the only friends I had. I wonder why she didn't sit with us."

"My boy, Suzy has had a crush on you since you were kids," Clancy told him. "The news that you were getting married was a mixed blessing to her. She's happy you've found happiness, but even now, she laments that she wasn't the one who captured your heart." He patted Kit's paw. "She's giving you space, my boy, both for you and for her."

"I didn't know she felt that way. She should have said something!"

"My boy, you forget," he sighed. "Your father would have had no qualms over destroying her family if she took up with you. That's why she always operated in secrecy, helping you while keeping it hidden. She had to keep her distance from you to protect her own family. But don't regret it too much, Kitstrom. Suzy is dating a wonderful fox that takes good care of her, and I think she'll be happy with him. She's just regretting the past rather than looking forward to the future."

"Well, I wish she would have said something. I knew she liked me, and we did have a—you know. A little fling. But she never hinted that she thought more of it than that."

"Before you begin to doubt, Kitstrom, answer yourself this. Are you unhappy at all you ended up with your cat than with Suzy?"

"Hell no!" he said immediately and adamantly. "Jessie is my life, Clancy! She's the femme I was put on this earth to marry!"

"Then don't worry a bit about Suzy. She is still your friend, and she always will be. She doesn't blame you, and she won't hate you. Just be her friend, my boy. You were fast friends before, you still can be."

"I—yeah, you're right. I love Suzy like a friend, and if I can, I'd like to be her friend again."

"You never were anything but her friend, Kitstrom. That never changed."

"Yeah. I do need to talk to her, though."

"That would be a good thing."

The doorbell rang, and Kit had to put a paw on Clancy's arm to keep him from going to answer it. "You're a guest here, Clancy," Kit chuckled. "It's open!" he shouted.

“Sorry, my boy, an old habit,” he chuckled.

Vil appeared in the doorway, along with Suzy, Sheila, and Muffy. They came in, and Kit stood up and greeted them. “Please, come in, I have some tea on,” he said.

“I hope it’s good tea,” Suzy grinned.

“As good as you’ll find for a poor fox in Texas,” he answered.

“It’s not bad. Not what I would expect, but not bad,” Clancy noted, taking another sip.

“Wow, it’s been years since I’ve seen some of these faces,” Suzy laughed, looking at Sheila and Kit. “And even long for others. When was the last time we saw each other, Muffy?”

“Seven or eight years,” she answered. “I think we only met once, at a party at Stonebrook. It was Vil’s eighteenth birthday. You still in school?”

“Me? No, I work at Yankee Bytes now,” she answered. “I’m the vice president in control over the stores in Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire.”

“Nice, that’s a lot of work.”

“Yeah, I know how Vil feels sometimes,” she laughed. “It’s pretty tough, but it’s rewarding. Dad’s been slowly pulling back and letting us kids run things. I think he wants to retire soon and enjoy the wealth he built up. Can’t blame him, really. I think he’s had all of one week off since he started the chain. He wanted to be here for the wedding, but he couldn’t make it. He’s negotiating to expand the franchise west.”

“Nice. Where?”

“Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia maybe. He doesn’t want to expand anywhere he has to change the store’s name,” she giggled. “Yankee is a slur in some places.”

“It is down here,” Kit chuckled.

“So, you’re marrying a cat, Kit,” Suzy said with a grin at him. “Did you pick her on purpose to piss off your family, or was it something you kinda stumbled into?”

Kit laughed. “It wasn’t deliberate.”

“Jessie’s an absolute doll, Suzy,” Vil told her. “Sweet, kind, a little shy, but once you get past her shell, she’s totally charming and lovable. Sometimes I think she’s way too good for a fox like my brother.”

“I’d have to agree with you sometimes,” Kit agreed.

“And to think, I missed my chance,” Suzy sighed, a little self-mockingly.

“Nah, I think you’d never have worked out, Suzy,” Vil told her seriously.

“It would have been nice to try,” Suzy said, giving Kit a coquettish look.

“Well, I’m sure Corey would object,” Vil grinned.

“Corey? Who’s that?” Muffy asked.

“Corey Reeves,” Sheila told her. “You know, the Reeves! Cape Cod Shipping?”

“Oh! Them! I’ve never heard of Corey,” she complained.

“He’s one of their cousins,” Suzy said. “He’s from California, not Nantucket. I met him at a mixer on Nantucket two years ago.”

“What does he do?”

“He’s a filmmaker,” she answered. “He hasn’t hit it big yet, but he has done some work on a few projects that got some attention at the Sundance Festival.” She laughed. “He directed a commercial for the shipping company that seemed to go over well. You know, the one with the bicycle that went a thousand miles an hour?”

Muffy gave her a look, then burst out laughing. “Oh, that commercial was hilarious! He did that?”

“He did,” she said proudly.

“I remember that commercial. Indeed, it was very funny,” Clancy chuckled in agreement.

“I guess we’d never see it down here,” Kit noted.

“Oh, it was great!” Muffy exclaimed. “It shows this guy on a bicycle going a thousand miles an hour, riding over the ocean while some narrator talks about overseas shipping and how you can do it cheap, then the bicycle comes up on the coast and rams a lighthouse!” All of them started to laugh. “And there’s this big hole shaped like a fox and a bicycle, while this old fox that was inside looks through it with this all confused expression on his face, then he looks back and sees the guy and his bicycle pasted on the other wall, flat as a board!”

“Then the narrator says over that, ‘save a lighthouse, go with Cape Cod Shipping’,” Vil laughed. “It was a very good commercial. I might have to talk to him to make a couple of shipyard commercials, put something fresh in it.”

“He’d probably go for it, Vil,” she told him.

“He’s a great guy,” Vil noted.

“Yeah, he’s a sweetie. But you always were my first love, Kit,” she admitted, reaching out and putting her paw on his arm. “I had the biggest crush on you when we were kids.”

“Yeah, we heard about that,” Sheila grinned. “We heard you’re the one that took his virginity.”

Suzy’s cheeks ruffled. “Well, I think we did do something like that back when we were kids,” she said with a naughty little smile, patting his arm fondly.

“So, was he any good?”

“That’s something you’ll never know, Sheila,” Suzy teased.

“And something you’d be wise to drop, so long as I have your mother’s number,” Clancy added, which made everyone but Sheila burst into laughter.

It was a good time. They talked for hours, well past sunset, drinking tea and talking of old times, and giving Suzy a chance to get familiar with Sheila and Muffy. No subject was left untouched, which surprised Kit, as they talked about his father and the fights between him and both his children, Kit’s leaving, and then him getting hit. “I carried so many messages to the hospital,” Suzy laughed. “I felt like a mailfur.”

“Suzy was my most frequent visitor,” Kit told his cousins. “Since Vil and Clancy couldn’t visit often or Dad would find out about it.”

“There wasn’t much to do for the first couple of months, cause Kit was always stoned out on the painkillers,” she sighed, holding the back of his paw as she remembered. “But after he got coherent again, it was nice to talk to him. I’d deliver Vil and Clancy’s messages, then take messages back for them.” Suzy turned his arm over to expose the white scars on his forearm, touching them with her finger. “Did they ever explain why these turned white?”

“Not really. They think the ones on my back were a reaction to the cauterizing scalpel they used. The only guess I heard that might make sense is that this was friction burns from sliding over the pavement after it hit me. It took some meat off my arm, and of course, it did this,” he said, pointing at his half-missing ear and the white streak in his hair just by his ear. “For some reason, Jessie’s totally fascinated by the scars on my back. She’s always touching them.”

“Compassion,” Vil told him. “The same reason Suzy’s tracing the scars on your forearm right now.”

Suzy gave a cough and quickly let go of his arm, which made Sheila and Muffy laugh.

While the girls continued to talk, Kit and Suzy took a walk in the courtyard, under the guise of showing it around to her. They walked in silence for a few minutes, then she took his paw. “I’m sorry if I embarrassed you, Kit,” she told him. “But I’ve always wanted to tell you that.”

“No, it’s alright. I just wish I would have known sooner.”

“Second thoughts?”

“Oh, hell no,” he chuckled. “But I think it would have been fair to give you the same chance Jessie had.”

“Aww, you’re sweet,” she said, kissing him on the cheek fondly. “Do you love her?”

“With all my heart,” he answered immediately.

“I’m glad to hear that. I really like Corey, Kit. I think there’s a chance there for love. He’s a wonderful boy, kind and caring, and right now it’s a long distance relationship while he’s shooting a movie in Mexico, but he does love me. So don’t you worry about me.”

“Do you love him?”

“I think I’m almost there,” she answered honestly. “I think about him all the time, and I miss him terribly. What is Jessie like?”

“Pretty much how Vil described,” he answered as they came around the corner, towards the back side of the complex where Sheila and Dan lived. “She’s very kind and sweet, and she’s also very shy and modest. She’s from a traditional family, so she’s a little old-fashioned in some regards, but she’s very strong, Suzy. She has steel in her, and even though she’s shy, I’ve seen her stand up when she felt it was necessary. She shouted down Aunt Sarah,” he said with pride in his voice.

“That take some guts alright,” Suzy laughed. “So, you’re marrying a prude?”

“She’s no prude in private,” Kit chuckled, nudging her. “And she’s loosening up a little. Sheila’s been working on her.”

“Oh my!” Suzy laughed. “Do they get along?”

“Amazingly, yes. Jessie thinks of Sheila as a little lost puppy she needs to nurture. Sheila loves Jessie, says she’s a lot of fun and she’s a wonderful friend. She is, too. She’ll give you the last dime in her pocket if you need it. She has a big heart.”

“She has big boobs too,” Suzy noted clinically. “Bigger than mine.”

Kit laughed. “Those are just an added bonus,” he grinned. “She’s fun to tease. I get into a lot of trouble doing that,” he said slyly. “Her weapon of choice is a pillow, and she’s deadly with it.”

“You like being a tease,” she grinned.

“Yeah, guess I am,” he noted. “I used to tease you enough.”

“It was fun though,” she said with a smile. “Kit?”

“Yeah?”

“Do you miss us?”

“Of course I do,” he told her. “You were my first girlfriend, Suzy. You were my first lover, too. I still get excited at the thought of leather sofas, thanks to you.”

Suzy laughed, leaning against him.

“But, even though it’s the past, and I’m about to get married, and you have a boyfriend, I’d still like to be your friend. I want to send you stupid birthday cards, and come hang out with you when I’m in the neighborhood when I’m at Boston, and I’d like you to get to know Jessie and hopefully come to love her as much as you love me. Now that it looks like the sword of Damocles that my family put over my head is being removed, I’d like to invite you back into my life, Suzy...just in a new role, that's all. If you don't mind just being friends."

"Just friends is fine with me, Kit," she told him as they turned back towards his apartment. "It's just fine with me."

Chapter 17

It was the first day of the rest of his life.

This was it. The day. The day that would change his life—for the better, as far as he was concerned. He hadn't woken up on the day he was disowned, or the day he was hit by the car with the same feeling of the inevitability of change, but then again, had he known what was coming on those days, he'd never have gotten out of bed. Today, he would be married. Today, he would stand at an altar and before God and recite irrevocable vows binding himself to the femme he loved, taking her to be his wife.

It was strange, really. Jessie and Kit were already virtually married. They lived together, and shared their lives with each other completely. They were completely entwined with each other, from sharing a bed to sharing bank accounts, living as married couples lived and having done so for nearly two months. A marriage between them was almost a technicality, and yet Kit was looking forward to it more than he'd ever looked forward to anything in his life.

It was the officiality of it, he guessed. They'd be moral, as Jessie jokingly put it the day before, living the way society expected them to live. They'd be publicly declaring their commitment to each other, standing up and telling the world that they had chosen to be together, to be a family rather than a pair. Jessie wouldn't be his girlfriend, she'd be his wife.

Wife. Just thinking about that sent a thrill through him. Jessie would be his wife. She would be giving him the one thing she could give him that she hadn't given him already, a family. It would be just her to start off, but with luck and God's favor, they'd have babies to increase their family. Both sides of their family seemed prodigious when it came to kids, so it was a good sign. Kit hoped they had lots of kids, and Jessie wanted to be pregnant already, so she shared his desire for children.

He looked at his clock. 5:27am. He rose up a little and looked at Jessie's clock, on the other side of the bed on her nightstand. 5:32am. Jessie liked to set her clocks a couple minutes fast to motivate her to get out of bed without being late, because when she just woke up she didn't remember that the clock was fast. He laid back and felt how empty the bed was, how hard it had been to sleep without her there with him. He kept reaching out for her in his sleep, and when his paw found nothing but empty bed, it woke him up.

There was no reason to even try to go back to sleep. He knew it would be absolutely impossible. He got up, sitting on the edge of the bed for a moment as he shook off the last of the grogginess, then stood up and stretched. His back popped loudly, and he almost expected Jessie to give a squeal at that sound; it always creeped her out. He also almost expected a teasing complement of his butt or hear her slide across the bed and put her paw on him as she loved to do in the morning. Jessie was a very tactile femme, almost needing to touch and be touched.

But there were none, because she wasn't here. She was at Rick and Martha's, and he'd bet that she was already awake and getting down to the business of getting ready.

Kit needed to as well.

He attended that business. He wandered sleepily into the kitchen and started the teapot, turned on the radio to listen to the news, then wandered back to the bedroom. After checking for the thousandth time to make sure the rings were still sitting on the dresser, he put on a robe, went back out, turned off the alarm, and picked up the newspaper off the porch. He sat down and tried to relax with a cup of tea and the newspaper, but it was almost impossible. All he could do was wish it was time to go already, and he had over six hours to go!

It startled him when the phone rang. He had to go back to the bedroom to get it, and saw that it was Jessie's phone calling him. It could be Jessie, or someone in the house. "Hello?"

"Today you will be mine," came Jessie's playful voice.

"Isn't this bad luck?" he asked.

"Only if you see me before the ceremony," she giggled in reply. "Did you sleep?"

"Not much. You?"

"A little," she answered. "I was too excited to sleep."

"I just couldn't sleep without you here," he sighed.

"What, you're not happy to marry me?" she asked archly, then she laughed before he could reply. "I'm about to take a shower."

"Then why did you call me?" he asked.

"Because I wanted to talk to you, silly," she laughed. "Do I need a reason to want to talk to my husband?"

"Aaat, you can't call me that yet," he teased.

“Forget the rules,” she giggled. “I’m exercising my option to just go ahead and call you that. It’s a guarantee, after all. There’s no way you’re getting away from me now,” she said in a purring voice. “Because everyone’s here, it’s the day of our wedding, and they’ll drag you to the altar if you try to back out.”

“You make it sound like I’m against the idea,” he challenged.

“You’re a boy,” she said simply. “You were getting it all without marrying me, you know, a cook and a housekeeper and a sex kitten. Never know, you mighta decided you liked not paying for it and tried to run at the last second.”

Kit laughed. She tried to sound all serious, but she just couldn’t do it.

“Someday you’ll learn how to lie,” he teased.

“God, I hope not,” she giggled. Kit heard a muffled voice in the background. “Mom, stop being a silly goose. I’m in my own bedroom!” she said away from the phone. “Mom just walked in,” she told him. “I’m sitting at this antique makeup table, and I’m not wearing anything,” she said in a husky voice.

“I’ve created a monster,” he teased with a laugh.

“It is your fault. I never slept without clothes until I moved in with you, now I can’t stand even wearing panties when I go to bed,” she laughed. “No, I’m not teasing him, Mom. It is his fault, isn’t it?”

Kit laughed.

“Well, Mom’s already eyeing the dress, so I think I’m in for four hours of fitting,” she sighed. She was silent a moment, then laughed. “No, a light breakfast, then two hours of meticulous preparation, then two hours of putting on my dress, then we go,” she recited as Hannah’s voice droned in the background, then she giggled. “She said I have to be absolutely perfect, and so do you. So she says get in the shower and spend at least an hour combing your fur before getting dressed for the wedding.” She laughed again. “She said if you fail her inspection, she won’t let you marry me.”

“Oh dear, sounds like I’d better start getting ready,” he said dryly. “Maybe I’ll go get my fur shaved off, that way I don’t have to worry about how it looks.”

Jessie almost dropped the phone as he heard her laughing. “If you do that, I won’t let you marry me,” she retorted. “He said he’s going to have his fur shaved off so he doesn’t have to comb it,” she told her mother. Then she laughed again. “Mom says it’ll be an improvement.”

“Tell her I’ll give her an improvement at the reception,” he said with a chuckle. “But I’ll leave you to your mother’s tender mercy. Such as it is. I sense a long bath in your future, along with two hours of combing fur,” he teased.

“I don’t mind. I want to be beautiful today,” she purred to him.

“I keep telling you, if you want to look beautiful to me, go naked.”

She laughed. “I want to look beautiful to more than just you,” she corrected.

“I think all the males would side with me.”

“Well, they can go home and cry,” she said tauntingly, then he heard a scraping sound.

“That’s about enough, Kit. She’s still my daughter until one o’clock, so I’m taking her from you now,” Hannah told him.

“Make her pretty, Hannah,” Kit told her.

“Even if I have to get plaster and spray paint,” she said, which made Kit break down in helpless laughter as she hung the phone up.

He chuckled as he put the phone on the table, then went back to his paper to try to calm down and forget the magnitude of the day...if only because he had so long to wait before it started getting important.

He wasn’t left alone long, though. Sheila came over about half an hour after Jessie called and talked him into going to the Y with her. They played racquetball for about an hour as she kept teasing him over the impending wedding, until he intentionally whacked her with a racquetball after a serve. But, the exercise did give him something to do, and it was good to banter with his cousin while doing it. When they got home, it was almost nine, and that was close enough, at least to him, to start getting ready. He took a very long, thorough shower, and after getting out and drying off, he did more or less as Hannah ordered and sat down with a comb. But he forgot to lock the door, and Sheila was ever one to impose if she found the door unlocked. “Woo, sexy,” she teased as she came to the bedroom door and saw him sitting on the bed. She was dressed in a little satin red dress that had a very short skirt and managed to show off her cleavage, along with a rather saucy little hat that had a fluff of red lace around its fringe. “Want some help?”

“Help with what?”

“With what you can’t reach, goof,” she teased, coming over and quite deliberately pushing him onto his stomach on the bed. He felt a little weird laying there as Sheila began pulling the comb through the fur on his shoulders, but she wasn't doing or saying anything strange, so he let it go. He did jump a bit when she dared to comb the fur on his backside and the base of his tail, but she moved on to his tail, pulling the comb through the thick fur on his tail slowly but thoroughly, teasing every strand of fur into perfect position, even teasing the black tip just over the white band before licking her fingers and pressing it to a perfect point. "There, now that's a gorgeous tail," she said critically, pushing it aside before pulling the comb through the fur on the back of his leg.

"Kit! Brah, you here?" Lupe shouted from the front door.

"We're in the bedroom!" Sheila shouted in reply, and put a paw on the small of his back when he moved to get up. "I'm not done with you yet," she told him.

"But—"

"Yo, brah, I didn't know you were kissing cousins!" Lupe said with a laugh from the doorway. He was wearing a dark blue zoot suit-like suit of all things, but he looked astounding. The suit fit him perfectly, with its perfectly fitted pants, blue shirt and vest with a pocket watch chain stretched across the front, and long, knee-length jacket with suspenders and a wide red tie, and he looked amazingly dapper and suave in it. He completed his stylish look with a fedora tilted ever-so-slightly over his right eye. In a way, he looked like a throwback to the swing era, but he looked very nice. The style and look was perfect for him, and he looked more handsome than Kit ever believed a chihuahua could appear.

"Lupe, you look awesome!" Sheila told him honestly.

"Aww, thanks babe," he said modestly. "What are you doing to him anyway?"

“Combing his fur,” she said simply. “This is his wedding, brah, he’s gotta look his absolute best. That includes a full body comb.”

“Brah, your cousin is doing it,” Lupe chuckled.

“If I wasn’t a relative, he’d be spending too much time keeping my paws off his butt,” Sheila said simply, which made Lupe laugh. “That’s why he’s safe with me doing it.” Then, if only to tease him, she patted his bare backside fondly, which made Lupe explode into laughter.

“Sheila, get on with it,” Kit told her dryly.

“I’m just working up to where you turn over,” she said, blowing a kiss to him when he looked over his shoulder at her.

“Well, I was gonna see if you needed my help with anything, but you look good to go,” Lupe noted.

“I’m going to need a ride to the church.”

“You’re not riding in Lupe’s old truck,” Sheila said sternly. “You’re riding in style, cousin. You’re going in my Mustang!”

“I’m going to kick both your butts if you don’t clear out and let me finish getting ready,” he told them. “I can get the rest of it, Sheila. Thanks for the help.”

“He uses me then throws me away,” she sighed. “I’d better warn Jessie that she’s next.”

“You won’t say a thing like that around Hannah,” Kit said with dead seriousness in his voice. “That’s one of her major buttons, Sheila. Don’t ever even joke about something like that in front of her. Do you understand?”

“Yeah, sure, Kit. Why is she like that?”

“Because she thinks I’m going to lose interest in Jessie and leave her,” he answered honestly.

“That’s like impossible, brah,” Lupe chuckled.

“Tell that to an obsessive mother, Lupe,” Kit answered.

“Eh, true. Come on, babe, let’s go give Kit some space so he don’t dress to an audience.”

Kit combed his front himself, brushed his teeth, then meticulously dressed in the tuxedo Vil had made for him. It took him about half an hour to be dressed to his satisfaction, only leaving the spats that would go over the tops of his feet off. He’d put those on at the church. He carefully combed and styled his hair, a rare instance where he’d use hair spray. He then inspected himself in the mirror and found that he looked presentable.

He was straightening his tie when his phone rang. He picked it up and unfolded it after seeing that it was Vil. “Hey sis,” he said. “I’m getting ready now.”

“Good, cause I’m in the limo on my way to pick you up,” she answered. “Clancy and Suzy are with me, so you need to be presentable.”

“I’m done dressing,” he told her calmly. “Just making sure I did it right.”

“Clancy says he’ll make sure of that when he gets there,” Vil chuckled, then she hung up.

They got there about five minutes later. Clancy immediately took him to task for his terrible dressing of himself, then carted him to the bedroom and helped him dress again, this time the way he was supposed to do it. He didn't really see much difference when he emerged from the bedroom about ten minutes later, but Kit had the feeling that Clancy had been looking forward to the idea of helping Kit don his tuxedo, and was going to do just that. Vil and Suzy whistled at him when Clancy brought him back out, Vil even making him turn around to look him over. "They did a good job on that tux," she noted. "And you remembered to comb your tail," she winked.

"Sheila did that, actually," he admitted.

"Well, you look very handsome, Kit," Suzy told him with a smile.

"She did a good job," Vil nodded. "Okay, where are the gifts you're taking to Cincinnati? I'll have them shipped up for you."

"In my truck still," he answered.

"Where are your suitcases?"

"In the bedroom."

"Everything packed?"

"I'm pretty sure. I have a carry-on bag for our necessities and cameras. I want to use them at the reception."

"Okay, you got the rings?"

"They're in the bedroom."

"Go get 'em, bro, I'll have Stav get your suitcases and we're on our way."

"Hold on, I need to give my keys to Lupe," he said. "He's going to watch over our cars and the apartment while we're away. He's gonna clear out the fridge for us, which for him means he'll eat it all," he chuckled. "That's okay, though, it'd go to waste otherwise."

After Kit got the rings and dropped his keys off with Lupe, and Sheila objected to Vil taking Kit to the church which Vil dismissed scornfully, they were in Vil's limo and on the way. He felt...giddy. This was it. They were going to the church, and in about ninety minutes, the ceremony would begin.

He was so excited he could barely sit still.

They arrived at the church at 11:45am, an hour and fifteen minutes before the ceremony. Monsignor Duke was there, wearing his canonical attire, which Kit felt was sure to rile Jessie's parents a little bit. But he gave them a warm smile as they came into the church, and Kit had to stop and gape. The church was unbelievable! Flowers were absolutely everywhere, yellow and pink arrangements side by side with blue and lavender arrangements, and the entire area behind the altar was a literal wall of floral beauty. The pews were decorated with tiny bouquets and gentle yellow and soft blue ribbons, using their favorite colors. Yellow was Jessie's favorite color, and blue was his. A red carpet had been laid down the center aisle, and there were even floral curtains hanging off the balcony's railing at the back of the chapel. The walls had white and yellow wall floral arrangements, with tassels dangling from them, hanging under the stained glass windows, and there were huge wreaths of yellow roses flanking each side of the altar.

The decorations were amazing! The church was absolutely gorgeous!

"It's beautiful," Kit whispered as he looked around.

“Yes, they did a great job, didn’t they?” Vil said approvingly as she looked around. “Glad you didn’t get interested and it was a surprise?” she grinned.

“Actually, I am,” he said honestly.

“What company did this, Vil?” Suzy asked. “If Corey ever asks, I might contract them. They did a fantastic job!”

“It’s a local place,” Vil said. “But they had very high recommendations.”

“I dare say those accolades are well deserved,” Clancy said with an approving nod.

“Quite lovely, isn’t it?” the monsignor said happily. “They’ll grace our church for days and enrich it with their beauty and fragrance.”

The raccoons from Tricoon were already here, and the female of the three siblings was snapping quite a few photos of the arrangements while the church was still empty, as one of the males swept a very professional-looking camera about on his shoulder, panning through the church to capture it on film. The femme raccoon was wearing a very pretty dark gray satin dress with straps reaching from the bodice to her upper arms, but the dress looked comfortable and well suited for a femme that would be moving around a great deal. The male was wearing a black suit with a gray tie.

“Now, my son, you have to stay out of the front part of the church,” the monsignor said with a smile. “Miss Williams is already here, and is currently in the front antechamber dressing room being preened and prepared for the ceremony. She arrived about a half hour ago,” he informed them.

“I brought her here in the limo, then came to get you,” Vil grinned. “I already have your limo positioned, and it’s not gonna move til you get in it to go to the reception. I don’t want anyone trying to take its spot. I got you a nice white stretch, you’ll ride in style,” she chuckled.

“If you wish to sit down or rest, we have a nice waiting room right through that door there,” he said as he pointed to the door on the left side of the choral box behind the altar. “There’s also a restroom back there you can use, if necessary. I’m afraid until we start preparing for the ceremony, there’s little for you to do,” he smiled.

“Except be nervous,” Suzy laughed.

“I’m too excited to be nervous,” Kit snorted.

Kit was too keyed up to sit around and wait, so he spent most of the early time talking to Vil, Clancy, and Suzy. As they got closer and closer to the ceremony, however, friends and family began to show up, and Kit made a point to greet them and talk with them a few moments. A whole lot of strangers also showed up, people he didn’t know, who didn’t greet him as they came in. Kit had no idea who they are, but they were dressed to be here, so they had to be friends and relatives of the gang or Kevin or Lupe or the guys from the apartment complex. The place really began to fill up, nearly three quarters full, but Kit saw that everyone he knew was already here...almost. He hadn’t seen Mickey or Kevin yet, but they may have slipped in without Kit seeing them. Several strangers filed by as he greeted his cousin Muffy. Muffy seemed a bit confused when she arrived and didn’t find Kit and Jessie at the entry to the chapel to greet them, giving him a strange look when he took her paw near the back of the chapel. “What’s going on, did she back out or something?” she asked.

“It’s not a Catholic ceremony, cousin, she’s not going to come out into public until it starts,” he told her.

“Oh. I was expecting to greet you at the door,” she grinned.

“Nah, it’s a more protestant ceremony to appease her parents,” he told her. “I start the ceremony already at the altar and everything.”

“Ah, okay. Now I know what to expect,” she giggled. “I’m surprised the father agreed to do it in a Catholic church.”

“He was amenable to it, actually,” Kit told her.

“Can I go see her and say hi before we start?” she asked.

“I guess so, she’s back in the waiting room back there,” he said, pointing to the right side of the back of the church. “The only one not allowed to see her really is me,” he grinned.

He went through that again almost immediately with Sarah and Brian, with whom Muffy had driven to the church. “Where on earth is your bride?” Brian asked as Sarah looked a little happy. “And why aren’t you and the Monsignor at the door greeting the guests?”

“Jessie’s hiding,” he answered. “We’re not having a traditional Catholic ceremony because she and her parents aren’t Catholic, and her parents didn’t want a Catholic ceremony.”

“What? This is a Catholic church!” Sarah said in a scandalized tone.

“Yes, that’s the compromise we reached,” Kit told her calmly. “Catholic church, Catholic priest, but a Protestant-style ceremony. And before you say another word, the Monsignor fully agreed to do this for us.”

“Why I never!” she said gratingly.

“If you cause a scene, I’ll have Vil skin you, Aunt Sarah,” Kit warned in an ugly tone.

“No, I’ll hold my tongue, nephew,” she said, taking a cleansing breath. “I should not have made assumptions. Which side is your side?”

“The right, naturally,” he said.

“May we sit in the front row?” Brian asked, quite cordially.

Kit considered it for a moment, then sighed and nodded. “There won’t really be anyone in it anyway, but mind that I gave the photographer permission to sit there too when not taking pictures.”

“We’ll save her a spot between us and the children,” Brian nodded.

Rick arrived almost immediately afterward. Kit shook his paw, then fished the two black velvet boxes out of his pocket. “Here, these are your job,” he said with a grin.

“I remember the rehearsal, son,” he chuckled. “You ready?”

“I was ready a month ago. I just want this to be done.”

“Stagefright?”

“No, I just want to be married.”

Rick laughed. “Here’s hoping that feeling never fades, son.”

“Amen, Rick. Amen.”

Sandy and Sam came out from Jessie’s waiting room. Both of them were wearing lovely yellow satin dresses with a modest neckline, flared sleeves with actual goring in them, gored with brocade, and with lace floral designs flowing down the bodice and along the outside edges of the skirts.

Kit accepted a kiss on the cheek from each of them. “Hannah sent us out to see if all the participants are here yet,” Sam told him.

“You’re here, I’m here, Rick’s here, John’s here, all the altar people are here,” he replied. “We got, what?”

“Twenty minutes,” Sandy said, checking her watch. “Is the piano player here?”

“I, I’m not sure, I have no idea who that is,” Kit said, looking around.

“He’s here,” Rick said, pointing to a tall bear talking with the monsignor on the other side of the chapel.

“Then everyone’s here,” Sam noted as Kevin entered the chapel and hurried right over to them. He kissed Sam on the cheek.

“Sorry, I had a little problem at my apartment. I had a broken water pipe greet me this morning,” he grunted.

“On no! Is everything alright?”

“For me, yeah. It was behind my bathroom wall. The apartment downstairs got soaked though,” he sighed. “It ruptured early this morning and had to have been pouring water into their apartment for a good half hour before they realized it.”

“Ouch. So, plumbers are there?” Kit asked.

“As we speak,” he nodded. “They fixed the pipe just as I left, and were working to put the wall back in. But there was some damage downstairs, they’ll have to replace some wallboard and dry out the carpets down there.”

“Well, that’s good at least,” Kit said. “I’m just glad you could make it.”

“My lawfirm’s senior partners are here, and Sam invited me, so they’re not riding me for missing work today,” he laughed, pointing at some furs in the pews already. “You’d think that Austin bigwigs would miss something like this?”

“What do you mean?”

“Look there,” he said, pointing. Kit followed his gaze.

Sitting a few rows back from the front, on the groom’s side of the aisle, was a slender, handsome badger. He was Rick Perry, the Governor of Texas!

Kit gaped. “Nobody ever said he was coming!” he gasped.

“He probably wanted to keep it quiet,” Kevin chuckled. “When the memo was spread about the wedding at the firm, we were warned specifically not to make the wedding public knowledge, not to talk to the press about it. Orders straight from the Vulpan family, the memo said. No doubt your sister made it clear that anyone who came had better not make a media circus out of it, because of just who’s getting married. But not to show up would be a big snub to the Vulpan family, and you do not snub the Vulpans. Not even half a nation away from their power base, not when they have steel mills, coke plants, and other businesses operating in your state, you don’t.” He chuckled. “It hasn’t gone totally under the radar, though. There were two news trucks out in front of the church when I pulled up.”

“I never even thought of that,” Kit sighed.

“I’ll guarantee they won’t be allowed inside,” Kevin chuckled.

“I don’t remember seeing those names on the guest list.”

“Vilene Vulpan invited our senior partners,” Kevin told him. “I’d guess she has her own guest list, and names like Governor Perry and Senator Hutchison are on it,” he noted, pointing towards the back of the chapel. A middle-aged femme ferret was walking down the aisle, wearing a sober gray dress and blazer. It was Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas. “I’ve seen a couple of state Senators and Congressman Lamar Smith in the pews too. We’re in Smith’s district,” he said when Sam and Sandy gave him curious looks.

Senator Hutchison came up to him and offered her hand. “Congratulations, Mister Vulpan,” she said in a stately voice. “I’m happy to be invited to your special occasion.”

Kit laughed ruefully. “I think you need to thank my sister for that, not me,” he admitted. “I had no idea you’d be here, Senator.”

“Well, I hope you won’t throw me out,” she said with a disarming smile.

Kit laughed. “No ma’am, we have plenty of room in the chapel for you.”

“It’s getting a little crowded in here, though,” she noted with a smile. “A few familiar faces to me.”

“They were stealth invited by my sister as well,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, I hope you don’t object to us being here,” she said with a compassionate look.

“No, not at all, not at all,” he assured her. “As long as you remember this is a family ceremony, not a public one.”

“Yes, Vilenne made that clear when she invited me,” she nodded. “This is a private affair. I didn’t even put my trip back to Texas on my schedule until yesterday, and didn’t disclose why,” she said with a knowing smile.

“Thank you for that discretion,” Kit said honestly. “Me and my bride are actually very private people. I just have bad luck when it comes to family, and she has the bad luck of being my bride.”

“She wouldn’t call it bad luck,” the Senator laughed. “If you’ll excuse me, I’ll take a seat now. We’ll be starting soon, won’t we?”

“About ten minutes, ma’am,” Rick told her.

“Well, I’m nervous now,” Kit said with a laugh as the Senator went over and sat beside the Governor.

“I think I’ll have Barry ambush them on the way out as part of our article about your wedding,” Rick chuckled. “Oh, that reminds me, I need to go make sure Mike and Lilly got pictures of Jessie in her dress. Be back in a minute,” he said, hurrying off.

Sam and Sandy stayed with him for a moment and chatted until the Monsignor motioned to them. They came to him, and he put his paw on Kit’s shoulder. “It’s about time, my son,” he said. “I’ve sent an altar boy back to give Jessica the five minute warning. If you would, please take the seats behind the altar until it’s time to begin. Where’s Rick?”

“He went to go talk to Jessie real quick, father,” Sam told him. “Your messenger should run into him.”

Kit, Sam, and Sandy went and sat on the bench behind the altar, which seemed to quiet down the chapel...which was packed. There were still a few stragglers hurrying in and finding seats, but every pew was either completely full or nearly full. Their wedding was playing to a full house! Rick joined them a moment later, sitting down by Kit, and he doublechecked that he had the rings in his pocket, they were set to hand out properly, and were clean and otherwise ready for use. Kit was almost unable to sit still, his tail writhing behind him, he was so excited and anxious to get started. They were almost there! He forced himself to calm down. We're here, and I don't want to look like a spaz on the video and pictures, he told himself. Just calm down. We're here and it's happening. Just enjoy the moment.

Two altar boys appeared at the back end of the chapel and took up positions at each side of the doors leading into the chapel. That was the signal that the bride was in position and ready to begin. Two more furs hurried in past the altar boys and quickly took seats at the very back of the chapel as the Monsignor approached the altar from the side and stepped up onto the dais, then motioned to those sitting behind it. That was their cue to get into position. Kit and Rick stood to the left side of the Monsignor, and Sam and Sandy stood a bit off to his right, leaving an open space for Jessie to stand by Kit's side before the priest. Two of Jessie's cousins appeared in the doorway at the end of the aisle, two adorable little femme kittens, gray-furred sisters who had been pressed into service to be flower girls in a last-minute change to the ceremony. They were holding little baskets in their paws, and they stood there in fidgety silence as they waited for the music to start. The femme raccoon snapped a few photos of the groom, best male, and bridesmaids before the ceremony began, all of them looking back down the aisle in expectation. Hannah appeared on the right side of the chapel and scurried down to the front row, then took her seat quickly on the left pew, leaving the spot immediately by the aisle open for her husband, who would take that seat after giving Jessie away.

The Monsignor nodded to his right, and the bear made a show of sitting down at the organ. The music began seconds later, and Kit felt a strange sense of relief, not nervousness, to know that the ceremony had now officially begun.

Almost every head in the church turned and looked back as the bridal march began, and Jessie didn't disappoint. She appeared from the side and stopped at the doorway for a moment as the femme raccoon and quite a few others took pictures of her, and Kit was absolutely amazed by how radiantly beautiful she and her gown was, even from that distance. Her gown was a traditional wedding dress, made of glowing white satin and a modest neckline, but with a lacy material that filled the gap from her bodice to her neck. The sleeves of her gown were satin, but sequined with embroidery, almost looking either gored with brocade or brocade themselves, though from that distance he couldn't make out their patterns. The bodice had a slender stomacher belt that circumnavigated her waist, embroidered with a rose, and the gown flowed down into a full skirt that dragged the floor, complete with a train. Jessie's hair was done in a beautiful wavy style, curling around her little tiara that held her veil in place, a veil of diaphanous lace that did little to hide the perfectly prepared face beneath it. Jessie had make-up on, but only just enough to accent her natural beauty, rather than trying to induce beauty that didn't already exist. She carried a bouquet of yellow roses and lilies, and her father, dressed in a black tuxedo that closely matched the tuxedos worn by Kit and Rick, had her paw on his forearm.

She was, by far, the most beautiful femme he'd ever seen in his life, or would ever see. She was an angel, and earthbound angel, gracing them all with her radiance and perfection.

The march part of the music began, and John escorted his daughter down the aisle in step with the music, treading on yellow rose petals strewn in their path by the flower girls. Every eye in the chapel followed them as they solemnly came down the aisle, as flashbulbs flashed everywhere in the audience, which was actually quite against tradition and custom. But Jessie was so beautiful, the guests forgot themselves and took pictures of her. The femme raccoon, Violet, snapped a few pictures of them as they approached, then melted out of the way as John led Jessie to the altar. He didn't step up upon it. He paused at the edge of the dais, then helped her step up onto it and beside Kit, who gave her a gentle, loving smile and accepted her paw from John. John then silently retreated to his seat, and they turned to face the Monsignor.

“Today, we come together to celebrate the union of this fox and this cat, as they publicly declare the love they share for one another and stand before God to exchange vows of holy matrimony,” the Monsignor called in a powerful yet gentle voice. “It is the most beautiful and wonderful thing a priest can do to perform this happy sacrament...or what would be a sacrament for me most of the time,” he said with a light smile, which produced a few chuckles from the Catholic members of the congregation. “But today's service will be as unique as those I join today into the vows of marriage. He, is a fox. She, is a cat. Different species, different families, different faiths and different traditions, but they teach us all that love is a universal joy, available to all, shared by all, and given to all, just as God shines his love down upon every species on Earth. Does it matter that he is a fox, and she is a cat? Some may say so,” he said, his glance ghosting over Sarah and Brian, “but some would say no. And while it is not our place to judge the will of God, we can all stand forth here today and bless the love this fox and this cat, this male and this female, profess before us and before God in this, the most joyful of all ceremonies of our Christian faith.”

Kit zoned out slightly as the Monsignor continued to speak about love and devotion, faith in God and the joys of family, devotion, and togetherness. He was lost in Jessie’s blue eyes, gazing lovingly into his own through her veil. She was so beautiful! And in just a matter of moments, they would be married, they would be a family, and she would be his for the rest of their lives.

God, he couldn’t wait!

He blinked when he realized he’d lost about five minutes of ceremony gazing into Jessie’s eyes, for the Monsignor began the vows. “Do you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan, take this femme to be your wedded wife in the eyes and laws of God and fur? Do you promise to love her and support her, nurture her, honor her and cherish her, stand together with her for richer and poorer, through happiness and despair, through triumph and tribulation, and through sickness and health, for as long as you both shall live?”

“I do,” he said with quiet conviction, though his voice resounded throughout the chapel.

“And do you, Jessica Desdemona Williams, take this male to be your wedded husband in the eyes and laws of God and fur? Do you promise to love him and support him, nurture him, honor him and cherish him, stand together with him for richer and poorer, through happiness and despair, through triumph and tribulation, and through sickness and health, for as long as you both shall live?”

She paused for just long enough to make him look her in the eyes. “I do,” she said with a radiant smile.

Rick stepped forward and handed Kit Jessie's ring. "Take this ring, and place it on her finger as you utter to her these words; 'with this ring, I thee wed'."

Kit slid the ring onto her finger with a gentle smile. "With this ring, I thee wed."

Rick handed Kit's ring to Jessie. "Take this ring, and place it on his finger as you utter to him these words; 'with this ring, I thee wed'."

Jessie took his paw and put the ring at the end of his finger, then slowly, almost leisurely, slid it up the length of his finger. "With this ring, I thee wed," she said with a slightly impish smile.

Monsignor Duke raised his arms to each side of the couple, then put his paws on their shoulders and urged them together. "Then it is my happy honor to pronounce you Kitstrom and Jessica Vulpan, husband and wife, bound by the vows to Almighty God and brought together in the presence of this joyful congregation," he proclaimed. "What we have witnessed and God has blessed, may no fur bring asunder. You may kiss the bride," he said, taking a single step back. "Carefully," the Monsignor whispered, which produced a giggle from his new bride.

Jessie beamed at him when he lifted her veil, as the applause seemed to fade away to silence as the world contracted down into that moment. It was done. They were married. The waiting was over, and now they were husband and wife. There was only one thing left to do, and Jessie looked up at him with adoring eyes, inviting him. She put her paws on his shoulders, he pulled her into a gentle embrace, and he leaned down and kissed her. It was an exquisite kiss, tender and gentle, sweet and touching, professing to her all the love he felt for her in his heart. He felt her quiver against him, felt her respond to that declaration of love as she felt him tell her with his kiss how much he loved her.

It wasn't Kit that nearly ended up on the floor, it was Jessie. She clung to him for dear life as the kiss ended, gazing up into his eyes with almost tearful adulation, then they remembered themselves and looked back to the congregation. They were on their feet, clapping and applauding as flashbulbs went off everywhere. Violet, the raccoon, was kneeling in the aisle before them, taking picture after picture, as Mike and Lilly joined her to stay out of the line of sight of the video camera at the back of the aisle. Kit felt Jessie shudder slightly, and realized that she seemed a little surprised by something...probably all the flashes half-blinding them. Kit and Jessie remembered to stay there until Violet cleared the aisle, which was their cue they could move. When she did so, they strode down the aisle with her paw on his arm as guests reached out and patted them on the shoulders or shook their paws, but those guests did not get in their way. They strode back to the antechamber between the entrance and the chapel, and there they paused while quite a few furs snapped photos of them, and one of the raccoon brothers hurried out with a video camera, taking footage of them posing for their final pictures before leaving the chapel, as guests rushed past them to take up positions for the customary send-off to their car, pawfuls of birdseed ready to cast upon them; Texas had banned the use of rice because it killed birds who ate it, so it had become the new custom to throw a special kind of white birdseed that resembled rice but was no danger to the birds. They were waved forward, and Jessie laughed delightedly as they were showered with birdseed as they came down the stairs of the church, then reached the sidewalk leading around the church and followed it. More furs had come out of the side doors and were positioned there, continuing to shower them with birdseed and congratulate them, giving them a constant shower of seed until they reached the parking lot. Stav and Marcus, Vilenne's bodyguards, were flanking the open door of a white limo. They both bowed quite ceremonially as Kit and Jessie reached them, and one of them offered his paw to help Jessie into the limo. Kit collected up the train of her dress and then climbed in behind her, and then the door was closed, leaving them alone.

Jessie looked over to him, then snuggled up against him. "Kit."

"Yes love?"

"Now you can call me Misses Vulpan," she announced, quite seriously.

Kit laughed. "It would be my pleasure, Misses Vulpan," he answered. "May I kiss you now? It would be our first kiss in something almost private as a proper husband and wife, you know."

She grinned at him. "Kiss away," she invited, wrapping her arms around him. He leaned down and gave her a toe-curling, intimate kiss as the one of Vil's panther bodyguards got in the front seat with the hired driver, and the limo began to pull out. Kit and Jessie were oblivious to the wellwishers that cheered the limo as it pulled out, also missed the two news crews that got footage of their limo as it passed them at the edge of the street and was on its way to the reception at the Four Seasons.

It was the culmination of a dream. He just sighed as their kiss ended and nuzzled her cheek and neck. "It's done, my love," he whispered to her. "We're married. Finally."

"Finally," she agreed. "I'm now Misses Vulpan," she said with a little thrill in her voice. "And you're mine!"

"All yours. Forever and ever," he breathed.

“It’ll take that long to get my fill of you, my love,” she said with a kiss on his neck.

“I’ll be happy to try to make you sick of me,” he chuckled, cuddling with her. “Now, we go on to the reception. What kind of decorations did you and Vil decide for it?”

“You’ll see,” she winked. “It was actually fun to pick a theme and decorations without you. You know, try to surprise you, see if I know you as well as I think I do,” she grinned. “Did you like the church?”

“Oh, God, pretty kitty, those decorations were gorgeous!” he said emphatically. “You’ll really have to be on your game to outdo those.”

“We’ll see,” she smiled at him, then she laughed. “Did you see some of the furs at the wedding, Kit? I saw the Governor sitting behind Vil!”

“Yeah, and a Senator, and the Representative from our district,” he added.

“I almost peed my dress when I recognized him!”

“Vil would have murdered you,” he laughed. “Wait, I think I remember that. Was that when we were posing on the altar after the ceremony?”

“Yeah. I was looking at the guests, and recognized him from the crowd.”

“Well, I’m glad you didn’t realize until after. I didn’t want you to be nervous.”

“I didn’t see anything at all except for you,” she told him, nuzzling his neck.

“You were so beautiful walking down the aisle,” he responded. “I thought you were an angel.”

“Do you like my dress?”

“It’s perfect,” he stated, running a paw over the embroidered satin covering her stomach. “That train might cause some problems, though.”

“It comes off,” she admitted with a giggle. “It’s part of an outer layer of my gown that comes off. It attaches to the gown under my stomacher. I have another satin layer under it that’s formal length. I’ll take the train off when we get to the Four Seasons so I don’t trip all over my dress during the reception, and I can dance in it.”

“Now that’s very clever,” he said with an approving nod.

“I thought so too.”

The Four Seasons was in the affluent west side of Austin, just outside the city limits, a large building built on the side of the hill that marked the beginning of the central hill country. It was a huge mansion-style reception hall with large columns dominating its front, but the limo didn’t pull up to the front. It pulled up to a side entrance instead, and they waited while the panther opened the door for them. “Now come with me, love, I’ll show you our reception,” she grinned as the panther helped her out of the limo, and Kit helped settle her train so it didn’t get caught in the car. She waited for him to get out, then walked arm in arm with him through the side door.

They had the entire building booked for the reception, and the entire building was decorated. The place was divided up into four main reception halls, thus its name the Four Seasons, each main hall decorated in a color pattern that hinted at a season. But the temporary walls had been removed on one side to form one huge reception hall for their party, while the wall was retained on the other to form two smaller rooms. The main hallway was themed, clearly, with a march of the past years. A pair of statues flanked the opening, one a female cat looking like Jessie wearing a Victorian dress, and the other a male fox vaguely resembling Kit wearing an English waistcoat, trousers, and wearing a derby hat. The main hall was decorated with mannequins and models wearing clothing from different past eras, from medieval dresses to one mannequin dressed as a 20's flapper, with the buntings, tablecloths, and hangings done in blacks, grays, yellows, and blues. He saw that each table represented a different era, from the ancient Greek table in one corner to the psychedelic color patterns of a table representing the 60's. The decorations were subtle, and might be lost on some guests, but the history major in Kit could identify the props on the tables, silverware and china, and color patterns and identify the time and place each table represented. Their own table was decorated to be Kit's favorite historical era, ancient Rome, with a Praetorian standard making up the tablecloth and miniature models of Roman architecture and artwork sitting on the table among the china and silverware. They even had an old medieval tapestry hanging on one wall, as well as a suit of armor. The tables were scattered around the edges of the huge room, leaving the center open for the long banquet tables holding their huge amount of food, and on a rolling cart at the end was their wedding cake, a four-tiered monster done in white and yellow curled frosting, the lower three tiers angel food, coconut, and German chocolate as one moved from the bottom to the top, and the top tier a fruitcake, as was the old tradition. There was a stage holding a set for an actual live big band, their instruments there and waiting for them, as well as a deejay booth in the corner beside and behind the band stage. They were going to have live music in addition to a deejay. "You always accuse me of being old fashioned,” she teased, elbowing him. “So here it is, old-fashioned in all its glory.”

Kit laughed. “It’s beautiful,” he said honestly. “And since I’m a history major—“

“You’ll feel right at home here,” she finished, kissing him on the cheek playfully.

“I love it, baby!” he said happily, looking around.

“We have two other rooms. One’s basically for the kids, filled with things that’ll keep them entertained and happy, and the other room’s a more sober and quiet place where people can go to find a little peace and quiet.”

“Where are we dancing?”

“In here. They’ll remove the tables after dinner,” she pointed to the long tables in the middle.

“Ah, I see,” he noted.

Vil entered the huge room with his family behind her. Sheila and Muffy looked very happy and excited, but Sarah and Brian looked pensive. “Hey hey,” she said with a dazzling smile. “There’s my brother and his new wife.”

Jessie gave Vil a shy yet triumphant smile. “Thanks, Vil.”

“Stav has your carry-on, bro. Want me to take a few pictures for ya?”

“Yes, I’d love it,” he said. “And I want to get a shot of these awesome decorations with the video camera before the crowd ruins it!”

“I didn’t like them, but Jessie does, and that’s what counts,” Vil said honestly, looking around.

They took quite a few pictures of Kit and Jessie, and then them with various members of the family, with more than one camera. Sheila, Muffy, and Vil had their own cameras, and they took pictures alone, then together, then with Vil, then with Sheila, then with Muffy, then with combinations thereof...even two pictures with all six of them, taken by one of the Four Seasons servers. After that, Vil took Jessie to a side room to help her remove her train while Kit used the video camera to take detailed footage of the reception room, making vocal notes as he panned around, then berating Sheila for striking a model’s pose for the camera as he panned her into the shot. Jessie returned while he was still shooting, and he got a great shot of her in her now-shorter gown, no longer dragging the floor and having a long bridal train, but instead ending just at her ankles, revealing her unclad feet.

“I thought you had shoes on,” Kit noted.

“I did for the ceremony, but I can’t dance in shoes,” she laughed as she put her paws before her, giving the camera a shy smile. “Do you like the active bride’s dress?”

Kit laughed. “It’s just as lovely as the train,” he said. “Where did you put it?”

“I had someone put it in your limo. She has to take it with you, she’ll use it again later tonight,” Vil answered.

“I forgot about that. When does the reception start?”

“It already has,” Vil grinned. “But we won’t start doing anything until the guests start getting here. There was quite a procession behind us, but they didn't have a police escort," Vil grinned. "They should start filtering in any minute now."

Vil wasn't far off from right. Rick, Martha, Sam, and Sandy were the next to arrive. Kit and Jessie accepted quite a few hugs, kisses, and pawshakes as they greeted them. "Vil lost us," Rick laughed. "We were in a limo, son, one just for the bridal party, but Vil had a motorcycle cop escorting her limo, and they lost us at the light right there by the Mo-Pac. Our driver didn't follow behind her." Rick laughed. "I hope they take us back to the church! Our cars are there!"

"We'll get you back to your cars, Rick," Vil chided him

"I'd never ridden in a limo before," Martha said with a smile. "It was a very fun experience."

"It was awesome!" Sandy exclaimed. "It had its own bar and TV!"

As was traditional, Kit and Jessie greeted the guests to the reception, standing near the door and accepting congratulations. Gifts for the couple were placed on an empty table near the stage, getting higher and higher as more and more guests arrived. They stood there by that door for literally an hour, in what seemed a nearly endless procession of males and females in suits and handsome dresses, shaking their paws, kissing them on the cheek, or hugging them fondly. They greeted furs they'd never even met, and Jessie gaped a little when Governor Rick Perry stepped up to them and shook Kit's paw firmly. "Sorry I'm running late," he apologized. "I had to return to my office for a quick bit of business. Congratulations to both of you."

"Thank you, sir," Kit said with a nod. "I'm honored you decided to come to the reception."

“Your sister invited me. I think she has something she wants to talk about,” he chuckled. “I hope you don’t mind.”

“Not at all, Governor! It’s your state, after all,” Jessie said quickly.

He laughed delightedly. “But it’s your wedding,” he said simply. He kissed Jessie’s paw gallantly, then stepped on to take Vil’s paws, talking animatedly with her as she came out to greet him.

“I feel so stupid,” Jessie groaned. “I don’t believe I said that to him!”

“I think he got a kick out of it,” Kit chuckled, leaning over and kissing her on the muzzle.

They greeted guests for another fifteen minutes or so, then they sat down to eat. The caterers had gone crazy, serving an absolute ton of food, very fancy and carefully prepared, but quite a few people chuckled when one of the servers set down a super-deluxe hamburger down in front of Kit, who had an excited, eager grin as he eyed that angus beef monstrosity. Kit’s favorite food was hamburgers, so the caterer made him the grandpappy of all hamburgers.

“Don’t you dare stain that tux,” Jessie warned as she spread a large napkin over her lap to protect her dress from accidents.

“I’ll be careful.”

“That hamburger has no liquids on it, just in case,” Vil chuckled. “No mustard, ketchup, or mayo.”

A deejay arrived and played soft background music as the reception ate, just loud enough to be audible but not so loud that it drowned out conversation. Kit and Jessie had a wonderful time chatting with the guests at their table, which were Vil, Sarah, Brian, Hannah, John, Rick, and Martha. The large table seated ten, but they left the tenth seat vacant, the placecard before it simply reading dearly departed, a nod to Kit and Vil's deceased parents. Sheila, Muffy, and Jenny kept flashing them unhappy looks that they didn't get to sit at the main table, but there was only so much room.

After dinner, the tables and leftover food was moved to the far wall across from the main table, flanking the main doors to allow people to continue to enjoy the food in a buffet style, and the cake was wheeled over to the main table, a slight break with the usual tradition of cutting the cake after a round of dancing. There was a great deal of applause as the attendants brought the cake up to the main table, and Kit and Jessie stood and went over to it to engage in the old tradition with the cake. They took up a silver knife, both holding it as furs laughed and took pictures and video of them cutting the cake at the bottom, then came the similarly age-old tradition of making fun of the moment. Kit fed Jessie a piece of cake, pushing it into her mouth carefully as everyone laughed, but failing to do it cleanly. She wiped the icing off her muzzle, gave him a light smile, and did the same to him. She was a bit more playful about it, threatening to smash it into his face, but then she delicately fed him with all grace and style. After the applause, Jessie cut pieces for her parents, then Kit cut a piece for Vil, since his parents weren't there, and then a caterer took over and began cutting pieces for the rest of the guests, as was tradition.

After the cake, desserts were served, and while people finished up dinner, the band filed in from a back door. But before the dancing, Vil stood up and struck her glass with a fork, politely getting everyone's attention. "I know it's tradition for the best man to give the first toast, but I think we've had just enough innovation in this wedding to allow me to go first.” She turned to Kit and Jessie and raised her glass. “You were a pain in my butt sometimes, baby bro, and I’m glad that you’re now someone else’s problem,” she announced, which made both of them, and quite a few others, laugh. “But you’ll always be my little brother, and I think you’ve got a lot of happiness ahead of you. And you, Jessie, were the perfect femme at the perfect time. You dragged my brother out of his nomadic lifestyle and made a respectable fox out of him,” she grinned. “Thanks to you, I don’t have to go to bed every night wondering where he is, what he’s doing, and if he’s alright. You gave him a reason to rejoin society, and a reason to be happy again. So, to Kit and Jessie, may life be as good to you as you are to each other.”

There was a rumble of assent, and everyone drank to them. Vil sat down, and then Rick stood up. “I’ve never been very good at this kind of thing,” he said with a humble smile. “But I can say something from the heart. Kit, Jessie, you two are something special, and I honestly think that God made sure that you two would find each other. Kit, you’re a kind and intelligent fox, a hard worker, and a wonderful friend. Jessie, you’re just amazing, hon. There’s nothing else I can say but that. You’re the kind of girl I’d marry in a heartbeat if I didn’t already have one just like you,” he said, reaching down and patting Martha on the shoulder. So, to cut it short, here’s to you. May God bless your union and keep you together as long as he’s given me and Martha, and many years more.”

After that toast, John stood up. “I could stand up here and spend an hour telling everyone all kinds of interesting stories about our Jessica, but teasing her just isn’t as much fun as it used to be, at least after she got so good at throwing pillows,” he teased her with a smile. “I can say that even though you two are young, and haven't known each other as long as some might think healthy for you to get married, all I can tell you is hang in there, kids. I think you have what it takes to be married as long as your parents, or Rick and Martha. You have a beautiful and special love, and I think it'll carry you through your entire lives as long as you treat each other well and keep your relationship honest and sincere. I lost a daughter today, but I gained a son-in-law...and I think I got the better part of the bargain," he winked, which made Jessie laugh ruefully.

Kit stood up. "I'm even worse at this than Rick, so all I have to say is this. Jessie, I love you. I'm glad I married you, and I want to spend the rest of my life with you. And that's all." He raised his glass to her, and she smiled and toasted him.

They all drank again, and then they prepared to dance.

Kit and Jessie were expected to perform the first dance, and they did so to a great deal of ruffled fur from his new wife as the band played a waltz. Jessie knew how to dance, but she was mortified to be out there dancing in public, so she wasn't exactly the absolute example of grace and elegance. But she also didn't trip over her own feet, and acquitted herself without major embarrassment.

The band was very versatile, playing traditional reception fare mixed in with big band swing, and then the deejay took over to play more modern music for the younger guests. Kit helped a laughing Jessie sit down as they rested after trying to dance a jitterbug to a swing tune. "I thought my tail got tied in a knot!" she exclaimed as he helped her sit down. "That was fun!"

"And better music than that tweenie pop crap," Kit teased as the deejay began playing a Shakira tune, which got quite a few of the guests Kit and Jessie's age out on the floor.

"You just have no taste for good music," Jessie teased.

"Real music takes an orchestra, not a master sound mixer," he challenged.

"Yo, Kit, Jessie, grats my buds!" Lupe said happily as he came over to them. "When you gonna throw her garter, brah?"

Kit laughed. "It won't be long now. It's nearly six, and we have a plane to catch around seven," he said.

Lupe gaped. "Brah, you'll never make it!"

"It's a private plane, no security to go through," Jessie laughed. "We're scheduled to leave at seven, so we'll be wrapping up in about twenty minutes."

"You're not changing for the flight?"

"We're changing in the airplane," Kit told him.

After a few more dances, the deejay announced that the throwing of the bouquet and garter would take place out front in ten minutes, which would also herald the end of the reception. The gifts were tactfully gathered and taken, to be placed in their apartment for them to open when they got back home, and the guests came around for one final chat or to wish them farewell. Vil was one of the last, hugging Kit, then hugging Jessie. "I guess I can't think of you as my baby brother anymore," she teased. "And I've lost my monopoly on you. I have to share taking care of you with Jessie."

"He's too much trouble for just one of us, Vil," Jessie giggled as she hugged his sister. "It's going to take both of us to keep him respectable."

“He’s such a troublemaker,” Vil grinned at him.

The reception wound down. The rooms cleared as the guests moved to wait out by the limo, and Kit and Jessie took the top layer of the cake from one of the attendants to take home and freeze, though Rick was going to hold it for them until they got back. Kit and Jessie then made sure that their bags were in their limo, the gifts were handled, and everything was ready for them to leave. “You ready, Misses Vulpan?” he asked, nudging her.

“Oh, I’m ready, Mister Vulpan,” she smiled up at him. “I have my garter on and everything.”

He laughed. “Well, I’m going to enjoy taking it off you,” he teased.

“That won’t require you to push my dress up all the way to my waist,” she said primly.

“No, but it’ll be fun to do,” he said casually, which earned him a smack on the shoulder.

Out in the parking lot, over a hundred guests formed a throng around their white limo. Jessie and Kit posed for just a few more pictures, then Jessie stood up at the top of a trio of steps at the edge of the parking lot and held her bouquet up. Quite a few ladies gathered in front of her, and some of them gave a few ugly looks at Marty, but the sheep was nonplussed. Jessie turned around and threw the bouquet over her shoulder, and there was a great deal of applause when Sam erupted from the throng holding it over her head. “No fair, she threatened to spray me if I didn’t let her catch it!” Sandy shouted, which produced some laughter.

Kit then got to throw the garland. Jessie’s cheek fur ruffled when she came down the steps and put her foot back on the step, then Kit knelt and raised her gown up to her knee and reached under it. She raised a threatening open paw and cocked it over his head, which made him laugh and not do anything that would get him slapped. He pulled her garter off, and she stepped back as he went up to the steps and flung it into the gathered males. To Kit's surprise, Mike came up with the garter, and he made a show out of putting it on his upper arm, wearing it like an armband, which made Jessie's cheek fur ruffle and made her laugh ruefully.

With that done, they were ushered with fanfare and more pseudo-rice birdseed to their limo. One of Vil's bodyguards opened the door for them, and Kit had to pause to hug Vil, John, and Hannah one final time. "Is everything taken care of?" he asked.

"Yup, bro, everything's all set," she told him. "I had your cameras put in your handbag, Jessie, and Rick has your cake and will take it home with him. Lupe's gonna watch over your apartment and he has your keys. Your jet is waiting for you at the airport to take you to Boston and we'll be right behind you, so just wait at the hangar until we arrive. Then we'll go on to Holy Cross and do the other ceremony, and you'll be on your way to Florida before you know it. I have a limo set to pick you up in Miami, and it'll drive you to my condo in the keys. Your plane tickets to Cincinnati are already bought and waiting for you at the condo."

"Sounds like we're free to go," Jessie giggled, hugging her mother. "We'll see you in five days, Dad, Mom," she told her.

"We'll be waiting for you, dear," she answered. "And though I still oppose this, I think it was a beautiful ceremony and I'm glad I attended."

"Thanks, Hannah," Kit said, giving her a hug.

"Enjoy your honeymoon, kids," John told them, shaking Kit's paw.

“Oh, we will, Dad,” Jessie said with a naughty smile that made her father clear his throat.

Kit and Jessie climbed into the limo to a round of applause, and Kit heard John call to his wife, “well, if anything, Kit’s made our little girl a lot more confident,” he chuckled.

“I liked her better when she was meek and compliant,” Hannah sniffed, then she laughed.

Kit and Jessie waved through the open window as the limo pulled away, and then they were on their way to the airport. “Well, we’re alone now,” Kit purred, pulling her close and kissing her.

“Not yet we’re not,” she giggled, pointing to the driver and one of Vil’s bodyguards that were behind the dark glass separating the front seat from the passenger’s area.

“We’ll be on a private plane, love,” he said huskily in her ear. “Want to join the mile high club?”

Jessie gasped and laughed, pushing at him, then nuzzled his neck. “Mmmmaybe,” she teased. “We’ll have to change clothes you know, and something might...happen,” she said, sliding her paw up his arm sensually.

“Seems silly to change clothes on the plane just to change right back into wedding clothes for the other ceremony.”

“Vil said we’re not wearing the formal stuff for Holy Cross, just something nice.”

“Wedding clothes are wedding clothes.”

Jessie laughed. “Wedding gowns aren’t usually meant to be recycled, you silly goose,” she told him. “It’s a one-shot deal! I brought a nice dress for Holy Cross, and I know Vil had you pack a suit for it.”

“I still say we should marry naked,” he teased.

She slapped him on the arm. “Then our minds wouldn’t be on the ceremony at all,” she countered.

They nuzzled almost all the way to the airport, so much so that Kit was surprised when the limo stopped outside of a large hangar at the far end of the airport. The panther helped them out, and escorted them to the plane as he and the driver carried their luggage. Kit was a bit started to find himself staring at probably the top of the line Windstream model of private jet, the Vulpan Shipyards logo emblazoned on the tail. “What the hell?” he gasped.

“It’s Miss Vulpan’s new corporate jet,” the panther told him. “She just received delivery of it last week. She hasn’t even ridden in it yet. She wanted you to be the first passengers.”

“Aww, that’s so sweet of her!” Jessie called.

“If you would, please board and settle in. You’ll be leaving in just a few moments. I’ll place the garment bag with your Boston clothes in the private room.”

“Private room?”

“This is literally an RV with wings, Misses Vulpan,” the panther told her. “It has a seating area for Miss Vulpan and her guests, a galley, an enclosed small area with a desk for when Miss Vulpan needs to do work, and a private room with a fold-out bed.”

“Vil thinks of everything,” Kit chuckled.

“Miss Vulpan spends a great deal of time in the air, Mister Vulpan,” he said as he led them to the stairs leading into the jet, and at the hatchway stood a maned middle-aged lion and a stag wearing uniforms. The stag had his antlers professionally trimmed, leaving nothing but two small bone spurs over and to each side of his eyes. “So she decided to upgrade to an aircraft that better suits her needs. Her old jet will be reassigned to free use by the board members.

“Welcome aboard,” the lion said with a smile as Kit and Jessie climbed up towards them. “I’m Captain Avery, your pilot. And your co-pilot, Captain Smith,” he introduced the stag.

“We’ll be ready to leave as soon as you’re settled in, Mister and Misses Vulpan. And congratulations on your wedding!”

“Thank you,” Jessie said sincerely as she shook the stag’s strange paw. His fingers ended with hoof-like growths, almost like nails or claws, but they made up the entire ends of his fingers from the first joint to the tip. They were meticulously filed and shaped to resemble normal fingertips.

“There’s a fully stocked galley behind the private compartments,” Avery told them as they stepped into the aircraft and looked inside. There were seats there, but instead of facing forward, they were six single seats, three to each side of the aisle, that looked to pivot, almost like captain’s chairs in a van. The wall on the left side at the back had a couch against it, a couch that wrapped around the fuselage wall, under the windows, and each couch had a coffee table bolted to the deck before it. On the right side there was a table with a bench against the fuselage wall, and swivel chairs bolted to the deck on two sides, leaving the side facing the center empty of any seats. Kit noted that there was a large panel in the ceiling, looking almost like a hidden plasma TV monitor on a hinged back that allowed those sitting at the table and couch to watch TV but not have it in the way when not in use. Behind those six seats, couch, and table were walls that cut the interior fuselage space in half. “The restroom is also behind the compartments, the door’s at the back of the galley. The compartment to the left is an office with a computer if you’d like to use the internet or send email, and there’s a folding bed in the private compartment on the right. You can call the cockpit any time using the intercom.”

“Thank you,” Kit said for the information.

“We’ll begin preparations for take-off now, so if you’d please settle in and make yourself comfortable.”

Kit and Jessie sat in the front chairs, facing the wall separating the cockpit from the passenger cabin, and on each side there were plasma televisions hung for the enjoyment of the passengers. A little recessed rack hiding behind a sliding door under it revealed a DVD player and a satellite descrambler for television stations. The seat had a foldaway tray that rose up from the right armrest and swung over the chair, giving them a flat surface if they wanted one.

“Wow, this is nice! And to think, Vil’s gonna fly around in this all the time!”

“She does spend a lot of time on the move,” Kit noted. “I guess she wanted something that made that comfortable,” he said as he patted the chair in which he was sitting. He then got up and led her back to the couch, and urged her to sit down. “Umm, aren’t we taking off?” she asked.

“We probably are,” he chuckled.

“Shouldn’t we sit down and buckle up?”

“Jessie, this is a private jet,” he told her. “Those rules don’t apply in here.”

“Oh. Well, far be it for me to be a prude,” she giggled as they settled on the couch.

The panther finished stowing their luggage, then stood before them. “I set out your dress and suit you’ll wear in Boston. They’re laying on the bed for you. I placed the garment bag for your wedding clothes in the closet in the room so you can store them when you change. I’ll dismiss the limo driver, and handle his tip for you. I checked the galley, and there are refreshments and light snacks stocked if you’d like them. I’ll be on Miss Vulpan’s jet to Boston, so I’ll see you when we’re back on the ground.”

“Thank you for all your help,” Jessie told him. “We really appreciate it.”

“Yeah, you were a lifesaver,” Kit agreed.

“Any time,” he smiled, then he hurried out of the plane. Smith closed the hatch and went into the cockpit with the lion, and then Avery’s voice called over the intercom. “We’re going to be leaving in about ten minutes, so please find a comfortable seat that faces forward and be ready to take it when we’re ready to take off. If you’d like we do have to empty seats in the cockpit if you’d like to watch a take-off from the front,” he offered.

“Oh, I’ve gotta!” Kit laughed.

“I don’t mind either,” she smiled.

They went up to the cockpit and sat in folding bench chairs behind the pilots. “All we ask is you be quiet and don’t press any buttons,” Smith told them with a smile as he put on a headset.”

“I have a pilot’s license, so I know better,” Kit laughed.

“Oh, really? What do you fly?”

“Nothing right now. Whatever I can afford to rent, but I’m rated on multi props.”

“You should get a jet endorsement,” he said.

“I’d love to,” Kit chuckled. “I haven’t flown a plane in like eight months, though.”

The engines started, one and then the other, and Kit and Jessie watched through the cockpit window to see the hangar workers clearing out. The plane began to move, and they taxied out onto a large tarmac at the far end of the airport. Large passenger jets were on the move, as a Southwest plane landed in their view and slowed down as it approached their side of the airport, then turned off before it reached the end of the runway and started along a taxiway towards the terminals. They listened in silence as Avery talked to the control tower, and then the jet joined a short line of commuter planes and large passenger jets waiting to take off. Kit and Jessie got a good look at the back of a Boeing 777, the United jet in front of them. “Make sure you’re belted up,” Smith noted as they turned onto the runway, and then, after they had permission to proceed, Avery pushed up the throttle. Jessie watched in interest as the nose raised, and then they were in the air. The plane kept an ascent angle for nearly five minutes, climbing and banking to cruising altitude and heading, and then Smith looked back to them. “And there you are, your first cockpit take-off. Did you like it?”

“It was really cool!” Jessie said enthusiastically. “I didn’t think you’d have your vision cut like that. I thought you’d be able to see a lot more, but the nose of the plane is in the way.”

“We can’t really see the runway at all when we land,” Avery chuckled. “Since the jet is leaning back as it descends. It’s like driving a car, though. You may not be able to see your bumpers when you park, but you know where they are.”

“Well, it’s three and a half hours to Boston, Mister and Misses Vulpan,” Avery said. “Would you like me to put out the plasma TV at the couch for you so you can watch TV or a movie?”

“I think we can do without that,” Kit said as Jessie gave him a sly, inviting look. “After all the noise and business today, I’d just like a little quiet time.”

“This dress might look nice, but it’s not too comfortable after a while,” Jessie giggled. “I’d like to change.”

“Consider the jet your home,” Avery told them. “We don’t leave the cockpit unless you ask us back,” he said, glancing at them with a smile. “We have a fridge, a folding cot, laptops, and our own head up here, so we’re good. Consider everything on the other side of that door your personal space. Just call us on the intercom if you need any help, okay?”

“We will, Captain,” Kit said as he undid his seat belt, helped Jessie with hers, and then helped her stand up.

They went to the slightly cramped private room, which had a bed taking up most of the space, and Jessie’s soft beige dress and Kit’s dark suit laying flatly on a cover emblazoned with the Vulpan Shipyard logo, a three masted schooner in front of steamship in a circular background, representing the past and the present. Jessie picked up their clothes and hung them in a cramped closet by the bed, then turned her back to him. “Start with the buttons at the back of my neck and work your way down,” she said playfully.

“Your wish is my command,” he laughed.

It was no different—well, outside of them being on an airplane—but it was. They had the same intimacy and joy with each other, but now they were husband and wife, and it felt, somehow...closer. They weren't a fox and a cat in love, expressing that love, they were a husband and wife sharing their love and desire with each other. They laid in each other's arms for a while afterward, as Jessie purred her contentment and he kept his head against her chest, her arms cradling him, to listen to that wonderful sound. “Sometimes I wish I could purr for you,” he chuckled softly as he heard her purring reverberate through her chest and through his ear...and through his heart and soul.

“I like you just the way you are,” she hummed, stroking his hair. “You don't need to purr to show me you love me, my handsome fox.”

There was a crackling that startled them. “We'll be landing in about half an hour, Mister and Misses Vulpan,” Captain Avery's voice called over the intercom. “The ground crew just called in and reported that your limo has arrived and is waiting for you, and that everything is ready and waiting at your destination.”

“And the real world interrupts,” Kit laughed ruefully.

“This isn't exactly the real world,” Jessie giggled, tousling his hair. “We're in your sister's private jet, love. And we're married,” she said with an excited squeal.

“So, how was your first official time?” he asked with a smile, rising up and kissing her on the nose.

“Heavenly, just like all the other times,” she said with a naughty smile, sliding her paw across his chest. “I just wish I could get pregnant already,” she complained. “I mean, we’ve been having sex for three months! Here I am trying to get pregnant and zilcho, when some girls get pregnant after forgetting about the condom just once!”

“Typical ironic justice I guess,” Kit chuckled. “The harder you try, the longer it takes. At least we’re having fun trying,” he said, tickling her sides. She laughed after a short gasp and struggled against him as he tickled her sides. “And at least now our first kid won’t do the math and realize he was conceived before we were married,” he added.

“I don’t think that would bother him. It doesn’t bother me,” she said with a grin. “My parents were married eight months before my birthday,” she winked. “I was conceived before they were married, and it just makes me see how much they loved each other, if they couldn’t wait until after the ceremony.”

“Ah, so the invincible armor of Hannah Williams shows another chink,” Kit mused, which made Jessie laugh.

“Don’t you dare tell her I said that, or she’ll spank me.”

“You’re a married femme now, love, she can’t do that to you anymore. That’s my job,” he grinned reaching under her and pinching her bottom.

“Ow! Kit, they have pillows on this bed, you know!” she warned, which made him collapse against her, paralyzed by laughter.

Despite excessive playing around and a little teasing, as Kit started lamenting that Jessie was already getting boring—which earned him a whack on the head from a pillow—they managed to be cleaned up, dressed, and ready when the plane landed at Logan Airport in a bitingly cold December night and taxied into a private hangar. Jessie and Kit waited on the plane for Vil’s plane to land, for they were all going to the Holy Cross together. Kit started to feel a little edgy when the hatch was opened and stairs lowered, for the excitement of the day and the fun with Jessie were fading to the knowledge that they were now in Boston, back in hated Boston, and any number of bad memories immediately started creeping into his mind. Boston had been a bad place to live for him, starting when their mother died and going through all the fights with his father and the uncertainty and the anger, and then there were the two years after he was disowned where he attended public school, living in the little apartment Suzy secretly rented for him, working any job he could keep through his father’s machinations to keep enough food in the fridge to keep him from starving while he finished. He left Boston after graduation, going to U-Mass and its main campus in Amherst, which was across the state, getting out from under his father’s crushing heel...though Amherst hadn’t been much better. The Vulpans basically owned Massachusetts, and Kit had to deal with the reach of his father even all the way over there.

The other plane taxied into the hangar and shut down, and Kit sighed as he stepped out into the chilly hangar. Two limos were waiting for them, uniformed chauffeurs standing by the back doors patiently. Jessie held his paw as they walked towards Vil’s plane, as the hatch opened and stairs came down. Vil was on her way down before they were even locked into place, and she kissed Kit on the cheek and patted his shoulders. “Where’s your coats?”

“Still in the plane,” Kit chuckled.

“Go get them, and your shoes. It’s snowy out there. You won’t need anything else. We’ll go do the ceremony and then come straight back here, and you’ll be on your way to Florida. Did you like my new jet?” she asked with a smile.

“It’s so nice,” Jessie said honestly.

“Did you initiate my bed?” she asked with a grin. Jessie’s cheeks ruffled, which made Vil laugh delightedly. “Good! I was hoping you would. Now my jet is properly christened and ready for use,” she winked. “Well, your jet, really. It’s taking you to Florida, too. You can get some sleep on the way down, then it’s a limo ride over to the helipad, and a half hour ride in a helicopter to my condo at Marathon Key. I wish you could stay here overnight, but you don’t have much time, so I gotta get you down there to have your honeymoon with what time you do get,” she winked. “Now, you guys take the first limo, and the rest of us will be in the second. We’ll have you back on the plane and on the way to Florida in an hour tops.”

“It can’t be too soon for me,” Kit said uneasily. “Just being here gives me the creeps.”

“Well, bro, let this be the first in a set of new memories for you to have of Boston,” she said in understanding, patting him on the shoulder.

Kit and Jessie were placed in the lead limo after they got their coats and shoes, and they were on the way. It was dark in Boston, but Kit knew those streets, knew them well. Despite the cold and the late hour, the sidewalks were populated with quite a few pedestrians, out doing their Christmas shopping, and Jessie seemed to take notice that a disproportionate number of them were red foxes. “So many,” she said in surprise, looking out the window.

“Welcome to Boston,” Kit told her simply.

“I can see how purism keeps a foothold up here,” she said. “I mean, I’ve heard you talk about it, but it’s so much different when you see it, see so many of just one breed on the streets of a city this big. It’s almost incredible!”

“From here north, foxes are the dominant breed,” Kit told her. “All the way up til you hit Canada. Then it mixes between British foxes and French wolves. A lot of French wolves settled in Quebec, and they still represent a large segment of the population that borders New England.”

“Are there a lot of foxes in Canada?”

“Eastern, yeah,” he nodded. “Western Canada is more mixed with wolves, hounds, and rabbits, all British. There’s a lot of rabbits from Britain,” he chuckled.

“Then why so many foxes here? Why not more balance?”

“Guess because of culture,” he shrugged. “In Britain, the different breeds all have their own little subcultures, so when the colonies were made, they segregated by breed. That’s why there’s so many rabbits who live in the southeast, and lots of wolves in Virginia and Maryland. The lemmings and rodents settled in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. And of course, the foxes settled in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Hampshire. It’s a big joke around here that the other breeds just can’t handle a New England winter, so they left it to the hardest breed in Britain to show them how to do it.” The limo turned on the street he knew the cathedral was on, and chuckled. “But, since this is New England and the winters are so cold, there isn’t as much integration up here as there is down south. Immigrants came and thinned out the domination of the British breeds in the other colonies, but here in New England, it’s still a majority of foxes. The only cities where you really see other breeds are Boston and the cities where U-mass has campuses, like Amherst and Worcester.”

“Wow. It’s just so strange to see it,” she breathed.

They arrived at the venerable Cathedral of the Holy Cross at about eleven. The cathedral was very old, showing its age, but had beautiful stained glass windows that here backlit by the lights within. Jessie gawked at the huge cathedral as they went around and parked in a lot beside it, then the chauffer opened the door for them. They were met at the side entrance by the Archbishop O’Malley of Boston himself, who was an Irish fox. Vil’s limo pulled in beside theirs as the Bishop shook their paws. “It’s nice to meet you, Mister Vulpan,” he said with a smile. “We’ve arranged things to your liking, and as to your family’s wishes. It will be a simple affair, a simple liturgy and vows, and since we’ve been warned that your bride isn’t Catholic, we’ll go slow and give her a chance to understand what we’re doing since she’s had no chance to practice.”

“It’s going to be Catholic?”

“That’s a slightly ridiculous question, son,” he smiled lightly. “Of course it’s going to be a Catholic ceremony. We’ll be conducting it in the main chapel.”

“Well, as long as you don’t mind me looking a little silly, I guess I’ll try,” Jessie said with a nervous laugh.

“You won’t look silly at all, dear. You may not know our ways, but we applaud you for giving him this. We’ve been told that you’ve already been married, and are performing this second ceremony to honor Kitstrom’s mother’s wishes.”

“We are,” she nodded.

“Then you’re giving out of love, and nothing given out of love can ever be anything but beautiful,” he said, patting her paw fondly. Now please, come into the nave. It’s cold out here,” he smiled.

They waited only a few minutes before Vil, his aunt and uncle, and his cousins came in, and while they did that, Kit quickly explained the mechanics of a Catholic wedding. “It can’t be too traditional, since it’s so unusual,” he surmised. “But odds are, we’ll walk down the aisle together behind the Archbishop, kneel at the altar, then he’ll conduct a short liturgy.”

“What’s a liturgy?”

“Mass, or what you’d consider to be mass. He’ll recite scripture,” he answered. “Then comes the homily, which is his sermon, but that can’t be very long. After that, we exchange vows and rings—well, we’ll have to take them off and do it again, I suppose—and then that’s basically it. The conducting priest will give us the opportunity to lead prayer, and since this isn’t a mass, he’ll recite the Lord’s Prayer, and it’s over.”

“What’s this about mass?”

“Marriages usually are conducted during a mass,” he told her. “It becomes a part of the mass.”

“Oh, I get it,” she said with a nod. “So they must have other customs when it’s not part of a mass?”

He nodded. “They try to keep it as similar as possible, but yeah, they do have some different customs when it’s just the wedding by itself.”

The bishop came back to them. “Now, Miss Vilenne has asked to be your maid of honor, Jessica,” he said. “I’m afraid we have no best man for you, Kitstrom. I can have a monsignor or monk serve that function for you, if you’d like.”

“No, I’m alright with going solo, Bishop. I’ll just carry the rings myself.”

“Very well then, if you’d follow me, we’ll take our places and wait for the music.”

Kit and Jessie were hustled to the doors leading to the chapel. Jessie took off her ring and handed it to him quickly, and he did the same, just as the doors opened into the magnificent chapel with its stained glass windows, ancient altar and huge, grand, imposing edifice behind it which housed several statues, and rich wooden pews. The famous stained glass windows of the chapel almost seemed to glow from their lighting, and the huge chapel was largely empty, except for attendants and altar boys at the far end, a few furs sitting in the pews near the altar, and the organist playing the Catholic wedding music.

It felt a little odd doing it in the massive main chapel, which was empty. There was a much smaller side chapel in this cathedral that would have been much more fitting for a small, private wedding ceremony, but they were doing the ceremony in the cathedral itself.

“What do I do?” Jessie whispered.

“Just walk behind the Bishop, it looks like he’s conducting the ceremony,” he answered, taking her paw and putting it on his arm. “We’ll kneel just as we come to the first row of pews, genuflect to the altar, then we’ll walk down to it and kneel at it when we get up on the dais.”

“Okay.”

They did that. The Bishop led them down the aisle, and Kit’s anger rose when he realized that those few furs in the pews by the altar were members of his family! Fifteen of them, meaning eleven of them were Vulpans who had come to this private ceremony...probably at Vil’s invitation. He relaxed slightly when he considered that. Vil wouldn’t invite anyone that would embarrass them or disrupt the ceremony. He couldn’t see any faces clearly from that distance, but they all looked rather young. They had to be some of his cousins. As he neared, though, he realized they were not just his cousins. His uncles and aunts, all of them, were sitting in the second row, and from the looks on their faces, they were almost white-hot with fury and indignation.

Kit gave Vil a strangled look, but she just gave him a sly little smile from the other side of Jessie and nodded him ahead.

“Are you crazy?” he demanded in a harsh whisper.

“They won’t say a word,” she answered in a similar whisper. “They asked to come, bro. Just ignore them.”

Kit could feel the hot stares of Zach and Jake on him, and the cold look of Maxine freezing his blood, but it was too late now. They were there, they were doing the ceremony, and he had to carry through with it...but he was going to strangle Vil when this was over. They came up to the altar and knelt, and the Archbishop took his place between them. He offered a short prayer, and then Kit urged Jessie to stand. “We come together this night, in unusual circumstances, so a son can honor the wish of his mother,” the Archbishop intoned, resplendent in his formal robes and mitre as the spotlights shone upon him. “It was her wish that her children marry here, in this cathedral, and tonight we join this male and this female in the bonds of holy matrimony to both celebrate their love, and also honor the ties of family.”

The Archbishop conducted a very short liturgy, reading from the Bible, select passages often used during weddings that professed love and described the holy union of matrimony to the couple and the congregation. Then, much to Kit’s surprise, he skipped over the homily completely and had them turn to face each other. He had them exchange their vows, and now that he was to the side of the family instead of his back to them, he glanced at their faces. His aunt Maxine and his uncles looked angry and mortified, barely containing themselves. The cousins that were there looked either bored, curious, or similarly offended that their cousin was marrying outside their species.

The Archbishop kept it short and sweet. After they exchanged vows, he led through the exchange of rings, and then raised his paws and uttered a short prayer. He then recited the Lord’s Prayer, and when he finished, the ceremony was over.

“Now what?” Jessie asked fearfully.

“Now we leave, quickly and quietly,” Kit whispered back, stepping back from the dais, genuflecting, then turning back up the aisle with Jessie in tow.

“Wait a minute, bro,” Vil called as she came up behind them. Kit slowed to a stop and turned around, and found himself staring at his uncles, Zach and Jake, and his aunt Maxine, as they hurried out of the pews and started towards them.

“No, Vil,” he hissed. “I have no idea what insanity possessed you to bring them here. You know how I feel about them, and I’m very disappointed in you.”

“They asked to come, bro, and promised not to say a word. And I wanted them to be here. I wanted them to see it, bro, see that you won’t knuckle under to them. I wanted them to see you and Jessie get married and know they couldn’t do a damn thing about it, so they can’t possibly deny that you are your own fox and are no part of them. And, I wanted them to see you. I wanted them to see that you’re happy, and you’re happy because you broke away from the family. Call it a little bit of poetic justice, but I wanted them to see that you made it despite them.”

“Why would they want to be here?” he asked.

“That’s obvious, bro,” she winked. “Very soon now, you’re going to have the keys to the castle, and they know it. The lawsuit’s a moot point, and they’ve agreed not to challenge me killing the old will and reinstating you as a member of the family. They have to acknowledge you now, no matter how much they hate you.”

“She’s right about that, Luke,” his uncle Zach said through a tightly controlled voice, shooting dark glances at Jessie, who inched behind Kit protectively in the face of so much open hostility. “We can’t deny that Vil is going to win, and so we must make...concessions.”

“Don’t call me that,” Kit growled. “My name is Kit. Do not ever call me by his name!”

“The past is over, Kit,” Maxine told him. “It’s time to reconcile the family and move on, even despite this marriage.”

“The family can go to hell, Maxine,” Kit told her coldly. “You wrote me off for dead years ago, so just go right on pretending I don’t exist, because I’ll never give you so much as the time of day.”

“You’re such hypocrites,” Jessie flared at them, stepping out from behind Kit and staring them down in a moment of bold anger. “Where were these calls to reconcile after his father died? Nowhere, that’s where! I’ll bet you knew then that you could reverse his father’s will and get him back in the family, but you didn’t do anything! You just abandoned him, and now, when he’s about to get control over you, you want to reconcile and bring him back, and act like all those horrible things you did to him don’t even matter? You’re so arrogant, you can’t even say I’m sorry! If I were you, that would have been the first thing I said if I was in your position, but you can’t even do that! The only one of you that even came close was his uncle Brian, and he only gave that after Kit backed him into a corner over what you did to him when he was a young fox! You don’t care about Kit. You don’t really want to reconcile with him, you’re just trying to keep your money! You’re so transparent it’s almost funny!”

“What else would you have us do, little miss?” Jake said, in a surprisingly honest tone. “We honestly have no idea what else to do. We were just as much subject to his father’s demands as he was. Lucas held all the keys to our family’s power, and we were subject to him. After he died, well, I guess none of us really thought to go against him, even in death. And, honestly, Kit has not exactly offered any olive branches to us, either.

When his father died, he could have asked to come back to the family, and we might have tried to help him. But he chose instead to flip us off at the funeral, and he has married you, which is very much against our wishes.”

Vil actually laughed. “Oh, that was rich!” she said with a giggle.

“Why should he? You’re his family!” she said in a heated tone. “You were supposed to be there for him, and you left him all alone! Do you want to see why he’ll never forgive you? Just look right here!” she declared, pointing at Kit’s damaged left ear. “How much worse could it be for him, laying in a hospital bed, in all that pain, not knowing if he’s going to live or die, and being all alone!”

His three elders fell silent. Against that argument, they had absolutely no defense, and they knew it.

“Did you come here to hear what Vil told you from his own lips? Well, let me tell it to you so he doesn’t have to talk to you. We don’t want your money,” she declared in cold, concise words. “Kit told me that money is a curse, and God he proved it once I got to see how his family is. You deserve that money, because you deserve the misery it’s put into your life! So take your money, and I hope you all choke on it!”

She took his paw, turned, and stormed down the aisle with a surprised Kit in tow.

And in that moment, he’d never been prouder of his wife.

She led him back to the side door leading to the limo, the door through which they came, and Kit slowed her down and gathered her into his arms. He kissed her, gently and tenderly, then nuzzled her neck and just held her. “I love you, my pretty kitty,” was all he could say to show her how much he appreciated her standing up for him, and for understanding, truly understanding. He never felt closer to her than he did at that moment, and knew beyond all doubt that his place would always be at her side.

She understood.

“What is it about you that just cows my aunts and uncles?” Vil asked with a laugh as she reached them. “First Brian and Sarah, and now Zach, Jake, and Maxine! You’re something else, Jessie,” she grinned.

“It’s because your aunts and uncles are so shallow and stupid,” she answered.

“Not stupid, just so arrogant they can’t possibly see anything from another point of view,” Vil chuckled. “And certainly unable to bring themselves to admit that they don’t rule the roost. Well, bro, you ready to leave Boston?”

“It can’t be soon enough for me,” he said honestly.

Vil rode with them this time, taking them back to the airport in their limo. Kit’s paws were shaking from the brush with his family, and Jessie held his paw reassuringly. Just seeing them brought back so many bad memories, and he found himself almost feeling physically sick, how much he wanted to get out of Boston, get away from them. But it was a thankfully short ride back to the airport given it was late at night and traffic wasn’t bad, and in short order they were again at the hangar holding the jet. Vil got out with them and walked them into the hangar with her bodyguards following them. “Now, I’ve taken care of everything,” she told them as they went into the warmer hangar. “If you have any questions, just call me. Oh, here,” she said, handing them a digital camera. “Are you going to be alright, bro?”

“I guess. I’m very mad at you right now, sis.”

“I know, and I’m sorry about that. But you had to face them eventually, if only just to show them one last time that you’re free of them. I think you’ll understand after you think it through. And I still love you, Kit. I always will. You’re my brother.”

She pushed herself into his arms, and he hugged her despite his anger.

Vil hugged Jessie fondly. “It’s so cool to know you’re my sister now,” Vil told her with a bright smile. “You take good care of him, Jessie. He’s very special.”

“He’s the most special male on Earth,” she said with a contented sigh, grabbing his arm and leaning against his shoulder.

“Just sit back and enjoy the ride, guys,” she smiled. “I’ve taken care of everything. And I’ll see you in Cincinnati.”

“You’re coming?” Jessie said with an excited gasp.

She nodded. “Your parents invited me and Sheila, and I accepted. I don’t know about her.”

Kit snorted in laughter. “She’s actually going to do it,” he realized.

“Do what?”

“Bring Sheila into her house, despite my warning.”

“Well, you did warn her then,” Vil chuckled. She kissed Kit on the cheek, then kissed Jessie on the cheek, then turned them around and started pushing them towards the jet. “Now get going! You only get four days, so don’t waste them standing around here! Get out of Boston, you crazy kids!”

Kit and Jessie climbed the steps into the plane, then turned and waved. They didn't wave just to Vil, they also waved to her panther bodyguards, who had been so helpful to them. "Take care of her!" Jessie called to them, and one of them—Kit couldn't tell them apart—just smiled and nodded, then placed his huge paw on her back gently in a display of that promise. Her bodyguards urged her back as they went into the jet, and they saw them standing well away as the jet's engines were started, and it began to turn to taxi out.

"Please find a seat, we're already cleared to taxi and take off and we'll be in the air in just a few minutes," Avery's voice called over the intercom.

"Are you okay, love?" Jessie asked as they sat on the couch, and she leaned against him.

"A little angry. A little scared. Too many bad memories all at once on top of it," he said with a sigh, taking refuge in her arms when she opened them to him. She pushed him down until his head was in her lap, and he just closed his eyes and accepted her gentle, soothing attention as she stroked his hair and gently pinched and played with his ears. She urged him to relax, and as the plane took off and lifted into the air, pushing him into the couch and against her stomach, he grabbed hold of her gorgeous longhaired tail and draped it over his shoulder. She laughed softly and teased his nose with it, then stroked it down his shoulders and side as her paw played with his hair and ears. She soothed him, soothed in ways even he didn't understand completely, and he took solace in the comfort of her presence. He relaxed, and the momentous nature of the day took its toll on him.

As the plane leveled out, Kit drifted off to sleep.

Jessie just leaned back and kept her paw and tail on him, letting him feel her, smell her, be reassured by her presence and sleep peacefully. She was touched and thrilled that she could bring him peace, that he loved her so much that he trusted her with his most intimate secrets, allowed her to know him completely and utterly to such point that she could understand the deepest parts of him, that he would sleep with his head on her lap, a tender demonstration of his love and trust in her. She loved him so much, it was so...fulfilling to not just hear him return her love, but show it to her, show her in ways he didn't even notice, such as this.

They were married now. She was now Misses Vulpan, and nothing on Earth could possibly make her happier than that one simple thought.

Chapter 18

Marathon Key in Florida was a beautiful place of green palm trees, luscious grass, old Spanish architecture, and blue seas.

And it was entirely too short of a stay.

Kit could learn to live here, that was for sure.

Vil's condo was everything one would expect from a rich woman's vacation home. It was huge, some nine rooms, luxuriously furnished, and lavishly appointed with all the toys, gadgets, and appliances rich people would want in a vacation home. It had a huge TV and entertainment center, a large balcony overlooking the ocean and a hot tub large enough for four furs in the master bedroom, a hot tub that faced a large bay window with a similar view of the ocean. The condo was in a twenty story building that catered specifically to be the vacation retreat for the rich, and had every luxury one could imagine as part of their offered services, from a concierge to a private helipad for the residents to fly back and forth to Miami to all manner of activities, services, and merchandise offered...and not all of it entirely legal. The concierge delicately and politely informed them when they arrived that he could get them anything, even that which the law considered to be illegal, and they had a certain club on premises that catered to the more...adventurous clientele. The manager, a short lemming, further expanded on that by telling them to consider themselves on a private island where the laws of America didn't exactly apply, an oasis of liberty where people who could afford it could indulge themselves, so long as they remained on the building's properties. And it had a lot of properties. A private harbor was near the private beach, where multi-million dollar yachts, sailboats, and charter boats were moored or anchored. The building had a private golf course, tennis courts, gym, running track, rock-climbing wall, four pools, a water park, miniature golf, and a small amusement park for the children of the tenants. The condo building and its compound took up nearly a quarter of the island, an elite retreat for the rich, isolated from the nation without leaving it, and treating its tenants like royalty.

It was the time-share of the rich, catered to and for the rich, and it was four days of absolute bliss.

Kit and Jessie didn't even leave the condo for two days after they arrived. They spent the time together, from sitting in front of that huge TV watching DVDs ordered from the concierge to enjoying the hot tub at night, looking out over a moonlit ocean. Napping on the couch, sitting on the floor nude as they ate delivered Chinese and threw noodles at each other like children, making love, sitting at the table on the balcony reading books and newspapers as they let the warm Florida breezes invigorate them, they had no desire to leave the condo until the third day, Monday. On that day, they took a helicopter tour of the Florida keys in the morning, Kit introduced Jessie to one of the games he liked to play, tennis, and they spent the afternoon sitting on the beach, under a huge beach umbrella that protected them from the heat of the sun while they enjoyed the salty breezes. Jessie actually shocked him by wearing the bikini he'd bought for her as a joke out of the condo, and he couldn't keep his eyes off her when she took off her wrap and sat down on her beach chair and picked up a novel and read it. She was just so unbelievably sexy wearing that bikini, the first time he'd ever seen her to look sexier wearing something than she was nude. He couldn't keep his eyes off her—neither could any male that happened by their beach chairs, for that matter—and she seemed to soak up his attention like a puppy, unable to not grin like a misbehaving child when she looked at him. She drove him wild with that bikini, until he just couldn't take it anymore, all but dragged her back up to their condo, and made wild, passionate love to her.

And there were the pictures. Jessie finally relented to give him his pictures, pictures of her in the nude in tasteful, elegant, sensual poses, nothing nasty or pornographic, but she also demanded nude pictures of him. He obliged her, having as much fun taking the pictures as he did taking pictures of her, and then they marked the camera they used to prevent them from using it for anything else, and also knowing exactly which memory card held those most private of pictures.

The other reason he was glad Vil lent them the condo was because it was a gated community, closed to the public...and that mattered. News of Kit's marriage did hit the tabloids, and speculation surfaced that the estranged Vulpan family might be on the verge of reconciliation. It was common knowledge that he'd married a cat, a major affront to the purist Vulpan family, but it also became known that the elders of the Vulpan family had attended his private and very secret wedding ceremony at the Holy Cross, so secret it was held in the dead of night, and the outcast Vulpan literally flew in, drove to the church, married, then drove right back to the airport and flew out. Those conflicting signals confused many in the tabloid community, him doing something his family would oppose violently yet having them at his wedding, and set the gossip columnists and ambush reporters into an absolute frenzy to try to get the truth of what was going on. Kit surfed the gossip internet sites on Tuesday and was highly amused by it, one site going so far as to hint that the Vulpans were invited to the wedding and had no idea Kit was marrying a cat, that it was an ambush and Kit's last act of defiance...because the rogue Vulpan left Boston in a great hurry after the ceremony and was currently in an undisclosed location....

It amused him a little bit, seeing all that speculation on gossip sites that covered it. He knew it was going to happen, and he was also glad that he wasn't anywhere near home for a while. No doubt they were camped outside the apartment complex looking for them.

He was sitting at the table on the balcony on a warm, sunny Tuesday morning, wearing nothing but a pair of swim trunks, going over it. Tricoon had delivered the video and pictures of the wedding by express courier just a bit ago, and Kit had his laptop out, watching it with Jessie sitting on his lap, wearing a more modest blue two-piece bikini that was practical for going in the water, her tail swishing back and forth as they watched from the beginning. They'd done a fantastic job so far, professionally edited footage from multiple cameras that began with Jessie's arrival, showed her getting ready in the antechamber with her bridesmaids and her mother, as Jessie tried to ignore the camera as she fidgeted with her little tiara and the veil that it held, and as Sandy was making all kinds of dirty jokes about their wedding night. Kit was surprised when Jessie shot back with a rather naughty comment that there was nothing they could possibly do on their wedding night they hadn't already done, which made Kit erupt into laughter and made Jessie's fur stand on end from head to toe.

"I can't believe she put that in the video!" she gasped in embarrassment.

"I dunno, I liked it. I love seeing you get all huffy," he chuckled, putting his arms around her waist and pulling her closer.

The video then showed him arriving, greeting the Monsignor, and him milling around, looking both nervous and excited, talking to anyone who came close to him. Then the video panned through many of the guests. When the Governor arrived, the video cameras caught it, and they caught him shaking Vil's paw and kissing her on the cheek.

"It's so strange to see it from another point of view," Kit noted.

"It's nice to see what I missed staying in the room," Jessie laughed.

The video then more or less fast forwarded to the ceremony itself. They watched the ceremony from three camera angles, one behind, and one to each side of the altar which surprised Kit quite a bit. He didn't remember them talking about setting cameras there, and he didn't see them. But, they were good angles, and to his surprise they zoomed in and out as if they'd had a paw there using them. "They had to be remote controlled," he realized. "They had a pretty big video board up in the balcony, I'll bet the raccoon up there was running the cameras."

"I've never seen remote control cameras," Jessie mused.

"They have ones that have basic little remote functions. These must be some pretty expensive cameras to have that kind of remote control ability."

Kit held his wife closely, her proximity and the fact she was sitting on his lap wearing a bikini getting to him, stroking the fur on her slender stomach as they watched the ceremony. Jessie kept twisting her wedding ring around her finger as they watched, as if to remind herself that it was there, then she gave a contented little sigh when she heard herself say I do. They watched the ceremony end, and then saw them standing there for a moment as their guests applauded and took pictures, as Endless Love played, dubbed into the background with the audio. The camera at the end of the aisle got a great shot of them coming back down the aisle at the end of the ceremony, and then the handheld camera the femme raccoon used captured video of them standing in the front of the church for a final picture opportunity.

“We sure didn’t give them much time,” Jessie giggled. “When Jim and Penny were married, their video people held them at the church for nearly an hour. They were soooo late getting to the reception!”

“They seem to have coped very well,” Kit noted.

“Who? My aunt and uncle?”

“No, the raccoons,” he said, motioning at his laptop. “Your script didn’t allow for extended photo shoots.”

She giggled “Vil’s suggestion. She said that if I made it clear we’d be first to the reception to greet the guests, it set the tone for the video people that we meant business. Where are the pictures?”

“They sent us DVDs for now. This note says we’ll get the photographs and the albums when we get back home,” he told her, holding up a letter included with the package. “Mike and Lilly’s pictures are in here, too,” he said, holding up two other DVDs. “I need to send them our pictures,” he said with a husky tone, sliding his paw up and down her stomach.

“Don’t you dare!” she giggled, slapping his paw. “Those are our pictures, and nobody else had better see them but us!”

“Hmm, I may have mixed the other pictures in with them on that memory card,” he mused.

“You better not,” she warned. “If you used that camera for anything else, I’ll erase that card, I swear!”

“Then I’ll just have to take the pictures over again,” he breathed, reaching behind her and pulling on the strings of her bikini top, undoing the knot.

“Always trying to get me out of my clothes!” Jessie accused with a giggle as Kit undid the knot, causing the bottom of her bikini top to drift away from her very shapely chest.

“Just keeping you pretty,” he teased, pushing her top aside to put his paw on the delights it concealed.

Her breath caught in her throat. “Kit, baby, we have an appointment, remember?” she said in a protesting voice, but she did nothing to stop him, and she began to purr.

“Not until ten,” he retorted, sliding his paw down to the waist of her bottom and snagging the material, sensually sliding his fingers under it.

She gave a shivering sound. “I’m willing if your back can take it,” she cooed in his ear.

He laughed against her neck and shoulder. “I’m gonna be spending our time in Cincinnati wearing a heating pad strapped to my back,” he admitted. “A bed that’s too soft and a wife I have to satisfy...I’m gonna be in sorry shape come the time we go home.”

“Oh, no, don’t blame that on me,” she teased. “Just who untied my top and started pawing me?”

“And who tackled me in the kitchen yesterday and all but raped me right there on the floor?”

“You can’t rape a boy. They’re always willing.”

“You sure as hell tried to prove that wrong,” he teased.

Jessie laughed, burying her face against his neck. “I thought you’d enjoy it,” she told him apologetically. “You know, me being all wild and wanton,” she added with a giggle. “Give you some memories of our honeymoon, since this wasn’t where our physical relationship started.”

“Memories are good. Scars, well, that’s another story.”

She laughed. “I guess I’m giving you quantity to make up for not being able to give you those memories. I don’t think we’ve ever had so much sex in three days.”

“I’m more than willing to go for the record,” he hummed, sliding more of his paw into her bikini bottom and making her gasp.

She grabbed his wrist and quite deliberately pulled his paw out of her bikini, then got up off his lap. “Well, you’re going to finish what you just started, my handsome fox,” she told him in a playful yet authoritative tone, pulling him up out of the chair and dragging him into the condo. “I think it’s time I give you another reason to get excited at the idea of leather sofas,” she grinned.

“Oh, be still my heart,” he breathed.

They snuggled on the couch afterward, and Jessie seemed bold enough to ask him about Suzy. “I could tell she still loves you when I met her,” she told him, rolling over on top of him and rising up, her paws on his chest as she looked down at him. “Did she talk to you about it?”

“Sorta. She admitted it, but also said she wanted to move on. She has a boyfriend now I think she hopes will propose to her,” he answered, unable to resist fondling her breasts with them right there and so deliciously available. She laughed and dropped down onto his chest, giving him a long kiss.

“I thought we just took care of this little problem,” she teased.

“That’s a task you’ll be working on for the rest of your life,” he answered.

“I can handle it.”

“So can I,” he said, squeezing her breasts deliberately.

She laughed helplessly, then she gave him a playful kiss. “We spent two whole days making love, I would like to spend our last day here at least seeing more of this place than the beach and tennis courts.”

“Why Misses Vulpan, are you saying you don’t love me anymore?” he said with a mock gasp.

“I’m saying I can love you when we get back from the tour,” she grinned, opening her maw and biting him lightly, playfully, across his nose and muzzle. “Now heel.”

“I’m a fox, not a dog. Foxes don’t heel,” he challenged.

“Neither do cats, but I’ll have to give you the rough side of my tongue if you don’t obey,” she warned with a mischievous grin.

“Oh, I’m so afraid of a naked femme,” he chided, slapping her bare bottom to accent his point.

She took her tongue and grated it right over his nose. She’d never done anything like that before, even when they french kissed, so the middle and back of her tongue, which were very rough, assaulted his tender nose with a sensation that was both unusual and actually painful. She’d licked him before, and licked him in some very sensitive spots, but she’d never licked him so hard, with so much force before, and it gave him an appreciation of what a cat’s rough tongue was capable of doing. He’d bet that she could scour the skin off his nose with that tongue if she was serious about it. He struggled under her, his arms windmilling wildly as that tongue tried to strip the skin off his nose, and when she finished, he very nearly sneezed before he burst into helpless laughter. “Now, don’t make me do that again,” she winked.

“I’ve never felt anything like that before!” he gasped as he fought for air.

“I’m a cat, baby,” she teased, digging her claws into his chest and sides lightly to remind him of that fact. “All my best weapons are always with me. Now don’t make me give you the rough side of my tongue again. Behave.”

“But I liked that punishment!” he protested. “Do it again,” he said with a grin.

“If you keep it up, I’ll do that someday when I’m doing something else for you.”

His eyes widened, and he shuddered almost involuntarily. “Okay, now that is a threat,” he laughed. “I’ll be good.”

“Don’t be too good,” she said impishly. “You make life fun with your antics and shenanigans.”

“Now I feel like I married an English professor,” he said seriously.

Jessie grabbed a pillow and bopped him with it. “You did,” she shot back.

“Oh. That explains it. You’re pretty hot for an English professor, you know that?”

She laughed helplessly.

The helicopter tour was breathtaking, flying them down to Key West along the land route, U.S. One, which went from key to key along bridges that connected each one to the mainland. In Key West, they and the other couple, a pair of martens, were treated to a carriage-ride tour of the city and lunch at one of the most exclusive restaurants in town. They then toured Ernest Hemingway’s house and were given two hours for shopping or personal sightseeing before the helicopter returned them to Marathon. Kit made sure to collect on Jessie’s promise when they returned.

She was right about one thing...they were having an awful lot of sex. Maybe she was right and they were just making it feel like a honeymoon with quantity, since their honeymoon wasn’t about the traditional reason of the pair getting to know each other physically. But for him, it was just one simple idea; she was his wife. That got him so turned on it wasn’t funny, and he couldn’t keep his paws off her...and she certainly seemed to be quite willing to succumb to his attentions. He had no idea why it got him so excited, but it did. Just knowing that that fine example of female cat was now his wife just made him want to touch her, and that touch made him want to kiss her, then undress her, then make love to her. Even the most casual contact between them could initiate a heated, passionate session of lovemaking, and it soothed his ego a little that he wasn't the only one that seemed vulnerable. Yesterday, the simple act of pulling Jessie's hair away from her face was what caused her to take him on the kitchen floor.

Maybe it was knowing that they'd be going from a condo where they could make love anytime, anywhere, to her parents' house, where they'd be much more restricted was what was making them both so bandy.

They watched the wedding video again in bed, laying on their stomachs side by side with the laptop in front of them. Jessie had her chin and muzzle supported on her paws, kicking her foot back and forth behind her, ghosting her tail over his back and legs as it swished back and forth. They smiled and commented and laughed and gasped through the second viewing of the video, then Kit loaded up the picture DVDs and they went through them all, both the Tricoon pictures and the ones that Lilly and Mike sent them. They laughed quite a bit, because the gang all had great senses of humor and they weren't afraid to show it for a camera. Lilly and Marty had decided to mimic the cake feeding tradition, but their idea of it was to smash pieces of cake into each other's faces, leaving them both a mess. There was also a good picture of Sheila and Muffy basically fighting over Ben, both of them hanging off him and kissing him on each cheek as Sheila pushed at Muffy's shoulder and Muffy poked one of her short claws into the side of Sheila's neck. They got a picture of Kevin and Sam, Sam holding up the bouquet, while giving each other a cool, speculative look. There was a great picture of Rick dancing with Hannah, and a picture of Jeffrey threatening to stab Sandy with one of the model replicas of a gladius that was on one of the tables.

"Oh!" Kit gasped.

“What?”

“I forgot to check the website,” he said, minimizing the picture viewer and bringing up his web browser. The condo had wireless through the whole compound, and it had taken all of two minutes when they arrived for them to add their laptops to the network. He brought up the magazine’s website, and there it was, just as Mike threatened. A picture of Kit and Jessie kissing at the end of the wedding ceremony, with lettering above and below the picture. Kit and Jessie Vulpan graced the top, and below that was It’s about damn time! There was an article posted on the website, written by both Barry and Lilly from the bylines. It described the wedding in detail, and made note of the fact that it was attended by quite a few notable people. They’d put up a bunch of pictures from the wedding on the website as well, but there wasn’t a single pictures on the site that they hadn’t sent on the DVD...except for one. It was a picture of Jessie putting on the garter that Kit threw at the reception, with her beautiful gown hiked all the way up to her thigh as she pulled the garter into place.

“Ooooh, be still my heart,” Kit said as he checked out the picture, and Jessie’s cheeks ruffled.

“That rat! I told her not to use that picture!” she complained.

“And you believed her? Hon, we gotta talk,” he laughed.

“At least my hose doesn’t let any of the perverts see anything,” she fumed.

“But it gives away the shape of those lovely legs,” he teased.

“Not another word, or you won’t touch those legs again for a week,” she said primly.

“I have pictures of them. And better things,” he winked.

“Yeah? Well, remember, buster, I have pictures of you too!” she reminded him. “If you don’t want me to send some really revealing pictures to the tabloids, you’ll watch your step.”

Kit laughed. “Oooh, so we’ve resorted to blackmail already?”

“It’s not blackmail. It’s the tactical use of available assets to gain an advantage over your opponent. Vil says so,” she said with a grin.

“I knew there was a good reason to keep you away from my family,” he sighed. “You’re just too young and impressionable.”

“I’m only seven months younger than you!” she protested.

“That’s a lifetime for some,” he noted sagely.

She reached over and swatted him on the snout. “Bad fox!” she admonished. “Be nice to your wife!”

“But I like being punished,” he protested.

“I think I need to find punishments you don’t enjoy,” she said musingly. “Duct tape, maybe.”

“Pft, that would rock if you used it right,” he suggested with a naughty tilt to his voice.

“Mmm-hmm. Then I pull it off you,” she noted.

Kit shuddered. “Alright, I take that one back.”

“Thought so,” she said with a teasing smile, then she leaned over and nuzzled his muzzle. Then she opened her jaws and clamped them down over his snout, forcing his head down. Jessie was a biter. She always had been, and this kind of bite, a clamping bite, was an impulse she often had, but had become much more prevalent in the days since they were married, now that Jessie felt that she was fully and completely his wife and lifemate. She would clamp her jaws on parts of him, most often his muzzle or neck, and hold onto him, or force him in a direction she preferred. It was behavior he'd expect from a wolf or a fox, but not from a cat...and was one of the subtle ways her fox side showed itself. Foxes too were biters, and clamping was an instinctual behavior among mates. Her jaws forced his head to the bed, which made her giggle at dominating him, then she rewarded him for his obedience by kissing him on the top of his muzzle. "You big faker," she taunted. "Acting all big, but you knuckle to me without a fight."

"And threaten my lifetime supply of the sexiest femme on earth? Dream on," he said calmly. "Besides, I didn't realize we were going to fight like animals for dominance in this marriage."

"Only over certain things," she said, then she began to purr as she nuzzled the top of his head. He winced slightly when she bit his right ear and held on, but she let go and lowered her head, clamped her jaws over his snout, and pulled to urge him to raise his head off the bed. She was just flaunting it now, teasing him by flagrantly controlling him. But she again rewarded him for his obedience, letting go of him and kissing him, which turned into a laugh when he flinched away, opened his jaws, and clamped them down over her shorter snout. Jessie could barely fit her jaws over his snout, but Kit had no trouble getting a firm grip on her muzzle, and he didn't let go of her. Kit had her jaws locked shut from his grip on her, exerting just enough force to hold her jaws shut without hurting her, so when she tried to talk, she had to do it through clenched teeth. "Leggo," she ordered. When he didn't release her, she slapped him lightly on the shoulder. “Kit, leggoame,” she commanded. “Kit! Leggo, you’re scarinme!” Kit couldn’t speak with his jaws pried open like that, but he exerted just a tiny bit of pressure on her muzzle, which made her flinch slightly. “Kit, leggopleeze!”

He released her. She flinched away and opened her mouth, rotating her jaw side to side as her paw checked her snout and chin for puncture holes, then she glared at him. “That wasn’t funny!” she complained.

“All you had to do was say please,” he said with a slight, evil little smile.

“Oh, so you wanna play, do you?” she called, then she lunged at him. Kit fought her off with paws pushing at her shoulders, but she overwhelmed him, rolled him over, then pinned him down with her paws on his shoulders and her weight holding him down, her legs straddling his stomach and legs, her tail writhing behind her. “Now who owns you, Mister Vulpan?” she demanded, grabbing his wrists and pushing them down to the bed over his head. “Huh? Who owns you? Come on, say it! You’re not getting up until you do!”

“Well, I’ve leased myself out to you with the option to buy,” he answered. “The rate was quite favorable and I could live with the down payment. But you never know, some rich old lady might come along and try to execute a hostile takeover.”

She gave him a startled look, unready for such a response, then she laughed. “Lease? I didn’t lease you, you silly male, I won you. I own you! You’re my trophy husband, after all! Soon, I’ll start my plan to steal your family fortune, then I’ll have to decide if I want to keep you,” she winked.

“Oooh, and what if you do?”

“I guess I’ll have to take you to Costa Rica or some other tropical getaway and crush your will by offering you unlimited love and devotion. Oh, and sex, of course. Lots of that,” she winked.

“You know me well,” he said in a mock serious voice, as if he were addressing a business rival. “I might have to find a way to torpedo that attempt at a hostile takeover.”

“You’d better,” she said with a teasing smile, dipping down and kissing him. Then, with a laugh, she clamped her jaws down on his nose and the end of his muzzle.

“Next time, dear, use a different angle and clamp my jaws shut,” he said, took in his breath, then blew into her mouth, hard. The sudden air startled her into letting go. “Or that happens,” he chided, pushing her head away from him with a paw to her upper chest.

She laughed and wiped her mouth with the back of her paw. “That was a creepy feeling.”

“Live and learn.”

One of their phones was ringing. Kit reached over Jessie and grabbed the ringing one off the nightstand and saw that it was Vil. “It’s Vil,” he said, putting it on speaker and holding the phone in front of both of them. “Hey sis,” he called.

“Sorry to disturb you two, but I had to call,” she said, her voice a little tinny through the speaker. “Having fun down there?”

“Your condo is awesome, Vil!” Jessie gushed.

“Yeah, I like it. Did you try the six hour sailboat excursion?”

“No, we took the helicopter tour and shopping trip to Key West,” Jessie answered.

“Ooh, that must be new,” she mused. “Then again, last time I was there it was summer, they offer different things at different times of year. You pregnant yet, Jessie?”

She laughed. “I’m trying!”

“She’s really trying,” Kit noted, which made Vil laugh and Jessie smack him on the shoulder.

“Ah, so, you really did have a honeymoon,” Vil teased.

“Oh, did we,” Jessie giggled, her cheeks ruffling. “It’s not over yet though,” she said teasingly.

“Well, it’s a tiny bit shorter,” she said. “There’s been a schedule change. I refunded your commercial tickets because I rearranged my schedule, and I’m coming to get you myself. I’ve already contacted the concierge and building staff about it and made the arrangements. Tomorrow at eleven you’re getting on a helicopter for Miami. I should be on the ground by the time you get there, so we’ll be on our way to Cincinnati. All the gifts you bought are already there, I put them on my plane and had them fly them over after I got home.”

“Thanks.”

“No problem bro. Sheila is going to come, just to warn you,” she told them.

“I don’t see a problem with that,” Jessie said.

“You will the first time she catches Ben under the mistletoe,” Kit chuckled.

“Ben’s a big boy, he can handle her.”

“Jessie, no male can handle Sheila when she’s being militant,” Vil said seriously. “It’ll be up to your mother to keep those two separate.”

“Oh, I’m not too worried,” Jessie giggled.

“So, remember guys, schedule change. Be ready to leave by ten thirty, and in case you forget, I’ve arranged to have the concierge call you tomorrow morning and remind you that you’re leaving.”

“I’m going to miss this place, it has everything,” Jessie sighed.

“Oh, don’t worry too much about that,” she said. “You won’t be living in squalor for long.”

“Huh? Vil, what did you do?” he demanded.

“Me? I didn’t do a thing,” she said, a little too sweetly. “See you tomorrow little bro, and brand new sis,” she said, then she hung up.

“That little—“ Kit grunted, but Jessie put her paw over his and looked at him.

“Leave her alone,” she said. “She enjoys pampering you, and it’s Christmas.”

“Oh come on, pretty kitty, I thought you understood.”

“I do understand. You don’t want money to poison us, and it never will. But look at it this way, love. Vil enjoys giving you the things she believes you deserve but were denied. Right?”

“Yeah, she does, but I don’t want it.”

“You mean to say you haven’t enjoyed this condo?” she asked archly.

He laughed. “Okay, you got me there. This place is awesome.”

“So, as long as she doesn’t give us money, and she doesn’t try to make us move away from the complex, why worry?”

He laughed. “Well, that’s a point, I suppose.”

“I’m going to ask her for a favor.”

“What?”

“Well, Lupe’s going to move us into the new buildings. Since they have to build them, I think I’ll ask to see if we can’t get a hot tub like the one here,” she said, her cheeks ruffling. “We can pay her back a little at a time.”

“You just said the magic words, love,” he said with relief.

“What?”

“Pay her back. That makes me totally confident about it now. You really aren’t letting all this go to your head,” he noted, motioning at the luxurious room.

“Well, it is nice here,” she admitted. “And I could get used to living in a place like this. But I also love our apartment, and our friends, and I don’t want to leave them. Vil tried to get me to talk you into letting her give us a house,” she admitted, “but I told her no. Partly because I knew you’d never do that, but also because I’m happy in our apartment. I love living right near Lupe and Dan and Mickey, and being so close to the campus and sorority so the girls don't have to go far to come see me. We have great friends, we have a great life. I want to keep it the way it is."

"I love you," he said honestly, nuzzling her by putting his muzzle under her chin and pushing up against her.

"Prove it," she teased lightly as he started nipping and biting gently at her neck.

"You're gonna have to wait a while, but eventually I'll do just that," he promised.

She laughed. "So I finally wore you out, eh? I knew I could do it eventually! Now I can get some sleep!"

"It only took three days. Doesn't that count for something for my ego?"

She giggled. "Your ego should be very proud of itself. It acquitted itself with full honors."

"It'll feel better once it gets you pregnant," he noted. "It's a major blow to my ego that I can't give you the one thing you want."

"Aww, you're so sweet," she gushed, nudging him with her shoulder. "What do you want to do tonight after we go on that scuba trip and have dinner down in the restaurant? The last night of our honeymoon," she noted. "We could go see that Broadway show, you know."

"I wouldn't mind trying to give you what you want," he said teasingly.

"You just made a deal," she hummed in her throat, and began to purr as he nibbled lightly at her ear.

Jessie was one cat that didn't mind water.

Kit, despite being from Boston, was actually a very good swimmer. It was easy when one spent lots of vacations in the tropics and had an indoor, heated, private pool. But Jessie showed that she bought her swimming two-piece out of experience, not out of fashion sense. The swimming two-piece was still sexy, but it also was practical for swimming, and Jessie proved it. They went scuba diving at one of the reefs off the keys, and Kit was amused at how they did it here. Usually one had to take several lessons to scuba dive, but Jessie received a two hour crash course in scuba diving, and when they went on it, trained scuba divers escorted them closely at all times... most likely to make up for the lack of individual training. There was a trained diver literally at arm's length for their diving adventure, swimming along a shallow coral reef, seeing quite a few colorful fish, and even seeing two rays and a small nurse shark.

They got back from the scuba excursion around five, and they showered to get the salt out of their fur and hair, dressed in very nice clothes—him his black suit and Jessie in a very sexy black dress she'd bought in Key West—and went to the five star restaurant down on the second floor of the building. The food was absolutely heavenly, the wine selection was outstanding, and the dining room was serenaded by a pianist at a grand piano on a raised pedestal in the center of the dining room. The entire pedestal raised and lowered, and also slowly rotated, which made Kit muse that they must interview quite a few pianists to find professionals good enough to play here without getting motion sickness up there.

Kit just thanked God he didn't have to pay for the meal. They were there on Vil's private account, everything they did paid for by her...and it was a damn good thing, for the cost of that meal was nearly a thousand dollars. The waitress brought him a check, and then the skunk realized that she'd made a mistake and took it back with a ruffled face and about fifty apologies.

“How much was it?” Jessie asked curiously.

“You don't want to know,” he said seriously.

Kit kept the wine. At four hundred dollars, he was damn well taking the whole bottle with him, and he wouldn't have wine of that quality again for many years.

They finished that bottle of wine up in their room, and they ended up going to bed early, but getting to sleep late.

The next morning, they had to get ready. The concierge called them at nine o'clock and gently reminded them that they had an eleven o'clock appointment to be picked up by a helicopter to fly them to Miami, and offered housekeeping servants to come help them pack their belongings and get ready to go. Kit declined the offer politely, and they regretfully packed their suitcases, put out their cold-weather clothes and shoes, and Jessie wrote a little thank-you note to the maids that came in and tidied up for them while they were there, then apologized for not having a tip for them to which they'd be accustomed given what kind of place it was.

Kit didn't have the heart to tell her that their tips were covered in Vil's account.

A steward pushed their luggage cart for them as they left Vil's condo, and he went down to the condo building manager and returned the key to him. “You still have nearly thirty minutes, Mister Vulpan, Misses Vulpan,” the rabbit told them with a smile. “Perhaps you’d enjoy some breakfast before you go?”

“I am a little hungry,” Jessie noted. “Would that be alright, since we’re kinda not guests here now? And can we afford it, Kit?”

The manager laughed. “Madam, you’re the brother and sister-in-law of one of our most important permanent owners,” he told her simply. “If I didn’t show you the hospitality you’re due, she’d sell her condo and find other accommodations, and I won’t stand for it. Miss Vulpan has always been one of our most prestigious and most thoughtful and pleasant tenants. To lose her would be devastating to the building and quite a blow to the people who work here, who always look forward to her visits.”

“And her tips,” Kit noted.

“Which is one reason why they’re always glad to see her,” he agreed with a smile. “The entire staff loves her, and they’d kill me if I snubbed her brother at the end of his honeymoon. Now, if you were the brother of one of the time-share tenants,” he mused and trailed off, which made both of them laugh.

“Sounds like we need to sneak down here without telling Vil someday,” Jessie said with a sly look at Kit.

The manager laugh. “Misses Vulpan, you’re more than welcome to do just that. I can put you up in a special condo we keep available for special guests, and I’m sure we can reach agreements over reduced rates and fees for our services for you.”

“We might have to do that, Kit!” Jessie beamed. “This place is fantastic!”

“I’m overjoyed you enjoyed your stay here with us, Misses Vulpan. Now, let’s get you some proper breakfast before you begin your trip. Going home?”

“Going to visit my parents for Christmas,” she answered as the manager led them from his office.

“Ah, going to the arctic tundra, from the look of you.”

She laughed. “Cincinnati,” she told him.

“For a Florida lemming like myself, that is the arctic tundra.”

The manager treated them to a breakfast of quiche and freshly squeezed orange juice, and then walked them personally to the helipad. He even helped the steward load their luggage onto the commuter helicopter. “I do hope you come enjoy another visit with us,” the manager said, shaking their paws, then he helped them into the helicopter and stepped back with the steward to watch them take off.

The flight up to Miami was uneventful. They landed at the Miami International Airport about a half hour after leaving Marathon Key, and there was a limousine waiting at the helipad. A burly badger took their luggage from the pilot as he unloaded it, and then told them he’d take them to the hangar. Kit thought it was a bit silly to ride a limo from a helipad to a hangar, but that was how they’d went when they got here, so they were doing it again going back. The badger ferried them across the airport on a five minute trip, and the limo pulled up to a private hangar in an annex off the main terminal area. “Miss Vulpan is on final approach now,” the badger told them as he opened the door for them and helped Jessie out. “Her flight was caught up by a ground delay that put the entire airport behind schedule.

“Oh no, allow me, Mister Vulpan,” he said as Kit picked up one of their suitcases.

“You don’t have enough paws to carry everything, and there’s nothing wrong with my arm,” Kit told him.

“Me either,” Jessie said with a smile as she shouldered their carry-on bag, holding their important things, their cameras, and both their laptops.

The badger chuckled and closed the trunk with two suitcases. “Very well, follow me please.”

They were given seats in a small lounge as they waited, but they didn’t have to wait for more than ten minutes before a member of the hangar staff came in. “Miss Vulpan’s jet is just outside and waiting to board you,” the black-furred rat told them with a short nod. “Please come with me.”

The jet was sitting outside of the hangar, its engines still running as a fuel truck refilled its fuel tanks. The hatch was open and stairs were down, and Vil was standing in the hatchway. She waved to them excitedly when the rat led them out onto the tarmac. “You’ll be passing in front of the engines,” he called loudly over the noise. “You’re going to follow me, but please listen as I give you a little safety briefing concerning operating around a jet with its engines going. Remember to always approach the jet from the nose and don’t go past the stairs. There’s no danger at all as long as you stay on the far side of the stairs from the engines. It’s going to be noisy. I can get you earplugs if you’d like.”

“We’ll be fine. Where is our luggage?”

“I have workers bringing your luggage as soon as you’ve boarded,” he answered. “Three suitcases and a garment bag, right?”

“That’s right.”

“Alright then, follow me please.”

The rat led them to the jet from the nose side, and then helped Jessie up the steps. Vil hugged her as she reached the hatch then ushered her inside, then she hugged Kit. Her panther bodyguards were in the jet, sitting on the chairs near the hatch, but Vil led them past them and towards the couch. “Close the hatch, Avery!” she shouted to the captain as she pulled Kit into the jet.

“But our luggage—“

“We have cargo doors, silly,” she told him. “You’re looking good! Did you like my condo?”

“I want to move in there,” Jessie laughed. “I never knew a place like that existed! It was like a cruise ship on dry land, and you own your stateroom!”

“Yeah, it’s awesome,” Vil agreed as she had them sit down. “That condo cost me six million dollars, but it’s worth it,” she noted, which made Jessie’s eyes bulge. “Sorry I’m late, there was some equipment thing that kept us from landing.”

“You and everyone else, from what the hangar people told us,” Kit added. “Oh, did you get a copy of the wedding video?”

“Of course I did!” she laughed. “Did it get to you?”

They nodded. “We have it with us.”

“You get some pictures of Key West?”

“Yeah, and we took a lot of pictures of the condo’s areas too, and the manager reminded us not to let anyone see them,” Jessie laughed.

“Yeah, they take privacy very, very seriously there. You can’t even show pictures of the grounds to people who aren’t owners or relatives of owners. So, show me your pics!” she demanded with a grin.

They fished their video camera and the camera they used out and showed them the pictures they took on the camera’s viewing screen. “We haven’t put them on DVD yet. The scuba guys had an underwater camera and they took some pictures of our scuba dive,” Jessie said, digging a DVD out of the carry-on. “That was so much fun!”

“Oh, I never did that when I was there. I was too chicken,” she laughed as Jessie dug a laptop out of the bag and booted it up. The jet began to move as Jessie put the DVD in the drive and accessed the pictures. “We went with another couple, a pair of wolves that were from California,” she said. “They totally snubbed us when they found out we weren’t rich,” Jessie laughed, pointing at a picture the divers took of all four of them in the water, near the boat.

“We’ll be taking off in a few minutes,” Avery’s voice called over the intercom. One of Vil’s bodyguards picked up her teacup and hurried it back to the galley.

“Thank you, Stav,” she called to him, then pointed to the monitor. “Wow, Jess, you look awesome in that bikini.”

“Thanks Vil,” she said with her cheeks ruffling slightly. “Look, here’s one of the stingrays we saw at the reef, the diver caught a pic of it. Oh, and they said this big floating jellyfish is called a Portuguese Man-O-War. They said it’s dangerous, so they kept us away from it. They even moved our dive site further away because it was drifting where they wanted to take us. I guess it has a bad sting.”

“Got me. I was a business major, not biology.”

“I was history,” Kit chuckled. “If the professionals think it’s bad, that’s good enough for me.”

The plane took off as Jessie showed Vil the diving pictures, then she dug into the carry-on and came up with a toy ukulele on a little stand, with Vilenne written on the neck. “Here, we got you this in Key West to put on your desk,” Jessie told her with a smile. “Merry Christmas.”

Vil laughed. “If this is all you got me for Christmas after everything I did for you, you’re in soooo much trouble!”

Kit and Jessie both laughed. “We got you a rock too,” Kit told her.

“Oh, I’m so blessed. Did you buy this rock, or was it something you picked up out of the golf cart path?”

“You’ll see. We wrapped it for you.”

Vil looked through the pictures and video again as her panther bodyguards served them tea and small sandwiches, then opened up the big TV screen that folded into the roof of the plane and started a DVD of The Shawshank Redemption that Jessie had bought in Key West. Vil’s brow raised noticeably, and she handed Kit the small silver camera they’d used for their private pictures. “I don’t think I need to see those,” she said delicately, which made Kit laugh and Jessie’s entire body of fur stand on end.

“I knew those wouldn’t stay private!” she complained.

“Relax, I saw him, not you,” Vil winked. “He’s gotten a little more impressive since the last time I saw him naked, but it’s still nothing I haven’t seen before.”

Kit’s cheeks ruffled, and Jessie erupted into laughter.

“I suggest you pull that memory card and hide it. Hannah seems like the snooping type to me,” Vil suggested delicately.

“That’s a good idea,” Jessie said, pulling the small memory card out of the camera and reaching for her purse.

“Well, I’m glad you seem to have had fun while you were there,” she added with a mischievous wink.

“You should see the video,” Kit said in a deadpan voice. “It’s a good thing they don’t enforce American law there, or we’d both be going up the river for years after what we did to that poor chipmunk.”

Vil gave him a startled look, then exploded into laughter. “That’s another reason why I sent you there, so you could be wild and uninhibited,” she grinned.

“We were about as wild as a box of corn flakes, thank you very much,” Jessie said primly, stuffing the memory card deep into her purse and putting it back on the floor by the couch.

“I think those pictures on that card say you were as wild as a box of Rice Krispies, not Corn Flakes,” she winked.

Kit laughed despite himself.

It took them about three hours to get to Cincinnati, landing in a cold, miserable drizzle. Airport workers unloaded their luggage into a waiting limo that pulled up by the plane on the tarmac, and one of the panthers held an umbrella for Vil as they disembarked. Kit held an umbrella for Jessie, carrying their bag as she carried her purse, moving quickly to the limo. Kit climbed in beside Jessie on the seat facing Vil, their backs to the driver, and one of the panthers got in with Vil as the other one got in the front seat. “Take us to the Williams house,” Vil ordered. “You two are staying there, aren’t you?”

“Well, nobody’s said we’re not,” Jessie laughed.

“From feast to famine,” Vil said with a sly little smile.

“Oh, hush,” Jessie replied primly.

Vil called ahead and warned Jessie’s parents they were coming, and they arrived about twenty minutes later, as the rain began to pound down with surprising vehemence. The panthers and the driver escorted them up to the front door with umbrellas, where John and Hannah were waiting for them on the porch of their rarely used front door. Jessie hugged her mother as Kit shook John’s paw, then Hannah embraced him as well, patting him on the back. “I’m glad you made it safely, we were worried with this rain,” she told him as the panthers and the driver brought their luggage up to the porch.

“It wasn’t raining at all until we landed,” he chuckled. “How was your flight back?”

“Boring, naturally. Your cousin arrived yesterday morning, she and Ben and Jenny are out at the mall right now,” she informed him.

“Oh? Have you locked her in the basement yet?”

John laughed. “She’s staying at the Sheraton, the closest hotel to here,” he explained. “We’re just out of room with you and Jessica here as well as Ben and Jenny. We offered her the couch, but she decided to go with a hotel.”

“Well, that’s not where I’m staying. I should pick her up,” Vil said as she hugged John, then hugged Hannah. “I’m staying at the Cincinnatian.”

“That’s not a surprise, dear,” Hannah chuckled.

“It’s not quite what I’m used to, but I got curious about it from what I read about it when I was looking for rooms here. It’s only four stars, after all,” she said airily. “However will I manage such dismal accommodations?”

“Be nice,” Kit warned.

“I’m just joking, bro, and they know it,” she grinned.

“Yes, she only pretends to be a stuck-up snob,” Hannah noted, which made Vil laugh. “Are you staying for dinner, dear?”

“I wish I could, Hannah, but I have a lot of work to do. I murdered my schedule for the wedding, and I’m still trying to catch up. I’ll have to pass tonight, and probably tomorrow as well.”

“But tomorrow’s Christmas Eve!” she protested. “We always have a family dinner on Christmas Eve and open one present. You have to be here!”

“I—alright, I’ll find time,” she said with a nod. “What are you having?”

“We have a small ham on Christmas Eve and turkey on Christmas day,” she answered.

“And leftovers for a month afterward,” John added lightly.

“Do I need to bring anything?”

“Well, we keep no spirits in the house, so if you want wine, you have to bring your own.”

“I’ll bring a bottle,” she said with a nod. “Oh, just one warning.”

“Yes?”

“If I bring wine, and Sheila’s there, she will want some.”

“She’s underage,” Hannah said simply.

“That’s a relative concept in our family, Hannah,” Vil told her. “The Vulpan children have had wine with dinner since they were twelve. Some of us even younger. It’s our tradition, just like the family dinner is your tradition. If you want, I won’t bring any. But you have to know what’s coming if I do, and be ready for it.”

Hannah looked torn for a moment, then nodded. “She will not drive, though,” she said. “If she takes a single sip, she will not leave this house under her own power.”

“I’ll pick her up and bring her to my hotel, so I can keep my thumb on her, Hannah,” she informed them. “You have her cell number, bro?”

“Yeah, I do,” he said, taking his phone out of his pocket. Vil read it and added it to her phone, then called her.

“Sheila. It’s Vil. Fine, just listen a sec. Pack your stuff, I’m moving you to my hotel so you don’t have to worry about getting back and forth. Well leave, silly femme, you can go again later tonight.” She glanced at Hannah and smiled. “She’s at the movies with your children,” she said, then returned to the phone and listened a moment. “You can stop trying to weasel out of it, girl. You will be moving to my hotel, or I’ll run you out of Cincinnati personally. I’m sure I’ll find it. Go back to your room and pack your things and meet me in the lobby.” She put her paw over the phone. “Do they still have taxis going here?”

“Of course dear, this isn’t a backwater village,” Hannah said with a smile.

“Okay, Ben and Jenny can either take a taxi back or they can go with us and I’ll have the limo bring them home. See you in ten minutes.” She turned off her Blackberry phone and put it back in her small purse. “I knew that was coming.”

“What happened?” Jessie asked.

“She has mischief on her mind, that’s what. She didn’t want to come to my hotel, even though it’s much more luxurious.” She looked to one of her bodyguards. “Would you mind terribly escorting Ben and Jenny back?”

“Not at all, madam,” he said with a nod.

“Thank you, Stav, you’re always a lifesaver,” she said to him gratefully.

“No need to usher the kids around, Mister Stav, they’re grown and in their hometown. But don’t worry about them, I’ll follow you to the hotel and bring them home,” John offered.

“That’s very kind of you, sir, but unnecessary,” he said, motioning with a large paw. “We can give them a ride in the limo, which they might enjoy.”

“It’s no trouble at all. And it gets me out of the house while Hannah works herself up to asking Jessie about her honeymoon,” he grinned. “Or I could just go with you and ride in the limo myself,” he proposed.

Hannah gave him a cold glare.

The panther laughed. “Well, if you insist.”

“That’s a deal, John,” Vil agreed.

“No problem at all, let me get my coat and boots,” he said, stepping back in and hurrying back to the laundry room, where they kept their outdoor gear.

“I’ll see you all tomorrow afternoon, then,” Vil said, giving Hannah another short hug, then she embraced Jessie and Kit at the same time, an arm over each of them. “I’m so glad to see that ring on your finger, little bro,” she chuckled in his ear.

“You’re next,” he teased.

“The planet would explode if I ever got married,” she snorted as the limo driver stepped up and prepared to cover her with an umbrella, and John returned with his boots and coat.

They came through the living room and kitchen, back to the laundry room that served as an entry area for the back door, and Kit took Jessie’s coat for her and hung it on the rack by the door, then removed his own as she bent down and took off her shoes. Hannah took Kit’s coat and hung it for him as he took his shoes off, then went back and picked up two of the suitcases from the porch and carried them up to Jessie's old room. Jessie was right behind him with the third suitcase, and Hannah carried the garment bag. "Is this—"

"No, Mom, it's not," she answered before she could finish. "I shipped my dress and Kit's tux to Rick the day after we got to Florida. I was going to just carry them, but Vil didn't want to take any undue risks with them. She had them shipped back to Texas like they were a Ming vase," she laughed. "We'll pick them up from him when we get home."

"What's in here then?"

"The dress I wore and the suit Kit wore in Boston. We're not quite as attached to those," she giggled.

"Amen," Kit grunted in approval. "I might burn that suit."

"Oh dear, tell me what happened, Kit."

"My sister invited my family to the ceremony in Boston," he grunted. "And I had no idea they were there. I literally saw them when the bishop led us in to begin the ceremony."

"Oh my. Why did she do that?"

"I still don't entirely understand why she did that," he said as he hung the garment bag in the closet. "I avoided murdering them if only because of the sanctity of the church," he said, glancing at Jessie, "and because this little trooper here did the talking for me," he added, which made her laugh.

"They were so arrogant and stuck-up, I just couldn't go without saying it," she told him.

"I think I need to hear this entire story in order," she noted.

“There wasn’t much to it, Hannah,” Kit said as he put a suitcase up on the bed and opened it. “The ceremony in Boston was already planned, to honor the wishes of my mother. Well, we get there and everything’s fine outside the fact that the Archbishop of Boston is there to do the ceremony himself,” he said with a frown.

“We walk in at the start of the ceremony, and they’re all sitting on the pews by the altar,” Jessie continued as she took a pawful of folded clothes from Kit and put them in the dresser. “They didn’t disrupt the ceremony or anything, at least. They were quiet all the way through. After it was over, we just tried to get out, but Vil stopped us and his family came over while she was talking to us. They were so rude!” she said angrily. “You should have heard it, Mom! They just talked like they never did a single thing to him, and then all but demanding him to do what they wanted! Like he was just one of their servants!” she flared.

Kit put a paw on her shoulder, and she blew out her breath and nodded. “Right about there, this little soldier here went off on them. I was never more proud of her,” he chuckled. “She dressed them down right there in the church and told them what they really were. I don’t think anyone has ever talked to them like that,” he chuckled. “But, they got what they wanted.”

“How so, Kit?”

“They heard it from us that we don’t want their damn money,” he told her honestly. “Actually, they heard it from her,” he corrected, patting Jessie on the shoulder. “That’s what it’s all about to them, Hannah. Money. I don’t know if we told you, but the lawsuit’s basically over.”

“Jessie mentioned something about it. She didn’t go into specifics, she just said that Vil had a lock.”

“Yeah, it’s over,” Kit said. “We can’t really say how or why, but it is. Vil’s going to win, and that means I’ll be named heir and executor of Dad’s estate. That had my family in a panic, because the deal that split the family fortune up among them will get nullified when Vil wins the case. I’m the one that’ll have all the money. Every penny.”

“Ah. So, they began kissing up.”

“No, they can’t even do that, Hannah,” he chuckled.

“You’d think they would, but you should have heard them, Mom! They talked like them disowning him had nothing to do with anything, and his aunt just basically ordered him to rejoin the family! You’d think that if you were in that position, you’d at least try to be nice to him! Their arrogance was absolutely unbelievable!”

“Love, the very idea that they’d have to submit to me is just beyond them,” he told her. “I’ve broken from the family, and I married a cat. That one fact made me amazed that Uncle Zach didn’t pull out a gun and try to shoot us right there in the cathedral. Zach is the most rabid purist that ever walked this earth. I’m amazed he could even manage to talk to me without trying to punch me in the nose.”

“That’s why he couldn’t suck up to you. He’s blinded by his hate, but not so blinded that he did something that would make you disown him,” Hannah said after a brief moment. “Greed is more powerful than hate, but that hate tainted his attempts to be nice. So, what are you going to do with it, Kit?”

“Give it back. Every penny,” he said honestly and immediately, giving another stack of clothes to Jessie. “I don’t want that money, Hannah. It’s a curse. It’s tainted. It would never bring me any happiness. That money is why I have this,” he said, pointing at his ear. “If I take it, it’ll change my marriage, it’ll change everyone around us, it’ll even change my relationship with you. It’s just not worth the baggage it comes with.”

“It’ll change those relationships either way when your friends find out you had it and gave it up.”

“Not as much as it would if I had it and they knew it,” he answered. “Money does things to furs, Hannah. It corrupts. It destroys. I don’t want any part of it.”

“I think you’re not the only opinion here, Kit,” Hannah told him. “I think Jessie has a say in this, or your vows don’t mean that much, do they?”

“He’s right, Mom,” she said seriously. “When I saw the rest of his family, I finally understood what he’s been saying all this time. Seeing it in action was like a slap in my face. He’s right, he really is. The Vulpan family fortune is a curse, Mom, it’s a curse that’s destroyed his family. I don’t want our marriage cursed, so I told his family myself that we don’t want a dime of their fortune. I fully support his plan to just give the money back to them, because he’s right.”

“You’re sure, dear? Think very carefully. I’ll agree that when you have too much money, it changes you, but a small amount, invested wisely, could supplement your working income quite nicely and allow you to never worry about money.”

“We already never have to worry about money, Mom,” Jessie told him. “If we ever have an emergency, we can always ask Vil for help. She’ll help us. She wants to do a lot more than help us, but Kit won’t let her. And since it’s not our money, and we fully know we’re taking it from someone else, it’ll keep us from getting crazy.”

“You really have thought about this,” Hannah said after a moment, as Jessie finished putting the clothes in the suitcase away.

“How could I not, Mom? Sure, Kit’s disowned, but the money’s still there, and even I thought about what if a few times. But when Vil offered to pay for the wedding, I realized then that she’d never let us slip into a deep hole. If we ask her for help, she’ll help us. But since we’re asking for something that’s not ours, we can’t go crazy, or we’ll lose respect for ourselves, and Vil will lose her respect for us.”

“You raised one hell of a daughter, Hannah,” Kit said appreciatively, opening the next suitcase. “Now do you see why I love her so much? She’s got quite a mind.”

“That’s not her mind talking, it’s her moral upbringing,” Hannah said. “But I’m proud of you, dear. You’ve certainly kept your head about this.”

“It was keep my head or lose my husband,” she said honestly. “Kit would have left me if he thought I was a gold-digger.”

“In a heartbeat,” he admitted honestly, handing her a few pairs of jeans.

She looked around curiously. “Isn’t this more than what you left with?” she asked.

Kit laughed. “Jessie kinda went crazy on a shopping tour of Key West,” he told her. “The condo place had to find us a third suitcase to fit it all.”

“Not all of this is mine!” she said quickly. “I seem to remember seeing you walking out of Emersons with several bags!”

“True, but you bought more than me.”

“Well, that’s technically true, but I’m a girl. Girls have more clothing demands,” she said primly.

“You don’t have to dress up for me,” he chuckled. “As far as I’m concerned, the less you have on, the prettier you are.”

“Kit!” she complained, her cheeks ruffling as he pointed at Hannah.

“We’re married now, love, I’m allowed to say things like that in front of your mother,” he said with a sly smile.

“Kit.”

“Yes, Hannah?”

“Behave.”

“Yes ma’am,” he said, coming over and kissing Jessie on the cheek, which made her giggle and put her paw around his shoulder.

After they unpacked, they went back downstairs to look at the tree. It was a seven foot artificial tree with a large number of delicate glass ornaments, some bulbs, some blown glass, some sculpted. Hannah seemed to collect Christmas ornaments, for there were many different kinds on the tree, interspersed with tiny glass candy canes with frosted stripes and twinkling white lights. The tree was curiously without the kind of color one would expect to see on a Christmas tree, but it was still very beautiful. The glass caught the white light of the bulbs on the tree and refracted it, and at some angles the tree seemed to be alive with a thousand scintillating rainbows. It was a stunningly beautiful effect.

“Woah,” Kit breathed as he stared at the tree, the area beneath it absolutely stuffed with gifts and presents in a riot of different colors and styles of wrapping paper.

“John has his Bengal Den, I have my Christmas tree,” Hannah said modestly, stepping past him and patting him on the cheek, then sauntering into the living room as if she’d just won some kind of argument.

They added the gifts they’d bought in Florida to that huge pile, so many that they had overflowed the tree and were stacked against the wall behind it, taking up almost half of the wall. Just by casual glance, there had to be well over a hundred presents under and around the tree! Kit inspected them, and realized that over two-thirds of them were from Vil, to all the members of Jessie’s family, and there were also quite a few from Sheila. That unsettled Kit just a little bit. Vil loved to meddle, and it looked like she was starting to meddle with Jessie’s family as well, starting, as she usually did, by worming her way into their heart with gifts and kindness, which put her in a position to exert her influence on them. Kit loved his sister, but he also wasn’t blind to her faults, and that was one of them. Vil was a Vulpan, and she shared many of the family traits. She sought to dominate, and unlike his aunts and uncles, Vil’s type of domination was from the kindly overseer point of view, in her mind doing it for their own good. Vil would shower Jessie’s family with gifts, but there were hidden hooks in those presents that would snare Jessie’s family and give Vil a measure of control over them.

But then again, John and Hannah were very wise and down to earth, and wouldn’t be easy to tempt with Vil’s presents and her money. But Jenny and Ben, on the other hand, might be easier for her to sway.

“These are from Vil. These are too. And so are these,” Jessie said, frowning. “She’s trying to buy my family, Kit!”

“I doubt she’ll have much luck,” Kit told her. “Hannah’s not the type you can buy.”

“We fully expected something like this,” Hannah said as she came back into the living room, carrying two cups of Earl Gray tea, copying what Jessie had bought for his visit. “Vilene is a rich woman, Jessie, and she’s flaunting it just a little bit for us by showering us with gifts. But, I think there’s also some love there,” she said with a slight smile. “Vilene is very attached to you, Jessica. She’s just trying to show you how much she cares about you by being lavish.”

“Well, this is a bit too lavish,” Jessie complained. “There has to be thirty gifts here from her!”

“Closer to fifty, if you add the gifts she got you two and Sheila,” Hannah corrected.

“Vil bought gifts for Sheila?” Kit asked in surprise.

Hannah nodded. “Sheila brought a whole trunkful of gifts as well. About thirty of them down there are from her. Sheila got here yesterday and immediately had Jenny and Ben take her to the mall,” she chuckled. “I think they just had to flaunt their wealth a little bit.”

“That’s not far from the truth,” Kit nodded. “I think it’s going to be a pretty interesting Christmas for you, Hannah. Vil and Sheila have very deep bank accounts, and neither of them are afraid to spend it.”

“Well, I have a son-in-law now, so that automatically makes it different,” she told him.

“I’ll do my best to make sure you hate me, just as a proper in-law relationship should be,” he said in a light voice, stepping up and kissing her on the cheek.

Hannah gave him a frosty look as Jessie laughed, then she actually dared to reach down and swat him on the bottom. “You’re already on thin ice as it is, young male,” she warned. “Don’t go looking for trouble that’s already looking for you.”

“Well, I don’t have to be nice anymore,” he teased flippantly. “We’re already married. Now the real me can ooze through the cracks in my polite and gentlefurly veneer.”

“Jessica,” Hannah said, snapping her fingers and pointing. Kit didn’t see what that meant until the throw pillow from the couch appeared in Hannah’s paw, and she belted him right in the head with it. Kit staggered back, nearly spilling his tea, and retreated as Hannah advanced on him threateningly with the pillow, then ran for the stairs.

“Now I see where she gets her pillow skills,” Kit laughed as he ran upstairs and to safety as quickly as he could while carrying a half-full cup of tea.

“I taught her well!” Hannah shouted after him as he fled, then he heard the two femmes share a laugh as he retreated to the safety of Jessie’s room.

Kit wasn’t surprised that Hannah wasn’t afraid to play, but he was a little surprised that Jessie got her deadly pillow combat skills from her mother.

John returned not long afterward with Ben and Jenny, and Sheila arrived not thirty seconds after he pulled into the driveway. The limo was pulling away from the house, but there was also a rental car sitting out on the street. Sheila hugged Jessie, then patted her on the belly. “So, there something growing in here yet?” she asked.

Jessie laughed. “I don’t think so, but I wish there was,” she answered.

They spent the evening just hanging around in the basement. Kit sat at the end of the couch, and Jessie sat snuggled against him as they chatted with Jessie’s family, then showed them the video and pictures from the wedding using the big TV and their DVD player, and the family showed Jessie and Kit the pictures they’d taken. While they watched, Kit moved all their pictures taken during the honeymoon they were willing to show to others onto a DVD, then showed those after they went through all the wedding pictures. Jessie’s family was amazed by the pure luxury of Vil’s condo, for they’d never seen or heard of a place like it before.

“They don’t advertise, Hannah,” Kit told her. “You either know about it, or you don’t.”

“Like Fight Club,” Jenny giggled.

“More like Eyes Wide Shut,” Sheila amended. “Places like that don’t just cater to what you can get legally.”

Jessie nodded. “When we arrived, the concierge said as much. I was a little shocked.”

“The rich have their own rules,” Kit told them.

Sheila got her first cooking lesson from Hannah that night. While everyone else was watching a movie downstairs, Sheila helped Hannah prepare broiled salmon, mashed potatoes, asparagus, salad, and banana pudding for dessert. After dinner, Kit volunteered to do the dishes, which

John joked would set a bad precedent for the males in the house to volunteer for chores, at least until Hannah gave him a cold look and told him to take out the garbage.

Though Vil was too busy to come visit, she wasn't too busy to call. She talked to everyone in the house by turns for about five minutes that evening, while they were watching another movie down in the Bengal Den. It wasn't all that exciting of a movie to Kit, and he nodded off somewhere in the middle of it. Much to his surprise, he woke up some time later in bed, of all places, all undressed and with Jessie wrapped up with him. He blinked and tried to get up, but that was quite impossible with Jessie's dead weight pinning him to the bed. He got his head up enough to see that it was nearly one in the morning, and he couldn't remember getting up and coming up to bed.

"Ben carried you and I undressed you, now go back to sleep," Jessie murmured, getting a better grip on his shoulder and hiking more of her weight up onto his chest to push him back to the mattress.

They lounged in bed until nearly eleven. Kit woke up groggily and realized he'd slept over twelve hours after looking at the clock, and boy, did his back register that amount of time in an incompatible bed when he woke up. He untangled himself from Jessie and sat on the edge of the bed, hissing in pain with both paws on his lower back, his tail shivering.

Did he really sleep that long? The last he remembered, it was around ten, and they were watching one of John's favorite movies, It's a Mad Mad Mad Mad World, and he didn't remember falling asleep. He didn't remember coming up to the room, or anything. One minute he was watching the movie, the next he was here, some thirteen hours later, with a sand-filled head and a back that was threatening to go on strike. He stood up and stretched, which made his back pop loudly, and he looked around to try to get his bearings as his brain attempted to re-engage itself.

A paw on his tail told him that Jessie was awake. He looked back and saw her sitting up even as she pulled his tail, forcing him to sit back down, then she snaked her arms around him from behind and kissed him on the corner of his neck, where his white ruff bordered his red fur. “I can’t believe we slept so long,” she said sleepily, resting her muzzle on his shoulder.

“Guess those four days in Florida caught up with us,” he chuckled, leaning against her.

“How’s your back?”

“A little gimpy this morning, but I’ll make it,” he answered.

He heard her hum in her throat, then began to purr, sliding her paws down his chest as she cuddled up more against his back. Kit knew her well, and knew that she was in the first stages of pulling him back down into that bed. “Jessie,” he said as she started biting gently at his ear.

“Mmm?”

“I’d usually never say no to you, but I’m not sure my back is ready for that. Can we wait a while?”

She giggled in his ear. “We need to get back to reality anyway,” she agreed, grabbing his shoulders and kissing his ear. “But I’m going to hold you to that later. I think I’m going to make sure Santa skips us tonight, because I’m being a bad girl.”

Kit's tail shivered at her husky tone, and he laughed. "Tease. I'm going to go down and get some breakfast."

"I'm going to take a shower, I'll be down in a bit," she told him.

Hannah was already busy cooking when he came down, but she had a kettle of water waiting to be put on for his tea. "It's about time," she noted. "I was afraid to come wake you up. I wasn't sure if you were sleeping."

"I think it was the crash after the honeymoon," he said, scrubbing his face with his paws. "I don't even remember falling asleep last night."

"Ben carried you upstairs," she told him.

"Well, that explains that," he said as he went to where they kept the tea last time he was there, and found it waiting for him. It was a new box of Earl Grey, no doubt Hannah just mirrored what Jessie bought over Thanksgiving. "I was wondering how I got up there."

"You feel alright?"

"Stiff, Jessie's bed does not like me. Where's the aspirin?"

"Medicine cabinet," she answered as she began to glaze the small ham.

Kit made a cup of tea for himself and Jessie, and after taking some Advil, he sat at the table and read the newspaper that John had left. Jessie came down while he was reading the sports section, a towel around her hair and wearing a bathrobe, going straight for the tea sitting in a cup on the table and swallowing almost all of it in one long draw.

"Morning, Jessica," Hannah said from the kitchen. "You alright?"

"I slept way too long," she complained, putting her paw to her head. "I feel like I have a headache."

“Honeymoon crash,” Kit chuckled.

“Probably,” she laughed in agreement.

The day was spent more or less idly. Kit was introduced to Ben’s Xbox 360 by Ben and Jenny, and found out that Jenny was one of those rare creatures on earth, a girl that knew how to play Halo, and wasn’t that bad at it either. He also found out that playing Xbox on that huge TV downstairs was awesome. Jessie wasn’t a gamer girl type, she instead spent the time watching her husband and siblings play while she sat on the far couch, legs tucked under her, knitting using her mother’s knitting supplies. Kit often forgot that Jessie was very good at knitting, because she’d been too busy lately to indulge in what was for her a stress-reducing hobby. She didn’t knit seriously, only for fun, but she was more than capable.

“Making baby booties over there, Jessie?” Jenny teased as she took up the needles from her mother’s knitting bag.

“Nah, thinking of a potholder,” she answered. “You still knit?”

“Hell no!” Jenny laughed. “I hate it.”

“At least you can make your own clothes,” Kit chuckled.

“I’ll have people make my clothes for me, thank you,” Ben said as they loaded up a new game.

“I’m being left out,” Jenny complained. “My sister marries a rich guy, and my brother’s gonna pull down millions of dollars a year once he reaches the NFL. I’ll be the family pauper!”

“Suuuure, Miss Future Doctor,” Jessie teased. “If anyone’s gonna be the pauper around here, it’ll be me. Kit’s not rich, he’s just from a rich family that he hates.”

“Pft, you’re still rich, even if you’re broke. You know, that snooty blue blood. Kit’ll infect you with it.”

“Infection’s a good way to look at it,” Kit chuckled. “I always did look at being rich as a disease.”

“Well, as long as I don’t lose my head,” Ben said modestly. “I just hope I don’t. I don’t want to be one of those spoiled guys like T.O., no matter how good I get. Guys like him forget that football is a team sport. It takes the other ten guys on the field to help you look great.”

“Well said, son, well said,” John said as he came down into the den. “Now, we just have to hope that Cincinnati drafts you when you get out of college. I’d suffer a nervous breakdown if you went to the Browns or the Steelers.”

“Your son playing for your most hated enemies,” Kit laughed. “That would be cruel to you!”

“I wouldn’t know what to do with myself,” John chuckled as he nodded in agreement. “At least this will be the year!”

“He says that any time the Bengals reach the playoffs,” Jenny told Kit.

“Hey! You have to back your team with your heart and soul, Little Miss Doubter!” he told her. “The Bengals are winning the Superbowl this year!”

“I’ll put a bet on that, Dad,” she teased.

“What is this I hear? You spend one year in Columbus, and now you’re doubting the Bengals? That’s it, young lady, you’re coming back home and finishing school here!”

Jenny laughed. “No way! I still love my Bengals, Dad, but I’m a football realist. They’re gonna lose their first playoff game, and the Colts are gonna go to the Superbowl.”

“I’ll take some of that action,” Kit said immediately. “The Patriots had a damn good year this year.”

“Is that an offered bet I hear?” Jenny said tauntingly.

“Ten bucks on the Patriots to go to the Superbowl,” Kit offered, digging a ten out of his pocket and slamming it down on the coffee table.

“You’re on!” Jenny said immediately. “I’ll put my ten on the Colts!”

“And I’ll put my ten on the Bengals!” John added.

“And if nobody wins, that money goes to the house,” Hannah said as she came down into the basement. “Thirty dollars would be a nice start on a dinner fund for Outback the next time I feel like going out to eat.”

“You have a deal, hon,” John told her.

Sheila and Vil arrived that afternoon, and they had the Williams traditional Christmas Eve dinner. Stav and Marcus seemed reluctant when Hannah pushed them to the table, but gave in and seated themselves to eat with the family, though they said not a word. The food was excellent, but it was the company that made it wonderful. Vil gelled very well with Jessie’s family, but he was surprised by how well Sheila got along with them. She bantered with Hannah almost dangerously, teased John and Jenny, and was a bit too forward with Ben, but Jessie’s family accepted her despite those issues. They coaxed her into telling her life story to them, about what it was like growing up a Vulpan, and her new life as a semi-autonomous young woman going to Harvard. “It’s not that bad,” she said. “My morning class sucks, but I enjoy my business classes, and I’m actually getting decent grades!” she said proudly.

“Wow, Harvard, I wonder what it’s like,” Jenny mused.

“It’s kinda boring, actually,” she said. “The students are all stuck up, either because they’re rich or because they managed to get into Harvard. There’s a lot of mutual butt-kissing going on on campus. The only fun furs are the legacy students, like me. At least we know how to have fun,” she grinned.

“I was there for the degree, not because it’s what was expected of me,” Vil said. “I went from Harvard to Oxford,” she explained. “I got my political science Master’s from Oxford, and my Bachelor’s and Business Master’s degrees from Harvard.”

“Prestigious,” John chuckled.

“You don’t get legacied into Oxford,” she said, a touch smugly. “You earn it.”

“You have two degrees?” Jenny said, a bit surprised.

“For what I do, understanding both politics and business is essential,” she nodded in explanation. “Being a CEO of a company like ours requires someone who deals with both politicians and businessfurs, so I covered both bases. Oxford won’t take legacies and it’s fearsome competition to get in, so my getting into Oxford for my political science Master’s program just proved to my father how serious I was about running the company after him.” She sighed. “He died just a few months after I finished my thesis and took my MCE.”

“You getting a Doctorate?” John asked.

“I’m already working on it,” she nodded. “It’s very hard because of how busy I am, but Harvard is letting me slide on the time limits on some of the required coursework. I do what I can when I can, the only real problem I’m gonna have will be when it’s time to do my dissertation.”

“Doctorate in what?”

“Business, but I wouldn’t mind eventually getting my Doctorate in political science too,” Vil answered. “Unlike the rest of the family, I’m actually entertaining the idea of going into politics after I’ve done the CEO thing for a while, and one of us has an heir to take my place,” she chuckled.

“Oh, no, don’t even think of trying to get my kids in the chair,” Kit warned.

“Well, I’m thinking more along the lines of me,” she said. “I’m coming up on thirty, bro, and I don’t have any kids. I’m starting to hear the ticking coming from down here,” she said, pointing under her ribcage. “The problem is, I can’t find any males that even remotely interest me. Maybe I’ll go to England and look,” she mused. They all can’t be like Cybil over there.”

“There’s lots of males around, Vilenne, you just have to look,” Hannah told her.

“Yeah, well, I do have a few prerequisites,” she said with a smile. “He has to be accomplished, intelligent, and, well, no offense, but a fox. I’m no purist, but to be honest, I just don’t get turned on by males outside my species. I could go for a gray or silver fox, but I'm not attracted to males who aren't foxes. They just don't do anything for me at all."

"There's nothing wrong at all with that, dear, as long as you're honest about it," Hannah told her. "And that you'd look at grays and silvers shows that you're not a purist."

"Thanks, I was hoping that wouldn't offend you," she chuckled.

"Well, dear, no doubt you'll have no trouble attracting a male."

"Yeah, but attracting the right male is the trick," she said. "I don't want a male version of Cybil."

Kit nodded in agreement. "One of the curses of money, Hannah. The leeches."

"That's a good term for them," Sheila laughed. "You have no idea how many guys hit on me cause I'm a Vulpan. They want to marry into the money. So I just screw them and leave them. That way they get a taste of what they'll never have again," she smiled.

"Sheila, that's not very proper," Hannah said disapprovingly.

"Hey, I'm not a proper girl," she grinned in reply.

"It's a losing battle, Hannah," Vil said with a chuckle.

"Yes, and she'll lose it," Hannah said frostily, giving the young vixen a steady look.

After dinner, Jessie's family traditionally opened one present, and they moved to the living room for it. Hannah was the one that chose them, pulling gifts at random from the huge pile, one for each of them. Ben was the first, getting a small box from Sheila. He opened it to reveal a necklace with a medallion of the Ohio State logo, a huge O with the words OHIO STATE curved through its lower half, gold letters with a silver background, connected to a thick silver chain. There was a single small diamond and a single small ruby above and below the text of the logo, representing the school colors of red and white.

“Wow, it’s beautiful, Sheila!” he said with wide eyes. “Thanks!”

“I had to get you something with your school logo on it,” she grinned.

Jenny was handed a small box from her father. When she opened it, she pulled out small piece of paper. “What’s this?” she asked curiously.

“A gift card good anywhere on campus at Ohio State, dear,” he told her. “We got you some real presents, to be sure, but we also thought you might like to have a little extra spending money next semester.”

“Aww, thanks Dad!” she said sincerely, kissing him on the cheek. “No doubt I’ll get some mileage out of this!”

“It’s rechargeable, dear, just like a pre-paid credit card,” he told her.

Jessie was next, being handed a medium sized box that was from Vil. She opened it to reveal a Blackberry, the same model as what she and Kit had. “I figured it was time to subvert you into the ranks of the Crackberries, Jess,” she grinned.

“Well, I love Kit’s,” she laughed. “Thanks for getting me one of my own!”

Hannah picked out a smaller box for John, also from Vil. He opened it and removed a small letter. He read it, and his eyes widened. “Vilenne!” he gasped.

“What is it, Dad?” Jenny asked.

“It’s a luxury box at the stadium!” he said. “And four season tickets for next year on the first row at the fifty yard line!”

“Kit said you were a nut for your football team, so I had to do something about it,” she grinned. “I figured you wouldn’t be happy unless you were right on the field, so the tickets are for you, and the luxury box is for your guests or when you don’t feel like sitting in the rain.”

“A true fan endures the same elements as the team!” he said with a laugh. “But still, this is wonderful! I can invite people to the box and let them watch the game while I sit in the stands like a real fan!” He got up and hugged Vil, then gave her a kiss on the cheek.

“Hey, you’re family now, and I love spoiling the family I care about,” she winked.

“I’m looking forward to tomorrow now,” Jenny laughed.

“You better, hon, I have plans,” Vil said with a smile.

“It’s going to be hard to top that one,” Hannah laughed as she picked one at random for Kit. It was from Sheila, about the size of a shoe box. He opened it and found a box, then opened the box and gawked.

It was a metal statuette of Jessie.

Naked.

“Umm, this one’s not fit for family viewing,” he said, his cheeks ruffling as he put the lid back on, which made them all explode into laughter.

“Sheila!” Vil chided. “What did you get him?”

“Lemme see,” she said, coming over and looking over his shoulder. “Oh Kit, give it up, this isn’t dirty! Not saying there aren’t a few dirty ones in there, but this one’s art.”

“Jessie might disagree.”

“Pft,” she said, reaching into the box and pulling it out. “See, it’s just a figurine. Since Kit has this thing for cats, I got him one of a cat.”

Hannah looked closely at the figurine. “Sheila, that statue has Jessica’s face.”

“Yes, well, the artist needed something to go on,” she winked. “So I gave him some pictures of Jessie.”

“That’s me? I’m not wearing any clothes!” she protested, her face poofing out.

“Well it is quite a nice piece,” Vil said professionally, taking it from Kit. “It’s very good. Did he do this as a cast?”

“I dunno, I guess, I don’t know anything about how artists do this crap,” she shrugged. “It just looks good, that’s all I know.”

“There’s nothing nude about it, either, Jess,” Vil said. “Look. It’s just a silhouette, no detail. It’s very nice. Who did this for you, Sheila? I might commission one for myself, it’s quite lovely.”

“Well, the proportions are right,” Jenny grinned, which earned her a smack from Jessie.

“I think I’ll avoid Sheila’s presents from here out,” Hannah said, which made them all laugh. She pulled a gift out from John, and opened it to show them a very handsome blue dress. “Why John, it’s lovely! Thank you!”

“It made me think of you when I saw it in the window, hon,” he told her. “It’s definitely you.”

“It is at that, dear,” she nodded, standing up and holding it against herself.

Hannah handed a gift to Sheila, and Kit recognized it as one they’d bought in Florida for her. “Uh, Hannah,” Kit said, “pick another one.”

“What? Why?”

“Because I don’t think that gift would be appropriate.”

“Oh, it’s a dirty gift? A joke? Gimme!” Sheila said, snatching it out of Hannah’s paws and tearing it open. She exploded into laughter when she revealed a latex blow-up doll, Horny Harry. Hannah gave Kit and Jessie a heated look, then she laughed ruefully as the entire room exploded into laughter. “We found it in Key West, and we naturally thought of you, Sheila,” Kit told her with a laugh.

“Oh baby, and he’s cute too! I’ll try him out tonight and let you know. You have a bike pump I can borrow, John?” she winked. Hannah gasped, but Kit and Vil almost fell off the couch laughing.

“Oh my,” Hannah, sighed. “I should have fought this marriage, I see.”

“Oh, go on, dear, and give Vil a present,” John chuckled.

Vil received a small gift from John and Hannah, and opened it to reveal a pair of very elegant chain and diamond earrings, three diamonds hanging from mounts that dangled from an emerald at the post, by delicate little golden chains. “Oh my, these are lovely. Thank you,” she said, removing the ruby earrings she had in her ears and immediately put them on.

“We thought they’d go well with the kinds of suits you wear, dear,” Hannah said. “And they look elegant enough to be worn by a woman of your means.”

“That they are, Hannah,” Vil nodded.

“Now then,” Hannah said, taking out two small black-paper wrapped gifts, and offering them up and across the room, where Stav and Marcus stood near the front door. “We couldn’t very well ignore you two, now could we?”

“You’re quite gracious, madam,” one of the panthers said with a surprised look. He read the tag and then handed it to his brother, then opened it. Inside was a pair of Ray-Ban sunglasses, and not the cheap ones, which made him chuckle and hold them up. “How thoughtful! And they’re even my size,” he said, putting them on.

“Well, you two just looked the sunglasses type,” John chuckled. “We hope you like them.”

“I’ll wear them quite a bit, sir,” the other panther said with a sincere smile, trying his on. “Good sunglasses are a requirement for our line of work, so onlookers can’t tell exactly where our eyes are looking. And you even got the proper tint,” he said with a satisfied nod. “Just dark enough to hide the eyes but not so dark we can’t see in dimly lit rooms. Very well done, sir.”

“Way to make me feel rotten there, Hannah,” Sheila said darkly. “I totally forgot to get them anything!”

“There’s still time if you hurry, dear,” Hannah said with a slight smile.

“That’s quite alright, Miss Sheila,” the first panther said with a wave of his large paw. “We quite understand, and honestly weren’t expecting any gifts at all. But we do appreciate that you’d get us one if you could.”

Kit and John cleaned up after dinner so the girls could relax, and Vil and Sheila left not long afterward. To her credit, Hannah had never said a word about Sheila drinking wine at her table, and after Vil and Sheila left, Jenny gave her mother a strange smile. “So, Mom, think I might try a glass of wine at dinner tomorrow?”

“Over my dead body,” she answered immediately. “I bent for Sheila because it’s a tradition of her family, and for no other reason.”

“We need a tradition like that.”

“When you have children of your own, you can start one,” Hannah told her sternly. “But you will not taste a single drop of alcohol in this house until you are of legal age.”

“Why couldn’t I be born into a fun family?” she sighed as she walked away.

“I’ll show you some fun, young lady!” Hannah barked, which made Jenny laugh and run away, retreating for the stairs.

Kit was feeling a little tired after dinner and presents, and lounged about downstairs as the family watched a movie on the big TV. Jessie and him took up a whole couch since he was laying on his side with his head in her lap as she played with his hair. About halfway through the movie, he yawned and sat up. “I think I’m gonna head to bed guys,” he said. “All that sleep I got last night has messed up my internal clock or something.”

“I’ll come with you, love,” Jessie told him. “I’ve seen this movie anyway.”

“Sleep well, you two,” John said as they got up.”

“You’d better not wake me up,” Jenny called, wagging her tail at them. “So get it done before I go to bed.”

“Jennifer Ophelia Williams!” Hannah barked, which made Ben laugh. “Behave yourself!”

“I am, mother,” she answered calmly. “They’re married and going to bed way too early to be sleeping. You’re not the one whose bedroom is beside theirs. I’m not sure I want to hear all that moaning and the bed knocking against the wall while I’m trying to sleep.”

Jessie’s entire body of fur stood straight out, but John laughed with his son. “Leave her alone, dear, she does have something of a valid point,” he smiled, which made Jessie gasp.

“Dad!”

“Go on, and have fun, you two,” John said mildly, though he was smiling.

“Well, I think we can do that,” Kit said, taking Jessie’s paw and leading her away from her family.

It was certainly the most momentous Christmas ever for the Williams family.

Vil and Sheila arrived at seven in the morning, sharp. Vil was wearing, of all things, a sweater and a pair of jeans, the first time Kit had seen her out of business clothes since before he was disowned, and Sheila was wearing a brand new black Cincinnati Bearcats tee shirt and a pair of jeans. Kit and Jessie woke up around six thirty, got dressed, and went down to help Hannah cook breakfast of omelets and sausage for everyone. Vil and Sheila arrived as they were sitting down to breakfast, and Hannah cooked them up something as well. Jenny kept looking at the huge stack of gifts like a child, until her parents finished breakfast and announced it was time to open the gifts.

Kit was a little unsettled about it. If the football tickets were any indication, then Vil had gone nuts with the shopping, and Sheila wouldn't be that far behind...and his fears turned out to be justified. Hannah seemed to wisely sense that anything opened after Vil and Sheila's gifts would seem paltry by comparison, so all other gifts were opened first. After that, though, they started on the gifts from their rich in-laws. Vienne's gifts to his wife's family were extravagant. Each member of Jessie's family got their own digital camera, top of the line Sabletech laptop, and BlackBerry. She showered Hannah with kitchen appliances, nice clothes, jewelry, a plasma TV for their room, and tickets to a March two week cruise through the Caribbean for a vacation. John received clothes, electronic gadgets, a blazing fast desktop for the house, and a football signed by every member of the Cincinnati Bengals in a glass case. Ben was given two game consoles in addition to a laptop, a desktop for his dorm when he went to Ohio State, and all kinds of other gadgets and toys a college kid would love. Jenny too received a plethora of useful equipment for a college student, a lot of clothes, her own laptop and desktop, and a mess of software for medical students, some of it quite expensive. Vil gave Kit and Jessie all kinds of things for their apartment, some jewelry for Jessie, new software for Kit so he could play more with photo and magazine editing, clothes, two new laptops to act as backups in case theirs were damaged, and an ultimate kick-ass desktop that could handle absolutely anything Kit could throw at it, a desktop that put his at home to shame. She also gave them some vouchers for new furniture, since their furniture at home wasn't exactly coordinated, being a mix of bought and donated pieces that served their purpose, but didn't look like they belonged together.

Sheila too went crazy with the gifts, but Sheila also showed she had a sense of humor. Each of them got one or two gag gifts, like the vibrator that Sheila got for Jenny, which made her explode in laughter and make Hannah hastily try to take it from her, to the voucher for one free lap dance at a local strip club for Ben. She bought a leather teddy for Hannah and a pair of bondage leather underwear and a vest for John, which made John laugh for almost ten minutes as he brazenly stood up and put them against his waist to check the size.

Vil wasn't done yet. When most of the gifts were opened, she reached into her portfolio and withdrew two small jewelry-sized gifts. "For you," she said, handing one to Ben, and the other to Jenny. Ben and Jenny were stunned when they opened tiny boxes that held keyrings, with two keys on them each. One was obviously a key to a car, and the other looked to be a housekey.

"What is this, Vil?" Jenny asked, holding it out.

"Just your new keys," she said with a bright smile. "Wanna see what they're to?"

"Uhh...sure?"

"Then come with me," she said as she stood up.

Outside, with big red bows on them, were identical Ford Mustangs. One was black, and the other was red. “Oh my God!” Jenny gasped, jumping up and down. “Which one is mine?”

“Go try your key and see,” she winked.

Jenny bolted into the wet grass without her shoes and coat, and excitedly tried the red Mustang first, which opened to her key. She jumped inside it and closed the door, and the engine started with a loud yet smooth purr.

Kit could hear Jenny screaming in delight even from inside the car, over the engine, all the way across the yard.

Ben stood there in the doorway holding the other set of keys numbly. “That’s mine, Vil?” he asked in humble tones.

“All yours, Ben,” she smiled. “Just please do me a favor and don’t go crazy. I don’t want to hear that you crashed it next week.”

“I’ll be very careful with it, Vil. Thank you very much.”

She kissed him on the cheek. “No in-laws of mine bum rides off people,” she winked. “Now go play with your new toy.”

“I’m not sure I approve of you giving them such expensive cars, Vilenne,” Hannah said as they looked on.

“Well, I can’t go and let you think that, Hannah, so I’m bribing you too,” she said, holding out another key. “Right over there,” she said, pointing. Kit joined the others, and they looked in the driveway, where a brand new white Ford Freestar minivan was parked.

Hannah gasped.

“Oh, and there’s one more in here,” Vil grinned, digging a final key out and handing it to John. “I hope you like SUVs, John, because I got you a Ford Escape. Right over there,” she said, pointing at a black SUV parked on the far side of the street.

“Vilenne, this is too much!”

“Pft, it’s just right,” she snorted. “I saw those cars you were driving, they’re too old! These are brand new, and I made a special deal with Riverfront Ford, who sold them to me. They’ll never cost any of you a dime if you take them back to the dealership, guys. They’ll do your oil changes, tune-ups, and all repairs for you for free. The only thing you should ever pay for these cars is gas and car washes. They’ll pay for everything but gas, John, Hannah. Take it back even if you just need the windshield washer fluid refilled.”

“Dear, this is a true gift!” Hannah said reverently.

“I’ve made a deal with a Columbus Ford dealer, Baxter Ford, to handle maintenance for your kids’ cars when they go to school,” she added. “Oh, and those other keys on their rings? Those are for apartments.”

“Come again, dear?” Hannah asked.

“I’m not letting my brother and sister in-law live in a dorm,” she snorted. “I looked around and found a very nice apartment building about a mile from the campus. Each of them has a spacious one bedroom in an upscale complex, filled with amenities. They have security, dedicated parking, a gym, a pool, the whole deal. They have unlimited leases there, those apartments are theirs for as long as they’re at Ohio State.”

“Oh my,” John said quietly. “Vilene, dear, this is too much! All those gifts, and the vacation, and cars for us all, and apartments for the children at school?”

“Oh, and these,” she chuckled, digging a quartet of credit cards out of her portfolio. “These are debit cards, John, connected to special accounts. Each has ten thousand dollars in its account, one for each of you. Every September the accounts roll over. Every September first, ten thousand dollars more is added to the balance, so you don’t lose whatever you had left on them when that time comes around. Use them for living expenses, trips, gifts, mad money, whatever you want. They work anywhere that takes Visa. This way, you and your family always has something to fall back on if you need it. Just use them responsibly,” she smiled. “Don’t let Jenny go out and burn through her whole ten thousand in a month.”

“You’re serious!” Hannah gasped.

“Deadly,” she said simply. “You’re now my family, Hannah, and I take care of my family.”

“I wish I could compete with her gift-giving skills,” Sheila chuckled as John and Hannah stammered to try to either thank Vil or tell her she went too far.

“She has a bigger checkbook than you do,” Kit told her simply. “Notice that she set the rollover date well before Christmas.”

“I did notice that,” Sheila giggled.

“So, what are you doing standing here?” Vil demanded at them. “Go check out your new cars!”

John and Hannah gaped at her, then they both laughed, took the keys, and did just that.

Chapter 19

Returning home restored a sense of normalcy, despite their marriage.

They'd lived together for months before their marriage, so living together, for them, was nothing new. They were used to it, and coming home was just a return to the routine, a return to real life after a nearly surrealistic wedding, honeymoon, and Christmas visit with Jessie's family.

Poor Hannah. Vil had blindsided her with her gifts, and she had basically been backed into a corner...or would have been had Vil not bought her a van. Hannah, it turned out, had secretly wanted a new van, was about to broach the subject with John, and Vil went and surprised her with a brand new minivan.

It wasn't entirely back to normal, though. For one, there were a ton of gifts, still wrapped and waiting, sitting on their table from the reception when they arrived that afternoon. Rick and Lupe had brought them to their house and there they sat, gifts from the reception guests, and a few that looked to have been dropped off afterward. "I totally forgot about those!" Jessie laughed as they came into the house after picking up their keys from Lupe.

"Oh, God, I hope we have room for all this stuff," Kit realized. "The Christmas gifts will be here tomorrow."

Vil had brought all their gifts to Cincinnati, but certainly wasn't about to leave them there without a plan. Though Kit and Jessie flew home commercially—Vil was on a tight schedule and couldn't detour to drop them off, and the other jet was being used by a member of the board—Vil had a professional shipping company show up the day after Christmas, pack up all of Kit and Jessie's gifts, and ship them to Texas next day shipping. They would be there at exactly nine o'clock tomorrow morning, six boxes filled with clothes, electronics, jewelry, music CDs, DVD, two new laptops, a desktop, and other assorted trinkets. Some of it had come with them, though, like the furniture gift certificates from Wentmore's, an upscale furniture store in Austin which they would be quite happy to use. All of their furniture was mismatched and the vast majority of it was used.

For another, there was the knowledge already eating at him that he'd have to return to Boston sometime late next month for the trial. He wasn't looking forward to the idea of that, but he did want to be there when Cybil realized that they knew, and defeat crept into her eyes. He wanted to see that moment. In that respect, he was a full-blooded Vulpan. He wanted to be there to taste the blood, maybe sink his fangs into Cybil himself.

God, Rick was going to murder him for asking for more time off. He was starting to feel like he really didn't work there anymore.

As Jessie went to the bathroom, Kit rooted through her purse, digging for the true prize out of this entire affair. He found it just as she came out, leaning against the hallway. "Looking for something special?" she asked teasingly.

"Very special," he said, holding up the memory card. "Priorities are priorities."

"Kit! Take it off the internet before you upload!" she commanded as he rushed by her, towards the den. "And delete them off the computer when you're done! Straight to a DVD we hide! And one copy only!"

"One copy of what, babe?" Lupe asked from the open door.

"Our wedding pictures," she said, her cheeks ruffling. "The kind you don't show to others."

Lupe laughed. "Babe, taking pics like that is a necessity on a honeymoon," he smiled. "Sheila come back with ya?"

"She'll be back tomorrow," she answered. "She went to Boston with Vil to see her mother, and then she'll be back down here."

"Ah. Hope everything goes okay with her. So, how was Christmas?"

"Pretty good," she answered. "Well, come in, silly! Just stay away from the hallway!"

Lupe laughed as he stepped in. "Better close the door to the den so I don't see nothin' by accident either," he grinned. "Need help with anythin'?"

"Nah, I think we got it, but thanks for the offer."

"What's your food plans? There ain't much in your fridge, I had to toss some stuff."

"Takeout," she laughed.

"I'll go in if it's pizza," he offered.

"Deal," she said immediately. "Pizza Hut?"

"Better than Domino's. Pony up, I'll go get it. It takes that Pizza Hut dick way too long to deliver here."

“Get something—“

“Without mushrooms, I know,” he grinned as she handed him a twenty dollar bill. “I’ll get you a no-mushroom special and me and Kit a couple of supremes, ‘kay?”

“Sounds good to me!” Kit called from the den.

“Hey brah, I’m trying to steal your wife!”

“Try harder, I don’t hear any gunshots!”

Lupe laughed. “I’ll be back in a shake babe, and you can show me your honeymoon pics.”

“In your dreams, Lupe!” she called as he hurried out.

Kit came out holding up a DVD, with the pictures on it. “This is it,” he smiled at her. “You in all your naked glory.”

“And you,” she pointed out, then she gave him a sly smile. “Put it where we can look at it when we want to, but nobody can find it,” she winked.

“Bedroom closet, in the document box,” he grinned.

“And remember, keep it off the computers! DVD only!” she called as he took the DVD to the bedroom. “I don’t wanna log on some day and find my naked pictures on some porn site!”

“I knew being married would suck all the joy out of life,” Kit said loud enough for her to hear. He expected to hear her run in to whack him, but she didn’t. He put the DVD away, but when he turned around, she nearly scared him out of his fur by grabbing him and throwing him onto the bed.

“What was that I heard?” she said loudly, climbing on top of him. “I can oblige you, baby!”

Kit laughed. “Was that a threat or an invitation?” he asked.

“You figure it out,” she said, slapping him on the snout like a misbehaving child.

“Wow, you think I’ll choose the punishment over the reward?” he laughed.

“Then motivate me,” she said, leaning down and kissing him.

“Mmm, Jess, Lupe is coming back,” he said against her lips.

“Then I guess you’re getting the punishment,” she said with a teasing smile, deliberately picking up a pillow.

“Nooooo,” he laughed, covering his head with his arms as she started whacking him with it.

Kit was punished for a good minute until she relented, dropped the pillow, and pried his arms apart to kiss him on the nose. “There, you bad boy, all nice and punished,” she teased as he put his arms around her. “Now behave.”

“But then we can’t kiss and make up,” he chuckled.

“You’d get more than kisses if you didn’t misbehave,” she winked.

“Oh, sure, now you tell me that,” he retorted, which made her laugh. “Let’s get our clothes back in the dresser while we have a chance, you know Lupe’s gonna be talkative tonight.”

It was a welcome return to routine...almost. Lupe returned with pizza, and they ate, told him about their trip, then decided to open the presents. Most of the presents were what they'd expect from furs giving gifts to newlyweds...small appliances, silverware, china, knick-knacks, small denomination gift certificates and gift cards for various stores around town, and so on...presents for them to set up their new home. Even though they'd lived together a while and everyone knew it, most of their friends also knew that all their things were mismatched and used, so the new dishes and silverware and such were very much welcomed. There were a couple of stand-out presents, though. The Governor of Texas gave them a little porcelain replica of the state capitol building signed by him and all the members of the state congress, which Kit rather fancied. They were also given a curious little picture frame with an LCD monitor in it, into which they could download various photos that would display a chosen photo all the time, or slowly cycle through multiple pictures like a little picture show. Jessie was taken with it, and immediately downloaded quite a few pictures of their wedding into it and put it on top of the TV.

Lupe hung out with them for a couple of hours, then left them to wind down and settle in after their long trip. Jessie ran to the grocery store to restock on their badly needed groceries, and Kit called around and told everyone that they were home now and everything was fine. After Jessie got home, they just sat on the couch and vegged out by watching the news on TV, then watching the DVD of their wedding again as they cuddled.

“Well, now what?” Jessie giggled as the DVD ended.

“Well, we could put in a movie.”

“No, now what? Isn't this supposed to be, well, different now that we're married?”

“Heck no,” Kit chuckled. “The only difference between before and after is now we have more jewelry.”

“Well, and the fact that I’m Misses Vulpan now,” she smiled, reaching over and patting his muzzle.

“I could get used to calling you that.”

“I could get used to hearing it.”

“Just don’t expect me to call you that all the time. It’s way too formal considering we have an informal relationship.”

“Informal? Just how is our relationship informal?” she demanded.

“Well, a formal relationship is what you’d have with your boss. I don’t want to think of you as a boss,” he grinned.

“I am your boss, buster,” she teased, poking him in the chest with a clawed finger.

“Oh, God, I’m sleeping with the boss,” he realized, which made her laugh. “You better hope I don’t have you brought up on sexual harassment charges.”

“Oh, I can stop that,” she smiled.

“And how do you think you will?”

“Simple, love. If you turn your back on it, you never get it again.”

“Ooh, the heavy artillery eh? I can always just go find some bimbo somewhere,” he said flippantly.

“Kit. Love.”

“Yes?”

“Remember when you vowed to stay with me til death do we part?”

“Yeah.”

“Don’t make me exercise that clause of our contract.”

Kit laughed. “Duly noted,” he said, putting his arms around her and kissing her. “My little barbarian.”

“Vulpans play for keeps. I’m just learning from you.”

“Well, I’m more than happy to give you more lessons,” he said, running his paw up her side.

“Mmm, teach away, my love.”

Kit and Jessie had two days off before he had to go back to work, and they needed it. When the Christmas presents arrived the next morning, they simply stowed them in the bedroom with the wedding presents, because they had furniture to get. They had to bow out of poker that day because they were too busy, had way too much to do, and the guys understood. They’d just gotten back from their honeymoon, after all, and they all knew about the big pile of gifts sitting on their table. They understood that the pair had a lot of work to do to go through them and write thank-you cards, but they did promise to drop by and at least say hello to everyone.

They went to Wentmoores with nearly five thousand dollars in gift certificates, and they used almost all of it. They got a proper dining room set with a china closet to hold the china set they got as a gift, they bought a pair of recliner chairs, corner closet for knick-knacks, coffee table, a stand for the little capitol building that the Governor gave them, and a wide entertainment center-shelf combination that would take up the entire wall. It consisted of an eight foot long lower flat cabinet with two covered shelves all the way across its length, filled with doors, and two small shelves that rose from both ends. The gap in the middle was large enough to hold the new large TVs, up to a sixty inch LCD or plasma panel TV, and was also raised on a small shelf unit that would hold a DVD player and cable converter box.

After measuring it, they found it would just barely fit against the wall where they had their current TV, framing the window, the shelves of one end just a mere nine inches from the door. Kit wasn't sure he liked the idea of it being that close to the door, but Jessie adored it, saying that the shelves would give them plenty of room to display stuff...and Kit just couldn't deny Jessie what she wanted.

The gift certificates also resulted in their first fight. After finding a bedroom suit that matched the bed, Jessie wanted to look at furniture for the den, but Kit was looking at TVs. Jessie didn't think they needed a new TV, because they already had a pretty decent one, but Kit saw that if they kept the TV they had now, which was a tube TV, they'd have to pull the shelf out to accommodate its bulk...that shelf wasn't designed to hold a tube TV, it was designed to hold a flat panel TV. Jessie didn't want to listen to that, however. "We only have a thousand dollars left, and we're not wasting it on a TV!" she said adamantly. "Not when we can buy two desks and a shelf unit for the den, so we can use both our computers and have someplace to store our other tech stuff!"

"Jessie, this isn't about the TV," he protested.

“Oh yes it is,” she flared. “You got used to that TV in Vil’s condo and the one we have in the basement, and now you want a big one too! We can look at TVs after we get what we need.”

Kit learned an important lesson about Jessie...that Hannah hadn’t been joking. Jessie was incredibly stubborn. She made her decision, dug in her heels, and she wasn’t about to budge an inch on the matter. Even when assaulted with the logic of his argument, that their TV would not fit on the new entertainment center, she wouldn’t listen. “Fine,” he sighed after he grew tired of arguing with her. “But I’ll expect an apology when we get the furniture home.”

They bought the two new desks shelf unit, and a bookshelf for the den, as Jessie wanted. They went home literally following the truck holding their furniture, then were basically pushed into the corner as the delivery males brought in and assembled their furniture, then carried the old furniture out onto the porch as they requested. The sorority furniture was going back to the sorority, and they were donating the rest of it to Lupe to store and use as needed.

When the entertainment center was assembled and placed where Jessie wanted it, Kit just stepped back when the large raccoon came up. “Ma’am, it won’t work there,” he said. “Your old TV is too wide, the unit wasn’t exactly built to hold one. We can put it there, it’ll fit, but we can’t keep the shelf flush against the wall. We’ll have to pull the shelf out from the wall more.”

Jessie gave him a surprised look, then sighed and put her paw over her face. “Alright, I apologize,” she said in a low tone. “Just put the shelf against the wall, please. We’ll move the TV back to our bedroom for now.”

“Yes ma’am,” he said with a nod and returned to his partner.

“Don’t you say a word,” she grated, pointing with her finger nearly touching his nose.

“I don’t think I have to,” he replied calmly. “How much is left on the certificates?”

“We used them all,” she answered. “They gave us a gift card with the balance, but it’s not even a hundred dollars.”

“We can just pull the shelf out.”

“No, I’m the one who wouldn’t listen, so now I get to live with it,” she sighed. “We’ll just put the TV on that rolling stand and put it in the bedroom. It’s not like we really watch much TV anyway. How’s the bank account?”

“Pretty much well empty,” he said. “We cleaned it out buying Christmas presents. We’ll have to wait until payday to look at TVs.”

“You’d think someone would have given us one,” she complained.

“That’s a pretty expensive gift,” Kit noted.

After all the furniture was in place, they spent the rest of the day settling it in and catching up. They put away their clothes in the new dressers, Jessie loaded the new shelves with the knick-knacks she most fancied from their wedding presents, and Kit put the ceramic capitol building on the little table he’d bought just for it. He took a picture of it and sent it to Mike out of pride. They then went over to Lupe’s and said hi to the poker crew, but they saw that Christmas had depleted the usuals to just Lupe, Dan, Mickey, Sam, and Jeffrey. Sandy was at home for the holidays, and Kevin had his big first case and couldn't make it today because he was doing research and preparing his case. Mickey gave them a bottle of wine as a welcome home gift, and they returned home to continue settling in the new furniture. Sam came over after poker, and her being in Austin surprised Kit. He would have thought she'd go home for the Christmas holidays after the wedding like Sandy had, and he was partially right. She had stayed in Austin because of the wedding, then went home for Christmas, but had come back yesterday to settle in before the next semester that began in two weeks. That seemed a bit thin to Kit, and when he asked if Kevin had called, the ruffling of her cheeks told him everything he needed to know. She came back because of him, not because she wanted to get an early start settling in.

“He's been busy with his first case, though,” Kit heard Sam complain to Jessie as she started cooking dinner. “We talk on the phone, but he hasn't had time to go out with me.”

“Stop thinking like a teenager, Sam!” Jessie admonished. “Do you know how much I enjoy just being in the same room with Kit, even when we're not doing anything? Ask him if you can come over and just hang out!”

“But, he might think that's too forward,” she complained. “Or that it's an invitation to go to bed with me!”

“Well, does the idea of that bother you?” she asked directly.

Kit heard a long silence from the kitchen. “Uh...no,” she finally answered. “You know I'm not a virgin, JD. But it's...well...different with him.”

“How so?”

“Well, I don’t want him to think I’m cheap or easy,” she explained. “He might not respect me.”

“So,” Jessie said with a laugh. “That’s where it is.”

“This isn’t funny!” she complained. “I could handle Mitch and the other boys because there weren’t any expectations out of it. We were just enjoying each other’s company. But Kevin—“

“Kevin is potential husband material,” she finished for her. “So you’re playing by the bride’s rules, eh?”

“I guess so. I don’t want to blow it. I’m not lucky like you, JD. You found the male you were meant to marry. I think I love Kevin, but it’s not the same with us.”

“Kit didn’t fall into my lap, Sam. I had to work for him,” Jessie contested. “So do you. And the first thing you need to do is show Kevin you want to be with him. So call him. Ask him if you can come over and just hang out with him while he does his work. Offer to cook him dinner, since he’s probably too busy to do it himself. Promise him you won’t interfere, you just want to be with him. And if he thinks it’s some kind of invitation, disabuse him quickly,” she giggled. “Establish your interest but make it clear that he has to work to get you in bed.”

“I don’t know if that’ll work,” she complained. “Kevin’s a lot different from Kit.”

“Not as different as you think,” she replied. “Trust me.”

“So if this idea of yours goes down in flames, I can blame you?”

Jessie laughed. “I guess you can.”

Kit heard Sam call Kevin and admit that she was a little lonely, and would like to come to his apartment to cook him dinner so he could keep working on his lawsuit. Kevin must have agreed, because Sam was borrowing Jessie's car and on her way to Pflugerville before Kit realized that Sam had hung up the phone. "She took your car?" Kit asked curiously. "How did she get over here for poker?"

"She walked, Kit. It's not that far, only about two miles. To Sam, that's well inside walking distance. She runs five miles a day, a two mile walk is nothing for her."

"Oh."

Sam didn't bring Jessie's car back that night. She returned it in the morning, almost waking them up in the process. Kit was making tea in a pair of shorts while Jessie showered when she rang the doorbell, and he turned off the alarm and opened it for her. "Morning," he said as he ushered her in. "How was it?"

"How was what?" she asked with an edge to her voice.

"Bringing Jessie her car back the morning after?" he asked lightly.

"And walk home after dark? No," she said calmly. "I'm wearing different clothes, if you didn't notice," she added, pointing at her U.T. tee shirt and running shorts. "I'm about to go running."

"You run without shoes?" Kit asked absently.

"I only wear shoes with dresses, so the males can't see my tomboy feet," she chuckled picking up a foot and showing him the bottom. The pads on her feet were thick, tough, and rugged, the feet of a fur who ran five miles a day without running shoes.

Kit laughed. “Well, I like the natural femme,” he told her. “Want some tea?”

“Sure.”

Kit made her a cup of tea as she looked around at the new furniture. “Snazzy,” she said. “Where’s the TV?”

Kit laughed. “It’s in the bedroom, it won’t fit on that shelf. And don’t mention it to Jessie. We had a little argument over it.”

“She lost?”

“That’s why you don’t mention it to her,” he said as he put the tea on the dining room table for her.

Jessie came out into the living room wrapped in a towel. “Sam?”

“Hey JD.”

“How did it go last night?”

“Pretty well. I made Kev some dinner and didn’t poison us thanks to your cooking lessons,” she laughed. “I just read while he did his work, then we watched a little TV, then I came home.”

“What’s his apartment like?”

“Well, it’s pre-furnished, so it wasn’t like I could get a sense of his style, but he is an art buff. He collects paintings and has a few sculptures in his apartment. He like impressionism for paintings, but prefers Roman and Greek era sculpture. He has a tiny replica of that famous statue of the woman with no arms sitting on a table in his living room.”

“I’m disappointed in you,” Kit told her as Jessie went to dry off and dress.

“What? Why?”

“You were in his house and didn’t short sheet his bed? Shame on you.”

Sam laughed.

Sheila was back, but to his surprise, she wasn’t preparing to return home. They talked the morning before his first day back to work, while working out at the Y, riding stationary bikes. Jessie had been feeding him so much, since she had all that free time to cook, that he’d been gaining too much weight, and so he’d begun to work out in the mornings with Sheila before work, taking advantage of the membership to the Y she’d set up for him. “I’ve already missed the next semester, and well, I kinda owe it to Rick and Martha to stick around until he can replace me,” she explained as they rode stationary bikes side by side at the Y one morning the week after they got back. “I’m going to hang down here until Rick has that deal in place with the college’s journalism school and he has an intern. I’ll be back home this summer, and back in Harvard for fall.”

“And staying where it’s warmer than Boston has nothing to do with it?” he asked.

Sheila laughed. “Well, that does make me wanna stay a little,” she admitted with a wink. “Among other things.”

“Like what?”

“I like it here, cousin,” she admitted. “I like having you as a friend, and I like Lupe and Dan and Mickey. I love Jessie like a sister, and her friends are awesome. I don’t mind working at the magazine, and the guys there are great, and they take me seriously. I feel, well, accepted down here. Rick and Martha look out for me, Martha and Jessie are teaching me to cook, I get to hang out with you and the sorority girls when I want to have fun, and I get to torment Lupe when I’m feeling mean.”

“Well, it’s nice to know you approve of my life,” he chuckled.

“I’m glad I came down here,” she told him, “and not just because of Cybil. I didn’t really do anything at home, Kit. I just walked through school, went to parties, and screwed a ton of guys. Well, that part wasn’t that bad,” she noted, licking her chops in a manner that made him laugh. “I ran away down here, but I found something more than just a place to hide, ya know? I found out that work can be cool if you’re working in the right place. I found out that I actually love cooking, and now I want to open a restaurant when I get out of school. And you taught me that I don’t have to be what the family expects...not that they really expect much out of us youngers. I don’t have to get married to who they say and crank out babies the way my mom did. I can go start my own business, find something I like to do, ya know, do something with my life.”

“Well, it sounds like Sheila Vance Vulpan has grown up quite a bit,” Kit noted.

“Bite my ass,” she said directly, then she laughed and pushed at his shoulder.

“If I did that, Jessie would kill both of us,” Kit pointed out. “Me for straying, and you for seducing your own cousin.”

“Kit.”

“Yah?”

“We have got to take her to the Top Hat.”

Kit almost fell off the bike. “Are you nuts? Take Jessie there? She’d have some kind of seizure!”

“She’s married now, cousin, think of it as expanding her horizons. She has to be a freakin’ prude in bed. We gotta make her worldly.”

Kit laughed. “She’s worldly enough already. She doesn’t need any outside help.”

“What, she knows two whole positions? I’ll bet she doesn’t go down on you or anything fun at all,” she pressed, which seemed to attract some unwelcome attention, since they weren’t alone in the exercise room and Sheila wasn’t exactly keeping her voice down.

“I don’t think this is the place for a conversation like this, Sheila,” he said in a low tone.

Sheila looked around, then chuckled ruefully. “True. But at least you haven’t been turned into a total prude,” she grinned. “Still willing to talk sex with your cousin, that’s a good sign. Hannah didn’t turn you to the dark side.”

Kit laughed. “And how did your own campaign of turning to the dark side go?”

“I got him,” she grinned wickedly. “Remember when Ben went to go answer the phone?”

“Yeah.”

“Did you see me anywhere?”

Kit laughed. “Damn, femme, that was fast work. He was only gone like fifteen minutes. We thought he was talking on the phone.”

“He was, to me,” she winked. “I called and asked for him to separate him from the rest of you.”

“And so you did exactly what I warned you not to do.”

“I didn’t screw him, cousin,” she laughed. “Though I’d love to. But I did get one hell of a kiss out of him and got my paws on that monster he keeps in his pants. He’s a great kisser,” she purred victoriously. “And he’s got a huge—“

“I don’t need to know that.”

She laughed. “I was considerate, too. It didn’t take much coaxing to get him to put those big paws on me,” she giggled. “I could have those paws on me every day for the rest of my life. His touch was...magical,” she said with a little sigh.

“All I can say is be very, very careful,” he said calmly. “I’m not your mom, and I’m not going to tell you what to do. But if you chase Ben, you’re going to be climbing a tree full of beehives. If you’re not very careful, you’ll be stung before you reach the top. And you might take me with you when you fall out of the tree, since I’m climbing it too.”

“What do you mean?”

“Think about it, Sheila. You’re exactly the kind of girl Hannah has worked to keep her daughters from becoming. You’re wild, you’re loose, and you’re wanton. Hannah sees you as a girl she needs to tame, to set back on the right and narrow. Hannah already doesn't like me, well, she'll have a fit when she finds out you're starting to court Ben. So what you do will affect my relationship with Jessie's family."

"Hmm," she noted, stopping her pedaling and leaning over the handle bars. "So, you won't interfere?"

"If you poison my relationship with Hannah, I'll kick your ass. But outside of that, no. You're a grown femme, and it's not my place to tell you what to do."

"Duly noted, cousin," she said calmly, then she started pedaling again.

Kit wasn't too worried about it, really. Sheila would find out that Hannah wasn't her main opponent if she went after Ben, it would be Ben himself. Ben was too down to earth, modest, and grounded to take a girl like Sheila seriously. He might be curious about her, play with her a little, might even go out with her and sleep with her, but he wouldn't get too involved with her, because he'd see the trap in her and avoid getting too attached to a femme that wasn't attached to him. He knew what kind of femme she was, and he'd keep his distance. Sheila would discover that a male like Ben wouldn't accept her the way she was, and if she wanted Ben, she'd have to change to get him.

It would be educational for her, that's for sure.

Kit called Hannah and warned her about the development while Sheila was with Rick on a trip to an advertiser. "You're serious," she said after he told her.

"She seems to be," he answered. "Sheila's never looked a male the way she's looking at Ben before. She's never seen males as anything but the next night of fun, but she's looking at Ben like a possible boyfriend. It must be shaking up her world," he chuckled.

"We can't let that happen, Kit. I don't want Ben mixed up with her."

"Hannah, you raised Ben to be prudent and proper. Just let him deal with her. He'll do the right thing."

"My children seem to have very poor judgment when it comes to your family," she said directly, which made him laugh.

"Well, maybe they see things in us you don't," he teased.

"Maybe I see what they refuse to," she countered.

"Well, Jessie's seen a lot more of me than you, I'd have to debate that point with you."

There was a startled silence, then she laughed. "Kitstrom, don't you dare start getting so familiar with me. I'm your mother-in-law!"

"And that's why I'm allowed to get familiar. If I can't talk about these kinds of things with the only mother I have, who can I?"

"Sweet talk will not get you out of this."

"You're too far away to threaten me with a pillow, so I'm not too worried about it," he said flippantly.

But getting beyond the reach of Hannah Williams wasn't quite that easy. When he went home and sat down to look over a little work he brought home with him, he was hit in the back of the head with a pillow. He covered his head with his paws, but another strike didn't appear. "What did I do?" he demanded as Jessie walked back towards the bedroom.

“Don’t ever think you’re out of Mom’s reach,” she called back. “She can have you beaten by proxy.”

Kit almost fell over laughing.

Life settled back into routine for them. When school began again, Jessie was back on a schedule, and a better one than last semester. She had five classes this semester instead of six, three on Monday and Wednesday, and two on Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday. Her earliest class was ten o’clock, and her latest class was her Tuesday/Thursday contemporary American literature class, which let out at five thirty. With the return of school came the return of the sorority girls and Sandy, and again there was almost always someone visiting them in the evenings, be it a friend from the complex or one of Jessie’s sorority sisters or someone from work. Sheila came over to hang out about every other night.

Work quickly settled back down as well. They started their election articles, and Kit found himself writing more and more when he had no research to do. Rick had him doing small articles about the elections, working off his own research to do background articles upon which Barry built with his main articles. Marty tagged him and the others to do a new section of the mailbag, where they answered a question sent in by email or letter. Two questions were answered every issue, and Marty promised in the new section, called Ask Away, that questions would be picked at random, and wouldn’t be edited beyond the need to keep them in decent taste.

And he meant it. Kit ended up being one of the two tagged for the first answer, and Marty made him answer the question what was it like to grow up rich?

That turned into a two column article, because Kit answered it honestly and without much sugar coating, making it plain that being rich wasn't as carefree for kids as he thought it might be. He made it clear that every perk he got from money was balanced by an expectation placed upon him a normal child wouldn't have. That there was a hidden price tag that came with having money.

Kit had told Rick and the gang about the lawsuit and his need to go to testify, and they were alright with it. "Nothin' we can do about that, son," Rick told him. "You gotta do what you gotta do. We'll be fine as long as they don't hold you for like two weeks."

"Oh no, Rick, I'll make sure that doesn't happen. I'll fly back and forth every day if I have to, and you can just email me some of my work. I can do it from there. I'm not gonna burden you guys again so soon after the honeymoon."

"Well, we can work something out. And I think Barry was talking about flying up to cover some of it. Since we've been keeping the readers up to date on your personal life, with the marriage and all, Barry did a piece on the lawsuit too...and now folks are curious to see how it turns out for you."

Kit laughed. "I spend years avoiding tabloids, and my own job tabloids me!"

"A good story is a good story, and this is a magazine, Kit," he chuckled.

But there was change coming, too. The first hint of it was the construction fence that went up beside the apartment complex. Lupe was so happy he could barely sit still when the construction company showed up and began demolishing the closed dentist's office. "They say two months, brah," he said as Lupe, Jessie, Sheila, and Mickey were standing by the building closest to it, looking out behind the building and at the new fence. That building was the one behind the one that had Kit and Jessie's apartment, so they were fairly close to where the new pool was going. "It'll take them two weeks to tear down the building and pull the foundation, then they dig the pool. The pool should be totally done and ready by April no sweat. The contractor said he'll have it done by late March, but I won't open it til late April."

"How much will it cost to put in?" Kit asked.

"Not as much as you'd think, but our insurance went up," he grunted. "I done sent out the rent increase notices, but nobody bitched. Seems they agree that an extra ten a month is worth it to get a kickass new pool. And it'll be kickass!" he all but screamed. "Olympic size, brah! With a high dive and a slide of the kids!"

"Any word on the other project?" Mickey asked.

"It's a go," he said. "I made a deal with the last two families to buy them out. One of them's just gonna move into the complex," he laughed. "I had to promise them one of the four bedroom luxury units with a secured lease in exchange for them selling. They stay there til they decide to move out. It was worth it, though, cause they'll be paying rent like everyone else, just not as much. They bargained me down to half their current mortgage, but again, that's cool. I just added six more of those luxury units to the plans, so we'll have plenty."

"I hope they don't make a lot of noise," Jessie said hesitantly.

“They’ll do a little bangin’, babe, no help for it, but they won’t be working after six, so they won’t bother nobody at night,” Lupe answered. “They’ll be workin’ ten to six, six days a week.”

“That’s not too bad,” Mickey said. “Then again, I’m not living right behind the construction site, either.”

“Come on, I’ll show you the plans for the new Westwood,” he offered. “They’re in my office.”

Lupe certainly had a grand vision. He had both drawings and an artist’s conception of the new mega-complex, that would take up the entire city block. Lupe had bought out every other house and building on the block, and the apartment complex was going to expand both down the block and across it. “The pool will be the center of the place,” Lupe said as he pointed to it on the drafting sketches. “This big building right here is the gym and community center. I’m gonna have a gym and a couple of big rooms for dances and shit like that, and I’ll have pool tables and some other good shit in it. I’m gonna have a big playground right here, and this right here’ll be a daycare center for the tenants that got little kids.” He pointed to a series of smaller buildings in a cluster around the pool and community center. “These are the luxury units. See, they got their own parking, and they’re right by the pool and center. This is where we’ll all live,” he grinned. “They’ll go from one to four bedrooms, with the four bedrooms being a double-duplex style with no stackin’. Each side of this is its own place, kinda like townhouses, two-story with a deck. Out to the corner will be mixed units, from one to three bedrooms, to cover the furs already livin’ here so they can move in when it’s done. But the rest of the complex’ll be a little more organized by unit size. Each of the buildings in the units built after the initial build'll be separated by size. One buildin'll be nothing but one bedrooms, another two bedrooms, and so on.

“After we get this corner here built and I can move our current tenants over, we tear down the rest of the block and get going. They say they'll finish in a year.”

“A year? That's it?” Kit asked in surprise.

“Brah, I'm gonna have a freakin' army here buildin' this place,” he answered. “The banks demanded it be up in a year from groundbreaking', so they covered the cost of hiring enough to do it in the loan. When it's done, we'll have four hundred units, from one bedroom efficiencies to the twelve luxury four bedrooms. Most of 'em will be one bedrooms for the college crowd, but those'll be on the far side of the complex from the two and three bedrooms, so I keep the families safe from the college brats,” he said, giving Jessie a grin.

“Watch it, this kitty has claws,” she teased, showing him her small claws. “And ain't afraid of a little puppy dog.”

Lupe laughed.

Things moved at work as well. Two days after they started on the pool, Rick called them all into the main office, a big grin on his patchwork face. “We got new digs,” he announced.

“Eh?” Marty asked.

“A new office,” he said. “In the Willis Building.”

“Dude, that's like two blocks from the capitol!” Mike gasped.

“Vilenne helped us out,” he said. “Called in a favor. We got office space three times this size on the sixth floor, at the same rent we’re paying on this office. It used to be a lobbying agency, but it closed down. It’s perfect for us, guys. It has a large central room where they used to have calling zombies in cubicles. We’ll clear that out and form a new main office, but this time everyone has an office of their own too. It has twelve offices on both sides of the main room, and the main room has a bank of windows that looks out over Congress. Oh, and Marty, you’re off the phones,” he said. “You’re being moved to staff, I’ll hire a receptionist just to do that.”

“I love promotions!” the sheep grinned.

“When do we move?” Savid asked.

“We start tomorrow. When the building owners found out I signed a lease for another office, they terminated our lease here, probably out of spite. We have until the end of the month to clear out, so we have to move quick. Remember all that gear you guys took home? Well, we need it back now,” he chuckled. “We need to put a temporary network up over there to help us transition while we move. Mike, we’re going back over there so you can check it out. They had a computer network, and while the computers are all gone, the wiring is still there. They gave me a wiring plan for you to go on, but we need to go look and see if this is something you wanna tackle on your own, or if we bring in a networking company to install the network for you.”

“Let some stupid snotty kids touch my network? Hell no!” Mike said immediately. “If I do it, it gets done right.”

“Dude, you are one of those snotty kids,” Jeffrey laughed.

“Bite me, mouse,” Mike grunted. “Kit, Savid, you need to come too. I may need some help pulling floor or checking in the ceiling, and you two are trustworthy enough.”

Kit, Savid, Mike, and Rick went over to the new building after lunch. It was a glass building, new and modern, and the offices that still had Woolbanks Lobbyists signs and logos up were deserted. The furniture and equipment were gone, and it was as Rick described. A large central office where cubicles were built dominated the middle of a huge room, with rows of doors on either side leading to private offices. The office took up an entire half of the building, allowing the offices on both sides to have windows, with the two offices at the ends being corner offices. Mike had a wiring diagram in a technical manual before him as they surveyed the place. “They had a server room right here, behind this wall behind the receptionist’s desk, forming a big room that separates the front receiving area from the main office,” he said, pointing at the drawing. “I’ll use it for the same, and it’s big enough for me to stack some racks in there and make a real damn network and website. I can put my office in there, I have to be near the rigs. It has no window, which is perfect for a geek like me. This big corner office is Rick’s office, naturally. That leaves one other corner office. Guess they’ll fight over that one.”

“Nah, Savid has seniority, it’s his,” Rick said.

“Many thanks, Rick,” Savid said with a nod.

“We’ll put Lilly, Barry, and Kit in these offices here on your side, Rick, and Jeffrey and Marty on Savid’s side. That leaves five open offices, since I’ll put my office in the server room.”

“Let’s stagger them. Leave this office open so we have a hard storage room, and put Kit and Barry on each side of it. They’ll be the ones digging through those records. Leave this office here open between Savid and Jeffrey that we can turn into a dedicated office for the graphic artists, you know, for their shared computers, which we can also use for the big printer to keep it out of the main office. We turn this office here into a break room with a fridge and microwave and a table. We can hang the big plasma right there,” he said, pointing at the wall facing the bank of windows. “The building maintenance people will be here tonight to clear all these cubicle desks out. We keep a few of them, put the main table right here in the middle, and put some desks over in those areas for equipment. I want to put in a couple of open workstations for anyone to use when they come out into the main office, and we’ll need a desk for our intern.”

“We can stick Sheila in a spare office until she leaves. Since she’s Kit’s cousin, we can be nice to her and just treat the next intern like shit,” Mike grinned.

“No, put her at a desk right there,” Kit said, pointing towards the windows. “Halfway between Rick and Savid. They’re the ones she’ll be dealing with the most, that way she can’t hide from them when they need her. That also puts her in the main office and completely visible to anyone who sticks his head out the door looking for her.”

“True, true, I think that’s a plan,” Rick nodded. “There is one thing, though. Jessie does work for us, and we have empty offices, so I’m going to give her one.”

“Better keep it on the far side from Kit, so we don’t walk in on some workplace shenanigans,” Mike grinned.

“That would not stop them,” Savid said, which made everyone laugh.

“Jessie would love it, Rick.”

“Alright then, she’ll take the office beside yours. So, what do you think?”

“I think it’s perfect,” Mike said. “Not too big, but we have room to grow. It has the same intimate sense as the old office, but it’s big enough for everyone to feel like they have their own space.”

“Yes, just so. Having my own office will be nice,” Savid said with a nod.

“It’ll be nice to be in an office bigger than my armspan,” Kit chuckled.

“Hey, you have an office,” Savid told him. “And you are the youngest there!”

“Well, that little fight will be moot in a couple of weeks,” Rick chuckled. “Lemme go get the building manager so we can talk this over, and I can see how much of this old stuff the last tenants is going and what we can keep.”

“Let’s make sure their network cabling is where this says it should be,” Mike said. “Sometimes they like to move it and not document it.”

They returned to the office with big grins. “We can start moving tonight,” Mike announced. “I’ll begin moving over the non-essential equipment after work. Everyone’s offices are already assigned, so you can start moving stuff you want into them. I’ll draw up a plan for us to do it, but we’ll spread it across an issue no matter what.”

“Well, if we know the issue’s gonna be affected by the move, let’s do it on purpose,” Jeffrey noted.

“Huh?”

“We warn everyone we’re moving in the next issue, and then the issue after we make it a mess. Bad editing, typos, you know, make it look bad on purpose. I think the readers would get the joke.”

Rick laughed. “I think that would be fun to do,” he nodded.

It was hard work, but it was worth it.

Over the course of the next two weeks, the magazine moved to its new office. Mike worked his butt off, first establishing the new network, then moving machines over bit by bit. Rick had to buy some new furniture, and as it was delivered, they moved in. It was a little weird there for a while, with half of them in one office and half in the other, but they worked through it.

Poor Sheila. Mike worked her to the bone, and that poor girl must have made five hundred trips between the offices moving boxes.

It was very hurried, but it worked. Mike ruled them for those two weeks, keeping careful track of everything. He used the backup servers to take over as he moved the main servers first, established the core of the network, then started adding things piece by piece. Vil’s laptops were critical during the move, allowing them to literally use them for the entire transition issue outside of the main editing computer, which was moved first as soon as the servers were up and a new round table was delivered and set up.

Kit, oddly enough, was the first to move over. His office was generally in the way when Mike had to pull cabling, so Kit had to be out of the space between the servers and the main office. He moved over to the office two days after they began, with a brand new desk and chair and a nice set of shelves on one side of the office. His came with only his box of personal stuff, which he set up in his office as he put his laptop on his desk and took the plastic off the chair. Mike delivered his computer the next day and they set it up. “Remember, keep all the stuff for the next issue on your laptop,” Mike told him. “The network over here’s not fully ready to go yet, not til I get all the other machines over here and set up and then update the main servers with everything they’re doing over there.”

“Got it.”

With Kit anchoring the new office, the others began to move over, one by one. Barry moved over next, and then Lilly. After Lilly came over, the next morning Kit showed up at the office with Jessie in tow, as she moved some little things into her own office—that she’d rarely use—just so it felt like her own place, and found a young, petite little female ferret standing outside the locked doors. She couldn’t have been five feet tall, thin, almost scrawny, wearing a black blouse and a gray pleated skirt. “Are you Kit Vulpan?” she asked. Though she was small, her voice was rich and quite lovely.

“I am, who are you?”

“Denise Jacobs,” she told him. “I’m the new receptionist. Rick hired me yesterday. He told me to be here at nine o’clock and you’d let me in and show me my desk.”

“Uh, sure. My wife, Jessie,” he said, introducing her.

“I read about your wedding in the magazine. You’re really lucky,” she said with a shy smile.

“Thank you,” Jessie said as Kit unlocked the door, then turned off the alarm. “I hope you’re tough, Miss Jacobs. They’re mean around here,” she said, grinning at Kit.

“We’re not mean, we just destroy the weak,” he replied flippantly. “But you’d better be able to take a joke, Denise. We’re very fond of them around here.”

“I can handle it, Mister Vulpan.”

“Kit. Nobody calls me that but my wife, and only when I’m in trouble.”

That made the diminutive ferret giggle. “It sounds like you hear that name a lot.”

“Way too much,” Jessie agreed with a sigh, which made her laugh.

Jessie put her things in her office while Kit showed Denise her desk. “Well, this is it,” he told her. “As you can see, there’s no phone here yet. Our office is kinda a mess right now, we’re still in the middle of moving over.”

“Rick explained it. He said I’ll be helping Sheila move stuff for the next few days.”

“Sounds like he filled you in. Looks like Rick got you a chair, at least,” he chuckled. “Go ahead and look it over, I’ll call Rick and tell him you’re here.” Kit relayed that information on his work phone, and Jessie came back out and kissed him on the cheek.

“I’m on the way to school, love. What do you want for dinner tonight?”

“I don’t really care,” he answered. “But it sounds like you’re cooking.”

She giggled. “Yeah, I feel like it tonight. I’ll just surprise you.”

“Sounds good to me,” he said, giving her one more kiss. “Have a good day at school.”

“I’ll try,” she smiled as she went out the door and to the elevator.

“I read about your wedding in the magazine,” Denise repeated as she tested the chair, then raised it as high as it would go.

“Are you a student?”

“I wish I was,” she sighed. “I just got out of the Army three weeks ago, and kinda stumbled across this job. I’m gonna get some night classes started next semester, though.”

“The Army? Really?” he asked in surprise. “What did you do?”

“Administration. I was a paper pusher,” she admitted with a laugh. “My last post, I worked for the Army Times as a secretary,” she said. “It got me interested in journalism, and now I want to be a reporter. That’s why I lucked out getting this job. I’ll be working in a magazine!”

“A small and very unusually run magazine, but a magazine,” Kit laughed. “We don’t do things the way real journalists do, Denise.”

“It’s still good experience.”

“True. You certainly don’t look like you were in the Army,” he noted, looking at her.

“I know, I’m short,” she laughed. “They had trouble finding uniforms that fit me in basic training,” she admitted.

“Just don’t let them ride you. Mike especially. The first time he tells you a short joke, whack him. If you don’t stand your ground, he’ll hound you until the end of days.”

“Which one is Mike?”

“The raccoon.”

“I’ll show him what I learned in the Army,” she grinned. “I can deal with people who make fun of my height.”

“I’m going to like you, Denise,” Kit chuckled.

The addition of Denise to the crew helped with the transition. She helped Sheila move stuff the rest of the move, and then, after Rick had the magazine logo removed from the old office and installed behind Denise’s desk in the new one, she took her place as their new receptionist. She spent half a day with the phone people learning how the new phone worked, and it was Denise that briefed the rest of the staff about how the phones worked, teaching them what the phone people taught her. Denise got along well with the gang, and was quite capable of dealing with the jokes and pranks. She was a lively femme, chatty and funny, but she was also very brave and level-headed, more than capable of dealing with irate callers. She was a perfect fit.

Their transition issue was very funny. Instead of running a new issue, they instead did a “best of” issue, but they made sure it looked almost amateurish. Editing errors, spelling errors, the page numbers were out of sequence, and one page was printed twice. The only new thing in the issue was a new strip of School Daze where Kit and Jeffrey played on the idea to make Jo-Jo and Oxnard trade personalities, but give no explanation nor reason for it. The issue was so messed up the printer called after Rick sent it in and asked if they'd gotten a corrupted copy of the issue.

Eleven days after their old building terminated their lease, they were done. The old offices were bare, even the network cabling pulled out of it—Mike was leaving them absolutely nothing that wasn't there when the magazine started, not after what they did to them—and they were all now comfortably moved in in the new office. Their network was up and running smoothly, all their computers were up, they were getting used to having their own offices—well, everyone but Mike, Rick, and Kit anyway, and they couldn't get over how much more space they had. Marty felt a little weird being off the front desk, being listed as a staff writer and editor now instead of just an editor, and they had to take a new group photo. Jessie, Sheila and Denise were in the new one, all of them gathered around their new main table with the windows behind them, waving to the camera.

Their first issue in the new office mentioned the move itself, but was right back to business as usual covering Austin for the college crowd. The cover showed a picture Mike took of the office before they moved in side by side with the new group photo, with the caption We're Here! under it. Barry did an article about the move on page three, as well, short and to the point.

Moving sucks!

Lone Star has finished its move, everyone! We were getting a little cramped in our old offices with the addition of Kit, Jessie, and Sheila, so we've moved to larger offices if only so we don't walk in on Lilly naked anymore.

Sure, we could blame the Vulpan clan, but we got new offices out of it, so we're not going to complain all that much.

We've moved a whole five blocks north. We're now in the Willis building, 500 Congress Avenue, on the fifth floor. Our office hours are still the same, and all our internet services are back up and running at full strength, thanks to Mike and his godly computer skills.

But Jeffrey still kicks his ass in Halo. Mike can't handle a console controller.

We've also added another friendly face to the family! Everyone welcome Denise Jacobs. She's a spunky little thing (and we do mean little) who'll be answering our phones and greeting our visitors as she pursues a degree in Journalism, and we destroy any chance she'll ever have of getting a respectable job anywhere in the journalism business. So stop by and say hello and make her feel at home!

And no, she's not a Yankee. We've got enough of those damn Yankees in the office already. Denise is a native Texan, hailing from College Station.

Rest assured, Austin, we're back on the job and as dedicated as ever to bringing you the best Austin has to offer for the students of the University of Texas. We hope you enjoyed last week's moving issue, and promise we'll never do anything like that ever again.

Until the next time we need an emergency filler.

Kit chuckled when he read it, and laughed when Denise did. “Little?” her voice called from the intercom to every phone in the office. “Little, am I? Who told you to write that, Barry? I’ll cut them down to my size!”

“We can’t be cut down that far!” Mike’s voice came over the intercom, which had replaced the shouting that had taken place in the old office.

“Dude, your office is right beside her desk,” Jeffrey called over the intercom. “Is that a good idea?”

“I can always lock the—Aii!” he gasped, and they heard him get smacked several times, which made the whole office erupt into laughter.

“Remember to lock the door next time!” they heard her say, but Mike got the last word.

“Oh, my poor kneecaps!”

Yes, Denise fit in perfectly.

The good times couldn’t last forever, unfortunately.

Four days after they finished the move, early Saturday morning, Kit got the call he knew was coming but dreaded getting. Vil called him on his personal phone while was typing up some notes from an interview he did with the dean of the college of liberal arts about their new Portuguese language major program. “Hey sis,” he called as he put the phone on speaker and set it on his desk. “You get those pics of the new office?”

“Yeah, it looks really great. Spacious?”

“We have empty offices,” Kit laughed. “Jessie has her own office now, too. Too bad she only uses it once a day. She’s in it right now, doing her writing for Missy and Cutler. Earning that paycheck,” he chuckled. “Jessie! Vil’s on the phone!” he shouted.

“Be right there,” she called over the intercom.

“Well, this isn’t a personal call, bro,” Vil told him. “Do me a favor and turn on your laptop and jump on video.”

“Uh, sure, give me a couple,” he said, turning around to the little table behind his desk, under the window, and picking up his laptop. He opened it and waited for it to wake up, then started the videoconferencing program. It connected, and Vil’s face appeared. She was in her office, looking down at her own laptop, adjusting the microphone on her face so he could hear her. He hung up the phone as she finished, then he put on his own microphone as she greeted him. “Hear me, bro?”

“Loud and clear,” he answered as Jessie bounded into the room. She came around the desk and leaned over his shoulder, then got her muzzle right by the mic.

“Hey Vil!” she said. “You get that email I sent ya?”

“Sure did, Jessie,” she answered. “Listen guys, this is business, not personal. It’s about the trial.”

“Date set?” Kit asked.

She nodded. “It starts February Eleventh. Since Cybil filed the suit, she presents her side first. I want you here starting on February Twelfth. It’s going to take her lawyers a day to get through opening arguments, so I want you here and in the courtroom from then on, cause I’m not sure when they’re gonna nail her ass. So you need to be here and be ready to stay for a while if this gets dragged out.”

“How long will we be in Boston?”

“Hopefully no longer than a week. You may be coming back the same day, it may take a week, I really can’t tell. It all depends on how Cybil’s lawyers present their case, which witnesses they call. As soon as Cybil hangs herself, you sign the legal document holding the current agreement in place, then you go back home. You won’t even have to be here when the judge throws out her case and mine moves on unopposed by the family. That makes everyone happy except Cybil.”

“I can live with that.”

“Clancy asked me to ask you to please come home,” she said. “He wants you to stay at Stonebrook.”

“Absolutely not,” he said immediately. “Not so long as Uncle Zach is in that house. I will not bring Jessie anywhere near him.”

“Love, I can’t go,” Jessie told him. “I have school now, remember?”

“Then I’m really not staying there,” he grunted. “I couldn’t face staying one night in there without you there with me, love. If you’re not going, I won’t go anywhere near it.”

Vil sighed. “Can we talk about it later?”

“It’s not up for negotiation.”

She frowned and nodded. “I’ll find you a hotel room near the courthouse, then,” she told him. “I’ve already called Rick and told him. He’s making arrangements for you to come up. Don’t bother making reservations, bro, I’ll send the jet for you.”

“Alright.”

“Don’t look so down, bro. You come up for one week, hide in your hotel room, watch Cybil crash and burn, sign some papers, and you’re free of us forever.”

“Now that’s something to look forward to,” he said honestly.

“Alright then. I’ll let you get back to work then, bro. I’m working now too,” she said, motioning at the view behind her. “I’ll call you tonight, okay?”

“As long as it’s not just business, sure.”

“I always have time to rag on my little bro,” she winked, then she ended the conference.

“Well, love, it looks like it’s almost done,” Jessie said, leaning down and kissing him on the top of his muzzle.

“And I’ll dance down to the harbor when it is,” he sighed, leaning back in his chair, taking the microphone off. He was tense all the sudden, and a little worried. He knew it was coming, but to know it was coming didn’t help all that much. Jessie put her paws on his shoulders and massaged them, then reached over him and closed his laptop. “Why don’t you ask Rick to finish your article at home,” she urged.

“No, no, I’ll finish it. I’m done for today when I do,” he said. “Go ahead and finish up and go home, I’ll be along in a few hours.”

“Alright, love.”

Jessie pampered him when he did get home, around three, feeding him a nice dinner, then sitting on the couch with him laying with his head in her lap, something that never failed to relax and calm him. There, feeling the warmth of her legs against his face and muzzle, smelling her closeness, feeling her paw tousling his hair, it never failed to make him feel safe, secure, and wanted.

It seemed like a blink of his eyes.

It had only been two weeks from knowing of the trial until he found himself sitting on Vil's private jet, watching the city of Boston appear through the window as he looked from the couch, and the time had blurred by.

The gang was so understanding. They helped him get ready for his trip by helping him clear his desk of all his work, and they gave him a going away party with a banner that read Glad You're Staying Poor! Jessie gave him an extra-special parting gift the night before he left that made his back ache and his knees rubbery the next morning, but he didn't mind a bit. He'd take that kind of attention any day of the week.

At least he didn't feel quite so dreaded about this. This would be it. The last time he saw Boston. After this was done, he'd sign that paper that maintained the current agreement, flip off his family one more time just for the hell of it, then fly home to Austin, to where he belonged, and be rid of them.

"We'll be landing in five minutes, Mister Vulpan," Avery called over the intercom. "If you could secure anything loose and prepare for landing please. There's a car waiting for you to take you to the courthouse, and I'll make sure your bags are sent on to your hotel."

Kit hit the button on the side of the wall. “Thanks, Avery,” he called back, then he took his teacup back to the galley and returned to the couch and sat on the forward-facing half.

He was actually looking forward to this now. He was going to watch Cybil hang herself in court, hopefully today, which would be very satisfying, then he’d get the chance to look in the faces of his family and give them everything they wanted, and leave them totally mystified as to why. Why he didn’t take the money, why he didn’t punish them for their sins against him. But that was the point, a point they’d never understand. He saw that money for what it was, a curse, a blight on a family he hated, and he could not punish them any more than by giving them exactly what they wanted. He would give them their money, and they would continue to believe they were the kings of all creation, continue to be rich, and continue to be miserable and wretched. They wouldn’t understand was that the ultimate revenge against them wasn’t to punish them, but to leave them in their gilded cage, where they could eat away at each other like starving rats, find nothing in their lives but their love of their money and status. They would die alone, they would die unhappy, and they would die unwanted.

And there was no better revenge than that.

A few of them had escaped that fate. Vil certainly, but Sheila had also come to understand that there was more to life than money. Sure, Sheila couldn’t live without her money, but at least she understood that there were some things money couldn’t buy, like real friends, or love, or happiness, and she understood how important they were. Kit was better off poor than he’d ever been rich. And though it was fun to be spoiled by Vil a little bit from time to time, to fly in her jet, eat nice food, the truth was, he’d be just as happy if Vil never gave him another thing again, as long as she stayed in his life. Vil was much more important than her money. His sister mattered to him much more than her toys and her wealth.

Family was more important to him than family.

The plane touched down, landing out of a cloudless sky in the early morning. They'd taken off in the darkness of predawn, and they'd literally be going straight to the courthouse. The trial was scheduled to resume at 9:00am, and given that he moved into Eastern time, it was 8:27am now... and from what Vil told him, nobody knew he was going to be there except the uncles and aunts and Vil. Not even the cousins knew he was coming, so his appearance in the courtroom was certain to be significant to Cybil and her lawyers. Kit's split from his family and his hatred of this case was well known, so for him to show up in court was a huge issue. Something had to make him come up from Austin to attend the trial, and Cybil's lawyers would go nuts trying to figure out why.

It was cold in Boston. The hatch let biting air in, and he pulled his coat around him and shivered his tail, almost feeling like he did the day of the funeral, almost a year ago. That day had been dreary, though, but today was bright and sunny. A limo was waiting before him, with one of Vil's bodyguards standing there with his paws folded before him. Kit nodded to Avery as ground crews came to open the cargo hatch and get his luggage, and he shouldered his carry-on and stepped down onto the tarmac on shoeless feet.

If Sam could do it, so could he.

It wasn't that bad, though. He went without shoes almost all the time, so his pads were thick and durable. He could feel a little bit of cold through them, but nothing that would make him dance in place. Now if it was wet or raining or snowing, he'd probably be looking for a shoe store, however....

“Stav or Marcus?” Kit asked as the panther opened the door of the limo for him.

“Marcus,” he answered with a smile. “We’ll be at the courthouse in about twenty minutes. There’s tea and warm bagels inside for you.”

“Thanks,” he said as he ducked in and settled in the luxurious seat of the limousine. Marcus climbed in with the driver in the front seat, and the ground crews put his suitcases in the trunk, closed it, and waved to the driver that he was clear to go. Kit turned on the small TV in the back and poured a cup of tea for himself, then watched the local news segment on the Today show. The trial was actually on the newscast, the last little sound bite before returning to the network program. “And finally, the Vulpan civil trial continues today,” the vixen anchor said, “with the widow of Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan beginning her case to try to claim the Vulpan estate, which is contested by the Vulpan family. Full details at five o’clock.”

“Don’t they have anything better to do?” Kit complained loudly.

“This is Boston, Mister Vulpan. No,” Marcus said from up front, which made Kit chuckle.

The limo jumped briefly onto interstate and then dove down into the new Big Dig, tunnels under Boston that were such a scandal just about everywhere, all new and pristine but costing a ridiculous amount of money. The limo moved against the flow of rush hour traffic, but that was a relative concept downtown, so it moved through crowded roads as it exited into the heart of Boston, and then traversed the distance from the exit to the venerable courthouse in Boston. Reporters and news vans were all over the place around the courthouse, and cameras zoomed in on the limo as it drove by the courthouse, trying to get footage of who was arriving next for the high-profile case. “We’re going in through the garage,” Marcus told him as they went by the courthouse and turned at the corner, then turned onto the ramp leading to the underground parking garage by the courthouse.

“Thank God,” Kit breathed. “Am I the first here or the last?”

“The last,” he answered. “Seating in the courtroom is first come first served, so some have literally been camping out on the courthouse steps. But since you’re a potential witness, you’re guaranteed a seat.”

“Lucky me,” Kit grunted as the limo came to a stop by an elevator door, just beyond a concrete barricade complete with a metal detector and a security guard, a tall and rather burly fox.

Marcus opened the door for him and walked with him to the guard, who took one look at his eyes and almost dropped his clipboard. “Mister Vulpan sir,” he said, almost stammering, motioning him through. “Just ignore the metal detector, sir, go on through please.”

“Thank you,” he said with a nod as he stepped around the metal detector, followed by Marcus. “Oh, hey, you hungry?” he called back to the guard.

“Sir?”

“I have some bagels in the limo I couldn’t eat. All yours if you want ‘em, you can split ‘em with the limo driver.”

“Uh, thank you sir!” he said with a sudden smile. Marcus pressed the elevator button for him, and it opened immediately. He got a smile when he saw the limo driver handing the security guard a bag of bagels.

Marcus led him through quite a few furs on their floor, many of which gave ground to an obvious Vulpan and his bodyguard, staring at him as he passed. Many of them identified him, but then again, his half-missing left ear separated him quite distinctively from the rest of the Vulpan family. Marcus brought him to a large set of open double doors at the end of the hall, the room beyond probably the biggest courtroom in the courthouse, and it was filled nearly to capacity of quietly murmuring furs, the vast majority of which were foxes. Marcus led him to the second row on the right, where Vil and her other bodyguard were sitting right on the aisle. The aunts, uncles, and quite a few cousins were sitting in the rows behind and beside Vil, and they were all looking at him both fearfully and with relief that he was there. “Bro,” she smiled, standing up and hugging him, then motioning him to sit beside her, the two panthers flanking them on the padded bench. “How was the flight up?”

“Boring,” he said. “I napped through most of it. Where do things stand?”

“Opening statements are done, and Cybil’s team has already gone through two witnesses,” she answered. “They’ve established that Dad’s actions were unhinged to lay the groundwork for their case. I think they’re calling the witness I want them to call today, Basil Hawthorne,” she whispered behind her paw to even hide her mouth from the lawyers that were looking at them from the other side of the aisle. “He’s Cybil’s personal butler who’s going to put the nail in the coffin concerning Dad’s obsession with you by testifying from the inside, you know, since he was there right up to the end. He’s the one I want to get crossed.”

“What if they don’t call him?”

“Then we will. He’s already on the witness list, so they can’t object if we call him.”

“Ah.”

He looked past Vil and saw someone across the courtroom looking at him. The sharp muzzle and red hair, done perfectly, revealed that it was none other than Cybil Whitmore Vulpan, daughter of Earl Chester Whitmore. She gave Kit a strange, curious look, then her brows furrowed and she leaned forward to talk to her lawyers. The lawyers looked at him, whispered to her, then nodded.

The bailiff called the court to order, and the judge entered. He was an elderly fox, his red fur almost white, wearing wire rimmed glasses. He seated himself with an absent nod, then banged his gavel. “Court is in session. Mister Strahan, call your first witness.”

A fox on the far side stood up. “We call Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan the Third,” he said in a loud voice.

Kit started, the entire courtroom gasped, then he glared at Vil with unholy murder in his eyes. “You said I wouldn’t be called!” he hissed.

“I didn’t think she had the guts,” Vil mused in a whisper. “Well, go sic her, bro,” she said with a sudden grin.

“I will get you for this, sis,” he growled as he stood up. The bailiff showed him to the witness stand, and he took the oath. The tall fox approached the stand and squared off in front of him as the bailiff asked him to state his full name for the record. “Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan,” he recited, then he was motioned to sit.

“Your honor, permission to treat the witness as hostile?” the lawyer asked.

“I dare say you should,” the judge said, which caused a titter from the courtroom. “Granted,” he said with a smile, motioning at the lawyer with an aged paw.

Kit was very unhappy, but he also wasn't about to do anything stupid. He answered the lawyer's questions truthfully and honestly, since he asked questions pertaining to Kit's very hostile relationship with his father, and it was testimony that would only help Vil when the time came. The lawyer made him tell the court about his being disowned and the terrible things that happened to him, which everyone knew his father had done after the lawyer produced all kinds of evidence linking every act that Kit could recall to his father. The lawyer seemed to take almost ghoulish delight when he said, “Mister Vulpan, I seem to notice that there's something wrong with your ear. Could you tell us how you lost it?”

Kit gave him a look that could have peeled the enamel off the snarky lawyer's teeth. “I was hit by a car,” he answered. “But I'm sure you know that's not the only thing it did,” he added bitingly, holding up his scarred left arm. “Here, have a good look,” he grated, turning his arm to and fro from the lawyer. “Want me to show you the scars on my back, too? So you can get a nice long look at all my injuries and milk it for everything it's worth?”

“That's enough of that, young male,” the judge warned before the lawyer could even look at him.

“As a matter of fact, Mister Vulpan, I think you should show the court your back, so they can fully appreciate the extent of your injuries,” the lawyer said with an evil little smile that only Kit could see.

Kit growled in his throat, and stood up aggressively. He took off his suit coat, pulled his shirt out of his pants, turned around, and raised his shirt to reveal the white scars on his lower back.

“Is it correct that you still have screws in your back from the surgeries?” the lawyer asked.

“It is.”

“Thank you, sir. Please, return to your seat.” Kit did so. “Do you have any lingering effects from the accident?”

“What do you mean?”

“Any residual pain? Stiffness? Physical impediments or limitations?”

“Not really. My back gets sore if I sleep on a bed that’s too soft,” he answered. “Outside of that, it doesn’t bother me that much.”

“Isn’t it a bit odd that a fox of your means carries such dramatic scars? I mean, sir, you’re missing your ear. Surely reconstructive surgery could restore it.”

“It could, I guess, but I’m used to it now. Besides, my wife has never seen me any other way. She said I’d look weird if I had a whole ear.”

The lawyer’s mouth twitched when there were a few chuckles from the spectators. “Why didn’t you have your ear repaired immediately after the accident?”

“I couldn’t afford it,” Kit told him with a steady look. “Look, can you get to the point? I’d like to get this done sometime today. Just ask what you’re digging at instead of trying to be Perry Mason.”

The audience broke out into laughter, and the lawyer glared at him darkly. Kit glanced at the judge, who actually looked a little amused. “You can move along, Mister Strahan,” the judge smiled. “The young male does actually have a valid issue. I’m not sure where you’re going with this.”

“The point, Mister Vulpan, is that you, a member of one of the richest families in America, couldn't pay your hospital bills,” he said intensely. “Would you please tell the court why?”

“I was disowned,” he shrugged. “And at the time, I was in college. I was just as poor as any other college student.”

“And would you please explain to the court what happened after you were injured?”

“Well, that’s a lot of ground. Could you be more specific?”

“Very well,” he said, going to his table and picking up a file. “Petitioner’s exhibit seventeen, your honor,” he said. “The hospital payment records from Boston Mercy General. Who paid for your medical bills, Mister Vulpan?”

“My sister.”

“Despite the strict policy of your father to disown anyone caught giving you assistance?”

“Well, after word got out I was hurt, the scandal made him back off,” he answered. “God forbid anything stain the Vulpan family reputation like being outed as a heartless bastard.”

“Your honor,” the lawyer sighed.

The judge chuckled. “Mister Vulpan, try to keep the color commentary to a minimum. Just answer his questions.”

“I’m trying, he just doesn’t want to hear the whole truth,” Kit grunted, “which is what I swore to tell. My father was a heartless bastard. If you don’t hear that fact, then my answer isn’t the whole truth.”

Vil gave him a huge, amused grin, but his uncles looked a little annoyed.

“Sometimes one fox’s whole truth is another’s conjecture, Mister Vulpan. Try to stick to the facts.”

“Yes, sir,” Kit sighed with a nod.

“So, you’re here to tell the whole truth?” the lawyer asked with a predatory smile. “Even if it hurts your sister’s case?”

“I don’t particularly care about my sister’s case,” Kit told him immediately and forcefully. “I have no part of this. I’m being used by my sister just as much as Cybil is trying to use me now, and I don’t particularly damn well appreciate it. I walked away from this family years ago. All I want is to be left alone to live my own life, away from Boston, away from the Vulpans, and away from money. Yet no matter how far I go or how far I run, I still can’t get away from them, from it, or from you.”

“So if Misses Vulpan wins this case?”

“I couldn’t care less,” Kit growled.

“I find that slightly hard to believe,” the lawyer noted. “Given they are your family.”

“Would your family do this to you?” Kit snapped, pointing at his ear.

The lawyer just smirked. "No more questions."

He went back to his table and sat down. One of the foxes at the table in front of Vil stood up. "I have only one matter to discuss with you, Mister Vulpan," he said. "Did you experience any other unusual or dangerous incidents after your father died?"

Kit blinked, and nodded. "I was shot. Someone tried to kill me."

"How do you know this, Mister Vulpan?"

"The Austin Police told me. They also told me the guy who shot me was a mob hit fur, and he was trying to fulfill a contract on me."

"So, someone hired him to kill you?"

"Yes."

"How did you survive the attempt?"

"My boss shot and killed the leopard that attacked me," he answered. "If not for him, I'd be dead right now."

"Have the police solved the case and tracked down the fur who hired the hit fur?"

Kit caught the clever wording in the question, and answered it truthfully as it was asked. "No. Not yet."

"Do they have any suspects they've discussed with you?"

"No one solid."

"After you were shot, what was your opinion, Mister Vulpan? Who did you think tried to kill you?"

“Given my family’s...position, I believed it was a member of my family.”

“Why would a member of your family try to kill you, Mister Vulpan? After all, you were disowned and no threat to anyone, living halfway across the country.”

Kit wasn’t quite sure what point the lawyer was trying to make, so he just answered the question. “Because of my wife. Well, at the time she wasn’t my wife, but my girlfriend. She’s a cat.”

“And this is a matter worth trying to kill you?”

“In the Vulpan family, yes. It would be,” he said honestly, staring directly into Uncle Zach’s eyes. “The Vulpans are purists,” he announced boldly. “They don’t believe in marriage outside the species. When I was shot, I knew they knew about my relationship with Jessica, and there are a few members of my family that are fanatical enough for me to believe would be capable of it.”

The lawyer nodded. “Thank you, Mister Vulpan. No more questions.”

Kit was a little startled, but the murmur in the courtroom made him understand. Vil wasn’t toying with Cybil, she was giving Kit a chance to say that publicly, to finally call down his family over his wife. She gave him the chance to reveal that the Vulpans were purists, which would forever protect him and Jessie from his family even after he gave them back the money. If anything ever happened to him or his wife, then almost every camera in America would turn on the Vulpan family, who were now exposed as fanatical purists whom Kit feared so much that he once believed that one of them tried to kill him because of his relationship with a cat, who was now his wife.

“Redirect?” the judge called.

“No questions,” the other lawyer said after standing.

“You may step down, Mister Vulpan,” the judge told him.

“You owe me,” Vil said in a singsong kind of whisper as he sat down beside her.

“Thanks, sis,” he whispered back, patting her knee.

It was poetic justice that the next witness was the one Vil wanted, Basil Hawthorne. He was a small, reedy rabbit, fairly old, and walked with a cane. Kit listened as the lawyer for Cybil painted the picture Kit’s testimony laid out, about how his father had tried to bury his son’s accident from the press, denied paying his hospital bills, even sought to have the hospital discharge him to a private care facility, whom the rabbit said that Lucas Vulpan confided would kill Kit with a drug overdose. This new tidbit infuriated Kit, but it also wasn’t that big of a shock. His father would have seen killing Kit as the ultimate act of control, to decide life and death. The hospital refused that demand, and that refusal saved Kit’s life.

Kit was quite curious after Cybil’s lawyer sat down, and Vil’s lawyer stood. “Mister Hawthorne,” he said, taking something out of his briefcase.

“Do you recognize this?”

He held out a cell phone.

“Uh, it’s a cell phone,” he said, not quite sure what to say.

“Yes. Do you recognize it?”

“No sir, I do not.”

“So, this cell phone does not belong to your employer, Cybil Whitmore Vulpan?” he asked.

“I can’t honestly answer that question, sir. She owns more than one phone. I can’t confirm or deny with complete authority.”

“Can you testify to Misses Vulpan’s cell plan, sir?” he asked.

“Excuse me?”

“You are Misses Vulpan’s personal butler, privy to the secrets of the Vulpan family. Does Misses Vulpan have a contract with a cell provider, sir? Or does she use prepaid cell phone services?”

Kit was looking at Cybil. She seemed to start slightly at that question, and glanced at the lawyers sitting at the table in front of her. She leaned forward and whispered to them, and one of them whispered back as the butler answered.

“Why, she has a plan, sir,” he answered. “Why would Misses Vulpan use prepaid cell phones? Those are for the destitute,” he scoffed.

Vil’s lawyer almost beamed. “So, Misses Vulpan would have no earthly business using a prepaid cell phone?”

“No sir,” he said in confusion.

“Objection!” Cybil’s lawyer called. “Where is this going, your honor?”

“If I may, your honor?” the lawyer said, going back to his table. “Give me a little latitude? I’ll make my point momentarily.”

“Alright, but don’t dally about, counsel.”

“Thank you, your honor. Now then, sir, you state that your employer would have no business using a prepaid cell phone. Now, if we examine Respondant’s exhibit nine, already introduced, we see the phone logs of the assailant on Mister Vulpan, who was called in Atlanta from an untraceable pre-paid cell phone. Exhibit ten demonstrates that the origin of the call, according to cell tower records, was in Boston.”

“Yes?”

“In fact, if we examine the cell tower logs on exhibit eleven, we discover that the call had to come from somewhere in this area,” he said as his partner picked up a large posterboard map of the Boston area, pointing to a red circle. “That is the reception area of the cell tower that logged the call. Quite a large area, is it not?”

“Counsel,” the judge warned.

“Sorry, your honor. This point here, Mister Hawthorne, is Stonebrook Manor. It appears to fall inside the range of the cell tower that captured the cell call,” he noted. “So, is it not theoretically possible that the call that put out the contract on Kitstrom Vulpan could have originated from Stonebrook Manor?” he asked.

Kit saw where he was going now. He looked at Cybil. She was grinning broadly, and then Kit understood that Vil had baited Cybil. Cybil, and many in the audience, were going to remember Kit’s testimony and jump to the conclusion that a Vulpan had called out the hit from Stonebrook. But it was Cybil, and Kit’s testimony actually helped hide the trap until the lawyer dropped it on the rabbit. It wasn’t planned, but Kit’s own testimony was the bait that was going to lure Cybil into the cage.

“Uh, yes, sir, it looks possible,” the rabbit said, glancing at Cybil, who just smiled at him and nodded slightly.

“Very good. Now, Mister Hawthorne, do you own a prepaid cell phone?”

“Me? No sir, I use a phone provided by Misses Vulpan.”

“And the staff at Stonebrook Manor? Do any of them use prepaid cell phones?”

“Not to my knowledge, sir. I can’t answer that with complete veracity, however, but I would think not. Why would they when they are provided their own phones?”

“Explain, please, sir.”

“The staff members are issued cell phones by the manor that double as two-way radios. Everyone, from the gardeners to the chief of staff, carries such a phone, and they’re allowed to use their phones for personal calls.”

“So no one on the manor would have a reason to use a prepaid phone?”

“No sir, at least no legal reason,” he said.

The lawyer snapped his fingers. “Ah, there’s the crux of the argument, sir, no legal reason,” he said quickly, reaching for something. The other lawyer picked up a piece of paper and handed it to him. “Your honor, might I introduce a piece of evidence unearthed just recently?” he asked, holding up the paper.

“What is the nature of this evidence, counsel?” the judge asked as the other lawyer took a copy and handed it across the aisle, to the opposing counsel.

“It’s a federal wiretapping document. This, your honor, is a certified text transcript of the conversation that arranged the attempt on Mister Vulpan’s life, captured by a roving federal wiretap. This affidavit, from Special Agent Brown of the FBI, verifies the validity of this transcript.”

Kit was staring at Cybil. Cybil’s eyes widened, her jaw dropped, and she leaned forward to hiss angrily at the lawyers at the table before her.

“Why wasn’t this turned over sooner, counsel?” the judge asked testily after the bailiff handed it to him. “It’s dated over a month ago!”

“We had problems procuring it from the bureau, your honor. They refused to turn it over to us.”

“And you can verify that?”

“If you read the affidavit from the agent, your honor, you’ll see the difficulties we had in attaining this evidence,” he stated. “We received these affidavits late last night.”

There was tense silence in the courtroom as the judge read the affidavit. “Alright, counsel, proceed.”

“Your honor, I object!” Cybil’s attorney called, standing quickly. “It’s too late to introduce new evidence now that we’re already at trial! They had their chance during discovery!”

“Overruled,” the judge said quickly. “This affidavit gives counsel more than enough latitude with wrangling this evidence away from the FBI, given it was attained by a wiretap that looks illegal.”

“Then this evidence can’t be presented!”

“If this were a criminal trial, you’d be right,” the judge noted calmly. “But this is a civil proceeding, counsel. The fact that the government broke its own laws to tap cell phone calls is a moot point in this proceeding. The only matter here is that the evidence presented is viable and truthful. And it is. So overruled. And your exception is noted,” he said, holding a paw up when the lawyer was about to say something else.

Cybil had her snout between her lawyers, whispering at them heatedly.

“Mister Hawthorne, would you read the highlighted portion of the transcript?” the lawyer asked.

He took it from the bailiff, and then did so. “No, no, you can’t do that,” he said, reading in a monotone. “I thought you couldn’t take a gun through an airport. Yes I can if I fly a private plane from a local airstrip. I have a license. I’ll just put my guns in the trunk and drive over to the airport and fly over in a private plane. Nobody will ever know. Trunk. What is a trunk.” His eyes widened slightly, and he looked to Cybil with a startled expression.

“Continue reading please.”

“A trunk, you know, where you put things in a car. Like your golf clubs and luggage.”

He fell silent.

“Mister Hawthorne?”

“Oh. A boot,” he said in a whisper.

“A what, sir?”

“A boot,” he said in a louder voice, which caused a storm of whispering.

“What is a boot, sir?”

“It’s a car’s cargo box, sir,” he said, glancing at Cybil. “Where one keeps the spare tire and jack and such.”

“Really? I’ve never heard it called a boot in America before, Mister Hawthorne. Isn’t that a British word for a car’s trunk?”

Hawthorne was silent a long moment. “Yes,” he finally admitted.

And there it was. Cybil looked over towards Kit, and she found multiple sets of Vulpan eyes staring back at her coldly. Kit saw her eyes widen, and then her fur try to ruffle, and then fear crept into her startled expression. She knew. She knew the Vulpan knew. And she knew they had her dead to rights.

She knew she lost. And Kit found tremendous satisfaction in the chagrin that swept over her proud, haughty face.

“Very well, sir, might you explain why the prepaid cell phone that ordered the hit on Mister Vulpan, which could have been used at Stonebrook Manor, is demonstrated here to be used by someone who uses British terminology? Unfortunately we have no audio of this call sir, so we can only go by the words. Mister Hawthorne, how many British people live at Stonebrook?”

“A few,” he said quietly. “Misses Vulpan’s personal staff.”

“And Misses Vulpan herself?”

“Yes,” he said, looking down.

“No further questions,” the lawyer said simply, turning and walking back to his seat and sitting calmly as his companion stacked a shuffle of papers on the desk and then put them down.

Cybil issued several low commands to her lawyers, and one of them stood up. “Your honor,” he began. “We request an adjournment for the day so we can study this new evidence and get in contact with the agent who issued this affidavit.”

“Granted. Court is adjourned until nine o’clock tomorrow morning.” He banged his gavel, and he pushed his chair back from the bench.

“All rise!” the bailiff called. Everyone did so, and the judge filed out of the room. There was a great deal of hushed whispering, and several furs at the back charged out of the room, most likely reporters to report on the bombshell dropped in the courtroom seconds ago.

Thought the accusation wasn’t made directly, the inference was definitely there. A British person had tried to have Kit killed, and the only British people at Stonebrook were Cybil Whitmore Vulpan and her personal staff.

“It’s over now,” Vil breathed, patting him on the shoulder. “Sign a few papers, bro, and you can go home.”

“Gladly,” he said as Marcus stepped into the aisle and motioned Kit ahead with his paw. Kit stepped out, but he stopped and stared right at Cybil until she looked at him. Their eyes met, and Kit took his paw out of his pocket, raised it, and quite deliberately flipped her off with cold eyes boring into her. Then he mouthed the words you lose at her, and then turned his back and walked out of the courtroom.

In a private conference room, Kit, Vil, and Uncle Zach sat at a table with Vil’s lawyer and two other foxes who stood behind him. “This is an agreement, explained in the presence of two notary publics to serve as witness,” he explained, “that mirrors the current standing will of your father, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan Junior, Kit. This agreement retains the current asset sharing agreement between your family members, dividing your father’s fortune and assets up amongst them evenly, except for your sister Vilenne. Instead of money, she receives the stocks that give her ownership and control of Vulpan Shipyards and Vulpan Steel. Included in this document, Mister Vulpan, is a statement that severs you completely from your family interests,” he said in a steady voice. “By signing this agreement, you surrender any future attempts to claim your portion of the family assets or inheritance, legally severing you from your family, which means that you can never file a lawsuit or make a claim against your father’s estate, except for one point. By agreement between Vilenne and the rest of the family, the property known as Stonebrook Manor will retain your name on the deed as a co-interest. Vilenne will be named primary owner, you will be named co-owner, and Zachary tertiary owner. What this means is upon the death of Vilenne Vulpan, should you remain living, ownership of the manor will revert to you. If both you and Vilenne were to pass away, ownership reverts to Zachary. If all three of you are deceased, it falls to your children in order of their parents on the deed, beginning with Vilenne, then you, then Zachary. Do you understand this?”

“I do,” he answered.

“Included in the Stonebrook agreement is a clause that allows Zachary to remain in the manor as a resident, with power to maintain the grounds, access the manor’s financial accounts, hire and fire all staff except for Clancy MacArren, and domicile his children within the manor until they reach the age of twenty-one. Do you understand?”

“Yeah, I understand.”

“This agreement is set up so it will supersede the prior version of your father’s will, should Vilenne win her case and have your father’s current will nullified, except for one point. The clause forcing your family to surrender its family assets for associating with you will no longer be valid. This means that you will be allowed to communicate and socialize freely with your family, and they with you, and they will be permitted to grant you any property or monies they so desire from their own personal share of the Vulpan estate. Do you understand this?”

“I understand.”

“Have you read the document as I instructed, Mister Vulpan?” he asked Zach.

“I have.”

“Is it as I’ve described?”

“It is.”

“Have you read this document as I instructed, Miss Vulpan?” he asked Vil.

“I did.”

“Is it as I’ve described?”

“Exactly.”

The lawyer nodded. “Very well. If you agree to this, Mister Vulpan,” he said, turning the pages of the document to the back, “then sign here, on this line.”

Vilenne offered him a pen, her eyes a mystery. He took it, and with absolutely no hesitation, he signed it. “And once more, on this line,” the lawyer said, turning to the back page. Kit signed it again.

“And would the witnesses please sign and affix their seals?” the lawyer asked, pushing the document to the side of Kit. He watched as the two foxes signed the document, then used their seals over their signatures to validate them.

“Very well, this business is concluded. If Vilenne wins the lawsuit, Kit, then this contract will be put in effect, maintaining the Vulpan legal situation as it currently stands.”

“Then I’m done here?” Kit asked.

“You are done. You just signed away your control of the Vulpan family fortune, Mister Vulpan. I do hope you understand exactly what you’ve done here today.”

“I saved my soul, counsel,” he breathed explosively. “I saved my soul.”

“I do not understand you at all, Kit,” Zach told him, his eyes totally mystified. “You had everything, and you just sign it away without a word, without a second’s thought.”

“I got everything I wanted out of it, uncle Zach,” Kit told him. “I got my freedom. I’m going home now. I pray to God above I never see you or Boston again.”

“We won’t come looking for you,” Zach told him. “Not after you married a cat.”

“Then you stay up here, I’ll stay down there, and we can forget all about each other.”

“I can live with that.”

Kit left the conference room feeling like a great weight had been lifted from his shoulders. Now, finally, he was free. The family had no reason to ever look for him again. He had no control over them, no power over them, and now that the public knew about their purist attitude, he and Jessie were safe from them. They were free to drown in their money and leave him to his life in Austin with his wife, his friends, his job, and what few members of the family he still loved.

He was free of them, at long last. He was free of them.

He put his paws in his pockets and walked down the hallway, whistling idly to himself.

“Kit! Wait!” someone called. He stopped and turned around, and saw Muffy rushing towards him. She hugged him tightly, patting him on the back, and then kissed him on the cheek. “It’s already hit the family. Thank you!”

“For what?”

“For being what I hoped you would be,” she told him, “instead of what they were afraid you were. You’re better than them, Kit, and you proved it. Can I come visit you in Austin?”

“Sure,” he said with a rueful chuckle, patting her on the shoulder.

“Cool! I’m looking forward to getting to know my cousin better, but right now I gotta go! We’re gonna celebrate!”

She ran off down the hall, and he had to chuckle. “Enjoy it, Muffy. For what little pleasure it gives you,” he added, then Marcus fell into step beside him. Together, they headed for the parking garage, where a limo was waiting to return him to a life of quiet, middle-class, blissful normality.

“No Vil?”

“She’s not sure she can talk to you right now,” he answered simply. “She’s so proud she could cry.”

“Because she thinks I’m a lunatic?”

“No, because I think she finally understands you, Kit,” he answered. “She sees that you’re not crazy at all. What you have in Austin makes you the richest Vulpan of them all, son. And your sister is finally starting to see it.”

“I’m glad someone does,” he chuckled.

“Let’s get you home, Kit. There’s a pretty young lady waiting for you to come home.”

Kit again rode in a limo, and flew in a private plane, and then was dropped off at the airport. But instead of a limo, Kit took a taxi home. He was a normal fur again, just another fox, and he couldn’t be happier.

He carried his suitcases into his apartment, suitcases he didn’t even use, then flopped down on the couch and stared at the brand new LCD TV sitting on the entertainment center, bought last week after he and Jessie spent two days shopping around for the best model at the best price. It made him laugh. A Vulpan wouldn’t do that. They’d go straight for the best, the most expensive, and buy it without even thinking twice. But he wasn't a Vulpan, at least not anymore.

In many ways, he never was.

He looked around at their modest apartment, filled with gifts and quality furniture, showing the duality of his life. He was a rich kid who was broke, trying to be a normal guy, but that life just kept intruding on him. Sometimes, he hated it. But sometimes, he didn't mind so much. Money couldn't buy happiness, but it could buy some damn fun toys.

All he ever wanted was for the family to leave him alone, let him live his own life, be his own fox. And now, finally, he achieved that goal. The family's money was now solidly theirs, all challenges either crushed or signed away, so they were secure. Kit was severed by his own paw, removed from the family, and now he felt they would honor his departure from the family. They would leave him alone, let him enjoy his life with his wife, but at least now those few in the family he did love could visit him, be a part of his life without any threat of repercussion from the ghost of his dead father, who had finally been put to rest.

His father had lost. Finally. The last strings were cut that held his ghost to Kit's life, and now he was free to fall into hell.

The door opened and Jessie rushed in. No doubt Sheila or Vil had called her, and she'd cut her afternoon class to come home, he realized. She stood in the doorway, her eyes on him. "Well?"

"It's over," he told her simply. "Cybil hung herself in court. I signed the papers. I'm never going back."

"Regrets?" she asked simply.

“Not a single one,” he said immediately. “Nothing in Boston could ever compare to this, or to you.”

She sat down on the couch, and cuddled up to him. “Welcome home, my handsome fox,” she cooed, and she began to purr.

“I love you, my pretty kitty,” he said with a contented sigh, putting his arm around her and snuggling, feeling her warmth, hearing her beautiful, wonderful, mesmerizing purr.

“Kit?”

“Yes, love?”

“I’m glad you came home so early. I have something to tell you.”

“What?”

“I just found out an hour ago. I’m pregnant.”

Kit gave a start, and pushed her out so he could look into her eyes. “Really? You—we—oh my God!” he said, then he laughed and hugged her tightly. “You’re going to have a baby! I’m so happy, Jessie!”

“Me too,” she said, sighing and nuzzling his neck, just holding onto him. “You got what you wanted, and I got what I wanted, my love. Today was a good day.”

“It was a good day,” he agreed, kissing her ear, then leaning his head against hers. “It was a very good day.”

“So, now what?” she asked.

“Now? Now we live, my love. Free of my family. Free to be whatever we want. Free to raise our children. We live, and we love, and we raise our children, and we be happy.”

“Mmmm, I can live with that,” she giggled, and she again began to purr, purring her happiness, purring her contentment, and telling him without words that she was, at that moment, the happiest femme in the world.

And that made him the happiest male on earth.

Chapter 20

It took Kit quite a while to rationalize Jessie's news, given everything else that had happened in just one day. The euphoria and relief at finally freeing himself of the chains of his family was just a platform the news of his impending fatherhood used to catapult his mind into a state of near rapture. It was the next day before either of them thought to start spreading the news.

News that would have different reactions once it reached certain ears, he was sure. Some reactions were easy enough to predict. Vil, Sandy, Sam, the crew, the friends in the complex, the sorority, they'd be ecstatic. But when word of Jessie's pregnancy went past Vil and reached the aunts and uncles, he was rather sure that there wouldn't be any celebration. Another reaction that would be very hard for him to gauge would be Hannah. She had been against the marriage, and now her daughter was pregnant, something Hannah would fear given that she was still convinced that Kit was going to leave Jessie within two years. How would she react? Some part of her, he was sure, would be overjoyed. Even if she wasn't so sure of the ability of the marriage, the idea of being a grandmother would have a certain unmistakable appeal.

They should have started making phone calls that very night, but Kit was all but shellshocked from Jessie dropping that bomb on him the day he freed himself from his family. He walked around in a kind of giddy stupor once the true impact of it hit him for most of the afternoon, and Jessie was forced to keep a handle on him, which precluded her from starting the tasks of making phone calls. Jessie had been forced to make Kit heel by evening by keeping him entrenched on the couch, snuggling him through his happy disorientation, giving him a fuzz therapy only Jessie could really supply. When she decided that he had too much nervous energy, she took him back to the bedroom and wore him out.

Since he was back and had no excuse—truly, had not even told anyone that he was home—the crew was quite shocked to see him all but dance into the office the next morning, a huge, stupid smile on his face. “Kit!” she gasped. “I thought you were in Boston!” She nearly smacked him when he pulled her out from behind the desk and spun her around the lobby, then looked utterly confused when he set her right back on her chair and all but did a jig on his way down the hallway into the main office. She followed behind him as the rest of the office saw him, and he was swarmed over by the crew.

“Trial? Oh, the trial’s over,” he said with a huge grin.

“Already? Sheila isn’t back yet,” Rick noted. “It was supposed to last at least a week—“

“Well, it’s still going on, I suppose,” Kit shrugged, scratching his muzzle. “My part of it’s over, I should say.”

“Why didn’t you call and tell me you were back, son?” he asked. “And why didn’t Sheila check in last night? I was about to call her. She may be up there for her family trial, but she’s also up there to keep us informed.”

“Call? Oh, sorry. It’s been kinda wild since yesterday morning.”

“Well, why? We’re dying to know!” Mike chimed in.

“I think you’d better tell us what’s going on, son,” Rick said, sitting at the main table.

“There’s so much, I don’t know where to start.”

“Try starting at the trial,” Barry said.

The offices emptied and everyone gathered around the big table. Kit sat on the edge of it and went over what happened the morning before, about what happened at the trial. They gaped when he told them about him being called to testify, and then the fatal testimony of Basil Hawthorne. The crew had not known about Cybil’s involvement in Kit’s shooting, and they were floored by that bombshell when Kit described how Vil’s lawyers verbally strangled Cybil’s case when they cross-examined the rabbit butler. “I have no doubt that Cybil is back in England,” he finished. “The look on her face when she realized we knew was just sheer terror. I’ll bet money she had her driver take her straight to the airport after the courtroom adjourned. If she hangs around here, she might have an arrest warrant being nailed to her door.”

“Well, that does explain a great deal of it,” Rick said with a nod.

“Why didn’t they arrest her right then?” Lilly asked.

“Because Vil got hold of the evidence illegally, and the evidence was itself illegal. It was part of an illegal federal wiretap, part of that homeland security crap. I guess they’ve been illegally tapping pre-paid cell phones,” Kit answered. “But that doesn’t matter in a civil trial. As long as the evidence is factual, it’s admissible. And Vil had an affidavit from the FBI and everything to prove it was factual.”

“Ohhh,” she said, nodding.

“But, now everyone knows that Cybil tried to kill me,” Kit continued. “And it was all just a part of a plan to distract my family long enough for her to sneak back to England with half of my family’s money.”

“What a bitch,” Lilly grunted, which caused nods of assent.

“Anyway, all of that is over,” Kit said happily. “I don’t need to be there for the rest of it. I have no doubt that Cybil is back in England, and the bombshell destroyed her case. My family has already agreed not to oppose Vil’s case, so I figure that it’ll all be done by Friday.”

“So, Vil will win and you’ll get the money?” Jeffrey asked eagerly.

“Vil will win, but I won’t get the money,” Kit answered. “I’ve already signed an agreement that leaves the part of my bastard father’s will intact that dealt with the division of the family fortune. Since that was what my family was fighting to maintain, they had no objection to allowing Vil to void the will. They just care about their money. The voiding of the will does mean that my sister and cousins can socialize with me all they want without any fear. In a way, that’s what my sister has been fighting for, getting me un-disowned. Her case will do that. I’ll no longer be disowned, but I still will have nothing from the family fortune. Given that, and Jessie, and my feelings about my family, it’s still the same to me. I disowned them six years ago. I want nothing to do with them.”

“So where exactly does that leave you, son?” Rick asked.

“At work,” Kit grinned. “I’m still the poor kid you all know and love. I signed away control of that money before I ever had control of it,” Kit chuckled.

“Wow,” Jeffrey breathed. “You signed away over a billion dollars!”

“Without batting an eye,” Kit nodded. “I want nothing to do with it. That money is curse, it is a curse, and I’m more than happy with this life.” There was a long silence, and Kit laughed. “So, get those dreams of yachts and Lamborghinis right out of your heads, you pack of leeches!” he barked with a teasing smile.

They all laughed, and Rick patted him on the shoulder. “Well, for one, I’m glad you came home, son. This place just wouldn’t be the same without you.”

“Him and Vil,” Mike grinned.

“Well, that might explain why Sheila hasn’t called or touched base,” Barry said. “If the Vulpans feel the trial’s over and they won, I think there’s some celebrating going on up there. Sheila may still be drunk.”

A few of them chuckled, and Kit could only nod. “Muffy said something about them going out to celebrate, and Vulpans know how to party.”

“That’s parr-taay,” Marty corrected, snapping his fingers.

“How do your family thinks of you?” Savid asked.

“They think I’m stark raving mad,” Kit answered honestly. “They don’t understand. They can’t understand. All they have ever known is money. It’s all they know, and all they ever want to know. They can’t fathom that anyone could ever be happy without it.”

“Well, I guess I’ll just have to try being happy poor,” Marty said melodramatically. “All my dreams of a handsome sugar daddy, dashed! Oh, the anguish of it all!”

“Keep tryin’, Marty,” Rick chuckled.

“So, no more extended time off, eh? You’re gonna be like the rest of us wage slaves?” Mike grinned.

“Thank God,” Kit said with an explosive sigh. “Believe me, I appreciate you guys being so understanding. First I get shot, then the marriage, then this. I swear, I owe Rick so many vacation days I won’t be setting foot out of the city for two years.”

“You’ll earn it back, son,” Rick grinned.

“Now, the other news that rocked my world yesterday,” he said with building excitement, “which was why I was so scattered I never told you guys I was back.” He put on a foolish grin. “Jessie’s gonna have a baby!”

It was as if he dropped a bomb at the table. There was instant bedlam as the crew all laughed and shouted and jumped up, and he was pulled six different ways as he was hugged and his paws were shaken, often at the same time. “Ohmygawd, I gotta call Jessie!” Lilly squealed, reaching for her Blackberry.”

“Jessie’s in class, so don’t bother her!” Kit warned. “And don’t spread it around just yet. Me and Jessie are going to tell everyone today, so let us tell the important people. If Vil finds out from someone other than me, she’ll have a conniption. And God help us if Hannah hears it second hand,” he said with a shudder.

“Now that I can understand,” Mike laughed.

“When is baby due, Kit?” Savid asked.

“We’re not entirely sure. Jessie’s only between one and two months pregnant, she got suspicious when she missed her period, and went to the university clinic yesterday and they did a pregnancy test. One of the things she asked me to do today was start researching obstetricians, we need to find one.”

“I’ll have her call Martha,” Rick said quickly. “Our doctor knows every doctor in Austin, he’ll know exactly who to recommend, given how shy and modest Jessie is. Let me go put her on the job,” he said, then he hurried into his office.

“So, there’s going to be the pattering of little feet in the Vulpan apartment,” Lilly grinned, hugging him yet again.

“Not the one we’re in now,” Kit chuckled. “Lupe says we’ll be in our new apartment around August. They start construction on the Westwood expansion in a couple of weeks, as soon as they finish getting all the permits, and from what Lupe said, they’re building our apartments first, ours and Lupe’s. It’s gonna be a townhouse-style condo by the pool. We’ll be in one and Lupe will be in the one next door, connected to us.”

“I should talk to Lupe about moving into Westwood,” Jeffrey said. “My apartment is getting small, and my roommate is getting totally annoying.”

“Go for it, Lupe’s a great landlord,” Kit told him.

Kit did have one more important person to tell today, and after he extricated himself from the others and got into his office, he attended to that. He used his work cell phone, his Blackberry, to call Vil. Kit was tasked to tell his side of the family and the crew, and Jessie would tell her side of the family and the sorority. Kit would also tell Lupe and Kevin, that was how they decided to divide the task of letting everyone know. Vil didn't answer her phone, it went straight to voice mail, which told him that she wouldn't answer it. He realized that she must be in court, since he was pretty sure that the trial didn't just end yesterday. They had other things to do, and Vil would be there while it was happening, as would most of the family. Kit had no doubt that Vil was sitting in the same aisle with his aunts and uncles—except maybe Uncle Tom, he always was a reclusive one—and most of the older cousins. He couldn't just let it go, though. She wouldn't answer the phone, but he had no doubt that she'd read it if he text-messaged her, something he rarely did:

Sis. Important news. Call me ASAP.

He waited for about five minutes, and when she didn't reply, either by text or calling, he sent her another message:

CALL ME NOW!

He put the Blackberry aside and put his attention on his computer when it beeped, warning him that Rick was putting something in his in-box. His Blackberry started ringing with the short tone that told him it was a text, and he picked it up as his assignment appeared in his in-box:

Bro, trial still on! My lawyers moved 2 throw out bitch's case. Judge hearing arguments, no ruling yet. Will call @ lunch break. TTYL.

He texted her back:

OK. Don't forget 2 call. BIG BIG NEWS!!!

He turned his attention back to his job, and saw that he was being assigned another interview. Rick, that sly dog, was already abusing the connections he'd made during Kit's wedding, for Kit was being assigned to interview Congressman Lamar Smith. Smith and Rick had met at the reception and had had a very congenial conversation, and Rick knew that Smith would never dare to decline an interview with Kit, for fear of angering Vilenne Vulpan. Politicians tread very lightly and carefully around the name Vulpan. Kit and Barry had interviewed quite a few local and state politicians and election officials already, part of the extensive and detailed coverage the magazine had devoted to the upcoming national election, turning the magazine into a real magazine. Smith would be the first federal office holder the magazine would interview, and Rick was wisely assigning the reporter to which Smith could dare not say no when he requested the interview.

He considered the assignment. He'd need to research Lamar Smith exhaustively before the interview. Kit wanted to know absolutely everything there was to know about the man; his voting record, his personal history, his platform, his vitals, his job goals. He should also research

Smith's potential competition for his House seat, both any possible challengers in his primary, as well as the candidates in the other party. And make sure there were no serious third party contenders as well. Kit wanted to be armed with every possible scrap of information he could find to ask tough yet fair questions to Congressman Smith, so the readers could fully understand where he stood and be able to decide for themselves if he was a fur for which they could vote or not. He would approach the interview as a neutral observer, with the objective to give the readers as much information about Smith as possible without ambushing him, but also asking tough questions about controversial issues, so the readers would know exactly where he stood.

He got so involved with his assignment he lost track of time. The ringing of his phone surprised him as he was putting the finishing touches on a detailed outline of information Kit needed to research to prepare for the interview, and he saved it with the mouse as his other paw picked up the phone and connected the call. "Lone Star Magazine, Kit Vulpan," he said in his ritual greeting used on the company cell phone.

"Now, what's this big news?" Vil asked, her voice a touch amused.

Kit laughed. "Are you sitting down, sis?"

"No, I'm standing out in the atrium in the courthouse, with a pack of nosy reporters hovering around me. That's right, nosy!" she called loudly, away from the phone.

"Well, this can wait until you're somewhere more private," Kit chuckled. "I don't want you looking un-Vulpan in public. Image, you know."

“Okay, you just got me real curious,” she told him. “Let me find an empty room somewhere, and I’ll fill you in on what happened today while we’re moving.”

“Sounds like a plan to me.”

“Okay, basically, it’s over,” she began. “This morning when the trial resumed, Cybil wasn’t here. She’s back in England. From what I was told, she went straight from the courthouse to the airport, and boarded the very first plane to Europe she could find. She ended up in Paris, and took another flight from there back to London. That bitch was in no mood to stay where I can get my claws in her,” she said with a dark laugh, “but she’s gonna find out I can reach all the way to England. Anyway, her lawyers tried to ask for a continuance, but the judge shot them down. Then my lawyers moved to have her entire case thrown out. They argued about that all morning, and the judge adjourned us for lunch by saying he’d rule on it tomorrow. We should have adjourned for the day with that, but we’re going back in after lunch so the lawyers for the family can drop their opposition to my case and allow it to move forward with only Cybil opposing it. That’s much simpler, so the judge should rule on that today, which is really him just acknowledging it. The main message it sends, though, is that the Vulpans are moving forward united, and that will probably influence the judge’s ruling on dismissing Cybil’s case. I mean, Cybil doesn’t really have a legal leg to stand on, and now it comes out that she’s the prime suspect in your attempted murder,” she said with a wicked little snicker. “That does put just a little bit of a shadow over her entire case,” she said lightly. “We’re also going to introduce the agreement you signed this afternoon, so everyone can just get it in their heads that you’re no longer part of this, and to leave you the hell alone.” There was a brief pause. “Okay, I’m in an empty room, bro. What’s this earth-shattering news?”

Kit laughed, took a deep breath, then blurted it out. “Jessie’s gonna have a baby!” he said gleefully.

Vil actually screamed, a high-pitched squeal, and it sounded like she dropped her Blackberry for a second. “Oh my God!” she cried ecstatically. “I can’t believe it! Congratulations, bro!”

“Thanks, sis,” he said happily. “Jessie told me yesterday, but it was so crazy with me coming back and the trial and signing the agreement and all, this was the first chance we’ve really had to start spreading the news.”

“Who cares about that!” she laughed. “Oh, bro, I’m so happy I could cry! I am crying!” she announced, then she sniffled as if to prove it. “I—I have to call Jessie! Does she have a doctor yet? When is the baby due? Have you told her folks? Please tell me you’re moving out of that closet and getting a proper house!”

Kit laughed lightly. “Jessie’s in class, so don’t call her. Rick and Martha are asking their doctor for the name of a good obstetrician right now, we don’t know exactly when the baby’s due yet, I don’t think Jessie told her folks yet, that’s her job, and we weren’t planning on moving out of the complex. We’re staying right where we are, thank you very much. I like not having to mow the lawn!”

Vil laughed again. “Don’t even think of telling me I can’t put a paw in about this, bro! My sis-in-law and my bro are having a baby! I’m going to find the best OB-GYN on the freakin’ planet and send him to Austin, on me.”

“I don’t think we have to go quite that far, but I’ll gladly let you pick up the tab for the doctor. This is about the health of my wife and my baby, I won’t say a word.”

“You damn well better not!” she said with a happy little giggle.

“Watch your mouth, young lady!” Kit teased.

Vil laughed brightly. “I can’t wait to tell the family. God, will they ever blow a fuse! You know this won’t stay secret for very long, bro. The press has been all but crawling up my skirt since the trial started. I wouldn’t be surprised if there was a reporter hiding in the air duct listening to me right now.”

“That can’t be helped. I just didn’t want you to look flabbergasted when someone mentioned it to you, sis. You deserved to hear it from me.”

She laughed. “Well, thanks for that much. I’m gonna be an aunt,” she said with a thrilled lilt to her voice. “I’m so happy I could walk across the harbor!”

“Given it’s probably frozen over, I think you might pull it off,” he teased.

“Stav is giving me the warning, court’s about to go back in session, so I gotta go, bro. I’ll spread the word up here.”

“Okay. Tell Sheila as soon as you can, and you can call Jessie later tonight. She’s gonna call her folks as soon as she gets out of class.”

“Alright, I’ll make it a late call,” she promised. “Talk to you later tonight, bro, and congratulations!”

“Thanks, sis,” he said, and he ended the call. He wasn’t done yet, though. Vil would spread the word to the family and to Sheila, who was up there to attend the trial, but Kit still had two more people to inform, Lupe and Kevin. He dialed Lupe first, since now it was very important to know exactly how this construction and move was going to go. Kit didn’t want to be hanging in limbo waiting when Jessie was nine months pregnant. He wanted to move before the delivery if at all possible, he did not want to try to execute a move with a newborn child.

“Westwood Apartments, Lupe speakin’.”

“Lupe, it’s Kit.”

“Yo, brah! How’s Boston?”

“I’m back home. Didn’t you see me leave for work this morning?”

“Brah, I was late gettin’ into the office this morning. Why didn’t you call me or drop by? What happened up there to bring you home after just one day?”

“Things were crazy,” Kit chuckled. “But I’m home for good. I never have to go back.”

“That’s good to hear.”

“Listen, speaking of home, when did you say they’d have our part of the new apartments finished and we could move in?”

“Umm, July, brah, at least that’s what I was told. They’re starting construction on them on Thursday, and they’re gonna go twenty four seven til they’re done. They gotta get the far side up so we can move everyone over and tear down these old buildings.”

“You’re positive about that?”

“Pretty sure, yah. Why?”

Kit beamed at the phone, which Lupe naturally couldn’t see. “Lupe, Jessie’s pregnant.”

He flinched when Lupe whooped loudly into the phone. “It’s about time, brah!” Lupe laughed. “All that sex you two have, I’m shocked you didn’t get her knocked up sooner! Congratulations!”

“I’d like to be moved before she delivers, Lupe, so it’s kinda important we’re sure about when we’re moving.”

“Shit yah,” he agreed. “I sure as hell won’t want you two in limbo with a baby on the way! Lemme call the contracting company and get a solid estimate, brah. I’ll have to make sure they’re available to move in before Jessie’s so big she can’t stand up by herself!”

Kit laughed. “I wouldn’t say that to her. She’ll sock you.”

“When she’s too fat to do anything but waddle, I’ll get all kinds of brave, brah,” Lupe said wickedly. “Lemme get on this. I sure as hell don’t want you two trying to move when Jessie’s big, or you already have the baby. Only problem is, if you move too early, you’ll be next door to a major construction site,” he grunted. “I dunno if the baby’s gonna like that. May have to hang in your apartment until they’re about to tear them down, then move over. Eh, lemme talk to my guys and get an idea. I’ll call ya back, brah.”

“I’m at work, so call me here.”

“Got it.”

Kit moved on to the last person he was tasked to tell, Kevin. Kevin, like all associates in his firm, had both a private number that reached him directly and an office number that could reach him through the office switchboard. The direct line was for his clients, so they could always call him directly without going through the switchboard. “Kev,” Kit called before he could go through his ten second long introduction.

“Hey, Kit! How cold is Boston?”

“I have no idea, I’m back home,” Kit answered.

“Already? How did it go?”

“For me, great. For Cybil, it was brutal,” he answered, which made Kevin chuckle. “I have some different news for you, though.”

“Cool, what is it?”

“First off, don’t tell Sam. Jessie wants to tell her herself.”

“I’m interested,” Kevin told him.

“Kev, Jessie’s pregnant. We’re gonna have a baby!”

“Really? That’s wonderful!” Kevin gushed. “I’m so happy for you! When is Jessie due?”

“We don’t know exactly yet, she has to go to an obstetrician and get an exam,” he answered. “Now remember, don’t tell Sam. Jessie wants to tell the sorority girls herself tonight.”

“No problem. Let’s have lunch to celebrate!”

“Sounds good to me,” Kit said. “Chinese?”

“You know it! I’ll be down in twenty!”

“Mind if I bring company? I doubt the crew’ll let me sneak out, I already told them.”

“No problem, I’ll bet a couple of partners will want to come too. They’re still trying to get me to talk you into retaining the firm,” he laughed. “Just the prestige of representing a Vulpan would be a major coup, even if we never actually did anything.”

“Them? Pft, you’re our lawyer, Kev,” Kit snorted.

“Wow, thanks, Kit,” Kevin said cheekily. “Does this mean I can bill you for lunch?”

“Bite me.”

Kevin exploded into laughter.

They met at the Little Dragon, and it did turn into an impromptu celebration. The entire office cleared out, they locked the doors, and hung a note on it as the entire magazine went to the restaurant to meet Kevin, and found that every partner and several associates had come down with him. The Little Dragon was still about the best place to get Chinese food in Austin, so they had trouble finding enough tables close enough together to remain concentrated. Kevin sat at a table with Kit, Rick, and Delores Kittimer, one of the partners at Kevin’s firm, a small, thin cat with tabby fur and a serious expression. Delores was one hell of a lawyer, sharp and highly educated, and Kevin always had praise for her when he talked about his bosses around poker. Delores did break her professional veneer by hugging him and telling him “I’m so happy for you!”

“Aww, thanks, Delores,” Kit chuckled as several of the crew rushed towards the buffet.

“I haven’t heard Martha cry that much since the wedding when I told her,” Rick chuckled as they sat down. “Poor Jessie. The second she gets out of class, she’s going to be bowled over by calls.”

“That’s why she left her Blackberry at home,” Kit grinned.

“Martha’s bringing over a dinner and a cake for you tonight, son,” Rick told him. “She started working on it as soon as I told her.” He took a bite out of his sweet and sour pork. “She doesn’t want Jessie to cook tonight. She figures you and her will be too busy.”

“God, I love that femme,” Kit laughed.

“She’s taken, son,” Rick grinned.

“Have you told your sister yet?” Kevin asked.

“And get murdered if she heard it from someone other than me? Do you think I’m insane?” Kit asked, which caused the whole table to erupt into laughter. “I have no doubt that my aunts and uncles know by now, and are cursing me out.”

“Screw ‘em,” Kevin said. “They have no right to say anything.”

“Amen,” Kit agreed.

The group of them made it something of a celebration, even paid for by Kevin’s firm, and neither the crew nor the firm got back to their offices before three o’clock. Kit found quite a few messages on his Blackberry—which he’d intentionally left on his desk—and office phone voicemail, all of them from his cousins Sheila and Muffy, Suzy, Clancy, and surprisingly one from his uncle Brian, all of them congratulating him. Vil seemed to have quickly spread the word, even outside the family, and Kit grimly guessed that the press had to have wind of it by now. He didn't get much more work done as he called them back, Clancy first and then Suzy, then Muffy, then Sheila. He chatted animatedly with all of them, but only breached another subject with Sheila. "Now that Cybil's gone, are you gonna change your plans about leaving Austin in the fall?"

"I'm kinda working on that right now," she answered. "I'll have a solid answer for you probably tomorrow."

"Alright. Were you at the trial today, or out getting drunk?"

Sheila laughed into the phone. "Both," she answered. "Man, what a circus," she mused. "But it's basically over. The judge may finish it all tomorrow."

"Vil told me about what happened up til lunch. What happened after that?"

"That's the only part of it I caught," Sheila giggled. "I was out with the Party Pack last night."

"Well, what happened? You know if you come back with nothing, Rick'll skin you. You're up there to work, you know!"

The family is letting Vil's case move forward unopposed," she told him. "But made it clear they'll still fight Cybil. But that's a moot point, just about everyone expects the judge to toss out Cybil's case, even the press."

"So, not much."

"Nope. I'm jut glad that the bitch is gone," she said with a sigh of relief. "Finally, I feel safe walking the streets of Boston again!"

"And free to return to your life of sex, drugs, and parties," he noted.

“Sex, drugs, and parties aren’t as much fun as they used to be,” she admitted with surprising candor. “Well, the sex is,” she hummed, which made Kit laugh.

“Do my ears deceive me, or have Martha and Hannah done the impossible and tamed Sheila Vance Vulpan?”

“Bite my ass,” Sheila grated, which made Kit explode into helpless laughter. “I’ll probably be back tomorrow afternoon.”

“I’ll be here,” Kit assured her.

“Oh, and grats again, cousin.”

“Thanks.”

After quite a few happy parting words, Kit left the office and drove home. Lupe rushed out of the office and shook his paw, and Mickey and Darn intercepted him before he made it to the door and added their own well wishes. Jessie still had a half hour before she got home, so Kit put on some water for tea, and had barely managed to take two steps out of the kitchen before the doorbell rang. “It’s open!” he shouted, and saw Martha rush inside. The tall great dane laughed and gave him a crushing hug, slapping him almost painfully on the back. “I’m so happy for both of you!” she bubbled. “I brought you some dinner, Kit. I’ll get to work heating it up for you. When will Jessica get home?”

“In about a half hour or so,” he answered. “Need help?”

“Come help me get it out of the car,” she told him.

The dinner she brought was almost a banquet. Tupperware dish after tupperware dish put in IGB bags, what had to be six courses, and a large rectangle holding a dark-frosted cake. “Rick said you were going to ask your doctor about obstetricians.”

“I talked to our doctor,” she nodded. “He knows just about all the doctors in town. He suggested a doctor named Sandra MacNair. She’s supposed to be the best obstetrician in Austin, but she also has a very gentle and nurturing bedside manner. Given Jessica’s personality, that’s a very, very important quality.”

“Yeah, it would be,” he said as he got the last bag out of her dusty minivan and closed the back door. “She’d freeze up if it were someone with a gruff demeanor.”

“She’s such a dear,” Martha said with a little smile and laugh. Since the wedding, Martha looked at Jessie as something of an adopted daughter, and called Jessie at least once every two or three days. “Have you told Hannah and John yet?”

“Jessie’s going to do that when she gets home from school,” he answered.

“I’m so glad I didn’t call them, then!” Martha laughed. John and Hannah had struck up a very strong friendship with Rick and Martha after they met at the wedding. The two couples called each other often, and Rick was even talking about trying to go on the same cruise that Vil had given his in-laws for a Christmas present, sharing a vacation.

“Me too. We’d have seen the light from the explosion from here if Hannah gets the news from anyone but Jessie.”

Martha laughed delightedly as they returned to the apartment. They unloaded everything on the kitchen counters and dining room table, and

Martha swatted Kit on the backside when he started unpacking one of the bags. “Out, you!” she commanded. “This is no time for you to be worrying yourself with the little things. I’ll handle this!”

“Just wait til I tell Rick you’ve been pawing my butt,” Kit threatened, then he danced out of range as she sought to swat him again, and much harder. He laughed and evacuated himself from the kitchen, and turned on the radio while Martha’s voice emanated from the kitchen, singing to herself as she took over the place. In moments, the smell of country fried steak wafted enticingly through the apartment as the matronly canine started heating up the expansive meal she’d brought over, enough food to feed the two of them for five days.

Jessie got home right about on time, laughing as she opened the door. Lupe, Mickey, and Dan were with her, Dan carrying her backpack, Mickey a Wal-Mart bag, and Lupe had his arm over her shoulder. “—just so thrilled for yah, hon!” Lupe was saying to her as they came in.”

“Aww, thanks, Lupe,” she smiled dazzlingly, then hugged him fondly. “And I’m not delivering tomorrow!” she accused Dan, giggling as she took her backpack back from him. “I carried this all day, all by myself, you know!”

The lion grinned at her. “Hush, you! You’re more than entitled to a little pampering. You deserve it!”

“Stop putting the moves on my wife, guys,” Kit warned playfully as Jessie gave him a loving hug, and kissed him on the muzzle.

“Then keep her happy, so she don’t come to Doctor Looove,” Lupe retorted, which made them all laugh.

“What are you cooking, love?” Jessie asked, sniffing the air in the apartment.

“He’s not cooking anything!” Martha called, padding out from the kitchen and burying Jessie in a crushing embrace. “I’m so happy for you, sweetie!”

“Aww, thanks, Martha,” she said with a laugh, patting the great dane on the shoulder.

“I’m cooking enough for a good sized dinner, if your friends would like to stay. I figured you’d have company tonight,” she smiled.

Lupe laughed. “I don’t never say no to free food!” he said. “But, I’ll have to come back later, I’m still working on something.”

“Yeah, we should give you some privacy to make some calls, hon,” Dan told her. “We’ll come back around six-thirty or so. That alright with you?”

“That’s fine,” Jessie told them.

“Now if you need any help with anything, you know where we are,” Mickey told her. “We can’t have you straining yourself in your condition!”

“Boys,” Jessie accused, pushing them towards the door. When the three of them left, laughing, Jessie gave Martha a challenging yet fond look. “I can still cook for myself, you know,” she teased. “You of all people, Martha! I’m shocked!”

“Tosh,” she sniffed, smiling. “You’ll be much too busy today to cook anything wholesome, and you’re eating for two now!”

“It sure doesn’t feel like it yet,” Jessie laughed, patting her very slim belly. “I haven’t even started getting morning sickness yet, knock on wood.”

“How far are you along, dear?”

“I don’t really know, somewhere between four and six weeks,” she answered. “I found out because I missed my period. And I’ve been paying real close attention to it, kinda hoping this would happen,” she said, smiling at Kit. “As soon as I realized I missed, I went to the clinic on campus and they gave me a pregnancy test. They gave me three different ones, just to make sure! I need to find an obstetrician now so I can get an exam and find out where I am.”

“I found you a very good one, dear, who came highly recommended.”

“Really?”

“Our own doctor recommended her personally,” she answered with a nod. “Doctor Kantrell said she was the best OB-GYN in Austin, and we trust him explicitly.”

“Is that who it is?”

“No dear, that’s our doctor. Her name is Sandra MacNair,” she said as she padded back towards the kitchen. “I have her number, and she’s expecting to hear from you tomorrow to make an appointment. But you have a few other calls to make,” she prompted as she turned the corner and vanished from sight.

“Yeah, I do,” Jessie said, blowing out her breath. “I guess we can’t put it off forever,” she said, steeling herself as she pulled her Blackberry out of her purse. Ever since she got it for Christmas, she almost never used her other cell phone...she just kept that one for emergencies.

Hannah's reaction was very much a wild card, and it was one of the reasons that Jessie wasn't entirely enthusiastic to make the call. Hannah had just started getting used to the idea that they were married, and now it was going to be complicated by this. It might make Hannah that much more paranoid that the marriage she felt was doomed to fail would be complicated by a child. Kit could see that Hannah would feel that Jessie would be that much more vulnerable; pregnant, still in school, and growing increasingly dependent on a husband that Hannah didn't entirely trust. That was one way she could look at it—the way Kit expected—but there was also the simpleness of it. Despite the situation and her reservations, some part of Hannah would have to be happy about the idea of being a grandmother, no matter how problematic it might be for her daughter. Kit left Jessie to give her a little space to make the call, joining Martha in the kitchen to help her.

“Is she calling Hannah?” Martha asked as Kit poured Jessie a cup of hot water for tea.

Kit nodded. “Now we find out if Hannah will be happy about this or not.”

Martha tutted. “She'll be happy about being a grandmother, dear. How can she not be happy about that?”

“Hannah will find a way,” he said darkly. “You know how she feels about our marriage, Martha. She thinks I'll abandon Jessie the instant things start getting anywhere near inconvenient. She's afraid I'll abandon Jessie the way her father abandoned her mother.”

“Kit. If you have proved anything to Hannah, it is that you are not her father.”

“God, I hope so,” Kit prayed fervently as he heard Jessie begin to talk.

There was no shouting from the living room, which was a good sign. Jessie’s voice sounded reasonable, then she giggled, then she was too quiet for Kit to hear as he poured green beans from a tupperware container into a pot on the stove, and Martha turned on the oven. Kit got too busy following Martha’s orders to pay much attention, at least until Jessie called his name. He hurried into the living room, and Jessie held out the phone to him. “Here,” she said, giving him a warning look.

“Hello?” he said, almost timidly.

“That was very quick work, Kit,” Hannah’s voice said darkly over the phone, as if on the verge of an explosion. Kit’s tail stood straight out in sudden fear, which caused Jessie to erupt into laughter, and he heard Hannah laugh over the phone. “Congratulations, dear,” she said in a much happier voice, but not too happy.

“Thank God!” he said explosively. “I thought you’d be angry! And you, you little sneak, are in so much trouble!” he said, snapping an accusing finger at Jessie. “You put her up to that, didn’t you?”

“Mmmmaybe,” Jessie grinned, putting her paws behind her back and assuming an almost unbearably cute pose and expression.

He heard Hannah laugh over the phone. “But seriously, Kit, this has come at a very awkward time. Jessie still has two more semesters to go. How is she going to finish school? What about her hopes to earn a Master’s?”

“I know,” Kit nearly groaned. “We didn’t plan this—well, I didn’t. Jessie’s been hoping it would happen. But we’ll have to find a way. Jessie’s so close to graduating. She just has to finish school!”

“I’m glad you agree,” Hannah said in a satisfied tone. “Now, what you two need to do is sit down and seriously think everything through. There is a lot you need to think about now. For instance, Jessie needs to find an obstetrician, and quickly. A girl can never have an obstetrician too soon when she’s expecting.”

“Martha helped us with that,” he told her. “She had her doctor recommend one to us. Jessie’s making her first appointment tomorrow.”

“That’s very good.”

“And we will sit down and talk about this. I’m sure we won’t think of everything though, that’s why I’m so glad we have you, and Rick and Martha, to give us advice.”

“I’m glad you’ll be looking to them,” Hannah said approvingly. “They’re good people with a great deal of common sense. If you can’t talk to me, dear, then Martha is your best alternative.”

“She’s here with us now,” Kit chuckled. “When she heard, she rushed over to make us dinner!”

“She’s there? Put her on,” Hannah ordered.

“Martha! Hannah wants to talk to you,” he called, going into the kitchen and giving her the phone.

“Hello, Hannah,” Martha said happily. “Yes! I was shocked, but I’m very happy for them! Oh, country fried steak and lots of different dishes. I want them well fed today,” she chuckled, and Kit wandered back into the living room. Jessie gave him a kiss, but she squealed and laughed when he grabbed her, turned her side to him, then reached down and spanked her.

“Bad kitty! I nearly had a heart attack!” he admonished her as she continued to laugh helplessly and struggle with her gorgeous longhaired tail writhing as he smacked her backside. Jessie struggled for a moment more, then surrendered by kissing him on the muzzle, which made him give her a gentle embrace. “How did she take it when you told her?”

“A lot better than I thought she would,” Jessie answered. “She was speechless at first, and you know, that’s when you wait for the explosion. But then she laughed and congratulated me.”

“How did John take it?”

“Dad’s still at school. He teaches an afternoon class on Tuesdays and Thursdays. Mom will tell him when he gets home.

“Well, that’s a hopeful sign, at least,” Kit said. “I was so afraid she’d blow a fuse when she found out.”

“I’m sure she’ll be less joyful when it sinks in,” Jessie said. “But I think as long as I keep calling her and asking her advice, I can keep her mollified to where she doesn’t start thinking negatively. I have to keep her focused on the good and not let her dwell on the bad.”

Kit laughed and rocked her from side to side. “Good God, what did I do to you, my pretty kitty? What happened to that moral young femme who would never discuss manipulating her mother so blatantly I fell in love with?”

“I’m a Vulpan now,” she giggled. “Am I proving it?”

“Wayyyy too much,” he agreed. “I have got to get you away from Vil and Sheila before they do any more damage. But God help me, I love you.”

“You better. I still own your contract,” she grinned, giving him a passionate kiss that made his knees weak.

His Blackberry started to ring, and he held onto Jessie with one paw as he dug it out. “It’s Vil,” he said, reading the display, then he connected the call on speaker so Jessie could hear. “Hey sis,” he said. “You done for today?”

“Yeah, we’re all done,” she said. “Is Jessie home?”

“I’m right here, Vil,” she announced.

“Congratulations, hon!” Vil said brightly. “I’m so happy for you!”

“Thanks,” she said with a light laugh.

“Kit has already knuckled under to me,” Vil said victoriously. “I want you to go to an obstetrician, Jessie. Kit said you’d find one yourself, but when you do, give me the number to their office. I’m going to take care of all the doctor bills.”

“Aww, that’s so sweet!” Jessie gushed.

“This is about family, hon, and I won’t let Kit’s pride jeopardize your baby!” she said vehemently. “You’ll get the medical care you deserve!”

“Well, I won’t say no, Vil.”

“You’d better not!” she declared, quite seriously.

Jessie laughed. “I’ll call you tomorrow about it, alright? I’m going to make my first appointment.”

“What’s the name of this doctor?”

“Umm. Sandy MacNair.”

“Sandra MacNair,” Kit corrected.

“Give me her number. I want to call her and arrange paying for your appointment.”

“Uh, Vil, can I make the appointment before you do that? She’ll have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Oh. Right,” she said in a very unusual tone, which surprised Kit a little.

“Calm down, sis,” Kit told her.

Vil laughed. “I know, but I’m just so excited,” she said giddily. “Guess I’m going all spazzy on you guys, aren’t I?”

Jessie laughed. “That’s alright, I think it shows how happy you are for us,” she said affectionately.

“God, am I ever!”

“How did the family take it?” Kit asked.

“About how you’d expect,” she answered. “Muffy and Sheila are overjoyed, most of the other cousins don’t really care all that much, and the aunts and uncles are up in arms. All but Brian, that is,” she mused. “He seems really happy for you. He asked me to tell you congratulations from him, he knows you’ll never talk to him if you know it’s him.”

“He’s right,” Kit said adamantly.

“But, it was good timing,” Vil mused. “This news coming right behind us winning the trial. They’re too busy celebrating keeping their money to worry too much about you.”

“It’s all over?”

“Not officially,” she informed them. “The judge accepted the family’s dropping their objection to my suit this afternoon, and said he’d rule on the motion to dismiss Cybil’s case probably tomorrow. Everyone’s predicting it’s over, including Cybil’s own lawyers,” she snickered. “Bro, to say they were floored by our evidence was the mother of all understatement. You should have heard them today. They had nowhere to go, they had a dead case, and they knew it. We murdered their case. Where can you go when you find out the petitioner tried to have a member of the respondent’s family assassinated just to help you win your case? Their arguments for not dismissing the case were pretty weak, on top of it.”

“What happened to Cybil?” Jessie asked.

“She ran back to England before the judge finished banging his gavel yesterday afternoon,” she answered with a wicked little chuckle. “She caught the first plane to Europe out of Logan, didn’t even take any luggage with her. She ran, and everyone noticed it. It was all over the Herald this morning.”

“Now what?”

“Now? I give her maybe five or six days to think the Vulpans aren’t going to chase her across the pond, get her hopes up, then she wakes up and finds a damning story in the Globe and reporters banging on the gates of her manor in Cheshire,” she said. “Then I’ll call her and tell her that her bony ass is mine and would she please try to do something about it. Because I’ll enjoy crushing her that much more if she fights than I will if she just meekly accepts it,” she said with a vindictive growl in her voice.

“That’s my bloodthirsty sister,” Kit laughed.

“I’m glad you’re keeping your promise to me, Vil,” Jessie said heatedly.

“You bet I am, sis, I will make her hurt,” Vil said intensely. “I will crush her and leave her totally destroyed. She’ll have nothing when I’m done with her.”

“My little barbarian,” Kit laughed, squeezing Jessie.

“So I’m a barbarian,” Jessie shrugged, which made Vil laugh. “Mind if we call this a little short, Vil? I still have some people to call.”

“No problem, Jessie,” Vil said. “I want you to call me the instant you get that appointment made. And I want you to push to get it as soon as possible. Tell her you’ll pay him triple the usual fee if he moves you up to, say, tomorrow.”

“Her. It’s a her. Sandra MacNair,” Jessie corrected.

“Thank God,” Vil grunted. “Why males want to be obstetricians is beyond me. It’s creepy. I always think they’re sex perverts who are too ugly to go into porn.”

Kit and Jessie both laughed. “I’ll see what I can do, I promise,” Jessie said. “But I do have class tomorrow.”

“Pft, class is not your biggest priority now, sis,” Vil said seriously. “You can always take classes over, but you only get one shot to have a healthy pregnancy.”

“Well, I think I can have my pregnancy and stay in class,” she said. “I’ll finish this semester before I deliver. It’s just the fall semester I’m worried about. I don’t know when I’m due, so I don’t know how that’s going to go.”

“Well, we’ll find out soon, and then we’ll all sit down and work something out,” Vilenne said confidently. “Now I’ll let you go so you can get some of that food Martha’s cooking for you and finish making your calls.”

“I will, thanks Vil.”

“Aat, call me sis!” Vil said playfully.

“Sis,” Jessie laughed.

“There, I feel better now,” Vil giggled, then she hung up before they could say another word.

“Wow, she’s all pumped up,” Jessie laughed.

“Yeah, she sounds excited about it,” Kit agreed. “Now call Sam and Sandy before Kevin spills the beans.”

“You told Kevin already?”

“You told me to!”

“Oh. I did, didn’t I?” she laughed, taking Kit’s phone from him and speed-dialing Sam.

Kit could predict the squealing gushiness of Jessie informing the sorority, so he left her to it to go help Martha in the kitchen. He helped her knead homemade dough for bread while she finished up a pan of spiced cheese potato casserole and popped it into the oven. “How did Hannah sound to you, Martha?”

“Excited, but a touch nervous,” she answered. “The same as any future grandparent. Don’t worry, Kit, she didn’t sound angry.”

“I just can’t stop asking,” he sighed as he took his Blackberry back from her. “I’m terrified she’s gonna change her mind and go against us, somehow.”

“Show her the same faith she’s showing you, dear,” Martha chuckled, patting him in the shoulder. “Give her a chance.”

“You’re right, of course,” he said, pocketing his phone.

“Of course I am, dear. I’ve been around the block a few times, after all,” she smiled.

The dinner turned into quite a gathering. Rick was the first to arrive, and Kit was surprised to see that he wasn’t the only one that decided to drop in on Kit after work. Jeffrey and Mike came over with him, since Jeffrey didn’t have much else to do and Mike lived only about two miles away, and as soon as Sam and Sandy heard the news, they rushed over with the other Jessie, Danielle, Sherry, Lisa, and Charlotte from the sorority. Their apartment wasn’t big enough to hold everyone, so it spilled out into the courtyard as Lupe, Dan, and Mickey came over. They set up tables, Rick went and got hamburgers and hot dogs, Mickey brought his big grill over, Kevin arrived with a big bottle of wine and a few pizzas, and it turned into a party. It was a bit chilly for some to be out grilling in February in forty-five degree weather, so Kit handled the grill while friends milled in and out of their apartment. Everyone was energetic and chatty, as some of their friends who didn’t often see each other interacted. The sorority didn’t often see the crew outside of Jeffrey, and it was fun to see the wolf, Charlotte, flirt with Mike as Danielle teased Jeffrey and Sandy, and the other Jessie talked to Rick about running his own business; Jessica was a business major herself. They had a great time. Jessie was radiant as the center of attention, and Kit was quite content to let her have her moment in the sun. So often, Jessie was overshadowed by Kit's family name, and she never complained. He was glad that this was about her, and almost exclusively her, and it was so wonderful to watch her smile and talk to their friends, and be so completely happy and content. Yes, everyone congratulated him, but she was the one that was pregnant, and she was the one that was the complete focus of their celebration...and he couldn't be happier for her.

God, what a femme.

Sandra MacNair was a gray vixen who wore large-lensed square glasses with gold rims, had a lustrous coat of charcoal-gray fur with a lighter gray ruff, a dark stripe over her muzzle, and sober amber eyes. She was middle-aged, thin, athletic, and wore a white coat over a University of Illinois tee shirt and a pair of black denim jeans. She called them by their first names, and insisted they call her "Doc Mac" or just "Mac." She didn't look like the best obstetrician in Austin, but Kit was never one to judge by appearances.

Someone had definitely pulled some strings, Kit figured. Jessie had called her first thing that morning, calling between classes from school, and it was just so lucky that Doctor MacNair just happened to have an open slot on her schedule between four and six...and Jessie just happened to get out of class at three o'clock on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

It smelled strongly of Vil. They'd told her the name of the doctor, and Kit had a strong suspicion that Vil had had Stav or Marcus track down Sandra MacNair, M.D., and convince her to open her schedule for Jessie.

But, Kit wasn't going to complain. MacNair was unusual in that she demanded that Kit be there for the examination, feeling that having the husband there reassured the wife and also kept the husband completely in the know as to the needs of the femme, and it was time that Rick was more than willing to give Kit so he could leave early to take her. Jessie was just a little nervous and shy, at first, a reaction that got a little more intense when the doctor made her take her clothes off and gave her a thorough exam, which Kit saw in its entirety, even the embarrassing parts. She then took some of Jessie's blood and gave her a smile. "Now, how long ago did you realize you missed your period, hon?" she asked.

Jessie's cheeks frizzed a little. "About a week," she answered.

"And your period last month was normal?"

"Uh, yeah, I think so."

"Have you been taking any medicines since last month and this month?"

"Just Tylenol a few times," she answered.

"Alright, now, let me check this tummy one more time," she said, having Jessie lay back on her exam table, and probing Jessie's stomach with clawed hands. Kit wondered how she did her job with those wicked looking weapons sticking out over her fingers, but she seemed to have no trouble. She gently prodded Jessie in several places from her ribcage to her hips, then she nodded to herself. "Now, the blood test will give me a clearer picture, but I'm feeling a little something here. I'd say you're definitely expecting, and you're somewhere between three and six weeks into your term."

"How can you tell?"

"Changes in your uterus that someone with training can detect," she smiled, showing teeth just like Kit's, normal teeth with elongated canines on her upper and lower jaws. "Now, those I found with the cervical exam, not this," she winked, which made Jessie's fur ruffle again. "But your abdominal cavity feels entirely normal and capable of letting you bring a pregnancy to term with no problems. Now, since I need those test results back before I can do much else for you, I'll let you get dressed," she smiled. "You look perfectly healthy, so all I can really tell you right now is keep right on going, don't change or stop your routine because of your pregnancy. I want you to keep exercising, but I'd also like you to start taking multi-vitamins and make sure you get plenty of vitamin C and D. Your pregnancy will put a bigger demand on your body for vitamins, so you need to increase your intake."

"Okay. We'll stop at the store and buy some on the way home. Which brand do you suggest?"

"Any complete multivitamin will do," she said. "If you want to buy some expensive specialty brand from GNC, go for it. If you want to get the cheap Centrum clone from Wal-Mart, that works just as well. Just make sure it's a complete multivitamin, and make sure you take in at least a full one hundred percent RDA of Vitamin C and D from today on. My best suggestion is a glass of orange juice and a glass of milk every morning with breakfast to wash down that vitamin, and you're just fine."

“Okay. Umm, when will the morning sickness start?” Jessie asked nervously.

Doctor MacNair laughed. “It could start tomorrow, it may never start. But, you’re about to enter the barf window,” she winked. “So be ready for it.”

“I will.”

“Now, since you are pregnant, that means that there are some no-nos,” she said seriously. “No more drinking, and if you smoke, then stop.”

“I don’t smoke, and I don’t really drink much, so I won’t miss it,” she nodded.

“Good. Don’t take anything stronger than Tylenol or Advil without consulting me first, make sure you keep exercising. As far as diet goes, at this stage, there’s not much you need to worry about. Just make sure you get enough to eat, no dieting,” she warned, “and take your vitamins. Your figure had better be the last thing you’re worrying about right now. If you want to keep your figure, do it with exercise, not with dieting. I prefer to see you active right up until your labor, I’ll never put you on bedrest unless you have a complication, so keep right on exercising, hon. Outside of that, if you wanna chow down on hot dogs and bacon three meals a day, go for it. Kit, do you take any medicines?”

“Me? No,” he answered. “And I don’t smoke, and the most drinking I do is an occasional glass of wine with dinner,” he added.

She laughed. “Well, I’ve found that a femme is more likely to stop when her husband stops with her, so you’re becoming a dry house,” she ordered.

“Not a problem,” he nodded. “I’ll give my wine to a friend of mine, so it’s not even in the house.”

“That’s a good attitude,” she said approvingly. “And since she needs to exercise, then so do you,” she told him. “That way you keep each other on the program. You’ll keep her exercising, and she can take it out on you,” she grinned.

“We have a membership at the Y,” Jessie told her. “That’s no problem at all.”

“When you’re further along, Jessie, I’ll give you some exercise regimens to follow so you don’t stress your belly or endanger your baby. But for right now, feel free to do any exercise you want as long as it’s not something like boxing.”

Jessie laughed. “Alright.”

“She doesn’t need to train for boxing, doc, she gets enough of that kind of exercise beating me up at home,” Kit said dryly.

“Ah, she’s a scrapper is she?” MacNair grinned. “Claws?”

“Pillows.”

She laughed. “Ah, one of those. Well, she’s free to keep you on the straight and narrow for a while,” she winked at Jessie.

“I have him well trained,” Jessie said primly. “Anymore, I only beat him up because he intentionally goes looking for trouble.”

“Then it sounds like you have a good husband,” she said with a laugh. “Males who don’t stir up trouble are boring!”

“I’d have to agree,” Jessie said seriously.

“Now, I’ve already been contacted by Miss Vilenne, Jessie, and she’s already paid for your visit today, so you’re free to go as soon as you’re dressed. Stop by the store and pick up some vitamins on the way home, and I’ll call you when your test results come in and schedule your next appointment, okay?”

“Okay. Thanks a lot, Doctor MacNair.”

“Just Doc, or Mac, honey,” she smiled. “You make me feel old when you call me that.”

“Old? You?” Kit said with a scoff. “You look too young to be a doctor as it is, let alone the most recommended OB-GYN in Austin.”

“You do have him well trained,” the doctor said with a bright smile at Jessie.

“Of course I do,” she said with a prim little smile.

Kit helped Jessie into the Pathfinder after finishing up the visit, and Jessie seemed quite excited. “I can’t wait to find out when I’m due,” she said happily, reaching over and patting him on the paw as he put it on the gearshift. “I was almost mortified when she made me undress in front of you!”

“Uh, love, explain how that matters,” he said.

She laughed. “It’s a difference between private and not private,” she told him. “I don’t mind taking my clothes off for you, it was taking my clothes off for a medical exam in front of you that made it creepy,” she told him.

He chuckled “I’m so sorry for compromising your modesty,” he teased. “I do hope this doesn’t mean you’re gonna start hiding under towels and robes at home.”

She slapped him on his scarred forearm. “I wonder how she’ll figure out when I’m due,” she mused. “Do you think the blood test is that precise?”

“I think it’s a combination of things,” Kit said. “But if she couldn’t predict your delivery date, she wouldn’t be a very good obstetrician, would she?”

“I guess not,” she giggled.

The next day was busy for Kit, and not just because of the life-changing news. He had an interview to do, and he spent all morning digging every scrap of information about Congressman Lamar Smith out of every dusty back corner of the internet and the Austin Public Library. Kit assembled an exhaustive bio on the fur, to the point of digging up the names of his four grandparents, then putting it all together to create an overview of his life history, his education, his political career, his platform and ideals, and his known aspirations for the future.

The crew was still a little giddy, but then again, so was he. He entertained quite a few pawshakes and hugs through the morning, and not one of them failed to come to his office and ask about Jessie. He told them all they’d see her tonight, for she was going to come to the office after class, and would get there around five-thirty, right around the time they did their Thursday wrap meeting.

Given it was Thursday and the last day of the issue, there was the usual bustle. Rick and Savid were making last-minute changes. Marty was riding Lilly about finishing the question posed to her in Ask Away, and was also editing down a mailbag letter that was going into the issue. Jeffrey was busy drawing for School Daze, working off writing Kit had already given him. Mike was working on The Scene on the website, for he was about to change the website's layout. Barry was out doing an interview with one of the Austin City Councilfurs, part of the election special. Denise was up at her desk, reading something Rick had given her. It was just another typical day at work.

But it wasn't a typical day. Kit kept daydreaming about Jessie's pregnancy, often going ten minutes just staring into space. What would it be like as her belly grew? What kind of food cravings would she get? Would she get morning sickness, and if so, for how long? He'd heard that some femmes had wild mood swings due to hormones, but had also heard that pregnancy seriously mellowed many femmes out. Both were probably correct, so he wondered which way Jessie would swing. How active would she be? Would her being mixed influence her pregnancy in any way? Would her sex drive change? Just what went on during a pregnancy anyway?

Clearly, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan III, professional researcher, needed to do a little research about pregnancy. Since this was their first baby, Kit wanted to have an idea of what they could expect.

Of course, he still got some calls. Vil called him about an hour before lunch, and she was almost smugly happy just from the sound of her greeting him. "Let me guess," he prompted.

"It's over," she declared triumphantly. "The judge threw out Cybil's case. My case went through unopposed, and the judge voided Dad's will and accepted the agreement we drew up. Congratulations, bro, you're no longer officially disowned. The family's happy, I'm happy, you're happy, Cybil is fearing for her life...it's a wonderful day."

"Well, that's good to hear, sis," he told her. "I'm happy it all worked out for you."

"Not entirely," she grunted. "Uncle Zach is still trying to take my job at the company, but at least he can't badger me about Stonebrook anymore. Did I tell you he tried to sue me for ownership?"

"Yeah, you did," he answered.

"The bastard," she growled. "Anyway, I'm sure that Zach's gonna lay low a while and get his nerves back after he had to face the possibility of you disowning him, and once he feels himself again, he'll be back at it. One good thing about the deal is that Zach had to admit he doesn't own the estate in writing."

"Yeah, but you agreed to let him live there."

"He can live there all he wants," she snorted. "It doesn't change the fact that I am the one in the big chair. And our deal makes it clear to the family that I'm letting him live there, out of the kindness of my heart."

"I didn't think you had a heart."

Vil laughed. "I have a small one, and it's very well hidden," she told him playfully. "But, I'll enjoy the vacation until he starts stirring up trouble again. So, what did the doctor say?"

"To wait for the blood tests to come back," he answered. "She estimates Jessie's three to six weeks into her pregnancy, but she wants to look at the tests before she makes a more precise guess. Outside of that, Jessie's perfectly healthy, and the doctor doesn't foresee any complications."

"That's fantastic news, bro," she said with a sigh. "Just to warn you, Muffy's coming back with Sheila today."

"What about her school?"

"She's only taking two days," she told him. "Sheila said she has to start making arrangements."

"Yeah, I figure she'll go back home as soon as Rick finds an intern to replace her. Maybe not even that long."

"No, she's making arrangements to move down there."

"What?" Kit gasped.

"She's serious about it, bro," she told him. "From what I found out, she's made a deal with Harvard. She's going to transfer to U.T. and take culinary arts, but still do her business classes at Harvard through correspondence, through the internet and private correspondence with the professors. Harvard agreed to accept all her U.T. credits and shadow her through the crap requirements so long as she pays the tuition for them, and only come back up here for one semester to do her capstone project. That way she can graduate with her B.A. from Harvard in business and also get a B.A. from U.T. in cooking, since U.T. will take credits from Harvard. She has a pretty sweet deal. She'll only take cooking classes down there, only business classes through Harvard, and will graduate with two degrees in three years. I guess she's dead serious about opening her own restaurant, bro. She's taking steps to make it happen."

“Well, good for her,” Kit said with a chuckle. “I’m surprised she wrangled that kind of deal out of Harvard.”

“Well, bro, the Vulpan name is a big club here. But, I suspect she probably bribed them to agree to let her shadow the requirement classes, accept her credits for her classes down there, and just do the business classes, and still graduate. Sheila knows how to schmooze people.”

“Knowing her, she banged the dean,” Kit grunted, which made Vil laugh.

“She very well may have,” she agreed. “But, her setting up this deal shows she’s smart, she knew what to do to get what she wants, and she made it happen. She acted like a Vulpan,” she said, with a little pride.

“She did at that,” Kit agreed. “I think Great-grandpa would be proud of her.”

“You know, I think he would. Sheila showed she’s much more of a Vulpan than her mother,” Vil told him. “After all, that’s what being a Vulpan is about. It’s about coming out on top despite the odds, about winning, not about being rich. And Sheila won.”

“In a weird way, I’m glad she’s staying here. God help me, I think I’d miss her if she left.”

“She grew on you, eh?”

“Like mange,” he grunted, which made Vil laugh delightedly.

“I can’t deny, I’m kinda fond of her myself,” Vil admitted. “She’s definitely a piece of work. There’s a mind hiding under that oversexed exterior.”

“It took it long enough to start showing up.”

“No, it just took her believing in herself,” Vil said seriously. “When she ran down there to you, she found that she can make it on her own, I think. You and Jessie and Martha were a good influence on her.”

“Martha and Jessie more than me,” Kit admitted. “I just put up with her. Those two nurtured her. I guess I should tell Lupe she’s here to stay,” he mused, pondering it. Sheila really did prove that she was quite smart with this move, and displayed amazing logic and methodical execution. Kit realized that Sheila had, probably for the first time in her life, been confronted with the possibility that she wouldn’t get what she wanted. But, instead of whining about it or running to her mother to have her make everything just right, she instead tackled the problem herself, took action to accomplish her goal. She wanted to open a restaurant, learn to cook, and what was most surprising, she wanted to stay in Austin. So she identified her goal, analyzed the obstacles keeping her from her goal, devised a plan of attack to remove, circumvent, or counteract those obstacles, then executed that plan. Kit was quite impressed that his cousin, who seemed a Party Pack femme to the core, would demonstrate traits more in line with her parents or Vil than her other cousins. It just went to show that even someone like Sheila could change her tune when she wanted something bad enough. “Pretty amazing,” he chuckled, mainly to himself.

“Sheila? Yeah,” Vil agreed. “Next thing we know, Lynn and Bess will become nuns.”

Kit laughed so loud that Mike stopped at his open door and looked in curiously, but Kit waved him on. “I have to ask, did you meddle with the doctor?”

“Just a little bit,” she admitted cheekily. “I offered her triple her usual office fee if she could see Jess the same day.”

“I thought so.”

“Don’t you dare bitch,” she warned. “This is about Jessie and your baby!”

“Did you hear me complain?” he asked calmly. “I told you, when it comes to Jessie, I’ll turn a blind eye as long as you don’t go nuts.”

“Good. You just saved yourself a hell of a lot of grief, bro,” she told him bluntly.

“Like I think I could derail you over this. Like I would want to!”

“Ooh, sounds like I can slip in some first class meddling under the guise of the baby,” she teased.

“Vil!” Kit barked.

“I gotta be me,” she laughed lightly.

“You’ll find your number blocked and your email on ignore,” he warned.

“Well, better put on your fighting cap, bro,” she taunted. “Because you and me are going to have a few little chats about your living arrangements.”

“We like our apartment,” he told her. “Even Jessie will tell you that.”

“You’re starting a family, you need a house,” she challenged strongly.

“But they’re so expensive,” he complained, and immediately winced.

“Kit!” she gasped in shock. “You think I’d throw you a key and forget about you? Shame on you!”

“But that’s the problem, isn’t it?” he challenged. “How can I ever prove to myself that I can make it if you’re always standing at the rudder, Vil?”

“You’re being silly,” she told him. “You don’t think surviving Dad answers that question? I’m not trying to take away your life and turn you into one of the Party Pack, bro. I just want to give you what you need, and what you deserve, after everything our father and our family did to you. If I really did do what you’re suggesting, you’d be back up here in Boston, living with Jessie in Stonebrook, and you’d be sitting on the lion’s share of the family fortune.”

“That’s a quick way to make me miserable.”

“Pft,” she snorted. “Bro, I think you’d be the best Vulpan to have that money, and the responsibility that goes with it. You understand what it means more than any of us, even me. I’ve never lived a day without my comforts. I wouldn’t appreciate it the way you would.”

“I don’t want that curse.”

“I think you can handle it.”

“I don’t want to find out.”

“Pft. Baby bro, you are a Vulpan,” she said seriously. “Now that you’re doing more than slumming around hiding from me and the family, I don’t see how you could possibly do anything but succeed. I’ll bet you half my shipyard stock here and now that you’re a self-made millionaire by the age of thirty-five.”

“I doubt Rick will ever earn enough to pay me that much, Vil.”

“I know you, bro,” she said with a curious little lilt in her voice. “I know how that mind of yours works. Where do you keep the business plan you drew up about the magazine one day when you were bored?”

Kit’s cheeks ruffled. There was indeed such a business plan, buried in his computer, which was a plan to expand the size and circulation of the magazine by increasing its coverage to more than just the college crowd. He was glad Vil couldn’t see him at that moment.

“You are a Vulpan, bro, down the marrow in your bones, just like me,” Vil teased. “Dad always thought you hated business, but he was wrong. You didn’t hate business, you just loved the idea of being a pilot more. You hated him never giving you a choice. But you’ve chosen your battleground now, and now you’ll start climbing that mountain. I give you one year before you’re a partner at the magazine. I give you five years before you’re running it, and Rick retires off the income you bring in for him. I give you ten before you’re pulling down two hundred grand a year net off your profits.”

“I seriously doubt that, unless you cheat.”

“Cheat? Why would I even bother?” she challenged lightly. “You forget, bro, I talk to Rick. Who has he taught his accounting, and who does his books when he doesn’t have time? Who does he send to meet with advertisers when he’s busy? Who did he talk to when he wanted input on his idea to expand circulation? You. You have business in your blood bro, and Rick knows it. You have enough formal training to let those instincts run wild, and Rick knows he’d be a damn fool not to make use of all your talents. And Rick is no fool.”

“Well,” he hedged, but Vil cut him off.

“So, bro, either take my bet or shut up.”

“I’m going to pass on that one,” he chuckled.

“Wise decision,” she murmured. “I’m making a special note of this day, bro, so when you make that first million, I’ll be sure to remind you all about this little conversation.”

I’m sure you will,” he teased.

“Anyway,” she chuckled. “We’re sending you a little we won gift, bro. Believe it or not, it’s from the whole family.”

“No,” he growled.

It’s not just from me, Kit,” she said seriously. “I told you, it’s from the whole family. Think of it as a token of appreciation that you didn’t disown them all and leave them broke and homeless.”

“What is it?”

“You’ll find out tomorrow.”

“I don’t like it, and I don’t want it,” he said hotly.

“Kitstrom!” she snapped, which got his attention quick. She never called him that unless she was sincerely angry with him. “You don’t have to like it, but you will not bitch about it,” she said hotly. “You will accept it with all the fake smile you can muster, and you won’t say a single word! If you pitch a fit, I will come down there and beat you senseless myself!” she warned in an ugly tone. “I busted my ass to get Dad’s will voided and get you back to at least this point with the family. You have no idea what I had to do to make them agree to it! The family sent you this gift in good faith, in gratitude for you not being an asshole and taking everything from them, and you will accept it with grace,” she railed at him. “I’ll be damned if I let your temper piss off the aunts and uncles to where they hate you even more than they do now!”

“Well, Jessie’s pregnancy probably put them over the top.”

“It certainly didn’t help, but they’re still giving you this gift. But I swear to you, Kit, if you raise a stink about the gift the whole family sent you as a token of good will, I will never forgive you.”

“Alright, alright,” he sighed. He could tell just how serious she was, and he knew better to cross Vil. She could be the Ice Queen even to him, for she would see his behavior as a direct insult after all the hard work she did on his behalf. She may love him, but she was still Vil, and he knew it. “But I don’t want money, Vil. You know that.”

“If we send you money, you will put it in a trust fund for your baby!” she told him.

Kit considered that...it was a pretty good idea. Knowing his family, they all chipped in their petty cash and sent it to him, the pitiable, broke, destitute Vulpan, who now that he was no longer officially disowned, might affect their social standing if people thought he was still dirt poor despite again being part of the Vulpan family. So, to alleviate their guilt over his poverty, each member probably chipped in about five hundred dollars, and they were sending him a check for maybe ten or fifteen thousand dollars. He was certain that it was a cash offering, either a bribe so he wouldn’t embarrass them or some kind of token offer. Since they had money and he didn’t, they couldn’t understand that he was happy without it. They just couldn't understand, so they'd do the only thing that made sense to them, offer him money.

He wouldn't touch a penny of it, but that money would do quite well paying for his child's college education.

"Now that I can do, sis," he said in a mollifying tone. "I'd never touch that money, you know I wouldn't, but I can't deny that it would be well spent on my baby."

"Good. I'm going to go now, bro. I'll call you later," she said in a much calmer tone.

"Alright. I love you, sis."

"I love you too, Kit," she said, and she hung up the phone.

He sighed. That was close. She was really mad, and she was serious. He knew better than to rile his sister, so he'd take the cash and just drop it in an annuity for his baby.

It took him a little time to calm down, but he eventually got back into work. But after lunch, Doctor MacNair called him with information about the test results. "Barring any unforeseen complications, Jessica will deliver on September Thirtieth," she said with absolute confidence. "I've already called Jessica, and her next appointment is scheduled for Monday, February Twenty-fifth, at ten a.m."

"Next Monday at ten o'clock, got it," he said, scribbling it down on his planner. "You know, Jessie could have told me all this, Doctor. You didn't have to call me."

“Kit, I make it a policy of keeping the husband fully informed,” she told him. “It ensures that you never miss an appointment, just in case one of you writes it down wrong. It also keeps the husband involved in the pregnancy, and as I told you, I like to keep the husbands as involved as possible.”

“That makes sense,” he agreed. “Oh, Doc, let me apologize for my sister.”

“No apologies necessary, Kit,” she chuckled. “Vilene’s a sweetheart, and she’s very, very concerned that Jessica gets the best care possible.”

“That’s one way to say it.”

“Well, she’ll learn that she can’t buy me,” MacNair said with a challenging little catch in her voice. “When she called and offered me triple my usual fee to get Jessie in the same day, I already had an open slot from a cancellation,” she admitted to him. “So I took her money and put your wife in the empty slot. I got triple fee, and nobody got bumped. The first time she tries that when I can’t swing it, she’ll find out I’m not quite so easy.”

Kit laughed. “You’ll do just fine, Doc. Not many can swindle my sister. And you keep right on doing it. It keeps her on her toes.”

“Oh, I’ll do that,” she giggled, then said her goodbyes.

Kit hadn’t thought much about the “present” that the family was sending him. He’d told Jessie about it, warned her that Vil had put some ugly warnings that he take it with a smile to keep the peace, and then let her putter through some banks checking annuity rates while he finished up his Lamar Smith research. Jessie was rather happy about the idea of it, certain that their child could easily go to Harvard on what that annuity would be worth when the child was 18.

He was right...and wrong.

It arrived at nine the next morning, and it was just luck that they were home. Kit and Jessie had gone to the Y to exercise, he was teaching her how to play tennis and she was teaching him to play racquetball, when the courier arrived. They hadn't even been home thirty seconds when the doorbell rang, and Kit answered it wearing his sweatpants and jacket. He recognized the courier for what he was immediately, a gray-furred wolf wearing a dark suit and carrying a briefcase. "Kitstrom Vulpan?" he asked.

"I think you know I am," Kit said calmly.

He chuckled. "The eyes are better than a fingerprint, sir," he said with a nod. "I'm carrying a package for you, from Boston."

"They told me it was coming," he said.

The man stepped inside when Kit invited him in. "Would you like some tea, sir?" Jessie asked him as she came out of the kitchen.

"Oh! Yes, please, thank you very much," he said with a grateful smile, taking the cup from her and sipping at it. "Ah, Lipton," he smiled. "Always a reliable fallback."

"It's about the best we can get down here," Kit grunted, which made the wolf nod knowingly. "These people don't know anything about tea."

"That's the honest truth," the wolf nodded. He drank down the tea despite it being piping hot, then handed the cup back to Jessie. "Thank you very much, ma'am," he said with a smile. "Now, on to the package. May I sit?"

"Please," Kit said, motioning. The wolf seated himself at the couch and put his briefcase on the coffee table.

"I have two things here for you, sir," he said. "I was told to tell you that one of them is from your sister. The other is from your entire family." He first held out a small packet. He opened it, curiously, and found himself looking at a thick stack of bearer bonds; special bonds that were negotiable no matter who carried them. With them was a note, which he read to Jessie. "Bro, Dad bought these for you when you were born. They're yours, and always have been. This isn't a handout, it's giving you what was always yours to begin with," he recited, then leafed through them. All of them were dated 1986, which was his birth year. Each of them was tendered at a face value of five thousand dollars, but that was just their face value. These bonds matured after twenty years, so each one was worth probably about six thousand dollars now, after two years of added appreciation.

And there had to be about twenty of them. So, a little over a hundred thousand dollars. He was impressed, they tried to buy him off with much more money than he expected they would.

But, he was right about the gift. Money. If he just dropped them in a safe deposit box, they'd be worth about three hundred thousand when their baby was ready to go to college, which should be more than enough to go to any college he or she wanted. Wise investments in annuities, other bonds, and other investments would probably stretch it out to half a million after twenty years. That was enough to send more than one child to any college they wanted to attend, and get them a Master's degree.

That worked for him. The future of his children was secure, thanks to these bonds. And in some kind of strange irony, he guessed he had his father to thank for that, a father who would roll over in his grave if he knew, and would rise from the dead to stalk and kill Kit if he knew Kit was married to a cat.

“What are they, love?” Jessie asked.

“Savings bonds,” he answered. “It looks like they were bought when I was born, so Vil wasn’t lying about that. Yeah, here, this was a week after I was born,” he said, pointing at the date on one of them, which was April 2, 1986. “These can put all our kids through college by the time they’re old enough, if we invest them wisely.”

“Good,” Jessie said with a nod. “If there’s anything I would ever want from your family, love, I just got it.”

“There’s a second item, Mister Vulpan,” the wolf prompted, taking a small black box from his briefcase and presenting it to them. It looked like a jewelry box...some old piece of jewelry? Maybe the necklace his mother had always worn? Kit took it and opened it curiously, but found no jewelry inside.

Inside were a set of keys.

“What is this?” Kit asked, a bit harshly. “Keys? Keys to what?”

“A Cessna 400, sir,” the wolf answered calmly. “Currently parked at Bergstrom. I take it you have a pilot’s license, sir?”

“Well, yeah, I do,” he said, his mind swimming. They gave him a plane? And not just any plane, one of the most expensive private planes one could own! It was one of the biggest planes a pilot could fly with a personal license, so long as they were qualified for instrument flight rules and was rated for a utility plane...which Kit was. Kit had a commercial license, earned from a Part 141 flight school in Massachusetts, and he was rated on utility class aircraft.

“Cessna? What is that?” Jessie asked.

“It’s a plane, ma’am,” the wolf told her. “A personal aircraft. It’s very nice,” he said with a chuckle. “I flew it down. I’m so glad I have utility rating,” he said with an impressed expression.

“They gave me a plane,” he said, a little dumbfounded. A seven hundred thousand dollar plane!

“Well, that’s my delivery, sir. If you’d just sign this,” he said, taking a form out of his case, which Kit numbly signed. “Thank you. You’ll find all the paperwork for the plane in the plane itself, sir. It’s already registered to you, no doubt through your family’s connections. It’s parked at Bergstrom, in their general aviation area, slot G fourteen, between hangar one and hangar two. The keys will get you inside it, and the paperwork is in the glove compartment. Good day to you, and enjoy your plane. I did,” he smiled, then let himself out with quiet professionalism.

“Kit? Kit? What’s wrong?”

“Jessie, love, do you have any idea how expensive that plane is?” he finally erupted. “It’s almost three quarters of a million dollars!”

“Woah,” she breathed. “Kit, we can just give it back.”

“No. No, I can’t. Vil made it clear she’ll disown me if I raise a fuss about this,” he said, thinking furiously. “I, I’ll have to keep it,” he told her. “I can buy a space somewhere, maybe there at Bergstrom, maybe at a smaller airfield somewhere near the city. Space isn't that expensive. Buying gas for it won't be cheap, though."

"You don't sound too unhappy," she noted, then she giggled. "So, Vil found something you wouldn't throw back in her face."

"I—well—I guess not," he laughed sheepishly. "Jessie, love, having a plane is very liberating. We can fly to the beach on weekends, or fly up to Cincinnati to see your parents. Cincinnati would be about five hours from here in a plane like that. We could leave on Saturday afternoon and come back on Monday evening. When we can afford the gas, anyway. It'd cost about a thousand dollars in gas to fly up to Ohio and back."

"Well, that does sound nice," she said. "Are you sure Vil would have a fit if you gave it back?"

"You didn't hear her, love," he said seriously. "She meant it. For some reason, she wants me to have the plane. And I guess I'll cave, just like I did with the car," he sighed. "I don't really need it, but what good is having a pilot's license when I don't have a plane?"

"Well, I think you can give yourself a little luxury, love," she giggled, giving him a kiss. "And I certainly won't mind being able to fly up to Cincinnati to see my family on weekends."

"When we can afford it," he grunted, clutching the box holding the keys in his paw. "We're still trying to recover from Christmas, and the wedding."

She laughed. "Well, I think we'll manage, love," she told him, giving him a gentle hug. "How much will it be to park the plane?"

“Depends, probably around a hundred fifty a month. Then there’s maintenance, and gas, and registration, and taxes, and a lot of other things. Owning a plane isn’t cheap, Jessie.”

“Well, I think the first time we go see my folks, it’ll be worth it.”

“It can pay for itself if you use it a lot, just in not paying to fly commercial,” Kit chuckled. “But I don’t see me flying all that much. And don’t expect to fly up tomorrow,” he warned. “I have to do a lot of work before I can fly the plane. I’ll have to get familiar with it, make sure my license is still good, and I think it’s time for my yearly physical. So it’s going to be a couple of weeks before we do more than take it for a spin around the airfield.”

The phone rang, and Kit sighed when he read the display. “Vil,” he told Jessie, and put it on speaker. “Hey sis.”

“So, can I give gifts or can I?” she said with a laugh.

“He actually wants to keep it,” Jessie laughed.

“I’m a little overwhelmed, sis,” Kit said honestly. “Do you have any idea how much a Cessna four hundred costs?”

“Well, since I’m sitting here looking at the receipt, yeah, I think I do,” she giggled. “And don’t worry about paying for it, bro. It’s a gift, it won’t cost you anything. I didn’t get you a space at Bergstrom, though, because I can’t find any available hangar space anywhere in central Texas,” she said with a grunt of annoyance; Vil wasn’t used to not getting her way. “I bought you two months of tie-down space there at Georgetown, at least for now. I wasn’t sure if you’d want to deal with Bergstrom and the rules for landing there, so I went with the closest small airport that still offered all the services you need. I'm still trying to find some hangar space, though. When I get my hands on some, I'll let you know."

"Thanks, sis."

"I just don't want you to have to drive up to that airport every time you want to use the plane, it's like thirty miles," she fretted. "Like I said, let me see what I can get. Maybe I'll buy some hangar space from one of the small airlines for you to park your plane inside. Anyway, I set you up with one of those transport credit cards you can use to buy fuel and pay for parking and maintenance and such at airports."

"I, I don't know what to say, sis," he said, a little bewildered.

She laughed. "Well, you can say thanks," she said winsomely.

"Vil, thank you," he said.

"It's the least I can do for my brother," she answered. "But I didn't do it alone. That plane is a gift from the family, bro. It's not money, it's not an empty token, it's something that I assured them you would appreciate and find useful. Everyone chipped in to help pay for it, even Uncle Zach and Uncle Jake."

"I think I'd better have it checked for bombs."

Vil gasped, then laughed helplessly. "That may not be a bad idea," she agreed with a little extra giggle. "But, I hope you enjoy it, bro."

"We were talking about flying to Cincinnati to see my parents before you called," Jessie said.

"That's exactly why I had the family buy it for you," Vil told them. "So you have more mobility, more freedom. You may even be able to use it for work, bro. Rick can send you out to interview people out of state, and you can do it on the cheap. You can fly out in your own plane.”

“Well, it’s a little small to take the whole crew, but I could carry a few passengers,” he noted. “And when I first interviewed for the job, I told Rick I had a pilot’s license, but wasn’t sure what use it’d be to the magazine,” he laughed.

“Well, it might be useful now,” Vil told him. “Is it alright?”

“What do you mean?”

“I couldn’t remember what kinds of planes you can fly, so I went with the safest bet. I remembered that you’re rated to fly planes with two engines, but the new ones I looked at had the same basic abilities as the one I bought. Hell, that plane I bought you has more range than most of the two engine planes I looked at,” she snorted. “That plane looked to be really nice, and the dealer said that anyone with a pilot’s license could fly the plane I bought you, and he said it’s about the best single engine plane for flying long distances, even better than some two engine planes. But if it doesn’t work out for you, or it’s too small or something, I’ll replace it with something bigger.”

Kit chuckled ruefully. “I’m not going to complain. How can I complain about a gift?”

“Well, that’s sweet, bro, but if that plane doesn’t work out for you, let me know, and I’ll replace it with something that will. Did you get the bonds too?”

“Yeah, we have them, Vil,” Jessie answered.

“Mother bought them for Kit when he was born,” she told them. “They’re his. They have nothing to do with the family, and nothing to do with Dad. So take them and use them well. Buy a house, invest for the future, it doesn’t matter, so long as you don’t burn them or throw them away. They didn’t come from Dad, Kit, they came from Mom,” she made sure to stress a second time. “So don’t throw them away, bro. You’d insult Mom’s memory if you did that. Use them. Invest them. Do something good with them.”

“We will,” he promised. “These bonds are sending our kids to Harvard,” he declared. “Why did you hold onto them for so long?”

“Bro, the bonds fell under the proscription in Dad’s will,” she told him. “I couldn’t give them to you until after it was voided, or I’d lose everything. Mom may have bought them, but they were considered Dad’s assets because Mom died before you were eighteen. But notice, bro, that they got to you the day after the will was voided. I wanted you to have them, I wanted both of you to have them. I wanted to know that even if you won’t come to me, you’ll always have an emergency nest egg to fall back on when times get tight, and have something to ensure that your kids never have to worry about anything.”

“You’re such a sweet femme, Vil,” Jessie said with a snuffle.

“I love you too, Jessie,” Vil said gently. “And think, bro, if it wasn’t for Jessie, you could have been rolling in money with no responsibilities or cares.”

“I’ll take Jessie over money any day,” he said with conviction, putting his paw on her shoulder.

“And that’s why you’re the richest Vulpan of them all, bro,” Vil said thickly. “Go check out the plane, you two, I want you to pick up that Transport card. You have to call a number on it to activate it, and I want you to do that today. And the airport wants you to do the safety briefings and walkthroughs, and they want a copy of your license.”

“I can handle those later, but we’ll go up and get the paperwork out of it before I have to go to work, I promise,” he told her.

“Works for me. I’ll call you guys later, alright?”

“Alright. Thanks again, Vil,” Jessie said.

“Yeah, thanks, sis,” Kit agreed.

“Any time, bro, any time. Goodbye.”

Kit lowered the phone, then hugged Jessie. “God, I love that sister of mine.”

“So do I, love, so do I.”

Chapter 21

It. Was. Gorgeous.

The Cessna 400 was brand new, right off the assembly line, and had only been flown once outside of whatever tests the manufacturer did, and that was to fly it from Richmond, Virginia, where it was bought, to Austin. It was very sleek, with sloping, graceful lines, low wings, and fixed gear in flared housings. It was painted the same colors as the logo of Vulpan Steel, red white and blue, with a white overcarriage and a blue belly with two horizontal red stripes along the fuselage broken by the registration number, running just under the cockpit and back along the centerline of the plane, with the plane's registration letters and numbers in red.

The inside was even more amazing. It was like a luxury car inside, filled with leather and sleek glass and rich wood. The control sticks were offset at an angle off the sides of the cockpit, not in the center or between the pilot's knees, and the seats were beige and covered in leather, split down the back to accommodate tails. The instrument panel was almost all glass, two panels holding a Garmin navigation system and electronic instruments, with a center console holding the radio, throttle, and some of the controls for the Garmin and other systems. It was all top of the line, new...it even smelled new. The doors were gull wing, opening to give them access to a surprisingly roomy cockpit reached by stepping up onto the bases of the wings.

Jessie gaped inside the cockpit from the copilot's side, almost afraid to get in, as Kit confidently climbed into the plane and opened the glove compartment, which for the plane was on the side of the center console facing the pilot. He noticed the sleeves in the side for maps or magazines, and all the little niceties...though it had no sun visor. The cockpit glass was rounded and high on the front, giving one a fantastic overhead view, but it had no sun visor. Sunglasses would be a must in this plane.

“Can...can I get in?” she asked.

Kit laughed. “Don't be silly, pretty kitty,” he teased. “Climb on in, have a seat.”

“But there are controls up here,” she protested, pointing at the control stick jutting from the rest on the side of the cockpit.

“Just ignore it, love,” he told her as he found the paperwork the courier mentioned. The plane was already registered in his name, which meant that Kit could fly it that day if he wanted. He rifled through the legal papers to make sure everything was in order, then he pulled out the operator's manual. He didn't really need it, since he'd already downloaded absolutely everything he could find on the Cessna 400 yesterday, which was printed out and in a big binder that was still in the truck, but the manual matched up to everything he'd read online. And what he'd read told him that he'd need some time to adjust to this plane. He'd been trained in two planes, a single engine Cessna 172 and a twin engine 341, and had flown a Cirrus a few times, but those weren't even half as luxurious as this plane, though they did share the Garmin G1000 navigation system. It had just everything. TKS anti-ice system, a rarity in a single engine plane, a Mode S Transponder, a 4.2 G rating, which would let the plane do some pretty hard flying, HVAC climate control, speed brakes, TCAS collision avoidance system, multichannel transceiver with push to talk switch right on the joystick, the plane had almost every system someone would find in a more complex plane like a twin engine except retractable landing gear. The Garmin G1000 system was just godly, incorporating electronic flight instruments, real-time traffic locations on the map taken from transponder data received from beacons, autopilot, computer-assisted navigation, GPS, plane functions, timers, flight plan generators, fuel mix calculations, and since Vil had bought a totally decked out plane, it had XM satellite radio and real-time weather radar imagery, and was also outfitted with a Blue Sky satellite internet system and a wireless router, allowing them to use their laptops in the plane to surf the internet. From what he read, it was one of the fastest piston engine planes in production, since Vil bought him the turbocharged variant. It was capable of 254 knots, which was around 300 miles an hour, but that was at high altitude and burning fuel like a son of a bitch. Its load rating wasn't the greatest in the world; if he carried four people and luggage, he couldn't completely fill his gas tanks and still get the plane off the ground, it would be overloaded. But, given the plane had a range of over a thousand miles on a full tank, he could easily fill to load rating and just land more often for refueling stops. With just him and Jessie and modest luggage, the plane could fly from Austin to Cincinnati in one leg without refueling, as he could completely fill their tanks. According to the Garmin's navigational database, it was 812 nautical miles from Georgetown to Cincinnati, which was nearly 300 nautical miles within the maximum range of the plane with full tanks. At a listed cruising speed of 174 knots, they could make it in about six hours, including takeoff and landing delays. Closer to seven hours if he factored in driving to the airport, then driving from the airport in Cincinnati to her parents' house.

“Wow, it’s almost like being in a car,” Jessie said, keeping her paws in her lap, fearful to touch anything.

“It’s just like driving after you get used to it,” Kit chuckled. “I haven’t flown for like eight months. I hope I’m not rusty.”

“Kit!” she gasped, a little fearfully.

He put his paw on her shoulder. “I was joking, pretty kitty,” he said, gently. “I’m sorry if I scared you. I didn’t realize the idea of flying in a plane made you nervous.”

“It does, a little. I’ve never been in a plane like this before,” she told him.

“Well, love, they’re just as safe as an airline. After all, how often do you hear of planes crashing?”

“Not often.”

“Now think of how many planes are in the air right now,” he said, motioning at the runway of the small municipal airport, where two personal planes were waiting as a third took off.

“I see what you mean. They’re really safe, I guess.”

“Safer than driving, because pilots take flying much more seriously than most furs take driving.”

“So, when can we go to see my folks? I’d love to drop in on them!”

Kit chuckled. “Maybe next week,” he told her. “We’ll see how I feel about it after I have some time learning this plane’s systems. I have a lot to study here, and I’m one of those pilots who takes this seriously. I need to get comfortable with this cockpit, and learn how the plane’s unique systems and autopilot work. I've never had that in a plane before, at least not a good one. The 341 I trained in during flight school had autopilot, but it was dumb as a box of rocks."

"What were the planes you used to fly like?"

"Well, when I was in flight school, they were pretty nice," he told her. "Cessna one seventy-twos with Garmin navigation, so they were pretty nice to fly, and Cessna three forty-one twin engines, so we could learn complex planes and older navigation systems that weren't as modern as the Garmin. After I got my license, though, all the planes I flew were old," he chuckled. "I rented planes to keep logging hours after I got my license, but not much else, and old planes are cheap to rent. I tell you, those old planes made me appreciate the Garmin system in the Cessnas."

"I've always wondered about that. How did you afford it? I mean, I heard that it's really expensive to get a pilot's license."

"Well, my scholarship and grants covered most of my flight school, believe it or not," he told her as he settled into the pilot's seat. "Since I was in ROTC and I wanted to fly jets after I graduated and went into the Air Force. Vil helped me with the rest of it. After the accident, I actually earned money with my license," he laughed. "I was paid by my dorm buddies to fly us all to Nantucket one weekend. And it was even legal."

"Legal?"

"Love, there are different types of licenses," he told her, "just like with driving. I have a commercial pilot's license, because it's the baseline for flight school in the Air Force. If you have a commercial license or better, they give your application for flight school much more weight. I spent over a year in a flight school near campus getting a commercial license, and it wasn't cheap," he grunted. "Anyway, there's a junior license, which is like a learner's permit, then there's a standard pilot's license, then a commercial license, then there's a flight instructor's license, and finally an air transport license, which airline pilots have to have. Only a commercial pilot or better is allowed to earn money flying a plane," he explained. "Commercial pilots are rated for instrument flying, which is huge, and we're trained to deal with many more emergency situations and to deal with air traffic controllers. Standard pilot licenses run on what's called visual flight rules, where commercial and above are allowed to run on instrument flight rules. Right now, if there was a cloud deck above us, those planes over there waiting to take off would have to wait if their pilots weren't instrument rated, because they couldn't see."

"Oh. So, you could land a plane at night in the rain?"

He nodded. "I'll have to learn this plane before I'm comfortable doing that, though," he noted, motioning at the dashboard. "It has a hell of a lot more bells and whistles than anything I've ever flown before."

"You don't have to take tests on this plane to get your rating?"

"Nope. Once you get your license, the FAA assumes you're responsible enough to know what the hell you're doing if you fly a plane with a new instrument system that's in the same class of plane you're already rated to fly. But this plane is just a little different than the usual personal plane. This is what's called a utility class plane, love, and those have special rules...but this particular plane doesn't. Usually, I'd have to be rated on a plane classified as utility—and I already am, truth be told—but this model is part of a loophole. It technically falls into utility rating because it can go faster than two hundred knots, but it's also a private model airplane, so the FAA waives rating requirements for it, since it's not meant for the same utility as other planes in the class. Most utility planes are helicopters and small commuter planes, like most dual-engine prop planes. This is a private plane, so while it's classified as a utility plane, I don't have to rate on it to fly it, I can treat it like any other private plane. That means that I'm the one who's responsible for understanding the plane and being able to operate it safely, and that means studying its systems. I learned to fly using a Garmin, the same system in this plane, so at least I don't have to learn that much. I just need to study the manual and learn how the plane operates, learn how its anti-icing system and such work. Those are new to me."

"Oh. Well, show me some of this. If you teach me, it'll reinforce you."

He chuckled. "Sure, we'll go through it together," he told her, pulling out the key to bring up the plane's electrical systems. "Maybe I'll make a pilot out of you," he grinned.

"Just think of it, my handsome fox," Jessie mused, watching him as he put the key in the plane and enabled its electrical systems, causing the dashboard to light up and boot. "Being able to see my family whenever we want. I never really thought of what it would mean to have a husband with a pilot's license," she giggled.

"It never really meant anything until right now," he answered. "I've been too busy with work, and we've had no money, I couldn't really use it until now. It would be cheaper to fly commercial than it would be to rent a plane to fly to Cincinnati, pretty kitty. I guess I can't completely hate my family now," he chuckled. "I know they bought me this just to alleviate their own guilt, and maybe pacify Vil a little bit, but I'll take it. I guess my vaunted resistance to money is a sham," he said ruefully. "The instant they dangled something shiny in my face, I snapped it up like any other greedy bastard.”

“Not at all,” she protested. “You accepted what was given to you in good faith, love, and something you could both appreciate and use. And you didn’t take Vil’s offer to buy you a house or give you a lot of money, did you? You took one thing, something you can use and will appreciate, and I think that’s all you’ll ever take. After all, what else do we need?”

“God, I love you,” he said sincerely, reaching over and putting his paw on her shoulder.

“I’m so glad you do,” she said with a teasing smile. “Else I’d have to kill you.”

He laughed delightedly. “That’s one way to defend your honor, I suppose. Knock off the only guy who’s ever besmirched it.”

“It wasn’t besmirched,” she grinned. “You did follow through and marry me, didn’t you?”

“I guess I did. I have no idea what insanity came over me,” he sighed forlornly, then adroitly put his paws over his head to deflect the inevitable whack. Jessie did try to playfully smack him, but then her face turned fearful and she looked around.

“I didn’t hit any buttons, did I?” she asked nervously.

“Jessie, love, calm down,” he told her soothingly. “Nothing’s going to happen with us on the ground. You couldn’t get the plane moving no matter what you hit in here, the parking brake’s engaged.”

“Well, I could hit that, couldn’t I? Or start the plane by accident?”

“I guess you could, but do you know which buttons to press in which order to make the engine start?”

“Umm, no.”

“Then don’t worry yourself one little bit,” he chuckled. “We won’t be here long, I promise. I know this must be boring for you.”

“No! I think it’s really neat! I have a husband who’s a pilot,” she smiled. “I’m going to use this for the subject of a paper I’m writing for my English composition class. Our professor wants us to write a paper based on something in our lives, complete with three topics of research comparing my experience with other people’s. So I think I’ll do it on people who have pilot’s licenses and how it makes their lives different from others.”

“Sounds fun,” he said honestly. “I’m looking forward to seeing how you do it.”

“It should be interesting. The professor said it’d be more fun if we picked something that was interesting to us. She’s right, of course.”

“Naturally. Writing about something that’s boring or sucks makes it a chore. Now, back to what we were doing, showing you how this all works.”

They spent nearly four hours sitting in the cockpit, interrupted only by trips to the small terminal to go to the bathroom, as Kit studied the plane’s systems and went over the checklists for preflight, startup, takeoff, landing, postflight, and shutdown. Jessie was right in that teaching her all about it made him pay much more attention, and allowed him to memorize it himself more quickly. Kit refreshed himself on the Garmin—it had been a year since he’d flown and used one—and had everything come back to him quickly. The Garmin almost made learning to navigate the normal way obsolete, since it told you exactly where you were, where you were going, and which direction to go. It even showed an expected time of arrival, elapsed flight time, fuel burn ratios, weather or air restriction warnings, and kept a log of it all. He moved on to the weather system, a very handy little integrated part of the Garmin that streamed weather data in from XM satellite through the satellite antenna, and also gave him internet connectivity since the Blue Sky system used the same antenna. With the weather system, he'd never find himself flying headlong into a thunderstorm, it was literally like having weather radar in his plane. The plane had a very good TCAS system, the same system that had been in the 172s, part of the Garmin suite, which even gave audio warnings in addition to warnings on the right monitor multi-function display, the MFD. The MFD would let him put up a map that showed the ground terrain, his projected route, other planes in the area, and any weather features all in one easy to read display. After that, he taught her about radio etiquette, and how it was used. "Some planes don't even really need radios," he told her. "Small planes flying out of private airstrips using visual flight rules and staying away from restricted airspace, they technically don't need them, though no pilot in his right mind would fly without one. If you had an emergency, how would you warn anyone or get help?"

"I can see that," Jessie nodded. "What does VHF mean?"

"Very High Frequency, it's a range of radio frequencies set aside mainly for aviation, commercial, and military use. Virtually all aviation radios use either VHF or UHF, Ultra High Frequency. UHF doesn't have as much range, though."

"Oh," she said, typing on the laptop she had in her lap.

Kit did a radio check with the little local tower for her, showing her how it worked, and explained how certain frequencies were dedicated to certain things. “Love, how do you know where to go?” she asked. “I mean, you have the plane, but how do you know where you’re going? Does the GPS tell you?”

“You mean how will I know where to land if I need gas, or I’m going to a city I’ve never visited before?”

“Yeah.”

“Come on, let’s go to the terminal and warm up, I’ll show you,” he said with a smile.

They locked up the plane, and he took her into the terminal, which was pretty close to where the plane had been parked, in a short-term tie down parking area. Kit also needed to go in there and find out where the space that Vil had rented for him was located. She hadn’t really noticed much when they came in that morning because she ran straight to the bathroom, so he took her into the pilot’s lounge, which was actually much more. He wasn’t sure what they called it here, but up in his old flight school they called it the lounge. It was a large room occupied by three other furs at the moment, with a huge map on one wall and four computers at desks under it. Books were lined into bookshelves near the desks, filled with manuals, flight books, and old navigation books. “This is how we do it, pretty kitty,” he said, motioning at one of the computers. “Of course, this is the fast and easy way. When I did my flight training, we had to be able to do it all the old way, using maps and a calculator and lots of books with airport information. See, the computer has a list of every available airport in North America,” he explained as he sat down at one of them and brought up the nav program. “I tell it where I want to go, and it gives me a list of available places to land at the destination. It even tells me things like what radio frequencies the airport uses, how much their parking fees are, if they charge landing fees, if they have maintenance facilities, and if there's a rental car agency either close by or that will deliver a car to the airport. Here, let's put in Cincinnati," he said, typing it in. Immediately a list of six airfields popped up, with icons by the names to represent the services they offered. "Here we go, this is where I'd land if I were going to Cincinnati. It has overnight parking for visiting planes, it's real close to your house, they offer a courtesy car for visiting pilots as well as a rental car agency that will deliver a car if we make a reservation, and it has a hotel right beside it. It's also a municipal airport, so I wouldn't have to deal with all the crap I'd take landing at a big airport, like Bergstrom. This one has a control tower and two strips," he continued, pointing them out when he clicked on the airport. "It also has a maintenance shop rated for working on all models of piston and small-size turboprop planes. Ooh, this one has jet mechanics available, too," he noted. "Guess some private jets are parked there. So, now that we know where we're going and where we want to land, next we'll file a flight plan," he said, minimizing the window and bringing up the FAA program. "Since we'll be flying above the visual ceiling of eighteen thousand feet, we have to tell the FAA. They need to know where I'm going, when I'm going, and what altitude I intend to fly at. So, let's tell them that we're going to Cincinnati, and landing at Regional Municipal Airport," he said, inputting the information. "Now, we're leaving next weekend, so our flight plan is for Saturday the twenty-fifth. So, we'll tell them we're leaving at approximately six p.m. Now, they're asking here how many stops I need to make to refuel, which is something I'd have to work out using my plane's weight and the size of my gas tanks to determine my safe maximum range. Pilots do use math," he chuckled, pointing at the next field. "Our plane can make the trip nonstop as long as it's just the two of us, so I'll tell it none. If I did need to make a stop, it would recommend an airfield along our planned flight path where we could land and refuel."

"What if you have to go to the bathroom?" she asked.

Kit chuckled. "Well, if you're not carrying a portable urinal in the plane, or you need to a real toilet, then you make an unscheduled stop," he winked. "Those are allowed. These flight plans aren't set in stone with us private pilots like they are with commercial planes, they're just to help the FAA better control traffic. If we need to stop or change our flight plan, we radio in to whichever controller's jurisdiction we're in and tell them. They make the changes for us and we're good to go."

"Ah, I see. It's not that bad, is it?"

"Not at all," he smiled. "Now, if we stayed under eighteen thousand feet the whole time, we wouldn't have to file a flight plan at all," he told her. "That's visual flight rules. We'd just have to avoid restricted airspace and obey any traffic control orders radioed to us, that's the only real rule."

"I see. So, if we fly at, what was it, twenty five thousand, won't we be sharing the sky with big airline planes?"

"Not really, miss," one of the furs interrupted. He was a tall, lanky canine, looking like a mixed canine mutt, with black fur but a brown face, and a single brown mitten on his right paw. "The FAA keeps things layered. The big planes fly over thirty thousand most of the time, while us private planes usually occupy the area underneath."

"Oh, I see."

"Hi, by the way," he chuckled, offering his paw. "Brad Hennings."

“Jessie Vulpan,” she smiled, taking his paw. “My husband, Kit. He’s the pilot, not me.”

“Well, it sounds like he’s teaching you well,” Brad smiled warmly.

“I’m trying,” Kit chuckled. “Local?”

“Yeah, it’s my weekend with the plane,” he grinned. “I’m fractional.”

“What’s that?” Jessie asked.

“It means me and a few other pilots jointly own a plane, and we share it,” he answered. “This is my weekend with the plane, so I’m going to go have a little spin around with my girlfriend. I’m thinking of going to El Paso. Never been there.”

“Nice, what kind of plane?” Kit asked.

“A Cessna Skyhawk, but we bought it new, so it has a Garmin in it. It’s really nice. What do you have?”

“We have a, um, Cessna four hundred,” Jessie said, looking at her laptop.

“Nice!” Brad said animatedly. “I read that Cessna didn’t change a single thing when they bought out Columbia. Is it all the same?”

“I never really looked at the Columbias, so I’m not sure,” Kit said. “I’ve been kinda out of the game for a while.”

“Yeah, it can happen,” Brad nodded. “I went about two years without any logged hours. God, I hated getting the physical after that,” he laughed. “I was halfway through my instrument rating, too. I had to do it all over again.”

“Eww,” Kit sounded. “I feel your pain. Getting IFR was such a freakin’ bitch.”

“Amen, brother, amen,” Brad chuckled. “But it’s all over now. I’m thinking of trying for my commercial. I have all the logged hour requirements three times over, and I have my IFR. I’d just have to do the tests.”

“I’d recommend it. I did it through a one forty-one program when I went through flight school. When I graduated, I had my commercial.”

“That’s the best way,” Brad nodded. “All at once, no redundant crap. Thinking of trying for an instructor’s license?”

“Nah, not really. It’s a lot of money for something I’d almost never use.”

“True. But, you could teach your wife without having to pay for it,” he grinned.

“I can do that anyway,” he chuckled. “They don’t know who is controlling the plane once you take off,” he winked.

Brad laughed. “True, true. I’ve let my girlfriend fly, but haven’t let her land or take off. You can teach her that way, it just looks a little fishy when it comes time to document for her license.”

Kit laughed. “Yah, true.”

“So, you gonna settle in here?”

“We live in Austin, the plane was just parked here after I took delivery,” Kit said. “I need to find hangar space for it.”

“Good luck,” Brad said with a frown. “I was on a waiting list for nearly eight months to get a Tee hangar here.”

“It’s that bad?”

“It’s bad,” Brad nodded. “Most of the airports around here are really small and constrained by the towns they’re in, so they can’t expand. That puts hangar space at a premium. My Skyhawk spent eight months at a tie down before I got a Tee. You got an FBO yet?”

“I’m going to just go freelance until I find hangar space. No use hiring an FBO until I know where I’m going to park my plane,” Kit answered, to which Brad nodded in understanding. An FBO was a fixed base operator, which was basically a flight services company...kind of like a gas station, garage, and concierge all rolled into one. Most of them offered fuel and maintenance for private and business planes, but larger ones also offered services like cleaning inside and out, de-icing, oxygen tank refills, and lavatory maintenance. Most FBOs also had pilot perks in their hangar terminals like sleeping bunks, showers, lounges, courtesy cars, concierge services, and so on, for they were major selling points for an FBO. Some of the large multi-airport “franchise” FBOs even offered services like aircraft sales, or offered hangar space to clients to house their planes. Most private pilots hired an FBO to maintain their planes, but Kit would hold off on that until he knew exactly where he was going to permanently hangar his plane. Virtually all airports and FBOs offered their services to anyone who paid for them, be it someone who hired them to do the work all the time or a transient pilot who needed one-time service or a fuel tank fill up while flying cross country. Contracted planes got services cheaper than one-timers, but that option was always there.

FBOs, oddly enough, often competed with the very airports that housed them. Georgetown was a good example of that. There were six FBOs at the airport of various sizes, and two of them offered to sell aircraft fuel. But the airport also offered aircraft fuel at a public fueling station, and that was where a vast majority of planes would fuel up if they weren't already contracted to an FBO at the airport—it was where Kit would be gassing up his plane himself. Many airports offered their own fueling stations, because it helped the airport earn more money on top of the rent they collected from businesses on the airport, aircraft tie down and hangar space rents from pilots, and landing fees they charged to planes that landed at their airports, if they charged them. Georgetown did not charge landing fees to land there, because it was a small, general aviation airport, and not charging landing fees was often a factor determining if a pilot landed at an airport. So, instead of charging landing fees, Georgetown offered air fuel, called AVGas, at a public fueling station at competitive prices, which probably earned them more money than the landing fees would.

That was probably another reason why Vil had his plane delivered here...he had no doubt that Bergstrom charged landing fees.

“Well, let me sit down and check out airfields in El Paso,” he chuckled. “Have a good trip!”

“You too,” Kit returned, and the canine wandered over to a free computer and sat down.

“Were you serious?” Jessie asked. “About teaching me to fly?”

“Would you like to?” he asked.

“I, I don't know. Maybe. We'll see, after we fly to Cincinnati,” she said, her eyes speculative. “But I have so much else to do, and the baby—”

“Love, it’ll always be here, if you want to learn. There’s no time limit. We have all the time in the world.”

“We’ll see. Okay, so, what’s next?”

Under Jessie’s eye, Kit completed the flight plan, then even filed it. “There. Now it’s all set, we can go to see your folks next weekend.”

“You think we can?” she asked excitedly.

“I think I’ll be ready by next Saturday,” he told her. “The systems on the plane are much easier than I thought. I’ll feel confident flying it cross country next week, as long as I break it in,” he said with a sudden smile. “Let’s take it up!”

“Go flying? Don’t we have to—”

“Nah, we’ll keep it under eighteen thousand, so we can have a little joy ride,” he told her. “Wanna go for a flight, Misses Vulpan?”

She laughed. “I’m a little nervous, but I’d love to, Mister Vulpan,” she replied.

“The first time is always scary,” he assured her as they stood up. “My first time in a plane, I nearly threw up. And my first solo, I almost wet my pants.”

“I can’t believe that,” Jessie laughed. “You’d never be that nervous about anything!”

“Well, you start getting really friendly with God when you’re sitting in the plane by yourself for the first time and heading down the runway.”

Jessie giggled. “I don’t think I believe you,” she teased.

“Well, let’s see how fearless you are, Misses Vulpan,” he challenged. “Trust me enough to take you flying?”

“Such a silly question,” she retorted.

Her playfulness turned to nerves when they got in the plane and he started it up, after he performed a thorough preflight check, and had to fight a little with the headset she needed to wear; piston engine planes weren’t nearly as loud as jets or turboprops, but there was some noise, and the headsets helped block it out. He helped her adjust her microphone, then put on his own headset and plugged them both in, setting it so only his headset would transmit through the radio, and both sets were set for the intercom. She was quiet as he went down the checklist for preflight, very still when he started the engines, and was a little fidgety when they taxied out.

Kit was impressed. The plane was quiet. They didn’t really even need the headsets, it wasn’t much louder than a car inside, quiet enough for them to speak in normal voices and be heard, with just a background droning about as loud as it would be driving down interstate with the windows down. It wasn’t entirely quiet in the cockpit, but it was much quieter than any other cockpit he’d been in. Amazing acoustic dampening! “Why do we need this for the noise, there isn’t much noise,” Jessie noted, pointing at her microphone.

“Yah, this is the quietest plane I’ve ever been in,” Kit agreed. “You can take yours off, love, if you don’t mind what you hear. I just had you put it on cause the planes I’ve flown were loud enough for the headsets to help. Your ears would start to ring after a while, and you’ll probably want to wear them when we’re airborne, since the engine’s going faster, and will be a little louder.”

“Okay, I’ll leave it on, then.”

She got a little nervous, clutching to her armrest when they took off, but then she gasped when she looked out the window, as they did a slow banking turn while climbing, heading north and away from the restricted airspace around Austin. “Wow!” she exclaimed, looking down at the ground through her side window.

“Yeah, it’s pretty, isn’t it?” he said, looking over at her as he leveled out around four thousand feet and pattered off to the northwest, keeping an eye on his MFD window to make sure no other planes were around; using visual flight rules, he was responsible for avoiding a midair collision, so knowing where other planes were was critical. Most planes had transponders, and those transponders showed up on his window because the transponder fed that data to the Garmin through telemetry beacons with which the transponder maintained contact. “We’ll go out about fifty miles and head back in, shouldn’t take more than an hour given I’m gonna be going slow.”

“No, go fast!” she said excitedly. “How fast can we go?”

“Well, you won’t really feel it, but at this altitude, I think about two hundred knots is the best we could manage. It’ll suck all our gas to do it, though, and that gas is five dollars a gallon, love.”

“Oh,” she said, a little disappointed. “What’s a knot?”

“It’s a little over a mile an hour,” he answered. “Ten knots is about eleven and a half miles an hour or so. Our normal cruising speed is hundred seventy-four knots, which is just about two hundred miles an hour. We can’t really do that down here, we need the thinner air at around twenty five thousand to go at that speed without burning up all our gas.”

“Oh, so, the lower we are, the more gas it takes?”

“More or less,” he said. “It’s a little more complicated than that, but you can sum it up that way. The air’s much thinner higher up, which lets us go faster and without as much air resistance. That’s why airliners always cruise above thirty thousand. Much more fuel efficient, not to mention much less turbulence.”

“I get it. It’s not that hard.”

“It can be for us. This plane isn’t pressurized, pretty kitty, so if we go over fourteen thousand feet, we have to wear these oxygen breathers,” he said, picking up the white tube that would affix over his nose. “We only have five hours of oxygen for four people, but that’s not a big deal, since we only have about five hours of flight time above fourteen thousand anyway, and with only two of using it it’ll last ten hours. We can only carry so much gas.”

“I never thought of that,” she said with a surprised look. “Are they uncomfortable?”

“Try it on, cause you’ll be wearing it when we do go see your parents,” he told her. “I’m not flying that far at low altitude, it’ll murder our fuel efficiency. If we want to do it in one leg, without stopping, we have to fly high.”

The good thing about a decked out plane was that it had all the cool toys. The plane had XM Satellite radio and was enabled for internet access via satellite thanks to the Blue Sky equipment and account Vil had set up, which was a different system from the Garmin and the weather system, but the Garmin knew the Blue Sky was there and could use it as well. Since the plane was literally connected to the internet, the Garmin could access internet information, like how the weather system downloaded real-time weather information from the Weather Service. Kit had Jessie get out her laptop and have it search for networks, and she was a bit astounded when her laptop connected to the internet through the airplane. They listened to XM radio and chatted while they flew out about a hundred miles, then turned around and headed back for the airport, but the whole time Kit was seeing the unique plane systems in use, after he studied them for hours on the tarmac. Jessie kept her nose glued to the side window, looking down on the sun-dappled ground below, with the crosshatched farm fields, ranch pastures, roads, buildings, and houses. They passed over a large stream, nearly a river, and then over the rugged hills that dominated the area north and west of Austin, filled with houses. She pointed things out to him, like a golf course, or a large cluster of houses winding along a hillside, or a baseball diamond. They turned on the air conditioner when the cockpit began heating up, and Kit was highly pleased...climate control in small planes wasn't the best in the world. But this plane used HVAC for climate control, the same system used in jets, and it kept the cockpit nice and comfortable. As far as the unusual cockpit configuration went, Kit had no complaints. It took him a little getting used to the side-mounted angled control stick, but it rested at the natural angle of his arm, and he found he had a very comfortable control of it, able to rest his elbow on the armrest and still keep hold of the stick. The controls were electrical, fly by wire, and were responsive and sensitive, which made it a joy to fly. No wrestling with a stick or rudder pedals in crosswinds. The cockpit layout was nice and practical, and everything was at his fingertips as every flight instrument was right where he expected it, since most of them were displayed on the primary window of the Garmin. The Garmin's control pad was on the center console, with additional controls on the dash, surrounding the twin display monitors, but everything was laid out exactly as it had been in his training plane; Garmins were all the same. After just an hour in the air, Kit felt confident he could fly the plane cross country, since the plane's systems and displays were either fed into the Garmin or were well organized and easy to read—indeed, the Cessna 400's cockpit was designed around a Garmin. He had only one beef with the plane, and that was a silly little thing; no sun visor. Kit did see that getting some sunglasses was going to be mandatory, though, since the large curved cockpit windscreen had nowhere to put a sun visor...flying northwest hadn't been entirely fun. Outside of that one thing, the plane was freakin' perfect. "Alright, we're going to descend," he warned her as they approached Georgetown, showing clearly on the map on his right window, the Multi-Feed Display or MFD, and saw that there was one plane about four miles west of them. "Let me radio the tower and get landing clearance."

Jessie was quiet as they landed, and Kit taxied them back to their parking spot using the rudder pedals; the plane had a fixed nose wheel, so it steered with differential braking on the rear wheels. "So, did you like it, pretty kitty?" he asked as he powered down the engine and started to perform the post flight checklist.

"That was awesome!" she gushed, giving him a happy look. "So, can we go to Cincinnati next weekend? Please?"

"We already have the flight plan filed," he winked.

"Thank you!" she squealed, lunging over the center console and giving him a fierce hug. "I have to call Vil and thank her myself for them giving you this plane, my handsome fox. It's going to be so wonderful to have it!"

“Love, that makes me glad I took it all by itself,” he told her seriously. “If you like it, then we keep it.”

“Yes we’re keeping this!” she told him excitedly. “I love this thing!” she cried, pattering her paws on the dashboard in rapid staccato, then flinching her paws away as if afraid she might break something.

Kit laughed. “I’ll have to find you a flight instructor,” he winked.

“I would not mind at all,” she said with utter sincerity. “If we have it, I’d love to learn how to fly it all by myself!”

“Well, I do hope you’ll let me come along,” he said flippantly, which made her burst out laughing and smack him fondly on the arm. “Let me finish the post flight, then we can lock it up and head home.”

“Okay. I gotta go pee,” she said, reaching for the door latch.

Kit chuckled as she climbed out, dropped down off the wing, then rushed for the terminal. She’d been bitten by the flying bug. Now would come the process of converting her to the Dark Side.

The plane was exciting, but there were, honestly, much more important things for him to worry about. The plane had been a wonderful distraction, but today, Sunday, he had real work to do, so much work that he begged off Sunday poker so he could focus on the task at paw.

The bonds.

Kit was quite a savvy businessman, and a savvy businessman never does anything without a plan. He was savvy enough to know that he didn’t know enough to form that plan himself, so he sought out the advice of someone that did have that kind of knowledge... Vil.

As Jessie spent the day cooking, doing homework, going over to visit the poker crew and take them some food, and excitedly telling her parents all about their flight and plans to come up over the phone, Kit was on video conference with Vil. Kit had tried to get Jessie to take part in the discussion, but she just told him that she trusted him to take care of it, that she'd really have no idea what they were talking about anyway, and left it to them to handle it. After counting up the 15 bonds and calculating their combined worth with interest, Kit found that he had $117,743.28 worth of them, and that much money demanded wise and prudent investment. One didn't just stick it in a savings account somewhere. And that was where Vil came in. She wasn't a financial planner, but she was more than well versed enough to know where the good investments were. Together, over the course of the day, they hammered out a highly detailed and thorough investment portfolio for the money, divesting the capital through multiple investments; stocks, bonds, annuities, certificates of deposit, and commodities, mainly precious metals. They decided that it was only wise to leave $10,000 of it out as available cash in case of emergencies, which Kit would deposit in a special money market account, giving him access to that money while it earned more interest than it would in another account. "God, I'm going to have to either hire an accountant or bone up on my tax codes," Kit grunted as he typed up the plan, which he'd send to Vil to let her check over to ensure he had it all copied correctly. "I'll have to file a ten forty next year, no way will we get away with an A or EZ form, not with all this interest and capital gains."

“Well, it’s a good kind of pain,” Vil chuckled. “Much better than you living out of your boots. Dear God, bro, you have no idea how worried I’ve been thinking about you down there with nothing but your salary, and nothing in the bank and no investments. I’ll sleep much better now knowing you’re set up.”

“You shouldn’t worry about stuff like that, sis,” he told her. “I know how to manage our money. The only reason we’ve been so broke was because of the wedding and Christmas and the honeymoon. We kinda went overly crazy in the keys and burned up our savings. Taking that day trip to Key West broke us.”

Vil laughed. “Well, you’re entitled to the occasional moment of insanity,” she grinned. “But now you have some reserves if that ever happens again, and that’s what makes me so relieved. Now, if you have some kind of emergency and can’t get hold of me for some reason, I know you have enough held back to get you through until you can get hold of me.”

“Well, thanks for that concern, sis,” Kit said mildly. “Oh, and expect a call from Jessie sometime today.”

“Oh? What does she need?”

“Nothing, she’s going to thank you and the family for the plane,” he said. “She’s hooked.”

Vil laughed. “So, you’ve taken it up already?”

He nodded. “Yesterday. I wasn’t planning to, but the control systems in it are so user friendly, I felt safe taking it for a short flight to get the hang of it. Next time I'm taking some Windex and paper towels so I can clean Jessie's nose prints off the glass."

Vil laughed harder. "She liked it?"

"Now she wants a pilot's license," he told her. "She said that since we own it, she wants to learn how to fly it."

"Well, that shouldn't be too hard," Vil said, waving her hand negligently. "I'll—"

"You'll let me handle that. I am her husband."

She gave him a quick grin. "Alright, I'll leave that one alone."

"You'd better. Okay, sis, here it comes," he said, saving the file, then uploading it to her. "Check it over."

"No sweat, bro," she said, her paws working under her, where he couldn't see. "You gonna let me handle this, or are you going to do it?"

"You can help with the stocks, but I'll get the rest," he answered. "You can buy the stocks much cheaper and faster than I can, and I can handle the others over the phone or at a few offices here in town. I know where to go. With you doing the stocks, I can do it all in one day."

"It's the Vulpan in you," she winked. "Call Jessie over here."

"Sure. Jess!" he shouted. "My evil bitch of a sister wants to talk to you!"

Jessie laughed from the kitchen and scurried in. "hold on, Dad, I'll give you to Kit for a minute," she said into the phone, and pushed it at him. "Stop being mean to your sister," she chided him, swatting him on the end of his nose with two fingers as she leaned down into the range of the webcam. Kit traded places with her, standing up and giving his attention to the phone.

“Did she chew your ear off about yesterday?” he asked John.

“A little,” he chuckled. “She seems quite happy and excited about your plane. She was only mentioning your coming baby and her pregnancy about once a minute rather than every other sentence.”

Kit laughed. “Well, I’m glad she’s keeping her priorities straight,” he noted.

“I have to admit, I rather like the idea of it myself. It’s very nice knowing you can be here six hours after we call you.”

“We could do that no matter what flying commercially, but this way we can do it basically for free. Vil and my family gave me that plane, and you know how Vil sees a gift.”

“It costs you nothing,” he noted.

“Exactly. She gave me a credit card you use at airports to buy gas and pay for maintenance, and she’s paying the insurance and the taxes and everything. So, we basically have a free plane at our disposal.”

“I’m going to have to thank Vil next time I call her,” John chuckled. “How many furs does it hold?”

“Four.”

“You couldn’t squeeze someone in between the two in the back seat? We couldn’t squeeze Ben in there and fly to Columbus, for example?”

“It’s not a bench seat back there, John. A fifth fur would have to sit on the floor, and that’s illegal. I wouldn’t allow it. I’d like to keep my license, cause the FAA is really anal about following the rules.”

“Oh. Do planes have trunks? Where do you put your suitcases?”

“It has a cargo hold, which is a plane’s trunk,” he affirmed.

“So, you could bring stuff up with you?”

“Up to a point,” he said. “Personal planes aren’t good shipping planes, John. Everything’s about weight in a private plane, and there’s not much extra weight to play with. The plane only has an extra four hundred pounds of load rating if I fill up the gas tanks, and that four hundred pounds doesn’t go as far as you might think. That weight doesn’t include anything, not even the pilot. So stick two furs in there, and you’ve just eaten that four hundred pounds. Then add in their luggage, carry-ons, food, necessities, and the weight gets used up quick.”

“Yes, I see. But, with just two of you, you could put some extra luggage in the plane.”

“With just two of us packing light, yeah, we could. We’ll have about a hundred pounds of weight open to us. The old pilot’s assumption is two hundred pounds per fur with average baggage.”

“Kit, Jessie doesn’t weigh two hundred pounds,” John said with a chuckle. “If she’s an ounce over one twenty, I’d be amazed.”

“When you take her and add everything she’s carrying to it, like her suitcase, her purse, and our camera bag, and her laptop, and so on and so on, yeah, it gets pretty close to that,” he answered seriously.

“Ah, I didn’t think of that.”

“That’s where the weight goes,” Kit chuckled. “That and we’ll put some stuff in the cockpit that we might need, like an emergency kit, atlas, a blanket, that kind of thing. All of that adds to the weight too. Everything you put in the plane adds weight, and that’s the one thing a pilot never ignores.”

“Well, think you can take me and Hannah up for a flight? I’ve never been in a small plane before.”

“I’d love to,” Kit answered. “We can do a lap around Cincinnati.”

“It sounds like it’ll be fun.”

“Jessie wants a pilot’s license now,” Kit laughed, which earned him a light, playful smack on the knee. “What?”

“It’s not a joke!” she protested.

“I never said it was, pretty kitty! I just think it’s funny how quickly you decided you want one.”

“I take it she’s being mean to you?” John asked lightly.

“Eternally,” Kit answered in a suffering voice, which made John laugh.

“So, when will you get here?”

“It’ll depend on when we leave, which depends on when I get out of work on Saturday,” he answered. “Saturdays are kinda free-wheeling for me. I’m done when I get my work done, so it’ll come down to how much I have on my plate. We’ll fly back on Sunday night, since Jessie needs to be in school Monday morning. But she can sleep on the plane, so we can leave really late.”

“He never lets me miss even a single class,” Jessie complained to Vil, which made her laugh. John chuckled when he repeated her words to him.

“Good, I’m glad you’re keeping her on the path, Kit,” he said approvingly.

“That’s going to be much trickier when she starts coming to term,” Kit said, “and the baby’s gonna mess with her final semester, but we’ll manage. I won’t let Jessie get this close to her degree and quit now. She will graduate.”

“She’d better, or she’s gonna owe me and her mother sooo much money,” John said, which made Kit burst out laughing.

“Okay, trade me again,” Jessie said, and she took the phone while Kit sat back down at the computer.

“So, is it all good?” Kit asked, looking at his monitor.

“Everything’s right,” she affirmed. “You gonna get to work on that?”

“I have tomorrow off. It should all be done by close of business tomorrow,” he promised her.

“Sounds good, bro.”

“Kit! Dad wants to know if you can ask Rick to trade days off,” Jessie called. “Take Saturday off instead of Monday, and give us an extra day.”

“Yeah, I can do that, as long as they don’t mind picking us up really late,” he called back. “I still have a late day on Friday, you know.”

“Sounds like you should have fun up there,” Vil noted. “Jessie will get two whole days to listen to her mother carp about getting pregnant.”

“Hannah’s not nearly as opposed to it as I thought she would be,” Kit said musingly. “I’m sure she’s going to sit us down and have a very long talk about responsibility and taking care of the baby, but she seems honestly enthusiastic about the idea of being a grandmother.”

“You know she will,” Vil chuckled. “I’d take a copy of your portfolio statement with you to wave in her face when she starts complaining that you can’t afford the baby.”

Kit laughed. “That may not be a bad idea. She’ll know that even if I leave Jessie, she can always get half of our assets for the baby,” he winked.

“Like you’d ever leave Jessie,” Vil snorted. “You’re a Catholic. Doesn’t she understand what that means?”

“Well, we weren’t married under Catholic sacraments,” Kit noted. “No Catholic wedding, no need for an annulment.”

“Bro, you’re about ten seconds from getting slapped,” Vil warned in a very unfriendly tone.

“Sis, get real. I’ll never leave Jessie, and you know it.”

“Still, you don’t even joke about something like that,” she told him flatly. “Sometimes with you, it’s hard to tell what’s a joke and what’s not. Hannah doesn’t know you as well as I do, bro, and she’d flip out if she ever heard it.”

“I’m not stupid enough to ever say something like that in front of her.”

“At least you have that much sense,” she said with a nod. “Oh, by the way, Sheila and Muffy left here about five hours ago. They should be getting there any time now.”

“Today? Weren’t they supposed to leave yesterday? I thought they were just too busy clubbing or something to stop by and see us.”

“Yeah, but Sheila’s parents made her stay over for some reason, and Muffy decided to wait for her. Probably to grill her about her decision... they’re not too happy about it. They want her to stay in Harvard. But, they can’t deny that she’s determined, and I think in a way that makes them happy. They think she’s finally growing up.”

“Alright. Odds are, they’ll spend the evening over here. I’d better warn Jessie.”

“She already knows, I talked to her this morning.”

“Ah, that would explain why she’s done all that cooking. I thought she was just too excited to sit still.”

“Well, I’ll let you get to it, bro, I have some work to do here. A few reports to read, and a termination to write up.”

“Uh oh, who?” Kit asked.

“Kelly Parmon, senior vice president of safety,” she said, her face grim. “He let our ISO certification logs and paperwork get out of date, and I was some kind of pissed off when I found out.”

“How bad was the fine?”

“Fifty thousand dollars,” she fumed. “That’s a pink slip with no warning in this company.”

“Yeah, I’d say it is,” Kit agreed. “How on earth did he let that go?”

“Total absolute incompetence,” she growled, then she used several rather colorful adjectives to more fully describe her feelings. “It’s not like it's even that hard to keep that current!"

"Who are you promoting to take his place?"

"I'm going inside the family. Cousin Terry." Terry, or Kitstrom Terrence Vulpan, was the second child of uncle Tom. From what Kit remembered, he was twenty-one years old, just six months younger than Kit, and had graduated from Yale at the age of nineteen...and not because he slacked. Terry had skipped two grades in elementary school, and graduated from Yale in three years with a bachelor's in business. Last Kit heard, he was just starting his Master's courses at Yale, and was also looking into trying for Oxford the way Vil had done.

"Terry? How long has he been working at the shipyard?"

"About a year, but he's been pretty impressive," she said. "Right now he's a vice president over in accounting, and he runs a tight ship. Nothing but good performance reviews out of his department. I'm sure as hell not giving him the job because he's a Vulpan. That's not a rock job, cause the government will fine our asses to oblivion if he doesn't do it right. He earned his chance to prove himself, so I'm giving him some real responsibility and we'll see how he does."

"I think he'll do alright," Kit said. "Terry is one smart cookie."

"No doubt," Vil nodded. "He got through school faster than any of us did. He was only nineteen when he graduated from Yale with his Bachelor's, and he just finished his Master's degree in December."

"I'm surprised he decided to go into the company. I always thought he'd go off on his own."

“I think he will, but I’ll teach him as much as I can until he does,” she chuckled. “I won’t mind losing him as long as he goes out there and does something with himself, and also doesn’t go into business competing against me. Then I’d have to destroy him.”

Kit chuckled. “No mercy even for the family?”

“I’d come after him even harder, cause he should know better than to try to compete against me,” she snorted, which made him burst out into helpless laughter.

“Dear God, I married a barbarian and my sister is a heartless bitch. Where did I go so wrong?” he lamented.

“That’s Miss Heartless Bitch to you, buster,” she teased in reply. “Now, I really need to go, so I’ll talk to you later, bro.”

“Alright. Night sis. Love ya.”

“I love you too, you little pain in the ass,” she grinned, and then she disconnected the conference session.

Jessie was indeed cooking knowing that Sheila and Muffy were coming, for they arrived about a half an hour after he finished talking to Vil. They’d shed their winter clothes the instant they hit Austin, it seemed, for Muffy was wearing a halter and a miniskirt in the brisk forty-five degree evening, showing off a great deal of fur, and Sheila was wearing a Boston Bruins tee shirt and a pair of khaki shorts. “Muffy,” Kit greeted, giving her a warm hug, “how’s Boston treated you?”

“Coldly,” she giggled. “It’s been freezing up there! I’m glad to be down here for a couple of days.”

“What happened, though? I thought you were supposed to be here yesterday.”

“We were supposed to leave yesterday,” she growled, giving Sheila a strong look.

Sheila coughed uncomfortably. “Well, blame my mom and dad for that,” she said. “I got the freakin’ third degree from them. We were packed and like two seconds from catching a ride to the airport when my mom and dad waylaid me and made me explain everything to them again,” she sighed. “They tried to talk me out of it. Er, you do know, don’t you?”

“Of course we do, silly femme,” Kit chuckled. “Vil explained it to us. I have to say, I’m impressed, cousin. Your idea to go to both schools at the same time, that was impressive.”

“Thanks,” she said with a modest smile, coming over and hugging him as Muffy greeted Jessie, and got a friendly, warm hug, which startled his cousin a little.

“So, the infamous Party Pack loses a member,” Kit teased.

Sheila laughed. “Only temporarily,” she winked. “Besides, I can always start a new Party Pack down here. I’m an Austin Vulpan now, just like you.”

“Ooh, can I be a part-time member of your Party Pack, Sheila?” Muffy asked with a little bounce, entirely overacted.

Jessie laughed. “Stop being so silly!” she chided. “Are you two hungry? Dinner’s almost ready.”

“Oh, am I!” Muffy said, getting a bright smile. “What did you make?”

“Jambalaya,” she answered. “With garnished asparagus, stewed beets, beef tips and chunked potatoes, and home baked black bread. Oh, and I made us some cherry cobbler for dessert.”

“I haven’t had jambalaya in forever!” Muffy said with a big grin. “How did you know I like spicy food?”

“I didn’t,” she admitted with a giggle. “But Kit does, so I have to indulge him from time to time.”

“She made me a thank you dinner,” Kit laughed. “Because I was extra-nice to her.”

“You should be the one in there cooking for her,” Muffy teased, and she hugged Jessie again. “Congratulations, cousin-in-law!”

“Aww, thanks, hon,” Jessie said with a demure smile.

“Yeah, congrats you two!” Sheila added, hugging Kit, then hugging Jessie in turn. She put her paw on Jessie’s stomach and patted it gently. “You proved our cousin’s a real Vulpan, Jess, he knocked you up not three months after you were married!”

Jessie gave Sheila a prim look, but Muffy continued to dig. “If he was a real Vulpan, he’d have got her pregnant before they were engaged,” she announced.

“That would have been a real trick, since we were engaged so quickly after we entered that phase of our relationship,” Jessie said, her cheeks trying to ruffle.

“Well, Kit’s full of surprises, as well as a few other things,” Sheila said with a sly grin at her cousin, which earned her a punch on the arm from him.

They sat down to dinner not long afterward, and spent a very pleasant evening catching up with the goings-on up in Boston. Muffy had arranged to take two days off from school to come down to see him, and Sheila talked about all the work she had ahead of her enrolling in the University of Texas. “They have a great culinary arts program,” she said. “I looked around, and it’s the best one in Texas. It’s just nice that it’s where I want to live, too.”

“I’m still surprised that you want to move,” Muffy said.

“I love it here, Muff,” Sheila said sincerely. “Kit and Jessie are awesome family to have around, and I have a lot of great friends who don’t care that I’m a Vulpan. Between Jessie and Martha, I’ve already learned so much about cooking!” she said with a bright smile, turning to Jessie. “I cooked for Higgins last week, and he said I did really good!”

“That’s nice to hear, Sheila,” Jessie said supportively.

“Higgins has been helping me since I went back up, teaching me more about cooking. I wish he’d come down here,” she frowned. “But he doesn’t want to leave Boston.”

“He quit?”

“No, he was one of mom’s servants, so he’s going back to work in her house,” she answered. “I tried to get him to come down here, but I couldn’t convince him. I’ll just keep up with the maid service, and cooking for myself will give me plenty of practice, so I think I can manage. I still wish he would have come, though. I like Higgins. He’s a lot of fun for a butler.”

“How did you pull off that deal with Harvard?” Kit asked curiously.

“It took a lot of ass kissing, that’s for sure,” she laughed. “When that wasn’t enough, I had to start threatening to sic my mom on them if they didn’t give me what I wanted. That got them. They agreed to shadow me through the filler courses, and I do my business courses in what they call private tutoring,” she said, making ditto motions with her fingers. “It’s really me just emailing my homework and course assignments to a professor in the business college. I have to go up to Boston twice a semester to take a midterm and a final, and I also have to attend a full semester when I do my capstone project, they wouldn’t budge on that. But that’s okay, I should be able to manage it.”

“What do you mean by shadow?” Jessie asked.

“It’s a term that means cheating, basically,” Muffy answered. “Sheila will show up on the rolls of those classes, and won’t do any work in them, but will graduate with a C average in them on the books. She has to pay double the usual tuition for each course she wants to shadow, though.”

“Oh. Some of that under the table stuff Kit says Harvard does for the Vulpans.”

“Us and a few other very prominent and rich families,” Sheila nodded.

“Yale does it too,” Muffy added. “I’m shadowing a couple of courses this semester that I absolutely can’t stand.”

“The perks of being rich,” Sheila grinned. “Anyway, I’ll be taking only culinary arts courses at U.T. Well, those and the courses they require for a degree that Harvard credits won’t cover,” she added. “I’ll have to actually take those courses. Eww,” she said, making a face.

“You can’t cheat at my school,” Jessie grinned at her. “You’ll do the same work we do!”

“Another low point for the Vulpan family,” Sheila sighed. “Being just like normal people.”

Jessie gave her a startled look, then both Sheila and Muffy began to laugh. “Be nice,” Kit murmured. “Remember, she’s feeding you right now. That’s not a paw you want to bite.”

“Yes, I think I’ll have to make you something special next time,” Jessie warned.

Muffy grinned. “We’ll just bring antacid.”

“Cousin, there’s nothing you can bring to help when she makes that meal,” Kit said mildly, which made Jessie and Sheila giggle.

“Oh, do we speak from experience?” Muffy teased.

“I speak from the experience of never being dumb enough to send her to that spice rack,” he retorted.

“What are you planning to do while you’re here?” Jessie asked.

Sheila looked at Muffy, and they both grinned at Jessie. “Oh, we have plans,” she all but purred in reply.

“Oh dear,” Kit sighed. “Love, do we have any honey in the fridge?”

Jessie laughed. “It must be time to teach me the recipe for the famous Vulpan hangover tonic,” she giggled.

“Oh, those plans involve you, Jessie,” Sheila grinned. “In fact, they start in about a half an hour,” she added, looking at her delicate gold watch.

“What’s in a half hour?”

“The Top Hat opens,” Muffy said with a wicked smile.

Every single strand of fur on Jessie’s entire body frizzed out. “No way!” she gasped.

“Oh, yes we are,” Sheila told her with an evil grin. “You can’t get knocked up by someone else now, you’re a total free spirit! And we’re going to liberate you from this evil monogamy!”

“You wouldn’t dare!” she said in absolute mortification, standing up and glaring at the two of them. “I’d never ever do something like that no matter how drunk you get me, and I’m pregnant!” she shouted. “If either of you even try to give me a drink, I’ll beat you up!”

“Relax, love, they’re just teasing you,” Kit said calmly. “Or at least they’d better be,” he added threateningly.

The two Vulpan females laughed almost uncontrollably, Sheila nearly falling out of her chair. “Alright, we’re teasing about that, but you are going with us tonight!” she said. “It’s femme’s night! All the male strippers are going to be there, and you can’t miss it!”

“And you’ll be our designated driver,” Muffy added.

“I have class in the morning!”

“It’s only six thirty, you prude!” Sheila accused. “We can have a good three hours of harmless fun ogling naked males and still get you home in time to get to bed.”

“I will not!”

“Why not?” Kit asked her. “I think you’ll have fun.”

“You’re sending me to a strip club?” Jessie demanded, a little hotly.

“No, I’m sending you out with your friends,” he answered calmly. “If you happen to wander into the Top Hat, so what? I trust you, love. I know you’d never do anything foolish, and I’ve told you before, I have total faith in you. Did you have fun during your bachelorette party?”

“Well, yeah, but—“

“Then go have fun, my pretty kitty,” he told her, leaning over and kissing her on the cheek. “Besides, you’ll get home so hot and bothered that I’m guaranteed some action tonight.”

“Kit!” Jessie gasped, but then she laughed helplessly.

“See, you have official permission to be naughty!” Sheila said commandingly. “So let’s finish this wonderful dinner and get busy!”

“Oh, you can do me one favor,” Kit said.

“What is that?”

“Ask them if Allison still works there. I want to talk to her. If she does, either get her phone number or give them my Blackberry work number so she can call me. If she’s not, see if they’ll give me her contact number.”

“Woo, now he’s a Vulpan!” Sheila laughed. “Arranging his mistress in front of his wife!”

Kit gave her a nasty look, which made Muffy nearly spray jambalaya all over the table.

“What do you want to talk to Allison for?” Jessie asked.

“I want to interview her for a story,” he answered. “I can make her anonymous so nobody knows who I’m talking about and still publish her story. She’s a very, very interesting young femme, and I think she’d be the subject of an outstanding piece.”

“Sure, I can do that, cousin,” Sheila told him. “I’ll ask Benny, the bartender. He’ll know, and he can pass it on for you.” She narrowed her eyes. “Isn’t that the one that’s the chemistry Master’s student who pays for school by stripping and whoring?”

Kit nodded. “And that is why she’ll be such a good story.”

“Yeah, I’d have to agree,” Muffy said seriously.

Jessie gave him a curious look, but said nothing. Kit, seeing it there, headed it off by reaching over and putting his paw on her arm. “Trust me, love, as I trust you.”

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled, and she nodded.

Kit picked up the dishes for them after they left, and busied himself by checking to see if Rick had assigned him anything over the weekend. When his in box came up empty, he sat on the couch and practiced guitar, at least until his Blackberry rang. He didn’t know the number, so he answered it with his ritual greeting. “Lone Star magazine, Kit Vulpan.”

“Hello,” a femme’s voice called. “I was asked to call you.”

“Allison?” he asked.

“Yes.”

“Good. I’m not sure you remember me, but—“

“Kit Vulpan. Two different colored eyes, missing part of your ear. I danced for you at a party a few months ago.”

“So you do remember,” Kit chuckled. “Listen, I know this is going to sound unusual—“

“Yes.”

“Excuse me?”

“I agree. Your cousin explained what you wanted of me. As long as you guarantee my anonymity, I’ll do the interview.”

“Nice, nice. Thank you very much.”

“Be glad your cousin came tonight. This week is my last here.”

“Really? Moving on, moving up, or moving away?”

“Moving up. This is my last semester, and I told them I wouldn’t work here beyond that. They’ve known for two years. They pressed me on the issue, demanding I stay on, so I quit. I could have just walked out, but I agreed to work until Friday just so my regulars know and understand I’m leaving, and that I am not interested in any private arrangements.”

“I’m sorry to hear that.”

“Oh, it’s about time anyway. I have more than enough money saved now, I decided I’d work after I get my degree, and I don’t need this job anymore. It’s certainly not because I was doing it for fun.”

“Well, that’s something we’ll talk about during the interview,” he said, grabbing a note pad and jotting down some quick notes. “When would you like to meet?”

“Any time tomorrow after three, and any time between one and five from Tuesday to Friday is fine. After Friday, I won’t be here anymore, and I’ll have the whole weekend available.”

“Hmm. We’ll be out of town this weekend. Can you hold on a minute? I’ll call my wife and ask her if she wouldn’t mind inviting you to dinner tomorrow. If you don’t mind doing the interview with company, that is.”

“She’s right here, listening to me,” Allison said calmly. “Misses Vulpan, he wants to know if you mind if he interviews me tomorrow at your house during dinner.” Kit waited, a bit anxiously. “She agrees.”

“Good,” Kit sighed. “Don’t tell her this, but she’s just a little jealous of you. I’m going to interview you with her listening, so she doesn’t get the wrong idea.”

“I understand,” Allison said with a slight hint of amusement. “So, what time tomorrow?”

“How about six or so? I have some things to do that morning, but I should be done by then. We can interview while Jessie cooks, then have a good meal.”

“That’s fine. What’s your address?” Kit gave her his address, Blackberry number, and detailed directions on how to get to the apartment from the university. “I have it. Hold on.”

“Kit?” Jessie’s voice came over the phone.

“Pretty kitty,” he said. “I do hope you don’t mind.”

“I understand, love,” she said sincerely. “And thank you. You’re so sweet, thinking of me.”

“I always think of you, my love,” he said impulsively. “Do you mind terribly cooking for Allison?”

“I’d be happy to. And I’ll get to hear her story, too.”

“You can get a head start, you know. She seems to be right there in front of you.”

Jessie laughed. “Sheila would kill me if I spend all my time in this private room talking to Allison and not out there watching naked guys gyrating around the room.”

“What’s she doing there, anyway? I thought it was femme’s night.”

Jessie repeated that to Allison, then there was a long silence. “She, umm, said that they entertain the males who came with the femmes upstairs. So she’s working tonight.”

“Ah. Alright, I won’t hold you away from the fun, pretty kitty. Go out there and ogle to your heart’s content.”

“There’s only one male I like to ogle,” she said with shy daring, being a little bold but a bit self-conscious because Allison could hear her.

“Well, get all charged up so I can enjoy it when you come home and do that.”

“Kit!” she gasped, then she laughed. “Hold on, this is her phone.”

“Mister Vulpan?” Allison’s voice called.

“Allison. Be nice to my wife, she’s a touch shy.”

“I noticed,” she said knowingly, which made Kit chuckle. “Tomorrow at six, then?”

“We’ll be ready for you. And my wife is an awesome cook,” he added.

“I’m looking forward to testing your claim,” she said. “Goodbye.”

She hung up before he could respond.

Kit chuckled. Now that was an interesting young femme.

Jessie got home around eleven, and much as he predicted, she was very amorous. As much as she said she only had eyes for him, he knew that she was as red-blooded as any other femme, and no femme could look at the fine hunks of male a place like the Top Hat would employ and not get bandy...unless she was some kind of religious zealot or frigid. And Jessie was neither of those. Jessie did indeed give him a wild time, but she wasn’t quite so fun when she woke up that morning and had to go to school. She was almost like a little kid, groaning and pulling the pillow over her head, hiding from reality. “Nnnnnoooooo,” she whined when the alarm went off. “Ten more minutes!”

“Up and at ‘em, tiger!” Kit called from the hallway. “You have school!”

“Nnnoooo!!!!” she moaned groggily, rolling over on her stomach and pulling the pillow tighter over her head.

Kit rolled in and yanked the covers off of her, baring her gorgeous long-haired tail and exquisite backside. She kicked her feet jerkily, then slid halfway up onto her knees with her head still under the pillow, which revealed all kinds of very interesting things to him when her tail flicked up. “Pretty kitty. Love. Either you get up right now, or you’re going to miss class for an entirely different reason.”

She froze, realized what kind of position she was in, then laughed helplessly under the pillow. “Alright, I’m getting up,” she said, putting her tail down and rising up onto her knees, then she looked back at him over her shoulder and winked.

“You little tease,” he accused as he went back down the hall. “Breakfast in five minutes!”

As usual, he had breakfast ready for her by the time she was out of the bedroom and at least partially awake. A strong cup of tea and a ham and onion omelet awaited her, and she flopped down in the chair wearing nothing but a robe barely belted in the front, leaving half her considerable cleavage hanging out. “How long will it take you to get all those finances done?” she asked.

“I should be done around three or so,” he answered. “What do you want me to pick up for dinner?”

“Let’s give her something nice,” she said with a yawn. “Grilled salmon with lemon and rosemary, au gratin potatoes, steamed broccoli with cheese sauce, and you can bake an angel food cake for dessert with cinnamon chocolate icing. Oh, and shrimp scampi for an appetizer.”

“Oooh, going for the throat, eh?” he chuckled.

She just gave him a grin. “You need to be reminded who feeds you when you’re looking at her boobs.”

He laughed, leaned over the table, and pulled her robe open. “These are the only boobs I care to look at,” he winked.

“Suuure,” she teased, slapping his paws away. “And who sent me to go ogle naked males last night?”

“So, you’ll let me ogle Allison?”

“Only if you do to me afterwards what I did to you last night when I got home,” she said roguishly.

He laughed. “You have a deal, pretty kitty,” he told her. “I’ll drag you into the bedroom and ravish you the instant we push her out the door.”

“I can live with that,” she smiled. “And I’m glad you invited her to dinner. Both to keep me from getting jealous, and so I can meet her outside of that place. She was naked when you were talking to her!” she said, slightly scandalized. “Just sitting there on the couch like that was entirely normal!”

“It was for her, love,” he told her simply.

“She had her naked butt on a velour couch!” she said. “I was afraid to sit on it! Who knows who sits on that couch and doesn’t wipe properly!”

Kit almost fell out of his chair laughing.

He sent her to school on time, and then got to work. He had a lot to do, and since he had a dinner appointment, he had to finish in time to get the shopping done. He got the first parts of it done, and that was where Vil would help him. She placed orders for all the stocks they planned to buy, and as soon as he had the cash, he would wire it to her to cover it. Vil could buy the stocks at a vastly reduced fee, given she could buy them using the company and its buying power. It was a service the company offered to its executives as well, so it wasn’t like they were doing anything illegal. Vil was just using her own policy to buy stocks herself, which she would then sell to her brother at cost. After that was done, Kit called the same accounting firm that handled the taxes for the magazine, whom Rick trusted, and he contracted the services of an accountant who would help them do their taxes next year. Kit wanted to hire them now, so he had his spot as a client and his accountant would be waiting for him come January; it was always best to be a client well before the tax season rush.

He was standing outside the bank waiting when it opened, however. The teller was a bit mystified when he presented the bonds, and it took a manager to assure her that the bank did in fact cash them; they were fairly rare. The manager helped him personally after she realized he had fifteen of them. She cashed the bonds, and he scratched two tasks off his list when he bought four certificate of deposits of maturation times between 30 days and six months for a total of $15,000, and opened a money market account with an initial deposit of $10,000. The CDs were basically “wait and see” investments, short-term no-risk investments with low returns that basically gave him money something to do while he waited to see if any better investment opportunities came along, like perhaps some real estate investments when the real estate market bubble burst and real estate values crashed, which would put investors in a prime position to snap up deflated property and hold onto it for when the markets rebounded. He also bought a safe deposit box—they miraculously found an open box for him despite a nearly year-long waiting list—and he put the CD certificates directly into the box. He walked out of the bank with checks and two debit cards for the new account on order, and the balance minus $25,000 in his old account, with plans to keep his original account open to handle day to day expenses and pay bills.

Sometimes it was funny what money could accomplish. Jessie would normally need to be there with him when he opened a new account, but they accommodated him by simply pulling the signature card and Jessie’s vital information for their original checking account and using it for the new account, which let him open the joint account without her being with him. And they only did it for him because he intended to keep around $25,000 in their bank, ten in the account and fifteen in the CDs he'd just purchased.

After finishing at the bank, he visited a brokerage and bought two commodities. The first commodity he bought was precious metals; he bought $9,000 worth of gold and platinum. Those were the most stable metals with solid track records of increasing value over time, and were stable investments. The second commodity he bought was treasury bonds, guaranteed government bonds that had a good rate of return if one bought 30-year bonds; though not the best way to invest to make money, their rock-solid guaranteed maturation made them a very solid foundation for any portfolio. Kit bought $20,000 worth of 30-year treasury bonds, which he could also sell before maturity if necessary. Combined with the precious metals, Kit had built a solid foundation for his portfolio, guaranteed money that grow steadily and dependably over time.

The CDs and Treasury bills were the “stability” portion of his investment plan, which would appreciate slowly but steadily over time. He had already started on the “risky” portion with the gold and platinum, though precious metals weren't really as risky...but weren't absolutely guaranteed to appreciate in value. So, Kit classified them as “risk.” Since he now had the commodities bought, he returned to the bank and placed the bills and metals vouchers showing his ownership of the metals—those would come later, he demanded it delivered to the bank rather than allow some company hold the metals for him—told the manager the metals would be delivered directly to the bank in two days, and then moved on to the next phase. That was to return home, and wait for Vil to get confirmation to know how much he owed her; often her agents on the floors of the exchanges would delay making a buy if they thought they could get a better price. And her brokers actually came through. They saved Kit nearly four hundred dollars by going on their own instincts and catching several of his stocks at inter-day lows, buying them at their cheapest that day. Sure, waiting to buy a stock after it fell by six cents wasn't much, but when one bought a thousand shares of that stock, those pennies added up fast. When they bought all the stocks Vil had ordered bought, she added it up, and Kit called the bank and arranged the wire transfer of that sum to her, which was $64,427.24.

After adding everything up, and including brokerage fees, safe deposit box rental, and other expenses, he invested a grand total of $117,484.01 of the $117,793.28, which led to a tidy $309.27 net deposit into his regular checking account. He had cut it almost razor-fine, but their planned investment expenditures had come in under the initial capital.

All because of careful planning.

“Is that it, bro?”

“Yeah, that's it,” he said, looking at the clock and seeing that he had twenty minutes left before 3:00pm, which was when he had to go buy the food for tonight's dinner. “And I even finished on time.”

“You got everything?”

“Yup. Money market account open, safe deposit box bought, CDs bought, T-bonds bought, gold and platinum bought, all our stocks are bought, and I contracted an accountant to help do our taxes next year. It's a nearly sixty percent high risk, forty percent low risk balanced portfolio, at least for now since nearly fifteen percent of the capital is available for reinvestment. You gonna courier those stock certificates to me when you get them?”

“They should be in your hands by Wednesday,” she promised. “What’s the grand total?”

“I have a little over three hundred dollars left,” he said, a bit proudly.

“We nailed it, then,” she giggled.

“We did indeed. Well done, sis. I expected nothing less when you’re the one helping with the planning.”

“Well, you’re solvent now, bro. It’s about time. Now, what is this dinner you’re making? Making something special for Jessie?”

“Kit chuckled. “The truth? I’m inviting over a stripper and prostitute to interview her for a story I’m writing.”

Vil gasped, then laughed richly. “You have to be joking!”

“Not a little bit,” he answered.

“And Jessie knows about this?”

“She’s cooking.”

“Dear God, bro, what did you put in her orange juice?”

“Jessie’s a little curious about this one,” Kit told her. “She works at that sex club Sheila used for my bachelor party. She was a stripper who’d whore out to the clients in the club, their highest-priced femme, and she used the money to get a Master’s degree at U.T.”

“Okay, now that’s unusual.”

“And thus why I want to get her story,” he finished. “She’s a drop dead gorgeous vixen, sis, and I mean gorgeous. Jessie’s just a little jealous of her because I’m showing interest in another femme, but my interest is only for the story, not for her. That’s why she agreed to invite her over. If I interview her with Jessie here, she’ll see she has nothing to be jealous about.”

“So she can keep an eye on you,” Vil chuckled.

“Which is why I offered the interview over dinner, so Jessie could be here to make sure I behave.”

“Clever.”

“You didn’t raise a fool,” he chuckled.

“No, I did not. I’ll let you go get your shopping done. I’ll have the courier arrive at the magazine around lunchtime Wednesday, so you can take the stocks straight to the safe deposit box.”

“I’ll be waiting. Vil.”

“Yeah?”

“Thank you. You just ensured our children get their degrees. I owe you so much for all the help you’ve given me over the years, I don’t know how to ever repay you.”

“For you, bro, anything. Anytime. Anywhere. If you would let me, I’d put you in a mansion and give you every penny I got out of Dad’s will, but I know you’d never let me. Despite that, you are my family, and I love you, no matter what.”

“I love you too, sis.”

“Call me after you finish the interview. Tell me how it went.”

“You got it. Talk to you tonight.”

“Tonight then. Bye bro.”

“Bye.”

Kit blew out his breath, turning the phone over in his paw. It was done. In one day, he had executed the investment strategy he and Vil had drawn up. With her help and a lot of legwork, he had gotten it all done in only one day. Truth be told, it wasn't that hard. The commodities were easy to buy, as the same brokerage offered to sell both of them to him. The work at the bank wasn't hard because it was all in one place. The most difficult part of it all would have been buying the stocks, but thanks to Vil and her contacts, the brokers she sent out onto the floor of the exchanges to buy those stocks directly, she had saved him a lot of time and a considerable amount of money.

God, he loved his sister.

Allison was a very interesting young femme. In some ways, she reminded Kit of Sheila, Vil, Jessie, and Sam, all rolled into one. She was highly intelligent—to call her a genius wouldn't be far from the mark—but she had a remarkably practical and grounded outlook on life. Her practicality was her most pervasive trait, an almost brutal pragmatism that had led her into the life of a stripper and prostitute; she had seen that stripping and selling her body for sex was the most lucrative profession available to her, more than able to cover her tuition and keep her in a comfortable lifestyle. She could be coquettish and playful, but it was just an act. In ways, her almost detached outlook, a nearly emotionlessness, reminded him of Vil, when she was fully wrapped up in the persona of the Ice Queen. She had a very sensible and clinical approach to things, from eating to conversation, which was much like Sam's well ordered personality. But, she did have a delightfully wicked and understated sense of humor, which reminded him of Sandy. She was as fearless as Sheila, but outside of the club, she was as well-mannered and urbane as Jessie, with exquisite manners and a sense of nearly wholesome propriety. Foxy Firetail the stripper, her stage name, was just an act, a mask she wore, for Allison Gallagher was a very, very different young femme when she was at school.

Jessie was quite surprised to see her stepping in the front door wearing not a miniskirt, not a bustier, but a sensible blouse and a calf-length pleated brown wool skirt. Granted, her blouse and skirt did flatter her formidable figure, but the clothes themselves were very modest.

Kit greeted her, bade her to sit on the couch, and while Jessie cooked for them—he had baked the cake and put the tips and potatoes on before Jessie got home—they talked. He didn't need notes or research to know what he wanted to ask her, so he went through every question that had rolled around in his head since the night he met her. Allison was blunt, direct, and very honest, telling him things that elicited gasps from Jessie in the kitchen, and no doubt caused his pretty kitty's cheek fur to perpetually stand on end. She described her past, coming from a broken home of a father that abandoned them when she was thirteen and an abusive mother, who she left the instant she turned eighteen to let her mother sink herself into her addiction to drugs, and how the pitiful sight of her mother, a strung-out junkie, turned her away from a similar fate. She described graduating from high school and seeing how she would have to be smart, smart and practical, in order to earn the college degree she knew was her ticket to a better life. She talked about how she got into the business, how it worked, and what it was like to be a stripper and a prostitute. She talked about the Top Hat and how she earned almost obscene amounts of money stripping and having sex with the members, money that paid for her schooling, kept her in a small, modest yet well built little house in north Austin she owned outright, allowed her to drive a Lexus when not at school and a cheap used Toyota Camry while at school (so as to hide her money), and had put nearly $65,000 in cold hard cash in the bank at the age of 23, all of it spread through wise and well-reasoned investments that earned her a decent return. She told him about her fears, about her almost monthly medical screenings for AIDS and other diseases, and her many fights with patrons over them using condoms, which was her inviolate rule. “No rubber, no fun,” was her motto. She told them with calm reserve about the four times she’d been raped within the Top Hat by irate patrons who refused her condom rule, and how justice was never pursued against the rapists. The worst that happened was that they were barred from the club from then on. After all, how could she cry rape without exposing the club and losing her income? She told them about the lonely life she led, since she couldn’t really socialize with anyone at school. How could she risk getting too close to a fellow student and having them find out the truth? The only real friends she had were fellow workers at the Top Hat, who shared her occupation and shared her unique outlook. Only a fellow stripper could understand the dangers and hazards the stripper’s life held. But, Allison was much, much smarter than most anyone in the Top Hat, so she felt a little lonely sometimes. The other femmes couldn’t really relate to her as they could to each other. They were a little intimidated by her. While they wasted their money on useless toys, clothes, drugs, and other frivolities, Allison had invested the money she didn’t use on school and living expenses, and she was sharp. She had built a portfolio as diversified and insightful as the portfolio Kit had assembled that very day.

Kit wrote her summary of her life word for word out of her mouth. “My body earns the money, but my mind does something useful with it.”

She described an average day in the life of a high-priced prostitute in great detail to him. As he dictated her words into his laptop, she described going to school and doing her homework like any other student, teaching two entry-level chemistry classes both for a little cover for her true income and to help her in her own field of study, and then putting aside Allison Gallagher, graduate student and student teacher, and becoming Foxy Firetail, stripper and prostitute, performing an internal transformation, going from demure, quiet, femme-next-door femme to a seductive, sophisticated, and extremely sexy vixen who earns upwards of five hundred dollars a night stripping, and a thousand dollars an hour selling her body. She admitted quite calmly that one night, she took home nearly seven thousand dollars, and that was after the Top Hat took its twenty percent of her tips and the one quarter of her prostitution proceeds; that was the success of the Top Hat, she explained, that they took only a small percentage of their male and female workers, which attracted highly attractive workers. By attracting the most attractive workers, they catered to those with lots of money, who spent large amounts of money in their club. Allison told them about one night where there was a party, and the Top Hat took in nearly forty thousand dollars, and that was net. The actual amount of money that changed paws that night was close to two hundred thousand dollars. It was a huge party for a visiting millionaire, thrown by an Austin millionaire, and attended by quite a few other millionaires. Absolutely vast amounts of money were flowing through that club, making it truly a club for the rich to play with beautiful or handsome playthings and satisfy their carnal fantasies.

They took a break for dinner. Allison wasn't entirely impressed with the "fancy" dinner Jessie planned for them, for she was much like Kit, accustomed to eating exotic, rich meals. But her disinterest in the menu changed quickly when she tasted the salmon. "Oh my," she breathed. "Kit, you were not lying. Jessie, you are a fabulous cook!"

"Thank you," Jessie said with a demure smile. "I wanted to make you something really nice, and, well, I'm a cat, so to me nice is seafood."

They enjoyed a sumptuous meal, talking about nothing in particular, and Allison actually laughed when they produced the cake for her. "You'll ruin my figure, and my figure is my living!"

"Not anymore it's not," Kit reminded her.

She actually giggled. "You're right. One big slice, please."

She was startled when she found out that Kit was the one that made the cake. "I'm a lucky femme, Allison. I found a male that can actually cook," Jessie said with a fond smile at Kit. "I had to train him a little bit, but he's turned out rather well."

"I think he did," she agreed.

After dinner, they resumed the interview. Allison continued to describe the daily life of a student by day, hooker by night in frank, explicit detail, and even touched on how her life affected her personality. "I guess you can call me jaded," she said simply. "I don't believe in the innocence of fur any longer. I don't look at males and wonder what if any longer. I sometimes enjoy the sex, but it's just a feeling, a sensation. There's no love anymore, at least not for me,” she said soberly, reflectively, swirling wine bought just for her in her glass as they sat on the couch. “Furs lost being fur in a way to me.”

“Believe me, that’s something I can understand,” Kit said, almost grimly, glancing at Jessie. That was almost exactly how he felt about his family.

“Why is that?” she asked.

Jessie looked at him, and just nodded. “I don’t know if you know of my family, Allison, but my relationship to my family is just as jaded.” He told her about his history with his family, and the towering hatred he had for all of them except his sister and a handful of cousins he either liked or against which harbored no ill will. “So, all that money, and what do I have to show for my family? This,” he said, pointing at his damaged ear. “My family isn’t a family, Allison. It’s a collection of greedy, hedonistic, egotistical foxes who are bound together by their arrogance and their common name.”

“And you live like we do?”

“I used to,” he admitted. “But my father’s will was voided, and that allowed my sister to give me the bonds my mother bought for me when I was born, which I cashed out for a little over a hundred grand. It’s the only money I would ever accept from my family, because it came from my mother, and I’d insult her memory not to take it and use it for my family. It’s all invested now for the future, so I can provide everything our children will ever need. That money isn’t for us, it’s for our children. I’ll still work and we’ll still live off my salary—”

“And mine, when I graduate,” Jessie added.

“And Jessie’s,” Kit nodded. “But the money I inherited from my mother will never be mine. It belongs to our children.”

“That’s a very beautiful act. You’re a very strange couple,” she said honestly. “You, born from the rich, who hate the very money most others dream of having themselves. And you, a demure and shy femme who moves with seductive grace because you’re jealous of me, afraid I might steal away your husband.”

Jessie’s cheek fur bloomed in a furious blush.

“And you’re a femme who grew up like the rest of us, but also see money through your husband’s viewpoint rather than your own.”

“I used to, but when I saw Kit’s family, I finally understood what he meant. From that moment on, I haven’t had a single thought about his family’s money. We’re better off without it.”

“But now you do have money,” she noted.

“It’s not our money. It’s our baby’s money,” she said, putting her paw on her stomach unconsciously. “We’re going to have a baby, Allison. And that money is for our babies, not for us. That’s why Kit locked it all away in investments, so there’s enough to send all of our children through college when they’re old enough. This one won’t be the only one,” she said, giving Kit a loving smile.

“Congratulations on your blessing,” Allison said with a smile and a nod to them.

“Thank you,” they said in unison, and they both laughed. “So, we’ll live as we always lived, on our salaries, while the money given to us by Kit's mother will let our children go to Harvard if they want to," Jessie finished.

"A very responsible plan."

"We're responsible furs," Kit chuckled. "And we're just like any parents anywhere. We care more about our children than we do ourselves. Besides, it's not like we'll be living out of soup cans. We make a decent living, and I love my job."

"I can only hope I like my next job more than my last one."

"If it's what you want to do, how can you not like it?" Jessie asked simply.

"Hopefully. I was looking at either two to three more years in the Top Hat before I had enough invested to retire, or taking my degree and looking for a real job. I think that a job gotten from a Master's degree would take me maybe eight to ten years before I have enough saved to retire."

"Then what?"

"Honestly? I don't know," she shrugged. "Maybe I'll open a little bar somewhere, or a bed and breakfast. Or maybe I'll let my practical side take over and get involved in the sex trade from the provider side rather than the worker side. I think I'd make a fairly effective madam," she said with a slight smile. "To me, retirement means freedom. Freedom to do whatever I want. Even if I have no idea what to do, to me, it means that I've made it. I can do nothing if I want, sit around, get fat, and watch TV until I keel over from a heart attack. But I'll have earned that right."

They were quiet a long moment, and then Kit sighed and leaned back. "I'd say you have," Kit said. "I'll try to run this in the Friday edition, Allison. I should have the article finished by tomorrow. Tomorrow, I want you to come by here, or stop by my office, and review the article to make sure you agree to it, that I've made it sufficiently vague enough to protect your identity. You'll have total control over it, Allison. If you want anything changed, its gets changed. If you want me to kill the article completely, it dies."

"I can live with that," she said with a nod.

"Just call me when you're ready to come see the article. You still have my number?" She nodded. "Then call when you're ready. If I'm done, I'll let you read it. If I'm not, I'll let you see what I have and give me feedback on if you like what you see."

"Alright. I teach a class at one, so I'll call you around three. Is that alright?"

"That's just fine," he assured her. "I'll be in my office then, but if you don't want anyone there to see you, we can meet wherever you want."

"That works for me. How about John's Pizza? Do you know where that is?"

Kit and Jessie traded a look, then laughed. "We had our second date there," Jessie told her.

"I know where it is. I'll meet you there at three thirty. That sound good?"

"I can make it."

"Do you mind if I come too? I'd like to see the article."

“You’re welcome to,” Allison told her with a nod. “But I rather expect your husband will show it to you long before I see it.”

Jessie laughed. “I guarantee you, he’ll retreat into the den the second you leave, and I won’t see him again until tomorrow morning,” she grinned. “Then he’ll hustle me off to school and run to work, and he’ll shut himself up in his office and won’t come out until he either finishes or it’s time to meet you.”

“She knows me well,” Kit chuckled.

“You really think it’s that good of a story?”

“Allison, I’ve heard more stories than you can imagine, and none of them are as compelling as yours. I just hope I can do it proper justice.”

“Well, we’ll see if you can,” she said, sipping on her wine.

“Just answer me one thing, Allison,” Jessie said, quite seriously. “Why did you tell us your story?”

“Because life is a transient thing, Jessie. If I were to die tomorrow, then no one would ever know. And I think I’d like at least one fur to know. Or two, in this case,” she smiled. “If I say no to the article, at least you know. And for some reason, that makes me feel...better.”

Jessie got up, walked over to the chair in which Allison was sitting, then leaned down and kissed her wordlessly on the cheek. “And I feel better knowing your story,” she said seriously.

“Well...thank you, Jessie,” she said, with sudden, surprising demureness. “I should get going. I have a lab in the morning, and a class to teach. Tomorrow, three thirty, John’s Pizza.”

“We’ll be there,” Kit said with a nod, then he stood up and offered his paw to her. She took it and allowed him to help her to her feet, then he walked her to the door. “Thank you for a wonderful evening, Allison, and the privilege of hearing your story.”

She laughed suddenly. “Strange, the way things work. When I first met you, it was your trying to talk to me, with no expectations, no reservations, that made me give you my real name, told you what I did then. You made me feel...important. And that made me want to tell you something I’ve never told another living soul.”

“We’re all important, Allison,” he told her. “And don’t think that just because I’ve heard your story, I never want to talk to you again. You have my number. You know where we live. When you want to talk, if you want to just come over and hang out, you know where we are.”

“And you’ll always be welcome here,” Jessie said with total sincerity. “Our door is always open for you.”

“That’s very kind of you,” she said with a smile. “But I’m not sure I’ll ever accept that offer.”

“It’s there anyway,” she replied calmly.

“I’ll keep that in mind,” she said. She shook Kit’s paw, then Jessie’s paw, and then she opened the door. “Good night, and thank you.”

“We’ll see you tomorrow,” Kit told her.

She nodded and walked out. They watched her go, and Kit put his arm around Jessie, watching from the door as she got into her Lexus, and then drove away. “What do you think?” he asked her.

“That’s the most fascinating, and messed up, femme I’ve ever met,” she said with sincere pity. “If anyone ever desperately needed a friend, it’s her. She’s totally alone, and she’s shut herself off from everyone. But it’s like she just shut that part of herself away, and when she retires, she’s going to go looking for it again. Like it’s her second chance to find herself, without any responsibilities or distractions.”

“That’s exactly what she’s like. She gave up a part of herself when she sacrificed her morality to pursue her goal of getting a degree. And now, she wants to find herself again now that she doesn’t need to hide behind her mask anymore. That’s why she opened up to us. She’s starting down the road that will lead her back to herself, and she had to admit what she was to herself instead of hiding from it behind a false front.”

“Why do we seem to keep coming across femmes like her?” Jessie asked curiously. “First Sheila, now her.”

Kit gave her a look, then shook his head soberly. “They’re nothing alike. Only on the surface. Underneath, Allison is nothing like Sheila.”

“True,” she agreed after a moment’s thought.

Jessie was absolutely right about Kit. Five minutes after Allison was gone, Kit was in the study, poring over the copious notes he wrote in his laptop. He spent nearly an hour organizing them, arranging them, and then he started on the outline of the article.

He decided immediately that to maintain the impact of the article, certain truths had to remain, but he could protect Allison by being intentionally misleading about where and when he met Allison. He would claim that Allison was merely one of the many furs he met on his six months of working his way across America, meeting her “somewhere between Atlanta and Austin.” He would tell her story from the past tense, as if it was already over, and that Allison had been retired from prostitution for some time. He also decided to intentionally change her breed. Allison would transform into a ferret for the article, though still quite attractive; he knew how to describe a femme ferret to make her sexy. He could do all of this because of the disclaimer that appeared with all his Through My Eyes articles; that the stories told may not be real, though the furs that told them most certainly were. That disclaimer gave Kit license to change many relevant facts about Allison to protect her anonymity.

He decided on a title for it: Second Chances.

After he had his planned changes noted in his outline and notes, he began. He worked almost without interruption, stopping only to go to the bathroom and make himself tea. Jessie knew better than to bother him or wait up for him, so she went to bed and left him to his work. He wrote, and wrote, and wrote, telling the story of Allison’s life in simple, almost simplistic terms, focusing on the events, but never forgetting about the femme who experienced those events. He highlighted Allison’s resolve, her drive, and in a way, the hard choices she made when she abandoned sentimentality for hard practicality, giving particular focus to that fateful moment when she realized that working as a stripper and prostitute was the most economical means of achieving her goal, embracing pragmatism over morality, giving up the dream of love and, while not becoming hard or cold, instead becoming aloof, separating herself from a job she despised, and forced to maintain that illusion to hide that job from the rest of society until it became second nature to her, until she became so wrapped up in protecting herself behind a persona, she lost the real femme inside her for a time...but she also had no regrets. She had survived, even thrived, and her success made her happy in her own way, filled the void caused by the sacrificing of a child's dream. Hers was not a happy story, but it had something of a happy ending in that she had survived her time buried in the dark underside of American society, and had come out of it both emotionally unscarred and financially well off. She had given up the child's dream and the hope of love to pursue her goal, but she had gained independence and freedom in return. To her, that was a fair trade, since now that she was independent and wealthy, she had time to rediscover the child's dream, and find within her the ability to love. Hers was an innocence sacrificed, but a hope maintained, for everything she had done was done with the goal of retiring and having the chance to discover the true femme buried for so long within her, to find out who she was, who she really was.

Gaining a second chance for happiness.

He realized he finished the article, but it was nine pages long, so he went back and tried to edit it. He chopped it up and rewrote it, keeping select passages and paragraphs intact, and again he found it running nearly ten pages, which was way too big to be an article.

All through the night, he worked on it. He redrafted, and redrafted, and redrafted, edited it down, and still could not get it under seven pages without completely destroying the essence of the article. Allison's story was so hard to tell in just a few words. Few words did it a grave injustice.

He drafted it again, and making a few painful choices, he cut it down to five pages. After he got it to five pages, he scrubbed his face and realized that he had to make breakfast for Jessie. It was almost 7:00am. He'd been up all night writing, and aside from an achy back, he was not tired in the slightest. He was too excited, too absorbed in his work to even feel tired. He rushed into the kitchen and put on some eggs, sausage, and toast for Jessie, made her a pot of tea, and then found her already up, droopy-tailed, heading for the bathroom. “Breakfast’s on the stove, don’t let it burn,” he said, hurrying back to the den. He transferred all his work into his laptop, and was on his way to work with just a quick kiss on Jessie’s cheek as she dragged herself into the kitchen. He was the first one in, so he left the door unlocked and hurried to his office, then transferred all his work into his workstation and went back to work. He kept rewriting passages and trying to edit, but could not get it under five pages no matter what he did.

The door opened, and Rick looked inside. “Son, it’s nearly eleven, and you haven’t even come out to get your tea. What’s wrong?”

“I...have a problem,” he said. “Come in. Close the door.”

Rick gave him a curious look, but did what Kit asked. Kit brought up his original article, the unedited one, which was nine pages long, then brought up the edited five page article. “Read these. Then tell me what the hell to do.”

Rick took Kit’s chair when he vacated it, then he read the article. His expression never changed for over twenty minutes. He then read the edited article, and again, his expression never changed. After nearly forty minutes, he leaned back in the chair, his expression neutral, but his eyes reflective. He then picked up the phone and dialed a number. “Dan. Rick. My next issue is going to run long, just to warn you. It looks like it’ll run about forty pages. I just wanted to give you a head’s up. Okay. Later, friend.” He hung up the phone, and looked at Kit. “We run the long one,” he said. “There’s no way you can edit that piece, Kit. No way. It’s...wow.”

“Don’t make plans for it yet,” Kit said. “I have to get final approval.”

“From who?”

He gave Rick a steady look.

“I see. When will you know?”

“This afternoon. I’m meeting Jessie for a late lunch at three thirty. I’ll know after it’s over.”

“Call me the instant you know.”

“I will.”

Kit was at John’s Pizza at two, with his laptop. He sat in a booth and nursed the same glass of tea, exhausted but pleased, just sitting and reading the article over and over, looking for ways to edit it, tweak it, try to do it more justice. He was so absorbed that he was honestly startled when Allison knocked on the table, making him snap his head up. She was wearing a baggy tee shirt and a pair of faded jeans, and to his surprise, a pair of silver rim glasses. “You’re early,” she noted.

“I am? I am. What time is it?”

“Three fifteen,” she answered. “Are we eating?”

“Yeah. Yeah,” he said, motioning for her to sit opposite him in the booth. “Here. Read this,” he said, turning the laptop towards her. “I’ll order us a pizza. What kind do you like?”

“Anything,” she said with a negligent wave of her paw.

Kit ordered them a large pepperoni pizza, and waited at the counter for it, almost afraid to go back to the booth. Fortunately, though, he didn’t have to wait long, for John's kept pizzas all but ready to bake. Ten minutes later, the pizza was ready, and he carried it back to the booth. Jessie was there now, quiet, waiting patiently as Allison read from his laptop, her expression sober. He received a kiss from Jessie on the muzzle as he set the pizza down, and she reached for a slice. "Have you eaten at all today, my handsome fox?" she asked in a subdued tone.

"I...I don't know," he said, a little wearily.

"Here. Eat!" she commanded, pushing the slice at him.

"I'm not hungry," he said. "Not yet, anyway. I'm too nervous."

She gave him a compassionate look, then tore a piece of cheese off the tip and pushed it slowly and gently against his lips. He nibbled at it, and as if that one taste unleashed a monster inside him, he was suddenly ravenously hungry. She gave him the piece of pizza, and he attacked it like a man dying of hunger. She took a piece herself and ate it with her usual speed, but she kept her eyes on Allison.

After what seemed like an eternity to Kit, Allison finally raised her eyes from the screen of his laptop. She said nothing, for a long, long time. Kit felt his heart was about to leap out of his throat, that he was about to throw up the piece of pizza he'd just eaten, and then she gave a single, eloquent nod.

Then she said something that totally baffled him. "Why a ferret?" she asked.

He was dumbstruck. He tried to find words, which came out as several incoherent rasps, then he laughed helplessly. "Why not?" he asked.

“Can he use it?” Jessie asked, wanting to hear her say it for some reason.

She nodded. “I’m...touched, Kit.” She reached down for a piece of pizza, then took a bite out of it.

“Do you want me to make any changes?” he asked.

She shook her head while chewing, swallowed, then said “no. It’s fine just as it is.”

“Did I do it justice?”

“I think you did. But what is my opinion?” she shrugged. “Here, Jessie. Your turn,” she said.

“Good, cause I haven’t seen it yet,” she said, turning the laptop around and scrolling the article back to the top. Kit and Allison ate in silence, the calm silence of two people content to share a meal and not discuss what was certainly an emotional issue in public. Jessie sniffled once, and then her eyes misted over as she reached the end, closing the screen of the laptop. “Kit, that was beautiful,” she whispered. “Stark, but beautiful.”

“The story was told,” Allison said simply. “And now someone will know.”

“They will indeed, Allison,” Kit assured her.

Jessie was misty-eyed the rest of the time, as they ate pizza and talked of nothing important at all, as if they were pointedly avoiding the subject of the article. Allison complained about her stupid students, who were taking introductory chemistry either as degree requirements or because they had this strange idea of what chemistry was, and Jessie told her about her

English classes. Kit told her about his work, and then Allison abruptly cut them off. “I have to go,” she said. “I promised them I’d stay until Friday. I have to go get ready.”

“This is my cell phone number,” Jessie told her, her eyes grave as she wrote on a napkin. “I want you to call me every day until you leave there. I want to make sure you’re okay.”

Allison looked at her with her eyes a mystery, then took the napkin and nodded silently. “I don’t get off work until late.”

“Then wake me up,” Jessie said immediately. “Knowing you’re okay is going to let me go back to sleep that much happier.”

“I will. I promise.”

“Don’t be a stranger, Allison,” Kit told her. “You have friends if you want them.”

She gave both of them a long, emotionless look, then nodded to them, got up, and left without a word. Kit blew out his breath, and Jessie put her paw on his shoulder. “Are you alright, my handsome fox?”

“I’m very, very tired,” he said, digging his phone out and calling Rick. “But I have more to do. Rick, it’s Kit.”

“What’s the word?” he asked.

“The word is yes. As is.”

“Thank God,” he said. “I don’t think it needs anything, son. You did a fantastic job. I’ll just spellcheck it and work it in at nine pages.”

“I hope it’s worth the extra cost.”

“Son, between this and Barry’s interview of the Austin election commissioner, yes, it’s worth it,” he said bluntly. “Go home, son. When you left here, you couldn’t walk straight. Go home and get some sleep. You deserve it.”

“I can’t yet,” he said. “I have to come back to the office. I made a promise, Rick. I have to wipe all my notes off my workstation. The article will be all there is.”

“Alright, but don’t push it. Come in, clean up, and then go home.”

“Alright, Rick. I’m on the way in.” He disconnected the call, and looked to Jessie. “Go on home, love. I’ll be along as soon as I’m done.”

“Do you want me to do that at home, too?”

“No, I’ll get it. I’m going to keep one copy of my notes. I’ll burn it on a DVD, encrypt it, and hide it somewhere.”

“Okay. I’ll be waiting for you at home, my handsome fox. Please come home soon.”

“Believe me, I will,” he said with a yawn. “I am beyond tired.”

Chapter 22

It had been a great day to fly.

Jessie had given over gawking out the window to settle in with a book, one of her reading assignments, a cockpit light turned on that was basically a map-reading light for the copilot's side and her oxygen tube affixed over her nose. It was 8:42pm by the clock on the dashboard, and the GPS window in the Garmin display showed them at 47 nautical miles south-southwest of Heather Municipal Airport, which was six miles northeast of Cincinnati. They'd be landing in about twenty minutes, and Kit was about to begin his descent and swing around to the east side of the city to avoid restricted airspace around the city and its main airport.

They'd left on Friday rather than Saturday, leaving after only three hours at work, which he spent securing a day and time to interview Lamar Smith and do some easy research jobs for both Lilly and Marty. Kit had arranged to work on Monday to cover his Saturday, and Rick had also given him some flex time off, given he'd worked for nearly 17 straight hours on Allison's article. Then again, Rick was in love with that article, and right now Kit could burn down his ranchhouse and rape Martha, and Rick would just tell him he was a naughty boy and don't do it again. Everyone else in the office thought it was a great article, too. Barry had been speechless, it made Lilly and Marty cry, and Savid spent nearly an hour sitting at his desk, tapping his template pen on his temple, lost in contemplation. Kit still felt that it could be better, but Rick had locked the article in literally as is, and printed it on page four, taking up ten pages once it was reformatted into the template format and the font was dropped down to the magazine's standard, but not editing out a single word. Rick had left the entire article just as it was written, printing it contiguously, and just pushing back the other usual features of the magazine to pages further back. Kit wasn't the feature article, though; Barry's outstanding interview with the head of the Texas Election Commission was the lead article, taking up the entirety of page three and one column of page four.

Kit had a copy of the magazine with him, since it was printed and distributed today, packed in his overnight. They'd left the apartment at three, telling Lupe to keep an eye on things—Lupe had a key to their apartment and the code to the alarm—and were in the air by 4:45. Kit had to file a new flight plan because he intended to try the plane out at its maximum service ceiling, but that was not meant to be; there was some kind of snafu going on with the flight plan servers. It usually only took thirty seconds to get confirmation, but for some reason the system wasn't working. Kit abandoned trying after twenty minutes, deciding to fly under VFR, and then it took twenty minutes to get into the air since he'd already done the packing and preflight inspection of the plane before coming to get his flight plan in. Jessie had spent most of the flight looking down at the ground, or staring at the clouds around them as they flew over most of them, having to ascend through a partial cloud deck when they took off... which was why they got off the ground so quickly. The cloud cover grounded all the VFR pilots, giving Kit a quick line to the runway. She got to watch a gorgeous sunset out of the left side of the plane, having to look across Kit, a sunset at 17,500 feet, the sun sliding behind a rippled horizon of gentle hills. Once the sun went down and she couldn't see the ground, she started reading.

The plane was a dream to fly. The Garmin made navigating ridiculously easy, and the autopilot was both very easy to use and very versatile, allowing the pilot to control virtually all aspects of the flight while the autopilot was engaged. Kit let the autopilot fly for about an hour, but had kept manual control of the plane for most of the rest of the five hour flight, just so he could get completely used to the unusual stick placement. On the trip home, the autopilot would be doing a great deal more work. Kit had flown most of the flight at 17,500 feet, just on the upper edge of VFR airspace, where they had a steady tailwind and clear, cloudless skies both above and below. They averaged 170 knots relative airspeed to ambient air, what was called TAS airspeed—which translated to about 185 knots true speed relative to the ground, or around 250 miles an hour—with a very efficient fuel mixture thanks to the favorable weather conditions. They'd land with enough gas in the tanks to go another hour, where he expected to land with only enough gas for another thirty minutes, not counting reserves. They wouldn't get that kind of efficiency at lower altitudes, which was why they had gone high enough to require oxygen. The oxygen breathers themselves weren't uncomfortable to wear, slim nose tubes much like the portable oxygen tubes worn by people with lung problems, much better than wearing a full mask and much more efficient, and the plane's superior climate control kept them nice and warm in the frigid air nearly 18,000 feet over northern Kentucky on a late February night.

“Alright, my pretty kitty, we're gonna start descending,” he warned. “When we get under fourteen thousand feet, you can take off your breather. After that, you need to pack up your books and stow them. And after that, it'll be time to pull out the winter coats and boots from the back seat.”

“Sure thing, love,” she said. “Should I put my seat belt back on?”

“Not yet,” he answered. “But I do want you to have it on when we land.”

“It doesn’t bother me, love, I just couldn’t slouch down in the seat to read with the belt on,” she said, giving him a smile. “I’ll be glad to get on the ground, though.”

“Yeah, I have to pee, too,” Kit laughed. “I’ve been holding it for the last half hour. I knew I should have bought a portable urinal, but it’s been a crazy week, and we got a late start because of that damn flight plan server. I don’t want your folks to be up all night waiting for us. They certainly sell them out of the little store there at the Georgetown airfield, and the shop at Heather should have them too. I’ve never seen a terminal shop that doesn’t. I’ll have to get one before we fly home.”

“Well, you’re a boy,” she said, almost accusingly. “You could do something like that. Girls don’t have that option,” she said primly.

“Well, you do, actually,” he said. “They sell female urinals too.”

“They do? How would a girl, umm, you know.”

“You’d hold it in place, I imagine,” he shrugged. “They’re specifically designed so you can use them sitting in a seat. They come with this flared and shaped opening, so I guess you could just hold it tight up against yourself and prevent any leaking. They also sell bedpan-style ones that you can actually sit on, which seal so nothing leaks out. You could put it on the back seat and sit down if you don’t like the idea of holding a urinal to yourself.”

“That’s a creepy thought,” Jessie mused. “And kinda embarrassing.”

“Well, it’s an option. And think, love, there’s nobody up here to see anything except me,” he chuckled as he turned the plane and started descending, following the Garmin’s suggested course correction. “You can just drop your jeans and have a seat, or hold the urinal in place. It’s not like you’ve never done it with me in the bathroom before.” He clicked his teeth absently. “I’ll have to find one for our return trip. Trying to hold your knees together isn’t good when you have to put your feet on the rudder pedals. I should have thought to get one before we started up, but we were in such a hurry, I forgot it.”

“That or a soda bottle,” she winked.

He chuckled. “That would work for me. It would be a bit of a challenge for you.”

They were on the ground about fifteen minutes later, and the ground controller directed him to an open space he could rent for the weekend. Jessie was out of the plane as soon as the propeller stopped, not even putting on her winter boots and running with her coat in her paw, running for the terminal. He followed her and saw the terminal clerk to pay for three days of parking and a recharge of the oxygen tanks on the plane, whose desk was right inside the lobby of the small terminal, so visiting pilots could not possibly miss it. “Your shop still open?” he asked the badger.

“Yeah, closes in twenty minutes.”

“Good. I didn’t have time to buy a urinal for the plane,” he grunted. “We had a late start, and we just got our plane a few days ago. This was our first long distance trip in it.”

“Well, congratulations,” the badger said with a smile. “Ah, so, that would explain why that cat ran through here,” he laughed. “She with you?”

“My wife,” he nodded. “I’ll be following her as soon as I pay for parking,” Kit confided, which garnered another chuckle out of the badger.

While Jessie called her parents, Kit used the bathroom, and got to their shop before it closed. It was filled with everything a pilot might want in or for a plane, from sunglasses to clip-on map holders to little hand-held electronic maps to portable DVD players to decals to Game Boy and Playstation Portable games to magazines to puzzle books to clip-on battery powered book lights to 12 volt outlet adapters to run small devices and such. They did have portable urinals, as he knew they would. Jessie came in with him, and blushed a little when he pointed out the urinals, since the clerk in the store was a male.

Kit spent nearly two hundred dollars in that shop, but it was money well spent. They bought two hybrid male/female portable urinals that Jessie didn’t think would be too embarrassing to use, two power adapters for their laptops; airplanes were just like cars, they had 12 volt DC power outlets in the cockpit to run external devices. He was a bit surprised that they had power adapters for a Sabletech at first, but then he thought about it and realized that most people who could afford to fly their own planes could afford a laptop like a Sabletech. He bought a nice pocket pilot’s atlas so he’d always have a map and it wouldn’t add much weight to the plane, and even bought a copy of the FAA flight plan program to install on his laptops so he could file flight plans from his laptop.

Jessie gave him a curious look when they came out of the gift shop carrying two huge bags. “I realized we don’t have power adapters for our laptops that’ll work in the plane,” he explained.

“I never said a word, love,” she chuckled. “I’m the one that went out and bought that camera when we were poor. And they are kinda necessary.

The battery in my laptop won't last five hours." Her phone rang, and she dug her Blackberry out and answered it. "Mom, what's wrong?" she asked, and listened for a moment. "Do you want us to take a cab instead?" She giggled. "Oh, okay. Just go to the terminal building when you get here and call, we're going back to the plane. Kit has to tie the plane down, and hee bought some toys for it and we have to put them in the plane, so we may still be there when you get here. You know how boys are with their toys," she giggled. She put her Blackberry back in her purse. "They're going to be a few minutes late, there was an accident down on Wilkerson and they're waiting for the cops to let them through."

"I hope everyone's okay," he said as they walked back to the plane under the bright lights of the tarmac.

They returned to the plane to stow their purchases and get the luggage. He gave Jessie a sly smile and set the urinal down by the center console, which made her cheeks ruffle and made her laugh. "You are so not watching me use that!" she teased.

"Let's just say that I'm glad the plane has autopilot," Kit told her, which made her laugh helplessly.

To their surprise, Jessie's family didn't wait at the terminal when they arrived. They instead drove right up to the plane from the back side, along the car path, and got out. Jessie ran over and gave her parents a big hug, and Kit climbed down and embraced Hannah warmly. "Hello, Hannah. We're here," he chuckled.

"It's good to see you, dear," she returned. "And I'm glad you got here safely."

"Thanks for coming to pick us up. We really appreciate it."

“Well, I have to make good use of the van your sister gave us for Christmas,” she said with a light laugh.

Kit shook John and Ben’s paw in quick succession as Hannah started animatedly talking to Jessie about her pregnancy. “So, this is the plane,” John chuckled. “Care to show us the inside?”

“You’re going to fly in it tomorrow,” Kit said with a smile. “But sure. Step right there, and get up on the wing, but stay within the line you see right there. That’s the safe zone where the wing can support you,” he cautioned. John and Ben were going to just look inside, but Kit had them climb into the front seats, and Kit pointed things out from the outside, showing them the control surfaces, and letting Ben push the rudder pedals. “You won’t do anything, the plane’s turned off,” he said with a chuckle. “The plane is fly by wire, the controls don’t work with it shut down like this.”

“Ah, good, I was afraid I would accidentally deploy flaps or make the plane lurch or something,” Ben chuckled. “But it’s really cool.”

“Very, very nice. Almost like the inside of a car,” John noted.

“Just about. Now get out and help me with the luggage,” Kit said with a grin.

“Isn’t it neat?” Jessie called from the ground. “Kit’s going to teach me how to fly it!”

“She wants a pilot’s license,” Kit elaborated to her father and brother. “She’s already addicted,” he winked.

“Ya know, it’s not a bad idea,” Ben said speculatively. “If I make it in the NFL, I could afford to buy a plane, and it would be kinda nice to be able to fly down and see the folks whenever I want.”

“How long did it take to fly here?”

“About seven hours total, if you count it from the minute we left the apartment, since the airfield where I keep the plane is thirty miles from my house. The actual time in the air was a smidgen over five hours.”

“That’s not bad at all,” John said with a nod. “When you compare it to about sixteen hours by car, and the five or so hours it would take by airliner given you can never get a nonstop flight, that’s really nice. How much is gas for planes?”

“About five a gallon right now,” Kit said as he helped John back to the ground. “Ben, can you close that side? Just pull it down, I’ll come around and lock it before we go.”

“Sure thing, Kit.”

“Anyway, I don’t really have to pay for the gas, Vil does. So all it cost us was time.”

“And two hundred dollars in the terminal shop,” Jessie added.

“Yeah, but we need everything I bought,” he challenged. “Or would you like to spend another hour flying back waiting to go to the bathroom?”

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled, then she laughed helplessly.

“What does that mean, Kit?” Hannah asked.

Kit climbed back up onto the wing, and as Jessie protested, he reached in and pulled out the urinal and showed it to them in the floodlights of the tarmac. John and Ben laughed, and Hannah’s fur seemed to want to stand up for a second. “We were in too much of a hurry for me to buy one when we started out, but this little eight dollar piece of plastic is one of the most important things you can ever have in a plane when flying cross country. It prevents all kinds of unscheduled stops.”

“Not much privacy in there,” Ben noted with a chuckle.

“Well, then it’s a good thing we’re married,” Kit replied urbanely.

The Williams males helped him finish tying the plane down, then they transferred the suitcase and two carryons to the van in the brisk February night, and then they were all in the van as Hannah drove them out of the airport. “Any trouble finding this place, Hannah?”

“No, dear, I’ve been past here many times,” she said.

“Don’t let him drive your van, eh?” Kit noted.

She glanced back at him through the rearview mirror. “He has his SUV, I have my van,” she said calmly, which made both Kit and John chuckle.

“How’s the Mustang, Ben?”

“Heavenly,” Ben said from the back row. “Of course, I don’t think I’ve ever driven it faster than sixty miles an hour. All my friends accuse me of being an old femme,” he said, which made everyone laugh. “Miss Vil asked me to be careful with it, and I’ll do just that.”

“I’m glad I have at least one responsible child,” Hannah noted.

Jessie bristled. “Hey!”

“Jenny isn’t nearly so careful,” John said sourly. “She’s had it all of three months or so, and she already has two speeding tickets.”

“Why does that not surprise me,” Kit chuckled lightly.

“I’ve visited the apartments your sister arranged for them, Kit,” Hannah told him. “They’re very nice.”

“Heck, are they,” Ben said in agreement. “I went with her to check out mine. It’s huge! It’s got really nice furniture in it, and it has everything but a TV and a stereo as far as appliances go. It even has its own little washer and dryer, no laundromats for us,” he said happily. “It’s in a fenced compound, I have an assigned parking space inside the fence so my car is safe, and there’s a pool and a gym in the complex. It’s only a mile from campus, and it’s a straight shot. You turn right coming out of the complex and the street goes straight to the east side of campus. I can easily walk it, cause I’ve heard trying to park around campus is absolute murder.”

“Jenny bought a bicycle,” Hannah told them. “It must be cold to ride in the winter, but she uses it to get to campus when it’s not raining. “She also bought this ridiculously large TV and stereo system for her apartment,” she said disapprovingly. “It cost her nearly three thousand dollars!”

“Sounds like she’s trying to burn up all the money Vil gave her at Christmas,” Kit said with a grunt.

“At the rate she’s going, she will,” Hannah said with a little heat in her voice. “I mean, Vil bought her that DVD combo player and that very nice portable stereo and that Playstation with all those games and that portable TV, but that does not mean she has to go out and buy a three thousand dollar home theater system to use them on,” she complained. “She could have bought an entirely decent thirty two inch widescreen television for five hundred dollars, and a very nice component audio system for three hundred. That little girl needs to have me pull sharply on her reins. She’s being entirely wasteful and disrespectful of the wonderful gifts that Vil gave her.”

“Let her learn from it, Hannah,” Kit said calmly. “When she uses up all that money Vil gave her, when she calls home begging for money, snub her. Let her learn that if she can’t manage her money, then there will be times when she’s going to starve.”

Hannah nodded sharply. “I can agree with that advice, dear,” she told him.

“Well, you won’t see me doing that,” Ben said. “I haven’t used a penny of the money Vil gave me yet.”

“Well, you’ll need to buy a TV and stereo and a few other things, son,” John told him. “And you will need to eat and buy gas when you’re at school, and there are also expenses like books and such. And for that, Vil’s money will be very useful. But you don’t have to follow Jenny’s example. If you manage that money wisely, you’ll easily get all the way through the year.”

“I hear ya, Dad,” Ben nodded. “Since I’m not paying rent or utilities or car payments or insurance, if I can’t live off ten thousand dollars a year, I should be shot.”

“Well said, Ben,” Kit said with a sober nod.

The Williams house was a warm place which Kit rather liked. It hadn’t changed a bit outside of a little table that had been in the basement now standing in the place where the Christmas tree had stood when Kit was there last. Kit and Ben carried the suitcase and carryon bags up to Jessie’s old room while Hannah made some coffee and put water on for tea, and put some leftover roast beef in the microwave. “I know you must be hungry,” she told Kit when he came back down.

“A little, thank you,” he said. “Are we going to have our long talk tonight or tomorrow?”

She gave him a look, then laughed. “Well, I think we can save that for tomorrow,” she told him. “There are a great many things for us to talk about, and they aren’t joking matters.”

“I know they’re not, Hannah, and I’ll welcome your advice. This is unexplored territory for both of us. I don’t know how Jessie will take it, but I’ll take any advice you and John can give me.”

“I’m very glad you feel that way.”

“This is my wife and child we’re talking about. You better believe I’m serious about this.”

She gave him an approving pat on the arm as she took some green beans in a glass bowl out of the refrigerator. “Would you like some potato salad too?”

“Please,” he said as John wandered into the kitchen at the smell of coffee emanating from the coffee maker.

“Mmm, thanks dear,” he said as he pulled his mug out of the strainer in the sink and standing near the coffee maker, waiting. “So, you’re taking us flying tomorrow?”

Kit nodded. “I can only take three of you at a time, though. So we can do two trips.”

“I think Jessica can wait for us in the terminal, or here at home,” Hannah said sharply. “After all, she gets to ride in the plane whenever she wants.”

Kit chuckled. “Good luck convincing her,” Kit told her. “She really likes that plane.”

“You’re right I do,” Jessie giggled as she came into the kitchen. “It’s a little scary right at first, then it’s just awesome!” The water started to boil for tea, so Kit took down two cups while Jessie fetched the tea from the pantry.

“Well, I think you can sit out a ride, dear, so Kit doesn’t have to take two trips.”

“I don’t mind, Hannah,” Kit assured her. “Heck, I could fly to Columbus and pick up Jenny. I could take two with me on the way to get her, and two with me on the way back.”

Hannah’s eyes lit up. “Can you really do that?” she asked quickly.

“It’s about an hour to Columbus from here,” he shrugged. “I could leave tomorrow morning and get her, and take her back the next day. I could take Ben and John tomorrow to pick her up, and you and Jessie when I take her back.”

“John,” she prompted.

“I’ll call her right now,” John chuckled, pouring himself a cup of coffee and scurrying towards the living room.

“Heck, from now on, we can fly from Austin to Columbus first to pick her up, then drop her off on the way home,” Kit added.

“That’s very thoughtful of you, dear,” Hannah said with a nod. “I’m starting to understand you when you said that Kit’s plane could be very useful, Jessica,” she added to her daughter.

“Yeah, it’s really awesome. It just opens up so many possibilities,” Jessie agreed.

“I’ll need to get back to the airport early tomorrow,” he said. “The earlier I go get Jenny, the more time we have together.”

John came back into the kitchen, holding the phone to his face. “Kit, which airport does Jenny go to?”

“I won’t know until tomorrow, when I get to the airport and look up Columbus,” he answered. “We can call Jenny after we know so she can meet us there.”

John relayed that, then asked another question. “She wants to know if she can park her car at the airport overnight.”

“Sure. She might have to pay for it, but I’ve never heard of an airport or airfield that didn’t have extended parking.”

John relayed that, then hung up after a minute, and after telling Jenny to go buy a road atlas of Columbus, so she could find the airport. “She sounded excited at the idea of it,” John said. “And Kit, thank you very much for this. You certainly don’t have to go so far out of your way for our benefit.”

“John, you’re family,” he said simply. “I’ll be happy to do this for you. Heck, I like Jenny, I won’t mind at all,” he chuckled.

Hannah’s cooking was as good as he remembered. The whole family sat at the table with Kit and Jessie as they ate the offered leftovers, chatting over little things. Jessie did tell Hannah about Kit’s article and Allison, so Kit pulled out the magazine so they could read the article. To Kit’s delight, Jessie made sure to refer to her as Foxy to maintain Allison’s anonymity.

“She doesn’t work in that place anymore,” Jessie said. “Well, not after tonight, that is. She’s supposed to call me when she’s done, so I know she’s alright.”

“You associate with this femme, Jessica?” Hannah said, a bit coldly.

“God knows she needs someone to be her friend, mom,” Jessie replied. “She may not be an angel, but she’s a nice girl, and I’m worried about her.”

“I don’t see how a tramp can be nice,” Hannah said frostily.

“She’s not a tramp, Hannah, she’s a realist,” Kit said simply. “She saw that the only real way she could get her degree was to do work she found repugnant. She made a very logical decision and swallowed her repulsion to do it. That’s the story of quite a few prostitutes, you know. I’ve never known a prostitute that liked doing it. They did it because they had to. Foxy may have had other choices, but none of them would have let her do what she wanted. So she made a practical decision.”

“And just how many prostitutes do you know, Kit?” Hannah challenged.

“Quite a few,” he said honestly. “I met a bunch of them in homeless shelters as I was working my way towards Austin. I have a bunch of stories they told me in my journals about what it’s like, people they’ve met, so on and so on. But none of them had a story anywhere near as interesting and unique as Foxy’s.”

“Well, I don’t approve,” Hannah announced.

“I’m sure she doesn’t entirely approve of her old life either, Hannah, else she’d have kept doing it after she graduated from college, or just dropped out of college to focus only on that. But she did it. She did it because she couldn't see any other way to achieve her goal. You can hate what she did, but you can also respect her determination to achieve her goal."

"Not at that price, I won't," Hannah said bluntly, crossing her arms beneath her breasts and putting on an affronted expression.

"Just read the article, Mom, then you'll understand what Kit's saying," Jessie urged.

"Well, I'll read it," she said. "But I doubt that it will change my mind."

"I think I'd like to meet her," Ben mused.

"You will not!" Hannah snapped. "It's bad enough that Kit's cousin is chasing after you! I won't have another tramp trying to grab your tail, Ben!"

"Still?"

"She calls me at least twice a week," Ben said dismissively. "She wants to fly me down to Mexico during spring break, but Mom won't let me go."

"She's not the only one," John said mildly.

"Well, at least she's not giving up," Kit chuckled. "The new Sheila is quite a bit more tenacious than the old one."

"We didn't tell you, she's staying in Austin for good," Jessie added. "She's going to get a degree in cooking at U.T. and open a restaurant after she graduates. So she's down with us to stay."

"She left Harvard for U.T.?" John asked in surprise.

“Not entirely,” Kit said, a bit delicately. “She’s going to do her business degree requirements at Harvard by correspondence and internet classes while she takes culinary arts classes at U.T. Her plan is to get two Bachelor’s, one at each school. Her plan is actually pretty good,” he said approvingly. “She really put a lot of thought into it.”

“I don’t mind, I really like Sheila,” Jessie said. “She’s wild, but she’s also very sweet and thoughtful. She’s been a good friend.”

“Hmph,” Hannah sniffed.

Jessie’s old bed still didn’t agree with him, so he was quite stiff when he woke up at six to go to the bathroom, and decided to just stay up since he’d need to get up in about a half an hour anyway. Hannah was still asleep--the first time he’d ever woke up before her--so he invaded her kitchen and started cooking breakfast, using Hannah’s well stocked refrigerator and pantry to start quiche. He had all the vegetables cut and the bacon and sausage cooked by the time Hannah appeared, wearing a full length terrycloth bathrobe, hurrying down to find out what was going on in her kitchen. “Morning,” he said pleasantly as he swept a cutting board of onions into a bowl. “Want to help?”

“I’ve told you about this kitchen, young male,” she told him, her face stern.

“You’ve cooked for me so many times, Hannah, let me do something for you, at least once,” he smiled.

“What are you making?”

“Quiche,” he answered. “I have everything cut up and the meats cooked, now I just need to mix up the egg filler, sautee the veggies, and pop it into the oven.”

“Well, let’s see how you’re doing this,” she said professionally.

Hannah quickly took over his attempt to cook, relegating him to a purely helping position, but she did follow his recipe instead of trying to finish it using her own. Between the two of them they had the quiche in the oven and merrily baking in short order. Hannah went on to make coffee while Kit reheated the teapot, for he knew Jessie wouldn’t be asleep much longer. Kit cut grapefruits into halves to go with the quiche as Ben and Jessie appeared at the same time, Ben in a pair of shorts and a tank top and Jessie in a long nightshirt and pajama bottoms, which she only put on to come downstairs. Jessie slept nude, even here at her parents’ house. “That smells great, what is it?” Ben asked.

“Quiche,” Kit answered as he poured water into a cup for Jessie’s tea.

“It’s Kit and Jessica’s recipe,” Hannah said, almost disapprovingly.

“Well, it smells good,” Ben said. “When are we leaving, Kit?”

“After we eat, so go wake up John if you don’t mind.”

“He’s already up. He should be down in a second.”

They all dressed while the quiche was baking, and then Hannah got a little offended when John and Ben complemented her on such a good breakfast. But, after they were done, Kit herded Ben and John into Hannah’s van, and John took them back to the airport. “This is gonna be soooo cool,” Ben said expectantly as they pulled into the airport.

“Where do I park, Kit?”

“You can park behind my plane, same as last night. That parking space comes with the airplane spot, so you don’t have to pay anything.”

“Okay.”

It was rather chilly as they piled out of the van and walked over to the terminal. John chatted excitedly with the terminal clerk while Kit used their computer to look into the flight. Columbus wasn’t far, only about 120 miles, or about 100 nautical miles, so there was no earthly reason to go over 18,000 feet and require a flight plan. He’d fly on VFR. They could be there in 35 minutes...and that was with him piddling along. He could be there in 20 minutes if he opened the throttle to max and hauled ass over there in an arc that let him gun it through thinner air.

“So, how does this work, anyway?” Ben asked.

Kit chuckled, and gave Ben a brief explanation of the computer. “I’d use it to file a flight plan if I was going to fly over eighteen thousand feet, but I’m not going to do that. Columbus is only 95 nautical miles out, that’s like a hop, skip, and a jump from here. There’s no reason to go over eighteen thousand for such a short trip. Besides, you’ll get to see more if I fly low. John!” he called.

John scurried over. “Yes?”

“Call Jenny, I know where I’m landing,” he said, clicking up a map of Columbus on the computer and pointing. “Here. Bolton Field Airport. It’s not that far from Ohio State’s campus, and I won’t have to go through all the procedural crap I would if I landed at the international airport. Hold on, they link to Mapquest, we can get driving directions for her.”

John called his daughter, and then read off the instructions to her when Kit brought them up on the monitor. “How long til we get there?” he asked.

“Tell her it’ll be about an hour,” he answered. “I have to gas up the plane before we leave. Oh, and tell her that the terminal employee can tell her when we land, so she can wait in the terminal and we’ll come get her there.”

They went back to the plane, and after Kit unlocked it, Ben and John had a bit of a row over who got to sit up front as they removed the tie downs. Kit listened to them jostle for position, then chuckled and broke it up. “You can switch in Columbus. Jenny can ride up front when I take her home, and Hannah can ride up front on the way back. Jessie can stay in the back seat, she gets to fly home,” he told them.

They both laughed. “I’ll flip you for it,” Ben offered. “I sure as heck don’t want to be back there when Jenny’s in the plane.”

They did indeed flip for it, and Ben won the toss. That put John up front on the flight over. They loaded themselves into the plane, and Kit turned on the electric heater for them so the plane could warm up as he stayed out in the cold and did the preflight walk around inspection. After that was complete, he climbed into the plane and performed the preflight checklist, which included starting the engine. “So, we’re on the way?” Ben asked as Kit released the parking brake.

“Not quite yet. I told you, I need gas first, and that means we head to the pump,” he answered. “This isn’t an airliner, Ben, us private pilots pump our own gas in airports where they don’t offer a truck fueller or I get it at a service hangar, and I’m not. I’d rather just get it myself. I don’t want to wait around for the fueler or attendant, not since they have a self-serve station right over there.”

“I didn’t know that,” he mused.

Kit followed the signs to the fueling station, and had to wait as a little Piper gassed up. After it was done, the pilot waved to him before he climbed into his little two-seater, then Kit replaced him at the fueling pump. “So, how do you pay for it?” John asked curiously. “I don’t see an attendant.”

“It’s a credit card pump, John, just like at a regular gas station,” Kit said, pulling out his wallet and removing his Transport card. “But it’s a lot more expensive.”

“How much will it cost?”

“Well, I’m about to put about sixty gallons in this thing, and it’s, um, four sixty a gallon,” he said, looking at the pump before he opened his gullwing door.

“Ouch!” Ben said. “That’s like three hundred bucks!”

“About that,” Kit agreed. “Flying isn’t a cheap hobby, Ben,” Kit chuckled as he climbed out.

“Actually, if you compare it to driving, it’s really not that much more expensive,” John said after a second’s contemplation.

He gassed up the plane in the cold morning, as the sun peeked through some wispy clouds near the horizon. It takes a little bit of time to pump seventy gallons of fuel, so Ben and John had to wait inside for a bit. Kit finished up and took his receipt, closed the fuel tank cap and door, then climbed back into the plane. “Now we’re ready to go,” he told them as he restarted the engine, then disengaged the parking brake. “We’ll be in the air about half an hour or so, guys, so if you need anything, say so now.”

“I think we’ll be alright,” John said, reaching down and picking up the urinal. “After all, we have this,” he chuckled.

Kit had them in the air about ten minutes after fueling up. Both of his passengers were reverently silent as they took off, Ben gazing down at the ground as John looked out the front windscreen, wincing against the sun. “I should have brought sunglasses,” he complained.

“Jessie left hers in her nook,” Kit said. “They may make you look a bit silly, but it’s better than your eyes watering for the rest of the flight.”

“Where is that?”

“Reach down the side of the center console, there’s a little nook down there,” he prompted.

He reached down and produced Jessie’s sunglasses, then put them on and sighed in relief. “Much better,” he noted. “Okay, explain this dashboard while we’re flying.”

Kit chuckled, and spent much of the flight explaining the flight instruments and how he navigated using the Garmin and GPS. He explained the MFD, which showed them where they were, showed them the locations of other planes on the map which were his responsibility to avoid, and pointed to Bolton Field in the top right corner of the MFD map. “We’ll be there in about five minutes. I guess you could call Jenny and tell her we’re almost there.”

“You can use cell phones in planes?”

“Sure, it won’t mess with my avionics, and we’re low enough for you to get a signal,” Kit assured him.

“How high up are we?” Ben asked.

“Four thousand and thirty seven feet,” he said, pointing at his altimeter. “Let me radio Bolton Field and get landing instructions, they have a tower there.”

“You make it sound like not all of them do.”

“Nope,” he said. “Most airfields don’t have towers. That’s one of the main differences between an air field and an air port. Some airfields have control towers, most don’t, it depends on how much traffic the airfield has. But all airports have a tower, no matter how large or small they are.”

“Wow, there’s a lot more to this than I thought,” Ben said musingly.

“You should see the written test you have to take to get your license,” Kit chuckled. “And that’s just the beginning. If you want to get rated for flying only by instruments, you have to know a heck of a lot more. And you have to know a heck of a lot more than that if you want a commercial pilot’s license. And it only gets worse as you go up. The test for an air transport license, the airline pilot’s license, is an absolute beast.”

“What kind of license do you have, Kit?” John asked curiously.

“A commercial license,” he answered. “I got it because if you apply to military flight school and you already have a commercial license or better, they give your application much more weight. So, I went to a flight school that did commercial pilot training, called a one forty-one school. If you ever want a license, Ben, I highly recommend you do a one forty-one. The requirements to get a commercial license are much less stringent if you do it in a one forty-one program, since you're being specifically trained for it. If you get a standard license first and then try to upgrade, it's a headache."

"I'll remember that," Ben said, "cause I guess I'm like Jessie. Seeing this plane and how you just flew up here for the weekend, it seems awfully convenient."

"It is at that," Kit chuckled. "Now excuse me while I do the pilot thing and radio in."

He set the radio so they heard it on their headsets as well so they could hear the tower, and they listened in interest as Kit got landing instructions. Kit landed behind a Citation jet, which was taxiing back towards them on the ramp as they landed, heading for a small hangar near the terminal. Kit was directed to a short-term parking area near the terminal, for he told the ground controller he was just staying long enough to pick up a passenger, and John called Jenny and told them that they were on the ground. "She's in the terminal waiting, and she says she's already got a parking place."

"I told you they'd have them. It probably cost her about ten bucks."

John told Jenny that, then he laughed. "She said you're way off, it cost her twenty."

"Then this airport's a ripoff," Kit noted. "God help me if I wanted to park my plane overnight, if they charge that much just for a car."

Kit parked, and they didn't have to go in after her. She must have been waiting at the doors, watching planes, for she ran out carrying a small carryon as soon as Kit and John appeared behind the opened doors. John climbed down and hugged her when she reached them, and she came around and gave Kit a crushing hug. "Hey, you! This is gonna rock!" she said happily. “I’ve never been picked up in a private plane before! Oh, and congratulations!”

“Thanks. I hope you like it,” he said as Ben climbed over the center console and got into the copilot’s seat. “Now let’s get you in, you’re in the back.”

“Aww! I wanna sit up front!”

“We already drew up a schedule,” John told her with a chuckle as he went around the plane.

“You get to sit up front on the way back to Columbus tomorrow,” he promised her.

“Oh, okay! I can live with that,” she said. “Where do I put my bag?”

“There’s a compartment behind the back seat, or I can put it in the trunk. Your call.”

“I’ll keep it, I wanna take some pictures!”

“I should have thought of that!” John said, slapping his forehead as he climbed up onto the wing, preparing to get back in the plane.

“No sweat, Dad, I’ll sell you a few of mine,” Jenny winked as Kit helped her up.

Jenny was almost annoying excited as everyone got in, Jenny took off her coat in the warm cockpit, and everyone buckled up. Kit got in line to take off as he tried to cope with about a thousand questions spewing out of Jenny’s mouth, thrown out at blazing speed as she snapped pictures of everything; the cockpit, her father beside her, the tarmac, the taxiway, everything. She gave an excited yell as Kit, who was idling at the end of the runway waiting for clearance, throttled up. She screamed and laughed when the plane lifted off, then took pictures out her window at the ground below as Kit did a slow banking turn to point them back to Cincinnati, which dipped the wing on his and Jenny's side of the plane. "Are we going up really high? Can I still see everything? How long will it take to get there? What happens if the engine quits?" she rattled at high speed.

"I'm getting a muzzle for you when we fly back," Kit told her, which made her laugh.

"Can we fly over the campus? I'd love a picture of it from above."

"Afraid I can't, the campus is back there," he said, jerking a thumb over his shoulder, towards her. "And I'm not turning around. Besides, it's restricted airspace, I'd have to be so high over it that your picture wouldn't really show anything."

"Oh, I didn't know that."

"There's a ceiling over most big cities we can't go under except when we're in set flight lanes," Kit told her. "Not since nine-eleven. If their radar caught me flying too low over a city, they might think I was going to try to crash into a building or something, and I'd get in big trouble. They have me on radar and the transponder in the plane tells them exactly who I am, so they'd bust me when I landed."

"How high is it?"

"Depends on the city, but most of them are two thousand feet, which is too high to get the kind of picture you want," he answered. "Some really big cities don't allow private planes over them at all, like Washington D.C., but other big cities will let private planes fly over, as long as we stay high enough.”

“Cool,” Jenny said energetically, accidentally kicking the back of his seat. “Can you do a loop the loop?” she asked with a giggle.

“I’m not sure everything’s stowed for a move like that, I don’t feel like getting whacked in the head by your carryon. But, if you just want a ride, well,” he said, looking to make sure everyone still had their seat belt on, then he jacked the stick hard to the left. The plane rolled, rolled hard, well past vertical, turning the plane upside down. Ben grabbed the dash and John cried out in alarm, but Jenny was laughing. He ran inverted for nearly ten seconds, then turned the plane back over, which caused John to give a startled cry, but made Jenny give an excited whoop.

“Yes, this plane can do a loop, by the way,” he said lightly. “It’s rated for 4 Gs, that lets it do a few stunts. But I’m also not going to give myself a concussion or plow my plane into the deck just to amuse you, Jenny.”

“Warn an old male next time!” John complained, which made everyone else explode into laughter.

They got back to Columbus at a fairly decent clip, and landed and taxied back to the same parking space. Jenny was too excited to sit still as they drove back, and then ran into the house. “Such a spazz,” Ben sighed as they got out behind her, which made Kit laugh.

With Jenny there, it was like a little family reunion. Jenny gushed over Jessie’s pregnancy for several minutes, then settled down some. Kit and Jessie showed them pictures of their honeymoon, and Jenny showed them pictures of her apartment, proudly pointing out her “awesome TV and theater.” John and Hannah took her to task for wasting so much money, and Hannah threatened her quite effectively by making it clear that between the debit card Vil got her and the campus card she got from her parents for Christmas, she would not receive any more money from them. She had to survive on her own on the money she had. That made Jenny quite flabbergasted at first, then she turned sulky, despite the fact that she said she still had nearly six thousand dollars to last her until next September. “Vil said we could enjoy her gift!” she protested.

“Enjoying it is fine, but you are wasting it. You could have bought a much cheaper TV and stereo and still had quite good ones, but instead you go out and buy something entirely too expensive,” Hannah told her frostily. “Are you determined to show your sister-in-law how much like her family you can be?”

That brought Jenny up short. She turned to Kit for support, but was snubbed just as flatly as Hannah had. “Don’t look at me, I think you’re being a touch ridiculous,” Kit told her. “Your mother is totally right. Enjoying money doesn’t mean going nuts with it.”

“So says the guy with his own plane,” she pouted, then she stalked off.

“She’ll get over it,” Jessie giggled. “She always does.”

Ben went to work out, and Jenny went to see some old high school friends to give them a little space, and Kit and Jessie sat down with John and Hannah and had that serious talk, that lasted over three hours. They were very frank, explaining that they were very worried about the pregnancy because the two of them were young, Jessie was still in school, and Hannah was still not convinced that their marriage would last. Kit and Jessie had to talk quite a while, assuring them over and over that they were okay, their marriage was still strong, and they were taking the pregnancy very seriously. Jessie told them about her visit to the obstetrician, and how Kit was both making her do everything the obstetrician said, and also making her go to school. Both of them stressed heavily that Jessie's education was still a priority, and while she would lose a semester when she delivered and their baby was newborn, she would finish her degree. After she got her Bachelor's, then Jessie's future was much more ambiguous. John spoke of seeing her go on to get her Master's to teach, or even get her Doctorate and be a professor like him, while Hannah favored her settling down to be a housewife, devoting herself to her baby as Hannah had done with her own children...but still absolutely adamant that Jessie get her Bachelor's, so she would always have it and the doors that it would open for her if she ever had to work. "The baby's just a delay, not a derail," she said for the tenth time. "Not that I'm not overjoyed to be pregnant," she said with a giggle, "but I do still want to teach. I can do both, I know I can. Femmes do it all the time!"

"I'm torn about that idea," Hannah said honestly. "I would like to see you devote yourself to the baby, but I know that's just impossible nowadays. But, I've seen you work so hard and come so far, to see you abandon it now, so close to earning your degree," she said, then trailed off and sighed.

"Don't ever think I'd never think my child doesn't come first, Mom," Jessie said, with a little heat. "But I can be a good mommy and still go to school, and then to work. We've already discussed how we're going to handle it. Kit can take care of the baby when I'm at class, because I'm going to arrange to take afternoon and night classes after I deliver. We may not see much of each other for a semester, but I'll graduate by then. I'm going to take some time off after I graduate to care for the baby, then start my Master's program."

"I'm already supporting both of us, so I'm not too worried about money," Kit continued. "Jessie can still work on School Daze for money, that's not very hard, and that's at-home work. But, it's her decision about all of that," he told them. "If she wants to work, I'll support her. But if she wants to be an at-home mother, then I'll support her. My only position in this is to make sure Jessie gets to do what she wants. That's what being her husband is all about," he said, putting his paw on Jessie's arm. "Making her happy."

"Aww, you're so sweet, my handsome fox," she smiled in reply.

"Well, you did think about it," John noted approvingly. "Thoroughly."

"But there's a lot more we haven't considered, mainly because we haven't thought about it," Kit said. "And that's where we need you. I expect to be burning up the phone lines between here and Austin over the next seven months."

Hannah sat up a little straighter, unconsciously assuming the matronly role. "As well you should," she told them. "We've been through three pregnancies, dear, we've experienced most of it. And you should also talk to Rick and Martha. They're also quite experienced, and they can help you with the little problems that takes being there to best address them."

"Oh, we will, that's a promise," Jessie said with a nod. "Martha thinks I'm her long lost daughter, she won't let me get away with not letting her be involved with my pregnancy," she laughed.

“She hosted you and helped you put on your wedding dress, Jessica, and you two have been very close to her and Rick for as long as Kit has worked at the magazine. Of course she sees you as all but her own daughter. Martha will make sure I know what’s going on, even those things you’ll either forget to tell me or refuse to,” she said flintily.

“I knew there was a downside to having in-laws,” Kit said morosely, and he laughed as she ducked out of range of Hannah’s paw.

“The big question is, Kit, can you afford to support three?” John asked. “A baby is a very expensive addition, if a welcome one. Jessica might have to work. And then there’s the expense of raising the child, and then there’s college. You really need to think this through, and come up with some kind of plan, because I haven’t heard either of you mention that yet.”

Kit and Jessie looked at each other, then Kit shook his head. “We have nothing to worry about, John,” he said.

“Not anymore,” Jessie agreed. “Our baby’s future is set.”

Kit told them about the bonds. “I’d never take a damn penny from my family, but the bonds are different. My mother bought them for me, and Vil was smart to tell me that when she sent them. I’d never turn down something from my mother, because she loved me,” he said simply. “I’d insult her memory if I threw them back in Vil’s face. So, I took the bonds, cashed them, and invested them. We have ten thousand dollars in the bank for emergencies, and the rest of it is invested so our children can go to any school they want when they graduate.”

“That money belongs to our children, not to us,” Jessie added.

John and Hannah looked quite surprised, and were silent for a long time. Finally, John leaned forward on the table. “A hundred thousand, you say?” he asked.

“More or less. The invested portion is closer to eighty-five thousand, but that’ll mature nicely in the investment portfolio that me and Vil hammered out. Our children will want for nothing, and the interest off the investments will more than support us as a second salary in case Jessie wants to be a stay-at-home mom. She doesn’t have to work. We have the investments for the future, the ten thousand put back in case of a disaster, and now we just sit back and let the money do the work for us.”

Hannah looked...strange. He wasn’t sure if she was happy or angry or what. “And how is this money arranged, Kit? In your name?”

Jessie almost knocked the chair over as she jumped to her feet. “Mother!” she gasped, utterly outraged.

“It has to be asked, Jessica,” Hannah said, a bit sternly. “If your marriage fails, then what happens to this money?”

Kit gave her a hard look. “If you want me to sign a contract right here and now that sends every dime of that money to Jessie if we divorce, then go type it up,” he told her with an intense stare. “But don’t ever assume that I’d leave my child hungry and abandoned.”

John put his paw on Hannah’s forearm. “I think that’s about enough discussion, before you say something that causes your daughter to punch you in the mouth,” he said mildly.

“I can’t believe you, Mom! Hasn’t he proved himself to you by now? Has he ever lied to you? Doesn’t he bend over backwards for you? Has he ever given you any reason to doubt him?”

“No, he hasn’t. But I had to ask, Jessica, for the sake of your child if nothing else. I had to be sure.” She looked at Kit and nodded. “And now I’m sure that he will be a responsible male should your marriage fail and take care of Jessica and your baby. I believe you, Kit, that you’d sign all the money over to Jessica.”

“Thank you for that much, Hannah,” he said, not very cordially.

“Alright, let’s all go calm down before we have a war here,” John said in a commanding tone. “Jessica, Kit, don’t be too angry.”

“I’ll get over it,” Kit said. “I’m sure Hannah didn’t mean it the way it sounded.”

“No, no, I didn’t mean to offend, Kit,” she said, just a little placatingly. “But I did have to ask, and we did deserve an answer.”

“I’ll admit that you did,” he nodded.

Kit took Jessie down to the basement while Hannah cooked and calmed her down. Hannah had been quite tactless, but Kit wouldn’t begrudge her her right to know the answer to that question. She just should have been a little more diplomatic about bringing it up. Kit soothed Jessie for over an hour, after Jenny and Ben both came back and wisely stayed upstairs, until he had to resort to her own tactic; laying her down on the couch with her head in his lap. One paw tousled and played with her hair, while the other kneaded through her silky longhaired tail, and he kept her contained until she calmed down. She surrendered to him, let him pay special attention to her, and nearly dozed off by the time John came down the stairs. "Dinner will be ready in a minute," he said. "Are you coming up?"

"We'll be up in a minute, Dad," Jessie said, sitting up.

"I'm sorry that happened, sweetie," John told her sincerely. "Your mother just said it wrong, that's all."

"It's...it's alright, dad," she said with a sigh. "I can believe that she didn't mean to sound that shrewish. Maybe four months ago I'd have believed it, but not now."

"Alright, we'll set places for you," he said, then went back upstairs.

"I'm sorry, Kit," Jessie said, snuggling up to him and putting her muzzle under his chin. "I'm sorry she said that to you."

"It's alright, love," he told her. "She took a question she was entitled to ask, and just had it come out wrong. I don't blame her."

"I thought you were going to come over the table at her," Jessie said.

"Only to get between you and her," Kit told her, which made her giggle. He caressed her shoulders and back, which made her start to purr. "Now, ready to go up and be nice to your mother?"

"I guess so," she told him.

"Come on, I'm hungry. And I'd much be up there eating than down here with you."

"Why you little jerk!" she barked sharply, and he laughed when she bulled him down to the couch and started tickling him. "More concerned about your stomach than your wife? Just wait til I get you home!" she shouted as he laughed helplessly, squirming under her. "I'm making you a meal from that spice rack! Then you won't have to worry about being hungry anymore!"

"P—P—Pizza," he wheezed, which made Jessie laugh and collapse on top of him.

"I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan," she told him, then gave him a lingering kiss.

"And I love you, Jessica Desdemona Vulpan," he returned with a loving smile, patting her on her waist. "Now let's go get some dinner. You have to keep our baby healthy and developing."

"I just hope the morning sickness bug passes me by," she laughed as she got off of him.

"Keep dreaming," Kit noted as they went upstairs.

Since there was no football, there was little for John to do on Sunday. Since Ben was training for Ohio State, though, he had started going out with his son on Sundays to help him practice, since he knew how to throw a football, and despite his small and wiry frame, he could put some surprising air under a pigskin.

While John and Ben were out in the cold, Jessie and Hannah, who were speaking again after a rather contrite dinner, had a long and indepth talk about what Jessie could expect as the weeks went by and her pregnancy progressed. Kit didn't listen too much to that, since he wasn't entirely sure he wanted to know what kind of physical changes Jessie could expect, so he and Jenny spent the early morning and afternoon down the basement playing X-Box, in what Jenny cheekily called the "no pregnancy talk zone."

She'd calmed down a lot since the flight, and was back to the normal Jenny he remembered, all smiles and energy and a wicked paw at Halo 3. Jenny would make some guy out there either the happiest male in the world or unbelievably jealous, since Jenny was a total sports nut and was a hardcore gamer femme, the mythical "femme who likes video games and sports." She wasn't the only one, though; Vil had been known to pick up a game controller from time to time, and she was no slouch herself.

Not many Fortune 500 CEOs had an X-Box 360 in their offices and Civilization IV installed on their work computers. Vil loved simulator games like that, where her amazing analytical mind and attention to detail could shine.

About two, though, after an indulgent early dinner of beef shishkebabs, it was time to take Jenny back to Columbus, since she had some homework to do. It was Jessie and Hannah's turn to go, so, Kit found himself in a van with three femmes, who all talked about "femme things" all the way to the airplane. But Hannah and Jessie got quiet, sharing the back seat, while Jenny asked a zillion questions and had to resist the urge to press buttons up front as Kit taxied out of the parking space after his preflight inspection and checklist. "Don't we need gas?" Jenny asked as they pulled out onto the main taxiway leading to the runway, getting in behind a Citation and with a Cirrus pulling up behind them.

"I filled up when we came to get you," he said, pointing to the monitor. "I still have plenty of fuel, enough to fly to Columbus and back twice with plenty to spare."

"Oh. I guess you'd pay attention to that," she giggled.

“Checking your fuel status appears three times on the preflight checklist,” he said calmly as he pulled up to take the place of the Citation that pulled out onto the runway, preparing to take off. “So you can’t possibly miss it unless you’re stupid. Now excuse me as I get us airborne,” he said as the control tower called him, and he bent his attention to the task at paw.

They were airborne and heading northeast, and Jenny went right on asking him a thousand questions. He answered them as best he could, then when she asked how hard it was to fly, he chuckled and looked at her. “Want to try?”

“Would I!” she said with a squeal, almost reflexively reaching for the control stick. “Um, can I grab it?”

“Kit, this is not a good idea!” Hannah said with sudden concern from the back seat, leaning forward.

“Trust me, Hannah, I won’t let her crash us. My sister would kill me,” he said, which made Jessie laugh. “Alright, now, grab hold of the stick. Don’t bother putting your feet on the pedals, you won’t need them.”

“Okay,” she said, taking hold of the stick in her right paw, since it was on the right on her side of the cockpit. “Now what?”

“Now hold it steady and in the center, centering a stick makes the plane go in the same direction,” he instructed. “It’s spring loaded, so just let it go back to its rest position.”

“Okay, it’s there,” she told him, relaxing her grip on the control.

Kit toggled a switch on the center console to enable the controls on both sides of the cockpit and let go of the stick. “There, you’re flying,” he told her with a smile.

“I am? I am! I’m flying the plane!” she said with a laugh. Her laugh caused her paw to shift on the stick, and that shift caused the plane to shift a little, rolling just slightly to the right. Hannah gave a sudden cry of alarm, but Kit didn’t shout at her. “No problem, see this white line right here on the dash? Make it level by pushing the stick just a little to the left, then center it when you get there. Just nice and slow,” he told her.

She did as he ordered, slowly leveling the plane, and she did a fairly good job of it to boot.

He let her fly for nearly five minutes, pointing out the other planes on the MFD. “Each blip is a plane,” he explained, “and these letters pointing to it tells me who it is. It tells me if it’s a private plane like mine, or an commercial airliner, or military.”

“This plane has radar?” Jenny asked.

“No, that’s too expensive and heavy. It gets all this information from transponders and a radio,” he told her. “Transponders are little radios that broadcast a unique ID signal that identifies us. Each plane’s transponder radios to a beacon, which includes who we are and where we are. Our GPS location, altitude, speed, and direction are all part of the information the transponder sends, which the transponder takes off the flight instruments in the plane. The beacons all combine the information with a common computer, and then the computer sends data back to the beacon. Then the beacon sends out what you see to all the planes so we can see each other without needing radar for each plane. It’s not radar, but it’s just as good.”

“Ah, that’s pretty smart,” she said approvingly.

“The skies got much safer when the FAA mandated the upgrade to Mode S Transponders, which are what allows what you see on that monitor,” he told her. “Now let me take back over, we’re getting close to Columbus.”

Kit did get Jenny one thing, and that was a flyover of Ohio State. He had to stay above two thousand feet and stay inside a narrow corridor arranged by a controller since he was close to an approach path to the international airport, but Jenny had a good zoom on her camera. She got a few good pictures of the campus and the stadium, and then they turned around and landed at Bolton Field. He again parked in a temporary parking zone near the terminal, then killed the engine. They all got out of the plane, and then they hugged Jenny by turns. “You be good, sis-in-law, or at least good in comparison to how you usually act,” Kit teased when it was his turn.

She laughed. “I’ll try,” she grinned. “Thanks for letting me—uh, for doing that for me,” she said, looking around.

Kit laughed. “It’s our little secret,” he whispered in her ear, then kissed her on the cheek.

“Woo, baby,” she said with a grin, throwing her arms around his shoulders and slashing her tail behind her aggressively. “Soon I’ll be having an affair with you! You do have the sisters fantasy, right?”

“Jennifer Ophilia Williams!” Hannah barked, which made both Jenny and Jessie laugh.

“Be good, sissy,” Jessie told her, giving her a hug.

“I’ll never be that boring, sissy,” she winked. She waved to them and shouldered her bag, then hurried towards her Mustang, which was visible in a parking lot beside the terminal.

“Someday that girl will grow up,” Hannah complained.

“I don’t know, Hannah, sometimes when you act young, you feel young,” he chuckled. “Now let’s get out of this cold and back into that warm cockpit.”

“I still can’t believe you let her handle the controls,” Hannah said, a bit accusingly.

“Well, I’m going to let you fly too,” he grinned as they turned back to the plane. “If I can trust Jenny not to crash us, I’m positive you won’t.”

Hannah’s cheeks seemed to ruffle slightly. “Well, I might give it a try,” she said speculatively.

Hannah wasn’t that bad at it, actually. He let her fly in a straight line for a while, but when it came time to make a course correction, he let her do it, walking her through the process of stick, rudder, and throttle involved in making a turn. She really didn’t have to use anything but the stick and rudder pedals—the stick itself actually—but she did well. Kit let her control the plane for about ten minutes, but took over when it was time to get serious about it, when he started descending and circling Cincinnati to get in the proper landing lane for Heather, which was using its southwest approach for landing today.

“Well, that was quite interesting,” Hannah said in her manner as they slowed to a stop in the parking place, and Kit turned the plane around to face the tarmac. “It was much different looking out the front window rather than a side window.”

“Yeah, gives you an entirely different perspective,” Kit agreed as he killed the engine. “Alright, we’re done, let’s go back to the house.”

It was a very enjoyable afternoon. Hannah was still just a little contrite about her faux pas the night before, so it made her very accommodating. She made them a big dinner, and then they all sat around the Bengal Den and watched movies while they talked. Jessie talked about the baby, Ben talked about his excitement at the idea of going to play for his favorite college team, and John talked about the cruise that he and Hannah were taking next month through the Bahamas. Vil had very thoughtfully set the cruise date so one of the two weeks fell on Cincinnati’s spring break, so John had to arrange replacement teachers to cover his classes for the other week he’d be gone. The university wasn’t entirely happy about his extended vacation, but he had been there for nearly twelve years without missing a single day of work and he had tenure. The fact that he was the head of the English Department made him just a little hard to replace, so they wisely gave him his week off.

Kit did talk a little bit about his work, telling them about their election coverage, which surprised Hannah. “Why would a student magazine cover something like that?”

“Because Rick wants to bring substantial information too, Hannah, not just where the cool bars are. He believes in providing everything a student might want to know, and some students are interested in politics. Besides, perhaps the election series will make us youngsters get interested in politics,” Kit added. “I’ve been registered to vote since I was eighteen, but this will be the first year I actually do it. Covering politics made me interested enough in the process to want to take part in it.”

“Well, then I’d say it’s a good thing,” John said with a nod. “Young furs need to be involved. If they don’t use their voice, they let all the old fogeys make their decisions for them,” he chuckled. “So, who are you voting for?”

“I’m something of an independent who’d like to see some real change in Washington, so I’m supporting Ron Paul,” Kit grinned. “My sister and most of my family are hardcore Republicans, but that should be no surprise, since she’s rich. She’s all for Mitt Romney.”

“I’ve never thought to ask her about politics,” John chuckled.

“Don’t tell me you’re one of those nutzoid liberal college crackpot professors,” Kit teased.

“Nutzoid crackpot, no, liberal professor, yes,” he smiled.

“And he’s entirely wrong, of course,” Hannah said simply. “This is a true mixed marriage, Kit. He’s a liberal Democrat, I’m a moderate Republican.”

“That must make for some fireworks come election time,” Kit noted.

“On the contrary, our debates are quite calm. I tell him how much he’s wrong, and he keeps refusing to listen,” Hannah said loftily, which made Kit laugh. Hannah had a very subtle sense of humor.

“Well, I’m going to register to vote when I get home,” Jessie said. “I’m going to register as an independent, since I’m not really swayed by either party.”

“Thought about the election, Jessica?”

She made a noncommittal sound. “I’m still listening to all the candidates. I haven’t really made up my mind yet.”

“Always good to keep an open mind,” John nodded.

“Did you read the article about Foxy, Mom?” Jessie asked.

“I did,” she answered. “And I have to admit, Kit, you did make her sound like something more than a tramp. I still say she’s a tramp, but she has much more of a story than I believed at first.” The phone rang, and John reached over to pick it up. “But I still can’t agree with her decision. She seemed a smart femme, she could have found some other way to get her education. Student loans, work, something.”

“Well, we’ll have to disagree on that point, Mom,” Jessie said. “You haven’t met her, or talked to her. She’s nothing like what I expected.”

“I’m afraid this isn’t a good time to talk,” John was saying into the phone. “Yes, I can understand that, but we have company right now. No, Monday evening is fine. Talk to you then. Goodbye,” he said, then he hung up the phone and gave Kit a serious look. “Kit, that was your uncle.”

“Uncle? Who?” he demanded.

“He said his name was Brian,” he answered.

“What did he want?” Kit asked, a little suspiciously.

“To talk,” John said honestly. “He said he wanted to get to know us. He said right up front that he wanted to try to reconcile with you, so learning about us was one step towards it.”

Kit frowned. Brian was...well, he was a wild card in the family. He was an uncle and as such he was fully cognizant of what the family did to him, but he was also the only elder in the family that showed any kind of remorse or reluctance. Kit had no idea what he was up to, calling Jessie's family, but he was also damn well going to find out. "Let me call Vil," he said, standing up. "They know better than that. They are supposed to leave me alone, that's part of the deal. I didn't make this agreement and give them back their money just have to have them start interfering with my life."

Kit retreated upstairs to make the call. Vil answered on the third ring, and from the sound of it, she was on board her jet. "Hey bro, what's up?"

"Vil, Uncle Brian just called here," he said.

"I know. He asked for their number," she said calmly.

"What? You let him?" Kit asked, almost astounded.

"Of course I let him," she answered simply. "Brian seems quite sincere, Kit. Of all the elders, he was the only one that ever showed any real concern for you. That's why I tried so hard to get him to help you," she explained. "You know, it's really weird. Sarah was so close to Dad, I always thought that she was the one that would have been easiest to convince. But, I guess she was in Dad's pocket too much," she sighed. "Of course, Uncle Brian never went against Dad either, but he did show some concern for you."

"Sis, we had a deal," he protested. "They leave me alone, I leave them alone. I don't want Brian nosing around my life. I will never forgive him. You tell him that."

“I think you’re being a little too harsh, bro,” she said honestly. “The will is voided. Let him at least try to prove himself to you.”

“I think I’m not being harsh enough,” Kit returned. “Where was his concern when I needed him? Where was he when I had a broken back? Protecting his money, that’s where,” he snapped. “He only decides to try to get back into my life after it’s safe for him to do it. He never risked anything the way you did, sis. He made his decision, and now he has to live with it. He chose his money over me, and I’ll never forgive him for it. So tell him to back off. I don’t want him contacting Jessie’s family, I don’t want him contacting anyone in Austin, I don’t want him anywhere near me.”

Vil sighed. “Are you sure you won’t even hear him out?”

“I won’t even give him the time of day,” he declared bluntly.

“Alright, I’ll talk to him,” she said, in a disappointed voice. “But I think you’re being too stubborn about this, Kit. I worked very hard to get you back into the family, and despite his disapproval of your marriage, Brian is at least trying. You should at least try in return.”

“He’s trying about two years too late,” Kit said bluntly.

“Alright. I need to hang up real soon, bro, we’re about to take off in a minute or so, and I’ve found that my phone doesn’t get good reception in the air.”

“Where are you going?”

“Washington. I have to testify in front of the Armed Services Committee tomorrow, and I didn’t want to fly down on the same day. I have a friend down there I want to see, anyway.”

“A friend? Who?”

“A friend from Oxford,” she said, suddenly demure. “He’s over visiting some friends who work in the English embassy.”

“Oho, is this the answer that that ticking clock you were hearing around Christmas?” he asked lightly.

She laughed. “Maybe,” she admitted. “His name is Kendall Brighton.”

“The Brightons? As in Brighton Industries?”

“That’s them,” she affirmed. “So it would be a marriage of equals, and a good business arrangement. They’re Britain’s version of Vulpan Shipyards, so at least he’s someone I have a lot in common with.” She laughed. “His father introduced us at a mixer at Oxford, which I didn’t completely appreciate at the time, since I had the feeling he was throwing his son at me. That opinion changed after I talked to him, though. Kendall just graduated in December. He’s tall and handsome, with this little black dot under his chin that’s cute,” she said with a surprising giggle. “Outside of that, he’s exactly what you’d expect from a British fox from a family like the Brightons. Sophisticated, well mannered, educated, and intelligent.”

“I’ve never heard you talk like this about a male,” he teased.

She laughed. “I’ve been too busy being the Ice Queen to act like a femme,” she said. “I certainly don’t love Kendall, at least not yet, but at least he’s interesting enough for me to see what’s there.”

“Well, good luck, sis.”

“You should come meet him,” she said. “Can you fly over?”

“No, we’ll have to do that some other time,” he told her. “I have to fly back to Austin tonight, and I’d rather spend this time with Jessie’s family.”

“Okay then. But you do need to meet him, bro.”

“He’s the rich guy, he can fly down to Austin.”

Vil laughed. “Say the word, and you can be rich too,” she told him.

“No thanks,” he said dryly. “I’ll earn my own millions, thank you.”

She laughed. “Then get to work, bro!” she teased. They said their goodbyes, and Kit went back to the living room.

“What did she say?” John asked.

“Brian won’t call you again,” Kit said, a bit sternly. “I want him nowhere near me, and nowhere near you.”

John and Hannah traded a brief look, then Hannah changed the subject. “Have you decided where you’re going to live? Jessie mentioned that the apartments will be under construction.”

“We’re still talking to Lupe about that,” Kit said. “We can stay in our old apartment until the new ones are done, that’s not a problem, but I’m not too keen on doing the move into a new apartment close to a construction zone with a newborn. We’ll either stay in our apartment until they’re totally done on the far side of the block, or we’ll move into another apartment somewhere else temporarily if we can’t do that.”

“How long is it supposed to take them to do the construction over on the other side?”

“Lupe says they’ll be done in about five months for the duplexes, and six months for the other buildings,” Kit answered. “He has three contracting companies over there working under the architects. One company will be building the community center, one will be building the duplexes, and the third will be building the apartment buildings to give the current tenants somewhere to live when they tear the old ones down. They're putting so many workers on the project because the bank demanded that the construction schedule had the entire project completed within a year in order for him to get the loan."

"That's a strange condition," Hannah noted.

"Not really," Kit answered. "Apartment complexes don't earn any money if they can't hold tenants. The bank wants to see some returns on their investment, so they were willing to loan Lupe enough to hire enough workers to get the work done in a year. That assumes that there are no delays, which are common in construction. But that's not Lupe's problem. The bank can't penalize him if the actual construction takes longer than a year if it's an issue with the contractors. But that'd be the contractor's loss. They get a bonus if they finish on time, and an even bigger one if they finish early, and they'll lose it if they run over."

"Won't that encourage them to cut corners?"

"You've never built anything in Texas, John," Kit chuckled. "The regulators there are pretty strict. They'll inspect all of the contractors' work before they sign off on it and let Lupe start moving furs in. If the contractors cut corners, they have to fix everything, and that runs them over time and they lose their bonus. They're best off just doing the work and doing it right. They'll earn much more money than if they try to cheat."

"I hope you move before the baby comes," Hannah said. "A baby needs a stable environment."

“I hope so too,” Kit agreed. “The three companies are supposed to combine into a single force to build the rest of the complex after they finish that part of it,” he continued, reciting what Lupe had told him a few days ago. “Lupe said there should be a small army there doing the work. It’s going to take an army to build a complex that takes up an entire city block from the ground up in a year.”

“Lupe’s sure they can do it,” Jessie added. “He said his project manager is positive they can finish, that they’ve set up a schedule that finishes in eleven months.”

“Well, we’ll see,” Kit noted.

It was a great visit.

Kit and Jessie enjoyed a wonderful early dinner prepared by Hannah, and then, at six o’clock, Jessie’s family drove them back to the airport. There were the usual goodbyes and promises to call, but there was also reality, the reality that Kit had work in the morning, and Jessie had school.

For the flight back, Kit did manage to get a flight plan filed, and that let them fly home with him trying out the plane at its service ceiling of 25,000 feet, where he would get some serious fuel efficiency. Flying that high again required oxygen, and also introduced Jessie to one of the little annoying parts of altitude flight...pressure differences. She spent nearly ten minutes trying to get her ears to pop, but once she finally did and the cockpit warmed up, she was comfortable flying at such high altitude. Kit felt a little restricted flying on a flight plan, but it was worth it with that gallons per hour number on his display. He didn’t have the tailwind this time, but he was still going to get home without stopping for gas, and do it without landing while running on fumes.

She did her homework in the plane, balancing her laptop on her lap and typing on it as Kit took advantage of the autopilot and used his own laptop to surf the net...just because he could.

Jessie didn't let him get away with it, though. He'd let Jenny and Hannah fly the plane, so after she finished her homework, she demanded her own turn. Kit laughed and complied to her request, teaching her the rough basics of the idea of flight, about the three axes and the controls that moved the plane along them, then enabled the copilot controls and let her have at it. She flew the plane for nearly twenty minutes, and he let her make a couple of very slow and gentle turns in a zigzag that put them back on their original course, then let her descend to 23,500 feet before going back up to the cruise altitude of 24,500 feet...then getting bitched out by the traffic controller for deviating from his flight path's assigned altitude. He passed it off as an autopilot snafu, which made Jessie giggle as he lied baldly over the radio. After that, they put it back on autopilot, and Jessie finally broached a subject she'd been avoiding.

"Alright, my handsome fox," she said in the tone of a femme about to do war, reaching down and picking up the portable urinal. "Look out the window."

Kit almost knocked the plane off course laughing. It was a good thing it was on autopilot.

He certainly didn't make it easy on her, giving a grinding vocal rendition of stripper music, which earned him a smack, but she did eventually manage to get her business completed satisfactorily. "I'm putting a towel or a bag in here to hide these when we take them out of the plane,” she declared, which made him laugh again.

They got home a little after midnight, landing in the chilly night as Jessie took video of them landing to send back to her parents. They were in the door about 1:00am, and since Jessie had napped on the plane, she wasn't as tired as Kit was when they carried their luggage into the apartment. “I'll make you a cup of tea, my handsome fox,” she offered.

“No, I'm just going to bed,” he told her. He then found her all over, him, giving him a crushing hug, and receiving a passionate kiss.

“Thank you, my handsome fox,” she smiled. “Thank you for taking me to see my folks. And thank you for being so wonderful.”

He laughed. “You can show your gratitude by coming to bed,” he told her, dropping their suitcase by the couch. “I can't sleep without someone to snuggle, and I'd rather not go wake up Sheila.”

Jessie laughed and took his paw, then shooed him towards the bedroom. “I'll lock up and set the alarm,” she told him.

Kit showed pictures of their trip at work the next day, and even showed them the video Jessie made of them landing at Georgetown. They were all impressed, and he had to field quite a few questions and inquiries as to if he could fly them out to South Padre Island or Houston. But the serious part of the day happened after that, when the office was visited by two male furs wearing dark suits.

Kit was working on the questions he was going to ask Congressman Smith tomorrow at their interview when they came into his office. One of them was a cat with gray tabbled fur and the other was a badger, and they came in and closed the door. “Kit Vulpan, I’m Sergeant Brown of the Austin Police,” the cat said, showing him his badge as he approached his desk. “My partner, Sergeant Wilson.”

“APD? What can I do for you?” Kit asked, in a bit of confusion.

“It’s about the article you wrote,” the badger told him. “The one in your Friday issue.”

“What about it?”

“We’d like for you to answer some questions about this femme you called Jane Doe and where she works,” the cat told him. “The commissioner of the Austin Police read your article, and he wants to find and shut down the illegal brothel if it’s operating in this city.”

“I’m sorry, I can’t help you,” Kit said immediately, quickly forming his thought so he gave away nothing about Allison, not even her gender. “That fur was an anonymous source for a journalism article. I won’t reveal anything about him or her, nor will I answer any questions about the article.”

“Aren’t you interested in helping the femmes that might still be forced to work there?”

“What I want or don’t want makes no difference,” Kit told them. “I made a promise to keep my source’s identity a secret, and I will not break my word. I’m sorry, but I can’t tell you anything. It’s nothing personal, I assure you.”

“Your article said you met her somewhere between here and Atlanta. Is she even in Texas?” the badger asked. “If you tell us that much, we can leave you be and refer the matter to another state.”

“I’m sorry, but if I answer one question, you’ll expect me to answer other questions. So I’m afraid I will answer no questions about my source or about the article. It’s a journalist’s right to protect his sources.”

“I’m not entirely sure we’re willing to take that answer, Mister Vulpan,” the cat said. “The DA is already starting an investigation. He may subpoena you.”

“Let him, I’ll just sit on the stand and repeat what I just told you. Like I said, it’s nothing personal, but I cannot help you. Now, in the interests of keeping things cordial and polite, I’ll ask that you kindly take your leave and let me get back to work. Because I’m afraid I can’t say anything more.”

The two officers looked at each other, and the cat nodded. “Thank you for being polite, at least,” he said, offering his paw. Kit stood and shook it. “I’m obligated to leave you my card in case you change your mind.”

“I understand,” he said, taking the officer’s card when he offered it. “And thank you for being polite as well. It raises my respect for the Austin police. Have a good day, now.”

“We will, thank you. By the way, off the record, I thought it was a damn good article,” he smiled.

Kit chuckled. “Thanks,” he said.

That was the first indication that the article had caused a reaction. He found out around lunch just how much it did, for Marty was inundated with emails about it. Furs commenting on it, asking questions about it, asking where this femme really was, both emails asking to help Allison and a few crude ones asking to hire her, there were hundreds of emails about it, many of them requests for the magazine to put the article up on their website.

Mike had done so, as well as opening a forum on the site so furs could discuss the article on a message board...and boy, did that stress the servers. All those different viewpoints flying around, from religious zealots who denounced Allison to the snarky cheeseballs who were asking for her number to the femme-rights militants who used the article as a springboard to spout rhetoric about how unfair the world was to femmes. Quite a few furs supported Allison, quite a few denounced her, much as Hannah did, unable to look past what she did no matter how logical a decision it was for her. Mike had to go in and moderate it when the messages started becoming flames.

But, the one thing that mattered to Kit was that a great many furs thought it was a very thought-provoking article. It made furs think, it made them take an issue and see it in an entirely new light, from a startling new direction, letting them look inside something dark and unpleasant and see that things were not what they always appeared to be.

And that was one of things journalism was all about.

Rick told him that there wasn't an issue to be found anywhere on campus, and for the first time ever, it had sold out in College Station and San Antonio in the limited news stands where it was sold. But, Rick told him, it wasn't just Kit's article that did it, for Barry's election piece had also generated quite a bit of email traffic.

But what was most flattering to Kit, ten separate magazines and websites had contacted the magazine, looking to lease the right to reprint it. Rick would earn some money by selling those rights, and the magazine and Kit himself would get more visibility because the article would retain his byline and give credit to Lone Star as the original publisher. But, what mattered more to Kit was that Allison's intriguing story would reach more readers.

"It's not just this one," Rick told Kit, who was working on Monday in place of the Friday he took off, as Kit sat in Rick's office and Rick both talked to him and typed on his workstation. "The statewide magazine The Texan asked to lease reprint rights on all the election articles we've done so far and for ones we're gonna do, and I also got an offer from the American Statesman to reprint the articles for a section they're going to do starting next Monday, since we're coming up on the primary. They said we did a lot of their work for them," he grinned.

"Are you going to do it?"

"Sure, they're paying for it," Rick chuckled. "And we keep the byline, so it's also free advertising."

"Well, both of those are good. Does that mean we're getting raises?" Kit asked with a playful grin.

"You wish," Rick growled in reply. "I'm going to reinvest that money."

"Hey cousin," Sheila called from the door. "Wanna do lunch?"

"Sheila, it isn't even ten yet."

"Yeah I know, just lockin' you down," she told him.

"Well, sure then. Where do you wanna go?"

"I got plans," she winked.

"Alright, I'll let you surprise me," he said, then Sheila padded off when Savid called for her. "Okay, now back to this raise," Kit prompted.

Rick laughed. “I’m going to invest that money in the magazine,” he repeated. “I’m going to expand our pages per issue, increase our circulation, and I’m thinking of hiring someone with professional photography experience. Lilly and Rick are good, I’ll never take that from them, but I’d like someone with some formal training on staff, so they’re not always running around taking pictures when they could be doing their normal jobs.”

“Sounds good. Where’s the extra money coming from?”

“I’m gettin’ a hell of a lot more advertising offers,” he said. “That’s one reason why I’m plannin’ on expanding our pages per issue, that’s more net revenue. Always before, fillin’ those extra pages with viable content was the trick, but that’s not hard anymore. Things have really grown here, son. Lilly’s started doing some real writing, I have your journals, School Daze, you’re a damn good writer on top of researching, Barry’s work has become fantastic since you came on and took the researching pressure off of him, and that lets both of you put out a lot more content than before. There’s that, and I also want to start both a photo spread and a submitted reader photo page, just random nice shots, as well as a couple of new weekly features I’ll be introducing at our next major staff meetin’.”

“Which is why you want a staff photographer.”

“Yeah. Things are really moving here, son, and I want the magazine to keep pushing the envelope. I want us to be a magazine for school kids that’s read by more than just school kids. I want to see expanded circulation, more sale units distributed, and thirty-eight pages per issue as our new target length.”

“I’ve noticed. You’re putting Barry on more and more real news, and there’s the election special, and Lilly’s been pulling some actual writing assignments on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, when she’d usually just spend all day dicking around with the Scene page or going out and taking the pictures you need.”

Rick nodded. “It’s not going to be entirely cheap to expand, but I think we can make it. It’s gonna be tight for a few weeks, when our expenses outrun our revenue until it all evens out.”

He said it impulsively. “Well, Rick, if you’re interested on taking on a partner, I’d be willing to invest,” he said. “I work here, after all, if I can’t believe we’d turn a profit, I should get another job.”

Rick gave him a serious look. “You mean that, son? I thought you were broke.”

“Not as broke as I was two weeks ago,” he said, then he explained about the bonds. “I have fifteen thousand bucks sitting around waiting for an investment opportunity, at least I will after three months when the CDs mature, and what better opportunity than right here?”

“Son, you and Jessie need to come over for dinner tonight,” he said quickly. “Let’s sit down and talk about it.”

“I’d be happy to. I’ll bring over a business plan I wrote up a while ago, and we’ll see if my ideas for the magazine come close to yours.”

“Bring it. I’d love to see your ideas.”

“I keep it in the bottom drawer of my desk,” Kit laughed.

“Go get it. I’ll look it over and we’ll discuss it at dinner tonight.”

“Sure.”

Sheila’s lunch plans were not for an intimate family affair. They went to the Burger King by campus, and as they sat down at a booth, Allison came in. She waved to them, then came over and sat down. “Hey,” she said.

“Heya,” Sheila smiled. “I brought him.”

“Thanks. It’s good to see you,” she said, shaking his paw.

“How you been? Enjoying the lightened workload?” he asked carefully.

“Yes, school is much easier now that I’m not working,” she told him with a light smile. “I saw your article. I liked it very much.”

“Thanks,” he told her. “I didn’t know you knew my cousin.”

“Well, she’s very interesting,” Allison said mildly. “I find her easy to talk to and fun to be with, so we’ve been palling around since we, ah, met each other last week.”

Kit gave Sheila a surprised look, and she nodded with a grin. “We get along well together. Ally rocks,” she winked. “Way more fun than you two,” she teased.

“I’m, I’m really glad to hear that, Allison, and Jessie will be too. She’s really worried about you.”

“That’s very kind of her. Your wife is very sweet. A little naïve, but very sweet.”

“Well, I like her that way,” Kit said with a chuckle.

Allison ordered some food, and they had a very nice lunch. Again, they made smalltalk, leaving Allison's article and her history alone since they were in public, but Kit was just glad to see her, and what was more important, overjoyed that she'd found someone to be her friend. Sheila wouldn't care a whit that she was a former stripper and prostitute; in Sheila's eyes, that just made her more fun. Sheila would be a good friend that would push Allison and try to make her have fun, keep her engaged, and help her try to find herself by being someone she could talk to about anything, someone with whom she could be honest without being judged.

After looking at it for a moment, he realized that Sheila was the perfect choice for a friend for Allison. Someone fearless and fun-loving, and someone that knew the truth of her and didn't care a bit. Sheila would reintroduce Allison to the world, slowly integrate her into her circle of friends, which were also Jessie and his friends, and slowly wear down the protective shell she kept around herself until she could break out of it and be her own femme. He realized that Allison would slowly become part of the circle of furs that were their friends...and he didn't mind at all.

Chapter 23

The honeymoon between Jessie and their baby was over.

She scrambled out of bed five minutes before the alarm went off, rushed down the hall, and Kit heard her noisily retching into the commode. It might have concerned Kit to hear his wife throwing up if he didn't know she was pregnant, for that was the first time she'd done it. Much to Jessie's discontent, morning sickness was not going to pass her by.

At least she was ready for it. Doctor MacNair had explained the phenomenon to them thoroughly at her last exam, how it was inconsistent in when it struck and how long it would make her nauseous, and that it did not, as the name might suggest, occur only in the morning. The doctor had given Jessie a series of useful tips if she was struck with the condition, and from the sound of it, Jessie would start following those helpful hints today; eat small meals, avoid hot rooms, eat soda crackers or salty potato chips to settle her stomach enough for a meal if she felt queasy, take short naps, and avoid laying down after a meal.

But, Doctor Mac had been almost dead on with her prediction, Kit noted. She said that morning sickness tended to begin showing up during the sixth week of pregnancy, and the March 5 day showing on the calendar near the bed showed that Jessie was about halfway through her sixth week. Doctor Macnair said that Jessie conceived somewhere between January 26 and January 28, an actual estimate of January 27 with a little margin for error, and that put March 5 three days into her sixth week of pregnancy.

That calendar, the Countdown Calendar as Jessie called it, was segmented by weeks of pregnancy and indications and other features that Doc Mac told them to expect. He knew that Jessie had already, rather morosely, scribbled start getting fat on the May page. That was the month that Doctor Mac said that Jessie would start showing visible signs of her pregnancy obvious to the casual observer, her “baby bump.”

Though she was modest, Jessie was still proud of her sexy physique, and the thought of getting fat was not the greatest thought in the world to her. But, it was what she called her “happy sacrifice,” and she could always get her figure back after the delivery.

Outside of this morning sickness, things were going swimmingly with Jessie’s pregnancy. She was almost disgustingly healthy, as Doctor Mac put it, and their baby was perfectly healthy inside her. Her pregnancy was progressing in an almost textbook manner, and Doctor Mac joked that their baby shared its parents’ love of routine and preparation, habits ingrained in his job as a researcher and her preparation to become an English teacher. “You’re giving birth to a banker,” she teased them.

In the two weeks since they’d gone to see Jessie’s family, there had been quite a bit going on in their lives. Kit and Jessie had sat down and talked with Rick and Martha about investing in the magazine, and Kit had found that nearly 90% of what he put in the business plan he’d drawn up for the magazine was also in Rick’s plan. Over dinner, Rick and Kit drew up a contract which would let Kit buy into the magazine as a part owner, and receive a percentage of the profits in return for a $15,000 investment which he’d pay in installments, as the CDs he’d bought matured and he could cash them out. He did begin with a $5,000 initial payment, taken out their crisis reserves, which would be replaced as the CDs holding that money locked up matured. That $5,000 would help the magazine afford expanding their pages per issue for those critical three weeks between the increase and securing enough advertising to pay for it, as that meant it cost more per unit to have the magazine published. For those three weeks, Kit's money would literally be paying everyone's salaries...including his own.

A touch ironic, that.

That salary would include the photographer. Rick had already put the ads out in the paper, Monster, and other online sites, as well as telling the Job Placement Services office at U.T. what he was looking for in case any recent graduates were looking for a job. Rick already had a lot of experience dealing with U.T., for he'd finally arranged the intern deal with them to replace Sheila. Starting with the summer semester, the office would have two unpaid interns, changing every semester, who would be learning about journalism from inside a magazine. Rick had only wanted one at first, but the school convinced him to take on two, since the university was having trouble finding enough intern positions for its journalism school. The journalism school took Lone Star a hell of a lot more seriously now than they did just six months ago, for the magazine had evolved from a quaint little Friday student rag to a magazine that put out real news and had some unique and innovative features. It said a lot for the magazine's credibility that the school of journalism actually lobbied Rick to take on two interns rather than one.

And that was just one of the busy aspects of friends involved with their daily lives. Lupe had been running around like a maniac for over a month, because a virtual army of construction workers had descended on the far side of the new pool. Kit was astounded at how fast they moved. When they first arrived, the combined companies knocked down every building left on the block and ripped up their foundations, working 24 hours a day despite Lupe's assurances they'd only be working 10 hours a day, while the pool builders finished pouring the concrete and let it cure. They couldn't run heavy machinery around the pool area as the concrete cured. Despite working around the clock, though, the denizens of Westwood really didn't mind all that much. They didn't do any loud work after sunset, mainly just cleaning up and laying out their planned construction, and the worst complaints Lupe had to deal with were the lights they used after dark to illuminate the job site. After about a week, after an inspector had signed off that the pool cement had cured properly and the pool builders could start on the deck, diving boards, and slides, the three companies broke up to begin their individual tasks. In the week since they started their individual assignments, there was already significant visual signs of progress. The foundation of the first duplex row and the the first apartment building had been laid out, and work had already begun on them. The third company, building the large community center that would anchor the pool, had started excavating so it could lay the pipes that would go into the foundation. Inspectors and workers from the water service, city sewer authority, power company, cable company, phone company, and gas company were already on site, coordinating with the contractors to set up the utilities the buildings would use. The old Westwood was all electric, but the new Westwood would offer natural gas hookups for kitchen stoves and kitchen stoves only. Dryers and air conditioning units would still only be electric. Gas would also be hooked up to the community center, though, running its heat during the winter and supplying gas for the large kitchen that would be in the building.

The utilities were taking advantage of the construction, too. Lupe had already contracted with the phone company to allow them to build a major repeater station in the basement of the community center, acting as a hub for their DSL service, which would give any DSL users in the complex very high speed; the further from a repeater one was, the worse DSL was. Being literally in the same complex as the repeater would give all the complex fast and reliable DSL. The cable company decided to use the complex as a hub as well, already planning to run a new heavy bandwidth trunk line to the complex to radiate out to the surrounding neighborhood as part of their broadband upgrade project in Austin. The fringe benefit for allowing them to do that for Westwood was a dedicated low-population trunk feeding off that major line, which would give cable modem users in the complex blazing speed with virtually no slowdown during peak use hours. Be it DSL or cable, the complex would have some screaming fast internet. The power company was already starting work on the surrounding power lines to prepare for the increased demand on the block, and the water company was also looking at installing a larger main to service the new apartments.

Kit gave Lupe his fifteen minutes of fame. He did a story on the new complex and interviewed Lupe professionally, then Rick ran it in last week's issue, along with Kit's interview of Lamar Smith. They put in some architect's sketches of what the new Westwood would look like, and the article talked about the number of units there would be, what services the new complex would offer, and highlighted its proximity to U.T. and the fact that the AMTA had agreed to start a shuttle from the complex to the school once the complex was finished, which would give students a special reduced fare bus ride to campus and back with arrivals and departures every 20 minutes from 7am to 9pm Monday through Friday, 7am to 5pm every half hour on Saturday, and special service directly to and from the stadium on home game days.

Kit had promised Lupe space in the magazine, and the complex was of interest to students of U.T. since it was being built aimed at housing them, so the article more than deserved to run in the magazine. And maybe it would help Lupe fill up with signed leases to show the bank when they started doubting the sanity of giving him so much money to get the complex built so fast.

Allison had faded into the background of their lives over the weeks, but still reared her head indirectly. Sheila and Allison were almost inseparable, and as a result they didn't see Sheila quite as often. She came over only about once a week and still came to poker, but going out with Allison now took up most of her time. The two of them were the anchor of a brand new Party Pack made up of Sheila, Allison, and members of the sorority, mainly Danielle, the other Jessie, Sandy, and Lisa. Much as he expected, Allison had been integrated into Sheila's circle of friends, and Sheila had told him that she got along very well with the sorority girls. They had no idea just who she was—well, Sandy did because she'd seen the picture of Allison giving Kit a lap dance, but she kept it secret from the others—and treated her well, if being just a bit jealous of her. Allison was drop dead gorgeous, and femmes sometimes couldn't help but feel a little threatened by another femme who was so much prettier than they were. But, Allison gelled well with Sheila, and Kit was sure she'd be just fine. Sheila would teach her how to have fun again, something that she'd forgotten in the years she'd been a stripper and prostitute.

But her impact on his life was still front and center. The article had attracted huge attention, and Rick had received four requests to reprint it from other magazines, as well as continued emails coming in about it. Sheila kept Allison informed, joked with her that she was a rock star now.

Kit had also received another visit from the Austin Police, trying to get him to reveal anything about the article. Their last visit was them nearly begging just to have him answer if he met the femme in Austin or some other city, just so they'd know if they could retire the matter, but Kit would not budge. He would not answer any question, for if he answered just one question, they would try to make him answer another, then another, and so on and so on. He kept Allison's identity an absolute secret, and there were only four furs who know that secret outside of him and Allison. Jessie, Sheila, Sandy, and Mike were the only ones who knew, for Sandy had heard him talk about Allison and seen the picture of her, and Mike had been there when he asked her all those questions and wasn't drunk enough to forget it. He pieced it together after he happened across Allison's picture while going through old photos, but he agreed along with his family and Sandy that it had to be kept an absolute secret. He even deleted all his copies of Allison's pictures he had from the bachelor party.

Kit sat up in bed, arched his back until it popped, then swung his legs out. Today was a big day for him, for his medical certification had expired without him realizing it, nearly two weeks ago. He'd literally flown to Cincinnati with four days left on his eligibility, and since he'd not left the FAA a forwarding address, they'd had no way to send him a reminder to renew his medical certification until Vil registered his plane in his name. The expiration warning had arrived last week, a week after his medical certification expired, and he'd had scheduled this exam to get it back. He wouldn't have any penalty for it, he just had to either visit the FAA office at Bergstrom or fax in a copy of the certification to them, and they'd send him his new license. The license part of his license didn't expire for eight more years, only his medical clearance had to be renewed. Today, he had an exam scheduled to get his medical certificate for his pilot's license, which would grant him another year of flight status.

And it would be a war. Kit's injuries had caused him a huge hassle last year, for the doctor examining had deferred him, put his flight status on suspension so the FAA could examine his physical health and determine if he was flight worthy. His doctor had given him six hours worth of tests and exercises to prove his back wouldn't prevent him from flying safely, then he sent it all to the FAA for their determination...and that took two months. He'd gone for his physical in late December, got deferred and went back for the follow-up tests in early January, and it was late February when the FAA finally approved him and sent him his license. He knew that this doctor as well would question the condition of his back, but this time he was armed with all the tests and results of his last physical to show the doctor that he'd already been thoroughly examined, and passed by the FAA. He knew he'd still be facing an exhaustive examination, but he was positive he wouldn't get deferred this time. It would just take all day.

A fun way to spend his day off.

Jessie came back into the bedroom and sat on the bed by him, smacking her chops with an unpleasant expression. "I need to brush my teeth," she complained. "I'd kiss you, my handsome fox, but you do not want to do that right now."

He laughed. "I'll dare the Godzilla breath," he said, leaning over and giving her a quick peck on the lips. "Better now?"

"Mmm," she nodded, putting her paw on her lower stomach gingerly. "I don't think our baby liked that lasagna we had last night. And I was hoping I wouldn't get morning sickness," she complained, flopping back on the bed. "I hope it doesn't last long. Doctor Mac said it could last a few days, or a whole month."

"Well, let's wait and see. Just keep her tips in mind."

"Yeah, I'll go buy some Lays after class, some of those little lunch size bags, and carry them around with me. She said they were the best thing to squash my nausea while I'm at school."

"If you leave a few minutes early, you can swing by Circle K and pick up a couple of those little grab bags," he told her.

"That's a good idea. Let me get into the shower, then," she said, standing up. She started forward, but Kit grabbed her by her longhaired tail and stopped her. "Turn around," he ordered, making a circling motion with his finger. She laughed and complied, turning to face him, and he gave her a thorough visual inspection. "Nothing yet," he reported.

She laughed, striking a little pose for him, which was really sexy since she was nude. "So, I'm still your supermodel?" she teased.

"You always will be, even when you're about to deliver," he answered. "Now go hop in the shower, I'll start breakfast."

"No thanks," she said, making a face. "I'll leave a little early and grab something at school, I'm not in the mood to eat right now."

"Okay. But take your vitamins, and I'll start the tea."

"Make me some Earl Gray," she said, turning and heading for the bathroom. Kit put on a pair of shorts and wandered into the kitchen and got the water for the tea going. He turned off the alarm and went out for the paper, and found the door opening behind him. Sheila came in wearing her workout shorts and a tank top despite the thirty degree morning. The weather the last week or so had been really wild. It would be in the 30s in the morning but rise up to the 70s during the day. That was usual, the crew told him, the precursor to the hot Austin summer. Spring came early in Texas.

“Kit,” she called. “You ready?”

“Do I look ready?” he countered. “Let me get the tea going, you want some?” he asked.

“Sure!” she said, closing the door. “She in the shower?”

“Yeah.”

“She coming?”

“She has school today, and she says you cheat.”

Sheila laughed. “She just doesn’t have the guts to play racquetball with me,” Sheila teased. “She spends half her time running away from the ball. Where’s your bag?”

“In the den,” he said. “But we can’t play a full set, I have that physical at eight thirty.”

“No problem, Rick always bitches when I come in late anyway,” she laughed. “Oh, I do have something to show you, though. I got the new Iphone!”

“Such a lemming,” he teased.

“It’s awesome,” she countered. “It can do so much!”

“I’ll keep my Blackberry, thanks,” he said, pouring water into teacups. “Come get it.”

She bounded into the kitchen and took the cup of steaming water, then went to the cupboard where he kept tea. He’d finally broke down and started having Connecticut Tea Company tea shipped to him, buying direct from their website, so they finally had decent tea. The only problem was that he had to order large boxes, so it was rather pricy. He had bought regular tea, a box of Earl Gray since both he and Jessie liked to drink it from time to time, and a gift box filled with a variety of flavored and herbal teas to satisfy Jessie’s curiosity and occasional taste for something new, but Sheila went for the regular tea. “Get me a regular too, please,” he said as he finished pouring the water. One of the things he liked about it was he bought loose leaf tea, which came in little packets, rather than tea bags. He’d always favored loose leaf tea over bags, it just tasted better. Jessie had to get used to the idea of that, but she rather liked it after she learned how not to drink too much of the loose leaf.

“What’s Jessie drinking?”

“Earl Gray,” he answered.

“She been trying out the flavor box?”

He nodded as she handed him a packet. “Tries a different flavor every night.”

“I need to order another box,” she noted to herself. “I’m down to my last week’s worth.”

Jessie came into the kitchen wearing a robe, and took the tea Kit had prepared for her with a grateful nod. “Hey Sheila, come to take him for racquetball?”

“Yeah. You gonna come play soon?”

“When you stop hitting the ball at me on purpose,” she accused.

Sheila laughed. “Then never,” she winked.

“I’ll make you a deal. I’ll play racquetball with you tomorrow if you play tennis with me on Saturday.”

“You drive a hard bargain,” she accused.

“Well, Kit’s too good, I can never beat him,” Jessie complained. “He makes me run all over the court!”

“Well, we do play for the exercise,” Kit noted calmly, which made Sheila laugh.

“You make it Thursday afternoon, you have a deal.”

“That’s fine, just remember I don’t get out til after five.”

“Just wait for golf season,” Sheila grinned. “I already joined a country club, and they open for the season on Saturday,” she said eagerly.

“I didn’t know you play golf,” Jessie said with surprise.

“I love it. Kit, not so much.”

“I don’t mind golf, but swinging the club makes my back ache after a while,” he said mildly. “So I don’t play very much.”

“See? But I’ll need a partner, and hey, you said you’d try almost any sport once. So, wanna play golf with me?”

“Sure, I’ll try it,” Jessie said with a nod. “Is there some place I can rent or borrow some clubs?”

“We’re about the same size, we’ll see how you do with mine,” Sheila told her.

“You’re gonna let a whiffer use your driver? You’re brave,” Kit noted, which made Sheila laugh and Jessie give him a flinty look.

“Oh, since I have both of you here, I wanted to ask something,” she said. “Kit, would you do me a huge favor?”

“What?”

“Can you fly me, Allision, and Danielle out to South Padre Island on Friday morning, then come get us Sunday evening? I’ll pay for the gas,” she offered.

“I guess I can. Did you ask Rick for Friday off?”

She nodded. “I’m gonna work next Saturday to make up for it. So that’s all set.”

“Well, I can manage it, as long as I pass my physical today,” he chuckled.

“How long will that take to get your license back?” Jessie asked.

“Back? You lost it?” Sheila asked.

“My medical certificate expired,” he explained to her. “And it’ll take all of one day to get my license back. I get my physical certificate, make a phone call and fax it to the FAA, or take it to the satellite office they have at Bergstrom, and I’m legal again. If I go to Bergstrom, I’ll walk out with a temporary license til my new license gets here by mail. If I fax it in, they’ll mail it to me, and fax me a temporary license like I’d get if I go to Bergstrom.”

“Oh, cool beans,” Sheila said. “So, it’s a go?”

“I’d be happy to take you,” he said with a nod.

Sheila gave him a huge grin. “You’re the best, cousin!” she said excitedly.

After racquetball, he was there on time at the office of Doctor Enrique Valguerro, an FAA-approved flight surgeon who had his practice about two miles from Bergstrom. Doctor Valguerro was a pilot himself, and had been in the Air Force, stationed at Bergstrom back when it was an Air Force base. He moved back to Austin after he left the military, and he came highly recommended on the airfields around Austin as a doctor who knew.

Valguerro was a plump brown-furred chinchilla, looking like he could be Sandy’s uncle, and he did indeed know. He’d administered this examination many times, so he knew exactly what he was doing, and gave Kit the only complication he was expecting. When he reviewed Kit’s medical records, he made note of the screws in his back, and also his passing medical examination and official FAA documentation showing that the FAA was aware of his past accident, but had cleared him to fly after his last exam, after a thorough check of his back. “I see they deferred you last time, but you passed the subsequent physical, and you have all your waiver documentation right here. Have the screws caused any problems since your last certification physical?”

“None,” he said. “I still have full range of motion and it doesn’t hurt at all when I fly, even when I’m doing G maneuvers to scare my passengers.”

Valguerro laughed. “You’re lucky you brought these records, or I’d have to file for deferral for you again. But, I’m afraid I’ll have to make you do some pretty extensive exercises and tests so I’m sure you’re still in flight condition, my friend. That's something I have to check thoroughly before I sign off on you. I hope you understand."

"Completely, and I don't mind at all," he said with a nod. "I've been through this before, as you saw when you checked over my records. My last doctor did a six hour exam and a bunch of tests on my back to send in with the rest of my records when I filed for my waiver. I had to wait two months for the FAA to look over my case and approve me," he grunted.

"Well, your last doctor was doing his job," Valguerro said with an approving nod. "And I doubt it'll take that long this time. You got passed last time, and I won't have to defer you again since you have all your waiver paperwork. So, after I make sure your back is still in flying shape, you'll be good to go."

Then came the tests he knew were coming. He went through X-rays of his back, a very thorough physical inspection and examination of his entire spine and musculature and tissues surrounding his spine, and then he did nearly an hour's worth of range of motion exercises and pressure tests simulating G forces Valguerro demanded without any trouble. The doctor put him through every possible test he could think of to make absolutely sure Kit's back was capable of the stresses of flight. After all that, he was back on the exam table, and Valguerro continued the examination, moving on to the normal parts of the exam. "So, what are you flying these days?" he asked.

"I lucked out and got my paws on a Cessna four hundred," he said.

Valguerro whistled. "I had a fractional on one when it was a Columbia, before Cessna bought them out, and it was a sweet plane," he said. "I'm flying a Centurion now. I wanted something pressurized."

“Nice,” Kit told him. “Fractional?”

“Nah, I own the whole thing,” he grinned. “You rated on twin engines?”

Kit nodded. “I don’t have seaplane, rotor, or any jet ratings, but I have about everything else...Cat two and three, IFR, high altitude. I’ll have to get those some day,” he chuckled. “I was trying to get my first jet rating before the accident.”

“I never bothered trying for one. Why did you want it?”

“Before these screws were in my back, I wanted to fly fighters for the military,” he said. “So I was trying to get rated on a jet while I was in ROTC, so they’d see I had jet experience.”

“Ah, I understand, amigo,” he said, patting Kit on the shoulder compassionately. “Which one were you doing?”

“Citation CJ-2,” he answered.

“All those ratings at such a young age? That had to be pricy.”

“Eleven thousand dollars was the final price tag. I was on scholarship, and I finished flight school before the accident. It paid for most of my commercial license. The expensive part for me was renting planes after I got my license to keep logging hours to pad my application to Air Force flight school, and I was also starting on that Citation jet rating right before the accident. I’d done about half of the ground training and flown my first jet the day before it happened. That was very expensive,” he grunted.

“Renting a jet to log hours is almost ridiculously expensive. It was like four hundred bucks a day.”

“Well, that’s quite an accomplishment for such a young pilot.”

“No, it just took money,” he said calmly, which made Valguerro laugh. “I got my commercial and my extras in a year in a one forty-one program through the University of Massachussets. It was one of those comprehensive programs that rated us for both single and multi props as a commercial license, Cat two and three, IFR, high altitude, the whole shebang, so when I graduated, I had to take both single and multi tests, then do two check flights for the first test. Then we had to do it all over again for our IFR ratings on both types, then do it again for the commercial test. God, that took a lot of studying, because I was taking fifteen credit hours a semester on top of that. It was like working two jobs,” he chuckled.

“Well, you got through it. So you didn’t rock much in flight school?” he asked, using an old Air Force term that they also used in ROTC. To rock meant to fail.

“I was paying very close attention,” Kit chuckled. “The scholarship would be withdrawn if I went under a three point zero GPA, and my flight school was through my scholarship, so I couldn’t fail any major section or it would be withdrawn.”

“That’s motivation,” Doctor Valguerro said with a nod. “I rocked way too much when I got my license,” he laughed. “It took me a year to get my standard pilot’s license. But, I was doing it on base, so it was way cheaper than it would’ve cost me elsewhere. But, after I had it, I moved to flight medicine, and I’ve never regretted it.”

After another three hours of exhaustive tests of his vision, hearing, reflexes, general physical health, even a psychological evaluation,

Valguerro had Kit dress as he went over some lab results. “You’re good to go, my friend. I’ll sign off on you, so you’re back on flight status.”

“Thanks, Doctor,” Kit said with a smile. “I’m glad of that, I’m taking my cousin to South Padre on Friday, so I kinda need my license.”

Valguerro laughed. “Finish dressing, I’ll fill out the forms for you.”

After six hours of being examined, Kit got his completed form, and then went to the FAA office on the grounds of Bergstrom International Airport, in a building not far from the smaller south terminal. He sat around waiting for an hour, finally got a clerk, then sat and waited as the short, thin male marten clerk reviewed his license history, inspected the certificate issued by Doctor Valguerro, then called Valguerro to personally confirm Kit had passed his physical because of Kit’s previous deferral on his physical from last year, due to his prior injuries. “I have to ask,” the marten said with a slightly shy look, “you’re that Kit Vulpan, right?”

Kit smiled. “Afraid so. You won’t hold that against me, will you?”

The marten laughed. “Why should I? A co-worker pointed me to an article you wrote, and I thought it was pretty good. Let me print out your temporary license. You know the drill with the real one?”

“Yeah, I’ll get it in the mail about a week before it expires.”

He laughed again. “That’s about right,” he admitted, turning to his keyboard.

At four o’clock, he walked out of the FAA office on Bergstrom holding his temporary pilot’s license, which would expire on March 6, 2009. He had a full year before he went through another six hour physical, but he would to back to Doctor Valguerro when that time came, since he already knew about Kit's back and wouldn't be so hard on him next time.

He also noticed that there was a flight school there at the airport.

He called Jessie as he walked back to his truck. "Hey baby," he said. "I'm done. Need anything before I come home?"

"Now? What took so long?" she demanded as the sounds of dishes clinking chimed in the background.

"My back," he said simply. "The doctor had to make absolutely sure my back doesn't disqualify me. I told you this would take all day," he noted.

"Yeah, you did," she agreed. "Well, you can swing by IGB or Wal-Mart and pick up some nutmeg, I'm almost out. And you can buy me some of those little bags of potato chips, I haven't done that yet."

"Will do," he promised. "Any nausea today?"

"A little, right after lunch, but thank God I didn't throw up," she said with relief. "Nothing is more humiliating than kneeling in a public bathroom and having everyone listen to you barf."

Kit laughed. "Anything else?"

"Grape juice?"

"Don't ask, silly femme, demand. I don't respond to wishy-washy little girls."

"Then get grape juice, you little jerk," she retorted playfully. "And keep an eye over your shoulder when you get home!"

Kit laughed lightly. "Always do, pretty kitty, always do."

Kit bought what Jessie wanted, and gave her a loving kiss when he got home. He put his paw on her belly, almost reflexively, and she laughed and responded with her pattern “not yet, my handsome fox.”

“Someday I’m gonna feel him kick.”

“Someday you might feel her kick,” she said with a giggle. “After she starts making me fat.”

“You won’t be fat, you’ll be pregnant,” he told her, wrapping his arms around her from behind and rocking her gently from side to side. “And you’ll be beautiful.”

“So you say now, when I’m still skinny,” she giggled, reaching behind his head and patting him on his damaged ear.

“To be fat, you have to have fat in here, not a baby,” he teased, kissing her on the side of her neck as he patted her flat belly with his dark-mitted paw. “Now stop being silly, my pretty kitty.”

“I’m not being silly! I’m making sure my male will still love me when I’m fat and ugly.”

He laughed lightly. “You will never be either of those,” he told her. “You’re a gorgeous cat, love, but it wasn’t your face or body I fell in love with. What’s in here is what I love the most,” he said, tapping her just under her ear. “The body and face are just window dressing. Gorgeous window dressing, but still window dressing.”

She giggled, and leaned against him. “I need to record that so I can play it back at you when I’m fat.”

“Be my guest.”

After dinner, Kit relaxed with Jessie on the couch, practicing guitar while she wrote part of her paper about flying. She asked him all kinds of questions, how long it took him, what kinds of licenses there were, and so on. Kit explained pilot's licenses to her, and the various ratings for different kinds of planes, and the levels of licenses. "So, if I wanted a license, what would I have to do?" she asked, looking at him and ready to type on her laptop. He explained the way that worked too, how one could go to flight school or take private instruction, and explained the difference between a program for a standard license and a program for a commercial license, a part-141, like the one he'd taken.

"That's the best way to do it," Kit told her. "When I graduated from flight school, I had my commercial license and I was rated for two classes of aircraft, single engine prop and multi-enging prop. It took about a year, but it also cost over twelve thousand dollars. If I'd have done a standard license, I could have graduated in four months or so and did it for about six thousand dollars, but I wouldn't have even a quarter of the privileges I have with a commercial license. My commercial license lets me land at almost any airport, because I know air commercial traffic control procedures and I can fly by instruments alone. Those are skills that standard pilots aren't required to have."

"Okay, so, how does having a license make life different for you compared to other furs?"

She was serious about this, he realized. She was approaching it like a reporter, and she'd seen how he did his prep work enough to know what to ask to get the information she wanted. "Well, I guess it's a matter of freedom," he said. "I can fly a plane, which lets me go much further than someone in a car. In the same time it takes someone to drive to San Antonio, I could fly to Dallas or Brownsville. It's not a cheap thing to do, but it's an option. But most pilots don't fly so they can go places faster, they fly because they enjoy flying." He chuckled, strumming his guitar. "And you got a taste of how it makes things different, love. How many of your classmates can fly home to visit their parents on the weekend?"

She giggled. "Yeah, I guess so," she said. "Thanks love."

"When's that paper due?"

"Next month, but why wait?" She glanced at him. "Do you have any plans for my spring break?"

He laughed. "Love, I'm still so far in the hole on time off I'll be making it up to the magazine for ten years," he told her. "But, I did have a couple of ideas. We haven't gone out on a date for a couple of weeks, you know."

She gave him a shy yet loving smile. "Where do you want to go?"

"I was thinking of dinner in New Orleans," he said with a smile. "And a night in a French Quarter hotel, then a ride in a riverboat after we explore the Quarter."

She gave him a bright smile. "I'd love to," she said. "Can we afford it?"

"A dinner, a night in a hotel, and a riverboat ride? Of course we can," he told her. "I can land at Lakefront Airport there in New Orleans, so we can take a cab into the city easily or rent a car."

"I'd love to go," she said with a smile.

“I’d love to take you. I have to start looking at other airports, though. Driving up to Georgetown kinda sucks, but I guess I have to go where I can find hangar space for the plane. Leaving it outside tied down to the flight line isn’t the best thing in the world for it. I want to get hangar space so we can store it out of the weather, and hangar space is always in demand.” He gave her a sly little look. “They have a flight school at Bergstrom, you know.”

“Really?” She said with a smile. “Have you been looking at flight schools for me, love?”

“A little,” he winked. “I noticed the signs for it when I was at the FAA office getting my license renewed. I’ll look into it for you.”

“I’d love to, but didn’t you say that flight training was expensive?”

“If you want to learn, pretty kitty, I’ll find a way to pay for it. It’s just that simple.”

“I’ll think about it,” she said. “But the baby comes first. Maybe after I deliver I’ll think about it, but I’d rather not have something like that on top of school with me being pregnant.”

“Love, there’s no time limit,” he chuckled. “We have plenty of time for you to decide.”

Jessie wasn’t too keen on the idea of starting flight school while pregnant, but Kit could understand her position. She was in school, and she was pregnant. She had a lot more important things on her mind right now, and flight school did take some concentration and devotion.

He did, however, thoroughly research every flight school in the Austin area. There were six of them, and he finally settled on the Austin Aerial Instruction Academy, which was based in the general aviation section of Bergstrom. They were almost exactly like his own old flight school in that they offered all levels of flight instruction, from standard to flight instructor, and they also offered ratings on multi-engine and instrument flight rules. They had a 141 program which would graduate someone with a commercial license in 10 months, and what was most important, all of their flight school trainer planes were late models with impeccable maintenance records. Their oldest plane was a 2002 Cessna 172. Three of their trainers had Garmin's, and they also had a Beech for people who wanted to earn a twin engine rating. The only difference between their flight school and Kit's was that Kit's school included a twin engine rating with their commercial program, where it was an optional choice for AAIA's commercial program, and cost extra money to get if one took it.

What he looked around for himself was a flight school that offered training for rating on jet aircraft. Despite what he told Avery back at his wedding, he really wouldn't mind getting a jet rating now that he was in a position to be able to use it. Renting a jet would be cheaper for the magazine than flying 8 furs to the same place, but only so long as Kit could fly it, and for that he'd need a rating on the specific kind of jet he rented. Having a commercial license and his multi engine rating opened the door to getting a jet rating, which was specific to the type of jet he intended to fly. His multi-engine rating and his authorizations in most aspects of jet flight would let him rate to a jet, which required training in that particular class of jet, like Citations. Getting rated in a Citation would let him fly Citation class jets, which was what he'd been doing right before the accident, trying to earn a rating on a Citation CJ-2. Some pilots also pursued the authorizations entailed in jet flight at the same time while rating to a jet, like complex aircraft and high-altitude operations, since one could cover those things during training for the jet. It could take as little as a couple of weeks or as long as a few months, it depended entirely on how much money he had to afford renting a jet to complete the rating.

He knew it would be hard, and expensive. To get a rating that mattered, he needed to find someone willing to rent him a jet to fly, then rate on that jet. He'd also need a second pilot, since most jets required two pilots on board...but, if he could find all of those things, then it would be viable. If they got a small enough jet that only required one pilot, like a 6-seat Citation, and he was rated on it, they could rent a jet and fly it and save money over flying 6 furs commercial. It would cost about $2,000 in rent and jet fuel for a two day trip in a CJ-1, where it would be about the same cost to fly 6 furs on airlines, with the added bonus of having total control of when they left and when they arrived.

Sure, it wasn't exactly cost-efficient or really that useful to go to all that trouble to maybe fly a jet for the magazine once, but it was more about finally getting that holy grail of pilot ratings, a rating on a jet. Finding an excuse to do it was justifying itself in his mind.

He did dream about it while flying Sheila, Allison, and Danielle down to Brownsville on Friday. Kit was reading the newest issue of the magazine, seeing it in print rather than on computers, while the autopilot kept them on course, trying to tune out the excited babbling of Sheila and Danielle, where Allison comported herself with her usual quiet reserve. They were only twenty minutes from Brownsville's airport, the closest airfield to South Padre Island, but Sheila already had hotel reservations and a rental car that was supposed to be waiting for them at the terminal at 9:00am sharp. Kit had agreed to take them, but only in the morning, so he didn't miss work. He had enough time to get back home and even relax a little while. He still wasn't sure why they were going now, since Danielle and Allison were missing a day of class; U.T.'s spring break started a week from today...but then again, maybe that was why they were going now. Next weekend it would be crowded, where this weekend they had the beach to themselves.

Wow. Wow. Barry had interviewed State Senator Chris Rivers as part of the election special, and—wow. What a fantastic interview! Barry took it to Rivers, but not in a confrontational manner. Much as Kit did, he asked hard, difficult questions, but also gave Rivers a chance to display his strengths, state his platform, and try to woo people to vote for him. He'd ask a very tough question challenging his views, then turn around and ask a supportive question that aligned with Rivers' platform. It ran five pages, and was the lead article. Next week, they would release their first expanded issue, going for a target of 38 pages.

But the TCAS woke him up. It gave an audio warning of a nearby plane, and Kit knocked it off autopilot and checked the MFD; there was another private plane coming at him from an angle, but a good mile under him. Kit was cruising at 11,000 feet, but that plane was at 6,000 feet. Kit bumped his auxiliary radio over to the accepted pilot chatter frequency for Texas pilots and called the plane. A femme answered, and he chatted with her for a few minutes before saying goodbye when Brownsville air traffic control called him on the primary radio, still tuned to traffic control frequency. "Belt up, femmes," Kit called over the intercom as he answered the controller, descending to enter a holding pattern around the airport. "We have to sit in a holding pattern for a little bit," he said.

“Are we gonna run late? That car’s supposed to be waiting for us,” Sheila warned.

“Call them, we’re close enough to the ground for you to get a signal,” Kit answered. “But I don’t think we’ll be waiting long. I don’t see much traffic around us,” he noted, looking at the planes on the MFD.

They were in holding for only ten minutes, and he landed only five minutes later than expected, and rather happily; Brownsville wasn’t going to charge him a landing fee. He taxied up to a temporary parking area by their terminal, giving the girls access to their terminal through a concourse door, then powered down. “Alright, girls, you can get out,” he said as he set the parking brakes and disabled all flight controls and control surfaces. “Remember to stay next to the plane and walk straight to the door when you’re ready.” There was no reason to go through postflight since he was going to start the engine back up as soon as they unloaded. Kit got out and opened the cargo door, and then started pulling out the three small suitcases they brought. “Remember, right here, Monday, six o’clock,” he told them. “I’ll call you before I start out, Sheila.”

“Thanks a million, cousin!” Sheila said, hugging him.

“Yeah, thanks, Kit, you saved us a ton of money and time!” Danielle added, giving him a hug of her own.

“Don’t let Jessie see you do that, or she’ll shave the fur off your tail,” Kit told her, which made her laugh. “Have fun, Allison,” he said, taking her paw, rather formally.

“I’ll make sure she does,” Sheila grinned. “Let’s go find our car, femmes! It’s still a half hour to the island, and we have beer to drink and guys to lay!”

Danielle's cheeks ruffled up as she gave Kit an apologetic look, which only made Kit laugh and shoo her along, then he started out for the terminal so he could pay the landing fee for the airport.

What he thought would be a nice quiet solo flight back turned into anything but. Vil called him while he was sitting on the taxiway, waiting for a commuter plane to cross through the intersection so he could get to the runway. He ignored her until he was in the air, when he could put it on autopilot and get the phone out. He hooked up the hands-free headset for it and pulled his aircraft headset off one ear to put the Bluetooth in his ear. When she answered, he heard her gasp. "Where the hell are you, and what's all that noise?" she asked.

"I'm flying back from Brownsville, I just dropped Sheila and some friends off there for the weekend. What did you need?"

"I don't need anything so badly I'll listen to that droning," she told him. "Call me when you're back on the ground."

He did so when he got back to Georgetown, talking to her as he tied down the plane in a rapidly warming morning. "Alright, I'm on the ground, now what did you need?"

"I got news for you, bro," she told him. "I made a deal with a commuter airline at Bergstrom for your plane. They'll give you some hangar space in their hangar down there until we can get a permanent hangar. I'm going to give you a number for their hangar manager down there, and she'll tell you about it. Remember, though, this is just temporary, bro. They have some empty space in one of their maintenance hangars because the plane that usually takes it is assigned somewhere else, but she'll be happy to rent you that spot until the plane comes back in four months. The plane's in Europe somewhere right now."

"That sounds good, sis, thank you," he said as he tugged on the guide line securing the tail of the plane. "Cause it sucks having to tie this thing down every time I'm done."

"Hey, that's one of the things I'm here for," she chuckled. "That and trying to spoil you rotten, that is."

"Keep trying," Kit chuckled, "though you've certainly started tempting me because of this plane."

"Oh? I'm starting to taint that purity, eh?" she giggled. "And just how did I manage this miracle?" "I'm not sure I should tell you. It just gives you a new angle of attack to use against me, after all. Why should I give you ammunition?"

"Humor me."

"Well, alright, I guess. I've been pondering getting a jet rating," he told her. "If there's ever a time Rick wants to take most of the office somewhere, we'd all have to take commercial flights. It would be cheaper if I could fly us, but flying eight people would take either a multi-engine prop or a jet, and, well, jets are faster and more comfortable. If I could fly us, we'd save money renting a jet over flying six or seven furs commercial. The only drawback to that is that most jets that can hold eight or more require two pilots to be on board, by law, and there's the fact that I'd have to rate on a specific model of jet, so there would have to be that particular jet available for charter when we went to go rent it. Getting an eight seater would require an extra pilot, but there are some six seat jets that can be flown with just one pilot. It really wouldn't be cost effective to rent a jet big enough to fly the whole magazine, but a six-seat jet flown by just me would actually be cheaper to rent, since we wouldn't have to hire a second pilot. It's not really all that important, but I was working on a jet rating before I was hit by the car, and, well, you know. It's something I never got to finish, and something I'd always wanted to do."

"Hmm. What does it take to get this rating thing?"

"That depends entirely on the jet," he answered. "There's no generic rating for jets, Vil, it's specific to the jet I want to fly. So, I'd have to know what jet I could charter and train to fly that particular jet."

"Let me make some calls, bro," she offered.

"No, I'll do it myself," he said, a bit warningly.

"Bro, I can help with this, and I promise I won't throw money around. I'll just ask around and see if there's anyone around Austin willing to let you tag along on flights they're already taking so you can log hours at the controls. Doesn't that help you get your rating? It's what you did when you got your license."

"It's not quite that easy, sis. I'd have to do ground training on the jet, be officially working for the rating to fly the jet. And the pilot that was with me would have to be a flight instructor certified to train me for that jet rating. Those aren't exactly easy to find outside of the professional flight schools or the aircraft builders."

"I'll keep that in mind. But, if I can find you something like that, will you take it?"

"Well," he said hesitantly, considering it. "If you promise not to just rent the jet, I guess I will. It would be really nice to be able to sit in the co-pilot's chair of a jet on a flight.”

“I’m glad you will. You’ve denied yourself what you rightly deserve for a long time, bro. If I can help you get something you want, even if it’s something you don’t need, well, you know I’m gonna meddle. And after all, your birthday is coming up at the end of the month, and I have to get you a good present,” she said with a little chuckle. “I know how hard you worked to get your pilot’s license. I’d love to help you keep going with your flight training.”

“I appreciate your concern, sis, but I can do without the manipulation.”

She laughed. “I’m glad you’re using your gift.”

“I love it, sis. Thank you again.”

“How does it handle? What’s it like to fly in it?”

“Why don’t you come down and take a joy ride with me?”

She laughed. “Give up my private jet with my personal bedroom to come down and fly in a little single engine propeller plane? Sure!” she said brightly. “I’ll have to clear some space on my calendar, though.”

“We’d love to see you, sis,” he said. “It’s been months since you’ve been here.”

“Since the wedding,” she affirmed. “Okay, so, while I’m doing this, you look into that ground training you said you need, see where you can get it. With luck, I’ll find someone able to do me a favor by the time you’re done.”

“Remember, no cheating.”

“I’ll do my best to hold to that, or at least cover it up so you can’t tell I was cheating,” she giggled. “I’ll look over my schedule and find a good few days to come see you. Hmm, Jessie’s spring break is next week, right?”

“A week from today is when it starts, then she doesn’t have to be back until the following Monday.”

“Let’s see if I can wrangle a day or two somewhere in there, so me and her can spend some quality time together.”

“She’d love to see you.”

“I’d hope so,” she chuckled. “Alright, let me go juggle my schedule some, baby bro. I’ll call you back when I have something solid.”

“Alright.”

“I’ll text you the name and number of that fur about the hangar. She can give you all the details.”

“I was just about to make note that you haven’t given me his number,” he chuckled.

Kit wasn’t sure how to feel about Vil meddling. On one hand, he wasn’t asking her for money, he was asking her to use her influence and power to secure a favor for him. That, though, went paw in paw with that money, for her money gave her that power. Vil had incredible power as the CEO of the Vulpan businesses; he had no doubt that she could effectively bully the President of the United States. But, he’d also have to admit, that power was useless unless it was used, and at least he wasn’t asking for anything outrageous. He didn’t want her to arrange any special favors, he just wanted her to look around and see if she could find him a jet that would let him tag along when they went on a flight.

Kit called the hangar after he got home. The fur he had to talk to was named Alice Darrow, and he found her to be a pretty laid-back and friendly young femme. She was the hangar manager for Avia Commuter and Charter Airlines, which had seven offices; Austin, Houston, Seattle, Los Angeles, Baltimore, St. Louis, and they'd just opened a new office in London flying commuter and charter flights between London and European cities. The office here had originally been based in Houston, but they'd moved the home office to Austin when Bergstrom was built because they got their paws on a brand new hangar that had a hell of a lot more office space than their Houston hangar. There was enough traffic for them to keep a flight operation here in Austin, enough for two planes, but they had their main maintenance facility here as well, having moved that from Houston because they had much more room. "The space was originally for a Lear four fifty, so I'm sure your plane will fit in it," she told him. "What have you got?"

"A Cessna four hundred," he answered.

"Oh, nice, and that'll more than fit," she chuckled. "The spot's in the back of the hangar, but you'll have no trouble at all moving in and out, it's a big hangar. I'll give you a clicker that'll open the hangar door if you fly in after hours."

"Sounds good."

"We have an AVGas pump right inside, and we only have one turboprop that uses it," she said temptingly.

He laughed. "Yes, I'll buy my gas from you, if you take Transport."

"Of course we do," she said with a giggle. "Now, were you told that this isn't permanent?"

“Yeah, my sister said I can have the spot for four months.”

“Yeah. Our plane’s coming back after the London office takes delivery of a new eight fifty that’s scheduled for delivery four months from now.”

Kit whistled. “Expensive.”

“Worth it, our London expansion is really busy,” she said. “The new tunnel dropped off charter travel to Paris, but there’s lots of other European cities, and London’s a big arrival point for business. The eight fifty’s gonna do commuter routes from London to other cities. Our number crunchers say the plane will pay itself off in five years.”

“Sounds like it was a good investment, then.”

“I certainly hope so,” she laughed. “I’d prefer you come to park the plane when I’m here. Can you bring it here today?”

“Well, if my friend is home, I think we could get it done before I have to go to work,” he said, looking at the clock.

“Well, you have my number, call me if you can.”

“Sure.”

Lupe was indeed home, and he was willing to give Kit a hand. Lupe drove with him as he went up to Georgetown, telling Alice he was on his way on the phone on the way up, and he parked his truck behind his plane at the airport. “Now, you know where to go?”

“Yeah, brah, the backside of the airport. You have to go down one seventy-one to get there. Avia, right?”

“Yup,” he said, getting out of his truck and giving Lupe the key. “Do not burn out my clutch,” he warned.

Lupe laughed. "I know how to drive a stick, brah," he assured him.

"I should be there waiting for you," Kit told him, which made Lupe laugh.

"You better be. If you got beat somewhere by a car, you'd have to hand in your license in shame."

"Oh, it can definitely happen, Lupe," he said. "If they stick me in a holding pattern, you might get there before I can land."

"Well, let's hope it don't happen."

Kit took off for the second time that day for a five minute flight from Georgetown to Austin. He barely managed to get over a thousand feet before he was descending again, being guided down by a controller at Bergstrom. Bergstrom had two full-length runways for jets and two smaller runways to the southeast of them for small planes, and that was where Kit was sent to land. He relied on an airport layout graphic he brought up on his laptop computer, sitting in the copilot's seat, to guide himself to the Avia hangar, and he called Alice from inside the plane as he was taxiing down a long line of hangars. "I'm on the ground and coming to the hangar," he told her.

"Okay, park outside and I'll show you around before you taxi in."

Alice was a small collie, short and thin, but she was bouncy. She explained the procedures they used in the hangar while they walked down the clearly marked center line, showing him how the hangar was divided into four quadrants for the four planes that would be parked there. The two planes in the front of the hangar were both Citation business jets, the little CJ1 models, the six seater versions, obviously in for maintenance. The front two bays were their maintenance bays, while the back of the hangar looked to house two planes. The plane in the back on the left was a Cessna 421, an eight passenger turboprop, which was the one permanently assigned to Austin, while the back right area, cordoned off with yellow paint on the floor, was empty. There was an open garage door on the left side of the hangar, between the Citation and the 421, probably for maintenance trucks or clients, and there were doors that looked like they went to offices behind the empty area that would be his parking spot, which was in the back of the hangar on the right side. “Okay, this is yours for four months,” she told him, pointing to the empty marked area in the back right of the hangar.

“Everything inside the paint. The AV pump is right there, and the hoses should easily reach your plane. Just log how many gallons you pump and we’ll bill you for it,” she assured him. “You’re free to taxi in and out without getting a tow since your plane is so small, just warn everyone before you do it. I’ll give you a remote for the hangar and garage door so you don’t have to get in and out to open it, it’s an auto-open one. We own the six tie down spots outside the hangar too, so if you can’t get the doors open for some reason, tie down out there, so you won’t have to pay to park.”

“Can I drive into the hangar?”

“Sure, we let clients do it all the time. That’s what that garage door over there is for,” she said, pointing to the open double-sized garage door. “The clicker I’ll give you opens that door too. Just drive down the middle between the red lines, stay out of the plane areas. I’ll even let you park your car in your plane spot, since your plane’s so small.”

“Wow, thanks a lot, that’s nice of you.”

“No sweat,” she shrugged. “You’re paying rent, after all, so may as well let you get your money’s worth,” she winked. “Let’s go up to the office so you can sign the contract.”

Lupe was waiting in the lobby when he came in from the back. He waved to Kit, and gave Alice a curious, assessing look he saved for femmes that caught his interest. Kit had to chuckle; Lupe would lay the moves on her when they were done. After Kit read and signed the four month lease agreement, he went back out and taxied his plane into the hangar. He had no trouble at all getting it to his area, which was entirely too big for his plane, so much room he could easily turn the plane around with his Pathfinder parked inside the yellow lines within the spot. Alice and Lupe were talking near the door leading to the offices as Kit got out of his plane and locked it up, then he greeted one of the Avia workers who wandered over to admire his plane. They chatted a minute, until a stern look from Alice sent him scurrying back to the 421 and what he was doing. But her entire demeanor changed when she turned to talk to Lupe again, becoming all demure and coy. Kit saw that she was interested in Lupe, and was already playing the game with him.

Kit had to stand there and listen to them exchange goofy lines, then exchanged phone numbers, then Lupe finally asked her out. “So, how does dinner and a movie sound?” he asked her.

“Well, I think I could go for that,” she said with an appealing little smile, looking up at him. Lupe wasn’t very tall, but at least he was taller than her. “How about tomorrow?”

“Tomorrow’s fine with me,” Lupe grinned.

“Lupe, I have to go to work,” he reminded him.

“Oh. Oh, yeah. Sure. Gotta go, babe. I’ll call ya.”

“You’d better,” she said with a smile, which made Lupe chuckle.

“Damn, she’s cute,” Lupe said as they walked to his truck, the garage door opener-like control in Kit’s paw. Lupe had parked in the lot outside the side of the hangar facing the public, which was covered in white stone and had the Avia logo painted in blue over the glass doors.

“She’s a smart one, Lupe, be careful.”

“We’ll see,” Lupe grinned.

“And remember she’s in control of the space I’m renting for my plane,” Kit added. “You piss her off and get me evicted, we’re gonna have words.”

Lupe gave him a look, then laughed delightedly. “Then somebody’d better take a dive during poker on Sunday,” he grinned.

“Ohh, it sounds like someone doesn’t want rummage rights through our leftovers.”

Lupe winced. “That’s dirty pool, brah.”

“Vulpans go for the throat,” Kit noted in a calm voice.

Work turned out to be nearly as exciting as that morning, for when he showed up at one, nearly late, a small ocelot in a dark suit was standing in the main office waiting for him, with several uniformed members of the Austin Police behind her. Two furs he didn’t know were in his office, sitting at his desk, going through his computer. She stepped up to him and handed him a two folded sheafs of papers wrapped in blue, and Kit knew what they were.

A search warrant.

“What now?” he sighed.

“We have a search warrant, ordering you to surrender all notes, transcripts, drafts, edits, and or recordings pertaining to an article written about an illegal brothel,” the ocelot told him.

“Well, I don’t have any of it,” he told them. “They were all destroyed as part of my agreement with my source.”

The ocelot gave him a dark look. “If you’re lying and covering for your source, sir, you can be charged with obstruction of justice if we find anything.”

“You’re already snooping, go right ahead. You’re not going to find what I don’t have. I’ll guarantee you you won’t find anything.”

And they didn’t. Mike was no fool; because they worked in a magazine, every workstation in the office had a program that eradicated data off of the hard drive by zeroing the disk, causing the hard drive to write blank data over what one wanted deleted from the hard drives, which destroyed it. Kit had that same program on his laptop and home computers, and he had run it there as well. They couldn’t use a disk snooper to reconstruct that data, because the hard drive had completely written over all of it, permanently destroying it.

The computer techs in his office were quick to realize that. “He has Data Wiper on his workstation, counsel,” the short cat told the ocelot. “If he ran it, we won’t recover anything off this computer.”

“Like I told you, I destroyed all my notes,” Kit said simply. “And I’m not naïve enough to think that just hitting delete on my computer erases it forever.” He offered up his laptop as well. “And you’ll see I have that program on my laptop too.”

The techs took his laptop, started it up, then frowned when it was up and running. “We can check, counsel, but I doubt we’re going to find anything.”

“Check it.”

The DVD he burned did, however, come up. “I see here that you burned word documents to a DVD,” the tech said after he worked with his laptop. “Where is this DVD?”

“I’ve burned quite a few DVDs,” he said simply. “What file names?”

When the tech repeated them, Kit knew that those were the research notes because of the dates they were burned to the DVD. They weren’t given names that anyone but him would really understand; they didn’t say Allison’s notes or anything like that, they were listed by the evolution of the article, with names such as base notes or outline or second draft. Since Kit never worked on more than one article at a time, he never felt any need to differentiate; that came when he archived the information. When he archived it, it was bundled under the title of the article then all the individual files were renamed to reflect the archive, since he often changed the titles of articles halfway through writing them.

Besides, using the same names for all his research files always put the same names in his documents list on his shortcut window. After archiving, he just cleared everything out of the files and started over.

“If you can see I’ve burned DVDs, why don’t you keep looking? I burn DVDs of those same files over and over, it’s part of my archiving system that keeps things standardized. Since I do the archiving for all the writers, I change the names of their research files to a standard format then burn it. We keep three copies of all our notes and background information. One copy is in our server, another is the backups of the server, and the last is kept on DVDs in hard storage in case of some kind of cataclysm that wipes out all of Mike's backups of our network data." He pointed at the wall. "Two doors down, you'll find our storage room with a few boxes of DVDs, all organized by week. That's our hard storage archive."

"So, you burned a DVD of the information we want?"

"Do I look dumb to you?" Kit asked simply. "I promised my source I would destroy all notes. Why on earth would I burn a DVD of notes I intended to destroy?"

And that was the easy way to avoid answering the question—and maybe get busted for perjury—while giving an indirect answer they'd buy.

Vil didn't raise a fool.

"Then what did you burn on this DVD?"

"That week, I'd say it was Barry's interview with the head of the Austin Election Commission. Either that or background notes on instances of gay hate crimes committed around the U.T. campus. Maybe both. I don't recall exactly."

Kit waited patiently for them to go get the DVD, silently praying that they took him on his word and didn't actually check the DVD to see if its volume number matched the number of the DVD he burned. That would require them to load the DVD, where the DVD they'd go get would have the same week written on it as the DVD he burned. He almost held his breath when they came back, and was silently gleeful when he saw they did not have the DVD with them.

“It’s there,” the tech told the ocelot. “Right where he said it was. Two DVDs burned that week.”

“Did you see what was on them?” the ocelot asked.

“Do you really think he’d leave it out like that?” the tech asked.

“Check.”

Kit was again inwardly nervous as the tech went and got the two DVDs he’d burned that week, then checked them one by one. One of them had the same list of files he’d burned to the DVD, matching up exactly. “This is it,” the tech said, holding up the DVD. “It’s the one about the election commission.”

Thank God he was such a creature of habit! And thank God they were just looking at file names! And thank God he didn’t just merge everything to one DVD and burn it all together like he usually did! But that week was so wild, so messed up, he’d not done it all together. It was the only week in the box that had more than one DVD for it. That little mistake was saving his ass right now!

“We’re done here, counsel,” the tech said. “There’s nothing here.”

“Alright then. If you’d come with us, Mister Vulpan, we’ll go check your house and home computers.”

Kit didn’t entirely like them coming into his house, but when they arrived at his apartment, he showed them to his den and let the techs go after his computers while uniforms searched his house. One of them did come up with a DVD, taken out of the closet, and Kit's cheek fur ruffled a little when he realized just what that DVD was. "Uh, if you're going to look at that one, I'd ask you clear the room of the males," he said quietly to the ocelot. "That one has some pictures on it of my wife that I don't think I'd like seen by anyone but a femme."

She was at least accommodating in that regard. He let her use his laptop to investigate the DVD. After bringing up a text list of files, then seeing they were all picture files, she quietly removed it and gave it back to him. "It clearly has no documents on it," she said.

"Thank you, ma'am," Kit said sincerely, putting it back in the case.

It was a very nervous hour. Kit did in fact have that DVD in the house, but it was hidden in a rather ingenious way; in plain sight. It was in the entertainment center, inside a Pretty Femme DVD movie case. The movie DVD itself was over at Sheila's apartment, and he wanted that DVD where he could get at it quickly and easily but also keep it hidden, so he Lightscribed a copy of the DVD art of Pretty Femme on the DVD, and then put it in the case. The police did go through his entertainment center, but thankfully, they didn't check every single disc in all his DVD and game disc cases. The Pretty Femme box was just shuffled aside after the uniform officer opened it and just glanced inside, saw Pretty Femme printed on the DVD, and then moved on.

They had missed it.

After an hour in his apartment, the techs and police came up empty. The ocelot then handed him another piece of blue-wrapped papers. "This is a subpoena, Mister Vulpan," she told him. "Since there's no notes, you'll have to testify about it in person. Wednesday, March fifteenth, ten o'clock at the courthouse."

"Oh joy," he said blandly.

"We'll take you back to your office, then," she said.

Once he got back, Rick, Savid, Barry and he all congregated in Rick's office, and they talked about it. Kit made it plain that he was not going to give them any answers at all, which was what Rick wanted to hear from him. Rick and Savid basically gave Kit their full support, since they were listed as the editors of the magazine and they'd probably get subpoenaed next, but they were relieved when Kit said he'd talk to Kevin about it. Kevin was his lawyer, so this was his domain. "We should have called him as soon as they started searching, son," Rick told him. "Because I'm not entirely sure that search warrant was entirely legal. Did they cause any trouble?"

"No, they didn't trash our house or anything like that."

"Did they find anything?" Savid asked.

"I destroyed all of it," he said, giving Rick a look that told him he was lying, mainly for Barry and Savid. Rick already knew that he intended to keep one copy of his notes, and that DVD...and it would get moved tomorrow.

It was time to abuse his family's connections just a tiny bit more.

He called Vil as soon as the meeting broke up. He needed her help, but he was also fearful that they were tapping his phone, so he was very careful. "Sis," he said, "can you do me a favor?"

“Well, sure. What is it?”

He was quiet a second, then spoke in a voice that told her that he was deadly, deadly serious. “I just had the Austin police search my office and my house,” he told her, “and I got subpoenaed.”

What? Oh, like hell they did!” she said with sudden heat. “I’ll—“

“You’ll leave it alone,” Kit told her. “Let me call Kevin and see what kind of legal options I have before you start going Rambo all over everyone.”

She actually laughed. “I have every right to protect my little brother from being harassed,” she declared.

“Yeah, well, let me talk to Kevin first. I have the right to protect my sources, so I don’t think they can really make me testify. But I want to talk to Kevin first.”

“I’ll—“

“Vil, don’t talk, listen. Let me handle it. But, there is something you can do for me. Is that lawyer you went to school with still here in Austin, the one that used to work as a courier? I’d like to talk to him about it, and I know he’s good. I want to talk to him face to face. If they subpoenaed me, well, they may be doing something I’ve seen done before, so I’d rather not use the phone.”

She was silent just a second. “Yes, my lawyer friend is still in Austin,” she answered in a tone he knew meant she understood what he was really asking. “I’ll call him and have him drop by your office tomorrow morning to talk to you about it.”

“Thanks, sis.”

“Any time, bro.”

Take that, the District Attorney of Travis County. If he trapped Kit into admitting that hard copies of his article notes existed, and he wanted that information, he was going to have to wrestle Vil for it...and Kit rather doubted he had the balls to try.

“Now, let me make a few calls,” she said in a grim voice. “They’re not gonna push around my little brother,” she actually seethed.

“I can take care of myself, and like I said, let me call Kevin before anyone does anything. Let’s see where the law is before we start going Vulpan all over people.”

