She laughed helplessly over the phone. “Going Vulpan! God, is that ever the truth!”

After talking to Vil, he called Kevin. Rick was probably right that they should have called Kevin when the cops were searching, but on the other paw, they left without finding anything. Had they backed him into a corner, odds were he’d have called Kevin to come help. Kevin was startled to hear about it, and was in the office not ten minutes later, reading the copy of the search warrant he was given as well as the subpoena. “Well, this search warrant is legit,” he said, turning it over. “I’d have had to argue against anything they found in a hearing after the fact. It’s signed by a judge, that’s all they really need, and I know that judge’s signature. I clerked for him. Since they came up empty, they’ll have a hell of a time trying to get another one for the office and your house, but they could try to get one to search your cars, your plane, or your safe deposit box. If they try, call me immediately and don’t let them start searching until I get there. But this subpeona, this doesn't sit right with me. I need to go look up some cases, but there's something about it that's not ironclad," he said, looking at it. "I'm almost positive we can get you out of it. Let me go back to the firm and talk to Delores. I may be your attorney, but she's also my boss and always makes me tell her about any work I do for you, to make sure I do it right. She's also very well versed in criminal law. If there's any hole at all in this subpeona, she'll find it, and then we'll quash it. Can I take this back to the firm?"

"It's all yours," Kit told him earnestly. "I take it you're now on retainer?"

He laughed. "Nah, I'll do the research and file the motion for you pro bono, especially since you helped me set up that entertainment center last week. This is no big thing. But, if I have to go argue in a courtroom, that's another matter," he said delicately.

"I don't mind paying, Kev. You are my lawyer. I don't expect you to do this for free."

"I'll do the easy stuff free, at least what I can hide from the other partners but Delores," he grinned. "Delores won't say anything. I can't really hide doing real work if I'm going to the courthouse to argue a motion."

"I told you, no problem, Kev. As far as I'm concerned, you're on retainer right now."

"That'll make Delores happy," he chuckled. "You know, I'm amazed they're doing this."

"What do you mean?"

“Kit, you may be down here, but you’re a Vulpan. The DA has to know that if he pisses off your family, they’ll destroy him. Someone like Vil could ruin him with a flick of her wrist all the way from Boston.”

“Well, I’m outcast from the family and it’s basically common knowledge, so I guess he’s willing to take the risk.”

“If I were the DA, I’d never have the balls to try it,” he admitted. “I value my life. But, from what I’ve heard of the DA in office now, he’s one of those crusader types. You know, war against drugs, war against crime, war against indecency. But if he thinks he’s big enough to play in the Vulpan’s sandbox, he’s either really brave or really stupid. It’ll be a rude awakening for him the first time he deals with your sister. Anyway, let me take this back and talk to Delores. I’ll call you when we have something, either tonight or early tomorrow.”

Kit called Vil back and told her what Kevin said. “See, there’s no reason for you to come down here and buy out the city in a snit,” he told her. “Kevin’s pretty sure that the subpoena is flawed, and he’s talking to Delores Kittimer about it. They’ll let me know more either tonight or tomorrow, but Kevin said the outlook is very good. So just leave this one alone for now, sis. Let’s hear what Delores has to say first. Until then, leave it alone.”

“Well...alright. I don’t like it, but alright.”

“You have to let me grow up eventually, big sister,” he teased.

She laughed. “I guess I am being a nosy mom,” she admitted. “If I start acting like Hannah, you have official permission to smack me on the nose.”

The search and subpoena were a surprise, but it also didn't grind the office to a halt. They all had work to do, and a lot of it, since next issue was expanding by 14 pages, from the old target length of 24 pages to the new target length of 38. That was 14 pages of additional information, 14 pages they had to fill with interesting, viable stuff, and not just ads. Rick was absolutely adamant about his ratio of material to ads, and that meant that 79% of those pages had to be filled with articles, pictures, or other features. It was a noticeable increase in work for the four staff writers, for now Lilly and Marty were doing real writing, Barry was doing an extra article, and Kit was doing an extra article on top of his researching duties. Barry's article was about the lack of swimming pools for recreation for students in Austin, and Kit's extra article was about spring break destinations for students either with low money or no car of their own to get around. Kit had to research the data for both of those articles, as well as research for the closing of The Pit for Lilly's article, and the statistics Marty needed for his article about gay hate crimes on the U.T. campus, for there had been just such an incident four days ago that involved the spray painting of an anti-gay slogan on a car parked near campus. It was work for everyone else too, for Savid and Jeffrey had a lot more graphics to design, Sheila wasn't there, so Mike and Denise were running everyone's errands, and Rick had to manage it all. The only ones that didn't have a huge workload increase from the expansion were Denise and Mike, but they did anything and everything they could for everyone else. Mike also spent that time going out to take the photographs they needed for the issue, he did proofreading and formatting for the writers, he volunteered to do some footwork tonight to cover some nightclubs to help Lilly with her The Scene duties, and he also expanded the website by adding a new page where people could submit photos for the new feature they were introducing next week, named Student Snapshots.

Denise had taken over for Sheila doing the little things as best she could, often rushing back to her desk to answer the phone, trying to help everyone as much as she could. Rick rewarded her by giving her a piece of Marty's usual duties, letting her pick some of the letters for the mailbag which she had to proofread and edit to fit in the allotted size without changing the meaning of the writer's intent. It was her first real journalism project since working for them, and she was happy to take her shot at it.

It was really busy in the office, with a focus that they didn't often show. They'd all lost time because of the search that disrupted the office, and in a magazine working on a deadline, losing an afternoon was a bad thing. Everyone felt like they were already close to deadline, so there wasn't as much bantering and visiting, but there was a hell of a lot of work. Mike went out for pizza for everyone since nobody wanted to leave for lunch, and Jessie showed up with Sandy, Charlotte, and Sam around four. "Wow, it's so quiet," Jessie noted as Sandy went to Jeffrey's office, and Charlotte stood out in the main office talking with Lilly, who had come out of Rick's office.

"We're kinda busy," Kit told her as Sam and Charlotte wandered in behind his wife, sending Marty's research off to him, then looking at Sam and Charlotte. "Guys, can we have a minute?"

"No hanky-panky at work," Charlotte teased, but the serious look on Kit's face deflated her humor a little. "Uh, sure. We'll wait out in the office."

"What's going on, handsome fox?" Jessie asked.

"They served a search warrant on me this morning and searched the office and our house. And I got subpoenaed."

“What? Why?” she asked, her face aghast.

He explained it to her quickly, then leaned back in his chair. “They didn’t find anything, of course. I’ve been around the block enough times to get past it.”

“Did you tell Vil?”

He nodded. “She’s going to help, in her own way, but I did talk to Kevin. He said there’s nothing we can really do about the search warrant, and not to really worry about it, especially since they came up empty. They can’t really ask for another one since they didn’t find anything this time, unless they get a warrant for our safe deposit box. But they won’t find anything in there either. But, he also thinks the subpoena is illegal, so he’s filing a motion to quash it. He said Misses Kittimer is going to let him handle my case, but she’ll be watching over him personally to make sure he does it right.”

“Well, that does make me feel a little better,” Jessie said. “I mean, I love Kev, but he is just starting. Misses Kittimer is a partner, she’s got lots of experience.”

“I’m sure they’ll handle it. Kev said it’d just take a quick brief and a few hours of research, then the hearing to quash the motion. He’s not charging us for anything but having to go to court, though, which is really nice of him. Kev knows we’re not exactly rich, and I appreciate them not making us dig into our crisis fund.”

“They searched our house, didn’t they?”

He nodded. “They didn’t tear it up, I was watching them. They found our honeymoon DVD, but they didn’t see anything on it.”

“Oh, thank God!” Jessie said, her cheeks blooming.

“So, that’s the big news. They didn’t find anything, and they never will. The firm is on the case to defend me against the subpoena, so we’re just waiting to hear back from Kevin.”

“I’m going to feel weird in our house now, knowing a bunch of strangers went through our stuff,” she said, a bit indignantly. “It’ll take time for it to feel like it’s ours again.”

“I know the feeling. Anyway, as far as non-earthshaking news goes,” he said, which made her giggle, “I also moved the plane this morning. Vil found me a temporary place to park the plane on Bergstrom that’s inside a hangar, renting a spot from a commuter airline that had an extra space in their hangar. But I can only use it for four months, then the plane that occupies that space is going to be back.”

“Well, that’s better than nothing,” she noted.

“Yeah. Lupe took me up to Georgetown and picked me up at Bergstrom, and he already has a date with the hangar manager for the airline,” he grunted.

Jessie giggled, obviously starting to feel a little better. “He’s such a dog,” she said.

“No doubt there, but at least he has enough sense not to go after Sheila.”

“You think there’s going to be a lot of trouble over the article?”

He shook his head. “I have rock solid constitutional rights,” he said. “This is about protecting a source, and they can’t do anything about it.”

They'd never even try this if I worked for the newspaper or a big magazine. They think us little rinky-dink city magazines don't know our rights, so they're trying to intimidate me into giving up my source."

"I hope so."

"I know so," he said confidently.

"Well, let me get my work done, love," she said. "I have some writing to do for Jeffrey."

"So, when's the wedding?" he asked with a grin, referring to her Missy and Cutler strips.

"As if I'd ever tell you," she said primly. She kept the plot evolution of her strips a secret, even from him. "There may not even be a wedding!"

"Suuuure," he teased.

"Just for that, I'll make sure there's not," she teased, turning her back and flicking her tail at him insultingly as she strode from the office.

Jessie went home after about an hour, which Charlotte and Sandy spent in her office with her and Sam spent out in the big office on the phone with Kevin. The four of them were going to a movie tonight, since it was Kit's late night and Kevin wasn't able to go out because he had in the middle of his second trial before Kit dropped this on him, and he didn't like to go out while actively trying his case. Sam certainly understood, and gave him the space he needed so he could give his clients all the attention he deserved. Lilly and Mike left to do their footwork for The Scene, and Rick, Savid, and Jeffrey called it a night around nine. Kit stayed in the office to finish up Lilly's research, then got home around eleven. By doing it tonight, he could leave a little early on Saturday.

He got home to find the lights out everywhere but in the bedroom. He set the alarm and dropped off his attache by the couch on his way back, and found Jessie laying in bed on her side, wearing a seductive lace teddy that he noticed immediately. “Welcome home, love,” she said to him, swishing her tail behind herself sensually. “After all the stress today, I thought you could use a little relaxation therapy.”

“What a welcome,” he said with an eager smile, which turned into a hurried act of obedience when she crooked her finger at him.

Saturday was just as busy, and a big relief for him. Not a minute after he arrived and unlocked the office a few minutes before nine, a fur in a business suit came into the office and called out. When Kit came out of his office, he introduced himself as an old friend of Vil’s and showed him his Vulpan Shipyards ID card and Massachusetts driver’s license, which was what Kit wanted to know; this fur was Vil’s courier. They talked for about five minutes, then Kit gave him his encrypted DVD. He was gone before anyone else made it into the office.

Mike had come in on his day off to help Lilly compile her club information for The Scene, Marty was in, Barry was in, and Kit, as usual, was in before everyone else. But Kit had finished all the research for everyone else’s articles, so he only had to worry about his own article today. He did, though, have some advance research for planned articles in a few weeks dealing with the elections. There was going to be a Democratic debate in Austin in late March at big auditorium in U.T., and they were planning to cover it. Rick had already secured press passes for himself, Kit, Barry, Lilly, Marty, and Mike, and he was currently busting his ass trying to secure at least one interview with at least one candidate. He doubted that he was going to pull off that miracle, for why would a Presidential candidate bother to interview with a magazine that circulated in two mid-sized cities and a small town near them, but he was trying. Rick had spent almost all day yesterday calling campaigns trying to arrange an interview, with no luck.

The day started off rather well. After getting his DVD into Vil's safe paws, Kevin called him back in a conference call with his boss, Delores Kittimer, who was a partner at his firm. "Kit, we can quash your subpoena," Kevin told him right off.

"The subpoena violates precedents Texas law follows called bad faith subpoenas," Delores explained. "If a subpoena serves no purpose other than to try to force a journalist to reveal his source, without any other evidence, then Texas law has followed a precedent that says that's not allowed. I talked to the DA's office, and they have nothing. All they have is the article, no evidence, not even any certainty there was even a crime and if it happened in their jurisdiction if there was, and that's not enough. I'm completely confident we can quash the subpoena."

"Thank God," Kit said with a sigh. "When will it happen?"

"We talked to the judge yesterday afternoon. Since the court date is so close, he'll listen to our motion to quash it when you have to show up to testify, to give the prosecution a chance to present any other evidence first. He'll listen to the motion and then rule then."

"Okay, so I still show up at the courthouse on Wednesday?"

"Yes. We'll be there with you," Delores told him. "Kevin will be chairing the argument."

“And Misses Kittimer will be right there to make sure I do it right,” Kevin chuckled.

“That’s my job as your boss, Kevin,” she chuckled in reply.

“Thank God,” Kit sighed. “Thank you, guys, thank you so much.”

“We’re your attorneys, Kit,” Delores said gently. “It’s our job and our privilege to be there for you when you need legal representation.”

“Well, that doesn’t mean I don’t appreciate it, especially since you didn’t charge me at all.”

“Well, what we did before, checking out the subpoena, that was pro bono. But, I’m afraid we’ll have to bill you for the court date. Not me, just Kevin,” she said quickly. “I’m just going to be there as an observer, on my own time. Kevin will be the only one billing hours.”

“I don’t mind at all, Misses Kittimer,” Kit told her honestly. “Kev said he’d check out the subpoena as a favor, since I did him a favor last week. I never expected you to do it for free if you had to do real work for me, so bill me for whatever real work you had to do. It’s only fair.”

“I’m glad you feel that way. We’ll only bill you for whatever time it takes at the hearing, though. It only took me about two minutes to find the holes in the subpoena and call a friend in the DA’s office, and I won’t charge for two minutes.”

Kit laughed. “Well, I do truly appreciate that, Misses Kittimer,” he told her. “I’m not sure I could afford two of your minutes.”

She giggled girlishly. “They would be very eventful minutes,” she said with feigned seriousness.

Kit called Vil almost immediately after he was off the phone. “Delores said—“

“I know what she said, she told me before she called you,” she told him, rather smugly. “I’ll give over on this one, bro. I’ll let your lawyers handle it, because Delores absolutely promised me she’d kill this subpoena and get them off your back. If she fails, I’m gonna take a huge bite out of her ass. You don’t double-cross a Vulpan,” she said, a bit vindictively.

“I’m happy to hear that, sis.”

“I’ll still be watching, though,” she warned. “And if Delores fails, I’ll take care of it.”

“I won’t say a word if it does,” he promised, “because I promised my source I’d keep her secret, and I’ll go to jail before I break that promise. But I’m not too keen on the idea of being thrown in jail,” he admitted with a chuckle.

“You leave that to me,” she told him. “If they try to send you to jail, call me. I’ll step on that DA so fast he won’t have time to squeal.”

“It’s a deal.”

Saturday was his flex day, and he often had the luxury to leave early when he got all his work done. But Kit hung around to do some accounting work for Rick, as Rick had taught him his books and often let Kit enter payments and charges to their accounts so long as Kit left a detailed ledger of what he’d done. That put Kit in a position to know the financial health of the magazine better than anyone else. They were going to be in the red for the first expanded issue, but Rick’s notes and advertiser database showed him that they’d break even for their second, and show a profit for their third and beyond. Rick had secured more advertisers than he expected for the expansion, and some of them already had print ads designed and ready to go rather than having to get them created. That would get the magazine back into profitability much faster than Rick had planned...though Kit's investment was still a huge benefit. It was literally paying their salaries this week, and would help pay them next week. As he invested more money, it would be capital the magazine could keep in reserve in case of an emergency, and also give them the ability to buy some new equipment if they needed it. Rick, for example, was considering buying a car titled to the magazine, which he could then drive and claim against taxes for both the car and for the gas and other expenditures he paid out for it. In effect, Rick was going to drive a company car, which let him claim every penny of expenses he shelled out for that car against taxes, which he couldn't do with his truck. Kit thought that that was rather clever, and Rick did deserve to get something back for all the hard work he'd put into the magazine. Replacing his 12 year old truck would be suitable reward.

He keyed in a series of expense reports Barry had submitted for little things like batteries and gas for his car when his Blackberry rang. Rick did compensate them for gas but not the other little things, and they were tax deductible as business expenses, for either the magazine and for them. Rick claimed the compensation for gas against the magazine's taxes and kept track of other expenses for the reporters, which would help them when it was time for them to claim the expenses against their taxes. Kit kept every receipt of everything he spent for the magazine, for he fully intended to claim it on his taxes next year. He picked up his phone and saw it was Martha, so he put it to his ear as he finished putting in an expense on the Excel spreadsheet. "Hey Martha, what's up?"

“Kit,” Martha said quickly. “You need to come to Austin General.”

“What’s wrong? What happened?”

“Rick broke his leg,” she said quickly. “He was fixing the roof on the barn and fell off.”

“Oh my God! Is he okay?”

“He’s in surgery right now, dear. His leg was pretty badly broken. The bone was sticking out,” she said, then he gave her a second to recover herself. “Can you get down here?”

“I’ll be right down. Let me call Jessie and go pick her up, then I’m on the way. Do you need anything?”

“No, dear, no, thank you. Just come down.”

“I’m on my way.”

“Thank you, Kit.”

“Any time, Martha. See you in a few minutes. Bye now.”

When Martha hung up, he snatched up his Blackberry and speed dialed Jessie. “Hey, my handsome fox,” she said sweetly.

“Love, be ready for me to pick you up, we have to go to the hospital,” he told her quickly as he rushed for the door. “Rick broke his leg.”

“Oh no! Is he okay?”

“Martha said he had to have surgery, it was a compound fracture. Can you call Mike and have him spread the word?”

“Sure, sure I can. I’ll call Vil and tell her too, she’ll want to know.”

“Okay. I’m setting the alarm right now, so I should be home in about ten minutes or so.”

“Alright, I’ll be waiting.”

Kit drove perhaps a little too fast, and found Jessie standing by their assigned parking space with her phone to her face. She climbed into the Pathfinder quickly when he pulled up without pulling into the space, holding up traffic while she got in, then they hurried off. “No, I don’t know, Lilly,” Jessie was saying into the phone. “Kit said Martha said Rick was in surgery. I don’t know which room. Just get to Austin General, that’s where we’re all headed, we can meet in the lobby and figure it all out. Okay, let me call Jeffrey, you make the calls and I’ll see you at the hospital. Bye-bye.” She lowered the phone and scrolled through the numbers on her display. “I’ve told Mike and Lilly so far,” she told him. “Mike said he’d call Barry and Savid, and Lilly said she’d call Denise and Marty.”

“Good,” Kit said as he turned. “Did you tell Vil yet?”

“No, I’m starting local and working my way out,” she said. “Mike was asking me a million questions I couldn’t answer.”

“We should call Sheila and let her know too,” Kit said. “She can’t get back up here til I go get her, but she does deserve to know. She works there too, after all.”

“Okay, I’ll call her next. Jeffrey? It’s Jessie.”

Kit got them to the hospital in seven minutes, by nearly running a few red lights. He parked in the visitor lot, and Jessie was calling Sheila as they hurried towards the main entrance. Kit called Martha’s cell phone to find out where in the hospital she was, and he and Jessie finished at almost the same time. “Sheila asked you to come pick them up tomorrow morning,” she said. “They’re going to cut their trip short.”

“I can do that. Martha’s on her way to the third floor from outside, in the waiting room just off the elevator,” he told her. “She doesn’t know how much longer he’s going to be in surgery.”

“Okay. I’ll call Vil, so I’ll see you up there.” Austin General was one of the few hospitals that allowed the use of cell phones inside, but only in hospital rooms. They didn’t allow anyone to use them in waiting rooms or hallways to keep cell phone users from disturbing other furs, so Jessie already knew that she had to wait outside by the front doors to call Vil from her cell phone.

He met Martha in the third floor waiting room. The tall, slightly plump great dane gave him a crushing hug, twinging his back a little bit, and he patted her on the back as she held onto him for a long moment. “It’s going to be alright, Martha, it’s just a broken leg,” he told her assuringly.

“I know, dear, but surgery is surgery,” she answered. He pushed out enough to look into her eyes, holding her paws in his own.

“What happened exactly?”

“Well, Rick was working on the barn, fixing a leak up on the roof, when he just slipped. He slid down the roof and right off the edge.”

“He should have asked for help,” Kit grunted.

“Our next-door neighbor was helping him, dear,” she said. “It was just an accident.”

“How long has he been in surgery?” he asked.

“He just went in when I called you,” she said. “It was the first chance I had to tell anyone.”

“I understand, Martha,” he said, patting her forearm. “Are you alright?”

“I—it’s just frightening, dear,” she told him. “I know it’s not life threatening, but you didn’t see it. It was horrible,” she shuddered.

“Well, the docs will get him all patched up, don’t you worry.”

Jessie came out of the elevator and rushed into Martha’s arms, giving her a long, compassionate hug. “It’s going to be okay, Martha,” she said.

“Thank you, dear,” she said.

More and more furs arrived, both ones he knew and ones he didn’t. A portly doberman shook his paw and introduced himself as Bill Wilson, who was the fur helping Rick with the roof when he fell. “I tried to catch him, but he just,” he said, whistling and sliding his paw over his other quickly. “Was over before I could even reach out.” He met a few other of Rick’s neighbors, all farmers and ranchers, where Rick lived on a tiny ranch that didn’t have any animals or stock. Rick had bought it for a song from an elderly couple who couldn’t work it anymore when he moved back to Austin ten years ago, after leaving a job with Newsweek to strike out on his own in the journalism world. Rick was a native son, who had left to work with Newsweek, then had returned because his high-school sweetheart wanted to go back home. Rick had worked at the newspaper a few years, “trading down” as some had accused him, but that was only extra income for him to help raise enough capital to start his own magazine. The waiting room filled up as not just the crew came in, but with other friends. Sam and Kevin hurried in, no doubt told by Jeffrey through Sandy, and the sorority wolf, Charlotte, showed up out of the blue. “We met at the wedding,” she said in explanation to Kit. “Rick was really nice. I hope he’s okay. Any word?”

“No word yet,” Kit told her. “He’s been in for about an hour.”

After nearly everyone was there, Kit got a text from Vil to have him call her. He went outside and speed dialed her, and she picked up before it even went half a ring. “Bro,” she said. “I’m over Ohio right now. I should be there in about three and a half hours. How is he?”

“No word yet,” he answered. “He’s still in surgery.”

“Kit! Kit, he’s okay!” Jessie shouted, running out of the front doors towards him. “He’s going to a room!”

“Oh thank God,” Kit said explosively. “He just got out of surgery,” he told Vil. “Pretty kitty said they’re moving him to a room. Let me go up and see him, I can call from the hospital room.”

“Okay, call me when you get up there.”

Holding Jessie’s paw, Kit rushed up the stairs with her to the second floor, and down a corridor. They entered a private room filled with furs, and Rick was the center of attention. His lower left leg was wrapped up thick bandages and braces, and his tail also splinted in a brace. “Rick,” Kit said thickly, supplanting Savid and taking Kit’s paw at his bedside. “How you feeling, friend?”

“Very groggy,” he said. “But, they said I’ll be fine. Outside of a broken leg and fractured tail, no major damage.”

“Thank God,” he breathed. “Vil’s on her way down. The instant she heard you were injured, she rushed straight to the airport.”

“She’s such a sweet femme,” Martha said with a sniffle.

Kit called Vil to tell her, and Rick spent a moment talking to her on Kit’s phone as Martha pulled him aside. “The doctors said there was no major damage, but the way his bones were broken is going to make it hard for him to get around,” she told him. “He’ll have to be in a wheelchair for a few weeks, they said. He can’t put any weight at all on his leg, not even for crutches.”

“Well, your house has a big door,” he said. “And we can build a ramp to go up the porch steps.”

“Kit,” Rick called. He and Martha went back to his bedside, and he gave him back his phone, but not to talk to Vil. The call was ended. “Vil said she’ll call you when she gets in,” he said, then he put his paws out to both him and Savid, who was on his other side. “Kit. Savid. They said I’ll be laid up for at least a week, and won’t let me go to work. They won’t cast my leg until they’re sure it won’t get infected, so I’m stuck in here for a few days. Then I’ll have a couple of weeks in a wheelchair,” he grunted. “You two are going to have to hold down the fort for me.”

“We can do easily, Rick,” Savid told him.

“Savid, you handle the editing for the issue. Marty can help you, and I want you there with him, Kit, so you can learn more about it. Kit, I need you to do the rest of my job. I know you know how. I trained you for it myself,” he said with a smile.

“We’ll keep the place from exploding for you, Rick,” Kit told him.

“I know you can, son. I have all my appointments in my computer, you’ll have to go in my place. I know it’s gonna make it hard on you, son, doing my job on top of your own, and I’m sorry.”

“Rick, we’re a team,” Lilly said with a tut. “We’ll all help pull up the slack. We’ll show you we don’t need you around,” she winked.

“Someone always has to watch you, you naughty femme,” Rick teased in reply, which made her laugh.

“I can do a little of my own research for a week,” Barry chuckled. “I’d rather do research than go try to wheedle money out of advertisers,” he grinned at Kit.

“I don’t wheedle,” Kit said primly. “I tell them my sister will crush them like a bug if they don’t buy space in our magazine. Vulpans prefer coercion and blackmail to weak-position tactics like wheedling,” he said, which made everyone laugh.

“It’s the tactical use of available assets to gain an advantage against business rivals,” Jessie added. “Vil says so.”

“She’s corrupted my wife,” Kit grunted.

“She doesn’t look all that corrupted,” Charlotte giggled.

“Wait a few months for the corruption to show,” Sandy laughed. “She has pure evil growing in her belly!”

“Then you don’t need to be at the baby shower, do you Sandy?” Jessie asked, which made Sandy laugh raucously.

The doctors let them visit for nearly an hour, as Rick mainly talked to Kit and Savid about what he wanted them to do while he was laid up, then they were hurried out so the doctors could do a check on him. Rick's neighbors agreed to meet at Rick and Martha's tomorrow to build a temporary ramp that would go up the porch. Jessie and the crew also agreed to come, to turn it into a "ramp raising party," but Kit had to bow out. He was going after Sheila and the others tomorrow. While many of the others went home, promising to come visit tomorrow after the ramp was built, several stayed at the hospital with Martha. Kit and Jessie stayed with her, as did Savid and his wife, an Indian mongoose named Nawa, and Sam and Kevin. Jessie sat with Martha, holding her paw as they waited for the doctors to let them back into his room, as Kit paced the room, going over in his mind how he was going to juggle his schedule to get those appointments done as well as get his normal work done. He had another major project coming up in an interview with Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, but Barry was conducting that interview where Kit would be handling the research for him; Kit got the Smith interview, it was Barry's turn to get a major interview under his belt. There was also the Democratic debate that was coming up in a couple of weeks, and there was a hell of a lot of research to do for that, on the candidates, on the school, on the auditorium itself. On top of those major projects, there was an upcoming piece on the college of science's winning of several grants and their story on the debate over building a new sports facility that would house the basketball and volleyball teams, and the opposition by some students and officials because it would take one of the larger student parking lots as well as reduce the amount of sports facilities offered to the students by tearing down the student sports pavilion and replacing it with a much smaller one.

They let them back in his room after about ninety minutes, but Rick wasn't his usual self. They'd given him pain medication, so he was a little groggy and unfocused. He had this huge amalgamation of stitched canvas and chrome buckles around his left leg, a soft cast holding his broken bones in place, which was also elevated in traction, cradled in a sling of canvas held up by sturdy white cords. Sam noted that they were elevating it to reduce swelling when they went back into the room. Martha sat by his bed, patting his paw as he drifted through coherence in a manner Kit knew all too much, having experienced it from the inside more than once. The first couple of doses of a strong pain medication always put a fur out of it. Kit knew he'd be more coherent after the surge of the initial dose faded, which would put him in that "zone" of both coherence and lack of pain. Then the pain would creep back in, slowly, like some kind of insidious invader, until they gave one another dose.

Martha fed Rick some of the mediocre fare offered by hospitals when Vil arrived. She hurried into the room, hugged Jessie, hugged Kit, then sat by Rick's bedside. "Hey, old male," she said with a smile, patting his cheek and muzzle. "This is some way to get me to come down and see you."

He chuckled. "I don't recommend it," he said.

"I talked to the doctors, they said you'll be right back to kicking tail in about six weeks," she smiled. "How did you break it?"

He laughed ruefully. "I fell off my barn's roof," he admitted.

"You have a whole stable of young males working for you you could have made come out and fix your barn," she grinned.

"And most of them have no idea which end of the hammer to hold," he retorted.

"Well, that might be true. I certainly don't know how to swing a hammer," she admitted. "What are you going to do about the magazine?"

“I’ll have Savid and Kit mind the shop until I’m back,” he said.

“Well, that’ll work,” she said with a nod. “Now, what were you doing up there?”

Rick again recounted the tale of breaking his leg to Vil, and how Bill and Martha trussed it up waiting for the ambulance to arrive. “I’m just glad my wife and neighbor don’t panic,” he said. “I told them what to do, and they did it just fine.”

“You were supervising your own first aid?” Vil asked.

Rick chuckled. “I was in the army, young femme,” he said. “We’re trained for basic first aid. I knew what we had to do when I realized how bad my leg was broken, just like how I knew what to do when Kit was shot.”

“Well, that training has certainly paid off for you,” she smiled. “It saved my brother and helped you in your own hour of need.”

“It never hurts to know what to do in an emergency,” he said.

“Well, don’t you worry yourself one little bit, Rick. I’ll make sure this doesn’t put you in the poorhouse.”

“Well, I do have insurance, Vil,” he chuckled.

“Yes, I know, and we need to talk about when you’re going to offer health insurance to the magazine,” she said, a touch flintily.

“Dear, if I could afford it, I’d gladly do it,” he answered honestly.

“Vil, you didn’t fly all the way down here to pick a fight,” Martha said, a touch sternly. “Or talk business.”

“I know I didn’t. Guess you just can’t take the businessfemme out of me,” she chuckled ruefully.

They visited for nearly an hour, until the medication and the weariness of surgery caught up with Rick, and he started dozing off. They broke up then, and Vil took Martha home with Jessie and Kit driving behind them, and Stav driving Martha’s car. Rick and Martha owned a small ranch east of Austin, out in the hilly scrub of mesquite trees and browning pastureland. Their small three acre ranch was surrounded by larger ranches and farms, and it was Martha’s dreamhouse. Martha had always wanted to live on a small ranch, and Rick had bought it for her, since he’d grown up on a ranch not two miles from where he lived now. Their ranch was small because the former owner was a small horse caretaker, who had a ten stall barn and corral with about two acres of pastureland behind the ranch house for the horses. Rick and Martha used to have three horses, one for each of their sons, but when Rick got so busy with the magazine and the boys moved out, they sold them. Their property was a mirror of its owners. It may have been a small ranch, but it was clean and neat and impeccably maintained. Though the barn behind their two story ranch house now just held their tractor, it was freshly painted, and their ranch house was surrounded by well manicured shrubs and flowers and small trees. Martha was a gardener by hobby, as much as Jessie was a knitter, and her yard was her pride and joy. Five cars pulled up into their driveway, with Vil’s rented limo pulling up the rear, and Martha led Kit, Jessie, Bill, Sam, Kevin, and Vil into their house. It was filled with furniture from the 70s, with an earthy, old-fashioned feel, but everything was clean and neat and orderly.

“I’m afraid this ate up my visit,” Vil told Kit and Jessie when Martha offered to make coffee for everyone. “I won’t be able to make it down next week.”

“That’s alright, sis,” Kit told her. “I’d much rather you be here for Rick than come down just to piddle with us.”

“How long can you stay?” Jessie asked.

“I have to leave tomorrow morning,” she answered. “I just had to come down and see him.”

“We all appreciate it, Vil,” Martha told her, coming out of the kitchen and giving her a warm little hug. “I just hope he’ll be okay.”

“I’m sure he will, hon,” Vil told her, patting her on the arm. “We’ll make sure of it. Kit and Savid can keep the magazine going, and I’ll be watching from Boston to make sure he’s healing just fine. And there’s plenty of furs here ready to run when you send out a call for help.”

“Amen,” Bill said.

“That’s right, Martha. You call me, and I’m on my way,” Sam told her with quiet resolve.

“I’ll leave my numbers with you, hon,” Kevin told her. “I’m here if you need me.”

“Such good kids,” Martha said thickly, giving Sam and Kevin a hug.

“Only to good people,” Kevin told her with a smile, which made her chuckle and pat him on the arm. “I’m mean to jerks.”

“That’s something I’d expect Kit to say.”

“Well, that’s why we’re friends. We think alike,” Kevin winked.

“Well, I hope you know how to swing a hammer, youngun,” Bill told him. “Be here at nine tomorrow and we’ll get that ramp up.”

“I’ll be here, Bill,” Kevin told him.

“I’ll bring a couple of the girls from the sorority,” Sam said. “We’ll have enough paws here to get anything done that needs to be done.”

“Well, between me, Tom, and Jake, I’m sure we’ll have enough. Building a ramp we’re just laying over the stairs shouldn’t take more than a couple of hours.”

“Well, still, Jessie and Charlotte will want to come.”

“The other Jessie,” Jessie said with a giggle when Bill looked at her. “There’s another Jessie at the sorority.”

“That’s why we call her JD,” Sam said, pointing at Jessie. “You guys will need to be fed, and we won’t make Martha do all that cooking.”

Martha chuckled. “I’m used to cooking for a pack of hungry males. I had three sons and Rick to feed,” she told them.

“Yes, but you’ll be at the hospital,” Sam told her. “If you trust us to build your ramp, we’ll take care of it while you take care of Rick. And we’ll bring you a nice home cooked meal when we’re done.”

“Of course I do, dear,” Martha told her, patting the skunk on the shoulder fondly. “And I’m sure both of us will appreciate you cooking for us.”

They started filtering out after Martha had time to calm down and relax. Kit, Jessie, and Vil were the last ones behind, as Jessie assured Martha she’d have plenty of help and Kit and Vil assured her that Rick and the magazine would be cared for quite lovingly. “We’re partners now, after all,” Kit smiled.

“You just focus on Rick, hon, let us handle everything else.”

“I’ll even do the shopping for you,” Jessie assured her.

“At least Rick had good timing, he broke his leg right before spring break, which gives Jessie plenty of spare time,” Kit winked, which made Martha gasp, then laugh in spite of herself.

“I’m sure he had it all planned out,” Martha chuckled.

They kept Martha in good spirits until she was tired, and then Jessie and Vil tucked her into bed. “I’m going to stay here tonight,” Jessie told them when they came downstairs. “I want to be here if she needs me.

“I’ll have Stav bring your car here,” Vil said. “I’ll be here tonight, but I’m going to have to go back to Boston in the morning.”

“Which hotel are you going to stay at?” Jessie asked.

“I’ll stay here tonight, if there’s room,” she said.

“They only have two spare bedrooms,” Jessie said. “There’s not enough room for everyone.”

“Ah. Well, damn,” Vil sighed. “I’ll just go down to the Regency, then.”

“Stav, Marcus, you can borrow my truck to go pick up Jessie’s car,” Kit told them. “That should make it easier for you.”

“Yes, it will, thank you,” Stav said with a nod. “We can stop by the grocery store on the way back to pick up enough food for everyone tomorrow as well.”

“And thank you, it’s sweet of you to do this for us,” Jessie added.

“It’s more than our job, it’s our privilege,” Marcus said with a rare smile. “Often we serve to prevent something bad from happening. It’s always a joy to serve to help with something good.”

“Now you see why I pay their outrageous salaries,” Vil said with a smile.

Chapter 24

Rick was certainly in good spirits the next morning.

Kit stopped in to see him early that morning, talking the nurse into letting him in before visiting hours just to say hello, and he spent about five minutes with him. Rick was in that window of comfortable lucidity between pain and high from the pain medication, but both Rick and the nurse who came in with him gave him a very good prognosis. “They said I should make a full recovery with nothing but surgery scars to prove it ever happened,” Rick chuckled. “I just hope mine don’t do what yours did.”

“In that riot of patchwork you call fur, how could anyone tell?” Kit teased in reply.

“They said I’ll be about two to three weeks in a wheelchair before they’ll let me go to crutches,” Rick grunted.

“That’s better than six weeks in a wheelchair,” Kit told him.

“True.”

After stopping by to see Rick, Kit got back to business, and business was going to get Sheila. He arrived at Avia at eight on a Sunday morning, and found the hangar open and workers there. They had never seen him, but they also didn’t challenge him when he pulled his Pathfinder into the hangar through the car entrance...mainly since Alice had given him a little placard to put in his windshield. He parked near the hangar wall behind his plane, then went from car to plane in almost record time, performing a thorough

“Aside from his broken leg, he’s fine,” Kit answered. “The surgery they did to fix his bones went off without a hitch, they didn’t even put any screws or plates in his leg. They reset the bones and sewed his leg back up, and they were done. He’ll have to stay in a wheelchair until his bones can support him walking on crutches, though.”

“Well, that doesn’t sound too bad,” Sheila said. “I’ll still be happier after I see him.”

“He’s looking forward to it. I’ll be landing in about fifteen minutes or so, I’m about to take it off autopilot, so let me get off here and get my mind back on what I’m supposed to be doing.”

“We’ll be waiting.”

Kit landed for a second time at Brownsville and taxied out to the general aviation terminal, and saw that Sheila and the others were definitely waiting in an overcast, mild morning. Kit pulled in and went through engine cutoff, then opened the door. “Hurry up, femmes, there’s weather coming,” he called. They hurried up to his plane, and he helped them stow their luggage. Danielle fought a little with Sheila over who was going to sit up front, however.

“You were up front last time, and he’s your cousin!” Danielle protested. “You have a way better chance of riding in the plane again than me!”

“Well, he is my cousin, and I got us this weekend!” Sheila replied.

“I’ll make both of you walk if you don’t get in the plane,” he said bluntly to them, helping Allison up onto the wing on his side; she intended to sit behind him this time. “Just flip a damn coin, we gotta go!”

Danielle rather smugly won a coin toss, and he had them all strap in as he restarted the engine. “Alright, get your headsets on, femmes,” he called as he radioed the tower, then used the MFD to check the radar for the region. As he feared, the front that he’d seen edging in on the west side of the display was moving at a fair clip. “Damn,” he growled. “Well, I hope you don’t get airsick,” he told them.

The ride home was a bit more challenging than the usual flight, for he hit the front about ten minutes from Austin, and the whole time, he was too busy watching the Doppler radar to pay much attention to what the femmes were talking about. He had more important things on his mind. When they hit the leading edge of the front, which created sudden crosswinds and turbulence, Danielle looked a little frightened, but Sheila just laughed as the plane rocked in turbulence as he descended in preparation for landing. “There’s some crosswinds at the airport,” he told the girls, “so be ready for the plane to rock a little as I make our approach. Don’t be scared. I’ve landed in worse than this.”

As Kit predicted, the landing was a little bumpy, but it was also by the book. The small runways weren’t in much use during weather, so Kit didn’t have to wait at all to land. As the rain intensified, Kit taxied off the runway and along the ramp. “Isn’t this a different airport?” Allison asked curiously.

“Yes, this is Bergstrom,” he answered. “Vil managed to find me at least a temporary place to park the plane inside a hangar, which is much preferable to parking out on the tarmac, especially in weather like this. So we won’t have to unload the plane in the rain, and I won’t get soaked tying it down.”

“Well, that’s good at least,” Danielle said.

“I’m sorry again, girls, about cutting this short,” Sheila said as they turned along the ramp that led to Avia’s hangar.

“No problem, we understand,” Danielle answered.

“Did you at least have fun while you were there?” Kit asked.

“It wasn’t as busy as I thought it would be,” Sheila said. “I was hoping for at least some eye candy for us to look at, but it was all families and crap.”

“It was the wrong weekend for it, spring break starts next weekend,” Danielle giggled.

“I know, but I thought it’d be nice to go scope out the place before spring break, so we’d know where all the good places were,” she grinned. “And I think we might see if we can get Kit to take us down next weekend too,” she winked.

“Nope, I have plans,” he said. “If I take you, getting back is your problem.”

“Well, we could always drive,” Allison said. “It’s only a few hours to Brownsville from Austin.”

“Well, yeah, but it’s so much more stylish to be flown down by our own personal pilot,” Sheila said grandly.

“This personal pilot’s gonna start charging you,” he said as they pulled up to the hangar. “Gas for this thing isn’t free, you know.”

“It is for you, Vil pays for it,” Sheila teased.

“And is that a reason to let you abuse her hospitality, or mine?” he challenged as he carefully guided the plane down the center aisle, and then pulled into his spot and turned the plane around, putting it almost exactly where it had been when he pulled out that morning. A few button presses shut down the engine. “Alright, go ahead and get out while I do post flight. Shouldn’t take but a minute.”

By the time he was finished with his post flight, all three femmes had gotten out from Danielle’s side. Kit opened the cargo door and helped them unload their luggage, then he waved to the others in the hangar and herded his charges into his Pathfinder. “Alright, back to the sorority,” he said, for that was where he’d picked them all up.

Sheila followed him to the hospital, and they went up to see Rick. He looked much healthier and more alert than he had just that morning, mainly because Martha and Jessie were there. Sheila gave him a big hug, and Rick teased her about her outfit. “I’m supposed to be recuperating, and you saunter in here wearing shorts and a half shirt,” he told her. “That does little for my blood pressure, you know.”

“Oh, do I get the old heart going there, Rick?” Sheila said with an outrageous smile, turning in place to let him get a good look at her. “You should have seen me on the beach. I was rocking in my bikini. Some serious square footage of my white fur was on display,” she said with a wink, patting her white-furred belly.

“I hope you got pictures.”

“I hope you like hospital food,” Martha told him, which made Rick laugh.

“You missed it all, Rick,” Sheila pressed. “Me and Ally were having a contest to see how much fur we were willing to show off, while Danielle tried to pretend she didn’t know us,” Sheila grinned.

“Ally?” he asked.

“Allison, a friend of mine,” Sheila told him. “She’s a red vixen too,” she winked. “And she’s almost as fearless as me. There was all this white fur all over the beach, a whole bunch of boys following us, and Danielle looking about ready to die of embarrassment.”

“Sheila, I’m going to box your ears if you keep this up,” Martha warned, which made Sheila laugh delightedly and pat the matronly femme on the shoulder.

“I’m just playing, Martha,” she said. “I tease him all the time at work.”

“You tease everyone at work,” Kit said mildly.

“It keeps work fun,” she said shamelessly.

“She’s like this at work?” Martha asked.

“She once mooned Barry for a over a five dollar bet,” Kit told her, which made everyone but Martha laugh.

“Sheila, that’s very improper.”

“I’m no lady,” Sheila grinned. “And I’m five bucks richer. All it cost me was showing Barry my bare butt...which I might have done for free if he’d asked nicely.”

“But you compromised your modesty!”

“Give me five bucks, and I’ll compromise it right here and now. For ten I’ll show you all my white fur.”

“You’re incorrigible!” Martha laughed helplessly.

“Yeah. Fun, ain’t it?” Sheila agreed, then she burst into laughter when Rick started padding his hospital gown, looking for his wallet, which earned him a smack from his wife.

Despite being much more toned down, Sheila was still Sheila.

Kit stayed with them for about two hours, but then he had to go. He went into the office, and spent most of the early afternoon going over everything so he was sure it was all in order, and going over Rick’s schedule next week so he’d know what was going on. Just like Kit, Rick kept a very detailed appointment calendar, which told Kit absolutely everything that he needed to know about what Rick was going to be up to next week. There were seven advertisers to visit, calls to make about the upcoming debate they intended to cover, and more calls to try to secure interviews with other political figures. Rick was still trying to wrangle at least one interview with at least one Democratic candidate, but even the longshots like Joe Biden and Dennis Kucinich had declined an interview with the magazine.

Kit brought up his own calendar, then compared the two. It was going to really, really load down his schedule, but he could do it all. He’d be working late every day, and he’d have to come into work tomorrow as well...but that was the breaks. He owned a stake in the magazine now, and its profitability was necessary for him to get his investment back. That meant that he’d have to take over for Rick for a week, until the hospital cleared him to come back to work. Kit would still be doing the outside appointments until Rick was ambulatory again, but at least when Rick was cleared to return, he could do all the deskwork and phone calls.

No pain, no paycheck.

He decided to get a head start on it all by tackling some of the research he intended to do tomorrow, for Barry's Hutchinson interview. He did, though, call Lupe and tell him he wouldn't be there for poker.

"Brah, this is two weeks in a row. We miss ya!"

"It's gonna be three, next week I'm taking Jessie out, and we won't be back until Sunday night."

"Aww, hell. Well, if you can't show up for poker, the least we can do is swing by and bring ya something' to eat."

"Nah, you don't have to go that far out of your way, bud," he declined. "I've got food here already, and besides, Jessie would think you're making a pass at me if you start usurping what she sees as her domain."

Lupe laughed. "God forbid she thinks I'm muscling in on her turf. She's a sweetie, but she can be jealous."

"It just means she loves me," Kit chuckled.

"Dude, has she ever clawed you?" he asked.

Kit laughed. "Never on purpose," he said. "She prefers to whack me with pillows when I'm being bad. And of course, I'm bad as much as possible. There's not a pillow in our apartment that doesn't have an imprint of my face on it somewhere," he said, which made Lupe howl with laughter.

Jessie joined him a little after noon, fulfilling her self-appointed role of nurturer and caretaker by bringing him some stuffed peppers. "How much longer are you going to be, handsome fox?" she asked.

"I'm not sure, pretty kitty," he answered, motioning at the computer. "I've got a lot of work to do, and it got tripled when Rick went down. I'm here now doing work I'm supposed to do tomorrow so I can hopefully get home before dark tomorrow night."

"I can understand that, but can't someone help you with it?"

"Not with this," he said. "I'm halfway through the research I'm doing for Barry's interview with Senator Hutchison, and he wouldn't have any idea where to pick up where I left off if I left it for him to finish."

"Well, you don't have to do it all alone," she said, giving him a firm look. "Let me go get my laptop, and you can tell me what to go find."

"You, little missy, have homework," he said firmly.

"I've finished my homework," she said imperiously.

"I don't want you stressing yourself over it, pretty kitty."

"I'll be more stressed waiting for you to come home," she told him. "Now stop playing the noble sufferer and let me help you."

He chuckled. "Alright, alright. My laptop's in my attaché, you can use that one." She pulled it out and pulled up the chair that sat in front of his desk, then sat it down and opened it. "Okay, first thing you can do is go to the National Library of Congress and run a search for words Kay Bailey Hutchison Senate Bill sponsor. It will return every piece of legislation she's introduced or co-sponsored. When you have them, compile them into a list of titles, note what kind of bills they are, like environmental, spending, transportation, defense, and so on, and send it to my workstation. After that, run the words Kay Bailey Hutchison vote, then put the words Legislative Session in quotation marks. That will bring up a list of every vote she's made, sorted by legislative session. You'll get a listing of PDF files. Download each one, then save it and send it to my workstation. I'll go through them later to compile a list of every major or controversial vote she's cast, and how she cast it."

"Don't they keep a list like that somewhere?"

"Sure, but most often it's kept by the Senator's office or some other organization, and they like to conveniently leave out certain votes they'd rather not let furs know she made. The only way to get a full and unbiased list is to pull it right out of the Library of Congress. That can't be altered, they pull it right out of the Senate records."

"Oh. Alright, handsome fox, the computer's up, so let me get started."

Jessie actually helped tremendously. With her to do a lot of the tedious searching, Kit was able to compile and extrapolate the data into an easy to read format that Barry could skim quickly in order to compose his questions, then have that data on hand in his PDA to use as ammunition if the Senator lied about something in the record. What would have taken him five or six hours of searching and compiling only took three hours. Jessie was an English major, so she knew how to research to some degree, and that helped when it came to her using Google. Jessie could google like nobody's business.

The pair became a trio when Barry came in, poking his head into the office around four. "Did you see Rick today?"

"Of course we did," Kit told him. "Why do you think I'm here?"

Barry chuckled. "I came to do that research on Hutchison. I think you're going to be too busy to do it."

"We're almost done with it," Jessie told him, with a bit of a smug little smile.

“Yeah, I came in today to get that done for you.”

“Aww, damn, Kit, you didn’t have to do that. You’re going to be too busy with Rick’s work this week.”

“Barry, I’m the researcher,” Kit told him. “And I’ve seen your research. It’s the researching equivalent of a kindergartner with crayons. Think I’d let you go into that interview with what you prepared yourself?”

Barry gave him a hot look, but when he saw the lightness in Kit’s eyes, he laughed helplessly. “I did just fine doing my own research before you got here,” he said with mock imperiousness.

“Thank God I got here then,” Kit grinned at him. “I have a certain standard I expect out of research done for this magazine, and you, sir, simply just don’t cut the mustard.”

Barry laughed. “That’s it, it’s so on now, buster,” the bear grinned. “Just wait til the next time you do an interview, and I have a chance to rag on your invasion of my territory.”

“Bring it, little cub,” Kit grinned in reply. “Now let me finish this up. You can help by sending me that work you did on the board of governors meeting, so I can archive it for the database.”

“Sure thing.”

“There’s an extra stuffed pepper in the fridge if you want it,” Jessie added.

“Woo, thanks Jessie!” he said excitedly, then hurried towards the break room.

Kit was too tired to do much of anything that night, but he did manage to go see Rick and fill him in on things. He went over the schedule he'd drawn up with his boss to make sure Rick didn't have anything planned that wasn't on his schedule, and found that Rick didn't have anything to add, and probably wouldn't have said anything even if he did, since Kit was going to be so busy. "Son, I can't thank you enough for this," he said. "You're going to be so busy til I'm back on my feet, and on top of all that, Jessie's gonna have a baby, which has to be on your mind all the time."

"Well, let's just call it a clean slate when it comes to the vacation time I owe," Kit said, which made Rick laugh. "Oh, and there's one more thing. Saturday and Sunday, I am going to take some time off. I promised Jessie I'd take her to New Orleans, and I'm not going to break my promise. I'll just have to make sure that I get everything done this week, so we have that time."

"Abandoning me in my time of need, are ya?" Rick asked with a sly grin.

Kit laughed. "As if. You should be home by then, and I'll still be a call away if you need me."

"Did they build that ramp like Bill was saying they would?"

"I'd guess so," Kit answered. "I haven't been over to your house today. Jessie's over there now, you can call her and ask her how lopsided it is."

"With Bill doing it, that's entirely possible," Rick said seriously. "He's a great friend, but he can't eye up a straight line with a yardstick."

Kit had been right about how busy he'd be, but he was also right about a couple of other things.

On Monday afternoon, Barry almost had an interview with Senator Hillary Clinton, Presidential candidate. Kit called the national headquarters of her campaign, identified himself and the magazine, and asked for an interview for the magazine, ten minutes miraculously cleared itself in Senator Clinton's heretofore full schedule. However, the campaign worker told him that the interviewer would have ten minutes to ask the Senator questions, but only questions pre-submitted to the campaign at least three days in advance, to which Kit replied "that's not an interview, that's a sound bite," and threatened to publish the fact that the campaign had tried to do something like that, to turn the interview into a milktoast softball photo op about how Senator Clinton was the furs' candidate who even did interviews with little city magazines. The staffer seemed quite miffed, and made a fatal mistake. "I was being nice enough to offer your magazine time with Senator Clinton out of respect for the Vulpan family. I didn't have to offer you anything, since if I recall, you're the earless outcast Vulpan who has nothing but a family name to throw around, and lives exiled from the family in Texas. What does it matter to me that some little backwater campus paper prints something about us I'll just dismiss as the lies of a little fur who gets by after being disowned by exploiting his family's name while writing for some quaint little school newspaper? Who are people going to believe, a little mom-and-pop ten page mimeographed school paper and a disgraced rich kid that regular furs will hate because he's a rich brat, or a national campaign spokesfur? You have no teeth, Mister Vulpan, and I believe the Senator's schedule just filled up again. So, you can go to hell." Then he hung up the phone.

“Oh, you sorry little son of a bitch!” Kit shouted into a phone that was now dead. “Toothless, am I? I’m about to bite you in the ass, you political hack!” He went on to swear sulfurously, which got about everyone in the office looking into his office door. “We’re about to declare war on the Clinton campaign,” he told them, which made them all laugh.

“Ooo, I need some color-coordinated war paint!” Marty said eagerly.

That nameless staffer did the one thing one should never, ever, ever do. He made a Vulpan angry.

Like his family, Kit didn’t anger in the same way as most furs. The reaction of most furs to anger was to get, well, angry. Yell, shout, throw things, maybe do something rash, that was the common reaction to anger. But Vulpans approached anger from a different angle. Kit had gotten his initial ire out of the way, and now all that was left was the cold, seething side of anger that made him focused on his task, and that task was to take that unnamed staffer over his proverbial knee and spank him.

Still fuming, Kit sat down and typed out a blistering, savage, vituperous editorial comment that would run in the opinion section of the magazine, which was part of the mailbag. It was a rare thing for the magazine to run an op-ed, but Kit was furious, and not just furious that he’d been personally insulted. The staffer had dared to pull his pants down and piss on the journalism society in general, and seemed to forget that even little “mom and pop ten page school papers” had the power to reach readers. He blistered the campaign for the behavior of its spokesman, then added a final comment. “I may be the exiled outcast of one of the richest families of America, as you so succinctly put it, but that doesn’t mean that I still don’t have a voice, and the right to use it in the political process. Never once have I ever tried to use my name to gain unfair advantage, for if anyone knows anything about me or my family history, they know that I have no love for the family whose name I bear, and would wish to be divorced from association with the vast majority of them. To threaten to attack me for printing the truth of your own words by exploiting my family and my background is the most base and cowardly of attacks, equal to attacking the wife of a candidate for something her brother did twenty years ago. It is typical political flim-flammery of the sort that the American voters are growing tired, making an outrageous attack with absolutely no connection to the matter at hand in hopes that the outrage will obfuscate the truth. When you threatened to attack my credibility based on my family name and the unfavorable image created by the idea of spoiled rich brat whining because he was denied a shiny bauble, which has absolutely nothing to do with the issue, you proved that you and the campaign you represent are nothing but more of the same. And America grows tired of same old same old. And you may accuse me of whining in this article, crying to the readers of our “quaint little mom and pop mimeographed school paper,” but to do so would be merely proving my own point. The onus is upon you, sir, to prove that I am what you say I am using logic, reason, and debate, which is something which seems to be utterly lacking in the discourse of this campaign, from every campaign, not just the one you represent.”

Kit did edit his initial lambasting of the Clinton campaign to carefully remove all references to the Senator herself, who probably had no idea what her staffer had done. Then, realizing that that too was not maintaining journalistic integrity, he broadened it again, omitting all references to the Clinton campaign and just naming it “one of the campaigns.” But he left that same sense of outrage that a campaign could be that arrogant, accusing it of “forgetting its connections with the common furs,” and “scornfully dismissing the little fur in favor of the well oiled political machine, which proved that no matter how much campaigns said they were campaigns of the furs and with furs in their hearts and minds, that they would listen to the needs of the common fur, they were still nothing but cold calculating number crunchers that would bleed a newborn if it would milk one more vote out of the machine.” He went on to wonder if the campaign approached every phase of its campaign the same way, if it was the needs of the furs that the campaign would address when elected, or the needs of the special interest groups who had the influence to hold the candidate’s ear. “To deny a common citizen the same access you grant a rich corporate executive because they cannot pay you in the form of campaign donations is akin to bribery, and it makes one wonder just what you must repay to that rich executive should you be elected to office,” he finished with his final paragraph.

Kit showed the various versions of the editorial to Rick in his hospital room that evening as he sat down with his boss to discuss what he’d managed to get done that day. Rick gave him a steady look after he read it. “Did you drop your name on him on purpose? Did you come out and say that the Vulpans would like it if the Senator gave the magazine an interview?”

“No!” Kit said. “I just identified myself as Kit Vulpan, which is only polite, and then asked for an interview for the magazine. I admit, I figured them hearing my name might open the door, but I didn’t do anything overt. I’m smarter than that, Rick. If I threw around my family name like that, Vil might wring my neck. It might affect her, and she won’t stand for that if her renegade little brother is out there claiming to speak for the Vulpan family. My sister may love me, but she is a Vulpan. She’ll come after me even harder than she would someone else if I cross her, because I'm supposed to know better."

That made Rick laugh richly. "Alright then. Run it. It's brilliant. Just make one change."

"What?"

"Let's go with the original idea. Identify the Clinton campaign, but keep the paragraphs about all the campaigns acting like that too."

"But that's being biased."

"This is an op-ed, son, you're allowed to be biased. If Clinton can't keep her campaign staff civil, there's no reason we need to be civil in return. She's responsible for the actions of the furs she employs to speak for her. So, let's go after them. Leave them with me, I'll edit them so they merge. It's pretty clear you have two separate articles here, they'll look strange if you try to just paste one to the end of the other. Besides, it'll give me something to do. It's borin' in here," he complained.

"God do I know that feeling," Kit said seriously.

"We'll knock the starch out of a few collars," he said with a bright smile.

That was the memorable first day of his week, but he was too busy to dwell on that. He spent his days doing the work of two furs. He was going in at six in the morning and leaving at six or seven at night, doing his research and other duties in the morning, then attending to Rick's business that afternoon.

Kit ended up taking the accounting home with him, sitting at the table with his laptop as Jessie cooked dinner for him. “How was racquetball?” he asked her.

She snorted. “Your cousin cheats!” she accused. “She tries to hit me with the ball!”

“She’s a Vulpan, love,” Kit said absently, sipping his tea. “You’ve shown weakness. Now she’ll exploit it for everything she’s worth.”

“Well, it’s no fun to play if I’m spending all my time dodging the ball!”

“Learn to hit it back,” he shrugged.

“Just wait til I get her on that tennis court Saturday morning,” Jessie fumed.

“Pretty kitty, you know what she’s going to do, and you’re a damn good racquetball player. You taught me, after all. Use it against her.”

“I’d rather play you.”

“I’d rather play tennis.”

“You’d rather run me all over the court,” she accused.

“Yes, I love watching you jiggle in that sexy little tennis outfit,” he said immediately. “I need to buy you one of those little personal trampolines,” he mused, which made her gasp from the kitchen, the burst out in helpless laughter.

“I should smack you, but how can I be angry that you like looking at me?” she admitted.

“All day, every day,” he said, saving his spreadsheet. “I’m done, pretty kitty. Need help?”

“No, I got it, handsome fox. Go rest a little. You deserve it!”

“You’re the one who deserves a little rest.”

“Don’t go all psycho protective on me now,” she giggled. “Doctor Mac said I need to stay just as active. After all, you let your cousin beat me with racquetballs today!”

“No, you let her beat you up with racquetballs. Learn to play your game your way, or keep dodging little blue blurs.”

“Abused by my cousin-in-law and ridiculed by my husband. Whatever is a poor little kitty to do?” she said in a melodramatic tone.

“Grow some fangs, you weenie,” Kit called.

He knew immediately that he would face dire consequences for that one, but Jessie decided to extend the anticipation...for all of five seconds. He felt her grab the back of the collar of his tee shirt, then an icy shockwave roared through his back when Jessie poured ice down the back of his shirt. He yelped and jumped out of the chair, holding the back of his shirt out, but he was also laughing lightly as she strutted back into the kitchen holding an empty ice tray.

The week both seemed to crawl and rush by.

Kit was working more than twelve hours a day, doing his work in the morning and Rick’s work in the afternoon, but he was no replacement for Rick. They all felt his absence most keenly, for he was the calm rock that kept everyone confident and the gentle joker who lightly teased and was teased by in return. Kit did Rick's work in his own office, not even pretending to take Rick's place now that Rick wasn't here to claim his own desk. It was just fine to sit at Rick's desk when Rick was here and all the materials were in his office, but now, with Rick another week days to go in the hospital before his planned release date of Tuesday, when they planned to replace his stitches with ones that would dissolve on their own and then put his leg in a cast, which was the green light for him to go home.

Rick tried to stay as engaged as possible, mainly through his laptop. Kit and Savid would send him things, and he would look them over and send back his opinion. But Kit and Savid were the ones that did the real work. Savid was responsible for the layout of the magazine that week, and what was more, a magazine with 14 more pages than before. Kit's responsibility was filling those extra pages with ads to pay for it. Rick had secured about half of the new advertisers, but it fell to Kit to land the rest of them. He spent his Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons hurriedly bargaining with advertisers over ad space, offering the design skills of Savid and Jeffrey if they didn't have a print ad of their own, and then negotiating over how much space they wanted and how long they wanted it. He managed to secure all the advertisers they needed, fulfilling the 21% threshold of advertiser space Rick maintained to keep the magazine from looking like a NASCAR race car—barring certain exceptions, like half or full page ads, which were exempted from the advertiser ratio—that made the magazine look like a real magazine, and not another campus ad sheet with a little news in it. Some of those ads wouldn't show up for a couple of weeks, but they were contracted, and the magazine was paid for it.

Thursday was...weird. They had their first ever issue wrap meeting without Rick, and nobody liked the feel of it at all. They went through the motions, though. Savid chaired the meeting, going over the issue page by page, feature by feature, article by article, looking for feedback, opinions, or comment. Everyone felt a little subdued, and even more so because Rick refused to make the final call on wrapping it. "This was your issue, so it's ready for print when you say it is," he'd told them in a conference call between himself, Savid, and Kit just before the meeting. The cover had a picture of Rick on it, much as Kit had covered the issue when he was shot, Rick in the hospital with his leg in traction with the headline Oh No, Not Again! over him in big white letters, and below that was the caption Lone Star head dingo injured in home accident. Barry had done an article about the accident, and they also ran a tongue-in-cheek list of do's and don't's for furs working on the roofs of their barns, cautioning against such activities as ballroom dancing, jump rope skipping, and pole vaulting while working on top of a barn roof.

Rick's biggest contribution to the issue was Kit's edited evisceration of the campaigns. Rick had seamlessly turned Kit's rant into a devastating butt-whoopin' of all the Presidential campaigns in general, but taking the Clinton campaign to task in particular for its unprofessional and downright childish response to the magazine's attempts to get an interview, making sure to leave in the campaign staffer's cruel mocking of Kit's family situation, and Kit's personal response to it. Rick had rearranged Kit's material and added some lines of his own to fill the gaps, joining it all together. He changed it so much that Kit added Rick to the byline for the article, giving credit where credit was due.

It went to the printer right on time, and they called it a day...at least everyone but Kit did. He stayed behind to get some work done, clearing space for his weekend, for he still fully intended to take Jessie to New Orleans that weekend. He had promised her, and he never broke his word to his wife. He accepted two applications for the photographer's position from the mail, and printed three more filed through internet postings. He did more accounting work, closing out the week in the books, which coincided with the last day of the magazine's activity cycle. He called back two advertisers who had shown interest in the magazine, did some research on possible photographic equipment their new hire might want, sent off a copy of the end of week reports to Vil, who still watched the magazine's finances to ensure her investment was maturing satisfactorily, then dropped by the hospital to deliver the resumes and the end of week reports to Rick. "I think we got everything," Kit told him. "The wrap meeting went alright, but it was my first time closing out the week."

"I'm sure you did fine, son," Rick told him. "Did you send a copy off to Vil?"

He nodded. "If I messed it up, I'm sure she'll call me to point it out," he chuckled. "I also sent her a thank-you note with it for her coming down."

"Yeah, I need to do that too. By the way, the docs did some tests on my leg."

"And?"

"They're going to do another minor surgery," he answered. "They said it'd be just a local anesthetic and a twenty minute procedure. Something in there isn't healing exactly the way they want, so they're going to go in and fix it."

“Well, that doesn’t sound so bad.”

“It’s not, but they’re doing the surgery Monday morning, then they’re gonna hold me for three days afterward to make sure I don’t have an infection before casting me. They’re really anal about that. I tried to get them to send me home earlier, but they kept saying that since the surgery area will be inside the cast, they’re taking no chances. So I’m looking at not getting out of here until sometime next week.”

“Ouch.”

“Yeah, ouch. Think you guys can hold on, son?”

“I’m sure we can, Rick.”

“Good. When’s your court date?”

“Wednesday.”

“You still taking the weekend off?”

Kit nodded. “I should have my slate clear by tomorrow afternoon so I’m not burdening anyone, then I’ll be in New Orleans with Jessie on Saturday night and Sunday. I’ve already got our reservations at the Hyatt Regency and Antoine’s.”

“A restaurant?”

“Yeah. I worked there for a week when I was in New Orleans, until I got fired because the maitre’d didn’t like the looks of me. He said that someone that looked like a street ruffian had no business working in a respectable restaurant like his. It’ll be fun going in as a customer,” he chuckled. “I can be an ass to the manager, and he can’t say a word to me.”

Rick laughed. “Give him hell, son,” he grinned.

“Where’s Martha?”

“She went home about twenty minutes ago,” he answered. “She’s bringing me some pot roast,” he said with a hungry lick of his lips.

“I wouldn’t mind staying to steal it from you, but Jessie’s waiting for me.”

“Get yourself home, son, and thank you so much for stepping up to the plate when the magazine needs you.”

“Hey, I’m a part owner. I have to secure my own paycheck. Yours, well, who cares,” Kit said flippantly, which made Rick laugh so hard his leg shifted, and caused him to wince.

The true beauty of an airplane was doing things just like this.

It was a brilliant, cloudless late afternoon as they soared at 12,000 feet, with the Gulf of Mexico visible on Jessie’s side of the plane and them over the wetlands of Louisiana, and the sun low and behind the plane, painting the marshlands and little towns below in gorgeous golden light. Jessie had her earphones tuned to XM while Kit had his laptop balanced on his knees, surfing some websites to get a basic overview of his next major research project, the Democratic debate. They were an hour and a half into a two hour flight, en route to New Orleans. Instead of them wearing comfortable fare of jeans or shorts and tee shirts, Kit was wearing a suit and Jessie a breathtaking blue dress with sequined straps fastening behind her neck, splitting into four lines to form the border of the bodice, two going outside her breasts and the other two crossing between her breasts to form a border filled with blue satin, then looping around to form the border of the low back of her dress. It was calf-length, and her high heels were laying on the floor by her feet, ready to be slipped back on when they landed. They would be going from the plane to the hotel with just enough time to check in and drop off their single overnight bag and laptops, then would go directly to the restaurant. The clock on his PFD showed that they were right on time. They could call a taxi from the airport to take them to the hotel, and it would wait there while they checked in before taking them on to the restaurant.

“Wow!” Jessie gasped as the plane crossed over marshy wetland, the border of the sea and Louisiana looming to the south. “That’s so pretty! I gotta get a picture!”

“That’s Vermillion Bay over there on the horizon,” he told her, pointing to Jessie’s side of the plane. “We’ll fly directly over Thibadoux soon on our way to New Orleans. That’s all wetlands and swamp down there, what they call bayou country, or cajun country. When we approach the airport, you’ll see Lake Pontchartrain, the airport’s built right on the shore,” he told her. “Depending on how they make me land, we may swing out over it.” A controller called his plane’s number on his headphones. “Excuse me, love, I’m being called,” he said, then he pushed the key on his joystick and answered. The controller was basically just identifying him and learning where he was going, which wasn’t unusual when a private plane on visual flight rules wandered into airspace controlled by a new airport, for he was close to Lafayette.

It took them another twenty minutes to reach New Orleans, after they stowed everything and Kit took the plane off autopilot. They did indeed get to fly over Lake Pontchartrain, landing at Lakefront airport from the north, almost feeling like he was landing on an aircraft carrier when he approached the runway from over the lake. Lakefront was a big airport for a general aviation facility, and because of that it didn't run temporary parking for planes precisely the same way. Kit didn't talk to the airport about it, he had to talk with one of the three aircraft FBOs, Fixed Base Operators, who owned the hangars and tarmac space in the airport. Kit just picked the one closest to the runway, Aero Premier, called them on their radio frequency, and secured himself overnight parking in their brand new north complex hangar, which was literally right off the taxiway...after he taxied all the way back up from the south end of the runway. But, it was worth the taxi to park his plane in a hangar that was open 24 hours and offered to call a taxi for them while they were still taxiing to the hangar.

After landing and reaching the tarmac area controlled by Aero Premier, Kit was met by a signal truck who guided him into the huge hangar and parked him in the middle of a large collection of other private planes. Then the driver helped unload their suitcase and drove them to the front desk in the signal truck, where Kit paid for a night of parking, refilling his plane's fuel tanks, and a $10 landing fee charged by Lakefront airport.

At Georgetown, and the airport in Brownsville, visiting pilots weren't charged landing fees, the airports getting their income from pilots by selling their own AVGas and jet fuel. Here at Lakefront, though, the airport offered no services they themselves oversaw and they charged a small $10 landing fee for all landing aircraft not based at the airport...which Kit didn't find to be overly outrageous. It was entirely acceptable to him to pay $10 so the airport was there and in working order in case he ever wanted to land here again. The FBOs that offered parking, fuel, and services to visiting planes collected those fees, and probably split them with the airport.

The two FBOs at Bergstrom were Atlantic Aviation and Signature Services, both of which were “franchise” FBOs that had businesses at quite a few airports, didn’t have to do that; Signature was the FBO Vil used when she landed in Austin, it was to their hangar and tarmac that Kit went when they went to meet her.

That there were only two FBOs at Bergstrom that Kit could contract to take care of his plane, if that was eventually where he parked his plane after getting permanent hangar space, might seem odd. But in reality, it made sense from a business standpoint. Little Georgetown Airport charged no landing fees and was focused entirely on private aviation, was more friendly to businesses that focused on the private pilot with his personal plane, and as a result there were 7 FBOs there that offered a variety of services, on top of the services the airport itself offered in fuel and their pilot terminal. Bergstrom, a big international airport that had airlines landing there and also charged a landing fee to planes that weren’t based there—and thank God Kit’s plane was considered based there because of his hangar deal with Avia, so he didn’t have to pay landing fees as a private aircraft since the airport got rent from his parking space—didn’t really focus on its small general aviation section as a source of profit, so they weren’t as friendly to small FBOs that might want to set up shop there. There were only two nationally based FBOs that had settled in to serve private and general aviation at Bergstrom...because they were big, national FBOs who had the clout to bargain reasonable deals with the airport over rent, and one large flight school that probably had had to pay through the nose to set up their operations at the airport; but given the kinds of planes the school used, they were certainly successful. The biggest sticking point for Kit was that there was no hangar space, and until he found permanent hangar space, he’d not hire an FBO to maintain his plane. Some big FBOs offered hangar space as part of their services, but there wasn't an empty hangar spot anywhere in Austin. Where he'd eventually get hangar space was the major determining factor of which FBO he chose.

The taxi was sitting out front of the Aero Premier hangar waiting for them. Kit helped Jessie in and then got in himself, and told the cab driver, a scruffy-looking jackal who was very jovial and polite, where they were going. "I will have you there in no time," he said in accented English. "Safely and surely!"

Jessie looked out at the city as they drove down through it, at its mixture of new and old architecture, then they entered the glass and steel canyons between the thirty story skyscrapers in the central business district. "I will wait for you here," the taxi driver told them when he pulled up into the Hyatt's traffic circle by the front door.

"I'd appreciate it," Kit said. "We'll be going to Antoine's after we check in. I know you know where that is."

"And I know to drop you off at Decatur and Saint Louis," he said with a smile and nod.

"Then you're just the cab driver I need," Kit grinned.

It took then all of ten minutes to check in and drop off their suitcase and attaché, then they were again in the cab on their way to the French Quarter. Antoine's was in a rather awkward place on the back side of the Quarter, on Royal Street near Esplanade, and so it was always best to go in through the back way, via Esplanade, and walk to the restaurant from there. Some cabbies tried to drive down Royal, which was a very slow process at night in the Quarter, because of all the foot traffic heading for Bourbon street. Kit gave the cabby a healthy tip when he dropped them off, which made him smile brightly. “Thank you, my generous friend!” he said.

“It’s best to repay a kindness with a kindness,” Kit said sagely. “What’s your name?”

“Avrad, good sir. I hope to carry you again. Good evening to you.”

“Good fur there,” Kit said as they watched his cab drive off, and Kit took special note of his cab company.

“He seemed nice,” Jessie said.

“He knows his way around this city,” Kit told her. “That’s an important trait in a cab driver in New Orleans, because the streets here are really weird. If we ever come back, I’ll call his company and ask specifically for him.”

“Does he know his way around? Where’s the restaurant?”

“He knows his way around because he didn’t drop us off in front of the restaurant,” he told her. “Come on, I’ll show you why.”

It was so, so satisfying to enter Antoine’s. The hare maitre’d that got him fired was standing at the podium near the door. The hare certainly remembered him, but his gray-furred face was confused by Kit’s suit and Jessie’s elegant dress. “What are you doing here?” he finally asked.

“Vulpan, party of two, eight thirty,” Kit said, giving him a malicious smile.

The hare’s eyes darted to his appointment chart, then widened when he saw the appointment there. The look of shock, chagrin, and fear blooming on his face just made Kit feel all warm and fuzzy inside. “Uh, F—Follow me,” he said, motioning with a gloved paw.

They were seated in the main dining room, with its elegant carpet and crystal chandeliers, at a table clothed with a sheer coverlet. The walls were covered with memorabilia of famous past guests, along with tasteful paintings and one small tapestry with the fleur de-lis. When they were brought menus, Jessie’s eyes widened, both at the prices and at the seafood. “Kit, can we afford this?” she asked in a whisper.

“I told you we can, and this is one of the best places in the city for Creole seafood, so drool away, love,” he smiled.

It was a heavenly meal. Kit had crawfish bisque for his first course, oysters Rockefeller for his appetizer, no salad, and lamb chops with mint sauce for his main course. Jessie went with the shrimp remoulade for her appetizer, she tried escargot at Kit’s dare for her second course, which she didn’t think were that bad at all, and grilled trout with crawfish tails and shrimp for her main course. Both of them opted for the steamed broccoli to go with their entrees, and for dessert, Kit had peach melba while Jessie opted to try the chocolate mousse. As usual, Jessie finished her meal much faster than Kit, and was forced to sit and wait for him. She was much better at that now, though; months of eating dinner with him had slowed her down a little.

“Now, wasn’t that worth the flight?” Kit asked with a bright smile.

“I thought this was about getting revenge on that fur that got you fired,” she giggled.

“Oh, I already got that. I’ll remember that look on his face for years.”

Jessie laughed.

Their hotel room was by no means as luxurious as their $150 meal, but it was nice in its own right. For one, the bed actually felt nice to his back, and for another, their tenth floor room had a nice view of the river. Jessie avoided laying down to combat her morning sickness, following Doctor Mac's tips, so they decided to go down and check out the casino.

"Remember, don't bring any money into the casino you can't afford to lose," Kit winked at her.

"Then give me twenty dollars," Jessie told him, looking around in curiosity.

It turned out that twenty bucks went a long way, because, to his shock, Jessie was good at blackjack. They were there for over three hours, and though they left without the $20, it gave them three hours of fun. Kit watched Jessie play blackjack for nearly an hour before going off to play nickel slots, his own little mindless diversion of fun. At one point, Jessie had been up to $75 while Kit was playing slots. When they were finally done, Jessie was angry with herself for not quitting when she was ahead. "Seventy-five dollars, my handsome fox. Seventy-five! Why didn't I quit!"

"We were there to have fun, pretty kitty," he told her mildly, as he flagged a cab outside of the casino. "Did you have fun playing blackjack?"

"Well, yeah, but—"

"Did you lose a fortune?"

"No! I only played the twenty."

"Then wasn't the three hours of fun worth the twenty dollars it cost you?"

She gave him a curious look, then she laughed. “I guess it was,” she agreed. “But it would have been more fun if I won.”

“So says every gambler on the face of the earth,” he winked.

That Sunday, they traded dinner attire for tourist attire. It was as warm in New Orleans as it had been in Austin, so they left the hotel with their suitcases that morning wearing summer clothes, Jessie in a pair of khaki shorts and a tank top, and Kit in a pair of jeans and a faded Longhorns tee shirt, with the Texas flag on the back. He had a cab take them back to the airport so they could pack their luggage in the plane, then it took them back to the French Quarter so they could sightsee. They explored the quarter thoroughly, from one corner to the other, browsing tee shirt shops with naughty tee shirts, to the strip clubs on Bourbon street that Jessie made sure Kit got nowhere near, to the antique shops along Royal street. Kit took her into Saint Louis Cathedral just as mass was letting out, sneaking in, and they walked up to the French market. They ate lunch at Café du Monde there by the market, watched street performers across the street from Jackson Square, then went to the Riverwalk. Kit bought them tickets on a noon cruise on a riverboat, and then they spent four hours standing at the rail of the boat as it cruised the river, taking lots of pictures and video.

But, no matter how fun the day was, it had to end. Almost regretfully, they hailed a cab at the Riverwalk mall’s entrance around 6:30, and went back to the airport. “That was so much fun!” Jessie said exuberantly as the cab pulled up to the hangar at the airport, and Kit paid the cabby. “I can’t wait to show the gang the pictures!”

“Yeah, I had a ball,” Kit agreed as they got out of the cab.

Jessie was totally used to the plane by now. She got in confidently and strapped in as Kit did the preflight walk-around, then she pulled out the video camera from their carryon stowed in the back seat as he climbed in himself. “For the gang,” she grinned, pointing it at Kit. “And here we are in the hangar, getting ready to start the engines and go home,” she announced as the camera recorded. “Say hi, my handsome fox!”

“Hey guys,” Kit waved to the camera, then he reached overhead and began the startup sequence. “If they find this in the smoking wreckage, we love you.”

“Kit!” Jessie gasped, then she laughed. “Now do you see what I put up with, guys?”

“I have never tried to scare you on purpose. I did that to your father,” he added absently, which made Jessie nearly drop the camera as she laughed.

Jessie narrated the startup checklist, knowing it so well, then she talked loudly over the engine as she panned out to show them taxiing out of the hangar. “Which way are we taking off, love?” she asked him as they came out onto the tarmac.

“Not sure, lemme ask,” he said, then asked traffic control for instructions to take off. When they answered he relayed it to Jessie. “We’re taking off going south, over the city,” he told her.

She panned the camera all around the plane, then focused it on the Garmin screens, then she pointed it out her side window at a forward angle when Kit taxied out to the end of the runway. “Okay, heeeeere we go!” she called as Kit throttled up to take off. Kit made sure to dip his starboard wing slightly so Jessie got a good view of the city as they took off over it. “Oooh, there's the Superdome!" Jessie said, pointing her camera a bit more towards the wing. "And those big bridges they talked about when they showed the Hurricane Katrina coverage! And now we're moving out over the swamps southwest of the city as we slowly turn more west to fly home," she continued, pointing the camera out over the wing. "How long til we're home, love?"

"About two hours," he answered, adjusting to course he'd programmed for their return flight before they left Austin, following the most efficient pilot's arc south from New Orleans to Austin. "We could make it in about seventy-five minutes if I felt like burning all our fuel to get there, though."

"We'll be landing at night?"

He nodded. "That should be interesting to tape for the gang too," he said with a smile.

"Oh, they're going to see almost all this flight," she smiled at him, turning the camera back on him.

"It's going to be awfully boring for them," he chuckled.

"We can edit out the boring parts," she winked.

"Like when I'm yelling at my laptop, accusing Chess Masters of cheating?"

She laughed.

Jessie did tape a good part of the flight, getting them a beautiful shot of the sunset at 12,500 feet as they neared Port Arthur. She got great shots of the city of Houston's lights as they flew over it, and then put the camera away until they got ready to land. She taped the whole landing, panning between the MFD window showing their map location and the lights outside, as Kit put the air traffic on speaker so the camera's microphone could pick it up. "Aaaaaand...touchdown!" Jessie called when they landed, and Kit throttled back. "There you go guys, our flight from New Orleans to Austin in our Cessna four hundred! I hope you enjoyed it!"

"I know I did," Kit smiled, reaching over and taking her paw. "Enjoy our date, pretty kitty?"

She leaned over and kissed him on the muzzle tenderly. "Thank you," she told him.

"Enjoy it while you can. When the baby comes, we'll be chained to Austin. Not that that's a bad thing," he added with a dreamy little smile.

"Do they sell baby seats for planes?" she asked absently.

Kit found himself back up to his ears in work on Monday, but that wasn't the only issues of the day.

Rick's surgery took place at 8:00am, and went off without a hitch. They went in and fixed a slight herniated segment of muscle, which must have torn free after the first surgery, and Rick was being told he'd be casted and on his way home bright and early on Thursday morning, which was a very, very good thing. The doctors had cleared him to return to work, and they had an elevator here in the building, so Rick would have little trouble wheeling in to do desk duty. Kit would still be doing all the legwork for Rick's job, but Rick being back in the office would take a lot of work off Kit's shoulders.

The blistering op-ed they ran also caught just a little attention. Just a little, like, say...from CNN.

He fielded the call at eight o'clock Monday morning, just as Rick was going into surgery, as he was researching the nine Democratic candidates for President in preparation for the upcoming debate, which was now next week. Denise wasn't in the office yet, so the switchboard call came straight to Kit's phone; usually it went straight to Rick's, but Denise had reprogrammed it while Rick was recovering from his injury. "Lone Star Magazine, Kit Vulpan speaking," he said absently, copying a bunch of text off a campaign website into a Word file.

"Mister Vulpan? This is Dan Larkin, associate producer from CNN."

"CNN?"

"Cable News Network," he said. "We'd like to interview you over an op-ed you wrote, which has become something of a viral piece roaming around the web."

"Huh, really? I hope I get royalties for it," he noted, which made the producer laugh.

"So, are you interested in four minutes of on-air interview around four twenty?"

"No."

"I—what?"

"No thank you. I may be a journalist, Mister Larkin, but I also don't appear in public. I do my public speaking from behind a keyboard. It's an agreement I have with my family."

“I—well, I guess I could understand that. Are you sure you won’t change your mind?”

“Not any time this century, no. Thank you for the offer, I do appreciate it, but no thanks.”

“Well, I’d like to leave you my number, in case you change your mind,” he said in an obviously disappointed voice.

“That won’t happen,” Kit said with gentle adamance.

“Alright then. Thank you for your time.”

“Thank you. Goodbye.”

Then he hung up.

He didn’t pay it much more mind until Mike got there. He came straight to Kit’s office and pointed a finger at him. “You crashed my server!” he accused, though he was grinning.

“Excuse me?”

“The server crashed yesterday!” he said, then he laughed. “Too many hits on the website!”

“Would this have something to do with the op-ed?”

“Hell yeah,” he grinned. “I put it up on the site, and the server crashed from overload.”

“I was just called by CNN asking for an interview.”

“Holy—wow! Did you take it?”

“Nope,” he answered. “I don’t appear in public, Mike. I’ve lost my taste for it.”

Mike’s eyes flickered to his half-missing ear, then could only nod in understanding. “But yet you work for a magazine,” he grinned.

“That’s all done behind a computer,” Kit said with a little smile.

“Point.”

Kit tried to get his work done, but the op-ed made that hard. There wasn’t an issue of the magazine to be found anywhere, for those that had one weren’t leaving them laying around as they usually tended to do on campus, and the server was still logging huge traffic, way, way more than normal. Mike showed him a graph of the server’s load after he got it off the server. Somehow, word of the op-ed had gotten out, and it was attracting attention from the internet. From what Mike was saying, the issues were all snapped up because of the internet. The traffic started early on Sunday morning, according to the graph, while Kit and Jessie were in New Orleans, and then it grew steadily through the morning. The server crashed at 2:28pm yesterday, which caused the backup server to kick in and also text an emergency code to Mike, who had to come in to get everything all straightened out. “I have the server and both backups trying to keep up with the demand,” Mike said with a happy grin. “You need to write a comment about it I can put up, like saying you don’t do TV interviews.”

“I can do that,” Kit chuckled.

Rick was absolutely thrilled about it, calling at five minutes to nine to report in with the good news about his surgery. When he called, Kit didn’t have to tell him about anything, because he already knew about the server crash. Rick told him the good news about his leg first, then went straight on to the op-ed. “Son, this will drive interest in the magazine through the roof!” he said excitedly. “This is three weeks in a row we’ve totally sold out our sale units and the magazine has vanished off the campus. I want you to call the publisher and tell him we’re increasing circulation by twenty percent on the next issue as a test to see if it holds up, and send a blanket warning to all our advertisers that they’ll see a rate increase if our increased circulation holds. I don’t think they’ll mind too much,” Rick chuckled. “Oh, and accept every reprint request that comes in about the op-ed. And bargain for five percent over the going reprint royalty.”

“Alright, I can do that,” he answered. “CNN called for an interview.”

“Did you take it?”

“I don’t appear in public, Rick, you know that.”

“Damn. Well, I can respect that, son,” he said. “But I will,” he chuckled.

“You are on the by-line,” Kit noted. “Call CNN and tell them you’ll do the interview.”

“Did the CNN guy leave his number?”

“No, but I can get you the number for CNN’s Houston bureau in about ten seconds,” he said, already bringing it up. “Just tell them you’re trying to get the number for Dan Larkin about an interview he offered to us.”

“I’ll have to do it over the phone,” Rick mused.

“We’ll send them a nice picture of you they can put up on the screen,” Kit chuckled. “You seem awfully giddy about this.”

“God, son, you have no idea how hard it was to resist calling you when the server crashed,” he laughed. “But I didn’t want to intrude on your time with Jessie.”

“Aww, thanks, boss,” Kit said sincerely. “That was very thoughtful. I really appreciate that.”

“You get to work on that, let me call everyone and tell them I’ll be home Thursday morning.”

And that basically wrecked his day. Kit was doing two jobs, but since one of his jobs entailed dealing with magazine business, he found himself spending half the day wearing a phone earset lent to him by Denise so he could free up his paws while he fielded calls for half the day. They were offered 19 reprints, and Kit bargained for five percent over standard royalty for each one. A couple of editors grumbled a bit at that, but they also accepted it.

Lone Star made some money that day.

Jessie was on her spring break now, so she came in around noon, bringing Kit some beef stroganoff and broccoli with cheese sauce for lunch. She hung around to do some writing for her strip, then decided to just sit quietly in his office knitting, just being near him, which Kit did not mind at all. “I’m going to go have my first golf lesson with Sheila tomorrow afternoon,” she said. “We’re going to a driving range.”

“That’s no surprise,” Kit told her. “It’s a lot harder than most furs think to hit a golf ball. It takes some practice.”

“How long will you be at the courthouse on Wednesday?”

“Dunno, love,” he answered. “The hearing is at ten, and I doubt it’ll go much past six, so any time in between. It’ll depend on how many times the DA likes to hear me say no.”

Jessie giggled. “I’ll make sure to keep the checkbook handy if I have to bail you out of jail,” she winked.

“I may need it,” he said with a sober nod.

Rick did the interview with CNN instead of Kit, by phone from his office, and the whole office watched it on TV. It ran at 3:21pm Central time, where Rick told the CNN anchor, Don Lemon, about how the Clinton campaign staffer, who was unknown to them, had been almost vicious in his rejection of an interview request, and how that act had caused the magazine to release an op-ed about all the campaigns and how they were treating the “little furs,” how the campaigns were showing how they were so unlike the images they were trying to project. Rick told them about his own experiences with arrogant campaign officials who not only brushed off his interview requests, but did so with snide and snarky comments...though none matched the sheer hate spewed on Kit by the Clinton staffer. “How can a campaign say he or she is a champion of the common fur when the common fur gets treated like a criminal when trying to communicate with the campaigns? How can John Q. Taxpayer compete with Corporate Bigwig when trying to communicate his concerns to the candidates, when anyone without a name or a campaign contribution check is shown the door?”

“But you’re not a common citizen, Mister Sanders, you’re a journalist,” Don Lemon pointed out respectfully.

“Listen, we know we’re a small magazine, barely more than a campus mag for the University of Texas, but we’re also professionals. And when you don't treat a journalist with professional courtesy, you can expect that journalist to use a journalist's outlets to voice his or her indignation."

That made Don Lemon chuckle. "Indeed they can," he agreed. "The Clinton campaign released a statement saying that the co-author of the op-ed who tried to arrange the interview, Kitstrom Vulpan the third, tried to use his family influence to get an interview, and was rebuffed by the campaign because of it. Any truth to this statement?"

"Sir, if you knew anything about the Vulpan family, you'd laugh at that statement," Rick said seriously. "He has no family influence, and the staffer knew it. That was why the staffer was so nasty to Kit, calling him 'the earless outcast Vulpan.' If the staffer is saying Kit was trying to use his name to get an interview, then why did he bring that up? The staffer got very personal, and we couldn't let such an uncalled-for action go unchallenged, so we wrote the op-ed."

"But wouldn't an explanation be that the staffer made note of it because Mister Vulpan was doing just that?"

"You don't know the Vulpan family, Mister Lemon. If he ever spoke for his family, his family would definitely have something to say about it, and that's something Kit would never do. He just made peace with his family and reconciled to them in order for him to be able to communicate with his sister and his cousin, both of whom he dearly loves, but that peace doesn't include him speaking for the family. I doubt he'd do anything to jeopardize that peace, because it would strip him of his contact with his sister and cousin. He'd never do such a thing, because his family would be rightfully angry if he tried to use his name in a way that they didn't approve. After all, the name doesn't belong to only him."

“So you challenge the press release by the Clinton campaign?”

“I certainly do. And I stand behind every word in our op-ed.”

“Well, we’ll have to leave it there. Thank you, Rick.”

“Thank you, sir.”

“That was Rick Sanders, head editor of Lone Star magazine,” Don Lemon said, which made the office explode into applause.

Kit just blew out his breath. Rick had saved himself, and Kit, a lot of grief, for he followed the cardinal rule: never speak ill of the family. Rick had danced on the razor’s edge communicating the outrage the family would feel if Kit was exploiting his name openly—openly being the key word there—while also defending their right to feel angry if he did, for that was a violation of the unspoken rules of conduct of family members...even disowned ones. Kit was impressed anew with both how intelligent Rick was, and how subtle he could be.

“Did you hear that, cousin? You love me,” Sheila said, throwing herself into his arms. “Let’s elope!”

“And the banjo starts playing,” Mike said ominously, which made Kit laugh.

“He’s already married, Sheila,” Jessie said primly. “You had your chance when you were kids. He’s mine now.”

Sheila laughed raucously.

His phone rang, and it was Vil. “I didn’t do it,” he said immediately upon answering it, pushing Sheila out of his arms.

She laughed. “I’m calling just to say you’re fine,” she told him. “I don’t disapprove of what Rick said. He defended the family honor while also defending yours. He did well.”

“You were watching it?”

“Of course I was. CNN tried to get me to comment, so I fished and found out Rick was going to be interviewed today,” she answered. “I read the op-ed, too,” she laughed. “I can certainly tell which parts you wrote and which parts Rick did.”

“Yeah, it was a collaborative effort,” Kit chuckled as he went back into his office, while the crew high-fived each other. “He took my disjointed rant and put some structure in it.”

“I do have to protest one thing, though. As one of those rich special interest groups, I protest you trying to restrict my access to buying politicians,” she teased, which made Kit laugh helplessly.

Kit had to work late to get all his work done, since he spent most of the day doing Rick’s work, but Jessie stayed with him, so that made it much easier. She went out and got them Chinese for dinner, then helped him again with some of the easier research, digging up the easier facts for him and arranging it. She’d seen his research work often enough to be able to duplicate his basic format, which made it much easier for him when he incorporated her work into his own. “I should have Rick pay you for this,” Kit said as he merged her work with his.

She giggled. “I think Rick has more important things on his mind. Are we gonna go see him?”

He nodded. "I have to give him the daily briefing. I hope the docs stay with letting him go home on Thursday. He'll be in a wheelchair, but at least he'll be home."

"I wonder how long he'll last til he comes to work," Jessie mused.

"I give him one day," Kit said honestly. "I'll bet ten bucks he'll be in his office Monday morning."

"He probably will," Jessie agreed with a nod. "Not sure how he's gonna manage the bathroom in that wheelchair, though."

"He'll find a way," Kit chuckled.

Courtrooms sucked.

Kit arrived on Wednesday after having been dropped off by Jessie, who had liked trying her paw at driving golf balls that she was going to go back to the driving range this morning and practice some more. She'd wanted to go with him, but he didn't want her to worry. Besides, he was coming armed for bear.

Kevin and Delores met him in the lobby, just on the other side of the metal detector, which had a fit when Kit went through it and forced them to use a wand to determine that he did indeed have metal in his body. The skunk looked quite dapper in his dark gray suit and red tie, and the tabby cat wore a very modest gray business skirt and blazer. He shook their paw when he got to them. "Thanks for coming," Kit said.

"I am your lawyer," Kevin grinned. "We're ready to argue the case, so don't you worry a bit."

“I made sure he’s ready for this,” Delores assured him. “This will be very good practice for him.”

“We have the subpoena all but quashed, the only real thing they can do is try to search again using search warrants.”

“Well, it won’t help them all that much if they do, because I destroyed my notes,” Kit said carefully. “I don’t have them anymore.” And that was technically true, for he no longer had the notes. Vil did.

“Well, they can still try,” Kevin told him. “But we’ll be ready for them if they do.”

At ten, Kit, Delores, and Kevin entered the courtroom on the subpoena. The DA was already there, a raccoon wearing a dark suit, a gray-furred rabbit judge, a burly bear bailiff, and there were eighteen furs in a jury box to the side of the judge’s bench and witness stand. Luckily, at least to Kit, there was no one else in the room. As soon as Kit and his lawyers sat down in the audience seats, the judge banged his gavel, and the burly bear bailiff called the court to order.

“Alright, proceed, counsel,” the judge told the raccoon.

“The state calls Kitstrom Vulpan to the stand,” the raccoon said.

“Are you still moving to quash the subpoena, Mister Vulpan?” the judge asked.

“Your honor, I’m counsel for Mister Vulpan,” Kevin said in a strong voice after he stood up. “I’m here to represent Mister Vulpan on the matter.”

The raccoon looked a little irked, but said nothing. The judge, on the other hand, looked slightly amused. “Bailiff, see the jury back to the deliberation room,” the judge said, “while I hear the arguments.”

Once the jury was removed, Kevin and Kit were allowed to move into the well, sitting at the opposite table, while Delores remained behind them, silently observing but allowing Kevin space to do his work. Kevin stood up and began. “Your honor, as you know, Texas law based on reporter’s privilege is weak and unclear, relying mainly on the First Amendment, various appeal cases, and Branzburg versus Hayes. Reporter first amendment rights have always been weak in grand jury cases, but in each case the district attorney was asking specific questions about specific cases with a specific objective, and with supporting evidence. None of those conditions appear in this case. The district attorney is, to coin a term, fishing. He has no idea if there even was a crime involved in this case, and if there was, he can’t even claim that it occurred within his jurisdiction.”

“That’s why Mister Vulpan was subpoenaed, to find out,” the DA cut in.

“But, since there’s no definitive case here, no specific questions, not even a certainty of jurisdiction, the subpoena fails the balancing test put forth to subpoenas against reporters in most criminal cases,” Kevin said.

“This isn’t a criminal case, it’s a grand jury,” the DA said, a bit testily.

“But where is the case, your honor?” Kevin asked. “All we have here is a series of vague questions and uncertainties. Can the district attorney even prove a crime was committed and present enough evidence to bring charges? Charges against whom? All we have here is a paper-thin set of accusations brought against no one, in a place that may or may not be in the district attorney's jurisdiction, where the only possible lead they have to go on is an article that appeared in a campus magazine, that may not even be truthful, as the article's disclaimer clearly states. All this subpoena is trying to do is intimidate the author of the article into violating his relationship with his source, it serves no other reason, because the district attorney has nothing else. That, your honor, is a bad faith subpoena. And because of that, the subpoena should be quashed as by the precedent set by Branzburg, which the state of Texas follows."

The judge was silent a moment. "Counsel?"

"The subpoena clearly states our position, your honor," the raccoon said. "The purpose of the subpoena, and this grand jury, is to determine the very questions counsel brought up. Was there a breaking of the law? If so, where? The subpoena is clear in that it isn't demanding every single scrap of information from Mister Vulpan. We only want two questions answered, your honor. Where is the brothel in which the subject of the article worked, and when did the source work there? If those questions are answered, Mister Vulpan is free to go about his business. He doesn't have to name his source. We don't want details, we just want to know if this is a matter that falls within our jurisdiction, and if it falls within our jurisdiction, we'll pursue the matter from there without Mister Vulpan's help, since that's a battle over privilege I know I'll lose."

"Sir, to do that would cause me to break my word to my source," Kit said, standing up quickly. "I gave my source my solemn word I would protect their anonymity, and revealing anything about what I was told would violate that promise. Because of that, I can't answer any questions at all about the article."

“You’re speaking out of order, Mister Vulpan,” the judge told him. “Please sit down and remain quiet for the remainder of the hearing.”

Kit listened to Kevin and the other fur argue back and forth, rephrasing their core arguments as both sides quoted other cases to the judge, for nearly half an hour. Then the judge seemed satisfied. “Let’s break for an early lunch. I’ll return with my decision. We’re adjourned until twelve o’clock.”

“All rise,” the bailiff called mechanically.

“How do you think we did?” Kit asked as the two of them left the courtroom.

“I think we’re fine,” Kevin answered.

“You did very well, Kevin,” Delores told him with a nod. “Assertive, confident, knowledgeable, respectful, and always in control. You’re going to be an excellent trial attorney.”

“Thanks, Misses Kittimer,” Kevin said with a happy look.

Kit was a little nervous as they ate lunch at the cafeteria. The thought of going to jail was actually looming on his horizon, because he wasn’t about to reveal anything about Allison. If the DA won, he’d have to answer questions that he would not answer, and he’d be found in contempt of court. He wondered if they’d let him bail out, or hold him in jail to force him to testify. Kevin kept trying to distract him from those kinds of thoughts, keeping a cheery, positive attitude, so much so that he was joking with Kit when they went back into the courtroom at noon. Kit was very nervous when they sat back down, after the judge entered and called the court to order. “Despite the general, non-confidential information being sought by the district attorney, precedent falls squarely on the side of Mister Vulpan,” the judge announced. “No matter how general you’re trying to be, counsel, you have no case other than attempting to force a reporter to reveal a confidential source in order to support your case. That is the textbook definition of a bad faith subpoena. As such, I rule that the subpoena is quashed,” he announced. “Since there seems to be no other evidence the district attorney can present at the present time, I’m inclined to end this grand jury proceeding. However,” he warned, looking at Kit, “if the district attorney can re-present this matter to a grand jury with an external source of evidence to support the hearing, then I won’t rule to quash a subpoena again,” he warned. “Because in that situation, the grand jury proceeding will be examining actual evidence, and the district attorney isn’t calling you to testify for the sole purpose of forcing you to violate your relationship with your source. Understand, Mister Vulpan?”

“Yes, sir,” Kit said, a little nervous and also at the same time quite relieved.

“Alright then. Bailiff, dismiss the grand jury if you please. This case is hereby dismissed, with the district attorney’s leave to re-present the case at a later time once he meets the conditions I set forth.”

And with a bang of the gavel, Kit felt very much like the fish that slipped off the hook.

He left the courtroom with Kevin and Delores, who patted him on the shoulder. “I told you you’d get out of it,” he said.

“Yeah, but the judge said I would have to testify if the DA brings it back.”

“Yes, but without your testimony, I seriously doubt that they’ll ever manage it,” Delores told him honestly. “I talked to a friend of mine in the DA’s office. They have absolutely no leads. Nothing at all. All they had was your testimony, and we just stopped them from getting it, so they’re beyond helpless.”

“They don’t even know if the brothel where your source worked is in Austin,” Kevin continued. “I mean, they don’t even know if there was a crime, and if so, where it was. They have nothing, Kit. I wouldn’t worry about it. Trying to bully you into answering their questions was their last resort, their Hail Mary. It failed, so I’d just sweep this one under the rug and forget about it.”

“Well put,” Delores agreed. “Oh, excuse me a minute, boys, I see an old friend from the DA’s office,” she said, then she hurried towards a dark-furred male cat in a black suit near the stairs.

“That’s easy for you to say, Kev,” Kit said with a sour grunt. “I will worry about it, for quite a while.”

“Well, don’t let it make your fur fall out,” Kevin chuckled, playfully punching him in the arm. “You gonna make poker this weekend?”

“I’m going to try,” he answered. “But with Rick out, it’s not a guarantee. I’m still doing both our jobs right now.”

“And with Jessie pregnant, too,” Kevin grunted. “That must be a lot of stress.”

“Vulpans live on stress,” Kit said lightly. “How’s it been going with Sam?”

“Wonderful,” he answered. “I’m going to go meet her folks next month, as soon as I get this criminal trial out of the way. My first,” he said with pride.

“Oh? What happened with the infringement case?”

“Won it,” he grinned. “Got my client nearly four hundred thousand dollars in damages.”

“What kind of criminal trial are you doing?”

“I’m defending someone from petty larceny charges. A mid-level manager at Motorola accused of shoplifting. It’s just a misdemeanor case over a five dollar box of candy, but he pled not guilty, and the firm put me on his case. Sorry if I can’t really go into specifics.”

“No problem. I should do an article about you,” Kit chuckled. “I’ll call it Life After College, showing furs using their degrees, showing you cutting your teeth after graduation from law school. You’d be a perfect first subject.”

“I guess I could let you do that. It’s free advertising for the firm.”

“We’ll have to talk about it, and talk to Rick about it.”

“You know, you fall into that as well,” Kevin grinned.

“Nah, I cut my teeth as a homeless vagabond,” Kit winked.

“Such a waste of a history degree, since you’re solidly in journalism now,” Kevin grinned.

“I should go take classes on journalism,” Kit shrugged. “I really have no idea how to do it. All I really know is what I learned at the magazine and what Rick and Barry taught me.”

Kevin laughed. "I think you're doing just fine as it is," he said. "And not just you. Rick has something special going on over there. Lone Star is like no other magazine I've ever read. It's news for young furs, things that matter to us. It's the only magazine I know of that has news on the election on one page, then a review of the latest video game release on the next. It has The Scene, School Daze, Ask Away and all those other features that makes the mag much more fun to read. It's way more than a campus mag now."

"Yeah, Rick's got vision," Kit agreed. "And a damn fine group of furs working for him. Hmm," he mused.

"What?"

"I should ask Rick what he'd think if we had Mike actually start writing," he said. "Mike's our resident tech-head, maybe we should have him do articles about tech reviews, advice, so on and so on. It's the only thing we really don't do ourselves, Rick always buys articles from other sources for stuff like that. Why should we when we have a perfectly good computer god right in the office? After we hire a photographer, a lot of his workload is going to dry up, since he and Lilly are our primary photographers right now. We'll have to keep him busy."

"Computer god?" Kevin asked with a laugh.

"Just about. Mike knows everything about computers and gadgets. He knows how to network, he knows programming, he knows hardware and software, I've never seen anything he couldn't do when we asked him. I think he can even program a VCR."

"That is truly the ultimate test of any tech guru," Kevin said with a solemn voice, then both of them exploded into laughter.

Delores returned. “My friend tells me that with the subpoena quashed, they’ll let this fade away, at least if the assistants have their way. He said that off the record, of course,” she said with a light smile. “He said the DA himself was the one that pushed it, over the advice of the assistants, because there’s so little there. But then again, the DA has always been a moralistic crusader. He’s gone after things like this before,” she said absently. “I’d say Kevin was right, Kit. You can put this behind you. With the search coming up empty and the subpoena quashed, he can’t do anything but harass you, and he’d be doing it after he’s already been beaten in court. If he does, we’ll be coming after him for prosecutorial misconduct, and the DA’s office knows it. I made that clear when I talked to my friend, and I still carry enough clout in the office that they won’t dismiss that as an idle threat. So this case is over.”

“Thank God,” he said with an explosive sigh. “Let me make the reassuring calls that I’m not going to jail now,” Kit said, taking out his Blackberry as they all left the courthouse. He called Jessie first and told her to come get him, that she wouldn’t have to bail him out, which made her giggle, then called Rick and told him he’d squirmed out of it...if only just. He then called Vil to assure her all was well because she was poised to crush the DA if Kevin and Delores failed to quash the subpoena, then, after Kevin and Delores said their goodbyes and they parted, he called Allison. She too wanted to know what was going on. “Ally,” he said. “It’s over. I’m not going to jail, and my lawyer told me the DA’s office is going to let the matter drop.”

“Thank God,” she said explosively. “You are a true male of honor, willing to go to jail rather than break a promise,” she said carefully. Even now, they never directly talked of it except when they were in his house.

They both knew that cell phones were not secure; anyone with a scanner could hear every word they said.

“When I make a promise, I make a promise,” he told her calmly. “Jessie wants to know if you and Sheila would like to come over for dinner tonight. She’s making lasagna and german chocolate cake.”

“I’d love to,” she answered. “She’s still trying to make me fat,” she added with a laugh.

“She thinks if she fattens you up, you won’t be so attractive when she gets fat,” Kit said sagely. “She loves you as a friend, Ally, but she is a little jealous of you, even now. She has this weird idea that because we’re both foxes, I might find you to be more attractive than her, which is utterly ridiculous. It’s part of her sinister plot to keep my eyes from wandering when she’s waddling around.”

Allison laughed. “Well, at least now I know what to expect,” she said.

“She just can’t get it into her head that I’m totally hers,” Kit chuckled.

“Such a pity,” Allison teased. “You are so whipped.”

“I enjoy my slavery,” Kit told her, which made her laugh.

Rick, it turned out, was again operating on a similar wavelength to Kit. After he went to visit Rick in the hospital, his last night there, he told him about his idea, to which Rick replied by showing him a file in his laptop called Cyber Corner. It was a detailed description of a weekly article Mike would pen dealing with technology, games, and the internet culture.

“As soon as I hire a photographer, he starts the article,” Rick said.

“Have you looked over the resumes?”

He nodded. “I’ve set up interviews for next week,” he answered. “I’ve already looked over the portfolios of four of them online, the others offered to bring them to the interview.”

“So, you’re coming back?”

“Monday,” he affirmed. “They have elevators there, I can get to work just fine cause Martha’s gonna drop me off and pick me up. The docs have cleared me for desk duty. So, you can throttle back on doing my work after Friday, son. Leave it alone on Saturday, take your Sunday and Monday off.”

“Jessie will like that,” Kit chuckled. “We can spend time at home instead of the office. She’s spent almost all her spring break sitting in my office knitting and doing her homework.”

“Take her to the beach,” Rick told him. “Sunday is supposed to be a fine day, according to the weather. Take her to South Padre and let her have a little spring break fun.”

Kit was about to say something, then he laughed. “That’s a pretty good idea,” he said.

“Anyway, as far as the magazine goes, I’m also gonna introduce two new features,” he said, moving his document to a new page. It was called The Little Corner. “This is going to be Denise’s territory,” he explained. “It’ll be a femme’s-eye view of campus life.”

“She’s going to beat you when she sees that headline.”

“Rick laughed. “I’m actually going to let her name it, this one’s just to get a charge out of her.”

“It’ll do that alright.”

“Marty will handle the other new feature,” he said, scrolling down to a heading named 15 Minutes of Fame. “It’ll be guest articles from students, mainly from the journalism majors, giving them their shot at doing news, editorials, reviews, whatever, published. Marty will pick two articles submitted by students each week and run them, and he’ll pick ones that have a bearing on whatever articles we’re running that week. I think it has potential,” he said. “Not only do we give journalism students a chance to cut their teeth, we can introduce fresh views, angles we never thought of.”

“I think it’ll work, as long as we get enough submissions.”

“When it’s thin, Marty’s going to use this instead,” he said, switching to a heading called Shout Out! “This’ll be a log of a discussion on Twitter Marty and Mike will host on Tuesday nights, where students talk about some subject in real time, and we post logs of it or write articles based on it. I’m not sure how well this will go over, though. This one is purely an experiment.”

“Experimentation is good as long as it doesn’t consume all our resources,” Kit chuckled.

“I think Marty and Mike can sacrifice an hour every Tuesday night,” Rick said. “Jeffrey’s also talking about splitting Missy and Cutler off from School Daze and doing it as an independent strip, running one strip a week. He wants to name it Culture Wars, and put Missy and Cutler in battle gear on the intro panel, about to start fighting.”

Kit laughed. “That about sums up how those two get along,” Kit said. “It’s a love-hate relationship if there ever was one. But Culture Wars is a kinda silly title. He should just call it Missy and Cutler. Furs know those two by now, so the title makes perfect sense. What more needs be said once you get to know them? I mean, it's Missy and Cutler."

Rick laughed. "True. I'll have to talk to him about it. We haven't asked Jessie about it yet. Think she'd go for doing it as a weekly instead of the way she does it now?"

"She'd do it. You'll have to give her a raise, though."

"I'm going to put her on as a full-time staff member," Rick told him. "I was going to ask her if she would like to do a feature herself. Jessie has a gentle kind of personality, I think she'd do well in an advice column or something like that, something that let her sweet nature show through the words on the page. I'll let her think about what kind of feature she'd like to try though, and we'll go from there."

"She'd probably go for it, at least after she got over her bout of nerves," Kit chuckled.

"Talk to her about it when you get home. I thought about asking her about it when she was here earlier, but Martha distracted me with barbecue," he laughed. "Both of them are making sure I leave here twenty pounds heavier than when I came in, and that doesn't count the cast they'll put on me."

"Where is Martha now?"

"Home, getting things ready for the wheelchair," he answered. "She wanted to move some furniture around. She has Sheila and Bill over there helping her."

"Looking forward to it?"

“I’m not looking forward to the wheelchair, but I’m glad I’ll be going home,” he smiled. “I just hope I’m not in it long.”

“Well, here’s hoping you heal fast. Soon as your bones are stable enough, you’ll be on crutches.”

“I still don’t see how that matters,” Rick grunted.

“Just in case you accidentally put weight on your broken leg,” Kit told him. “They wouldn’t even take my cast off until my bones were fully healed, for fear that I’d stress it moving around.”

“Well, that’s your back, son, this is just a leg.”

“If you put the wrong stress on your leg, you’ll wish you stayed in the wheelchair,” Kit told him. “It means you’ll be back in surgery and you start over healing from scratch.”

“Yeah, I know, but I don’t have to like it,” Rick chuckled. “You talk to Jessie tonight, and take that girl to the beach on Sunday!”

“I think we will,” Kit said with a smile.

Sheila and Allison joined them for dinner that night, a dinner of lasagna, artichoke hearts, salad, and german chocolate cake. Allison looked at all the food with an amused look, giving Kit a slight smile as Jessie kept trying to double Allison’s portions, but she said nothing. She was too busy eating to say anything.

“God, Jess, I gotta learn to cook as good as you,” Sheila said after taking a bite of the lasagna.

“You’d better if you want to be a chef,” Kit teased lightly.

“How did it go today, cousin?” Sheila asked. “I mean, the stuff you won’t tell anyone else.”

“There wasn’t anything more to it,” he answered honestly. “Kevin went in there and just steamrolled the prosecutor,” he chuckled. “Perry Mason would have been impressed.”

Allison reached over and patted him on the wrist. “Thanks again, Kit,” she said. “You were willing to go to jail for me. I’m so honored.”

“I made you a promise, Ally,” he told her. “And a Vulpan never breaks his promises.”

“Yup,” Sheila agreed. “None of us will, not when it counts. It’s about the family honor.”

“You have no honor, Sheila,” Jessie teased with a cute smile. “You’re a Party Pack girl.”

“I have a little. I’ll sell it to you,” she offered, which made both Jessie and Allison laugh.

“I meant to ask, Ally. Do you talk to—to them?” Jessie asked. “How did they react to the article?”

“The Top Hat? It made them rather nervous at first,” Allison said. “They knew it was them Kit was talking about, and they knew it was me that did the article. They didn’t appreciate the part about covering up the rapes, but they did appreciate how Kit made note that they were very good employers in other respects, how they let us keep the majority of the money we earned. But when Kit refused to speak to the police after they came around, they calmed down a great deal. They relaxed when the search turned up nothing, and I’m sure they’re dancing in their offices now that the subpoena has been beaten, since their business has actually increased since the article. It got some old members who haven't been coming to start coming again. They have extensive contacts inside the police and DA's office, so they knew what was going on. As I recall, two of the assistant DAs are members," she mused with a slight smile. "I can say that the owners have a great deal of respect for Kit for refusing to say a word, and they didn't kick him out, he's still considered a member of the club. And Benny said that the owners actually liked the article, too. He said they said it was very good. Benny said he thought he knew me until he read the article, then realized he'd never really known me at all," she said with a mysterious little smile.

"Benny?" Jessie asked.

"Benny the bartender there at the Top Hat, he's still is a friend of mine, so he keeps me in the loop with what goes on there. Between attempts to lure me back, that is," she chuckled lightly. "But I'm never going back. I got out with my investments and, thank God, no diseases. I'm not tempting fate. I'm done with it."

"The hell you are, we'll go back as customers," Sheila grinned at her. "You forget, me and Kit are members, and we can take guests! You'll get to be the girl doing the pawing, not the girl being pawed!"

"I might do that," she smiled. "A couple of the male strippers are very handsome."

"Boy, are they," Jessie said reflexively, then she blushed and laughed. "But I still love you, my handsome fox, even though you did throw me at those male strippers."

"I'm so glad," he said blandly, which made all three femmes giggle.

“We should go celebrate,” Sheila said. “Kit, Jessie, wanna go do something with the Austin Party Pack this weekend?” Sheila asked with a grin. “Me, Ally, Sandy, Sam, Danny, Jessie, Charlotte, Lisa, we can all have a party at the sorority or go to Dallas or something! It’s the last weekend of spring break!”

“Actually, I’m taking Jessie to the beach on Sunday,” Kit said, looking at her.

“I’m so glad you decided to tell me that!” Jessie laughed.

“I just did. Wanna go to South Padre on Sunday?”

“Of course I do!” Jessie said immediately.

“Ooo, can we tag along?” Sheila asked. “We’ve been there, we know where all the sexy guys hang out!”

“I’m not all that interested in sexy guys, Sheila,” Kit told her with a dry smile. “But that’s up to Jessie. She missed out on spring break, so I gotta make it up to her. This is her trip.”

“I’d love to have you guys along,” Jessie said immediately, reaching over and patting Allison on the forearm. “If you’d like to come.”

“I think I would,” Allison smiled in return. “As long as you don’t get jealous of seeing me in a bikini.”

Jessie’s cheeks frizzed out, and she laughed. “I’ll do my best,” she said with a helpless smile. “It’s not going to be fair when I’m fat and you’re not.”

Allison glanced at Kit, then she laughed earnestly. “And I think you’ve been trying to fatten me up!” she accused.

“I am not!” she protested.

“God, the boys will just die,” Sheila said with a predatory smile. “Me and Jessie and Ally, three of the hottest femmes in Austin all together and in bikinis. They’re gonna howl!”

“I’m not going there so boys can ogle me,” Jessie said primly. “I’m a married femme, and I’m pregnant, for goodness sake!”

“So? You’re not showing yet, you’re still a sexy beast, Jess. Wear dental floss and your wedding ring, let them see what they can never have!” Sheila said with a malicious little smile, which made almost every strand of Jessie’s fur stick straight out.

“I will not!” she gasped. “I have a nice two-piece from our honeymoon I can wear, because I do like to swim.”

“You don’t go to the beach to swim on spring break, you silly girl!” Sheila said with a laugh. “You go to look utterly hot in a bikini and make every boy have wet dreams about you for two weeks afterward!”

“No thanks. I already have a male to do that for me, any time I want,” Jessie smiled.

“She does,” Kit agreed mildly. “I dream about her every night. Of course, she’s right there, but that doesn’t change the fact.”

“I don’t mind when my husband has naughty dreams about me,” Jessie said with a darling smile at him. “But I think I could do without some horny boy having them.”

“Jessie, Kit’s only like a year older than the average college student,” Sheila protested.

“What a difference a year makes,” she returned.

“You’re twenty-three?” Allison asked.

“Not for eleven days,” Kit answered. “Twenty-two.”

“His birthday’s on the thirtieth,” Sheila smiled. “And I already got plans.”

“I’ll be busy.”

“Big plans.”

“So sorry.”

“Huge plans,” Sheila said with a bright-eyed grin.

“I’m not that stuuuuupiiiiid,” he said in a sing-song voice.

“Cousin, your life will never be the same,” she said with steady eyes.

“Hmm. End up in jail for a year because of your plans, or spend my birthday with my wife and a nice quiet little party with our friends. Decisions decisions,” he said quietly.

Allison laughed. “Well, may I come to your party?”

“I’d be happy to have you,” Kit said with a nod. “But you’ll be there with the whole gang.”

“A bunch of criminals and reprobates,” Sheila grinned.

“And how are they different from you and me, Sheila?” Allison asked calmly.

“That’s why you’ll fit in perfectly,” she laughed. “So, what time do we get here on Sunday for the beach?”

“Six or so,” Kit answered. “If we leave out from here at six, we’ll get there around eight or so. If we get there early, we have plenty of time.”

“Six? Damn, cousin, that’s harsh,” Sheila protested.

“Take it or leave it.”

“Sheila, can I stay over at your place Saturday? That way we’re all right here.”

“Fine with me, Ally, long as you don’t mind the couch.”

“Make sure to remind me to bring my day bag,” Allison said, finishing the last of her lasagna.

“Just remember, once we leave the plane, all the space we have is the rental car, and you’ll be carrying most of what you need anyway. So pack light,” Kit warned.

“I didn’t think of that,” Allison mused. “Where can I put a credit card in my bikini?” she asked, giving Sheila a sly little look, which also made Jessie’s eyes harden just a little bit even as her cheeks threatened to ruffle out.

“Punch holes in two and wear them as your bikini top,” Sheila winked at her. “It’ll give the term swiping your card a whole new meaning. Jessie can wear a couple of those new golden dollars, and I’ll wear beer bottle caps!”

“Are we going to play ‘who can show the most white fur’ again?”

“You bet we are! Of course, Jessie wins, all her fur is white. Well, kinda nearly-white. Guess we coulda said it was white up until Kit deflowered her,” she said clinically, looking at Jessie in a manner that made her cheeks ruffle.

“Stop teasing my wife, you two,” Kit told them.

“But it’s so easy,” Sheila protested.

“Sheila, when she finally bites you back, I don’t wanna hear you come crying to me,” Kit warned.

“Duly noted, cousin,” Sheila said, glancing at Jessie with a smile.

“Let’s see if we can get some cash this time, Ally. We’ll dance for dollars!”

“We need G-strings for that.”

“And how is that different from the bikini bottoms we already have?”

“Point,” Allison acceded, which made Kit laugh.

Chapter 25

The entire crew was on hand on the joyful morning when Rick was released from the hospital.

It was nearly an honor guard that wheeled Rick out to Martha's old van, and Rick paused to get hugs and shake paws of those around him. "Now you better get all those party streamers down by tomorrow, since I'll be back on Monday," he teased. "You'll have to go back to doing real work!"

"Why Rick, aren't you coming to the wrap meeting today?" Marty grinned.

"I'm afraid not, I'm on strict orders from someone more important than the doctors," he said, pointing at Martha.

"I want him to settle in before he starts going back to work," she said bluntly.

"So Savid and Kit are still your whipmasters til I'm back," Rick grinned.

"At least they let us play X-Box in the main room on the big TV," Jeffrey intoned.

"You weren't supposed to tell him that!" Lilly protested.

"So, Jessie, did Kit tell you what I had in mind?" Rick asked.

“Mmm-hmm,” Jessie said. “I’ll take the job. I’m not sure what kind of writer I can be, but I’ll be glad to take the strip to a weekly. As long as you give me a raise,” she winked.

“A raise and a promotion to full time. As far as what kind of writing you’ll do, well, we’ll talk about it later. Given the good work you do on the strip, I’m positive we can find something you’ll be very good at. I’ve come to learn that English majors are good at writing.”

“She can do the work, she just can’t do it fast,” Kit teased.

“I get all my homework done on time!” she protested, then she grinned lightly at him.

“Well, now she’ll earn that big office we gave her,” Barry teased. “She does one little strip a week and gets an office, and poor Sheila gets a desk out where Rick and Savid can stare at her butt.”

“I stare at her profile, not her butt. She sit facing side to me, not back,” Savid chuckled.

“Ten bucks, Savid, and you can see all my butt you want,” Sheila teased.

“You get only five for showing Barry!”

“It’s a seller’s market, my dear mongoose,” she winked. “Demand goes up, price goes up.”

A couple of offended looking furs passing by glared at Sheila, which just made the whole gang laugh. “Alright, you bunch of freeloaders, get back to work!” Rick commanded. “We have an issue to put to bed today!”

“We have it all under control, you old dingo,” Lilly smiled.

The day was just starting, but it was already good. Kit and Jessie both went back to the office, and after a little kissing and nuzzling in his office, she went to go talk to Jeffrey about expanding her strip to become a strip of its own while Kit went back to the mundane tasks. He'd cleared his own inbox of everything major, so he was just doing Rick's work today. They were all ready for the debate, Lilly, Marty, and Barry's work for next week had already been researched and readied for them, and Kit was running two pieces out of his journals for Through My Eyes next week to clear a little time for himself; Rick had told him to hold off on doing any writing for next week so he could get his house back in order after Rick came back on Monday. So, in actuality, Kit was looking at a pretty light couple of days work wise. He had only two meetings with potential advertisers on Friday, nothing at all really on the schedule for Saturday outside of accounting work that Rick told him not to do but would do anyway, and Sunday they'd be going to the beach. Today he'd have to close out the week after the wrap meeting, but outside of that, he was on cruise control today.

He did still have work, though, in what was unplanned. Kit fielded two calls for requests for reprints of their work, which Rick had already told him to accept. One of them was for Barry's interview of Senator Hutchison, but another was for Allison's article.

Kit got a little curious, then pulled up the records, then he blanched slightly. In the last month, the magazine had sold reprint leases to 37 different magazines, newspapers, or websites. 37. Dear God, that was a lot. Most of them were local, either in-state magazines or the Austin paper, the American-Statesman, but four pieces had been sold to national organizations. Reprint rights to Kit's article about Allison had been sold to Newsweek, and no doubt because of Rick's contacts with his old job. The Associated Press bought rights to Barry's interview with Senator Hutchison and Kit's interview with Representative Lamar Smith, and the Washington Post had bought reprint rights for the op-ed.

37 reprints. Holy cow. That was a hell of a lot. That was just a sign that Rick's plan to increase circulation was a very sound one, since this was the perfect time to expand. The magazine was on a hot streak, and they had to build a larger reader base. They needed more free units on campus, and they needed—

They needed sale units inside Austin.

This was the perfect time. Rick had never done sale units inside the city because they were free on campus, but Austin was a pretty big city. Sale units around the campus were a waste of time, but if they put sale units around Bergstrom, in north Austin, out near Pflugerville, over in the hill country to the west, out in the ranchlands to the east, now those would sell.

Kit was a researcher, and this was a good topic to research with his spare time.

He spent all morning on his project. He called around to inquire about interest among vendors. He studied population distribution of students who lived off campus, to avoid putting sale units near concentrations of student housing, as well as age distribution to target the magazine at the 18-34 crowd on which the magazine focused. He projected printing costs against possible profits to run a risk analysis, then called all of their active advertisers to gauge their reaction to an increase in circulation of sale units within the city, which would increase their fees...but also increase exposure of their advertising.

Every single one was enthusiastically for the idea, despite the increase in their own costs, since they advertised with Austin in mind.

By the wrap meeting, he had his entire idea thoroughly researched and analyzed, and he found that a large increase in circulation, while risky, was also the best approach and had the greatest chance of increasing their profits. They needed to get the magazine out while furs were interested, and that meant putting it in every bookstore, library, convenience store, even every bar they could find. Kit worked through the math and decided that a 150% increase in sale units distributed in a ring around campus, concentrated to the north, south, and west where there was a larger segment of younger furs than there was to the east, along the edges of the city, was the safest and most effective means to go about it...at least to him. Kit was no business major, but it was just common sense to avoid selling the magazine in areas where furs could either get it free or where those furs lived, since they could just give away their free copy after they were done with it.

Kit called their printer and inquired about whether they could handle such a huge increase in ordered units. "It'd push us, but I think we could do it," Dan said. "We'd have to print them in waves and ship them out, we couldn't have the entire order ready to go by seven a.m. like we usually do. Uh, are we talking over and above the current increase, or based on the old numbers?"

"I did the math based on the old numbers," Kit answered. "So, you can do it?"

"If you can find stands to put them on, we can print 'em," he said confidently.

After the wrap meeting, Kit called Rick. “I’m sending a file to your Blackberry,” he said. “Download it to your laptop when you get it and take a look at it.”

“What is it?”

“A business proposal,” he said. “It’s still tentative, but take a look at it and tell me what you think.”

“Sure, I can do that, son. It’ll give me something to do while Martha coddles me,” he chuckled. “Send it off.”

“It’s on its way.”

“How was the wrap meeting?”

“Everything went just fine. We didn’t change it from what you saw yesterday. Jessie’s been closeted up with Jeffrey all day, talking about taking the strip to a weekly. She’s kinda hogging him, we still have some work to do on School Daze.”

Rick laughed. “I’m still not sure what kind of feature she’ll do.”

“How did Denise take your offer?”

“She said yes so fast I think she sprained her tongue,” Rick answered. “And if we’re lucky, we’ll have a staff photographer by next Friday.”

“That’ll be useful,” Kit agreed. “Mike?”

“He’s probably in his office right now planning his first article,” Rick chuckled. “Holy—how long did you work on this, son?” Rick asked in surprise.

“Almost all morning. It’s just a rough draft,” he said quickly. “I called around, did some math, and looked into a few things.”

“Dear God, son, I knew you were a good researcher, but damn,” Rick said quietly. “I’ll crunch your numbers and see if mine match yours. If they do, this might be worth a shot. It’ll cost some serious cash for the expansion, though, and we’ll have to do some major legwork to get the magazine on racks out there.”

“I’ll have another seven thousand available by Tuesday,” Kit said. “That should keep us out of the red ink until things stabilize and we find out if it’s profitable. If not, we can scale back and eat the loss.”

“If we can sustain circulation, it won’t be a loss for long,” Rick said. “If we can push even half this circulation on the sale units, we’ll earn the investment back inside three weeks.”

“It’s a gamble,” Kit said honestly. “But this is the perfect time to try, Rick. Almost past time. If we don’t try something bold while interest is peaked, while so many other mags and papers are buying our work to reprint, we’ll miss our opportunity.”

“We’ll see how the twenty percent increase goes this week,” Rick said. “If that does well, then we’ll take a long hard look at your idea. You’ve seen the books, son. If we overreach, the magazine is out of business.”

“I know. That’s why I said it was a gamble,” he said calmly.

“It might be a gamble worth taking. We’ll see,” he said.

Kit felt relaxed by the time it was beach time.

It was a good morning to fly, clear and warm for March, though there were a few sleepy girls in the plane with him. At seven they were in the air and on the way to Brownsville, and to be fair about things, Allison rode up front, since she'd been in the back both times last time they flew. She was her usual quiet self, though she was still not entirely awake. Jessie was in the back with her laptop, working on her strip, while Sheila slept in the seat behind Allison.

Sheila had rented a car for them, so they brought actual stuff with them. They had a cooler for drinks and light snacks they'd buy in Brownsville, and everyone brought one change of clothes, just in case they wanted to go somewhere that frowned upon bathing suits. Everyone was literally in their suits already with shorts and tees worn over them, Jessie's floppy straw hat in the open cargo area behind the back seat, though Sheila was wearing nothing but a little shoulder wrap that showed off her rather skimpy black bikini top.

Sheila was highly displeased with Jessie's choice of bathing suits. She was wearing the same sensible two piece she'd worn during their scuba excursion in the keys. It was a sleek little suit, showing off her sexy torso, but the sports-bra style halter top and sensible bottom did not sit well with Sheila at all. She wanted Jessie in a G-string and pasties, or just about the same thing, and rallied for nearly ten minutes to have Jessie buy a "better bikini" while they were at the beach...something Sheila would pick out for her that would no doubt mortify Jessie for a month after even thinking of putting it on.

Everyone was awake and alert by the time they landed, though. Kit paid to park the plane at a tie down spot and they climbed out, locking Jessie's laptop up in the cargo hold as Sheila went to go get the rental car.

Kit had the plane tied down by the time Sheila got back to them, parking at a lot across from the plane—cars weren't allowed on the tarmac in the visiting tie downs at the airport—and they carried their cooler and wicker bag full of their stuff. Inside it were their sunglasses, changes of clothes, a little cash, and Sheila's wallet. Sheila agreed to pay for everything but parking the plane, since Kit flew them down. Paying for the rental car, parking, and everything else was Sheila's responsibility.

“Let's go!” she said, honking her horn. “I know the beaches will be empty, but let's at least get there before the drunk naked coeds wake up and stagger back to their rooms!”

Sheila was close to right. They got the car parked and got out to the beach around 8:30, and they had the place more or less to themselves. There were very few furs out and about, since it was very early for the college crowd...though it wouldn't be totally empty. Not every college did spring break the same week, so while U.T.'s spring break was ending, other schools' breaks were just beginning. Today would be a huge turnaround day for the island, as some college kids left and new ones came to take their places. Kit and Sheila both figured that they'd have about four hours of peace and quiet before the beach started filling up, which would be more than enough time for Kit and Jessie to actually swim.

They got to do that. The water wasn't all that warm, and there weren't any waves, but it was still nice to float lazily in the clear water. He and Jessie swam a while as Sheila and Allison guarded their spot on the beach, laying out in the warm sun in their spaghetti strap bikinis and garnering about every male eye on the beach, until they'd had about enough. They came out and scrubbed the water out of their fur, which made Sheila giggle a little.

“You two look terrible,” she teased. “And your fur’s gonna be all chalky when the salt dries in it.”

“Well, I brought a comb for a reason,” Jessie winked, fishing a big comb out of the bag.

“Sheila, if you pull your bottoms down any further, you won’t really have any reason to wear them,” Kit noted clinically.

Sheila laughed and looked up at him. “Hush and let me enjoy myself.”

“Such an exhibitionist,” Kit accused with a chuckle.

They didn’t stay in one spot on the beach all day. After a while, after some beach volleyball, lunch, and a lazy hour or two dozing in the warm sun, they packed their things and put them in the car then went out to enjoy what the beach had to offer. They went shopping on a boardwalk, and Allison got talked into going on a parasailing ride by Sheila. Jessie took quite a few pictures of her flying along behind the boat. The two vixens had their “who can show the most white fur” competition early that afternoon, as well. Kit and Jessie just got a good distance from the two of them as they very nearly got arrested for indecent exposure by a bike patrol. Their bikinis were very skimpy to begin with, both of them wearing thong bottoms, and with less total material on their bra tops than a dinner napkin, and both of them were very brazen about pushing what little they were wearing as far as they could get it to go without exposing themselves. Sheila was no chicken, but she was dealing with someone who used to strip for a living, so Sheila lost that little contest. Sheila could show as much as Allison given the rules, but she couldn’t strut the way Allison could, move with that total sensuality, that utter ripe promise to rock a male’s world, the slightest tilt of her hips promising the darkest delights. It was the challenging strut of a stripper who knew she had the hottest body on the beach. Allison's strut just owned every male eye on the beach, admittedly, even Kit's...much to Jessie's dismay. Kit wheezed a little when Jessie elbowed him in the ribs.

"Give her the crown, cousin. You got your tail whipped," Kit teased when they came back to them.

"Yeah yeah, maybe I'll go to the Top Hat on member's challenge night and work on my walk," she grunted, giving Allison a slightly annoyed look.

"You may call me your Majesty," Allison said in her quiet manner, which made Kit explode into laughter.

"I'll call you a bitch, Ally," Sheila grinned.

"I've been called worse by meaner furs than you," she returned with a slight smile and a shrug of her shoulders.

Sheila treated them to a nice meal at a beachside restaurant, then they went to a beach party hosted by one of the clubs on the island. While Sheila and Allison tormented males and made females very jealous by playing volleyball, Kit and Jessie sat at a table. "Alright, you can put your eyes back in your head, handsome fox," she told him tartly.

He laughed. "I can't deny she's beautiful, love, but she's not you," he told her, kissing her on the muzzle. "You could totally kick her ass in a game of 'who can show the most white fur,' cause you're way sexier than she is."

"No, I could never do, that," she said, her cheeks ruffling.

"You've put her to shame when we're in the bedroom," Kit winked. "And who said you had to play the game in public?"

She gave him a speculative look. “I think you’re just being nice.”

He snorted. “I had my chance with her, if you recall, and I said no. So what does that tell you?”

“That you were too afraid of what Vil would do to you if your ruined our wedding?”

Kit laughed. “I love to see you jealous,” he told her. “It tells me I’m still your number one.”

“You always will be,” she told him. “And I have to keep myself on the top of your list when you have her tempting you,” she said, motioning at Allison.

“How can I be tempted by what I see as second best to what I already have? Yes, she’s beautiful, pretty kitty. I admit it. She’s probably the second most beautiful femme I’ve ever known...but guess what? You’re on the top of that list. You don’t have to do a thing to stay there, love, just be yourself. There’s nothing sexier on earth than that.”

“I just wish you were jealous,” she said, a bit accusingly.

“Oh, I’m jealous, love, but I keep it in here,” he said, tapping his chest. “I’m not like you. You’re a knockout, pretty kitty, one of the most beautiful femmes there is. You don’t have to have me tell you that either, you know it. You’re beautiful. Just look around. The males stare at you, the femmes give you dirty looks, just like they do Allison and Sheila. But you put Sheila to shame, and Allison can’t quite reach your level. I’m, well, plain. I’m not really all that handsome, I have funny eyes, I have a bad back, I’m missing part of my ear, and I have these,” he said, holding up his scarred left arm, where white fur marred the red fur on his forearm, jagged lines of white streaking down into the dark-furred mitten on his left wrist and paw. “I know I can’t hold a candle to the males you went to see at the Top Hat, but I just have to trust you, trust that you’ll come back to me when you go out the door. I know you could have any male you wanted, any time. No male could ever resist you. I can’t help but feel jealous knowing that, but I know that the only thing I can do is show you how much faith I have in you, how much I trust you, how much I love you, and hope that it keeps you with me. I just have faith that you love me as much as I love you, and I try to show you that even though I have a friend like Allison, someone almost as pretty as you, I’d never break my wedding vows, because you are my entire life. I’ll always be by your side, for as long as you’ll have me.”

She gave him a long, tender look, then leaned over the table and kissed him lovingly on the nose. “You are the most handsome male I have ever known, my love,” she told him with honest eyes. “These aren’t scars, to me, they’re beauty marks,” she said, touching his arm. “And you’ll never get rid of me. When we find our male, we Williams femmes dig in our claws and never let go. Just look at my mom and dad,” she said with a light yet loving smile.

“I’m easy prey to keep, pretty kitty. I won’t struggle.”

“That’s a good thing,” she said with a light whisper, then she kissed him. It was one of her special kisses, a kiss he was surprised she’d give him in public, and God, was he glad he was already sitting down. All sound seemed to turn off, and all he could sense was her, her lips on his, her paw touching his arm. When she broke the kiss, he was all but leaning into it, and he was a little disappointed that she ended it as his brain restarted. “So, I’m your number one?” she asked with a slight smile.

“The one and only,” he said breathlessly.

The intimate mood was broken when Sheila and Allison came back to the table, Sheila a little out of breath. “Well, that was more fun than I expected,” she laughed. “Allison popped out of her top jumping up to spike the ball,” she winked.

“And I was too busy kissing my wife to see it. Darn,” Kit said in a deadpan voice. “Oh, wait, I have a picture showing so much more.”

Allison and Sheila laughed, and to his surprise, so did Jessie. “I forgot you have that,” Allison said.

“One of the few left. There were only a few of them to start with, and the rest were deleted because of the potential scandal involved. You know, a Vulpan caught on camera like that. I’ve got the only copy I know of left, and I keep it in a very safe place,” he said carefully.

“Well, I’m glad to hear that. That would be a little...embarrassing, if it came out at the wrong time.”

“Well, I still have my copy, but I don’t keep it where just anyone can find it,” Sheila admitted. “And I’ll keep it as long as Kit keeps my picture.”

“Forever, then,” he grinned at her. “I can’t lose my blackmail material.”

“You learned way too much from Vil,” Sheila accused, then she grinned. “Seven days,” she said with a little trill in her voice.

“I already told you, it’ll be a party at home during poker,” Kit told her. “Lupe’s already planning it, and I told him I don’t want anything outrageous.”

“Oh, my plans start after the kiddie party,” she grinned. “I’m just glad you have Monday off. You’ll be in no condition to work the next day.”

“When is your birthday, Jessie?” Allison asked curiously.

“Not til July,” she laughed. “I’m a patriotic femme, I was born on July fifth, ten minutes after midnight. Ten minutes from the big day,” she laughed.

“Well, that’s always easy for furs to remember,” Allison chuckled. “What about you, Sheila?”

“September twenty-seventh,” she answered. “You?”

“August thirtieth,” she answered. “About one month and six years before you,” she said with a little smile.

“You don’t act twenty-four, but Sheila certainly doesn’t act eighteen,” Kit chuckled.

“I’m twenty-one,” Sheila said primly. “I have six IDs that say so.”

“You act like you’re twelve,” Kit teased. “You need a few IDs that say that, too.”

“I got way too much up here and have laid way too many guys to be twelve,” Sheila said with a naughty smile, pointing at her breasts and thrusting them in Kit’s general direction.

“Well, if we’re going by those standards, you’re, what, ninety?”

“Bite my ass, cousin!” Sheila snapped, which made Allison and Jessie erupt into laughter.

They got back to the plane after a few walks up and down the beach, right around sunset. Kit was a little tired from all the walking they did, but it had been a good day. It was nice to walk on the sand, paw in paw with Jessie, while Sheila acted like a little kid and lured Allison into shedding much of her reserved demeanor and having a little fun. It was nice to spend time with his wife, it was nice to spend time with his cousin, and it was nice to see Allison warming up to him and Jessie, on her way to being a friend. There was still a way to go, but there was hope.

They climbed back in the plane at 7:00, and were airborne and on the way home by 7:20. Sheila was up front for the ride home, and both she and Allison had their cameras out, taking pictures as they took off. Kit got them up and to a nice cruising altitude of 12,000 feet. "I wonder how hard it is to get a pilot's license," Allison mused, which made Kit laugh.

"You have no idea how many furs have said that who've ridden in this plane," he teased. "Just keep one thing in mind, Ally."

"What?"

"This plane costs about seven hundred thousand dollars."

"That much? Wow," she breathed.

"I certainly wouldn't have it if I wasn't a Vulpan," Kit admitted. "My family gave it to me as a thank you gift for me not stripping them of every penny and throwing them all out into the street."

Sheila laughed. "Yeah, they did," she admitted. "And I had to pony up twenty thousand out of my trust for it. They rated it to how much we got from the deal, as to how much we had to give. So, next time you bitch about me asking for rides, remember that, cousin. I helped buy this plane for you!”

“I’ll give you the stuffing out of the back seat. That’s worth about twenty thousand,” Kit mused, which made the three femmes laugh.

“I never heard that before,” Allison said. “What happened that made them buy you the plane in return for it?”

Telling Allison that story helped pass the time for the hour or so flight back to Austin. “Wow,” she mused in her quiet manner. “You had it all, but you gave it up. I can see, Kit, you’re truly a male of your word. You really did have the chance to be rich.”

“I could have been a billionaire,” he said immediately and without batting an eye as he started descending towards Bergstrom. “That’s what the Vulpans are worth, Ally. About six point six billion, if you add up everything. Stocks, property, the worth of the businesses, everything. Most of that worth is tied up with the shipyard and steel company, though. When my father died, he had about seven hundred million in cash in banks and securities, and he controlled the business.”

“Which is the biggest piece of the pie,” Sheila added. “Our family owns the biggest private company on Earth.”

“Not quite,” Kit corrected her. “The shipyard and steel companies and the parent company over them all have stock, but the stock isn’t sold to the public. It’s all internal within the family and the board, to keep the company privately controlled, even though it’s technically listed as a public company. Vil owns two thirds of all the stock of all three companies, Vulpan Shipyards, Vulpan Steel, and the Vulpan Corporation, which is the parent company of the other two and the catch-all for all the little tertiary companies the Vulpan control. Since Vil has that super-majority of all three companies, that's where all her money comes from, and it gives her total control of all of it. Vil earns no salary for being the CEO. She relies utterly on the profitability of the companies to earn her salary. Her pay is her dividends from the stock...but, since it's Vil, I think she netted like twelve million last year after taxes. Vil's an absolute genius when it comes to business."

"That's where the family got all its money," Sheila continued. "All of us own shares of the family business, and we earn money from it. I own five hundred shares of each company," she said proudly. "I think Kit's the only family member who doesn't own family stock."

"Actually, I do," Kit told her. "One thousand shares of each. Vil sold them to me, she leveraged a proportioned buyout of the board. The stocks are all zero sum, Allison," he explained when she looked at him with a blank stare from the back seat. "There are only sixty thousand shares of each company's stock, that was all that was ever issued. To buy stock in the business, I had to get them from someone else in the business. Vulpan stocks are never available for sale. They're not even listed on stock exchanges. What Vil did was force the members of the board to all give up one hundred shares, buying them back from them, then she sold them to me. The Vulpan stocks are the backbone of my stock portfolio," he said calmly. "That is no-risk dividends for life, since the shipyards have Navy contracts coming out of their ears for the next sixty years."

"So, you own a little less than two percent of your family business," Allison reasoned.

"Yup, and Sheila owns a little less than one percent," Kit nodded. "Vil owns two thirds of each one, which means she owns forty thousand shares of each company. It's the way they've done it ever since my grandfather incorporated the businesses back in nineteen thirty-six. When a board member is fired, quits, or retires, he has to surrender his stock to his replacement, it's an ironclad part of their contracts. The only ones who can't lose their stock are family members."

"So, over the years, the family earns money from the stocks," Allison reasoned.

Kit nodded. "Like I said, my father had like seven hundred million dollars in cold cash in the banks when he died, which was split up among the family as part of the deal that gave Vil control of the company."

"I'm one of the army of cousins, and I got a sixteen million dollar trust out of it, which is just chump change compared to what my mother got," Sheila told her. "My mom got ninety million out of the will, as well as some property and some other stuff. And that was on top of the money they already had. Mom and Dad were worth about a hundred thirty million in total assets before Kit's dad died, then they get ninety million in cash dropped on top of that."

"I don't get it. How could Kit have stripped your family and left them broke if they already have money of their own?"

"Because of the stocks," Sheila explained. "Up until the death of Kit's dad, see, the way it worked was that the oldest controlled all the stocks, as well as all money earned by the stocks within the family and any profits or interest made off money that was earned off the stocks. Yeah, my mom has a hundred twenty million of her own money from stock dividends, but since Luke's will was voided, it put control of that money all back in Kit's hands, even the money earned from stocks already given out. It was how Uncle Luke kept a stranglehold on the family, and his father before him. Not even our own money was really our own. Uncle Luke could have taken it all from us at any time.”

“That sounds illegal.”

“It dates back to a contract that all the Vulpans who were there in nineteen thirty-six signed, when the stock was first created,” Kit explained. “It gives the heir absolute control of all money earned and stock created from the family businesses. In return for that control, the family gets shares of the family stock. It was made that way because originally, my great-grandfather was only going to give the oldest son anything, he was going to leave the other three Vulpan siblings with nothing but million dollar trusts, which was far too small to suit them, far beyond their usual standard of living. Imagine, the thirties, and a million dollars wasn’t enough to live on,” he snorted. “Anyway, my great-grandfather still had that British concept of passing everything to the eldest son. That original agreement was still in force, right up until my father died, because of how the agreement was worded. It gave the descendants of the heir the same power over the descendants of the other family members, giving my father the power to strip all money and stock earned from the businesses away from anyone in the family at any time...which was just about everything. Everyone relied on the shipyard, and any other businesses they started were started using money earned from the shipyard, which folded them into the agreement too. The only way to get around the agreement would be for someone to leave the family, get a job, earn money, and use that money to start a business. And me and Vil are the only Vulpans who has ever done that,” he chuckled. “Vil has a little boutique in Boston that is all hers, outside of the family’s control, built with a two thousand dollar loan from a bank as part of her Master's in business degree project requirement. But that chain was broken with my bastard father's death. The money and stocks were all split up among the family, and the deal that would have given Vil absolute control was dissolved, outside of her ability as the majority shareholder to leverage a forced sale of stocks held by someone else. She can't take the stocks, but she could force the family to sell their stocks to her at a set price based on the last quarter's dividend. But the money is all theirs, free and clear. That's why the family was so happy about it. They're finally free of the threat of the family head disowning them and casting them out without a penny to their names. Vil can't take that money from the aunts and uncles, and the parents can't take the money from the cousins."

"How many cousins do you have?"

"Like thirty," Sheila answered. "It's hard to keep track anymore, the older cousins are having kids now."

"And each one got that much money?"

"It was based on how much stock we have," Sheila said. "The ones with stock got less, because we'll earn money off the stocks. I got sixteen, but I think one of the one-year olds got like thirty, because they stopped giving stock to cousins about ten years ago. Said the stocks were being spread out too thin by handing them out to every cousin. I think cousin Debbie was the last one to get stocks. All together, all us cousins got around two hundred million dollars from when Kit's dad died."

"And your parents got a hundred million each?"

"Only my mom. Each of the aunts and uncles, you know, Uncle Luke's brothers and sisters, each one got ninety million," Sheila told her. "But the property was distributed without being fair about it. Uncle Zach's the eldest now, so he demanded the lion's share of the property and assets, and the others knuckled under to him. So, Uncle Zach's the richest of all the Vulpans now. The only ones that didn't really get much out of the will were Kit and Vil, which kinda sucks, since all the money was theirs to start with," she said. "But Kit was disowned, and Vil gave most of it up in order to keep control of the shipyard, since she was given the stocks before Uncle Luke died. Uncle Luke named her the heir, and with the title of heir come the stocks and the CEO's chair. Vil got the company stock, her house in Chelmsford, her dad's collection of cars, and five million dollars in cash. That's it. Compare that to Uncle Zach, who got ninety million, houses and properties all over the world, a private jet, a yacht, securities, stocks, and a bunch of other shit."

"I knew you were from a rich family, Kit, but to hear the numbers thrown around like that," she said, sounding a little surprised as Bergstrom came into view in the distance, its lights on. "And you could have had it all," she breathed.

"I won't touch that money," Kit said with utter sincerity. "It's a curse I'll never bring down on myself."

"But you did touch that money when you bought the stocks," Allison reasoned.

Kit glanced over his shoulder at her. Allison was very smart. "I didn't buy into my family fortune, Ally, I bought confidence in Vil's ability to run the business," he told her. "So, I'm showing my faith in my sister to earn enough money for our kids to be able to go to Harvard," he chuckled. "But, I have more than just Vulpan stock in my portfolio. The Vulpan stocks are the backbone, but I also invested in industrials and energy, but stayed way away from real estate and financials for now. Both of those are bubbles either collapsing or on the verge of collapse, and I'd rather do more than throw my money down a hole. No matter how much faith I have in Vil, I won't put all my eggs in her basket. It's not sound financial planning. One untold disaster, and it's all gone."

"Truly," Allison nodded. "I keep my money spread out so I'm not exposed to too much risk in any one area."

"I just have a trust," Sheila laughed. "They send me a check every week, and I won't get to touch the principle til I'm twenty-five."

"You should pay more attention to it," Allison told her. "If you don't know how to manage that money, you'll find out how fast it can disappear."

"That's what the trust is about," she said as Kit radioed in and prepared to land. "I actually do a good job with my money, Ally. I have money in the bank. I think I have about fifteen thousand in there last I checked. My brothers and sisters burn through their trust checks like it's endless, and they go days, even weeks, broke. They have millions in the bank, and they're going to Mom for money cause they wasted it all. I budget my money. I found out a long time ago that if I watch how I spend my money, I have plenty to do whatever I want. I just don't do anything stupid with it, that's all."

"Well, that's a start," Allison nodded.

"Sheila may not look it, but she's probably one of the shrewdest of the cousins," Kit said as the plane lined up with the runway, then radioed the tower again to begin his landing approach. "And all this time we thought she was a flake," he winked at her. "Just another member of the Party Pack."

“Thanks a lot, cousin,” Sheila said caustically. “And I am a member of the Party Pack. The Austin Party Pack!” She grinned. “And in seven days, you will be inducted as its newest member!”

“Oh, no,” Kit said mildly. “Now excuse me while I focus my attention on not plowing us into the runway.”

After they were safely down and in the hangar, they drove back to the apartments. Allison’s Lexus was parked in the visitor’s lot, but she didn’t go straight home. She got to meet the founding members of the poker crew before heading home, since they were all sitting on Lupe’s porch. Kit took her over and introduced her to Lupe, Dan, and Mickey, and all three of them gave her a curious look. “Have we met somewhere before?” Mickey asked her.

“Maybe you’ve seen me when I’ve come over to see Sheila, or to have dinner with Kit and Jessie,” she said mildly as she shook his paw.

“Ah, maybe that’s it!” he said. “It’s nice to meet ya. Wanna come play poker with us next week? We’re always looking for suckers to separate from their pocket change,” he grinned.

“Brah, don’t scare off the easy targets,” Lupe said with a laugh.

“Kit invited me to his party next week, so I’ll be here,” Allison said with a slight smile. “And I’d be happy to try my paw in poker against you.”

“Uh oh, she might be a card shark,” Dan laughed, “just like innocent-looking little Sammy!”

“She’s certainly somethin’,” Lupe said with a grin, looking her up and down openly.

“Yes, I’m going home,” Allison said with a slight smile. “Let me go say goodbye to Jessie and Sheila, Kit. And thanks for taking us, I had a wonderful time,” she said, leaning over and kissing him on the cheek, then sauntering away in a manner that all three of the males noticed most keenly.

“Brahhhh,” Lupe sighed. “Sheila won’t let her anywhere near me,” he complained.

“Sheila knows you too well,” Kit told him with a chuckle. “You’d make a move on a mannequin if they put it in a bikini, Lupe,” Kit accused, which made Dan and Mickey laugh.

“Brah, what was she wearing at the beach?” Lupe asked intently. “I hope she was wearin’ some seriously skimpy bikini. Like, fishing line and drink umbrellas skimpy.”

“It was moderately skimpy, yes,” Kit said in a mellow tone.

“Brah, why you gotta be so mean,” Lupe said, his tail shivering.

“Because you’re sitting there drooling over one of my cousin’s best friends,” he answered evenly. “And if you annoy her, Sheila will probably get mad at you. You really wanna play with her? And if Alice finds out you’re trying to two-time her and takes it out on me, then I’ll get pissed. You want both of us riding your tail, Lupe?”

“Well, I hope you got pictures,” Lupe grinned. “I want to see as much of that fine femme as possible.”

“Dude, you’re so hopeless,” Mickey laughed.

Allison was already on her way home when Kit got back to the apartment, passing Sheila in the courtyard as she walked back to her apartment across the complex, and got to work making some tea as Jessie got the shower going, to wash the rest of the sea salt out of her fur. She hugged him from behind as he put the kettle on, and he patted her on the arm fondly. “Did you enjoy yourself, pretty kitty?”

“I had a lot of fun, thank you, my handsome fox,” she replied, kissing his neck. “Thank you so much.”

“Any time, my love. Did you get all your homework done?”

She laughed. “It’s been done since Tuesday,” she said, poking him in the side lightly. “You big worrier!”

“I gotta keep your grades up, or your parents will kill me,” he chuckled, turning around and putting his arms around her waist. Her paws immediately sought out the scars on his back, and traced them lightly under his shirt. “So, are we still a little jealous?”

She giggled. “I guess I always will be, but I feel a little more confident that you won’t stray on me,” she winked. “I just hope I can keep you faithful when I’m fat.”

He laughed. “That’s when I’ll be most faithful to you, my pretty kitty, because it means our baby will be closer and closer to coming into the world,” he said, putting his palm on her flat belly. “I can’t wait.”

“Me either,” she said, putting her paw over his on her stomach. “I’m just glad I had no nausea at all today,” she giggled. “I guess the baby showed mercy on me on our beach trip.”

“I think that means the baby liked the beach too,” Kit grinned, which made her laugh. “Six months and two weeks to go, Misses Vulpan,” he cooed, embracing her.

“Seven days until your birthday, Mister Vulpan,” she giggled in his ear.

“After spending all day staring at you in a bikini, I hope you’ll give me an early birthday present,” he said, sliding his finger up her back in a sensual manner.

Her tail shivered. “I think we could work something out,” she whispered in his ear, then she pulled back. “After we both take a shower,” she said, waving her paw in the air between their muzzles. “You smell like the beach!”

“I kinda like it,” Kit smiled.

“I won’t like tasting salt every time I kiss you,” she answered. “Now put the kettle aside and let’s get this salt out of our fur.”

“Together?” he asked with a growing smile.

“You’re better than a backbrush,” she winked, turning off the stove and taking his paw, then pulled him back towards the bathroom.

The kettle sat on the stove for the rest of the night, forgotten.

By Monday, they knew how the twenty percent increase in circulation went.

It was a complete success.

The features in this week’s issue weren’t earth-shattering like they’d been in the last two weeks, but they still cleaned out all the free copies, and had sold 85% of all sale units by Monday. A 15% leftover rate was higher than Rick’s estimation, so that was even more profit for the magazine. The success of the last two weeks had sustained over the third, and furs were still buying the magazine. Sensational stories had sparked interest, but they had come back again this week to read the magazine again.

After they got that information, Rick called in Kit to the office, then he, Rick, Savid, and Mike sat down in his office and had a long talk. The four of them were the core of the magazine, for Savid and Mike were the first employees whose input Rick trusted, and Kit was now a part owner. They talked about Kit's bold gamble to increase circulation for nearly two hours.

In the end, though, conservatism won out the day, but Kit also felt a little vindicated. They agreed to increase circulation another 10% and barter to offer it within Austin, mainly in youth concentrated areas in north and south Austin, away from the campus. Rick would arrange the rack space with bookstores and shops, and they would test the Austin market to buy what one could get for free on campus with 500 units.

"It's gonna mean another red week," Rick frowned, looking at his monitor. "I'm not increasing our advertising fees until the increase in circulation is permanent and sustainable, or we'll lose our clients. So, everyone tighten up your belts, cause it's gonna be crunch time."

"It's good risk," Savid said. "If Austin sales work out, we offer sale issues in city. That's good."

"Yah, I'd have to agree," Mike nodded. "We've always avoided Austin because it seemed useless to put sale units out where furs could pick it up for free. But we have a lot more interest now, and I think this is the time to see if selling the magazine in Austin will work."

"Well, one thing we could do is put out two separate issues," Kit said impulsively. "We add four pages to the sale units with extra features, like archived strips or best of articles or something. Give the students an incentive to buy the retail version.”

“I’m not sure I like that idea,” Rick grunted. “I don’t like the idea of teasing the students like that. They’re our backbone. If we piss them off and they think we’re holding back our best stuff to make them pay for something we’ve always put out for free, our campus circulation might bomb.”

“I was thinking of making different versions, though,” Mike said, looking at them. “We sell in College Station and San Antonio, but our articles are focused on Austin.”

“Mainly cause of U.T. alums living outside the city,” Rick told him.

“Well, why don’t we put out different versions for the expatriates? We could send someone down to do a story or two about San An and put those in the San An units, or buy articles from other sources.”

“Well, that might work,” Rick said. “But it’d be a lot of work, and reprinting can get expensive and a bit boring if they read those articles in the original material.”

“Well, we’ll have two new interns next month,” Mike said, smiling. “We have them help with it. Every week, they have to come up with one idea for a story about San An or College Station and research enough to present the idea to the office, then they help with the whole process, from Kit’s research to Rick’s editing. It’ll be good practice for them, and it also frees us up from having to do so much work trying to find stories. We’ll have Kit to do the research, one of the writers to write and proof the article, and you two to edit their work. Each of us puts in a little time, but they handle the lion’s share of the work on it.”

“That has potential,” Savid nodded. “But why restrict it? Let’s add it to all issues, not focus them. We make the magazine more, what is word, far reaching.”

“You mean start extending our focus out from Austin? That changes the core mission of the magazine, Savid,” Rick noted. “We’re about bringing news, information, and entertainment to the students, and all our advertisers are focused on that too. If we start reaching out, we’ll charge advertisers more, and what if they’re not getting returns for their money? They start pulling out. We can’t forget that.”

“Well, those would be sale units, so the price of the unit would help offset the advertiser problem,” Kit mused. “We could charge them the same, or even less, and make it up with sale profits.”

“But if the students still like it, why not try?” Savid asked. “We should ask them. Send Kit to do survey, see if students would like stories about Texas outside Austin in campus issue, see if they want more broad approach or if they want us to stay focused on Austin. If they like it, we add it. If they don’t, we do Mike’s idea and restrict external work to external sale issues. Either way, we increase circulation because we appeal to more and more furs.”

“That’s a good idea,” Mike said. “After all, we are about the students. We’ve asked them what they want before, let’s do it again. We’ll ask them what they want, and we’ll give it to them.”

“I agree. Kit, you have a job to do tomorrow,” Rick chuckled.

“Another afternoon in the student center. Yay,” Kit chuckled. “I should take Sheila and make her attract attention again.”

The other three chuckled. “Take her. If there’s one thing she can do, it’s draw every eye in the room when she wants to.”

“I’ll put a poll up and add a forum question to the website, get feedback over the net,” Mike added. “Me and Marty can also bring it up during our first twitter session tomorrow afternoon.”

“Alright, let’s do that,” Rick said. “I’ll call Vil and get her input before lunch. After lunch we start interviewing photographers.”

“When are the interviews?” Kit asked.

“Three today,” Savid told Kit. “Four tomorrow. None Wednesday because of debate.”

“We’re gonna have a meeting tomorrow morning about the debate,” Rick said. “I want to get articles on it out in this week’s issue, so it’s gonna be some long hours for everyone. I’m gonna warn everyone that Wednesday will be an all-nighter. We’ll all be here and work our tails off to get the debate articles worked into the issue by Thursday.”

“We’re young, we can handle it,” Mike chuckled. “And Kit’s already done like every possible angle of research, so we’ll be ready.”

“So we take Friday off?” Savid asked.

Rick nodded. “If anyone wants Friday off, they can take it, except Lilly. She’ll still have to do her canvassing that night for The Scene. But, if they want to come in, they’re welcome to do so,” he smiled.

“You keep saying it, it keeps not happening,” Mike grinned.

“Just remember to keep Sunday open,” Rick said. “It’s Kit’s birthday, and we’re having a cookout over at his apartment complex to celebrate.”

The survey was easy enough to do for Kit and Sheila the next morning, after the meeting. Kit had done student surveys often enough to have a routine, and enough students knew about the magazine to stop and talk to him and Sheila. Kit wore his usual tee and jeans, but Sheila was already in “summer” dress mode, and was wearing a half-shirt tank, a glorified bra, and a pair of cut-offs that showed off a great deal of Sheila’s legs. They arrived bright and early at 10:00 in the student center’s main room, pulled out the banner, and the two Vulpans did a lot of surveys...and even took a few pictures. For some reason, students wanted pictures of and with Kit and Sheila, and they obliged. Quite a few students got pictures sitting between the Vulpan cousins at the table, and more than one male got his picture with Sheila on his lap, kissing his cheek.

Sheila would never be anything but naughty, no matter how old she got.

They amassed about four hundred surveys in the six hours they were there, and the general feeling of the students was that they’d rather like to see articles about the general region in addition to articles about and for Austin. One student summed up the feeling rather well. “Well, Texas is more than Austin, and since I’m from New Braunfels, I’d kinda like to see some stories about other parts of Texas.”

That was what most students wanted. They wanted to learn a little about the Texas beyond Austin, but still have the magazine focus on their stomping ground.

Savid was a little victorious when Kit brought back the results that afternoon, as he and Sheila reported on their findings. “Most of them liked the idea, as long as we don’t go overboard,” Sheila summed it up for them.

“They liked the idea of us doing an article here and there, but not for us to suddenly go statewide. So, there ya go.”

“Is just as I say,” Savid grinned.

“Don’t get cocky,” Mike laughed.

“Well, I’d say that our readers have spoken,” Rick said. “I’ll get together with Barry and we’ll hammer out something we can show the school of journalism, so they know what kind of assignments we’re giving the interns.”

Kit had never attended a debate before, but to do it as a member of the press was very interesting.

Rick had decided not to attend because he was in a wheelchair, so it was Kit, Barry, Lilly, Marty, Mike, and Denise roaming through the auditorium on campus in the press section, where a multitude of desks were set out with little stands that said to whom they were assigned. It was what the organizers called the war room, where all the reporters would do their work, while the on-air journalists used the room as a relay between their studios and themselves. They were all wearing “nice” clothes for this excursion, suits for the males, a pantsuit for Lilly, and a long pleated skirt and white blouse for Denise.

“Wow! That’s Candy Crowley! And that’s Keith Olberman!” Denise gushed as they moved through the large room, on the way to the auditorium. “Look, that’s Bill Richardson!” she said, pointing.

“Down, girl,” Marty teased.

“Let’s at least try to act professional,” Barry chuckled. “It looks silly for press members to be going around asking for autographs. They might doubt our neutrality.”

“Oh, hush, you mean males,” Denise giggled.

They didn’t rank high enough to have a seat in the vaunted war room, but at least their press passes let them get into it. They’d arrived about an hour before the debate to get a feel for the place, and also so Kit and Barry could interview the other journalists. They wouldn’t do anything that took more than a minute, they just wanted some background information to get a feel for the debate. Armed with digital voice recorders, the two of them fanned out while the others milled around and talked to nearly anyone who would give them a minute. A few of the reporters seemed a little surprised that these young furs wanted to talk to them, but it actually got them quite a bit of good information. Kit even got to talk to a couple of real names, for he’d managed to get a couple of words in with Wolf Blitzer and Neil Cavuto. They were nice enough, and Wolf Blitzer actually knew who he was, which surprised Kit a little bit.

The news part of it for Kit and Barry was a brief and entirely chance meeting between Kit and Senator Hillary Clinton in a back hallway. Kit and Barry had been on their way to their seats in the auditorium as the Senator was coming out from the candidate’s preparation area to do a quick interview with someone and they happened to cross paths in the hallway, and were surprisingly alone, just Kit, Barry, the Senator, and a Secret Service agent. The Senator gave him a double-take as they approached, then reached out a paw to stop him in the hallway. The thin, middle-aged raccoon femme was taller than Kit expected in person. “You sure tore my campaign apart in that editorial,” she said with a surprisingly gamey smile.

“They got what was coming to them, Senator,” he answered simply. “It wasn’t personally against you, though.”

“I know. I just hope you’ll be fair to me when you write about the debate.”

“I guess I could,” he said, scratching his chin. “That’ll depend, though.”

She gave him a surprised look, then laughed. “Depend on what?”

“Answer three questions,” he said.

She laughed a sincere and heartfelt laugh. “Deal. Shoot.”

And that was how Lone Star managed to get a brief interview with a Democratic candidate. Kit asked three questions, about the instability in the housing market, about the war in Iraq, and how independent she would be from her husband if she won the election. She seemed surprised about the first and last questions, and answered impulsively and honestly. “I think the housing market will bounce back after a while, it’s just going through a natural correction,” she answered about that. “I’m more worried about how this increase in foreclosures might affect the markets, though.” As to the third question, she looked him right in the eye and said “when I was first lady, I did what he asked of me, gave him my opinion, but also knew that he was the one in charge. When he’s the first husband, I expect him to act the same way I did.”

“That’s my three questions. Thank you, Senator, I appreciate it.”

“Well, I guess I owed it to you after what happened,” she smiled, touching his forearm fondly.

“Dude, that was so score!” Barry said with a huge grin as they went into the auditorium. “What luck!”

“Yeah, but I’m just glad nobody saw it, or my picture would be everywhere in the morning,” Kit said. “I’m glad nobody’s really noticed me, for that matter.”

“I’ve seen a couple of cameras point your way,” Barry told him. “I’m not sure if they took any pictures of you, though.”

They all took very detailed notes during the debate, listening to the nine candidates, then rushed back to the office with a lot of coffee, donuts, and pizza set up by Rick, who was waiting for them. Then, they got to work. They had the rest of the issue ready, with holes left in it for tonight’s debate. They all took off their nice clothes, went back to jeans and tees, and worked. There would be four articles about the debate, written by Kit, Barry, Lilly, and Marty, with Mike and Denise writing an editorial on their impression as opposing views; Mike was a moderate Republican, Denise a centrist Democrat. They actually weren’t far off from their ideology, but they had some differing viewpoints, and those viewpoints would be the basis of the two sides editorial. They weren’t alone in the office, either, for Martha showed up a little past midnight bringing dinner for them, and Jessie brought them all fresh coffee and tea for Kit around four, then stayed until it was time for her to go to school.

They all worked right into Thursday. Kit finished his article first, a four page piece about the issues, then helped Marty with his writing and his viewpoint as a gay male and how the debate impacted his platform. Marty was still getting into the swing of being a “real” staff writer, but he did a pretty good job. Barry got his piece done, then he helped Lilly finish hers about the femme’s perspective. Rick and Savid sent them back a couple of times with edits, then they all took a break for lunch when Martha brought them all tuna casserole and a refill of their rapidly dwindling coffee can. The only ones not writing or editing were Sheila and Jeffrey, and those two found themselves in unusual positions. Sheila ended up manning the phones that day, while Jeffrey found himself doing a little research and some phone bargaining, getting pictures of the candidates to use in the issue from their campaigns.

By 4:00pm, they were all done. They had their wrap meeting, and Rick showed them how he'd jigsawed all their work together into the issue. It ran 47 pages this week since they'd done all their usual features and had done other articles on top of the debate articles. Rick had spent his time sitting in his wheelchair all week securing rack space in their test areas around Austin, so they'd be printing more copies of the issue tomorrow than ever before. The magazine would print at a loss that week, dependent on how many copies they sold; if the Austin test sites really tanked, the magazine would take a bath. Rick was being more conservative than Kit would have been, but it was still a real gamble to do what he was doing. But, expanding with an issue like the debate issue was a wise move.

At the end of the wrap meeting, Rick made a couple of announcements. "Damn fine work, gang," he told them. "But tomorrow, the gang grows. I've decided on a photographer."

"Which one?" Sheila asked.

"The femme sable, Janet Zychowski. She was very impressive in the interview, she has some solid experience with computers since she was a double major with computer science, she was more amenable to the idea of doing work other than photography, and she seemed capable of dealing with our rather unique chemistry."

“That and she’s cute,” Mike grinned.

“Well, with us losing Sheila next month, replacing the hot femme in the office was a priority,” Rick said, which caused Lilly to get up, go over to him, and smack him on the arm. That made everyone erupt into laughter. “I like versatile furs working in the office, and she was definitely the most versatile of the seven I interviewed. I’ll offer her the job tomorrow morning.”

“You’re not losing me, Rick, but if I stay on after April, I demand to be paid,” Sheila countered.

“Like I said, we’ll be losing Sheila next month,” Rick grinned at her.

“You old bastard,” Sheila grinned back.

“If I wasn’t a bastard, I’d fail the boss test,” Rick told her. “Everyone has Friday off except Lilly cause she has to do her club canvas, but if you want to come in, I’ll be here. The writers will be coming in on Saturday as usual, but I’ll have Janet come in on Saturday as well to start getting her settled in. If she takes the job, that is. Mike, pick an office for her and set her up.”

“She should get the one between the printer room and Marty,” he said. “We’ll move the break room to the other side of Marty. She’ll need close access to the big toys on that side.”

“Take care of it. Do we have the computer equipment she’ll need?”

“We have one workstation left from what Vil sent us,” he answered. “Thank God she had the foresight to send us a couple of extras to use as backups. I will need to buy a couple of boxes, though, Rick. We’re out of backups, and I don't like not having backups in case someone's box takes a nosedive on me."

"I'm not sure we can afford to go out and get Sabletechs."

"We won't have to, I'll custom build a couple of good ones. But I'll need to buy the components."

"Talk to me about it after the meeting and we'll take care of it," Rick nodded. "Now, as everyone knows, Sunday is Kit's birthday," Rick grinned, which got him some applause. "And there's going to be a party at his apartment. It'll be a cookout. Kit's friend Lupe is setting it up, and he asked me to ask each of you coming to bring something to eat, that way we have plenty. And he asked that you guys please not all bring the same thing. He has the beer, hot dogs, burgers, and paper plates all set up, and Jessie's baking the cake, so we need other dishes and some non-alcoholic drinks for those of you who have to drive home. And I don't want to see ten bowls of potato salad out on the table," Rick told them. "Before we call it today, let's make a list," he said, pulling out a piece of paper and a pen. "Who's bringing what?"

"Sounds good, boss," Denise nodded. "I'll bring some homemade salsa and some spicy corn."

"Salsa and spicy corn. Bring some chips too," Rick said, writing it down.

"I'm no cook, but I can grab something from a deli on the way down," Mike said. "How about some macaroni and cheese?"

"Sounds good, you're in for mac and cheese, Mike," Rick nodded.

"I'll bring a case of Coke, I'm no cook either," Marty said.

“We’ll need it,” Rick assured him.

“I have Nawa make some hot chicken curry for those brave enough to eat real food,” Savid grinned.

“I’d love to try it, Savid,” Kit told him. “I love spicy food, and it’ll rock to taste it from the paws of someone who knows what she’s doing.”

“Alright, that’s Savid. Lilly?”

“I’ll bring some pork barbecue,” she said.

“Ooh, nice,” he said, writing that down. “Jeffrey?”

“You’re asking me to cook?” he laughed. “How about if I bring a couple of gallons of ice cream to go with the cake?”

“I’ll put you down for three,” Rick answered. “Make sure they’re different flavors, but don’t get exotic. Chocolate, vanilla, and something else will work. Barry?”

“I’ll bring some shish kebabs. They sell these good ones premade at Sam’s, we can just throw them on the grill. I’ll get chicken ones for those who don’t want to eat burgers or dogs.”

“Bring enough for like ten,” Rick warned. “There’s probably gonna be more furs there than that, like twenty, but at least that way they’re not fighting over them.”

“Twenty?”

“Well, there’s the nine of us, Martha and Nawa, the sorority femmes, Kevin, my neighbor Bill’s coming with his wife Lucy, and Kit’s friends there at the complex,” Rick said. “That’ll be about twenty. What are you bringing, Sheila?”

“Me? I bought the beer,” Sheila laughed.

“That’s the beer. What food are you bringing?”

She gave Rick a look. “I’m buying the hotdogs and hamburgers too, Rick,” she told him.

“Oh. Okay, that’s different, then,” he said with a nod. “Martha’s bringing a bunch of food, so that’s my contribution. Kit’s the guest of honor, we can’t really expect him to bring anything, and Jessie’s baking the cake, so it sounds like we’re set. Kit, son, you get the honors of taking the list to Lupe.”

“I can manage that,” Kit chuckled, taking it from the dingo.

“Now, on to the last announcements,” Rick said, leaning over the table a little to look at them seriously. “As most of you know, Kit’s bought into the magazine as a partner,” he said. “In fact, it’s been his money that’s been paying our salaries the last couple of weeks, since we’ve been running in the red due to the expansion. And while I was out, him and Savid were handling my job. That got me to thinking, mainly about what might happen if I weren’t here, if something happens to me. Because of that, I’m giving Savid and Kit the title of vice presidents. The title gives you official clout to get these jokers to do as you say when I leave you in charge,” he grinned.

“God forbid,” Lilly grinned.

“Savid will be the vice president in charge of the production of the magazine, responsible for content and layout. Kit will be the vice president in charge of, well, everything else. But don’t get too jealous, guys,” Rick chuckled. “Over the next few months, if these expansions hold and we start earning the money we’re projecting, I’m going to expand our staff again.

I'll be hiring two new writers, another photographer, and two research assistants, and more promotions will be coming around the loop. And I'll be giving everyone a raise," he finished, which made everyone applaud loudly. "So keep kicking ass, guys. If we can keep the issues flying off the shelves the way we have been the last month, we'll get bigger, we'll get better, and we'll earn more money. But for tonight, go home, get some rest, and feel proud. We put a hell of a good issue to bed today."

"Congratulations, cousin," Sheila grinned at him when the meeting broke up, and pawshakes and hugs were distributed around the table. "Twenty two and a vice president, you're moving up in the world."

"Yeah, all it cost me was fifteen thousand dollars," Kit grinned, which made Sheila laugh.

"Just goes to show, even a hopeless bum can be important if he has enough money."

Kit laughed. "Well, I won't let it go to my head. I'll only wear my Darth Vader helmet on Fridays."

Janet Zychowski was exactly what Mike said...cute.

She wasn't beautiful the way Jessie and Allison were, but she was definitely worth a look. She had bone white fur except for a little brown band over her eyes on her forehead, extending into her blond hair, extending from temple to temple. This was an extremely odd fur coloration pattern, since the majority of sables had brown or tan fur. She kept her hair short, which let her ears pop through it, and she was very slim and surprisingly tall. She was wearing a dark blouse and a pair of black slacks, not normal fare in the office, but she was carrying four camera bags with her when she came in. She came into the seemingly deserted office and called out, then came to Kit's office when he answered her. He got up and shook her paw and introduced himself. "Rick told me to settle you in," Kit told her. "Did you finish all the paperwork yesterday?"

She nodded. "Yup. I'm all done with that. He said I'd be here half a day to get used to my office, and that, uh, Mike would be getting me up to speed on your network."

"This is usually his day off, so he'll probably be a little late," Kit chuckled. "I hope you don't mind my asking, but how did you get such unusual fur?"

She laughed. "You're not the first to ask. "My dad's a Polish marten and my mom's a Russian sable, and I guess martens and sables shouldn't mix," she grinned. "I'm the first Zychowski born in America," she added, with a bit of pride.

"Do you speak Russian?" he asked curiously.

"And Polish," she added with a nod. "My parents wanted their kids to know their heritage. Not that I think those will ever help around here," she grinned.

"Well, I never really think me having a pilot's license will ever matter working here either, but you never know," Kit shrugged. "And if we ever interview a Russian diplomat, your language skills will come in very handy. Let me show you to your office, and I hope you don't mind the sterile smell. It used to be our break room," he winked as they entered the big room."

"Oh really? Well, I'm glad I at least have one," she laughed.

“Well, we have a few open offices, but we wanted you near the printer room, where we keep all our industrial printers and scanners and such,” he explained as they crossed over to her new office, which held her desk, a small couch, two chairs, a shelf, a light table behind her desk, and her own printer and scanner. “We set you up with the same equipment our graphics furs use, but if you have any special requests, Mike is the raccoon to see.”

“What add-ons do you guys use with Photoshop?”

“I really don’t know, I’m the researcher,” Kit winked. “Mike will have your laptop and Blackberry ready when he gets here, I don’t see them on the desk,” Kit noted.

“You supply them?”

“I guess we do,” Kit chuckled. “We have them for everyone else, but now that I think of it, I should call and find out. We have a rather special arrangement with our Blackberries, I have to see if we can extend it, or if we need to change our plan. Let me call and find out.”

When Kit called Vil, he found out that Rick had already talked to her about it. “Yeah, Rick told me you’ve got a new hire. I agreed to add her on to the plan for the Blackberries, but I also told him I can’t be adding on everyone he hires. He gets this new girl for free, as a gift because he broke his leg. If he wants to put anyone else in, he’ll have to take it over himself. The Blackberries were a gift to the furs who helped you when you were hurt, not a running perk for the magazine.”

“Well, that’s only fair,” Kit said calmly. “She got our last Sabletech workstation, but I guess we’ll have to buy her her own laptop.”

“Now there I can help you,” Vil told him. “Tell Rick I’ll buy the laptop for him by proxy, because I signed a deal with Sabletech for them to supply the shipyard with laptops. The brand has impressed me. Their workbook brand laptops are very rugged, and they’re perfect for my foremen and engineers out on the platens. Tell him I can get the magazine Sabletech computers and peripherals at a discount, but the magazine does have to pay for them.”

“I’m sure he’ll go for it,” Kit said. “Dear God, everyone in this office is in love with the laptops you gave us. Do me a favor and put in an order for a laptop that a professional photographer would find good.”

“Just one?”

“Yeah, we have only one new hire,” Kit chuckled.

“It’ll be there Monday,” she promised.

“Thanks, sis, you’re a lifesaver.”

“Any time, bro. And premature happy birthday,” she said with a giggle.

He laughed. “Thanks.”

Kit went back to see Janet settling into her office, her fingers flying over the keyboard of her computer. “Tell Mike that his security is weak,” she told Kit in a calm voice. “I’ve managed to snoop the entire network.”

“Mike doesn’t put security on the inside, but try breaking in from the outside and see how far you go,” Kit chuckled. “Mike’s very good. Anyway, your laptop will be here on Monday, and your Blackberry is on order. I’m not sure when it’ll get here.”

“What kind of laptop?”

“We use Sabletech here,” he answered her, which made her eyes widen slightly.

“Sabletech? Those are expensive.”

“They’re worth every penny,” Kit said fervently.

“I’m glad I took this job now,” she laughed.

“That may change after a week,” Kit told her. Barry peeked in, and Kit waved him inside. “Janet, this is Barry, he’s our lead writer,” he introduced.

“We met when she came in for the interview,” Barry smiled, shaking her paw.

“Did Rick explain how things work around here?”

Janet nodded. “He said there would be times I’d be more than a photographer,” she said. “He told me I was hired specifically because I can do more than take pictures.”

“Yeah, we do what needs done around here,” Barry said. “Whether it’s in our job description or not. I think Lilly’s done every job there is to do in this place at one time or another. Rick said you were a computer science double major, so odds are you and Mike are going to be doing a lot of work together.”

“We’ll see how good he is,” Janet chuckled. “Rick said I’d also be doing some graphic design, I’ve taken a lot of classes on graphics and art. I think it’s a solid background for a photographer. I’m all about the picture, and sometimes a picture isn’t just what you take with a camera. A piece of art is just as much a picture as the pictures I take with my camera.”

“Well, Savid and Jeffrey will be very good teachers if you want to keep learning,” Kit told her.

Janet grinned. “I’ll enjoy working in the same office that writes School Daze,” she told them. “I started reading your magazine just to read the strips! I love Oxnard best, he rocks!”

“Well, we keep all our future strips a secret,” Kit winked at her. “But, I will let you in on one thing. We’re splitting Missy and Cutler off into its own strip.”

“Really? That should be really interesting,” she said. “Those strips have a very different feel from the others.”

“They should, my wife does the writing for it,” Kit chuckled. “I do the writing for the other strips.”

“I never noticed!” Janet laughed. “I guess I should look and see whose names are on the strips!”

“All three of our names appear on all the strips,” Kit told her. “But when Missy and Cutler splits off, it’ll just be Jessie and Jeffrey on that one. I don’t have anything to do with those.”

“Jeffrey’s gonna be stressed doing both strips and his other work,” Barry noted.

“I think we might be hiring another artist soon,” Kit chuckled.

Mike scurried into the office, and Janet shook his paw. “You must be Mike,” she said.

“That’s me,” he smiled. “I see you’ve met the unimportant furs.”

“Someone wants his check shorted next week,” Kit teased.

“Yeah, I dare ya,” Mike grinned. “Now give me and Miss Zychowski some room while we talk shop and get her box set up to her liking.”

“We’ve been dismissed,” Barry said to Kit absently.

“I think kicked out is a better term,” Kit noted in reply.

“Shoo!” Mike told them, waving his paws at the pair imperiously.

Kit could have left early, but he hung around to help Janet settle in. He showed her how their archives worked, which she picked up very quickly, after she and Mike spent three hours in her office setting up her computer to her exacting specifications. Lilly had both come and gone in that time, coming in and updating The Scene, then leaving early for some well-deserved rest. Mike went home as well after the computer work, leaving Kit and Janet in the office after Barry left for the day as well. “So, was he good?” Kit asked as she navigated through to the archives.

“He seems to know what he’s doing,” she answered. “He certainly knows Photoshop.”

“It used to be part of his job,” Kit chuckled. “Mike and Lilly did almost all the photography before we hired you. They’re both very good at it.”

“Well, we’ll see if I can’t free them up to do their own work,” Janet said with a smile.

“Oh yeah, I’m not sure if anyone told you, but I’m having a little party over at my apartment tomorrow. You’re welcome to come.”

“Well, sure, I can come. When and where?”

“Around one. I’ll bring up mapquest and print you out some directions. It’s not far from here.”

She was quiet a moment. “Can I ask you a personal question?”

He chuckled. “Yes, I’m that Kit Vulpan,” he said.

She laughed. “Well, I knew that. I just wanted to know what brought you here. Out of everything you could have done, why work in a little magazine?”

“Because this is my family, and this is my home,” he said earnestly. “Rick’s been like a father to me, and the gang here are the family I never had. I love it here so much, I took what little money I do have and bought into the magazine. I’ll be here until either I die or the magazine closes.”

“But what brought you here in the first place?”

“The same as you. I needed a job, I saw Rick’s ad, and I applied. Fate was being kind to me that day. That whole week, actually. That’s also the week I met my wife. Meeting Jessie is what sent me looking for a job, and brought me here. So, I guess you can say that my wife is the reason I’m here.” He turned to go back to his office. “Just tell me when you’re ready to go, so I don’t accidentally lock you in here when I leave. I’m not sure there’s enough food in the break room to last you until Monday. They cleaned it out when they moved the break room yesterday.”

She laughed. “Actually, I’m about done. I did everything Rick asked me to do today. I’ll be back Monday morning to get my portfolios and my own photo archives loaded up for the magazine, and Rick said I’ll have my first assignment. I can leave my cameras here?”

“If you want, as long as you don’t need them until Monday. Rick’ll be here around eight Monday morning.”

“I have cameras at home. I have too many cameras,” she laughed. “Only thing that’ll suck is taking my film home to develop, but I don’t think any magazine or newspaper has darkrooms anymore.”

“You use film?”

“For certain artistic shots, yes, I still use film. Film can produce effects you can’t quite match without six hours with Photoshop, and I get a better result spending twenty minutes developing film. I have a special camera that is both digital and film,” she told him. “It takes a digital picture but also takes the same picture on film.”

“I’ve never heard of one of those.”

“I’d be surprised if you had, because I made it,” she said, standing up and picking up a camera case on her desk, and pulling out a surprisingly bulky camera that looked like an old fashioned 35mm portrait camera. “This is the film lens, and right here is the digital camera lens,” she said, pointing to the dual lenses, the digital lens showing through a hole drilled into the case. “The controls for both lenses are up here on the top, but both take the picture when I press just one button. The offset between the two apertures is only half an inch, so I get virtually the same picture, but I can change modes on the cameras to get one scene with different effects between the two pictures.”

“You made that? Damn, I’m impressed!” Kit said honestly. “You should patent it!”

“I did,” she smiled. “Of course, since the film camera is a Minolta and the digital camera is a Fuji, I couldn’t really build and market them myself,” she added with a smile.

“I’m really impressed, Janet,” Kit told her. “I’ve never known anyone that could invent things before.”

“I’ve never known anyone who comes from one of the richest families in America before, so we’re even,” she winked. “Now let’s get out of here.”

Kit didn’t really set much stock to birthdays.

Much as Christmas and other holidays, Kit hadn’t had much leave to really feel like celebrating since he was about twelve. That was the last birthday he really enjoyed, his twelfth birthday, because he’d gotten to go to a Celtics game that evening and meet Larry Bird, and it was also the first time he’d met Suzy. She had been one of the masses invited to the party, a child of the Boston rich invited to the party of the Vulpan heir as a matter of courtesy because Suzy was one of Vil’s friends. Those two had met in Weston Academy, the ultra-elite private school for Boston bluebloods which Kit himself had attended, and the two of them had formed a very quick friendship that had endured over the years. Vil and Suzy were best friends, and probably always would be. Kit had liked Suzy despite her being so much older than him, and that was probably where Suzy’s crush on Kit had begun.

Of course, that was a very different Kit. Back then, he was called Little Luke about half the time by his aunts and uncles, and only Vil, Clancy, and the house staff called him Kit, because that was the pet name his mother had given him, a play on his first name that was both contraction and her own special way of calling him “baby.” Vil had taken to using it after their mother died, for it soothed Kit during his storms of grief and also seemed to evolve Vil’s regard for him as less and less his sister and more and more his mother, and it spread from her to Clancy and the house staff. Back then, he was only just beginning to stoke the fires of what would become an inferno of hatred against his father, the year when the hurt and confused young kit began to hate his father for not being there. That year, that birthday, was the second straight birthday party that his father had not attended, and in a sign of what was to come, it was the first that Kit enjoyed if only for the very fact that his father had not been there.

Since his twelfth birthday, Kit had had no reason to celebrate the occasion. Oh, there had been parties, but they weren’t the same. That year, his twelfth year, was the year that Kit started to drift away from his family, to start to question everything he’d been taught, all of it started by his hurt at why his father had walked away. By his thirteenth birthday, Kit was already on the path that would lead to the confrontation on his sixteenth birthday, the day he walked out on his family, forsook them, choosing to live on the streets rather than be a Vulpan any longer. And after that momentous sixteenth birthday, he’d been too busy trying to survive in the face of his father’s attempts to destroy his life to feel like doing much celebrating. Birthdays became like other holidays, just days, where the magic they had held for him in his youth had faded away over time.

But, this was his first birthday with Jessie, and in that respect, it felt like a special day for him. Jessie was going to bake him a cake and his friends were coming to a cookout in the courtyard, which would no doubt be done over the sounds of construction across the block as Lupe’s army of workers raced to get everything built on time. For that reason, Kit was looking forward to today. Not because it was his birthday, but because it would be a nice little gathering, where the three separate circles of his friends, the magazine, the sorority, and his neighbors, would combine and interact with each other more than they usually did.

Jessie was sure to give him an extra-special waking up birthday present, blowing lightly in his ear at 8:00, making his swat sleepily at what felt like a fly, the she kissed him exuberantly on the side of his muzzle, leaning over his back. “Wake up, my handsome fox,” she cooed in his damaged ear. “It’s your birthday.”

“Then let me go back to sleep,” he mumbled groggily.

Her paws sliding down his back sensually made his tail stand straight out under the covers. “But then I can’t give you your first birthday present,” she said huskily in his ear.

She found herself wrapped up in his arms before she could even take a breath.

After what Kit felt was the best birthday present ever given in the history of the universe, she made him a nice breakfast, keeping him firmly out of the kitchen. “Oh no, this is your day, silly fox!” she laughed. “No cooking! Now go play X-Box or something and let me take care of you!”

“You already did this morning,” he said with a loving growl, wrapping her up from behind, putting his paws on her belly. “Six months and one week,” he said in her ear.

“I know very well how much more time I have to go,” she said primly. “Now don’t make me call Mom and have her get you out of my kitchen!”

“The heavy artillery, eh?” Kit laughed, then he was serious for a moment. “You know,” he realized, “Vil didn’t send me a card. She always sent me one when I was in Boston. I’m a little surprised.”

“Oh, I seriously doubt she forgot your birthday, love,” Jessie told him, patting his paws with her own. “You know her, odds are some courier in a suit’s gonna knock on the door at noon and give it to you personally.”

“Yeah, that’s something she’d definitely do,” he chuckled, nuzzling Jessie’s neck. “I love you, Jessica Desdemona Vulpan,” he told her, hugging her a little tighter.

“And I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan. But that’s no defense to lurk in my kitchen when I have very important work to do for your first birthday since we were married,” she said tartly. “Now get out of my kitchen so I can make your breakfast and bake your birthday cake!”

He laughed, and just hugged her even tighter. “But I want to spend the rest of the day just like this,” he protested, “with the femme I love and our baby wrapped up in my arms, close to me. That would make the day much more special than me just getting one year older.”

“Such a sweet talker when he’s trying to get his own way,” Jessie accused with a giggle. “But you’re about to get punished, my handsome fox. I have to have your cake ready by the party!”

“Well, there are no pillows in the kitchen, and I have a pretty firm grip on you to keep you from going to get one,” he noted dryly.

“Mmm-hmm,” she hummed lightly, reaching to her left. She grabbed the extendable spray nozzle from by the faucet of the sink, pulled it up, then aimed it over her shoulder, right at his face. “You were saying something, love? I didn’t quite make that out.”

Kit laughed, then just rocked her back and forth in his arms. “Point taken, my pretty kitty,” he surrendered. “But you do realize, this means war.”

“We can have our epic battle of good versus evil after I bake your cake,” she noted clinically.

“It’s a date,” he chuckled, kissing her neck, then he obediently let her go.

He went to the living room and decided to read while he listened to the news on the radio. He took the cup of tea Jessie brought out for him with a smile and a nod of thanks, and basically did as Jessie wanted, which was relax. Jessie called him to the table when she finished breakfast, a simple affair of eggs, bacon, a grapefruit half, and wheat toast. After breakfast, she got to work on the cake, which made Kit feel a little...unsettled. He was so used to helping Jessie whenever she was engaged in domestic chores that he felt, well, like he was freeloading. Here he was, sitting around reading a book and listening to the radio while Jessie was in the kitchen working, and it just wasn’t like him. He would usually be in there with her, sharing in the labor both to be near his wife and also to get it done; after all, if both of them were working on it, it got done faster and gave them more time to themselves. But here he was, banished from the kitchen on pain of getting attacked with the sink sprayer, forced to sit there and do nothing while Jessie worked in the kitchen...worked for him. He knew it made her happy to do this for him, but it also annoyed him just a little bit that she wouldn’t let him share in the labor. He’d be much happier in there with her than he was sitting in the living room, banished from her presence. It just felt...

unnatural to be in a different room than her. Even when they were doing different things, they were almost always together. The only time they really separated was when Jessie had serious homework to do, which she preferred to do in the quiet sanctuary of the den.

When she came out to give him a new cup of tea, he pulled her down onto the couch and held her for a long moment. She always seemed to be able to sense his feelings, so she didn't struggle or think he was playing, she just let him hold her, kissing him lightly on his cheek and muzzle. "What's the matter, my handsome fox?" she asked. "I wasn't that mean to you, was I?"

"Just feeling a little unsettled," he answered. "I'm not used to being in the house with you and not with you. And I'm sitting here reading a book while you're in there doing work. That makes me feel like I'm a heel."

She laughed. "I'm in there working because I love you, silly," she told him. "I want to give you something special on your birthday, and I'd feel like a heel if I let you do any of the work. The birthday boy just simple does not help bake his own cake! It would be a scandal!" she told him, kissing him on the nose. "But it's all but done now, love, I got it in the oven. So, I have about a half an hour that's all yours," she cooed, wrapping her arms around him.

Despite being married, and knowing every inch of her body, and doing many much more intimate and sexy things with her, there was definitely something to be said about making out on the couch like a couple of teenagers. Kit made sure to keep full possession of his wife until the timer went off, spending a blissful 35 minutes in the arms of the femme he loved, running the entire range from playful pecks and smooches to deep, toe-curling kisses that nearly made them both pass out from lack of oxygen.

But, reality intruded on their intimate fun...but not without a fight. Jessie laughed quite a bit as she struggled free of Kit's grasping paws, constantly complaining that the cake was going to burn, and he'd be in all kinds of trouble if that happened. But she got free of him, and rescued the cake in more than enough time to prevent a calamity. Kit wanted to watch her decorate it, but she hustled him out of the kitchen imperiously, pushing him from behind all the way through the living room and to the hallway. "In the den, you!" she commanded. "You'll see the cake when I bring it out at the party, and not a minute before!"

"But--"

"But nothing! Stay!" she barked, pushing him through the door, then closing it loudly behind him.

"This is false imprisonment!" he shouted playfully through the door.

"You get one phone call, call your lawyer!" she shouted back, which made him erupt into laughter.

He'd give her what she wanted--he always did--but that didn't meant that he had to make it easy for her.

After the cake was decorated and safely spirited out of the apartment, Jessie let Kit out of the den. She did cave and let him help prepare some of the other food Jessie was bringing to the cookout, baked beans, her famous spicy beef tip and potato chunk dish, and she was making homemade chili for the hotdogs. Kit helped her carry some of it out, and saw that the courtyard had been converted to a little party area. Lupe had erected a large sideless tent, basically a shade, under which they'd set several long tables and folding chairs. The tent, tables, and chairs were brand new. Sheila and Allison were already there, helping Lupe, Dan, and Mickey spread cheap tablecloths over the tables and weight them down at the corners with little beanbags. Sam and Kevin were also here, carrying a large platter of chopped vegetables with a big bowl of ranch dip in the middle. “Hey brah, you’re early!” Lupe teased.

“It’s my party, I’ll show up whenever I damn well please,” Kit teased in reply.

“Well, if you’re gonna show up for the setup, you’re gonna help,” Lupe told him. “You can help Mickey bring over the grills.”

“I don’t mind, I’m not a drama queen like certain chihuahuas around here,” Kit grinned at him.

Kit helped them get everything ready. Tables were covered and sturdy plastic plates and silverware were stacked, food was brought out in containers in preparation for the guests, Dan and Mickey’s grills were brought over, and Dan had to make a quick run down to Circle K for a new propane cylinder when he realized the one he had didn’t have enough left to hold out for the whole party. Allison left as well, and brought back a couple of very large coolers and four large bags of ice. “I’ll pay you back for those, babe,” Lupe told her. “All this stuff is gonna go in storage and be in the new community center, that way it’s available for patio parties.”

“And you can write them off on your taxes,” Kit chuckled.

“I ain’t no fool, brah,” Lupe grinned. “So I hope you saved the receipt, babe. I’ll need it for my taxes.”

Dan and Mickey iced down the beer and soda they’d bought, Jessie started pressing hamburger into patties, and they all just sat down and talked while waiting for the others to start arriving.

And they didn't wait long. Sam and Kevin got there about twenty minutes after they got everything set up, carrying food for the party and a small wrapped present for Kit, and Martha and Rick arrived not two minutes later, so quick that Kevin helped Martha get Rick transferred to the wheelchair and wheeled him down the sidewalk. Janet was the next to arrive, and she spent much of her time shaking paws and being introduced around, which kept everyone busy until Lilly, Jeffrey, Sandy, Savid, and Nawa all arrived at the same time. More and more kept arriving faster and faster as they approached 1:00, which was the start time for the party, but nobody got there that late. The last ones to arrive were a couple of the sorority girls, Danielle and Charlotte, who got there as Jessie and Sheila had started grilling the hamburgers, hot dogs, and other grillable foods the guests had brought. Lisa had brought some chicken breasts to grill, since she didn't eat red meat, they had Barry's shish kebabs, and Charlotte brought corn on the cob wrapped in foil, which were parked on an upper rack and left to slowly cook.

It was a nice time for Kit. He wasn't allowed to help cook or serve, so he sat at the table and talked with friends, and friends around him either met friends or renewed friendships forged at the wedding. Some of the more bashful sorority girls like the other Jessie and Lisa got to see some furs they hadn't seen since the wedding, and Janet got the opportunity to meet just about everyone in Kit's life at once.

But, it wouldn't be a party without at least one surprise. Kit was chatting with Janet, getting to know her better, when he didn't notice things get a little quiet around him, and heard Sandy giggle. A paw tapped him on the shoulder. "Hey, can I sit here?"

Kit gasped and almost jumped up, since that voice belonged to no one other than Suzy. He whirled around and saw Suzy, Vil, Muffy, Hannah, John, Jenny, Ben, and to Kit's surprise, his cousin Terry all standing there with a fox male Kit didn't know. He laughed and gave Suzy a rough hug. "I never thought I'd see you guys!"

"Now you know why you didn't get any cards," Jessie told him with a giggle.

"I should have known!" he laughed as he hugged Vil. "You're such a sneak!"

"What can I say, I'm a Vulpan," she laughed in reply. "I left this morning and picked up Jessie's family in Cincinnati on the way down."

"I'm so happy you guys are here," Kit told Hannah as he gave her a fond hug.

"We were happy to come, dear. We got to ride in your sister's jet," she laughed.

"It was fun!" Jenny gushed as she hugged Kit.

"Kit, this is my boyfriend, Corey," Suzy introduced him to the slender fox male that was with them. He was a little taller than Kit and a little wiry, but he had a handsome muzzle and dark hair the same color as his mittens combed back and between his ears. "Corey, this is Kit, one of my oldest friends."

"I've heard a lot about you, Kit," Corey told him.

"I heard you make movies. How was Mexico?"

“Hot and dry,” Corey laughed. “But I’m done down there for now, we’re back in the studio for post production work.”

“Corey, this is Jessie, my wife,” he introduced.

“Well, it’s a pleasure to meet the girl that made Suzy available,” Corey grinned at Jessie as he shook her paw.

Jessie laughed ruefully. “Well, you’d better put a ring on her finger or you might not have her long,” Jessie teased.

“We’ve been talking about it,” Suzy told Kit in a low voice.

Kit was a little less pleasant when Terry approached. “It’s good to see you again, cousin,” he said with an earnest smile. “When Vil said she was coming to see you, I begged her to let me come. The rest of us aren’t exactly sure if it’s safe to try to call you or anything,” he admitted. “The only ones that seem to be allowed are Vil and Muffy.”

“Well, I guess I told them to leave it like that,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, you’d have quite a few cousins calling if we knew you’d let us.”

“Well, I kinda like not being embroiled in the family business,” Kit told him. “The last thing I need is for someone like Victor to be calling me at three in the morning just to be an ass, or Bridgette calling me every hour to try to make me get a divorce, or God forbid, Bess calling down here whining because Liz stole her boyfriend. I kinda like them to be too afraid to call.”

Terry laughed. “Tell me about it,” he drawled.

Kit accepted Terry into the party with a certain wariness, but after sitting down and talking with him a while, he felt much better about it.

Terry was a very earnest Vulpan, and not cut from the usual mold. He was intelligent, insightful, hard-working, and dedicated. He was also rather handsome, much more handsome than Kit, probably the most handsome among all the male Vulpans. But instead of having an arrogant snotty personality like Victor, he was instead modest and self-effacing, much like Ben. All of Uncle Tom's children were a little different from the other cousins, but not necessarily in a good way. Bess, the most wanton and notorious of any of the Vulpan kids, was Tom's oldest. Then came his cousin Dahlia, who was actually a little mentally unhinged and was kept close to the family's vest, then Terry, then their youngest, the twelve year old male Hunter, just starting at Weston next fall. Terry's mother and Tom's wife, Justine Leeks Vulpan, had been diagnosed with ovarian cancer not long after Hunter was born, and had had her ovaries removed, which made Hunter the last of the children of Tom and Justine.

Uncle Tom and his family had almost always been the "black sheep" of the family, at least until Kit took that title in spades. Tom was a little...odd. Eccentric was a good word for it, but he wasn't eccentric in a bad or dangerous way. He was just odd. He had a very unusual personality, he was a little moody and a bit erratic, but he was also absolutely brilliant. Kit had since learned that his enigmatic uncle had a bit of obsessive-compulsive disorder, which gave him those wild mood swings and periods of genius mixed in with periods of sullen depression. It wasn't blatant, but it was just enough to give him his rather unusual personality. All of his kids were also a little off the beaten path, in their own ways. Bess was an absolute slut and the most notorious of all the Vulpans, the founding femme of the Party Pack. Dahlia had battled clinical depression and mild schizophrenia most of her life, so she was rather delicate. Terry was very much unlike most of the other Vulpans, since he was so smart, and Hunter was just a bundle of unceasing energy that ran his parents ragged.

Terry, at least, was sincere when they got around to talking about his leaving the family, and he was brave enough to do it around the family, since Vil, Muffy, and Sheila were sitting with them as they talked. “I was petrified,” Terry told him. “I was a senior and almost ready to graduate, and then you get disowned, and I was terrified that Uncle Luke was going to come after the whole family, so much so that I convinced Dad to pay for my whole four years of school at Yale in advance,” he said. “He did it for me, too, set up a special trust I used to pay for my school, which would let me finish Yale. I wanted to try to call you a couple of times, but I’ll admit that I was too afraid to do it,” he sighed. “I couldn’t see how I’d survive if I got disowned, how I’d ever get a good job if I was thrown out of school, since I saw what Uncle Luke did to you. We were afraid he’d do the same to us, not just disown us, but torture us. We knew he was capable of it.”

“The old bastard certainly was,” Kit grunted, then he realized that just about all of Jessie’s family and Allison were listening with rapt attention.

“Well, I was wrong about it, and for that much, I apologize, Kit,” he said, offering his paw. “If you don’t mind a late apology, that is.”

“Yay! Another convert for the Austin Vulpans!” Sheila called.

“Hey, I’m still a Boston Vulpan, Sheila! We’ll have to go to war to get Terry back!” Muffy challenged.

“Bring it on, Eugenia!” Sheila called insultingly, then the two started mock-slapfighting across the table like a couple of six year olds, which made the whole party erupt into laughter.

“It’s not too late,” Kit told him, shaking his paw. “At least not for you. For some others in the family, their chance passed a long time ago. Basically anyone in the family older than me, who was old enough to understand what was going on, yet did nothing. Them, I will never forgive.”

“Well, I’m glad to hear that. And just so you know, it doesn’t really bother me all that much that you married a cat. I’d never do it, but that’s because I just don’t find femmes who aren’t vixens attractive. I guess growing up in Boston flavored my idea of attractive.”

Kit had heard much the same attitude from Vil, so he could nod in understanding. “I appreciate that, Terry. So, you’re saying my wife isn’t pretty?” he asked teasingly.

Terry laughed. “She’s pretty, but she just doesn’t do it for me, cousin.”

“Well, I know who to call when I want a chaperone for her, then. So, what’s it like being a vice president who matters?” Kit asked, which made Terry laugh.

Kit and Terry talked a while about the shipyard as the party got into full swing, hearing about Terry’s surprising resistance when he took over the safety department. The older furs in the department really resented what they saw as Vil’s move of cronyism, putting a Vulpan in charge of an important department, which had forced Terry to go in and clean house. He demoted a bunch of middle managers in his department, transferred some furs in from his accounting department to replace them, and reorganized the entire division to ensure that such a mistake that happened there could never happen again. He instituted tighter controls, more dual oversight so no one fur in a critical position could make a mistake that would result in a fine from the government, and ordered an audit of general shipyard safety to see if there was any way they could increase safety for the workers or streamline safety procedures. He went so far as to include a survey with paycheck to poll the workers on their confidence of the safety policies at the shipyard. From the sound of it, Terry was going to be just fine in his new job, for he took it seriously, and he had to guts to do what had to be done. While they were talking, Kit got to sample a whole lot of different foods, and he almost choked when he tried Nawa's curry; it was the spiciest food he'd ever eaten! His eyes watered as he swallowed the first mouthful, then he laughed and took another bite. Despite being so spicy, it was still quite delicious.

“At least he's brave!” Nawa laughed as he worked his way through the curry. Then, after he finished it, she put another plate in front of him. “Here, this is curry I did not make just for you,” she said with a teasing smile.

“Nawa! You cheating little so and so!” Kit objected, which made the whole party laugh.

“I give you honor for eating the whole thing,” she grinned at him. “Most run at the first bite.” Then she pointed at Savid. “And blame him for first dish, he told me to make my spiciest curry for you!”

“Oh, I'll take care of you next week, Savid,” Kit threatened, pointing an accusing finger at the mongoose.

They spent a very lovely afternoon in the courtyard, eating, talking, and laughing as Terry and Jessie's family circulated, and Suzy introduced Corey around. Outside of a slightly frosty meeting between Allison and Hannah, things went quite swimmingly. Kit rather liked getting to talk to Suzy face to face for a change. They talked about once a week on the phone on the average, usually every Saturday, maintaining a friendship that had endured for over ten years. Kit got a chance to get to know Corey, who was a very mellow young fox who loved to make movies. He'd be going back to his studio in New York on Monday to finish his movie, and then he'd be shooting another film in Maine over the winter, which would keep him close to home for Suzy. Suzy did seem to honestly love him, from their weekly talks, and getting a chance to see Suzy and Corey together showed him that Corey loved Suzy in return.

He was glad of that.

There were other little wars of conquest going on at the party. Sheila had trapped Ben over by the grills and was talking to him, and Hannah was keeping a very close eye on them. Sandy was teasing Jeffrey, playing with his ears from behind and making them flinch, while Sam and Kevin stayed close together, standing side by side as they chatted with Jenny and John. Lupe introduced Alice around when she arrived, and about all the males were watching Allison as she moved through the party, going back to her seat. Kit didn't spend all his time watching Allison though, if only to keep Jessie from beating him, so he stayed in his seat of honor and let his friends drift back and forth to him. He spent a long time talking privately with Suzy, out of Corey's earshot, getting caught up in the kinds of things she'd never tell him over the phone or in front of her boyfriend. He then took part in a pretty indepth conversation between himself, Vil, and Rick as they discussed the expansion of the magazine.

But they didn't let him spend the whole day talking. After everyone had eaten their fill, Jessie and Martha vanished, then returned with the cake. Kit had to sit there and get serenaded by a round of Happy Birthday by everyone as Jessie brought out a german chocolate cake baked in the shape of the magazine, with Lone Star written across the top in icing and all the birthday candles down where the picture would be, and the words HAPPY BIRTHDAY KIT! scrolled across the bottom. Everyone applauded when he managed to blow out all the candles in one try, and then he did the honors of cutting up the cake and doling out the pieces. Jessie had baked two cakes but had only decorated one to make sure that there was enough cake for everyone, and also explained why she was so adamant about keeping him out of the kitchen, to keep the secret that Vil and her family were coming. They enjoyed the delicious cake, and then everyone produced small gifts for him. Thankfully, nobody went crazy, not even his rich relatives, and he got a bunch of little knickknacks and useful little things for the office, though Sheila couldn't resist the opportunity to buy him a G-string to wear for Jessie and a stack of porno DVDs all taped together. He was afraid that Vil was going to spring something on him, but thankfully, her gift to him was a new acoustic guitar, to replace the rather old one that Rick had given him.

It was Rick's gift that puzzled him. He unwrapped it and found a mobile broadband card, one of those ones that worked just about anywhere by accessing cell phone networks rather than Wi-Fi. "Well thanks Rick, but I'm not sure how much use this is going to be," he said, turning over the card's box to look at the back.

"Oh, it's going to be very useful to you, son," Rick grinned.

A cold feeling built in the pit of his stomach, because Rick was looking at Vil.

"You're going to be telecommuting for about six weeks, bro," she said with a predatory smile, like the cat that caught the canary, taking a small brochure from Stav and handing it to him. "Happy birthday."

“What is this?” he asked, looking at it. It read Cessna Flight Training Academy, and upon its front was a picture of a raccoon and a badger sitting in the cockpit of an aircraft, the badger looking where the raccoon was pointing.

“May fifth, you’re going to Independence, Kansas for about six weeks, bro,” she smiled. “And you’re going to go through Cessna’s Citation training program, the one Cessna uses to train its own pilots. You said you’d always wanted to get that jet rating you’d never gotten, so I’m going to make sure it happens.”

“But, but I have work! I can’t leave for a month! I’m already too deep in the hole on time off as it is!”

“Work will be sent to you, son, and I seem to recall a certain young fox bargaining a cleaning of the slate as part of the deal when he invested in the magazine,” Rick chuckled. “I know you don’t believe this, but you can actually do most of your research work from home. Well, you’re going to be doing your assignments from Kansas, and you’re also going to be writing a few articles about your experience for the magazine,” he added. “I think those would be really, really interesting. So don’t think this is a vacation, cause it’s not. You’ll be working your tail off up there for the magazine when you’re not in flight training.”

“See, I already have everything all set up,” Vil grinned.

“I’m going with you,” Jessie smiled, taking hold of his paw. “My last final is the Thursday before we leave. I’ll be out of school, so I’ll have plenty of time. Vil said that I could take classes on flying while I’m there and she’s going to make sure I can get back to Austin for my appointments with Doctor Mac,” she assured him.

“I’m, I’m speechless,” he said in shock.

That made quite a few of them laugh. “It’s four different programs, bro, and they said a couple of different types of jet fall into some classes because all their systems are the same. You’ll do each one, one after the other after the other. They said it would take you about one or two weeks to do the first section, that’s for a little jet called a Mustang, because it has the same avionics you have in your plane now, that Garmin system. They said it takes about two to three weeks for the second section for, um, the CJ series, one week for the third section for an encore, then two to three weeks for the last section, which you get to pick for any jet they produce. When you walk out of there, you’ll be qualified to fly, hold on,” she said, taking the brochure from him and looking at the back, “the Mustang, all four models of the CJ series, and the Encore, and you’ll get a chance to learn how to fly a Sovereign, XLS, Citation ten, or a Columbus.”

“And I’ll be there with you,” Jessie said, kissing him on the cheek. “So you won’t be alone.”

“I’m...wow. Just wow. Vil, sis, I’m, I’m...thank you. Thank you so much!” he said, giving her a fierce hug.

“Can I give a gift, or can’t I?” she laughed as she patted him on the back.

“You spoil me too much!”

“You won’t let me spoil you anywhere near as much as you deserve,” she answered. “So I’ll just give you what you want. I know you’ll never take anything you can’t justify in your own mind, so I’ll just be happy with helping you fulfill a lifelong dream. You’ll finally get the chance to fly jets, little brother. They won't be quite the jets you wanted to fly when you were younger, but at least you'll get to fly jets."

"Thank you sis," he said, picking her up off her feet and rocking her back and forth in his arms. "I love you."

"And I love you, Kit," she told him, kissing him on the cheek. "Now put me down, it's entirely improper for the most powerful femme in America to be held in her brother's arms like a kid."

Everyone laughed and applauded as he put her back down. She looked up at him, her eyes a mystery, then she smiled. "So, you're not going to rage over my gift?"

He laughed. "It's a totally useless gesture since I don't have a jet, but you're giving me something I've wanted half my life. Why should I?" he smiled, then he hugged her again.

"That just saved you getting spanked in public," she grinned at him.

He was honestly overwhelmed. Vil was letting him finish a boyhood dream. It probably wasn't cheap at all, but on the other paw, it was something he'd always wanted, and it may even be useful some day. Some of the really small Citations could be flown with a single pilot...maybe some day, when he had money, he could rent one just to fly it. It would be worth the thousand dollars to do it...just once.

Jessie looped her arms around him and kissed him on the cheek. "I'm glad you're happy, my handsome fox," she giggled. "We've been working on it for a month, all of us."

They all gave him a huge grin, and it made Kit laugh. "Well, thanks, everyone. I'm very happy." He reached down and grabbed Vil's paw. "And I believe I owe you something,” he told her.

“Oh? What is that?”

“A ride in my little single engine propeller plane,” he smiled down at her.

She laughed. “I accept!” she said. “But we’ll have to go now, since we have to get back to Cincinnati and Boston tonight.”

“As long as nobody minds that the birthday boy’s bailing on his own party,” Kit laughed.

“Go ahead, handsome fox, you have a promise to keep,” Jessie giggled. “And we’ll just keep going without you.”

“Yah, brah, we won’t even know you’re gone!” Lupe teased.

And so, Kit and Vil took a short ride down to the airport in her limo. Stav and Marcus waited for them in the hangar as Kit helped Vil up onto the wing, and she settled into the copilot’s seat as he did the walk-around. She watched silently as he got in and did the preflight, just paying attention to his actions, and remained quiet as they taxied out towards the runway. “Kit,” she said, adjusting her headset, “I have a question.”

“Well, I’ll do my best to answer,” he said as he turned on the ramp leading to the runway, then held up his paw to Vil as he answered air traffic. “Well, hold that thought until we’re up, sis,” he said.

She was quiet, looking out the window as they took off, and he turned to the southeast and ascended, getting well away from the traffic patterns of the bigger planes. “Alright, now, what was your question?”

She was quiet a moment. “I want you to come to Boston next weekend. Will you do it?”

“That’s going to depend,” he told her honestly. “How long, and why?”

“Kendall is going to come over from London,” she told him. “I want you to meet him.”

“Well, why am I going to Boston? You know how I feel about Boston, Vil. Bring him here.”

“Kit,” she said, then she looked out the window. “When’s the last time you talked to Clancy?”

“Monday,” he answered. “Wait a second. Why didn’t he come with you?”

“Kit, Clancy—“ she said, then she blew out her breath. “Kit, Clancy is getting old.”

Kit gave her a long look.

“He wanted to come with us, but he was just too tired,” she told him. “And he’s really worn down over the last couple of months. I want you to come to Boston to meet Kendall, but I also want you to go see Clancy. He’d really like to see you, and I really think you should.”

He didn’t miss the inference in her voice, before it’s too late. “I’d love to see him, sis, but I will not stay in Stonebrook. Not as long as Zach is in that place. Maybe not even if he wasn’t. It was his house, sis. There’s nothing but bad memories there for me.”

“You can stay in a hotel, bro, that’s not a problem, but I’d really like you to come up. Both you and Jessie. I’ll even send my jet for you.”

Kit was silent a long moment. “I’ll have to ask her, sis. You know what might happen if I bring my wife to Boston, within rifle range of Uncle Zach or Uncle Jake or Aunt Maxine. My pregnant wife, Vil.”

“I’ll keep a leash on the uncles, Kit, I promise. So you’ll come?”

“I’ll ask Jessie. How she answers is how I answer, sis. If she says no, you’ll just have to bring Kendall and Clancy here.”

“Alright, I can live with that,” she said, looking at the cockpit displays. “You know, all those flights I’ve taken in my jets, and I’ve never once sat up front,” she said. “It almost looks like a video game.”

Kit laughed suddenly and earnestly, which made the plane lurch a little since he had his paw on the control stick. “Well, we can’t let you go without playing this one,” he told her. “Grab the stick, Vil. It’s time for your first flying lesson.”

Kit gave Vil the same basic flight lesson as Jessie and let her fly the plane for about ten minutes, even let her do a slow turn to turn them back towards Bergstrom, then let her spend the rest of the flight enjoying seeing flying from the perspective of the pilot. “I wonder what it would be like to fly a plane myself,” she mused, which made Kit laugh again.

“What is it about this plane that makes everyone want a license to fly it?” he asked her with a grin.

“It is nice, bro,” she said. “It’s like riding in a flying Bentley.”

“It probably cost about as much as a Bentley,” he noted. “How much is insurance on this thing anyway?”

“Insurance? Why should I insure it?” she winked. “You own it outright, bro. If you crash it, you don’t need any insurance to pay it off.”

“So, it was too outrageous to be worth it,” he noted.

She laughed. “Just about. You graduated from a very good flight school and have a lot of logged hours, but it was a combination of your age and your lack of logged hours for a long period that the insurance companies didn’t like. They said they’d give me a better rate after you logged some hours again. And unfortunately, about the only furs a Vulpan can’t bully are insurance underwriters.”

“I hope the flight school lets me rate as a solo pilot,” he said. “To be rated to fly a jet solo takes a little more than being rated to fly as part of a crew.”

“I showed them your flight record, and they said you would,” she said. “But just barely. You’ve had your commercial license for years and you have enough logged hours in complex planes, which was what they said was the benchmark. They said you’d earn a rating to fly solo.”

“Thank God,” Kit sighed. “I know I’ll never use it, but if I have the solo rating, the option is always there someday when I save up enough money to rent a jet, just to fly it once.”

“I can take care of that, bro,” she smiled.

He laughed. “And ruin my sense of accomplishment? No. If you do everything for me, when will I ever feel like I managed to do for myself?”

“Don’t sell yourself short, brother mine,” she told him seriously. “I read your magazine, and in the last month, I’ve seen better writing out of your little campus rag than I’ve seen out of Time. You’re doing exactly what you should be doing by trying to expand right now. If you keep your quality as high as it's been, I see Lone Star going statewide within two years. Have you seen your sale numbers for your Austin test market yet?"

He shook his head. "Rick will find out tomorrow morning. I think they'll be very good. This week's issue had the debate coverage in it."

"I think so too," she agreed. "I think Rick's being too conservative, though."

"Well, I can see it from his side, sis. If our test crashed, then the magazine would literally be out of business."

"I wouldn't let that happen, bro. This is an investment. I'd have loaned the magazine the money to recover. And note I said loan, bro, not give. My generosity has limits."

"I'm not sure I like the idea of you coming down here to bail us out," he said seriously. "If there's no fear of failure, there's no dedication to excellence."

"That's a healthy attitude," she said with a nod.

Kit put a finger to his headset as air traffic control called him. "Alright, time to watch and listen, sis, I have to land us."

Marcus and Stav were waiting for them at the hangar as he parked the plane, and one of them helped Vil down as Kit did postflight and locked up. "I really need to update my logbook," Kit laughed. "I still haven't logged the trip to the beach yet, and those logs are how the FAA knows I'm logging hours and how I know when it's time to take my plane in for inspections and maintenance."

“You can do it tomorrow,” Vil said. “We have a party to get back to!”

“True.”

When they got back, the party was still in full swing. Everyone was still out in the courtyard, talking, laughing, listening to music, and mingling...or mingling too much. Sheila was trying to pry Ben away from Hannah, who was watching him like a hawk as he chatted with Muffy, but the real shock was Terry and Allison sitting by themselves over at the furthest table, talking while sitting opposite each other, and with Terry holding Allison’s paws. Terry looked smitten, and Allison was smiling with surprising warmth and earnestness. Kit...wasn’t sure about that. Allison could be honestly interested in his cousin, or she could be fishing for him, using years of practice to lure him into a relationship.

Kit worried about it for a while, until Terry came over to him, his expression a little surprised and bewildered. “Kit, can I talk to you a second?” he asked.

“Sure, pull up a bench,” he said, waving to the empty seat beside him.

“I was talking to Allison.”

“I noticed.”

“I tried to get her to give me her number, and she wouldn’t give it to me.”

Kit’s respect for Allison went up a few notches, as well as his trust in her. She wasn’t fishing for Terry after all. She just liked him.

“What did I do wrong?” he asked earnestly. “She was such a wonderful femme to talk to. She’s smart, she’s funny, she’s interesting. We were having a great talk, and then she just seemed to shut down and walk away.”

“Did you take her paws, or did she offer them to you?”

“I, I don’t know. Maybe both? She didn’t seem to mind. She was squeezing my paws while we were talking. It was really nice to hold them. Her paws were soft.”

Kit wasn’t sure exactly how to approach it, but he did see that Allison hadn’t told Terry, and that meant that he had to protect her secret. It was not his secret to give. “She has her reasons, Terry. Besides, why did you ask for her number? You’ll probably never be back here.”

“I’ll come back if I can get her number,” he said earnestly.

“That’s not really your decision, Terry. If I were you, I’d leave it alone.”

“What? Why?”

“Because you seem to forget, she can get in touch with you. Sheila is her best friend, and I’m here too. You think she can’t get your number if she wants it?”

He was silent a moment, then he chuckled.

“You want my advice? Here it is. Just leave her be. If she’s interested, she’ll call you. If she’s not, she won’t.”

“That’s it?”

“That’s it. Allison is not your average femme, Terry. I think you noticed that.”

“God, did I,” he said fervently.

“Well, take it from me. Someday, when you’re older, you’ll understand.”

“Older? You’re only six months older than me!”

“Yes, and I’ve spent those six months here in Austin, where you live in Boston. You don’t know Allison, cousin. I do. Just trust me.”

“I—well, I guess I will. I’ll leave you my personal cell number, Kit, both for you and for her. But tell her that I really want her to call me. I don’t think I’ve ever met such an interesting femme in my whole life.”

“Oh, she’s definitely that, Terry. You have no idea how interesting she really is.”

And when Terry found out the truth of Allison, he’d be in for a shock. Kit pondered how Terry might react to that, to find out that the brilliant, beautiful Master’s graduate chemist he was dating used to be a stripper and a prostitute. Terry was a hard male to know, and always had been within the family, because he was so intelligent. That intelligence made Terry hard to talk to, hard to understand, because he was very, very complicated, and he was also very...standoffish. Kit guessed that being from Uncle Tom’s family, the black sheep of the Vulpans, and having sisters like Bess and Dahlia, made Terry less willing to circulate in the family. Kit had barely known Terry before he was disowned. The only thing that wasn’t a surprise to the family about Terry was that he had gone through school so fast. Everyone knew he was one of the smartest of all the Vulpans.

He could only guess at how Terry would react, and hope that it didn’t turn into major drama. Allison was just starting to come out of her shell, and if Terry was vicious to her, it might really, really hurt her. But, it was a risk she'd have to take. Allison would have to be honest with him, honest right up front, and let him decide if she was worth the risk.

God help Terry if he did get vicious with Allison. Sheila would take that very personally, and would probably come after Terry like ten kinds of pissed off bitch, seeking vengeance for her friend's injured feelings. Sheila was generally harmless, but she could also be very, very nasty when she was mad.

But, that concern faded after being immersed back into the party. He, Hannah, John, and Jessie sat for a while and talked about the pregnancy, how Jessie was doing, how often her morning sickness struck, then Ben and Jenny joined them. "Ugh, stop talking about pregnancy," Jenny said with a frown.

"You should pay attention, Jennifer, because some day you'll go through the same thing," Hannah told her.

"I hope not," she said quickly.

"Yes, a child having a child would not be a good thing," Kit said mildly. "It would be hard to tell them apart."

Jenny whacked Kit on the shoulder.

Vil came over and put her paw on Kit's shoulder. "Bro, I hate to say it, but I'll have to gather up the air crew and head back. I need to be back in Boston."

"Already?"

"Kit, it's nearly seven," she said with a smile. "Time flies when you're with friends and family, doesn't it?"

“I didn’t realize it was so late,” he said, and looking around proved it. Half of them were already gone. Most of the sorority had gone back, as had Kevin and Sam, and Janet, Barry, Mike, and Lilly had also said their goodbyes.

“Come on, you and Jessie can ride with us to the airport and have the limo bring you back before I release it,” she smiled.

“Sure, that would be nice,” Jessie said. “Lupe! Just leave everything, we’ll come help clean up when we get back!”

“Sure thing, babe!” Lupe called back from the grill, where he was grilling another hot dog while Dan and Mickey were sitting nearby, drinking beer. “We always like help when it comes time to clean up!”

Vil had hired one huge stretch limo for the day, and it was big enough to hold all twelve of them. It was divided into two seating areas, and while Ben, Jenny, Suzy, Muffy, and Corey sat in the middle seats, Kit, Jessie, Vil, and Terry sat in the back with John and Hannah. Stav and Marcus sat up front with the driver. Kit listened as Vil and Terry talked with John and Hannah, just enjoying what little was left of a good day. It had been so nice to have friends and family around, not to have any drama, and see Jessie’s family getting along with what few members of Kit’s family he would allow around them. Muffy was very friendly with Ben and Jenny, and Kit knew that they emailed and called each other. But he was even more glad that Terry had seemed to take well to Jessie’s family as well. He had been kind and respectful to Jessie’s parents, and had been friendly and social to Ben and Jenny...though for Terry, that was a double-edged sword. He was a hard male to get to know, and it wasn’t because he wasn’t friendly. It was because he was so smart, it was hard for furs to relate to him sometimes. He tried to be social, but he just seemed to come across as too introspective and aloof for most furs. But it was still good that he tried. Jenny seemed baffled by him, but he seemed to strike up a friendship with Ben.

They pulled into the airport, and up to the hangar housing Vil's private jet. The modified Bombardier Global 5000 was about five times bigger than any normal private jet, taking up a good piece of the hangar. They all filed out of the limo and hurried up to the jet, and Kit had to go up with them and see what changes she made to accommodate so many passengers. Vil's plane was so big it had enough room in it for a private sleeping area and galley in addition to a luxurious living room-like open area with seats, tables, and even a sectional couch that literally bisected the cabin, with the centerpiece plasma TV mounted into the ceiling so it could be retracted up out of the way when not in use. Vil had had the interior redone, he noticed. The galley was now behind the couch and was an open area, with a bar, little fridge, and cupboard, and the table that had flanked the couch was now in the galley. The couch had been lengthened to nearly bisect the cabin, providing a sense of separation between the galley and living area, with two doors at the opposite sides of the back wall, which was probably the private bedroom and the lavatory. There were four chairs across from the entry hatch now, with little tables between them, and there was a couch along the fuselage near the original couch and coffee table, forming a U of couch seating with a hole in it to reach the galley. The jet was big, big enough to be a commuter airliner, but it was built, designed, and operated almost exclusively for one fur and her passengers. The plane probably cost around fifty million dollars, but that was a drop in the bucket for Vulpan Shipyards, and Vil wasn't the one that ordered it anyway. Their father had been the one that had ordered the jet, but he had died before the shipyard had taken delivery. When Vil became the CEO, she inherited the jet right along with everything else. "Nice," Kit noted as Jessie looked in.

“You had it redesigned,” Kit noted.

“Dad’s design was...just weird,” she said. “He wanted to make it feel like a house, so he split the cabin and put in those seats and that table, then created that narrow companionway between here and the galley with the really small office and stateroom, like closets. I never really liked it, so I had it redone. I left the sectional, had the little office and bedroom ripped out, and put the galley behind this area, then expanded the back of the plane to a stateroom where I put a real bed and a desk.”

“Well, I think it looks nice. Kinda cramped this way, though.”

“I didn’t have enough seating for everyone,” Vil laughed as she came up behind them. “Too much me, not enough we. I’ll have the second couch pulled out when we get back and reduce the seats by the hatch to two to get my roomy feel back. I liked having lots of space up here, not feeling like I was in a plane.”

“Well, you’ll definitely get it,” Kit noted as Avery came out from the cockpit. “Not much room for others, though.”

“This is my plane,” Vil said adamantly. “They can fly in the other one, or they can fly coach.”

Kit laughed.

“It’s good to see you again, Mister Vulpan,” Avery told him, shaking his paw. “Just coming to look, or are you going back to Boston?”

“Just came up to look,” he answered.

“You’re looking radiant, Misses Vulpan. Congratulations on your coming blessing.”

“Aww, thanks, Captain Avery,” Jessie smiled, startling him by giving him a brief hug.

Kit and Jessie moved through them all, saying their goodbyes. “Now you be good to my daughter, Kit,” Hannah ordered as he gave her a hug.

“I will, and I’m sorry we didn’t get more of a chance to talk today.”

“Well, there were plenty here competing for your attention,” she smiled. “And we can talk almost any time, where some of those here don’t have that luxury.”

“I knew there was a reason I liked you, Hannah.”

“Good sense if nothing else.”

He laughed. “That and your towering sense of modesty,” he smiled.

“Oh, go on, you,” she said, lightly swatting him on the rump.

He hugged Vil one more time. “Thanks for a wonderful birthday, sis,” he told her, holding her around her slender waist. “And thanks for the wonderful gift.”

“Well, since you’re being so magnanimous, how would you like a nice house? Two of them, actually,” she said with a light smile. “There’s this nice four bedroom colonial about two blocks from your apartment, but there’s also this very nice six acre lot in a gated luxury community about a half hour from Austin that would be a lovely place to build a house of your own.”

Kit chuckled ruefully. “No, Vil.”

“You can keep saying it, but it’s not going to sway me, bro,” she grinned. “You aren’t a vagabond anymore, and you and Jessie aren’t a young couple anymore. You're going to have a baby. You're going to be a family. And families shouldn't live in apartments. They should live in houses."

"Lots of families live in apartments," Jessie protested. "There's nothing wrong with an apartment!"

"Oh yes there is, young lady," Hannah said authoritatively. "The difference is control. When you own your own house, you own that house. You are not at the mercy of someone else."

"I couldn't have said it better myself, Hannah," Vil said with an approving nod. "You're just one nasty fight with Lupe away from being in a very bad predicament, and you are pregnant, Jessie. I want you two in a house, a nice house where you are secure, a place that is all yours and where nobody can tell you what you can and cannot do."

"Except for you?" Kit asked with a dark look.

"Well naturally except for me," she said with a surprisingly playful smile.

"Let's not ruin this day with a fight now," Kit said quickly. "Let's just agree that we'll fight this battle another day."

Vil laughed. "I'll agree to that, bro," she said, hugging him again. "Happy birthday. I love you."

"I love you too, you little pain in the neck," he answered.

"Hey, no fighting," she teased, then she stood up on her tiptoes and kissed him on the cheek. "We have to go now, bro. I'll call you tomorrow morning."

Kit and Jessie hugged and kissed their way through the plane, and then they hurried out. Vil waved to them from the hatchway, and then Avery closed it. Kit kept his arm around Jessie's waist as they waved to those looking through the windows, who waved back, then they had to retreat so the jet could start its engines and taxi out.

"You think she was serious about the house?" Jessie asked.

"Deadly," he answered. "You don't know her the way I do, pretty kitty. She's starting to dig her claws into us, and she's going to get more and demanding. It will be for our own good, of course, that's how she'll justify all of it. She has it in her head that we should live in a house, and she won't stop until she gets what she wants...or I step on her."

"Well, I like it at the apartment. I mean, it would be nice to own our own house, but I love Lupe and Dan and Mickey, and living close to Sheila, and being close to the sorority."

"And I love not having to mow grass, pay property taxes, live bowed at the throne of a mortgage company, or try to figure out how to fix a leaky sink," Kit said, which made Jessie giggle.

"My poor inept fox," she teased, kissing him on the cheek. "We'll have to enroll you in those do it yourself courses they offer at Home Depot."

"I fight my battles with a keyboard, not a hammer," he said, which made her laugh.

The jet's engines started, and they watched the plane taxi out of the yawing doors. "Well, happy birthday, my handsome fox," Jessie told him, putting her head on his shoulder as they watched Vil's plane taxi out. "I hope you liked your gift."

“Now that I won’t complain about,” he chuckled. “It’s the completion of a boyhood dream. You know what’s going to make it so wonderful?”

“What?”

“You’ll be there with me,” he told her.

“Aww, you’re so sweet.”

“Let’s go home, love. You have school in the morning.”

“And you still have Sheila.”

“Sheila? What about Sheila?”

Jessie gave him a long, serious look.

“Oh, crap,” Kit breathed.

Sheila was indeed waiting for him at home. She gave him a huge grin and moved to grab his arm as he came into the courtyard, but he just pulled away from her. “After we help clean up.”

“Stall all you want, I’ve got plans,” she said eagerly.

Kit, Jessie, and Sheila helped Dan, Mickey, and Lupe clean up. The femmes cleaned up the litter and folded up the tablecloths—Sheila grumbling about doing manual labor the whole time—while the males folded the tables and carried them to the show unit to store back in a bedroom, mainly because Lupe was taking no more tenants while the construction was going on...which made the show unit obsolete and had turned it into a storage space. Dan and Mickey moved the grills back as Kit, Jessie, and Sheila swept up, and then Lupe stored the leftover food in his fridge and the storage unit fridge after splitting it with Dan and Mickey, the other two bachelors. “Well, we won’t be begging for your leftovers for a week, Jessie,” Dan grinned as he carried a large tupperware container of hot dogs towards his apartment.

“My fridge hasn’t recovered from your last visit,” Dan!” Jessie teased in reply.

After everything was cleaned up and restored to normal, Sheila grabbed possessive hold of Kit’s arm. “Don’t wait up for us, Jessie,” Sheila said with a dangerous smile. “In fact, don’t expect to see us until some time next week. It’s time for Kit’s initiation into the Party Pack!” She flipped her phone open and hit a button. “It’s time,” she said into the phone.

Not twenty seconds later, a limo pulled out and stopped in the street. The door opened, and about half of the sorority boiled out; Sandy, the other Jessie, Charlotte, Danielle, Lisa, and three of their new pledges, Shannon, Annette, and Vicky. They were giggling as they rushed up, all of them wearing dance club outfits, and they surrounded Kit. Paws grabbed him and started dragging him to the limo, which made him laugh. “We’ll bring him back to you, Jessie,” Sheila said over her shoulder as she sauntered behind the pack of femmes. “I can’t guarantee he’ll be able to walk straight, though.”

“Don’t you do anything illegal!” Jessie shouted. “And have a good time!”

“I don’t think they’re going to give me a choice in the matter, pretty kitty!” Kit called in reply.

“Damn right you won’t!” Sheila agreed with an evil, ominous laugh as he was physically dragged into the limousine.

Chapter 26

He was going to kill Sheila.

Kit woke up around noon to a dark and empty apartment. Jessie was in school, and Kit was so hung over that his head felt like it was going to explode. Sheila had gotten him so drunk that his memories were fuzzy for about half of last night...but the half that was fuzzy was something he was glad Jessie hadn't seen. She would have absolutely died of mortification...if she didn't haul off and slap Sheila in the face first.

Sheila had outdone herself.

She had taken him to several different clubs, and it was there that she had gotten him drunk, even got him to dance with Danielle and the other Jessie. Once she got him drunk, she took him to an illegal rave, then to illegal street racing, then to an illegal casino out in Bastrop, and then to cap the night, she just had to take him to the Top Hat for the crown of the evening. Sundays were typically femme's night down on the first floor, but while the sorority girls partook of the festivities on the first floor, Sheila had taken him up to the second floor, where he got the only shock big enough to penetrate the haze of alcohol.

Somehow, some way, Sheila had found a cat stripper whose fur was almost the same color as Jessie's, and had the same basic body type. She didn't have a longhaired tail, but she did have the same basic dimensions as Jessie through the bust and hips, and had long blond hair. She looked nothing like Jessie in the face, with much sharper features, but that didn't matter all that much. Sheila had the stripper do a private performance just for him, Sheila giving him a wicked smile when she abandoned him in a small room and the cat came in and gave him a lap dance, and the cat had made it abundantly clear that she had been rented for more than a lap dance, if he was so inclined.

And that was why Sheila was going to die.

Kit was too drunk to pass on the lap dance, but he was nowhere near drunk enough to break his vows to Jessie. The cat had tried very hard to entice him into a one night stand, but he stayed faithful to his wife. And, thankfully, he passed out not long after the cat left the room, which defeated any further attempts Sheila might make to make him stray.

And so, he'd woke up alone around noon, feeling like his head was about to explode. He'd had hangovers before, but never one that severe. He dragged himself to the kitchen and put on water for tea, his paws shaking and his tail quivering, but at least Jessie hadn't had him pour out or give away all of his wine. He used the last bottle to make the Vulpan hangover tonic, which was far more wine than it was honey or tea, but he'd extend the hangover just to take the edge off his splitting headache. He decided he'd rather have a little pain for a while than this kind of pain for a couple of hours.

After his paws stopped shaking like he had palsy, he took very direct action to recover from his hangover. He took an ice cold shower, about four Excedrins, and then rested on the couch until the worst of his headache dulled to a manageable level. He knew that the key to nursing a hangover was alcohol, but alcohol delivered in very small amounts over a long time, allowing his body to slowly descend from the plateau rather than crash hard like it did during a hangover. Besides, the wine also helped buzz off some of the pain, making it more bearable.

He was left alone most of the day, except for one visitor. It was a FedEx driver, who delivered a very large and heavy box. Kit was too tender to care much about what it was, so he put it on the coffee table and left it alone until he felt ready to investigate the matter. Odds were, it was some kind of belated birthday present from someone.

By the time Jessie got home, Kit was recovered enough. She kissed him on the cheek and passed by to put her backpack away, then she came back and sat in his lap, wrapped her arms around him, and gave him a healthy kiss. “Feel better, my handsome fox?” she asked.

“Some. I’m gonna murder Sheila.”

“What did she do?”

“She got me too drunk to care about almost everything else she did,” he said.

She giggled. “Well, let’s hear it. If the cops are gonna break down the door and arrest you, I want to know now,” she grinned. He told her about the night, at least what he could solidly remember, and she gasped when he told her where they went last. “She took the girls there?”

“She surely did. Remember, Sunday is Femme’s night down on the first floor, so no doubt they got to watch a whole bunch of male strippers. I have no doubt they’re hopelessly depraved now,” he noted dryly.

“I’m gonna kill her!” Jessie growled. “She shouldn’t be taking eighteen year old girls there!”

“Jessie, Sheila is eighteen,” Kit noted. “And you have to stand in line to kill Sheila. I get her first.”

“What did she do?”

“She hired one of the Top Hat dancers as a hooker,” he said, a little indignantly. “And had her try to get me to break my vows.”

Jessie gasped, her eyes wide. “She did not!” she gasped, flabbergasted.

“Oh yes she did,” Kit intoned. “And I’m gonna spank her narrow little ass as soon as she saunters over here.”

“I’m not waiting that long!” Jessie snapped, clearly outraged. She jumped to her feet and pushed the sleeves of her sweater up over her elbows, and marched right out the door without another word.

Kit chuckled. Sheila was about to get her come-uppance.

Kit turned his attention to the box on the table and started to open it when the door banged open. A wild-eyed Sheila was slamming the door behind her and pushing against it with her paws. “Kit!” she said in a strangled voice. “Call her off!”

“What?”

“She tried to spank me!” Sheila said as the door started shuddering as Jessie pounded on it. “Call her off!”

“You deserve to be spanked, girl,” Kit accused. “You tried to get me to have an affair!”

“It was just a joke!” she protested. “I know you’d never do it!”

“But you paid a hooker to try!”

“I wanted you to come home and jump Jessie’s bones, goof!” she said, pushing her back against the door as an irate Jessie started banging harder. “Hear that, Jessie? I was trying to get his motor started for you!”

“I’ll show you a started motor, you skinny little bitch!” Jessie shouted, which shocked Kit. He had never heard her curse in public before, only when she was alone with him.

“Jessie!” Kit called. “Calm down, love.”

“Thank you!” Sheila said, but then she yelped when Kit grabbed her arm and yanked her off the door. Jessie barged through it and saw Kit settling back on the couch with Sheila turned over his knee. “Kit! Kit, this isn’t funny!” she protested, and she gasped when he jerked on the back of her shorts, yanking them down and baring her furry butt, then he pulled her tail aside and tucked it under his leg.

“Pretty kitty, shut the door. I don’t think the courtyard needs to see this,” he said mildly.

Jessie grinned and shut the door.

What came next was something Sheila had deserved probably since she was twelve. Kit spanked her, and he did not hold back. Sheila howled and kicked her feet, yowling, crying, even begging, but Kit was implacable. He blistered Sheila’s shapely little backside for a good three minutes, spanking her so hard his paw was stinging.

But finally, he relented. He gave her one more hard whack, just for good measure, then pushed on her side. She scrambled off his lap and yanked her shorts up, then put both her paws on her butt and rubbed vigorously, her tail slashing behind her. “That was not funny!” she shouted.

“Neither was trying to get me in bed with a hooker,” he retorted. “You acted like a brat, so you got what a brat deserves.”

She gave him a hot look, then laughed ruefully. “If you wanted to paw my butt, you should have asked,” she grinned. “You may be a cousin, but what’s a little friendly pawing between cousins?”

“Still being a brat?” Jessie asked threateningly.

Sheila laughed again. “Will you spank me if I say yes?”

“No, Kit hits much harder than me. I’ll let him do it.”

Sheila grinned and rubbed her butt again. “Okay, okay, I’m sorry about the hooker. I thought you’d think it was funny, then get so horny you’d run home and give Jessie a hot nightcap. But you passed out before you could seal the deal,” she complained. “Really, Kit, you used to be able to drink way better than that! You could drink more than that at fifteen!”

“You drank at eleven?” Jessie gasped.

“I’m a Vulpan, and mom never locked the liquor cabinet,” Sheila grinned. “And I was drinking at nine,” she corrected. “So, truce?”

“Only if you never do that again,” Kit said.

“Deal,” she said. “But, did you like the girl I found for you?” she said with a sly smile.

“What?”

“She sent a cat,” Kit said. “And one that had the same color fur as you and was your height and size. I think she thought I might mistake her for you in my drunken haze.”

“Well,” Sheila hummed with a smile, but that smile faded when Jessie growled at her. “I said I won’t do it again!” she said quickly, putting up her paws.

“Kit. Love. I think you didn’t spank her enough,” Jessie said in a low, flinty tone.

“My pretty kitty has spoken,” Kit said, advancing on Sheila inexorably.

Sheila wasn’t a fool She turned and bolted, and managed to get out out the door and run for her life.

“Really!” Jessie fumed, putting her paws on her hips and glaring at the door. “I would never believe she’d do that!”

“I would,” Kit said simply. “You can’t ever forget, love, Sheila is Sheila, and she doesn’t think like a normal fur. There wasn’t a single Vulpan except for my mom and dad that was faithful in the marriage. Her own mom cheats on her dad, and vice versa, and they don’t really hide it from each other. She doesn’t see me having a tryst with a hooker as anything out of the ordinary compared to the rest of the family or as a threat to my marriage, since all the Vulpan cheat on their spouses. It’s almost expected. She doesn’t see it the way we do.”

“She’d better, or I’ll blister her butt!” Jessie declared, her tail slashing in anger. “You’re not going to cheat on me, buster!”

“I know I won’t,” he chuckled, wrapping his arms around her and giving her a light kiss.

“Shew! Godzilla breath,” Jessie giggled, waving her paw between their noses.

“Sorry. I’ll go brush my teeth.”

“I’ll make you some more tea,” she offered. “What’s in the box?”

“No idea, look it over while I’m fixing my Godzilla breath,” he answered.

When he finished brushing his teeth, he came out and saw that she’d opened the box. Inside were stacks of manuals, small software boxes, CD cases, and books. “They’re here already!” Jessie said in surprise, looking at one. Kit saw that each one had a Post-it on it that had either his or Jessie’s names on it, and each one, he realized, was from Cessna. He picked one up and saw that it was the manual for a Citation CJ-2’s avionics system.

“Well, I see Vil’s thorough,” Kit said, picking up another one, and saw that it was Cessna’s proprietary software, named Virtual Cockpit: Citation Mustang, and another that read Virtual Cockpit: Citation Encore. “She had them send the manuals.”

“They sent mine too. See?” she asked with a smile, picking up one of the books labeled for her, which read Cessna Flight Academy: Flight Regulations for Private Pilots.

“Jessie, exactly what did you agree to do with Vil?” he asked.

“I’m getting my pilot’s license,” she grinned. “Vil had them call me, and they told me that if I study these books they send, that I can get my license in as quick as four weeks as long as I can pass the written test. They said if I go really quick, they’ll help me get my twin engine complex plane rating too. The fur I talked to said that the more I study, the less classroom time I have to take, and that gives me more time to get the hours I need to do my practical test. He said if I can get my pilot’s license in three weeks, I'll have enough time to log the hours I need for a multi-engine complex plane rating."

"That is true about getting a license quickly," he said with a nod. "There's no real schedule about it. As long as you pass the written test and have the necessary logged hours, you can take the oral test and check ride any time. And multi and complex ratings, you can get those at the same time on the right plane, you just have to log the hours and take the test."

"So, while you learn how to fly jets, I'm going to get my pilot's license," she told him. "Vil said it was my early birthday present."

"Well, that's what it is," Kit chuckled. "I guess Vil got her way in the end and paid for it anyway. Eh, I won't complain, I guess, if that's what you want."

"I've wanted to fly our plane since the first time you took me up in it!" she said excitedly, putting another book aside on the coffee table. "I told Vil I didn't want to start until after the baby because it would take so long. I mean, you were in flight school for over a year. But then she found out I could get one in a month as long as I don't go for all the same ratings you got, so I went for it. She said I could get the same ratings you have later, after I get my pilot's license. I hope it didn't cost her that much."

"Private training at Cessna itself? I'd say it ran her about fifteen thousand dollars."

"That much?" Jessie said in surprise.

"It's expensive to fly, pretty kitty. I have no doubt that the jet ratings she'd giving me probably cost about fifty thousand total. The last time I saw a hard number for training, it was nine thousand dollars for a two week course for a commercial pilot to rate on a Boeing seven thirty-seven B.”

“Wow,” Jessie said in surprise. “Another one for me. There’s so many,” she said, in a little bit of dismay, looking at the books on the table, all of them with her name on them.

“It won’t be easy, pretty kitty. But if you really want to do it, I’ll help you.”

“I really do,” she said honestly.

“Then I’ll do everything I can to help you. You’ll have to study a lot, but at least I can take you up in our plane and let you see that textbook knowledge in action. That should help you learn it better than if you just memorize stuff.”

“Good, because I want to fly our plane home,” she said with a smile.

“Well, I guess I’ll let you,” he winked.

“You better, silly fox,” she smiled, reaching up and pulling his head down. It made his head throb a bit, but the kiss he got made all the pain melt away.

When they went through the box, Kit was impressed. They had sent Jessie all the books, manuals, and information she needed to study to learn about the fundamentals of flight, airplanes, and flight procedures, they even sent her testing software so she could quiz herself on her knowledge. Kit had been sent the manuals for every jet they were going to teach him to fly, as well as an email address and a letter telling him that he had to choose which of the big jets Kit wanted to learn to fly and email his choice to them tomorrow, so they could send out those materials to him as well. They not only sent books and manuals, they also sent software. They sent software that showed the planes and cockpits in great detail, and there was also test software that would quiz him on the locations of controls and procedures, literally the test software that would test him on the information he would need to know to pass the oral test segment of his check ride evaluation. They even sent a copy of the game Microsoft Flight Simulator 2008 that had add-ons for every Citation jet they produced. The flight simulator software was very faithful to real flight situations, and the add-ons would allow him to simulate flying the jets he was going to learn to fly. It also showed the internal cockpits of the plane in perfect detail, since they'd taken pictures of the real cockpits of the planes to reproduce for the simulator.

They also sent him brochures and website addresses to look over the big jets. There was the Citation XLS, the Citation X, the Citation Sovereign, and even the Citation Columbus, a plane that wasn't even in production yet, but they could rate him to fly on it because they had already had a test plane and were testing it for FAA certification. Once they started certifying the plane, it was standard procedure to train pilots to fly it for when it was in production, that way there were pilots out there that could fly the plane. Kit looked over each plane, but it took him all of three minutes to choose, once he looked at the Citation X. Now that the Concorde was retired, the X was the fastest civilian aircraft in the sky, capable of cruising at Mach .92, over five hundred miles an hour, and had transcontinental range. He could fly from Boston to London, New York to Los Angeles, or Los Angeles to Hawaii in a Citation X, without having to land to refuel. The X was a dual-pilot jet, not single pilot rated, but none of the big jets were. If he was going to learn how to fly a jet, he was going to learn how to fly the fastest one he could legally fly.

He sent off the email informing them he chose the Citation X, then went back to the material, preparing to sort it so he could draw up a study plan, both for himself and for Jessie.

The office was quiet when he came in on Tuesday, and when he went to go see Rick, he found out why. Rick showed him the spreadsheet showing sale figures over the weekend, and they weren't as good as the first test had been. In fact, they weren't very good at all. The magazine would be pretty solidly in the red for the week.

It had dismayed some in the office and made Rick nervous, but Kit studied the figures carefully. What he saw wasn't the bottom line showing that the magazine had lost six thousand dollars that week, he instead saw that every single new sale site had sold some magazines. Only two sites only sold one or two, the rest had sold at least five. What he saw was that furs had bought the magazines, but had not bought enough to put the magazine in the black. To Kit, that was more important than the scary figure at the bottom of the page.

Rick shared his cautiously optimistic appraisal after Kit read the figures. "I see that we sold throughout the metro area, but not in high numbers."

"We can just cut back on units to the Austin market next week," Kit said. "We'll put more out where we did well, less out where we didn't."

"Well, we didn't sell out at any location, and our sales always drop off past Monday at College Station and San Antonio. So I don't see us selling many more magazines."

“Well, we just adjust, Rick. You know how this works.”

“I know, but I can’t feel really nervous about it,” he said with a nod. “We’re gambling with everyone’s future here. Yours, mine, everyone who works for us.”

“Well, we’ll make it,” Kit said. “We should advertise.”

“Advertise? Where?”

“On the campus radio station, for one,” Kit answered. “Maybe a few radio stations around town too. Advertising works, Rick that’s why our advertisers pay us money to run their ads. We need to do the same.”

“That’s not cheap, son. I don’t see how we can pay for it.”

“I know it’s not cheap, Rick. And I’m willing to invest in the advertising, because I know it’s going to work.”

“Son, I can’t keep letting you sink all your money in the magazine. You might lose everything!”

“It’s my money to spend, Rick, and I won’t lose everything,” he said mildly. “In fact, I’ll have more cash to invest very soon.”

“Another CD is maturing?”

He shook his head. “No, the second quarter ends today,” he answered. “Tomorrow’s the first of April. That means that tomorrow the dividend checks get sent out for my stock investments. So, find out how much it’ll cost to have a radio spot produced, and we’ll talk about it.”

“Kit, it might cost fifteen thousand dollars for the spot and for radio airtime.”

“If it increases circulation, it’s worth it,” Kit shrugged. “I’m willing to pay the money, Rick, because I believe in the magazine. Besides, I kinda owe it to you, since I’ll be gone for six weeks.”

Rick chuckled. “You’re not taking a vacation,” he smiled, then turned a little in his wheelchair. “But I’ll look into it.”

“Works for me. Well, let me get to work,” he said, standing up.

That night, Jessie got her first taste of what she’d have to do to get her pilot’s license. Study. Lots and lots and lots of study. Kit made her do her homework and her study for her classes first, then she spent nearly two hours with the first book in the series she had to study. Kit also started studying, at least after he installed all the software they sent on the laptops. It made for a quiet evening in the Vulpan household, quiet and serious.

“You make this look so easy,” she accused as she turned the page.

“I’ve had lots of practice,” he answered lightly. “I have over a thousand hours logged, love. Back when I was in college, before the accident, I was logging fifteen to twenty hours a week flying either solo or as the pilot in command, which is what really matters. I was getting an hour in every day after class and about five hours a day on the weekends, most of it in that old Beech the flight school had,” he chuckled. “It was the only time Vil ever complained about how much money I was costing her,” he laughed. “Renting a plane to log hours isn’t cheap. Guess I shouldn’t complain about flying that old beast, it let me log the hours that will let me get my solo jet rating. A beech is a twin engine complex plane,” he explained, “meaning that it has systems like retractable landing gear and anti-icing systems and such, things you don’t find on single engine private planes. You have to be rated for those to fly a jet. Anyway, I put in eight hundred hours in that thing in a year. God, did I piss off the other students,” he laughed. “I always had it. They always had to fight me for it.”

“So, after I get my license, I need to get a twin engine and complex to fly a jet?”

“A lot more than that. You need instrument rating and authorizations for high altitude flight training. You’ll get both if you go for your commercial license, so that’s the way you should go. A commercial opens many more doors than other ratings, and it trains you to be a real pilot. Any pilot serious about flying should get a commercial.”

“Then I guess that’s what I’ll do,” she smiled at him.

After she studied, he quizzed her on what she learned as they cooked dinner, then they went down to the airport so they could talk about what she’d learned in the hangar with their plane, so he could show her, since her first lesson was about basic flight controls and surfaces. A couple of the mechanics wandered over while they talked, as he pointed out the rudder and grilled her on what she’d learned about yaw, as did one of Avia’s pilots. “Teaching her to fly?” the bobcat asked curiously.

“I just started today,” she answered.

“Congratulations! You’ll love it,” he smiled.

“Hey, if you need to show her more complicated cockpits, feel free to take a peek in the other planes in the hangar,” one of the mechanics added. “Just warn us, and don’t touch nothin’ inside,” he winked.

“That’s very nice, thanks,” Jessie smiled in return.

And that was Jessie's first lesson in flying. She learned all about flight controls, the three axes of movement, and how they affected a plane. It was her first step down a long path.

Without a debate or anything earth-shaking, their issue that week was what they'd call normal, maybe even boring, but they were introducing new features, Mike and Denise's, this week was the first week that Missy and Cutler would be its own, stand-alone strip, and it was also the first week where Janet's photography was going to be in the issue. And Janet was a damn good photographer. Mike and Lilly were good, but Janet had a touch, an eye, that made her photographs exceptional. They had also included the reader-supplied photo gallery and 15 Minutes of Fame features, and Janet had included a few of her artistic shots in the issue as part of the photo gallery to give the first photo feature some special style.

Kit, Rick, Savid, and Mike had had a meeting about circulation, and they decided—reluctantly—to print the same number of issues this week as last week and adjust distribution, sending more to good locations and less to poor ones. Rick had been hesitant to do it, but Kit insisted, and it was Kit's investment money that was paying their paychecks that week. Kit knew that they were going to lose money for a while, but the constant exposure and potential radio advertising was going to increase circulation in the long run, so it was money worth spending.

Kit and Rick were discussing radio spots with Savid and Mike when Jessie rushed into the office, breathing hard. "Kit!" she said urgently. "Kit, look at this! There has to be a mistake somewhere!"

"What's wrong, pretty kitty?" he asked as she held out a bank slip.

“You should take it to your office, son, I don’t think we want to listen to you two fight over money,” Rick smiled.

“Furs in wheelchairs can’t run very fast, Rick,” Kit teased, but he did follow Jessie back to his office.

In his office, she gave him the bank statement. “I went to go withdraw some money for groceries, and they gave me a statement that has balances for both accounts on it. Kit, look at the money market account!”

He did so, and saw that it had $38,382.25 in it, which was about $32,000 more than it should have. Kit thought about it a moment as Jessie looked nervous and frantic, then he realized that it was April 3, and the Vulpan stocks would have disbursed their dividends by now. “I think I know what it is, hold on, love,” he said, picking up his phone off the desk and speed-dialing Vil.

“Hey bro, what’s up?”

“Vil, have dividends been sent out?”

“Yeah, this morning,” she answered. “Did you not get yours? I had it set to direct deposit to your market account.”

“We did, but we haven’t got the statement yet, so it just showed up in the bank without warning.”

“Oh. Well, we were down a little this quarter because of some charges we had to write off over a Navy contract, but we should be back up to normal next quarter.”

“Well, that explains it. Thanks, sis.”

“Remember, Friday, as soon as you get out of work,” she told him. “The jet will be there waiting. You can sleep on the way up.”

“We’ll be there,” he promised.

“Gotta go. Love ya, bro.”

“I love you too. Bye.”

“Bye-bye.”

“It’s legit, love,” he said, putting the phone down. “That’s our dividend from our Vulpan stocks.”

“Thirty thousand dollars?” she gasped.

“Closer two thirty-two,” he said calmly. “That’s about what I expected, more or less.”

“I didn’t realize it would be so much money!” she said in surprise, her eyes wide.

“Well, that money is going to help,” Kit said. “I’m thinking of using it to invest in the magazine, if you don’t mind.”

“Well, I guess not, I think. What if you spend it all?”

“Love, we’ll get another check about that big every three months,” he told her. “The dividends are paid out every quarter. Mind that we have to save some of it to pay our taxes next April, but outside of that, this is the ‘guaranteed income for life’ I was talking about, pretty kitty. I thought I told you it’d be about eleven dollars a share or so, that’s about where the dividend pays out from quarter to quarter.”

“I think you did, but I wasn’t expecting thirty thousand! I thought it would be like three!”

“I think you were thinking of just the stock from one company,” he said. “We own a thousand shares of three companies, love. The dividends are different for each company, but they average out to about eleven dollars a share between all three.”

“Oh. Ohhh, okay!” she said, then she laughed. “Well, our babies are definitely going to Harvard!”

“We won’t start investing the dividends off the Vulpan stocks just yet, if you don’t mind, love,” he said. “I want to invest in the magazine. If we put some money into the magazine, it’s going to really take off. But to warn you, it’ll take time and money.”

“Well, if we’re getting this much every three months, I guess that wouldn’t hurt. After all, if the magazine does well, we earn more money in the long run, and so does everyone else.”

“Exactly,” he smiled, giving her a quick hug. “Thank you, pretty kitty.”

“Just don’t go crazy, handsome fox,” she winked. “I don’t want to try to buy lunch at school and find out my debit card is rejected.”

“I won’t bankrupt us. I’ll make sure we can at least buy enough ramen noodles to last us until July,” he grinned, which made her laugh and kiss him on the muzzle.

“You make me eat Ramen noodles for three months, and I might give birth to a panda,” she warned, which made him almost fall over laughing.

It took some wrangling, but Rick finally caved in on the radio spot. Kit wrote a check for $2750 for a professional radio commercial, actually three of them, in 60, 45, and 30 second intervals. After they had the professional commercial, Rick shopped around for airtime. It was frightfully expensive, but Rick advertised the magazine on a rock station and the pop station Jessie liked to listen to for 3 weeks, buying 6 commercial slots, 2 of them in the 18-34 prime time listening block, which was the most expensive. Kit wrote a check for nearly $6000 for the air time, but Kit saw it as a wise investment. The radio spots were in the spirit of the magazine, being both sophisticated and irreverent at the same time, and Kit had laughed out loud when he heard them. All three spots made sure to make note that School Daze could be found within.

The strip. Kit could see friction coming on the horizon over School Daze. It was highly successful, so successful that the magazine has been receiving requests for them to syndicate it from the Austin American-Statesman. Rick planned to do that starting in June, after they'd printed 100 strips in the magazine, but what he didn't see was that Jeffrey was really earning a name for himself as a talented artist, and that Jeffrey might be the first member of the crew to leave the magazine and strike out on his own. Kit was fairly sure that a big reason he was still here was because School Daze was not his alone. Kit was was the co-creator of the strip, and they owned it jointly...and they owned it. It did not belong to the magazine, it belonged to Jeffrey and Kit. The magazine had rights to print the strip, but the strip was not the magazine's. It was a dilemma for Jeffrey, for he could not do the strip alone, yet Kit was entrenching himself more and more into the magazine every week by investing his own money into it.

It wasn't that Jeffrey was unhappy at the magazine. He loved it there, he loved the gang, and leaving would hurt him. But he was young, and he saw a potential to really make a name for himself in the world of artists, and that wasn't easy at the magazine. Of all the workers at the magazine, he had the greatest potential to earn more money elsewhere, and that potential went up every week as his work was noticed more and more. He didn't have enough space to be creative here, not with the duties he had to the magazine, and the lure to leave, earn more money, and have more freedom, was strong. He needed room to create, to work on his own projects. That was why Kit felt that the next hire they made was another artist, to help Jeffrey and give him more room to work on his own projects. If they didn't, they might lose him.

Kit had a long talk about it with Rick after the wrap meeting on Thursday. He made sure to stress that Jeffrey hadn't said he wanted to leave, but he also put the situation out for Rick in terms that made it hard to ignore. "We need to give him space and time to do his own work," Kit said. "He's young and talented, and if we don't give him what he needs, we'll lose him. Besides, if you think about it, if we give him that space, we'll get first shot at anything new he does," he added.

"True," Rick said. "I was going to hire another artist, we talked about that when you bought into the magazine, but I wasn't ready to do it because we're in the red as it is from expansion."

"We don't have to hire now, but we should tell Jeffrey that we are, so he knows we're thinking of him."

"Yeah. We should." He reached over to his phone and punched up Jeffrey's intercom. "Jeffrey, come see me before you head out, okay?"

“Sure thing,” he answered.

The mouse came in and sat down with them, and Rick explained what they were planning to do. “We know that you’re more limited here with us than you could be trying to freelance, Jeffrey, so what we were looking to do was bring in an assistant to help you with the simpler work around here and give you more time to pursue some of your freelance work,” he said. “You’ll still be full time, you’ll get a promotion and title of lead artist, and you’ll still get your full paycheck,” Rick smiled, “but you’d have more time to work for yourself. We don’t want to lose you, so we’re willing to give you what you need to make you stay.”

Jeffrey gave Rick a startled stare, then laughed. “Wow, Rick, I’m, I’m speechless,” he said. “It’s really cool that you’re thinking of me and my career, and I have to admit, I’ve been wondering if I could make it freelancing.”

“Well, when we hire you an assistant, you can freelance on top of getting your steady paycheck from here,” Rick smiled. “And just to tell you, I’m going to let you start syndicating the strip when you’ve printed your hundredth strip in the magazine. Once you get to a hundred, I’ll relinquish reprint rights to you two, and you can contract to whoever you want to syndicate the strip so long as you always run your newest strips in the magazine first.”

“The strips would have never taken off without the magazine, Rick. As far as I’m concerned, the magazine will always be the home of School Daze.”

“I’m glad you feel that way,” Kit laughed. “I do own half the strip.”

“It wouldn’t have ever made it without you and Jessie, Kit.”

“Now, mind that we can’t hire an assistant right now, but as soon as we shake out the bugs of this attempt to expand, I’m going to hire your assistant, a research assistant for Kit, and a writing assistant for Barry and the others, and also give all you guys a raise. But hiring you an assistant will get priority, son, because you’re very important to us and we don’t want to lose you.”

“You’re offering me a raise to cut my hours and do my own work, Rick...I’d be an idiot to quit this job!” Jeffrey said honestly.

“I’m glad you see it that way,” Rick grinned.

Kit was not looking forward to this.

He and Jessie were being led to Vil’s private jet on a dark, rainy night. Kit was going to do his Saturday work on the plane and at Boston, so he had Saturday and Sunday to go to Boston.

Boston. Vil kept trying to drag him there, but she just wouldn’t, or couldn’t, get it through her head that it wasn’t just a city to him. It was a black pit of nightmarish memories and terrifying sensations. He was sure he’d either nearly faint or go into some kind of maniacal rage when they went past the grove of trees along the private drive and saw Stonebrook in its stark tan granite glory, sitting on the top of its gentle hill and with all the smaller buildings and garage behind it. She didn’t understand that there wasn’t just heartache tied up in Boston for him, but fear, almost overwhelming fear. She hadn’t tried to live on those unfriendly streets in those first two weeks after he walked out, she couldn’t fathom what kind of abject terror he experienced that first night, when he had nowhere to go, absolutely no idea where he could go, what he could do, walking the nine miles from Stonebrook to the outskirts of Boston in the freezing cold with no coat and no shoes. She didn't know that he'd nearly died that day, that a policeman had seen him stumbling along in the snow by a road and had taken him to a clinic to have him checked out, a clinic that kept him over because he had hypothermia. Boston wasn't a place to him, it was hell. It was the hell he endured after he walked out, and the hell his father put him through after he had managed to survive those first two months and tried to set himself up some kind of passable life. Vil thought that all he had to do was go back to Boston and stay a while, maybe have a little fun, build good memories to cover over the bad, and his aversion to the city would fade away, but she was wrong. It never would. Boston would forever feel like a hostile, ominous place to him, a place where he had shed blood and descended from the life of propriety and culture he had known to being beaten by street thugs and stealing from convenience stores because he was so hungry he was willing to risk going to jail just to get something to eat. Boston would never feel like any place other than a place from which he had to escape.

The only reason he had agreed to this was because Jessie would be with him. He held her paw, almost painfully tight, as they sat down in the plane, which Vil had had converted back to her spacious private area after his birthday. The chairs up front were gone except for two, the two Marcus and Stav probably used, with her couch and galley remaining. Jessie patted him on the shoulder, then cuddled up with him after the pilots went into the cockpit and closed the door. Kit was too nervous to talk to them, and Jessie could sense it, so she cuddled with him a moment, then pushed him down so he could lay with his head in her lap. He tried to relax as she played with his hair and ears, clutching hold of her glorious longhaired tail and holding it close to his chest. She knew how nervous he was about this, and bless her, she was doing whatever she could to comfort him, bolster him so he could get through it.

He laid there as the plane taxied and took off, until the plane had leveled out for the four hour flight to Boston, laid in silence, until he sighed and patted Jessie on the knee. "I love you, pretty kitty," he told her.

"I'm so glad, because I love you too, my handsome fox," she said gently, running her paw across his shoulders, then slid it down towards the one part of his body that always attracted her paws, the scars on his back.

"Six months to go, pretty kitty, six months."

"Actually, I think we can call it five months and three weeks to go now," she said with a little giggle, leaning down on one paw. She squeaked slightly when the plane hit a little minor turbulence.

"We're about to pass through some upper-level turbulence caused by that storm front," Avery called over the intercom. "So please either keep seated or walk carefully for the next five minutes or so."

They passed through some minor turbulence for about five minutes, and Jessie distracted him by asking him to explain turbulence and how it affected flying. He lay with his head in her lap, looking up at her as she smiled down at him, and did so, and branching off into general knowledge about weather she would be expected to know as a pilot. After nearly twenty minutes of just gabbing away, he stopped, gave her a rueful look, then laughed. "Such a wonderful femme," he smiled, reaching over his head and patting her on the leg he was using as a pillow.

"I know how to keep your mind occupied," she winked. "Now explain what warns me I'm about to stall."

“Ah, so we’re going over last night’s subject?”

“Well, why not?” she smiled.

“Well, I guess we should get today’s study done. I’m still trying to learn the characteristics of the Mustang.”

Instead of sleeping, they spent the entire flight in quiet study. Jessie was moving along in her studies, still studying the basics of the mechanics of flight. As soon as she finished that subject, she’d start memorizing flight regulations, and then she’d go on the mathematical part of it; navigation, fuel consumption rates, and converting a gallons per hour number and fuel remaining indicator to a distance a plane could fly before it violated its reserves. Kit spent that time poring over the flight manual and checklists for a Citation Mustang, the first plane he was slated to learn to fly when they got to Kansas. The Mustang also used the Garmin 1000 navigation system, so at least that much he did not have to study. He’d been using Garmins most of his piloting career. He’d be studying a new avionics system when he started studying for the other models; only the Mustang used the Garmin G1000 avionics suite. The CJ series, Encore, and X all used different avionics suites, though Cessna worked very hard to make each Citation cockpit feel similar. A CJ may use different avionics than an Encore, but Cessna worked hard to keep all the buttons, switches, and indicators in the same place as much as possible. So, if he wanted to check the status of his landing gear in a Mustang, he’d look in the same place when he was behind the controls of an Encore.

“You know, I should just get my flight instructor rating,” Kit chuckled when she asked him a question. “I’ll have to look into it. You can get your private at Cessna, and I can teach you to get your instrument rating and whatever else you want. It would be a hell of a lot cheaper for me to get my instructor rating than it would be for you to go to school for the ratings you want.”

“You said it takes a while.”

“About two months,” he said, waving a paw back and forth. “Give or take. I can pass all the flying parts, but I’d have to take the classes in learning how to teach.”

“Well, I can help you there, I am in school to be an English teacher,” she winked at him.

He laughed. “I guess you could at that. Well, I’m going to be your first student.”

“I should make a dunce cap,” she said lightly.

“I get to indulge in the hot English professor fantasy,” he grinned in reply.

She laughed. “Well, I’ll know how to punish you for poor performance,” she teased. “I’ll sleep on the couch!”

“Mean kitty,” he accused, then he felt the plane start to descend.

Kit’s anxiety returned when they were on the ground. It was a cold night in Boston despite it being April, since spring came late that far north, and they were bundled quickly from the jet to a waiting limo. Stav was waiting at the door of the limo, holding it open for them, and after they were inside, he supervised as the ground crew moved their single suitcase into the trunk. Kit’s paws were literally shaking as Stav got into the driver’s seat of the small limo and put on his seat belt. “How have you been, Mister Stav?” Jessie asked.

“I’ve been well, and you may just call me Stav, if you please,” he answered as he pulled away from the plane, towards a road that led off the flight line. “Miss Vil has put you up in the Liberty tonight and tomorrow, in the Presidential suite.”

“Naturally,” Kit sighed. “Why couldn’t she just put us in a Holiday Inn somewhere?”

“I believe she’d see that as a scandal, Mister Vulpan. This is Boston. Can you imagine what the gossip pages would say if a Vulpan stayed in the Holiday Inn, no matter which Vulpan it was? Remember, we are back where appearances matter.”

Kit sighed and nodded.

“I take it this Liberty is a fancy hotel?”

“It was just remodelled last year, Miss Jessica, and it’s one of the most luxurious hotels in the city. I believe it’s Miss Vil’s favorite because of its appearance.”

“Ooh, so it’s going to be like Vil’s vacation home in the keys?”

“Not quite, but expect the same luxury,” Kit said with a snort. “I’m glad it’s two in the morning, at least we’ll avoid any papparazi. I know they’ll be frothing at the mouth to get pictures of us if they find out I’m here. Kit Vulpan and his interspecies wife sneaking into Boston,” he grunted, holding his paws up as if to frame a headline.

“Kit,” Jessie protested.

“I’m just saying it how they will, love,” he told her, putting his paw on her arm fondly. “I happen to like the fact that you’re a cat. It would be kinda strange for me to call you pretty kitty if you were a raccoon.”

She gave him a look, then laughed helplessly.

The Liberty was built out of an old jail built back in the mid-1800's, but had been converted into a luxury hotel. The hotel had been built around the jail but maintained the original jail as its core, so the towering hotel was built of the granite famous in New England, granite just slightly darker than the granite from which Stonebrook was built. It was beside a large hospital and beside a long strip of grass and forest park called the Esplanade, on Beacon Hill, which was a promontory between the Charles River and the back bay. A bellboy took their suitcase and overnight that held their laptops, and then a smartly dressed clerk gave them their key as Jessie gawked at the nearly 100 foot high ceiling of the hotel lobby, which had originally been the atrium of the prison. “Miss Vulpan has already paid for your room and any and all meals or room service you may require, and will cover all gratuities. So, please don't feel that you need to tip any staff member, Mister Vulpan, unless you are particularly impressed by their service,” the clerk told him. “She also reminds you that she will be here to pick you up at eleven o'clock in the morning. Shall I arrange a wake-up call for you?”

“Please, around ten,” he nodded as he took the two keys that were on a small, ornate ring. “What's the smaller key for?”

“Each room has its own private safe. The key is for that safe, Mister Vulpan,” the clerk replied.

“Ah. Thank you.”

“You can reach our concierge counter by dialing zero from any hotel phone. Would you like a light meal sent up before you retire?”

“We ate on the plane, but thank you,” Jessie answered him.

“The steward will see you to your room, Mister Vulpan, Misses Vulpan. I hope you enjoy your stay with us.”

“Thanks. Have a good night.”

“You too, Mister Vulpan,” the male fox said with a nod.

The Presidential suite was suitably stupendous for a luxury hotel, and was so exclusive that Kit had to use a specific elevator to reach it, the only elevator that went to the penthouse. It took up the entire top floor of the building, and was like a luxury apartment. Every room was richly appointed in 1800s style furniture in dark, richly varnished colors, and the huge windows offered views of all four directions of Boston. The bedroom’s windows overlooked the Charles River...and seven or so miles upriver, on a hill overlooking the river, was Stonebrook Manor.

“Wow!” Jessie said in wonder as she looked out the window, then she went into the kitchen. “The fridge is full of food!” she called. “And there’s a bar, and a bowl of fruit!”

“You keep gawking, I’m going to bed. I hope this mattress doesn’t kill me,” he said, sitting tentatively on the bed and testing it. It felt soft, but there was a firmness under it that made him hopeful.

She hurried back into the bedroom and started undressing. “I’m not letting you sleep alone, silly fox,” she smiled. “You’d be a nervous wreck in the morning.”

“Amen to that,” he said.

After they were both undressed, Jessie slid into bed beside him and wormed her way into his arms, putting him on his back as she kissed him tenderly. “Well, hello there, Mister Vulpan, fancy meeting you here,” she said with a gentle whisper.

“You just keep following me around, Misses Vulpan,” he smiled in reply, sliding his paws up her back.

“For the rest of eternity,” she giggled, rubbing her nose against his. “Now let’s get some sleep. Tomorrow will be a long day.”

It may be a long day, but it started earlier than it was supposed to start.

Kit had gotten up to use the bathroom around nine, and sat on the edge of the bed, his paws on the small of his back. The bed wasn’t bad, leaving him only with a slight twinge in his back, much better than borrowed beds usually treated him. Jessie put her paw on his lower back, then grabbed the base of his tail and squeezed it lightly. “Morning, my handsome fox,” she called, and she used that grip on him to pull him away from the edge. He laughed and scooted back on the bed, until she sat up and wrapped her arms around him and kissed him on the side of his neck. “How’s your back?”

“Not bad,” he answered. “But I might be open to you trying to sprain it,” he said huskily.

She laughed. “Well, let’s get started on some of those good memories Vil wants you to take from Boston,” she purred in his ear, then pulled him backwards back down onto the bed.

After a very enjoyable two hours, the phone by the bed rang, as Jessie sat on the edge of the bed with her towel in her lap, and her just-dried fur being brushed out. Kit had just stepped out of the dryer they had installed in the luxuriant bathroom, with its huge shower, jacuzzi tub, and an alcove holding a full body dryer that even had a seat in it for someone too lazy to stand in the airstream. Jessie reached over and picked up the phone, then hung it up after saying good morning to whoever was on the other side. “I guess this is the real deal, it wasn’t a recording, it was a real fur,” she giggled as she pulled a comb through her tail, which she had in her lap. Kit sat down beside her, then leaned over and kissed her on the side of her short muzzle. “Kit, we’re supposed to be up and getting ready,” she said, but she started purring when Kit put his paw on her bare breast.

“I’m gonna be so jealous of our baby when he takes possession of these,” he said thickly in her ear.

“I’m sure she will give them back to you when she’s done,” Jessie said with a sly little smile and a sideways wink at him.

“Well, I see we’re going to have our first major fight,” Kit laughed. “I say it’s a he.”

“And I know it’s a she,” she answered.

“We won’t know until the ultrasound,” he protested.

“I’ll bet ya,” she grinned.

“Oho, you wanna bet, do you? Fine, I’ll bet you two weeks of doing dishes it’s a boy.”

“Such wussy little terms,” she giggled. “Oh no, it’s gonna cost ya, handsome fox. I’ll bet you a month of daily foot massages and weekly pedicures it’s a girl.”

“Such high stakes,” he said with mock seriousness. “And if I win?”

“You’re not,” she winked. “But if some miracle does occur and you win, I do the dishes for a month.”

“You’re on,” he said. They shook paws professionally, then she laughed when he put his arm around her and nibbled playfully on her cheek and ear. “I’d give you foot massages no matter what, you silly kitty,” he teased as she squirmed in his arms.

“And I’d have done the dishes. But I think you’re gonna look so cute painting my toe claws, and blowing on them for me,” she teased.

“You’re gonna look funny with waterlogged pads, cause I’ll make sure I dirty every single dish we have every time I cook.”

“Cheater,” she accused with a grin, then she started purring when ran his fingers through her hair between her ears. “I wonder how long it’ll be after I deliver before I’m ready to make love again,” she mused in a throaty purr. “I’m sure I’m going to be sore down there for a while.”

“I can wait as long as you need me to, love,” he told her, putting his paw on her flat belly. “Five months and three weeks, my pretty kitty.”

“I’ll be getting fat soon,” she complained. “Doctor Mac says I’ll start to show at the end of this month. I’ll start showing a baby bump, and then I balloon up like a whale,” she frowned.

“Such a vain little kitty,” Kit laughed.

“How am I going to keep my husband’s eyes on me when I’m fat and Allison is running around with her supermodel body?” she asked sourly.

He laughed. “Jealous, jealous, jealous,” he accused. “But that just makes me love you more. It shows me you love me.”

“Of course I love you, you silly male,” she told him with a bright smile.

“Well, at least the morning sickness hasn’t bothered you for a few days. Maybe you’re over it.”

“God I hope so,” she said explosively. “It’s really annoying wondering if you’re gonna throw up every time you eat something, or lay down.”

“Let me do that for you,” he said, taking the comb from her.

“You’re just looking for an excuse to paw my butt,” she giggled as he pulled her tail into his lap.

“Do I need an excuse?” he challenged, reaching behind her and goosing her, which made her squeak and flinch. “If I want to paw your butt, Misses Vulpan, I’ll just grab it! I own that cute little butt!”

“Hey, don’t bruise me!” she protested with a grin when he goosed her again, then again, and she jumped off the bed with a squeal and a laugh when his pinching fingers chased her posterior. Kit laughed, at least until she reached down and picked up one of the large down-filled pillows and cocked it back threateningly, then he put his paws up defensively.

“Now behave, you, or you’re gonna find out what Boston goose feathers taste like!”

“I give, I give!” Kit laughed.

“Good. Now, you have a job to do,” she said, turning around and presenting her longhaired tail to him, pointing at it imperiously.

“Yes, I believe I do,” he said lightly, reaching over and pinching her backside one last, fatal time.

The beating lasted about five minutes. Kit laughed the whole time, until he was in the usual position, on his stomach on the bed with his arms protecting his head, and Jessie straddling his legs to hold them down as she smacked him with the pillow. “Now behave, you little rat, or I’m gonna start putting horeshoes in the pillows,” she said in his ear after she put the pillow aside when he surrendered.

“But it’s more fun to be naughty,” he protested with a chuckle.

The phone rang again, and Jessie reached over and picked it up, flopping down to lay on top of him. “Hello? Hi Vil!” she said happily. “Oh, just beating up your brother, he was being a little jerk again,” she said casually, which made Kit laugh. “Umm, can you give us a few minutes? We’re kinda not decent,” she said shyly. “Okay, that’s fine. I’ll go unlock the door for you. Okay, bye-bye.” She hung up the phone. “Vil’s down in the lobby. She’s gonna wait in the living room while we get dressed.”

She moved to get up, but Kit grabbed her by the paw. “Aaat, where’s my kiss?” he demanded. She laughed and attended to the matter, kissing him playfully on the muzzle, then she slid off of him and picked up a robe, pulling it over her shoulders as she scurried out into the next room.

Typical for her, Kit mused with a loving smile. She wasn’t home, so she wouldn’t leave the bedroom without something on.

Kit pulled on his underwear as she went out to unlock the door, and was pulling on his jeans when she got back. “You need to comb your tail, love, it looks like a haystack,” she noted as she took off the robe and went for the bra and panties she’d laid out on the dresser.

“I know,” he nodded as she stepped into her panties and pulled them up, snuggling the back up against the base of her tail. Jessie didn’t like closed-tailhole panties, because her tail was longhaired and it really messed up her fur trying to thread her tail through the hole, the same problem Kit had with his bushy tail and closed-hole underwear. Nor did she like strap-backed panties, which usually either had a button, snaps, eyes and hooks like a bra, or velcro on a strap going over the tail. She preferred low-backed panties that relied on a femme’s hips to keep from slipping. Then again, the recent popularity of the low-back was one of the reasons hip-hugger jeans came back into fashion, since low-back panties were naturally low on the hips to begin with. Before low-backs, femmes either had strap panties or those old beasts that buttoned in the back, which tended to pinch the tail. Males didn’t have it much easier, since low-backs weren’t very popular. Most males wore holed undies, no buttons or openings, just a hole in the back through which he would thread his tail. Kit’s bushy tail made those impractical, so he’d worn snap-strap briefs most of his life, at least up until last year, when he wore whatever he could afford. The cheapest style of male underwear out there were hook-strap briefs, using the same eye and hook as a femme’s bra, and he’d kind of gotten used to them, despite them being uncomfortable. He’s only just started buying something different, he’d bought some Hanes super-thin velcro strap-back briefs, where the cloth-backed soft velcro had an overlaying flap of soft cotton to keep the velcro from snagging fur.

“Where are you repealing indecent exposure laws,” Kit sighed as she pulled her bra on.

She laughed as she hooked it; she usually wore a front-hooking bra except when she was wearing a dress, because her claws made it very hard for her to hook a bra behind her back. “Even if it was legal, you’ll never catch me going without clothes in public,” she teased.

“You know, there’s a nude beach down in Florida.”

“I’m so glad for Florida,” she said mildly, stepping into her jeans. “Now comb your tail.”

“Kit!” Vil called from the other room. “I’m here!”

“We’re in the bedroom, and we’re decent!” Kit shouted in reply.

Vil came in as Kit and Jessie both were pulling their tee shirts over their heads. She was wearing something that made her look like a college student, a U-Mass tee shirt and a pair of faded jeans, which was very unusual for her. Vil almost always wore business clothes, even when she wasn’t working. But, she’d told them to dress casual for today, and she had obviously taken that to heart herself. Kit hugged his shorter sister fondly, and Jessie hugged her and kissed her on the cheek after she got her shirt on. “Kit, comb your tail, it looks awful,” Vil ordered, looking at it critically.

Jessie grinned at him. “Chop chop, you miscreant,” she told him imperiously.

“I love it when she throws those fancy words at me,” he said, picking the comb up off the bed, sitting down, and doing as he was told. “What’s first?”

“We go see Clancy first,” she answered. “Then, afterwards, if you don’t need a little time to calm down after going to Stonebrook, we’re going to meet Kendall and have a nice meal, then I’m going to indulge Kendall in one of his joys.”

“Which is?”

“Basketball,” she said with a little sigh, rolling her eyes. “The Celtics play tonight, so I borrowed the box and courtside tickets from Uncle Brian.”

“Which explains why we’re in jeans and tee shirts,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, it should be good, they’re playing the Charlotte Bobcats, and both are gonna make the playoffs,” Vil noted. “Well, bro, you ready to face Boston?”

“No, but let’s get this overwith,” he sighed, combing the last burr out of his tail.

After Kit and Jessie loaded their pockets, they went downstairs. Jessie shivered when they stepped out into the nippy Boston air, for it was early April in Massachusetts, and spring wouldn’t come to the Northeast until early May. “Why didn’t I bring a coat?” she complained as she hugged herself as they hurried to the waiting limo, Marcus and Stav flanking the open door, waiting for them.

“We’ll buy you one on the way to Stonebrook,” Vil promised as she herded Jessie into the limo.

And Vil did. Kit was getting a little nervous, but it was nice to stop at a mall and run into Macy’s to buy Jessie a coat. They found her a nice black hooded jacket , light but warm, and Kit broke down and bought a zip-up hoodie just to take the bite off the air. Vil had them buy some simple canvas and rubber-soled slip-on shoes which were popular in Boston in late winter and early spring, basically just to keep the feet dry and offer a little extra insulation against a Boston night, since it was going to be rather cold after the game.

Kit felt his heart start to speed up when they pulled on Stonebrook Road, which was technically a public road but was literally nothing but a private, county-paved driveway for Stonebrook manor, since the Vulpans owned all land on both sides of the road and would not sell it. There used to be other houses out here, but Kit's father had bought them all out and forced them to move, then had their houses demolished and allowed the lots to return to nature. A mile down Stonebrook Road, they reached the massive gates of Stonebrook Manor, the ancestral home of the Vulpan family. The Vulpan family crest of a fox and a lion separated by a sword was on the gates, the fox on the left and the lion on the right, with the sword split in half to straddle the two gates.

Kit had a riot of conflicting emotions and fears roll through his mind at the sight of those gates. He had honestly never believed he'd ever see them again, and behind them, up that quarter-mile cobblestone driveway, would be the huge mansion that was the residence of the head of the Vulpan family. It was divided into three sections, the center and the east and west wings, and Kit knew that Zach was living in that house. There were many cottages, bungalows, and guest houses scattered through the estate along with other buildings, like the large garage where his father had kept his collection of cars. Some of the buildings were near the house, mostly associated with the house, while the guest cottages tended to be further away, giving guests a feeling of a little privacy from the bustle of the main house. One large guest house was down by the river near the dock, and another large one was by the large indoor pool down the hill behind the main house, with three others hidden among the woods beside and behind the main manor. Clancy lived inside the manor house itself, in an apartment in the center of the house on the first floor, not far from the kitchen. Kit could probably walk from the main entry hall to Clancy's door blindfolded, even after seven years since the last time he'd set foot in Stonebrook.

So many memories, and so few of them good. Most of good memories in that house were from when his mother had been alive, and afterward, there were fewer and fewer, and all of them involving Vil or Clancy. There had been so many fights with his father, screaming matches, furious exchanges. There was so much vitriol in that house, and it seemed that it was still there, for Kit's greatest enemy in the family lived in that house now, seamlessly taking over for Kit's bastard father. Uncle Zach was in there now, the most rabid purist that ever walked the face of the earth, someone who would probably kill Jessie if he thought there was any way he could get away with it without Vil retaliating. Kit had no doubt about that. Zach would see Jessie's entrance into Stonebrook as some kind of desecration, the out-of-control Kit bringing his non-vixen wife into the core of Vulpan history and culture, into the heart of the Vulpan family. That was what Stonebrook was to many Vulpans, the center of the family, the seat of the power of the family. That was why Zach wanted to live here, to be in that seat, to use it as a symbol against the rest of the family as he tried to slowly wrest the power in the family away from Vil. Kit also had no doubt that Zach would have a conniption if he saw Jessie, and there might be a fistfight right in the main hall. Vil was taking a real risk in allowing Jessie into Stonebrook, because Zach could poison the family against her even more than she was already poisoned given she supported Kit, and Kit had broken the most sacred of Vulpan family traditions, and had married outside the species.

The unforgivable crime.

Jessie put her paw on his wrist, giving him a compassionate look. He smiled wanly and patted her paw, then blew out his breath as the car took the driveway that would take them around the house and to the rear entrance, which was most commonly used since there was a pull-in heated garage back there that opened into a parlor where servants would prepare the Vulpans for going out. Clancy's apartment wasn't far from that parlor, down a hall branching out from the main hallway and near the east wing. The limo pulled into the large garage, which had a door on two walls so limos could simply pull forward and back out, and then slowed to a stop. A thin vixen and tall male, both in a gray uniforms, hurried out. The male opened the door while the vixen stepped up to take their coats. The male gaped when Kit stepped out, giving him an astounded look, and the vixen was so shocked she didn't give him the customary little bow, greet him, and offer to take his coat.

"Master Luke!" the male said in an astounded voice. "Bless my soul, I thought I'd never see you in the fur again! Have you been well? Are you home to stay?"

"Benson?" Kit asked, giving him a searching look.

"Yes! Welcome home, Master Luke!" he said with a bright smile.

"Kit," he corrected immediately. "Do not call me by his name."

"Master Kit it is, sir," he said with a nod. "Are you home to stay? Are you here to get rid of him?" he asked in a sudden whisper.

Kit shook his head. "I'm just here to visit Clancy," he said honestly. "This place could never be my home anymore, Benson. Too much bad blood, too many bad memories."

The vixen gave him a compassionate look, then finally held out her paws. Kit dutifully took off his hoodie and offered it to her. “You’re getting thin, Sally.”

“I’m surprised you remember me, Master L—Kit,” she smiled. “I’d only been here two months before you and your father had your falling out.”

Jessie climbed out, and the two gave her a startled look. “Benson, Sally, I’d like you to meet my wife,” he said in a calm yet strong voice, stressing her relationship to him. “Jessie, this is Benson and Sally. They worked here when I still lived here.”

Benson looked stunned, and Sally looked a trifle disapproving as she looked at Jessie.

“Then the gossip was true!” Benson gasped, then he blinked. “It’s an honor to meet you, Miss Jessie,” he said, giving her a little bow.

“May I take your coat, miss?” Sally offered, with the tiniest edge in her voice. Clearly, Sally was in the same boat as most of his family.

“Oh, it’s nice to meet you, and thank you very much!” Jessie said, smiling at Benson and taking off her coat and offering it to Sally.

But the edge in Sally’s eyes evaporated when Marcus helped Vil out of the car. Both servants bowed deeply to her. “Miss Vilenne!” Benson said happily. “It’s good to see you, madam. Have you been well?”

“Well enough, Benson. Can you send tea to Clancy’s apartment? We’re going to visit him.”

“I’ll see to it, madam,” he nodded.

“I don’t think your Sally likes me very much,” Jessie whispered as they followed Benson out of the garage.

“Bigotry isn’t restricted to the rich, love,” Kit whispered back. “Is my uncle here today, Benson?”

He nodded. “He and his family just finished taking lunch in the sun room about an hour ago.”

“Well, here’s hoping he decides not to bother us,” Kit grunted.

He felt...vulnerable. Almost like his father was lurking around every corner, or maybe uncle Zach. Zach was no better than his father, cut from the same mold, and the fact he was in the house made it still feel like the ghost of his father was hovering over his head. Kit led Jessie by the paw in front of everyone, moving quickly and surely along a path he hadn’t walked for over seven years, but knew by heart. Left into the main hall, down to the next right just in front of the main door to the kitchen, then right. Jessie kept looking around at the rich paneling and the portraits, at the Italian tapestry hanging near the kitchen, a piece that would be the centerpiece of any artist’s collection in almost any other house, but in the Vulpan house it was relegated to hanging in a hallway used almost exclusively by the staff, because his father had thought it looked ugly. Jessie gaped again at a huge two-handed sword, a Scottish claymore encased in glass and hanging on the wall. Vil walked behind him with Benson trying to hurry to keep up, until they reached a nondescript door devoid of decoration or filigree, the door to the private apartment of Clancy.

He knocked quickly, then opened the door before there was any response. He poked his head in and called out for Clancy, looking into a room he hadn’t seen for seven years. It was an elegantly decorated living room, with a simple chair and tea table near a fireplace, a couch facing the fireplace, and a television in the corner that had the look of almost never being used. A stereo was in a rack beside the TV, complete with a turntable so Clancy could play his collection of Big Band era music, his favorite music genre. “Clancy?” Kit called.

“Kit my boy!” came a reedy response. “Please, come inside!”

Kit led Jessie and Vil into the apartment, and held tightly to her paw as she looked around. Vil stood just behind, then moved out of the way when Benson had a young maid Kit didn’t know bring in a tray with tea and scones and set it on the tea table. Clancy hobbled into view in the hallway leading back to his den, separate bathroom, and bedroom, leaning heavily on his cane. Kit stared a moment, for Vil was right, Clancy looked old. His fur was dull and thinning, and the white fur of age had invaded the red fur all over his muzzle, cheeks, and head. He was wearing a smart gray suit without a coat, his white shirt and vest showing as he limped into the living room. He was moving very slowly, and Kit saw that the paw not on his cane was visibly shaking. When did this happen? When Kit talked to him on the phone, his voice was always the same, strong and eloquent, the diction of a fox with an impeccable education. His voice had never betrayed this shocking decline in Clancy’s physical health, and he’d never said a word about it outside of just saying he was tired from time to time.

“Clancy,” Kit said with a concerned look, helping the old fox to his chair by the fireplace. “How have you been, you old rascal?”

He smiled wearily. “I’ve felt better, my boy,” he said honestly. “I’ve just gotten over a bout of the flu, and I’m still feeling a trifle under the weather. Ah, Jessica, I’m glad he brought you,” he said, smiling at her. “And Miss Vilenne as well! Both of Master Lucas’ children together in Stonebrook. Ah, a happy day for me,” he told them with an honest smile. “I do so wish you’d come home, my boy. You are a Vulpan, and this is where you belong.”

“Clancy, you know I’ll never come back here,” Kit told him. “I have a life now, a life in Austin. I have friends, I’ve bought into the magazine where I work and now I’m a part owner, I have plans. And I’d never live up here so near the family with Jessie,” he added pointedly.

“Ah, true, your family lacks your progressive mindset,” Clancy said as he settled into his chair and reached for the teapot. “Now let me pour you some tea.”

“I’ll do it, Mister Clancy,” Jessie said, picking up the teapot before he could reach it. “We didn’t come here so you could wait on us.”

He chuckled. “An old habit that I fear will never fade,” he admitted as Jessie poured the tea.

Kit was really worried. Clancy looked so, so weak. So old. He was 73 years old, but that had barely slowed him down when Kit remembered him from his late sixties. Just three months ago, he’d looked much healthier than he looked now. But he didn’t let that show, he instead talked with him warmly, and let him tell Jessie quite a few stories about when Vil and Kit were kids. Several of them made both siblings’ cheeks ruffle a bit, and made Jessie laugh.

“Vil, I never knew you were a car thief!” she teased when Clancy related the first time Vil had stolen one of her father’s cars and drove it around the manor. There were quite a few more roads than just the main driveway on the manor. There were roads to the cottages, service roads used by the groundkeepers, a road to the boat dock, and a road leading to a never-used alternate entrance through the back gate, down by the river, which was much wider than the front gate and lacked an overhead frame. It was an industrial entrance left over from when they built the indoor pool, which would let them tow a boat or other large or heavy equipment in or out of the manor.

“Well, it’s dad’s fault for keeping the keys to all his cars in a rack by the garage door,” Vil said with a smile. “Boy, was he mad, because I ran into a post down by the boat cottage and scratched the paint of his thirty-six Ford. He took getting it repainted out of my allowance,” she laughed.

“That is nothing, though, compared to what Kit did,” Clancy smiled.

“Here it comes, his favorite story,” Kit sighed, which made Jessie giggle. Clancy did tell that story, the infamous day that Kit set fire to his father’s brand new Bentley, which had just been delivered two days before the incident. He went into great detail about how the fire department had to come and put it out, then all the questions and investigations that followed. Kit had managed to keep his involvement a secret for about five days, but the arson investigator had managed to isolate Kit as the only remaining suspect, and Kit cracked under the pressure they brought to bear.

“It’s silly to be jealous of a car, but I was,” Kit mused as he remembered that. “Dad seemed more interested in the car than in me, so I torched it. They never knew I did it on purpose until I was sixteen, when I admitted it just before I walked out.”

“Oh, if these old walls could talk, they would have quite a tale to tell,” Clancy said with a watery smile. “Sixty-eight years, my dear, that’s how long the Vulpans have lived in Stonebrook. Kitstrom Arthur Vulpan, Kit’s great-grandfather, bought the land in nineteen and thirty-eight, and Kit’s grandfather, Kitstrom Daniel, started construction on the main manor house in nineteen and thirty-nine, when he was seventeen. It had always been Samuel's dream to build Stonebrook, but he died before they began construction, leaving young Daniel to shoulder both the burden of running the company and building the manor. It was finished in nineteen and forty, and I remember the first day I stepped through the gates, back when they were brand new," he said wistfully, his eyes distant. "I have lived and served in this manor since the day it was opened, my dear. My father was one of the first butlers of the manor, and I joined the staff after college, returning to take my father's place and allowing him to retire. The Vulpans have lived in this house since it was built, but a Warrington has served on the staff. My son is the chief butler now," he smiled. "Following in the family tradition. He detests your uncle, my boy," he said with a slight smile. "I really do wish you would return home and drive him out. You have so much more right to this estate than your uncle ever did. You and Vilenne, it is yours, and he has no right to try to claim it."

"Well, I agreed to let him live here as part of the agreement to split up the family fortune," Vil reminded him. "But he didn't read all the fine print," she said with a purring voice. "He never does. That's his one weakness."

"What fine print?" Kit asked.

"If you ever return to the manor and take residence, he has to leave," she answered. "Not me, you. And once he's gone, he can't return if you maintain residence for a time considered it a permanent change of address. So, if you move back up here, change your license to Massachusetts, and settle into the manor, Uncle Zach will have to move out. And once he's out, he stays out."

“I don’t remember reading that.”

“You didn’t read the agreement, Kit. Zach did, but he didn’t read it carefully. You and me are on the deed of the manor as the owners, jointly. But the legal agreement that everyone signed includes that clause. And Zach knows about it,” she added with a wicked smile. “His lawyer finally noticed it, and we had quite a little spat about it about a month ago. But there’s nothing he can do. If he challenges the clause, he has to challenge the entire contract, it’s specifically written that way. You can’t challenge any one part of it without challenging all of it. And if he does that, well, he could lose everything if he wins, because his victory would void the contract, returning everything back to Kit. And I doubt Kit would be feeling very magnanimous if Zach dragged him back into family business again, especially when he’d be doing it for no reason but pride and greed.”

“But he agreed not to get anything,” Jessie protested.

“That agreement is in the same contract, Jessie. If that contract is voided, then Kit can lay legal claim to everything. And I mean everything. He’d leave the family completely broke.”

Jessie giggled. “That’s mean, Vil.”

“I’m a mean girl,” she said without batting an eye. “Zach thought he was nicking the bait off the hook when I drew up the contract, but he didn’t read it closely enough to see the little hooks that are spread through the whole thing, almost like little mines. Those clauses are there to absolutely ensure the good behavior of the elders towards Kit. If they violate any one clause, then Kit can strip them of their money.”

“Yes, Vilenne outdid herself when her lawyers prepared that agreement. The conditions of the split of the money are very specific, and they were worded in such a way that it seemed that restrictions against Kit were also restrictions against the family.”

“This is news to me,” Kit said seriously.

“I put it together to keep them off your back, bro,” she answered. “For example, no member of the family can ever sue you in court. If any of them ever does, it voids the deal. Any challenge to the contract, by the structure of the contract, voids the entire contract if any one section of it is thrown out. So, if anyone gets the bright idea to try to get the deal altered, they lose everything. If they win, then the deal that gives them all their money is gone and Kit takes it back. It’s also in the contract that anyone who helped you after you were disowned by Dad, back when his will was in effect, have retroactive immunity, an ex post facto clause. My past deeds can’t be used as a basis to try to challenge the existing contract. I mainly put that in there to stop Zach from trying to steal the CEO chair and stocks away from me, to hamstring any ideas he had of pulling a Cybil. Oh, and it’s also in the contract that if any Vulpan is convicted of a crime against Kit, Kit can call to have the contract voided for that family member, and that money comes to me,” she said with a sly little smile. “So, anyone who does anything against Kit ends up surrendering his or her entire fortune to me, and the same conditions Dad had against Kit in his original will are put in effect against the guilty party. So, Uncle Zach can’t have cousin Victor beat Kit with a crowbar or try to make Jessie have a miscarriage with the promise that he’d give Victor money to cover what he’d lose when he was convicted. Even if he wasn’t convicted of conspiracy, if he ever gave Victor a dime of his own money, he’d lose everything to me. And I’ll just turn around and give it to Kit’s children,” she smiled evilly.

“That is the true masterpiece of the contract,” Clancy chuckled weakly. “If you were so much as slapped in the face by your uncle, and he was convicted of it in a court of law, then he loses everything to the one member of the family who will never give it back. And it puts any member of the family who does this in the same situation from which you climbed out, Kit, completely disowned from the family with the threat that any aid to the disowned party costs the offender his or her own portion of the family fortune. The clause is brilliant in that it threatens a family member with absolute ruin if they attempt anything against you, my boy.”

“How did you slip that past them?” Kit asked in surprise.

“They either didn’t read the contract carefully enough, their lawyers didn’t bring it to their attention, or they signed it knowing it’s there, I can’t really tell you. But, see bro, I made sure you were well protected,” Vil smiled. “I have the family nailed to the mast. They can’t take any action against you without risking their own fortunes.”

“And you wondered why they were so quiet up here,” Jessie laughed. “Now we know!”

“I have everything under control,” Vil purred, sipping her tea.

“Damn, sis, that’s...just brilliant,” he said in admiration.

“Thank you,” she said with a knowing smile. “Oh, by the way, next week, you should pick up the Sun from an international newsstand and read it.”

“The English one? Are you going after Cybil now?”

She smiled and nodded. “She’s had a few months to think that I’ve forgotten all about her and that she’s safe, so now I start skinning her out of her mangy hide one little strip at a time,” she said vindictively. “The first shot will be fired Monday morning, after the Sun prints a very revealing little investigative article about Lady Cybil Whitmore.” She looked at Jessie. “As promised, Jess, I’m gonna make her hurt.”

“Good,” Jessie said, taking a rather savage bite out of her scone.

They stayed with Clancy for another three hours, letting him spin tales of the Vulpan children’s youth, while Kit pondered what he’d learned about the contract. Actually, it made perfect sense. It was why Zach had not tried to stop him from seeing Clancy, why he was staying far away. He faced utter ruin if he got into a confrontation with Kit, lost his head, and did something stupid. And if he didn’t do that, he risked getting evicted from Stonebrook if he angered Kit enough to cause him to move back to Boston and take residence in the house, which would force Zach and his family to move out of the manor. Oh, Zach had about 12 other houses to which he could move, it wasn’t like he’d be out on the street, but it would be a stinging blow to his ego to be forced out of Stonebrook, out of the ancestral seat of the power of the Vulpan family. That had to be why Zach was avoiding Kit, to both not do something stupid, and not give Kit any reason to get angry enough to come after Zach in the one way he could that Zach could do nothing to prevent.

“Well, I’m finding myself a bit in need of a nap,” Clancy finally said. Kit helped him to his feet, and the old fox gave him a gentle hug. “I’m honored you came all the way up here to see me, my boy.”

“When you couldn’t make it to the party, I had to make sure to bring the party to you, Clancy,” Kit answered, patting him on the back. “It was so good to see you!”

“And you too, my boy. Now, you can make an old fox happy and come home.”

“My home’s in Austin now, Clancy.”

“No, your home will always be here, young Kitstrom,” he said firmly. “This is your home. The bad memories that linger in this place can be cleaned away like so much dust, and replaced with what is good and proper. And it is only proper that the son of Lucas and Beth Vulpan live in the home that is his by birthright.”

“I’d be lost in here anymore,” Kit laughed. “And I couldn’t afford the electric bill, let alone paying everyone’s salaries.”

“Tosh,” he sniffed, then he was surprised when Jessie hugged him.

“It was good to see you again, Mister Clancy,” she told him. “I really enjoyed talking with you.”

“I’m glad you did, my dear, I’m glad you did,” he said, patting her on the back. “I’ll admit to you, my dear, I was honestly hesitant when I heard Kit was marrying a cat, but you have won me over. Kit could not have found a better femme and a mother for his children.”

“Aww, thanks, Clancy,” she said, giving him a kiss on the cheek.

“Don’t be a stranger, dear,” Clancy said, kissing Vil and taking her paw.

“Of course not!” she laughed. “I’ll be over to see you on Thursday. So just keep your chin up, old male, and know we still love you.”

“That comforts me in ways you’ll never know, my young ones,” he smiled. “Now, forgive a host for bad manners, but I really do need to have a lie down.”

Kit was very quiet when they left Clancy’s apartment. Vil was right, he did look...tired. Age was catching up with him. He’d been sick, he’d said, so Kit fervently hoped that some of what he was seeing was Clancy recovering from the flu. But he looked both old and weary, and that was never a good combination.

Kit made a very special point in his mind to call Clancy much more often...at least once a day from then on. He had to make sure his old friend, the fox that had all but raised Kit since he was nine, was doing alright.

It was a very concerned Kit that walked the halls back to the garage, so preoccupied by Clancy’s condition that he felt none of the anxiety and fear he’d felt when he arrived. Jessie kept hold of his paw, squeezing it reassuringly, and she sidled up to him and put her arm around him when they waited in the heated garage for Vil’s limo; Stav had taken it to the private gas pump on the grounds and filled up the tank, and the car was on the way back.

“Vil, how long has he been that bad?” he finally asked.

“He’s improved somewhat,” she answered. “He really was sick. He had the flu. But that was nearly a month ago, and it’s taken him all this time to get his legs back under him. I’m sure he’ll recover more, but Kit...”

“I know,” he said quietly.

“Does he like cookies, Vil? I think I’d like to send him some when I get home.”

“I can buy—“

“No, I want to make them for him. A homemade cookie always makes a fur feel like someone’s thinking just about him. I want him to open a box of cookies and know they were made just for him.”

“You are such a treasure, Jessie,” Vil smiled as the garage door opened, and the limo rolled in. “Clancy loves peanut butter cookies, but his favorite treats are cherry scones. If you next-day aired those, they should reach him fresh.”

“Hmm, I’ll have to look up how to make those.”

“I’ll have the recipe the kitchen uses emailed to your Blackberry before we leave Boston,” she promised.

Once they were back in the limo, Kit looked back at the tan granite of Stonebrook and could only sigh in relief that he was leaving. He was even more relieved in that Zach wouldn’t be bothering him...probably ever. Vil had never explained that little trick in the contract they all signed, but it certainly explained why it had been so quiet in Boston since the court case. The one thing the Vulpans wouldn’t dare would be to get stripped of their money and end up destitute.

For some strange reason, as he looked back on Stonebrook, he felt...a benediction. Even more than the end of the court case, as they drove away from that tan manor, he again felt...free. Always before there was a chance that the family might find some way to annoy him, but Vil had outdone herself in fixing it so they would never dare try to disrupt his life, by putting their fortunes on the line if they did so. He looked back on that manor, that source of so much pain, and he felt, well, not quite so nervous as he had when he arrived. The pain of Boston would always be there, but now he knew, completely, utterly, that there would be no more.

He was beyond the reach of the family.

The sun began to shine as clouds over the manor moved away, and in a way, that was how he felt inside himself. The dark shadows of his family were being chased away, and it was a fresh start, a new day, a chance to move on and feel that he was in total control of his life—well, as much control as Vil would let him have. He had no illusions about still being tied to her apron strings, because she was still on her mission to force him to take what she believed was owed to him. But those were battles for another day...and God, he knew there were going to be some doozies. He had no doubt that she had either already bought a house in Austin, or was looking for one, and was going to try to force him into it. But he'd have those fights with her when the time came.

Kendall Brighton was a tall, athletic, young, very attractive red fox. His eyes were green instead of the pattern amber common among foxes, and he was devilishly attractive, with strong cheeks and a boxy muzzle. His hair, like Corey's, was not the same color as the fur on the top of his head, which was rare for male foxes, though not quite so rare for vixens. His hair was a dark chestnut, cut short and away from his ears, but a little long in the back. Much to Kit's surprise, Kendall Brighton had an earring in his left ear, which branded him as an absolute maverick when it came to British upper-crust society. Such things were almost unheard of among the British blue-bloods.

Kit's first impression of him that this couldn't be a member of the Brighton family, that he had to be an impostor. He did fly in on a private Lear jet, but when he came down the steps, he was dressed in a Boston Celtics sweatshirt, blue jeans, and sturdy hiking boots, with his windbreaker jacket thrown over his shoulder negligently. With that earring and his casual demeanor, Kendall could walk into any bar in Boston and not make a single eye take notice of him. But when he spoke, it was abundantly clear that this was not an American fox. “Kendall Brighton,” he said in a Machester accent, shaking Kit’s paw as he reached them. “You must be Kit and Jessie. Villy’s gone on and on about you two.”

“Villy?”

“I cannot make him stop calling me that,” Vil growled, slapping him on the shoulder, which made him smile rogueishly behind her back.

Needless to say, Kit took an immediate liking to the male.

“Hi, I’m Jessie Vulpan,” Jessie introduced, and he took her paw and kissed the back of it, which made her cheeks ruffle slightly.

“Charmed, Jessie, charmed. I must say, you’re just as pretty as the pictures Villy’s showed me. So, you’re going to be an English teacher?” he asked with sincere interest.

Kit’s impression of Kendall only improved while they were in the limo, on the way to Boston Garden. “Villy wanted us to go out to a swanky restaurant, but I get enough of that at home,” he said with a chuckle. “I told her she could really make my weekend by taking me to a Celtics game and feeding me hot dogs and beer at the Garden.”

“I think taking him to a five star restaurant might be cheaper than eating dogs and burgers at the Garden,” Vil grunted, which made them all laugh.

“I have to wear a suit five days a week, the last thing I wanted to do was come down here on my day off and put on a suit just to eat dinner,” he grinned. "I'd rather be wearing a Manchester United tee and some trousers than a suit."

"What do you do, Kendall?" Jessie asked.

"Work for Brighton Industries, of course," he answered easily. "I'm in the public relations department, putting a good face on the family business. We build ships, Jessie, same as your family. 'Course, right now my official job, straight from the old male, is woo Vil and marry into the Vulpan family," he admitted with a light smile at Vil. "I heard the old male started working on a pre-nup the minute after he introduced us at a mixer at Oxford."

"He was certainly listening to wedding bells when he did that," Vil grunted darkly.

"Well, you two are going out," Kit noted.

"True, but that's just because it's hard to find a gal who understands, Kit. Villy understands, so it's easy to go out with her. No pressure, no having to worry if she's a gold-digger. By Jove, she's three times richer than I am, she's the one probably worrying if I'm the gold-digger," he laughed. "Besides that, she's a damn smart lady who I love to talk to. She's the perfect girl. Brains, beauty, and someone who's not after me for my family's money."

"Well, you're certainly doing the job your father gave you," Jessie giggled.

"I guess it shows how desperate I am to find a girlfriend when I'm flying across the pond just to go on a date," he admitted with a self-deprecating smile.

“You flew across the pond because you know my family has a skybox and courtside seats in the Garden,” she teased in reply.

“Well, that’s certainly a perk,” he winked. “So, you work in a magazine, Kit? What do you do there?”

Kit and Jessie got to know Kendall on the trip to the Garden, and they continued to talk as they pulled into the VIP garage and walked towards the arena. Stav and Marcus walked quietly behind them as they padded along, moving among other furs who were there to see the game. They went up an elevator to a carpeted, much quieter section of the arena, until they reached a door that had the Vulpan name stenciled under the skybox number. Kit had never been in this skybox before, since the last time he was at a Celtics game it was in the original Boston Garden, and the new box was much nicer. It was the size of a large living room, with huge glass windows that would let them look down on the game. Three huge LCD monitors were arrayed through the room so no matter where one was, a TV was visible so not a second of the game would be missed. There were two large couches, a table with raised chairs, chairs in front of the glass windows, and even a private bathroom just for the skybox. Vil picked up the phone hanging on the wall by the door. “Yes, this is the Vulpan skybox,” she said. “I’d like you to send up a platter of hot dogs, hamburgers, french fries, and condiments, enough for five furs. I’d also like a platter of mixed raw vegetables with ranch dip. Hold on,” she said, then she looked to Stav and Marcus. “What do you want to drink?” she asked them.

“Tea, madam,” Stav answered.

“Tea for me as well, madam,” Marcus added.

“Alright, send up a pot of Farthing tea, a glass of berry Aquafina, and a pitcher of Guinness draft.”

“Ah, bless you for remembering, Villy,” Kendall laughed. “A game’s not a game without a pint of Guinny, be it football or basketball.”

“Send it up as soon as it’s ready,” Vil finished, then she hung up the phone.

After they settled in on the couch, Jessie sitting on her feet and nestled up against Kit, Kendall looked to them. “So, Jessie, I have to ask you something, and it might be a tad personal.”

“That’s alright, I just won’t answer if it’s too personal,” she smiled.

He grinned at her. “Did it bother you much, knowing what kind of family you were marrying into?”

“Watch it, buster,” Vil teased, slapping him on the shoulder.

Jessie laughed. “It was scary,” she admitted. “Kit was terrified of his family when we first met, and I had to really work to make him look past them and look at me. They were the faceless, distant furs that didn’t seem to matter, at least until the day Kit was shot. It was then that I realized that he hadn’t been joking about his family. But I wasn’t about to let them win,” she declared, lacing her fingers between Kit’s and patting the back of his paw with her other paw. “If I’d have let them scare me away from him, they’d have won, and I wasn’t going to let them win. He was worth it, he was worth fighting for him.”

“My fearless kitty,” Kit said lovingly, kissing the back of her paw much as Kendall had done. “She owns me now,” Kit laughed. “She chased my family away, and now I'm all hers. It's her prize for being so determined."

"And what's most admirable is she did it knowing he was broke, that he was disowned," Vil added. "She knew the full truth about him. Jessie is no gold-digger. She wanted my brother for who he is, not who his family is."

"Yeah. I always thought it would be neat to be rich, but then I met Kit's family face to face, and I realized that Kit was absolutely right about them, and about the Vulpan fortune. It's a curse," she declared. "It turned his family against itself. They don't love each other. They hate each other, all they care about is their money. Every other Vulpan outside of Kit I've met so far except for two have been really messed up," she said.

"And who are those two?" Kendall asked.

"Vil and their cousin Terry. Sheila, Muffy, the rest of them, they're all, well, tainted by the Vulpan fortune. I love Sheila a lot, but even though I love her, I have to say that she's just as affected by her family's curse as the rest of them. She's hedonistic and self-centered. Kit showed that he's just a very smart male to stay away from that money. He's a brilliant and exceptional fox, he can earn us our own fortune," she said with a loving smile, patting his scarred forearm. "Then we can feel good about being rich, because we earned it, we weren't given it."

"Only with you there helping me, pretty kitty," he chuckled.

"You heard it here first, Ken," Vil said with a smile. "Kit will be a self-made millionaire by the time he's thirty-five. Maybe even sooner. He's settled down and found his business, he bought into the magazine where he works as a part owner. And between him and that clever dingo he's partners with, they're already well on their way to building their magazine into a profit powerhouse. He may be estranged from the family, but when it comes to the traits that built the Vulpan empire, he has them all in spades. Foresight, determination, wisdom, and a feel for the market."

"I'm blushing here," Kit laughed, a little embarrassed by all the praise.

"He has to use them, since he doesn't have the world handed to him on a silver platter," Kendall nodded. "That's why the old male makes every Brighton work. If you want to be a Brighton, you contribute. You'll have time to sit on your arse and eat caviar when you retire."

"I wish I could make my family do that," Vil chuckled.

"So, are you sure you want to marry into the Vulpan family, Kendall?"

"Call me Ken, and I won't be marrying into the family so much as marrying the best part of it," he said, smiling at Vil unashamedly.

"Such a schmoozer," Vil laughed.

"I'm just doing what the old male said to do," he grinned. "He said if a fox as handsome and educated as me couldn't woo a femme like Villy, he'd disown me. You don't want me to have to go work in a pub, do you?" he asked, looking at her with outrageously fake puppy-dog eyes, which made Jessie erupt into laughter.

"If you keep calling me Villy, I'll buy out Brighton Industries if only to fire you," she retorted with a smile.

The food arrived, and conversation ebbed so two of the most powerful families in the western world could eat hamburgers and hot dogs at a stand-up table, laugh, and talk about nothing important whatsoever. They enjoyed the amenities of the skybox, until there was a knock at the door. It opened before anyone could say anything, and Suzy poked her head in. “Vil? Kit!” she said with a happy squeal, rushing in. Kit moved out from around the table and gave her a huge hug. “Surprise!”

“I’m so happy to see you!” he said with an honest smile. “What are you doing here?”

“Vil invited me and Corey to see the game!” she said with a smile, looking to the doorway. Corey was hurrying in. “You know you can’t come to Boston without seeing us!” she grinned at him.

“I’m glad Vil found a way to get you in,” he laughed. “She’s been running us around most of the day.”

“I wanted it to be a surprise,” Vil laughed as she gave Corey a chaste hug, then kissed Suzy on the cheek. “Suzy, Corey, this is Kendall,” she introduced. “Ken, this is my best friend Suzy, and her boyfriend Corey.”

“Ah, the film maker!” Kendall said with an earnest smile, shaking Corey’s paw. “We really have to talk!”

“We’ve heard a lot about you too, Kendall,” Suzy smiled as she accepted a kiss on the paw from him. “Things like that,” she winked.

“I’m a British gentliful, I have manners,” he said stuffily. But then he belched loudly, which paralyzed the entire skybox with laughter, even Stav and Marcus.

Suzy and Corey joined them at the table to help them finish off the meal—and Vil’s order of vegetables came into focus when Suzy and Corey arrived, since Suzy loved raw vegetables—and a new round of introductory chatter and stories passed across the table, as Suzy, Corey, and Kendall got to know each other.

But there was a game to see, so they left Stav and Marcus in the box to go down to courtside about fifteen minutes before the game was slated to begin. The Vulpans owned six seats directly behind the Celtics bench, and they took them all up they settled in. Kit and Jessie found themselves in the middle, almost protectively, as Vil and Kendall sat to their left, and Suzy and Corey sat to their right. “Do you watch much basketball in England, Kendall?” Corey asked.

“Call me Ken, and yes, I love basketball!” he said enthusiastically, pointing to his Celtics sweatshirt. “Almost as much as I love football. I didn’t just buy this for the trip over, the Celtics are my favorite American team.”

“Well, that shirt does look a little worn,” Jessie giggled.

“I’ll buy a couple of new ones before I go back to London,” he said. “I’m sure they sell some here in the arena. They’ll feel more special in having come straight from the Garden.”

“They’re very expensive, though,” Corey warned.

“There are some things that are more important than mere money,” he said in a deadly serious voice that made Kit and Corey laugh, and Vil roll her eyes.

Kit noticed that there were already a few camera flashes, before the players were even introduced, and he realized that some furs on the far side of the court were taking pictures of them. But there was really nothing they could do about it. He lost interest in that when the announcer’s voice called over the PA, the lights dimmed, and the pregame activities got started. The Celtics were playing the Charlotte Bobcats tonight, which most were expecting to be a steamroll game since the Celtics had already clinched a playoff spot and the Bobcats weren't doing too well this year, but were in the running for the last playoff spot.

It was indeed a steamroll, but it was still a lot of fun. Kit hadn't been to a sporting event in years, and he really had fun cheering the Celtics, and watching as Kendall kept trying to steal towels from the Celtic players' chairs. The arena cameras even caught him doing it, showing him sliding his paw out with a naughty grin on his face, then snapping back and looking all innocent every time a player looked at him. The players seemed to realize he was just playing, and security was reluctant to stop him because he was obviously with Vil. The players even got into it a little bit themselves once the Celtics were twenty points ahead, dangling towels in front of him the wagging a finger at him. At one point, he even got down on his knees and begged with those outrageously fake puppy-dog eyes, which made Kevin Garnett laugh, grab someone else's towel from an empty chair, and throw it to him. He jumped up and down and swung it in the air, then threw it over his shoulders and sat back down.

Kendall seemed fun-loving and maybe little like Sheila, until he heard him and Vil talk business, discussing both shipyard business and the general state of the global economy. That was when Kit realized that the silly male that was trying to steal towels from players was indeed an Oxford graduate. He had a vast understanding of economics and business, and was able to give Vil brisk and intellectually challenging conversation in her own areas of expertise.

She wasn't the only one listening, Kit noticed. Two Celtics players were leaning back as Vil and Kendall were discussing the housing bubble, and Kendall explained to her why he was positive it was nowhere near the end of bursting, and how it might trigger a global economic recession if it continued on unchecked. “Too many banks have tied up too many assets into mortgage security bundles,” he told her. “With those mortgages defaulting in huge numbers, those securities are going to crash, and the market mark policy the American system imposes is going to destroy the value of those securities as American real estate values decline. Without those assets, it’s going to wipe out liquidity and put a major crunch on everything, The global stock markets will drop sharply, and the economic slowdown will cause the price of oil to go way down. The entire financial system is built on a foundation of sand that’s seeping through holes drilled through the bedrock by the mortgage issue. It’s already happening, Vil, look at Bear Sterns. That won’t be the first major investment bank to go under before it’s all over.”

“So you’re predicting gloom and doom?”

“I’ve already pulled my money out of stocks,” he declared immediately. “I don’t predict anything, dear Vil, I act on my instincts. And my instincts tell me to get out of the stock markets, because some time in the next six months, they’re going to crash. It could be tomorrow, it could be late October, but I can feel it coming. I’ll let them bottom out, clean out the dodders, then pick up some bargains. Either I’m right or I’m wrong, but either way I’m ready because I won’t be losing my money.”

Kit noticed those players pulling out some PDAs and making some entries.

The Celtics won handily, and Kendall got quite a bit more than he bargained for when Kevin Garnett pulled off his jersey and tossed it to him. “I figure you earned it if I don’t take a bath in the market,” he grinned, then the lanky hyena jogged off with the rest of his team back to the locker room.

“I couldn’t buy this!” Kendall beamed, clutching the jersey to his breast. “I’ll never wash it!”

“Then I’m not coming to see your house,” Vil murmured.

They parted with Suzy and Corey up at the skybox, since Suzy had to catch a plane to Cleveland in the morning to look over possible sites for a Yankee Bytes store. Suzy was still the vice president in charge of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts, but her father was having all the kids go with him and get engaged in the expansion. It was Suzy’s turn to go with her father to look at expansion possibilities. They left the skybox after having a short nightcap of tea, mainly to let the crowds thin out, and started out themselves. Kendall made sure to still buy a couple of Celtics tee shirts at a stand on the way out, spending over a hundred dollars on two tees, a hat, and a new sweatshirt.

“Now that was fun!” Kendall said brightly when they got back into the limo. “Where to next?”

“I’m taking Kit and Jessie back to their hotel,” she answered. “They’re going back home tomorrow morning.”

“Why not later? I’ll be here tomorrow.”

“Because Jessie’s still in school, and she’s pregnant, so they need to get back so she can rest and get her studying done.”

“Really? Congratulations!” Kendall said brightly, kissing her paw.

“I’m not made of glass, Vil, I don’t need to rest,” Jessie protested.

“But you do have to do your homework,” Kit said firmly. “And you have finals coming up. Don’t you have a paper due on Monday?”

She gave him a cold stare.

“I promised your mother our marriage wouldn’t hurt your grades. I’d rather not have her trying to drag us to the courthouse to file for divorce.”

“She would do it,” Vil laughed.

Vil and Kendall dropped them off at the hotel, and got out of the limo to take them inside. Vil hugged each of them in turn, and Kendall shook their paws. “I’m not sure if I’ll see you tomorrow, because Kendall’s taking me to New York tomorrow morning,” she said. “If we don’t, then have a good flight home. I’ll have a limo here at six, and it’ll wait for you until you get up and decide to go, so don’t worry about getting to the airport. Remember, the jet will be ready to go whenever you wake up and get there, so don’t feel rushed.”

“We will. Thanks, sis, thanks for a good day.”

“Gotta build those good memories of Boston, bro,” she smiled, then she kissed him on the cheek.

“Well, let’s say you laid a foundation today,” he told her, kissing her back. “But I still want out of Boston as fast as possible.”

They waved to each other, and then Vil and Kendall went back out to the limo. Jessie took his paw and watched them go with him, then she put her arm around him and kissed him on the cheek. “What do you think of him?”

“I think Vil found her husband,” Kit said immediately. “She’ll probably date him for about six more months to feel him out and make sure he’s what he appears to be, then she’ll hint that she’d be amenable to him proposing.”

“I like him,” she smiled. “He’s funny and charming and really, really smart.”

“Vil won’t be winning every argument against him, that’s for sure,” he chuckled. “Come on, you, let’s get you upstairs and into bed.”

“It’s not even eleven,” she protested.

“Who said we were going to sleep?” he asked with a husky whisper in her ear.

She shivered slightly, her tail sticking straight out, then she gave him a daring little smile. “Why are we standing here, then?” she challenged.

It was nice to get back to nice, warm Texas.

They landed at Bergstrom at about two in the afternoon, going from the thirty degrees in Boston to seventy degrees in Austin. Jessie did most of her homework on the plane heading home, but Kit was also glad to be home, and be out of Boston. Even though he’d had a good day, it was still Boston, and Jessie understood. That was why she’d not objected too much when they left so early. Kit had had a good day, and he wanted out of Boston before something happened that ruined the trip for them.

His visit did not go unnoticed. In the Sunday paper, there was a picture of them at the game, with the short blurb beside it reading Vilenne Vulpan shows off new beau, Kendall Brighton, at Celtics game along with her recently reconciled brother Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan III, his wife Jessica Vulpan, Susan Jenkins, whose family owns the Yankee Bytes chain of electronics stores, and Corey Reeves, whose family owns Cape Cod Shipping. In the picture, Kendall, Kit, and Corey were all standing with their fists in the air, cheering a Celtics basket, Vil and Jessie were looking at each other, clearly talking, while Suzy was taking a beer from a vendor with a smile of acceptance.

Kit and Jessie pulled into the apartment complex just in time for poker. They put their things away, then they showed up over at Lupe's and spent an hour chatting, telling them all about their trip. Poker was a bit thin that week, with just Lupe, Dan, Kevin, Sam, and Mickey; Jeffrey and Sandy were out on a date, and Sheila hadn't shown up either.

Kit called Rick as Jessie settled in with her other homework, getting her flight training books out. "Hey, Rick," Kit called. "Did you get the numbers yet?"

"I have partials, and while they're better than last week, I don't think we'll hit the black this week," he said, fretting a bit over the phone.

"But they're better?"

"I'll know for sure on Monday, but I think they'll be higher."

"That's all we need. We just keep putting them out. I know we have enough to print the same amount next week and still pay everyone."

"I'm not sure how long we can keep this up, son," Rick said seriously.

"Until we turn a profit," Kit answered calmly. "I'm not worried, Rick. I know we're going to turn a profit. We just have to be persistent and keep trying.”

“It’s risky.”

“Risk is part of the game,” he said simply. “We were just lucky to get so far without hitting a rough patch.”

“True,” Rick grunted.

“Just trust me, Rick,” Kit told him. “I’m willing to put up the money for it, so don’t worry about it. I think you know I’d never waste my money. I only back what I think can win, and I know we can do this.”

“Well, you’re putting your money where your mouth is, that’s for sure,” Rick said. “So much so that I’m considering taking a mortgage out on the ranch to raise some more capital. I can’t let you take all the risk yourself.”

“No,” Kit said quickly, remembering what Kendall said. “Don’t take out a mortgage. If you want to raise money, take out a business loan, but don’t do a mortgage right now, the market for it is very bad.”

“You sure?”

“I talked to someone yesterday who knows economics, and he said the mortgage market is about to explode, which will drag down real estate values. You’ll stand a better chance with a business loan, but I don’t think it’s necessary, Rick, at least not yet. I can pay for three more weeks at the current print volume and still pay our paychecks, so let’s go those three weeks and see what happens. I’ll be getting ready to go to Kansas about then, so we can make our decisions before I leave.”

“Alright, but I’m not entire sure I like this, son. You’ve already dropped so much money into the magazine.”

“And I’ll get back every penny and more,” Kit said confidently. “As long as we keep putting out the same high quality, we will sell at a profit.” He scratched his cheek. “We’ll talk about it in the morning, I’m gonna come in to make up taking Saturday off.”

“Sure thing, son. You just get back?”

“Yeah.”

“How did it go?”

“Good and bad,” he answered. “Good in that it was nice to see Vil and meet her boyfriend, bad that Clancy didn’t look very good at all. I’m really worried about him. Jessie’s going to bake him some scones and send them to him tomorrow,” Kit said with a loving smile at her as she went into the kitchen.

“I need cherries, go get some!” she told him from the kitchen.

“And I just got nailed to be an errand boy,” Kit chuckled, “so I’ll see you in the morning.”

“See you then, son. Bye.”

“Bye,” he mirrored and closed his phone. “Do I need to get you anything else?” he called.

“Just cherries,” she answered. “How does salmon steaks sound for dinner?”

“Sounds fine with me,” he said, digging his keys out of his pocket.

Monday's figures were encouraging. They weren't great, but they were encouraging. There was a solid increase in sales at all sites, up nearly 25%, which put the magazine only moderately in the red for the week. They had a really good issue coming up, though, for Barry had an interview with Governor Rick Perry...which was quite a surprise to almost everyone.

Governor Perry called the magazine last night. They didn't go after that interview, the Governor had come to them. He called Rick on his business phone last night and said that he had forty-five minutes of available time on Tuesday and wanted to give an interview to the magazine because he felt they'd done a good job, and he wanted to interview with someone that spoke to the young voter...and in Austin, he said, that was the readers of Lone Star.

That more than anything showed Kit that the magazine was spreading, and there was a real potential to make it take off here.

Needless to say, as soon as Kit and Rick had their meeting that morning, the entire magazine went into a blitz of activity. Barry and Janet would be going to do the interview, and Kit was going to make sure that he was well armed for it. Lilly ended up doing some easy research for Marty and Denise as Kit devoted himself to the project, fully intending to research Perry so thoroughly that Barry went into that interview knowing what size underwear the governor wore when he was 14. Jessie came in after school, did her homework in her office, then spent a little time with Jeffrey setting up their next week of Missy and Cutler, then she went and got pizza for Barry, Kit, and Rick, since they were working late that night to get ready for the interview. They had a long meeting around seven when Kit gave Barry all his research, and Rick discussed what Barry would ask. Barry was by far their best interviewer, much better than Kit; it was Kit that emulated Barry's style when he did interviews, so Kit had no doubt that the Governor would watch Barry leave his office tomorrow morning feeling like he'd been skinned, but skinned fairly. Barry was utterly non-partisan. His role model was Tim Russert, who played devil's advocate with all interviews, asking tough but fair questions that forced the guest to reveal his true feelings and views. Barry could pick apart talking points and doublespeak with ridiculous ease and relentlessly pursue a straight answer, and woe to any politician that wasn't ready when they sat down with him...as the Austin Commissioner of Elections discovered a while ago. But no matter how tough he was on the other fur, he was always exquisitely polite and gave the fur the chance to explain his views, thoughts, and platforms in as much detail as he wished.

Kit got home late that night, but he was happy. He knew that Barry would give a great interview.

He stayed up late studying the avionics systems in the CJ series of jets. The CJs used the Rockwell Collins Pro Line 21 avionics suite, one of the most vaunted and lauded avionics suites available, and it was the first electronic avionics suite Kit had used that wasn't Garmin. It had many of the same functions as the Garmin—actually many more—but the method to getting to those functions were different, and that was what he had to learn. Kit had gotten the hang of the extra attention he had to pay to things when studying the Mustang, so at least in that regard he was already adapting to the difference between a jet and a multi-engine prop.

They were all a bit nervous when Barry and Janet headed out at nine the next morning. This was, by far, the biggest interview the magazine had managed to score, even bigger than Representative Smith and Senator

Hutchison. Barry had only one day to prepare, and that pushed Kit's ability to research to the limit. In about two hours, they'd find out just how well they did.

Everyone was doing other work while Barry was gone, but their minds were on the interview. Kit was keeping himself busy by researching out Lily's upcoming assignment to write an article on the new club that was being built on Congress which was going to be called the Inferno. Rick was rolling around his office aimlessly in his wheelchair, muttering, and Sheila was sitting on the corner of her desk, being interviewed by Marty for some reason, probably for Ask Away.

The whole office stopped when Barry and Janet returned, and when Janet grinned, an explosive sigh of relief rolled through the entire office.

"Barry rocked!" she proclaimed.

"I think it was a good interview," Barry said modestly. "Here, we recorded the whole thing. You guys listen to it while I get an outline ready to write the article."

They did so, listening as Barry grilled the Governor on a variety of issues. The Governor's voice seemed quite surprised that Barry was ready with so many in-depth questions when he answered them, but it didn't sound like annoyance, it sounded more like delight. He answered the questions that were against his platform with honesty, spelling out why he disagreed, and answered the questions that supported his platform with quiet logic rather than passion, explaining his views. Barry asked questions from all over the field, from national issues like the war and economy to local issues like the rise in crime around the U.T. campus over the last few months. In all, Kit felt that Barry had done an outstanding job with the interview.

“You know, I think we should put a transcript of the entire interview up on the website on Monday, after the magazine has had a chance to sell,” Mike mused. “Who can type really fast?”

“I can do it, it gives me something to do while waiting for phone calls,” Denise volunteered.

“Why transcript it when we can podcast it?” Janet challenged.

“Oh, I was planning to do that too,” Mike grinned. “This way we have it available for anyone, including the stone-age furs that don’t have Ipods.”

Barry presented his first draft of the article that afternoon, and when Kit read it, he saw that it needed almost no editing. Rick did have him correct a couple of very small points, but the big smile on the dingo’s face said everything. “Damn fine job, Barry.”

“I just wonder when we became a political magazine,” Barry chuckled. “We’ve done more interviews with politicians than anyone else.”

“Well, it’s election season,” Rick chuckled. “That’s the big news right now. We’ll go back to more normal work after November.”

Jessie had an early dinner waiting for him when he got home. “What’s going on, pretty kitty?” he asked curiously.

“I want to go up in the plane tonight,” she answered, “so I thought we could get dinner done early.”

Kit laughed. “I have you so seduced by the Dark Side,” he teased.

“I wasn’t kidding, handsome fox. When we come back from Kansas, I want to be the one who flies the plane home.”

“Well, then let’s eat so we can give you some practical time to apply what you’ve been learning,” he smiled.

And they did. After a dinner of beef stew, her mother’s excellent recipe, they drove out to the airport. They again had a little impromptu lesson there at the plane, as Kit quizzed Jessie on what she had learned so far, then they got into the plane and Kit walked her through the preflight checklists. She knew them from hearing them so many times, but this time Kit took it slowly and explained why he performed each step, what he was checking, what he was doing and why it was important. When he finished the checklists, he had her get out of the plane, and then he climbed over the center console and got into the copilot’s chair.

“What are you doing, love?” she asked curiously.

“It’s an entirely different perspective sitting in the real chair, pretty kitty. If you learn from the right seat, you’ll be a little awkward when you sit in the left one. So we’re going to do this right, with you in the left seat. I can fly the plane from the right side, I did it enough sharing flight time with buddies in the Beech back in flight school.”

“Oh. Okay,” she said, hopping down and hurrying around the plane.

Instead of doing everything, he had Jessie do it. She was the one that started the plane, she was the one that did a radio check with the tower—in a slightly quavering voice, at that—and she was the one that did everything short of actually guiding the plane out of the hangar. As they taxied, Kit continued to teach her about their plane, and he stressed that what she was learning may be focused on the 400, but it could apply to virtually any plane. “It’s the method you need to focus on, pretty kitty,” he told her. “This could be our plane, it could be a Skyhawk, it could be a Piper, it could be a Beech or a Grumman, it could be a single prop or a four engine jet, it doesn't matter. If you understand the method, you can apply that method to any plane you fly."

"But wouldn't flying a bigger plane make it different?"

"It'll make it handle differently, and you'll have a lot more to do, but the fundamental method is the same," he told her.

It was a little different taking off from the right seat, but Kit adjusted to it. When they were up, Kit grilled Jessie about what she'd learned so far, about the mechanics of flight, and then he let her have the controls. They stayed relatively low, flying out over the ranch country southeast of Austin, as he let Jessie practice making turns, descending, ascending, and banking. She giggled as they did a fairly sharp bank. "I should turn us over like you did to Dad," she grinned at him.

"Let's save the aerobatics for when you have more time behind the stick," he said mildly. "It's not as simple as just pushing the stick, love. The flight characteristics of the plane will change when you invert it. Actually," he mused, then he looked at the altimeter. "Take us up to ten thousand. Let's introduce you to a stall."

Jessie was introduced to real flying then. She gasped when Kit intentionally stalled the plane, lowering the throttle and hitting the speed brakes, and she looked very frightened as the plane dropped out of the sky, entering a spin due to the way Kit jacked the rudder when the wings stalled. But Kit regained control of the plane with practiced ease, only losing about a thousand feet. "That's something you should never experience in this plane unless you do it on purpose, love," he told her. "This plane is almost impossible to stall by accident. Now, how did I get control back?" he asked.

She dredged her memory. “You work into the spin,” she answered. “To get air over your flight surfaces and work to put your nose down more steeply so you can regain control of the plane.”

“Very good. How do you get out of a spin?”

“One axis at a time,” she answered. “You focus on regaining yaw axis first, because regaining yaw control will make the plane nose down and let you get control back faster. After that, you get back longitudinal control, stopping the corkscrew, then latitudinal by pulling out of the dive.”

“Right. And the mechanics of it? How do you do it?”

“By working the controls in the opposite direction. If you’re sliding in yaw to the left, push the rudder right. The plane will want to naturally nose down once you slow the yaw spin, and once it noses down it’s much easier to regain control.”

“Right. What’s it called when you enter a spin?”

“Incipient.”

“Correct. And after you’re fully into the spin?”

“Developed.”

“Correct. How do you get out of a spin? What’s the key word, love?”

“Angle of attack,” she answered. “When the angle of attack decreases and you can overcome autorotation.”

“Exactly right, almost verbatim right out of the handbook,” he smiled. “Those are the three biggest words in flight school, love, angle of attack. Always remember exactly what they mean.”

“The angle between the wings and airflow,” she said immediately. “Which determines the lift the wings generate.”

“How do we alter our angle of attack without changing our direction or airspeed?”

She thought a second. “Flaps?”

“Very good!” he said with a big smile. “You’ve been studying hard, I see,” he said happily.

“Of course I have,” she winked in reply.

He let her invert the plane at ten thousand feet, and she found out that it wasn't as easy as just turning the plane back over. She found out that it took both stick and rudder to keep the plane stable and flying smoothly upside down, and turning the plane back over took more attention. “Now keep that a secret,” Kit winked at her. “It’s technically against flight regulations to perform aerobatic maneuvers in a utility class plane. We just broke the law.”

“Oh no, let’s run for Mexico!” she giggled, turning the plane south and opening up the throttle.

He stalled the plane three more times, and on the third time, he let Jessie try to recover after she asked for a chance to try. It was a flat stall with little yaw spin, a very easy stall from which to recover, and to his utter delight, she was able to recover control of the plane after about five seconds. When she pulled the nose up smoothly, he gave her a big kiss. “Outstanding, pretty kitty!” he beamed.

He let her fly around for over an hour, then he took control once they got close enough to the airport to have to start interacting with air traffic control. She watched carefully and listened as he interacted with traffic control, and she helped perform their landing checklist. He landed smoothly, and then let Jessie take over the taxi once he was off the runway, let her taxi them back to the Avia hangar. “Remember, this plane steers using differential braking,” he told her. “It will turn very sharply, but it’s always going to want to go in a straight line if you increase power while turning, and that’ll increase your turn radius. So never increase power during a turn.”

“Got it,” she nodded as she turned along a bend in the taxiway.

Kit was quite impressed with Jessie when he took over to put the plane back in their parking place. He was amazed that she got them out of that stall so smoothly, given she had so little time behind the controls. And he knew that she was intelligent, and that she had a quick mind, but she was amazing him with how much she was retaining from her self-study of the flight school books.

Kit was absolutely positive that she would get her pilot’s license in about three weeks in Kansas. With their own plane, she could practice what she was learning in the books, which just reinforced it. They’d give her a pretest when she arrived, and find out they’d have to teach her very little in a classroom, freeing up plenty of time to do the flying. She’d walk into that flight school literally already knowing how to fly. She’d just have to study for her written test and the oral exam given during the check ride, do her required flying hours, then do her check ride. She’d walk into that place already knowing how to fly a plane. All she’d need would be the formalities.

“Tomorrow, we’re going to a little airfield called Lakeview that’s northwest of Austin,” he told her. “And there, you’re going to learn how to take off, land, and do touch and go's."

"Why there?"

"Because it's a small private airfield with no tower, a nice long paved runway, and there will be very little traffic," he answered. "Think of it as going to a mall's parking lot early on Sunday morning to learn how to drive. You'll have plenty of space and few distractions."

"Okay," she nodded. "I'll make sure to go back to those sections and study them tonight. And I think that software they sent me has interactive programs that teach it."

She did just that, too. Kit talked to Clancy on the phone after they got home, and he put Jessie on the phone so he could thank her for the scones, while she was reading her books and also using her interactive software to learn all about the mechanics of taking off and landing. Kit was steeling himself for it; it was always a bumpy time for any new pilot, and the shocks on his plane's landing gear were going to be sorely tested.

Sheila opened the door without knocking. "Hey cousin," she called.

"Yeah?" he asked, pausing from the interactive quiz he was taking on his laptop about the avionics system in the CJ series jets.

"You got a minute? I need some help with something."

He paused the quiz and went out with her, going to her car. The trunk of her Mustang was tied down, with a box hanging out of it. "What did you buy?" he asked.

"My TV died on my last night, I have no idea why," she answered. "Can you help me carry it to my place?"

“Sure,” he said. She’d bought a large flat-screen TV, looked like 40 inches at least, and the two of them carried it from her car.

“Has Terry been calling you?” she asked.

“Not really, why?”

“He’s been calling me every freakin’ day,” she complained. “He’s really trying to get Ally’s number.”

“I told him to leave that alone, that she’d call him when she’s ready,” he grunted.

“Well, he’s not listening very well. So, what did you think of Kendall Brighton?”

Kit chuckled. “I like him,” he said honestly.

“Yeah, he seems nice,” she answered. “I met him last month when I went up for the weekend to see Mom, and bring back more of my stuff. I can’t wait for them to finish the apartments,” she said. “As soon as we move in, I’ll be able to have my stuff shipped down.”

“Any word from U.T.?”

She nodded as they turned down the sidewalk leading to her building. “They said I’ll have to pay out of state tuition for the fall semester, but I’ll qualify for in-state tuition in the spring.”

“So they accepted you?”

“I’m transferring from Harvard, cousin,” she winked. “They sure as hell didn’t say no.”

“Well, that’s one less thing for you to worry about. How’s Allison been? I haven’t seen her since the party.”

“She’s doing fine. She’s got finals coming up, and she has to take her oral Master’s test, so she’s been shut up in her house studying.”

“Oh yeah, that’s right,” Kit mused. “We’ll have to throw her a party when she graduates. Well, you will. Me and Jessie will be in Kansas.”

“Pft, we’ll come up to Kansas the weekend after she graduates and party there.”

“We’ll be busy, cousin. These schools aren’t five days a week. We’ll be going every day, even Saturdays and Sundays. On the weekends, I can buy time in their flight simulators that counts as logged hours, and I intend to do just that. I have six weeks, and I’m going to make good use of every single day. I’m also gonna start work on my flight instructor’s certificate, so I can teach Jessie and not have to pay someone else to do it.”

“Wooo, could you teach me?”

“Only if you’re serious about it,” he said adamantly as they reached her door, which was already open. They carried it into her living room, which had cherrywood-colored furniture. “Flying isn’t a game you can play whenever you want, Sheila. If you don’t take it seriously, you’ll kill yourself and whoever is in the plane with you when you finally crash. Go ask Jessie how much she has to learn, she’s already started studying for her license. It takes real dedication, because there is absolutely no way you can fake the final test. It’s an oral test combined with a check flight where you do everything and the test-giver watches while he asks you questions.”

“Yeah, well, I still think I’d like it.”

“If you really want to learn to fly, I suggest you enroll in a flight school, because they know what they’re doing. There’s a very good one at Bergstrom, AIAA. They’re professionals, and you won’t have to worry about buying flight time since you can afford to rent planes. Just be ready to pay. Getting a license will cost you about ten thousand or so, but every new rating you want will cost you more.”

“That’s why you’re getting that instructor thing,” she noted. “So you don’t have to pay to get Jessie those extra licenses.”

“Yes, that’s what I said not a minute ago,” he teased.

He helped her take the TV out of the box and put it up on her TV stand. “There ya go,” he told her. “I’m gonna head back home.”

“Thanks cousin,” Sheila said, bending down to hook up the TV to her cable box and DVD player. “I got it from here.”

The Perry issue went out on Friday at 44 pages, which made it larger than usual, but Kit was more interested in Monday. He was sure that the magazine was going to turn the corner this week, because there was a big picture of Governor Perry on the cover, him sitting behind his desk with the caption Gov. Rick Perry Speaks His Mind, with Barry’s interview and article as the main story. Kit kept a close eye on the Circle K down by Bergstrom, since they were selling the magazine, checking it both morning and evening as he and Jessie went to the airport and back.

The days were spent in training Jessie. She had learned all the aspects of moving the plane around on the ground, and he had taken her up and let her fly, so moving on to the more complex flight operations was the next logical step. Their first lesson in taking off and landing was predictably rocky, and his poor plane got some hard bangs that Wednesday. But that was part of the learning process, and they had practiced it again Thursday afternoon, which helped Jessie turn the corner. She could take off very well, that was actually easy, it was landing that she needed to practice. Saturday was spent teaching her the various aspects of in-flight maneuvers she had to know, ascents and descents, turning in climbs and descents, slow flying, throttled flying, high altitude and low altitude, ground-reference maneuvers like turning while holding a set altitude and distance from a landmark, and that afternoon a crosswind at Lakeview gave them the chance to practice takeoffs and landings in crosswind situations. Most of what they did were things she hadn't studied yet, since she was busy learning the flight regulations right now, but he wanted to give her an early idea of what kind of maneuvers she would have to know how to perform to get her license.

Monday, all of Rick's fears were allayed—at least this week—and Kit's faith was justified. They just got to the black side of breaking even. It was certainly no staggering profit, but they managed to pay everyone's salary that week.

That entered a pattern for Kit that lasted the entire month. He would have a meeting every morning with Rick, then call Clancy every morning at ten to keep up with him. He kept busy with a constant influx of more and more research, since he was researching for himself, Barry, Lilly, Marty, and even Denise, which kept him on the fine edge of overexertion almost every day. Afternoons were devoted to their coming trip to Kansas, which he looked forward to more and more every day, counting the days to May 5 as much as he was counting the days to September 30, which was when Jessie was supposed to deliver. Kit systematically went through all the work that Cessna sent him, memorizing all their manuals and using their software to master the avionics and cockpit configurations they used in their jets, used the testing software they sent him to quiz himself every day. Jessie kept pace, splitting her time between preparing for her finals—she only had to take two actual tests, her other classes were an end of semester paper or project—and studying for her pilot’s license. Every afternoon they went up in the plane for at least an hour, giving Jessie time to get comfortable behind the controls and get proficient in the actual maneuvers she had to know how to perform.

Every Friday, they sent out more magazines, to more locations, continuing what Rick considered to be a frighteningly aggressive expansion policy, but Kit was insistent...and he was paying for it. Kit used up the entire Vulpan stock dividend, and had even dipped into their crisis fund money, but he wanted a certain threshold of units before he left for Kansas, where they’d level off and allow sales to increase nice and consistently for the six weeks he’d be in Kansas. He was sure Rick would continue expanding while Kit was in Kansas, but not as aggressively as Kit would.

Every Monday, he saw figures that kept him optimistic. They were either slightly in the red or just barely breaking even each week, but they weren’t far in the red, and their sales numbers continued to steadily increase. That was what Kit wanted to see, and that was what kept him consistently optimistic. There was a market out there for the magazine, it was just going to take a little time for the readers to find the magazine. Until then, until it really took off, they just had to keep pushing it, keep cranking out quality issues.

The expectation of what was coming, both for them and for Jessie’s pregnancy, just made the time fly by. Kit noticed her baby bump for the very first time late in April, one nice sunny Monday morning as he held her after waking up, putting his paw on her belly and feeling a very slight yet significant thickening of her usually slim, taut belly. He gasped and felt her stomach with both paws, then laughed. “It’s about time!” he proclaimed, kissing her on the ear.

“What?” she asked sleepily.

“My son is starting to make himself noticed!” he proclaimed.

“My daughter should know better than to make me fat before it’s time,” she countered. “But we’ll know for sure in about four hours, and you’ll be in for me for a month’s worth of foot massages and pedicures!”

Kit looked at the countdown calendar, and kissed her again. “Twenty weeks and six days to go, pretty kitty.”

It was just one change in her body. Over the last few weeks, her breasts had grown in size, which Doctor Mac had said was entirely normal, gaining a cup size, which forced her to buy new bras, and she went ahead and bought maternity clothes while she was at it. She’d outgrown her morning sickness, and was now eating more consistently and had suffered a few episodes of craving. Her stomach had not started to thicken fast enough for Doctor Mac, and had dragged her in for a full medical checkup last week, a checkup that showed that their baby was quite healthy, the problem was that Jessie’s uterus had not filled with the normal amount of amniotic fluid yet, which was one of the contributing factors to the baby bump. Doctor Mac changed her vitamin intake levels a bit, and it seemed to have done the trick. Kit had noticed a definite thickening around her waist over the last couple of weeks, but it hadn’t been a thickening out from her belly, more of a settling in around her sides, as is her waist was preparing to carry the extra weight. But now there was definitely a little bump there, only noticeable by touch, and even then only because he knew her body so well.

“From here out, I get fat,” she sighed. “But it’ll be worth it.”

“You’ll never be fat, you silly kitty,” he told her, kissing her on her neck. “I keep telling you, you’ll be pregnant. And I’ll love you more and more every day, because I’ll see you carrying our baby inside you, and I’ll love you for it.”

“We’ll see how much you love me when I’m waddling around.”

He laughed. “I will break you of this delusion, you silly femme,” he told her.

“What delusion?”

“That I’m only with you because of your body,” he teased. “Your body is a perk, not the fundamental basis of our relationship.”

“A perk? I’m a perk?” she asked, rolling on her side and looking up at him.

“Yes, it’s one of the unwritten bonuses I got out of this deal,” he grinned. “The chance to make love to the sexiest beast in Austin every day, who will continue to be the sexiest beast in Austin, even after she’s well into her third trimester.” He brazenly fondled her breast. “And since these have grown, it’s been interesting,” he grinned naughtily at her. “That’s a part of you where I’m finding there’s more to love.”

She smiled slightly. “What, they weren’t big enough for you before?”

“They were perfect before, but now I get to experience the whole ‘too much to grab in one paw’ deal. It’s been an interesting challenge,” he winked.

She laughed, then wrapped her arms around him and pulled him down into a kiss. “What do you want for breakfast?” she asked.

“Aat, the doctor said no food until the ultrasound, and liquids only up to three hours before,” he reminded her. “So how about a nice glass of orange juice?”

“I want eggs,” she sighed. “I’m hungry.”

“Four more hours, and I’ll take you out for pizza,” he promised.

“Pizza,” she snorted.

“Pizza in Galveston,” he grinned.

“Ohh, that’s okay then!” she said brightly.

Jessie had a doctor’s appointment at noon, which meant that she would miss school today. She had already arranged for the absence, getting all her assignments done and getting the notes she would need. Her finals started next week, and both the classes in which she would take a final held class on Monday. He supervised her glass of orange juice, making sure she drank it, then they settled in for the three hour wait where she couldn’t eat, drink or urinate by getting involved in studying. Jessie was studying for a final while Kit was studying the flight manual for a Citation X, which Cessna had sent to him about two weeks ago along with software for it. Twice, Kit had to stop her from going to the bathroom, but when she couldn’t hold it any longer, he warned her not to completely empty her bladder.

They were at the doctor’s office right on time, and Doctor Mac was literally waiting for them. Kit, as usual, was present when they went to the ultrasound, and Jessie laughed and shivered when they smeared what looked like Vaseline into the fur all over her lower belly. "I'm going to need a shower after this," she laughed.

"Most femmes eat fast food on the way home to wash the jelly out of their fur," Doctor Mac smiled in return as her assistant, a short, slightly plump dog with tan fur, finished applying the jelly to Jessie's stomach. Doctor Mac took the ultrasound probe, which looked like a paddle, then applied it to Jessie's belly. Jessie and Kit watched in fascination as Doctor Mac explained what they were seeing on a display on the device. "There's the head, right there, and nicely developed," she said, pointing out a head-like feature. "Well, that's one for Kit's column," she laughed. "Your baby has a fox's muzzle. See how it's long, like his? Since both of you have triangular ears, that won't really be a fight. A well developed body, your baby's development is right on track, almost textbook. Ah, and now we know," she said as the baby seemed to move on the grainy monitor. "So, what was the bet?"

They both laughed. "A month of foot massages and weekly pedicures against a month of doing dishes," Jessie answered.

"Well, Kit, I'm sorry to tell you this, but you'd better learn how to apply nail polish," she grinned. "Congratulations, it's a girl."

"Ha!" Jessie said triumphantly, pointing at Kit. "I told you it was a girl!"

"I demand a do-over!" Kit called strongly.

"You can have your do-over after our daughter is born," Jessie told him.

“But, maybe he’s just not well endowed,” Kit protested. “Look again!”

“Are you that hot for a boy?” Doctor MacNair asked.

“I just want to get out of painting her toe claws,” he grinned.

“No chance now!” she laughed. “You made a bet, you lost a bet, you own up to that bet!” She held up her foot and wiggled her toes. “You’re going to really get to know these for the next month, baby!” she proclaimed.

But still, now they knew. A daughter. He was going to have a little girl, and at least they knew so far that she was going to have Kit’s muzzle. He gave Jessie an impulsive kiss, and held her paw. “We’d better look into pink bedding,” he smiled. “And I’d better talk to your dad about learning how to shoot a gun so I can keep the boys away from her.”

Jessie laughed. “Don’t be like my mom!”

“It’s a simple matter of statistics,” he said. “Her grandmother is beautiful, her mother is beautiful, so she’s going to be beautiful. I need to take precautions now, before the boys start following her around panting.”

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled, and she laughed shyly. “Well, I’ve done enough skeet shooting with Dad, handsome fox, I’ll show you how it’s done,” she smiled.

After Jessie was cleaned up with alcohol pads, and she got the chance to finally empty her bladder, they went on to the rest of the exam. The doctor took blood and did a couple of tests that she said were checking the baby for some common conditions that were detectable early. Afterward, she sent Kit and Jessie out to get something to eat, and had them return about two hours later. They sat in Doctor MacNair’s office while she wrote on a prescription pad. "I'm writing out the name of a prenatal supplement I want you to start taking, Jessie," she explained as she wrote it out. "You can find it in the vitamin aisle of any drugstore. You'll take one a day. Just add it to your current vitamin regimen."

"What kind of vitamin is it?"

"It's an iron supplement," she answered. "The bloodwork is showing you're a bit low in iron, hon, so we need to get that back in balance."

"I thought I was already taking one."

"You are as part of a multivitamin, but you're like many young femmes who need even more iron than usual," she answered. "Young femmes have a high demand for iron from their own bodies, and when you add on the baby's needs, it can create an iron deficiency. So, you need to increase your iron intake."

"Oh, okay. How about the baby? Did the tests show anything?"

"They showed your baby is absolutely and perfectly healthy," she smiled. "No defects, no abnormalities, no indicators that the baby might have a condition. So, you can cross birth defects and Down Syndrome off the list of possible problems."

"That's a relief," Jessie said with a smile.

"That's a Vulpan in there, she'd better not have any problems. She's part of a clearly superior bloodline," Kit said loftily, but his smile betrayed his true position.

"I'll show you a superior bloodline when I get you home," Jessie teased. "After I cut a few furrows into your arm!"

Kit laughed and patted her on the shoulder. “See the abuse I endure? She’s such a meanie,” he teased.

“Yes, and I’m sure you do everything you can in order to be abused,” she remarked in a deadpan voice.

“Oh, does he,” Jessie sighed. “He’s an immature brat, but despite that, I love him anyway.”

“God I hope so, since that’s my daughter in your belly,” he said lightly.

After the exam, Jessie called Vil to give her the good news as they drove to the airport, then, after they filled up the plane’s gas tank, they taxied out. Jessie was again in the pilot’s seat, and she was the one who taxied the plane out of the hangar. Kit was technically breaking the law letting her control the plane, but they’d never really catch them since she did such a good job of it. All that practice at Lakeview let her taxi the plane like a pro. She taxied them out to the runway, but Kit was the one that actually handled the takeoff. Once they were up, he let her take over, making her plan her course using the Garmin’s flight management system, search for any dangerous weather along their path, and calculate how long it would take to get there and how much gas they’d use during the trip at the cruising speed and altitude she chose to use for the flight. Once she had all that done, he started bombarding her with questions about flight regulations, weather conditions, and questions about the plane itself. She had to know the plane, be able to answer questions about the plane, for it was their plane in which she would fly to get her license. Kit had already arranged that through Cessna. She would do her required hours in her own plane, and do her check ride in her own plane, and only after she got her private license would she fly another plane, when she started flying a twin engine Cessna supplied by the school to get her complex and multi-engine ratings. Jessie answered every question he threw at her almost immediately, and she missed very, very few of them. He ran the gambit, from icing conditions to the rules of traffic collision avoidance to stalls to low speed turns to air traffic control procedures to the difference between VFR and IFR. He kept pelting questions at her as she lined them up for their approach to Scholes International Airport, but let Kit take over when they got close because the airport had a control tower, and Jessie was still learning the exact procedures about landing at airports where there was traffic control. He had her bring up the profile of the airport on her laptop from the FAA airport database program they had on their laptops, which had a diagram layout of every airport in North America, which told him where to go once he was on the runway. She guided him off the runway and along taxi ramps to a parking area near the terminal for short term parking. “Now you get to partake in the age old tradition, pretty kitty. Tying down the plane,” he chuckled.

“But we’re only gonna be here like four hours! We don’t have to tie it down!”

“We don’t have to tie it down,” he agreed, “but I’d rather not come back and find our plane on its back because a wind gust caught the wings and flipped her over. It takes ten minutes to tie her down, and that’s much better than taking a bus home,” he winked at her.

They indeed went out for pizza. Kit rented a car there at the airport and they drove around until they found a pizza parlor, one right on the beach, and they watched the sun set behind them as they ate Chicago deep dish pizza at an outdoor round glass and iron table with a striped umbrella. “So, are you ready for finals?” he asked.

“I will be,” she answered confidently, taking Kit’s broadband connect card Rick gave him for his birthday and connecting it to her laptop.

“What are you doing?”

“Making sure Professor Coffee got my assignment, he said he’d email me,” she answered. “I love this broadband thing, handsome fox. It’s awesome!”

“I’m sure we’ll get some use out of it,” he chuckled. “In one week.”

“I know. Excited?”

“God, you know it,” he laughed. “I just hope I’m ready.”

“Love, you can name every control in a Citation and point to where it’s supposed to be,” she laughed. “I just hope I’m ready. I want to get as much done there as I can.”

“We have six weeks.”

“Well, that’s just a floating number, love, based on how much time it’s supposed to take you to finish,” she told him. “If you finish early, then I don’t have as much time.”

Kit snorted. “We have six weeks,” he said. “That’s what Rick’s giving us, that’s how much we’re taking. If I finish in two weeks, then I’ll just beg Vil to pay for me to rate in another jet. The main thing we’ll need time for is you, pretty kitty. You have to log hours in the plane to qualify for your license. Log official hours, anyway,” he chuckled. “They don’t know that you could literally get in the plane right now and fly it home by yourself. You know enough to do it, and you certainly know how to take off and land,” he smiled.

“You made me practice enough!” she accused.

“So, the time is for you. If you can finish your private in three weeks, you’ll have enough time for them to rate you on multi and complex and get your high altitude authorization. Then you can log hours back here at home while I get my flight instructor certificates, then I can officially train you on IFR and your commercial rating.”

“And jets.”

“Well, I could get rated to train on a jet type, but I kinda don’t have a jet here to train you on,” he laughed. “We’ll have to go to a flight school for that.”

“Well, when we earn our millions, we can buy our own jet, and then you can teach me to fly it,” she smiled.

“I guess I could at that,” he chuckled, nodding in agreement. “I just hope I can find the time, it’s gonna be really busy at the magazine when we get back. Rick plans to expand again after I get home. He’s going to slow expansion while I’m in Kansas and let our circulation solidify, and also build up a little reserve capital, then we’re gonna hire four new workers. We’re hiring an artist to assist Jeffrey, two research assistants to help me, and another writer.”

“You’re hiring two?”

He nodded. “Rick wants me to branch out even more from research, so his plan is to let me run the research department and let the assistants handle the smaller jobs, and leave the really important research projects to me. That will free up some of my time for other duties, like writing or just goofing off.”

“Well, you are part owner,” she winked.

“He wants to train me completely in editing,” he nodded. “Rick said he wants me capable of running every aspect of the magazine so he can go on a vacation,” he chuckled. “He certainly deserves one. It took him breaking his leg to get a few days off. He’s worked without a vacation since he started the magazine.”

“I think as soon as we get back from Kansas, we need to send Rick and Martha on a trip. Can we afford sending them to Hawaii?” she asked.

“Yes, we can,” he said, smiling broadly. “I think that’s a wonderful idea, pretty kitty. I’ll have to dip into our crisis fund, but I’d say that’s a fully justifiable expense. I’ll call Vil and see if she can wrangle us a deal on a flight and a hotel room, and we’ll pay for it. Let’s make it a surprise.” He snapped his fingers. “Let’s make it a double surprise!” he said, grabbing his phone and speed-dialing Vil.

“Hey bro,” she greeted. “What’s up?”

“Vil, can you do me a favor?” he asked.

“Sure, what is it?”

“I’d like you to find out how much it would cost to send Rick and Martha and Jessie’s parents to Hawaii for a week, the week after we get back from Kansas,” he told her. “Rick deserves a special gift for being so kind to me, so me and Jessie have decided to buy him a trip to Hawaii to show our gratitude. And since Rick and Martha like Jessie’s folks so much, let’s just send them too. That way they can enjoy a holiday together.”

“Bro, I think that’s a marvelous idea!” Vil said brightly as Jessie absolutely beamed at him. “I’ll pay for it, because I know you’ve been sinking all your money into the magazine. You can pay me back later,” she said quickly, to cut him off.

“I think I can agree to that,” he answered, then looked to Jessie. “Vil said yes,” he told her.

“Good!” Jessie said with a clap, “and thank you for thinking of my folks, handsome fox!”

“Now this is going to be a surprise, Vil,” Kit warned. “I want to spring this on them when we get back from Kansas. But Savid will need to know, so he can quietly make preparations to take over editing the week Rick’s gone.”

“I’ll make sure he never sees it coming,” she laughed. “It’s a good thing that John isn’t teaching summer school this year, or this would never work.”

“Good. Thanks a ton, sis, you’re wonderful.”

“Oh, by the way, me and Kendall are going to fly over to Kansas to see you while you’re there,” she told him. “I’m not sure what weekend it will be, but there will be a visit.”

“We’ll be happy to see you. Is everything all arranged for Kansas?”

“Yup. I have your hotel suite reserved, I have two cars rented for you while you’re there, and I’ve basically swept everyone out of your way. You’ll have complete run of the place, bro, the instructors are at your beck and call, and the flight simulator is literally there whenever you want to use it. Cessna agreed to give you complete priority, even to the point of kicking other students out of it if you want to use it.”

“Well, you didn’t have to go that far,” Kit laughed. “How about Jessie?”

“The same thing. She’ll have two full-time instructors training her in as much as they can teach her in six weeks. They’re confident that if she’s studied the material they sent her, she’ll get her license and her multi-engine ratings at a bare minimum.”

“Good, that’s what I want her to get,” he said. “I might be calling you while I’m there to beg,” he laughed.

“Oh? Beg for what?” she asked impishly.

“If I finish my training before the six weeks is up, I might beg you to buy me another rating,” he laughed. “I want to stay the entire six weeks, so my pretty kitty can log as many hours as she can. That’ll give her a head start when she goes for her instrument rating and commercial license. If I finish early, I’ll have nothing to do.”

“Bro, you basically own that place for six weeks,” she told him simply. “If you finish early and want to train on a different jet, you just let me know, and I’ll make it happen. I’m glad I finally found something I can spoil you with,” she teased.

He laughed ruefully. “I can’t argue there. My towering morals seem to evaporate when it comes to learning to fly jets. I guess I can’t deny my boyhood dream.”

“Well, we’ll bring the little boy out in you yet,” she teased. “I gotta go, bro, I’m up to my ears in tax reports here.”

“Still?”

“We already filed, I’m examining the reports now,” she told him.

“Ah. Well, have fun with that.”

“Hush, you,” she chuckled. “Let me say bye to Jessie.”

“Sure thing. Hold on, and I lova ya, sis.”

“I love you too, bro.”

Kit gave Jessie the phone, and finished his pizza as he felt excitement well up in him. In one week, they’d be on the way to Kansas. Kit would be learning to fly jets, and Jessie would be getting her pilot’s license on a fast track. Then, after six weeks of training on jets during the day and doing his research assignments at night, he’d return to Austin and send Rick on a well-deserved trip to Hawaii. He was scheduled to be out of the cast by then, so he’d have a wonderful time, and finally get to take a nice rest.

And what was most important of all, he was going to have a baby girl. A daughter. All at once, the wonder and responsibility of being a dad washed over him, and he felt more devoted than ever to Jessie and their marriage. Finding out their child was a girl made it seem much more real, much more imminent. It was a concrete fact, and that made it all feel much closer. Now they could prepare for the baby knowing what they’d want for her, and that feeling would make it feel that much more real to him.

He just hoped he would be a good father, a much better father than his own father had been...but then again, just about any male could be a better father than his had been.

He would prove to himself that he was a better male than his father. He would be the best dad he could be, supportive, loving, and nurturing. He would teach her, try to give her what wisdom he could, be there to hold her paw when she needed it, but let her go when it was time for her to try things on her own. He wanted his daughter to grow up healthy, happy, and want for nothing. He wanted her to grow up responsible and intelligent, not be like his cousins, to understand her position and be conscientious and dependable.

He knew she would be a beautiful little girl. He just hoped that he could help her be just as beautiful inside as she would be outside...just like her wonderful mother.

Chapter 27

He was so excited he could barely sit still.

Their Cessna 400 landed on a brisk, cloudy, windy Sunday at Municipal Airport in Independence, Kansas after a four hour flight that seemed to take them a million years. Kit was so excited to finally be there, so anxious to get started, he flew the plane at almost full throttle, cruising at 220 knots at 17,500 feet and landing in a stiff headwind about ten minutes from violating the plane's emergency reserve, draining his tanks to get there quickly, so much so Kit had to land and refuel in Oklahoma, where they also had lunch. They landed at about two in the afternoon, and there on the north side, with its large buildings, was the Cessna Flight Training Center. It was there where Kit would tie down his plane, and it was there where he and Jessie would be spending the next six weeks of their lives. He taxied the plane towards their compound, and a guide truck came out to meet them. Jessie took video of their arrival from the right seat as the guide truck brought them to a large hangar, and then guided them inside to occupy a spot right near the hangar doors. Kit turned the plane around and shut it down as a femme raccoon, a cat, and a tall ocelot approached. The raccoon was wearing a pant suit, while the cat and ocelot were wearing dress shirts with the Cessna logo embroidered on their pockets and jeans. "Mister and Misses Vulpan, you're early!" the raccoon called as Kit opened the gullwing door. "We didn't expect you until later this afternoon!"

"I couldn't wait to get here," Kit laughed. "Are you Amanda Wilkes?"

“Yes, I am,” she nodded. “Welcome to Independence. Are you ready to go to your hotel?”

“Well, can we take a quick tour first?” he asked as Jessie opened her door and climbed out.

“I think we can manage that,” the ocelot smiled, stepping up and offering his paw to Jessie. “I’m David Summers, ma’am, and I’ll be your flight instructor.”

“Hi, I’m Jessie Vulpan,” she smiled.

“Have you been studying the materials I sent you?”

“Oh, yes sir!” she said with a laugh. “Kit makes me study every night!”

“I think you’ll find she’s all but ready to take her check ride,” Kit told him with a smile. “She can recite the FAR to you verbatim.”

“Well, there’s more to it than the regs,” he smiled. “And I’m happy to see you bought one of our planes! It keeps my paychecks coming,” he chuckled.

“This plane is why I’m getting my license!” Jessie laughed. “I love it so much, I’m learning to fly it!”

The male cat offered his paw to Kit. “It’s good to meet you, Mister Vulpan. I’m Luke Jones, and I’ll be your primary flight instructor for the Citation program.”

“I’m very happy to meet you,” Kit laughed.

“Have you been studying your materials?” he asked.

Kit grinned. “Do you want me to blindfold myself and point out the location of every control in a Citation cockpit?”

“I think you can do that when we start,” he smiled. “Did you find the software helpful?”

“Immensely,” he answered as he opened the cargo door and started pulling out their suitcases. “It’s one thing to see a picture, but quite another to have that interactive simulation that quizzes you on what a control is and what it does.”

“How was your flight up, Mister Vulpan?” Amanda asked.

“Smooth,” he answered. “We stopped in Oklahoma to refuel and grab a bite to eat, but outside of that, I’ve been flying her at about max speed to get up here. I’ve been just a little anxious to do this,” he said.

“It’s all I’ve been hearing about for two weeks,” Jessie sighed, but she was smiling at him.

“This is all the luggage you brought?” Amanda asked curiously as he pulled out the second small suitcase, and Jessie shouldered their carryall holding their laptops.

“The rest of it is on its way up via UPS,” he told them. “As you know, this plane doesn’t have the biggest load rating in the world, and we had too much to bring given how long we’ll be here. So, we just shipped up our other stuff and carried what will hold us over til it gets here.”

“Clever,” Amanda said with a nod. “Your rental car is just outside, and a second rental car is already parked at your hotel. So, you can put your luggage away and we’ll give you a tour of our training center.”

They were showed around, from the classrooms to the two large flight simulators, all of it brand new and cutting edge. “This is a much different flight school from what you might have attended Mister Vulpan,” Amanda told him. “This isn’t a for-profit school, it’s where we bring our customers, their private pilots, and our employee pilots for their initial type rating when they buy planes from us or they come to work for us. We have two facilities where you will train, Mister Vulpan. Here, and at our Wichita facility. This facility is currently dedicated to our Mustang, CJ four, and Columbus programs, since the Mustangs are built here in Independence and the CJ four and Columbus aren’t in production yet, and we’ve yet to incorporate them into our Wichita facility. The Wichita facility is where you’ll be training on the CJ series, the Encore, and the Citation Ten. Our facility here is understandably small but highly advanced, because it serves a very exclusive clientele of Mustang pilots and our test pilots preparing to test fly the CJ four and Columbus, and there’s a connected, even smaller facility where we train our pilots on our more complicated propeller aircraft like the four hundred, that holds flight simulators Jessie will be using when she can’t fly on VFR. Our Wichita facility is much larger, but just as advanced. Because of that, we’re completely focused on the timely and thorough education of our customer or their pilots. Our operation is usually centered mainly on our Citation jets, furs who already have their licenses, but we’ve made a special accommodation to give your wife her initial flight training,” she said with a smile. “David has graciously agreed to be her flight instructor, when he’s usually one of our Citation Mustang instructor pilots.”

“I’ve been told to train you as much as I can in six weeks, Misses Vulpan,” he told her. “If you get through your initial private certificate quickly, we can get you type rated on multi-engine craft and also get you your instrument rating.”

“I’ll do my best, Mister Summers.”

“Please, call me Dave,” he smiled.

“I find it odd that you have just one jet program down here,” Kit noted, “since you build the jets in Wichita.”

“The Mustang? It’s built here in Independence, Mister Vulpan, so it’s best to have the training facility for them here, at least for now. We had plenty of empty space down here after we built this building, so we put the Mustang training program here, and added the experimental flight programs while we prepare to expand our Citation flight training facility in Wichita to incorporate them there. The CJ four and Columbus are still in flight testing stage, so we decided to make use of the extra room and also keep them separate from the other jets, to keep the pilots we’re training on them focused.”

“Ah. So, when I finish here, I’ll be moving up to Wichita?”

“Then coming back here, while your wife does all of her training here,” she pointed out. “So instead of moving you, we’ll just allow you to commute to Wichita when you begin those phases of your training. We’ll be furnishing you a Mustang for your personal use after you complete your rating training, Mister Vulpan,” she smiled. “In fact, you’ll be helping with the test flights and shakedown of that jet, it’s just come off the assembly line. You’ll be the first pilot in the seat after it’s had its initial inspection flight and safety shakedown. You’ll be flying up every day, and also getting some real time behind a jet yoke in the bargain.”

“Now that sounds fun!” Kit said excitedly. “But why not put us at Wichita rather than here?”

“We had Misses Vulpan to consider as well, Mister Vulpan, and so we decided that it would be the most convenient for everyone if we let you settle in here, since this airport is where Misses Vulpan will be doing all of her training.”

“Ah, yes, that is best,” Kit nodded as Jessie looked at a flight simulator.

“Since you already have your license, it will be very easy for you to fly to Wichita and back every day. It’s only about fifteen minutes from here in a Mustang.”

“Not enough time to have any fun,” Kit laughed.

“Now, let me show you the planes we have for Misses Vulpan to fly,” she said, guiding them down a long corridor.

They entered a smaller hangar, where a Cessna 400 painted white with blue stripes rested, and beside it was a twin engine Cessna 303. “We’re not actually having her fly in your plane, but we have a four hundred here for her to use,” she motioned. “That keeps us from putting hours on your personal plane. This is our four hundred trainer. And we have a Crusader for her to use to get her multi-engine rating.”

“It’ll feel weird not being in our plane,” Jessie said, looking at the planes.

“You’ll find our trainer flies and feels just the same as yours,” David assured her. “We keep her in tip-top shape.”

“It’s all the same inside?” she asked.

“Yup,” he nodded. “We looked up the plane you bought using her serial number, and our trainer here has the same systems as your plane, so you’ll feel right at home inside.”

“Who did your training on the four hundred, Mister Vulpan?” Luke asked.

“I did,” Kit answered. “I already knew the Garmin, so I just studied the manuals on the plane itself. I have my commercial, so I can get away with doing that in a utility class airplane.”

Luke laughed. “Yes, you can,” he nodded. “As long as you don’t mind paying outrageous insurance.”

“Well, while I’m here, we can take a check ride in my four hundred and you can sign me off to make the insurance company happy,” Kit said with a smile.

“We can definitely do that,” Amanda said confidently. “That should bring down your insurance quite a bit.”

In all, Kit was impressed with the facility. They had three small classrooms, and one was in use, where three furs were being instructed by a fourth, who was using a laser pointer to indicate parts of a Mustang cockpit that was projected on a screen by an overhead projector. They had two flight simulators for the Mustang and one flight simulator each for the CJ4 and Columbus. One of the Mustang simulators was in use when they came into the room, and Kit saw on a monitor an image of the cockpit, where a thin femme bear was behind the controls, adjusting something on her Garmin display. Luke was explaining their training schedule to him as they walked, and from him Kit learned that he would spend his first few days in a classroom, going over the fundamentals of jet flight from an aviation standpoint, then they'd go into the Mustang's flight systems, learning how to manage a jet's systems, which were much different and more complex than any plane he'd ever flown before. After he finished his classroom training, he'd be spending most of his time in a simulator. Kit would literally be type rated on a Mustang without ever actually flying it. The simulator was approved by the FAA to type rate pilots, since it could duplicate all aspects of actual flight...and they could even program it to mimic in-flight emergencies. And it was a hell of a lot safer to deal with real emergency conditions in a simulator then train for the eventuality in a real plane, but never face the actual conditions until it actually happened. The simulators even moved, being on a platform moved by hydraulic pistons.

After they finished their tour, the three of them walked Kit and Jessie out to their car. "Now, remember, we start at eight o'clock," David told Jessie. "We'll meet in the hangar where you saw the trainer plane, alright?"

"I'll be there, Dave," she nodded.

"You'll start at eight as well, Mister Vulpan," Luke told him.

"Please, call me Kit," he said with a smile. "You're probably older than me, I'm the one who should be calling you Mister."

Luke laughed. "Then the boss would give me a funny look," he smiled, pointing towards Amanda.

"Darn right I would," she smiled, giving Kit a card. "This is my work, phone, cell, and fax numbers, Mister Vulpan. If you have any questions or need to talk to me, you can reach me any time. I'll be at your immediate disposal. Consider me your liaison to the Cessna company," she smiled. "So, if these two jokers do anything out of bounds, I'm the one you call."

“We’re not jokers! We’re troubadors,” David smiled.

“Well, these troubadors had better do a good job,” she smiled at them.

“I’m sure they will,” Jessie said with a smile.

“If you studied as much as you say, we’ll look good without ever lifting a finger,” David laughed. “If you’ve learned most of the bookwork already, then that’ll really streamline you getting your license. Heck, we might even be able to wrangle your IFR rating if you can log enough hours and do the bookwork quickly enough, since both plane models you’ll be flying are IFR rated planes. We can just double up and kill both birds with one training regimen. I’d be happy to give you the training.”

“I’ll do my best,” she smiled. “I already told Kit, when we leave, I’m flying the plane home.”

“Then we’ll do everything we can to make sure it happens,” David said with a reassuring smile.

The trio left them at their rental car, a Saturn, which had the keys in it as well as a map showing them where their hotel was. Vil had put them up in an Embassy Suites hotel, which was more like a small apartment than a hotel room; the chain was famous for their two-room hotel suites, a living room/kitchenette and a bedroom. The hotel was only six miles from the airport, on the outskirts of the town of Independence, according to the map.

“Well, what do you think, love?” Kit asked after they got into the car.

“I think we’re both going to have a lot of fun here!” she said with an eager smile.

“We’ll both be busy as sin,” Kit chuckled.

“It’s better than me just puttering around the house doing nothing,” she told him. “And besides, I’ll be learning something while I’m here, something really cool!”

“That makes me happier than you probably believe,” he told her. “I’d hate for you to come up here and be bored.”

“Oh, this will not be boring,” she laughed.

The Embassy Suites hotel was just off state route 27, and across the street from a strip mall anchored by a Wal-Mart and Sam’s Club. They carried their luggage in and to the desk, where a short, plump bobcat greeted them with a smile that revealed he’d broken a fang and had yet to have it fixed. “May I help you, sir?”

“Yes, we have reservations for Vulpan, Kit and Jessie Vulpan,” Kit told him.

The bobcat punched keys on his computer. “Yes, yes sir, right here. Ah, it looks like this was a special arrangement. There’s a couple of messages here. First, we replaced the bed in your room with a Sleep Number bed, by special arrangement. I’m not sure why it told me to tell you that,” he said curiously.

“I understand why,” Kit chuckled. “I have what you might call special needs when it comes to mattresses.”

“Ah, well, we’re happy to accommodate you, sir, it says here that the bed is yours, and you’ll take it home with you when you leave. We’re also holding a key for you, sir, for a rental car parked in our lot, it’s a black Saturn. And we’re holding several boxes delivered to the hotel by UPS this morning. Now that you've checked in, I'll have them delivered to your suite."

"Wow, they got them up here fast," Jessie said. "We just shipped them yesterday afternoon!"

"I guess when they say next day air, they mean it," Kit chuckled as the clerk started printing out forms.

It took them about five minutes to sign everything and get the little plastic strip-keys for their room, as well to get the key to their rental car. The clerk had an attendant show Jessie where the rental car was parked, since that was her car, while Kit carried their luggage to the hotel room that would be their home for the next six weeks. It was surprisingly roomy, he had to admit, with a nice big living room and full service kitchen along the side wall, with a nice little table for meals, and a small pair of small folding double doors at the end of the counter, which were open to reveal a little economy washer and dryer in a nook. The living room side had a clean, new-looking couch and two chairs, arranged around a large widescreen TV that did not look like the kind of TV one would find in a hotel. There was a small desk near the door to the bedroom that looked like a computer work area, since it had a network cable coiled on top of it. The clerk that had checked them in had also come with him, and he pointed things out to him as he looked around. "As you can see, sir, this is one of our long-term suites, for furs who will be here a while," he said. "We get quite a few, to tell the truth, because of the Cessna factory," he added. "We have a fully furnished kitchen, your own private washer and dryer, and you'll find your TV has Direct TV. You'll have about two hundred channels to choose from. We have a hotel-wide wireless network for your laptops, but we also provide two network jacks if you prefer to go wired, or have any trouble with your wireless card.” The bobcat led them into the bedroom, which was dominated by a king-size bed, two dressers, a nightstand on each side of the bed, a vanity, and a sliding door closet. “Note that there are two doors to the bathroom, sir, one here and one in the living room. The bathroom has a full size tub. Your Sleep Number mattress is already on the bed, and the controls for it are on the nightstands. The other wired network cord is behind the desk,” he said as he went over to the curtains on the far side of the room and opened them, revealing a little ground-floor patio surrounded by a waist-high iron fence, that looked into a pool. There was a gate in the fence and a little stepping-stone path between well-maintained shrubs that led to the pool area. “This room has a patio for your enjoyment, and as you can see, we also have a pool here, but it’s not open yet. It will be opened in two weeks, sir, and you’ll find that your patio has a gate that lets you go right out to it.”

“Nice,” Kit noted.

“Like I said, sir, this is a long-term room, so it has some extra perks compared to most of the other suites,” the bobcat said with a broken-toothed smile. “As you saw, there’s a Wal-Mart right across the street that has a grocery store in it, where you can shop for groceries and whatever you might want or need. Independence Mall is on the other side of town, right down route twenty-seven, if you’d like to do any shopping that doesn’t involve Wal-Mart, as well as a number of small stores in the downtown area. Virtually every pizza place in town will deliver here, and we also have a sub shop, Vietnamese restaurant, and a Chinese restaurant that will deliver here as well. We have the numbers to them on a little placquard in the top drawer of each nightstand. We don’t offer room service here, but if you call the front desk, they can usually help you with anything you might need.”

“Sounds good, thank you,” Kit said with a nod.

Jessie was brought to the room as they went back out to the living room. She smiled and tipped the young collie that had helped her find the car, then looked around the living room with a professional eye. “Very nice,” she said. “I can do some real cooking here.”

“Would you like me to show you around, ma’am, or will you trust your husband to do it for you?”

Jessie laughed. “I think I can trust him to do that,” she said, winking at Kit.

“Alright, I’ll have the boxes UPS sent delivered to your room immediately,” he said.

“What’s it like?” Jessie asked as the bobcat left, and she opened the door to the refrigerator. It was smaller than theirs at home, but it looked big enough to serve their purposes while they were here.

“Not bad. Vil had a Sleep Number bed sent for us.”

“What’s that?”

“One of those adjustable air mattresses, because of my back,” he answered.

“Really? That sounds interesting,” she said, leaving the kitchen to go back to the bedroom.

Kit helped the hotel staff carry in the five boxes holding their clothes and some other necessities, then he tipped each of them for their trouble. He carried the box holding their clothes into the bedroom and saw Jessie splayed out on the bed, arms and legs out wide, her tail straight out under her and between her legs, and with the control for the bed in her paw, with a happy look in her face. “I love this thing!” she gushed. “You can make it as firm or soft as you want!”

“Well, the manager said it’s our bed, that we’d be taking it with us when we go. I’ll have to ask Vil what that means.”

“I hope that means we ship it home with us,” she said. “It’s way more comfortable than our bed!”

Kit had to try it with that declaration, climbing in on the side in which he usually slept at home, then he picked up the little control and hit a button. Under him, he felt the mattress firm up, push back at him, until he found a setting that felt nice to his back. “Wow, this thing is nice,” he agreed, making it soft again. “Now you don’t have to worry about finding a mattress that suits me,” he chuckled. “I can set my side to be nice and hard, and you can have whatever you want.”

“Then I can firm up my side for when I’m feeling frisky,” she giggled, rolling up on her side and testing the border between the two sides of the bed. “Well, nothing hard in here, nothing that feels like a divider, I guess as long as we make both sides the same firmness, it won’t feel like two mattresses pushed up beside each other.”

“That’s good, since we always somehow end up in the middle of the bed tied up in each other’s arms anyway,” he said with a sensual smile that made her grin at him. He gave her quick kiss, but she giggled and grabbed hold of him, pulling him into a more serious kiss that made his tail shiver.

“Mmm, fancy meeting you here, Mister Vulpan,” she smiled.

“Whatever are you doing in a hotel room, Misses Vulpan? Did I catch you when you were arranging a liaison with some mystery lover?”

“I cannot tell a lie, you did,” she giggled. “He’s a handsome young fox that has this little problem with one of his ears.”

“I’ll have to challenge him to a duel,” Kit declared. “I’ll brook no competitors for your affection.”

She laughed and gave him a hug and kiss on the cheek. “Such a silly boy!” she accused. “Now let’s quit acting silly and get unpacked and settled in. We are going to be here for a while.”

“You do realize that Lupe’s gonna be abusing our apartment while we’re gone,” he laughed. “We have a nicer TV than he does.”

“As long as everything’s still there and nothing’s broken, why should we mind?” Jessie smiled. “As long as he stays out of our bedroom,” she declared in a serious voice.

“You left him a whole fridge and freezer full of food, I doubt he’ll make it back there for two weeks,” Kit laughed.

It took them about an hour to unpack everything. Kit had brought more than just clothes, he had also sent his printer and desktop, and their DVD player and a selection of movies. Jessie brought some of the pots and pans from the kitchen, since she liked them and didn’t relish the idea of either using the ones in the hotel or buying new ones. She’d brought most of her spice rack contents as well. As Kit put the computer back together, Jessie arranged the kitchen to her liking, then got on the phone and started calling everyone to tell them that they’d arrived in Kansas safely. Kit did the same, calling the office first, calling Rick directly. “Hey boss, we’re here,” he said after he answered the phone.

“That was fast,” Rick chuckled. “Did Jessie record you guys arriving?”

“She did,” he answered. “She’ll upload the video later, right now she’s calling her folks to tell them we got here.”

“What kind of hotel room did Vil give you?”

“Nothing outrageous, but it’s nice,” Kit said appreciatively. “We’re in an Embassy Suites, in one of their long-term suites. It doesn’t look like a hotel room, it’s actually kinda homey. It even has a full kitchen in it.”

“Take some shots of it, we have to document everything for your series.”

Kit was making a series of articles out of their trip to Kansas, but Rick was also having them video as much of it as they could, to have videos the readers could watch on the website that would coincide with the articles they’d read in the magazine. The series was being called The Life of a Pilot, and would document Kit’s experience training to fly jets in Cessna’s training program. Kit had to write the first article by Tuesday, since Rick needed it completely finished by Wednesday so he could work it into the issue.

“Jessie’s getting pretty good with the video camera,” Kit chuckled. “Did Mike install that video conference program on your laptop?”

“Janet did,” Rick answered. “Let’s test it.”

“Sure, lemme get my laptop up and running.” They kept up with each other on the phone as they got the video conference up, and then he was graced with Rick and Sheila's faces in his monitor as he hung up the phone and turned up the volume. From the look of it, they were at Rick's house, and Sheila had to be over there to see Martha, and get more lessons on cooking from her. "Hey guys," he grinned. "We're here."

"I see Janet didn't blow anything up installing this," Rick grinned to someone behind the camera.

"Just for that, your computer is going to suffer a mysterious and fatal crash, Rick," Sheila's voice called, barely audible, over the microphone Rick was using.

"I keep payroll synced with my desktop on this thing, so if she doesn't want to get paid, she can go right ahead," Rick countered.

"What's Kansas like, cousin?" Sheila asked, grabbing Rick's microphone and putting it close to her mouth, bending down to where she was literally cheek to cheek with Rick.

"Very flat," Kit answered. "Cessna has a huge facility here, and it's really nice. They already gave us a tour of where we'll be training. Hopefully they'll let us take some video of it so we can show you guys."

"I'll see it myself next month," Sheila winked. "Vil's gonna come see you, and when she does, I'm coming up too. Both me and Ally." She laughed. "Did I tell you?"

"Tell me what?"

"You're a damned virus, cousin," she grinned. "Me and Ally both enrolled in flight school!"

Kit laughed. "You did? Well, good for you!"

“We enrolled together,” she said with a big grin. “AAIA, we start next week! We’re gonna do it together! We’ll both have the summer free, and we’re both interested, so we’re gonna go for it! They said as long as we don’t dick around, we’ll have our private licences before school starts, they have a special summer program.”

“Well, congratulations, cousin! I’m sure you’ll love it. I know I do.”

“I loved it when I flew in your plane,” she grinned. “And think, after I get my license, I can borrow your plane,” she said with a huge, teasing smile.

“After you have about ten years of practice, maybe,” Kit retorted immediately. “Just remember, cousin, this isn’t something you do half-assed. You have to be dedicated, or you’re wasting your time and your money, and you just might get someone killed.”

“I think I’ve proved I can dedicate myself when I want to, cousin,” she smiled.

“You have at that,” he chuckled in agreement.

“Son, your first assignment is on its way to your Blackberry,” Rick said, pulling the microphone back close to his mouth. “You’re going to research voter fraud in Texas for a piece Barry’s doing for the election special, and you’re going to research the Rainbow Push Coalition, because someone from them is going to give a speech on campus.”

“And Michael Phelps!” Sheila called.

“And Michael Phelps, there’s a little fan club on campus that Denise is doing as her weekly piece,” Rick chuckled.

“God, he’s cute, even if he’s not a fox!” Sheila gushed, smiling in a predatory manner.

“It’s no surprise he’s a good swimmer, he is an otter, after all,” Rick grinned. “So, there you have it. I hope you’re ready, son, because we’re gonna keep you really busy while you’re in Kansas.”

“I’ll manage,” Kit smiled.

“Well, we’ll let you go, I’m sure you have a lot to do to settle in,” Rick told him. “If you have a kitchen, I have no doubt that Jessie’s gonna want to head to a grocery store as soon as you’re unpacked.”

“I wouldn’t bet against you on that one,” Kit smiled in agreement.

“Alright then, have that research done and sent in by Tuesday morning,” Rick told him.

“It will,” Kit promised. “I’ll call you tomorrow.”

“We’ll be here. Have a good one, son.”

“You too, guys. Bye now.”

“Bye cousin!” Sheila called, waving as Rick said his own goodbye and terminated the conference.

“Huh, guess what, pretty kitty?”

“What love?”

“Sheila and Allison enrolled in flight school for a summer program,” he told her. “They’re going to get their licenses too.”

Jessie laughed. “I think we’ll have to hide the keys to the plane!” she declared.

“We just might at that,” Kit chuckled in agreement as he speed-dialed Vil.

“Hey bro!” Vil called when she answered, without even saying hello. “You there?”

“We are, and thanks for the bed, sis!” he said. “I never thought of the bed situation.”

“That bed’s yours to keep. Just have a mover come pack it up and ship it home when you leave,” she told him. “Can’t have you showing up for your training bent over like an old geezer, can I?” she asked lightly. “What’s the hotel room like?”

“Kinda roomy,” he answered. “It’s pretty nice. We can definitely feel comfortable here.”

“They said they have a pool, what’s it like?”

“Pretty big, but it won’t be open for two more weeks, they said,” he answered.

“Did you find the cars alright?”

“Right where you put them,” he answered. “One was at the airport, the other was here and the desk clerk had the key. Our stuff from Austin was even here waiting for us,” he said appreciatively. “I have no idea how they got it here so fast.”

“You had it shipped next day air, bro, and UPS will deliver on Sunday if you pay for it.”

“I didn’t realize that, I thought it would be here tomorrow,” Kit chuckled. “I just told them I wanted it here as fast as possible, and they gave me a price.”

“Well, there ya go,” she told him. “Hate to cut it short, bro, but I’m about to pull up to the jet and get on board.”

“Where are you?”

“Getting ready to head back to Washington,” she answered. “I have to testify in front of the Armed Services Committee again, this time for the House. Why can’t they just do this at the same time?” she complained. “But, at least I’ll get to see Kendall!” she said brightly. “He’s coming over to Washington tomorrow and we’re going to have dinner.”

“Another long-distance date?” Kit chuckled. Kendall had been coming over at least once a week to go out with Vil.

“Yeah. Next week I’m going to England,” she told him. “We’re going to watch polo in Scotland or something, I’m not sure.”

“So interested,” Kit laughed.

“What I’m interested in is Kendall,” she told him. “I really like him, bro. And I mean I’m getting into daydream territory,” she told him.

Kit laughed. “Why Vil, are you telling me he’s challenging your virginal resolve?”

“You of all furs should know that I’m no virgin, bro,” she told him, a bit tartly. That much was true; there was no Vulpan younger than fourteen that was a virgin, be it male or femme. Vil had lost her virginity at fifteen, and she’d told Kit all about it when he was older, after Suzy took his. “But I can say that I hear that ticking coming from below my ribcage much louder whenever I’m around him,” she said, almost girlishly.

“So, Vil’s finally heeding her Catholic teachings to be fruitful and multiply,” Kit teased.

“I’m following in your footsteps,” she teased in reply. “So far, I think we’re on schedule for a nice May wedding,” she said dreamily.

“So late? Don’t give him that much time to see all your flaws, sis, trick a proposal out of him now and get your claws into him by September.”

She laughed. “So, I should approach this like business, eh?”

“You bet. He’s not listening to your offers, it’s time for a hostile takeover. Leverage him. After all, that’s what you’d do if he was a business rival.”

“I think I’d like a marriage, bro, not a business relationship. Just leave me alone, I’ll drag him to the altar in my own time and at my own pace.”

“Alright, but I could tell you all about what kind of fun you’re missing,” he told her, a bit naughtily.

“Stop right there, I don’t think I’m old enough to hear what’s about to come next,” Vil told him with a laugh.

“Alright, I’ll let you figure that out on your own,” he said lightly. “Call me when you get to Washington and we’ll talk.”

“Sure thing. Later, bro.”

“Bye sis.”

Rick was right in that the first thing they did after they finished calling everyone and got everything unpacked and set up to their liking was head to the store. They spent nearly $300 buying a plethora of food, and their own plates and silverware because the ones at the hotel weren’t all that good. Kit had to buy another bottle of body soap, and Jessie had to buy a new bottle of vitamins, since she only had enough to last her another two weeks. They bought laundry detergent for the washer and Bounce sheets for the dryer, and Jessie bought a beach towel to use when the pool opened, since Jessie loved to swim. She hadn't packed her swim suit, but odds were they could find one for her at the mall that was supposed to be across town.

When they got back to the hotel it took them about an hour to get everything packed away, and Jessie broke in the kitchen by cooking their first meal of shrimp jambalaya as Kit retrieved his assignments, sent them from his Blackberry to his laptop, and surveyed them to see what kind of work he had ahead of him. He saw that they were actually going easy on him, since they weren't asking for anything really indepth.

It took him about four hours to get it all done. He didn't go by what they asked for, he went by what they needed, so his research was much more detailed. While he worked, Jessie had her nose deep in her flight books, reviewing everything she'd learned so far, for she knew that starting tomorrow, what she knew was going to matter. He'd already told her that the first thing she should expect would be to be tested on what she knew, and not casually. David would grill her, really test her knowledge, because he had to know exactly what she knew so he'd know what he had to teach her. It was nearly eight when Kit was finished with magazine work, and he uploaded their video of landing in Kansas to the website for Mike, so he could do whatever it was he wanted to do with it. Kit took video of the hotel room as well, narrating as he went. "And there's my wife, studying for her first day of flight school. Wave to the readers, pretty kitty," he called. She laughed and waved, holding up her textbook so they could see the cover that read Flight Procedures and Air Traffic Control for Pilots. "She's already hard at work, because tomorrow she's going to start working for her private pilot's license."

"You've had me working on it for over a month!" she protested.

"You're going to officially start," he corrected, which made her giggle and nod. "We've got a very nice suite at Embassy Suites here in Independence, and we've already settled in. Almost looks like a home, doesn't it?" he asked, zooming in on the dirty dishes in the sink. "I'd show you the bedroom, but then we'd have to hide the slaves we keep tied up in there for our perverted desires."

"Kit!" Jessie called threateningly. "Behave!"

"Since when do I behave?" he asked flippantly as he panned back to the living room. "Tomorrow, I'll ask the Cessna furs if they mind if we take some video of the training facility, to show you guys. I hope they do, their facility is very interesting. I'd love to show everyone what they'll be reading about. Anyway, that's about it here from Independence, Kansas. Kit and Jessie Vulpan, signing off."

He sent that off to Mike as well, before Jessie could demand he make a video without the color commentary.

The first day.

Kit was almost giddy as he and Jessie drove to the airport, arriving at the facility a good half hour before 8:00, but the facility was already open, and their two personal trainers were already there and waiting. They separated with a kiss good luck, and were taken to separate areas. Kit was taken to a small classroom by Luke, and the small, thin cat then proceeded to do what Kit knew was coming...test him. Kit was quizzed on what he'd learned studying the manuals and books, and quizzed thoroughly. Luke told him to answer when he knew, but if he was guessing, to tell him he was guessing and try to answer anyway. Kit understood why; a guess was often based on what a fur knew, and that would give Luke insight into how much Kit really did know. Luke tested him for nearly three hours, and then, after it was done, he settled in and started teaching Kit the classroom aspects of jet aviation.

For the rest of the day, Kit was back in school. He learned all about flying a jet, how it was different from flying a prop plane in how it handled and what responsibilities Kit would have as a pilot of a jet aircraft. Luke was a very good teacher, teaching in a simple, earthy kind of language that seemed to just sink into Kit's brain and lock in. He learned all about jet engines that day, the science of jet propulsion, and how the higher speeds altered the handling characteristics of a jet aircraft. The main thing that was drilled into his head that day was that jet aircraft were much more responsive than prop planes, and also required more attention.

To Kit's surprise, at the end of the day, Luke gave him a written test on what he'd learned that day to see how much he had retained, and Kit had acquitted himself nicely.

"We'll have another day of classroom instruction tomorrow, and then we'll start working in the simulator," Luke told him. "You showed you know your stuff about the basics, so tomorrow we do the classroom portion of the Mustang control systems and handling characteristics."

"Sounds good. Oh, I have a favor to ask, but I think I'll need to ask Amanda."

“What is it?”

“I’m writing a series of articles for my magazine about my experience here,” he said, “and my editor wants me to take video of the facility to post on our website. Can you find out who I need to talk to to arrange that?”

“Sure, I can find out for you, no problem,” he answered with a nod. “I hope the articles are good,” Luke laughed.

“So far the experience has been wonderful,” Kit grinned. “You mind being interviewed about what it’s like being a flight instructor?”

“Not at all,” he answered.

“You’re definitely going to get some good press from me,” Kit chuckled as they left the classroom. “Now I need to find out where my wife is.”

His wife was, in fact, airborne. He found out from Amanda after she came over to talk to him about taking video inside the facility, and he went out to the tarmac to see her perform a touch and go on the runway. She lifted back up into the air and performed a low speed turn to the left, and it looked like David, who was in the right seat, was going to have her go around and do it again. He smiled when he watched her go around and do another touch and go, putting the plane down with practiced, gentle ease, right on the stripes; he’d taught her to aim to put the wheels down within the area of a band of marker stripes on the runway, because it taught her how to manage the runway. If she could touch her wheels on the stripes, then she could aim at any part of the runway when she was executing a short strip landing. And when she took her commercial check ride, she had to be able to bring the plane to a smooth stop within one hundred feet of a point her examiner selected on the runway, so he was just teaching her what she'd need to know later.

“She learns fast,” Luke told him. “She has a very light touch I wouldn't expect out of a student pilot.”

“I've been having her practice in our plane,” Kit chuckled. “You don't have to repeat that, though.”

“Repeat what?” he asked with a smile. “That's how I taught my wife, too,” he added with a chuckle.

“I did mean to ask one thing,” he noted. “How is Dave going to try to get her IFR done in six weeks?”

“Because the planes she's learning to fly in are all IFR rated,” he answered. “The hours she logs for her private are also hours she can claim for her IFR and her commercial, don't forget that. She'll really only need her cross country requirements for IFR after she gets her rating, and we can do some of that in the simulator. We do have simulators for a four hundred, which she'll use if she can't fly VFR.”

“Oh. Ohhhhh,” he said. “One forty-one rules!”

“We are a one forty-one facility,” Luke told him.

“But she's not learning through a one forty-one approved curriculum,” he realized.

“We won't say anything if you won't,” he smiled.

Kit laughed and shook his head.

Jessie did two more touch and go maneuvers, then she landed and taxied back to the small hangar attached to the facility. Kit, Luke, and Amanda met them there, and she waved brightly to him as she opened the gullwing door of the trainer. She and David did the post flight, and after she was done, she ran over and gave him a huge hug. “I take it you had a good day?” he asked with a laugh.

“I get to solo tomorrow!” she said with an excited squeal.

“You taught her well, Kit,” David chuckled as they came over. “She knows everything she needs to know to do her first solo flight.”

“So, I take it she passed her tests this morning?”

“Remember when you said that she could recite the FAR verbatim?”

Kit nodded.

“You weren’t lying,” Dave smiled. “There are some things she needs to take in the classroom, but I’m going to mix that in with actual flight time. She’ll spend some time in the classroom in the morning, then we go out to the plane and she logs her hours the rest of the day.”

“He said I could have my private in ten days if I really work hard,” Jessie said brightly.

“I think she could pass the written test right now, but she needs a little reinforcement to pass the oral, and she needs more training with the four hundred to answer the questions the examiner will ask her about it during the check ride. But if she works very hard, she’ll have the logged hours she’ll need for her check ride in about ten days. Then she just needs to bone up for the test.”

“I’m proud of you, pretty kitty,” he said, kissing her. “We saw you doing touch and gos, and you flew beautifully!”

“She’s definitely either a natural or been stealing time in your plane,” Dave winked.

“She’s a natural, naturally,” Kit said, then they all laughed. “How’d you do on the Garmin?”

“I remembered everything you taught me,” she grinned.

“She handled it like a pro,” David nodded in agreement. “I’ve already signed her off on the Garmin. I don’t think you missed a beat when you taught it to her. You’d be one hell of a flight instructor, Kit.”

“I’m going to get my rating,” he said with a nod.

“Really? I’ve seen your pilot record, Kit. All you have to do is pass your FOI, take the ground training, and get your proficiencies logged and you could do your check rides for your type one, type two, and your MEI, cause I doubt any pilot with as many logged hours as you couldn’t perform the required maneuvers,” Amanda said. “Hell, Kit, you’ll have enough hours logged to rate as a flight instructor for a couple of jet models. We can do that for you, we’re authorized to give the exams here.”

“You can?”

She nodded. “The FOI classroom training is a three week course, and Luke can do your ground training and endorse you for your requirements, fitting it in between your training sessions. It’ll be a lot of work, but we can do it inside the time you’ll be here. Interested?”

“Yes!”

“The FOI prep class is two hours a night, Monday through Friday, five to seven,” she told him. “Our next class doesn’t start until next Monday, though, but I think you'll need that time for your rating training."

"Just give me the books so I can get a jump on it," Kit said.

"I'll have them for you before you leave tonight," she promised. "We have a doctor you can go to for your physical for your rating."

"He doesn't need a physical, Amanda, he already has a commercial. They're the same physical."

"Oh? Well, I guess that's not a problem then," she winked. "That means you can focus on getting everything done in time. Luke, you'll need to work up a schedule to get all the ground training in along with the type training."

"I think he'll have plenty of time to study and get the ground training in, since he already knows most of what I have to teach him about the jets," Luke told Amanda. "He's going to the simulator tomorrow."

"How long until he tries his check ride?"

"Honestly? Four days," Luke said. "We'll finish classroom instruction on the Mustang tomorrow, and after that, all he needs is practice behind the controls. I'm positive he can pass a check ride then."

"Well, you're shaving a whole week off our usual time," Amanda smiled at him.

"A week of that is usually glass cockpit training," Luke noted. "He already knows the Garmin, so he has a leg up. It's when we go to CJ training that he'll have to devote some time to avionics training. The Collins is much different from the Garmin."

"But the switch locations will be similar to a Mustang," Kit noted.

“Yes, and that will help you a lot.”

Jessie was very excited when they went home, Kit with a new book to study that taught the process of teaching; an amusing repetition in his mind. “I was really nervous at first, but Dave is very nice, and he made me comfortable,” she said in the car. “After about ten minutes, I relaxed when we went over what I knew instead of what I didn’t, then we talked about what I don’t know. Classic teaching tactic, building confidence in the student,” she laughed. “He had me plot a trip to Wichita on the Garmin, then he had me carry it out. We flew to Wichita and landed at the airport there, then we came back. He had me do everything, and he only talked about flying when I was about to do something wrong. After he had me practice touch and gos, he said that tomorrow I get to solo,” she said. “I’ll be really nervous, but I can do it. I know I can.”

“I almost threw up on my first solo,” Kit told her with a wry chuckle. “Of course, now, I have no idea why I was so nervous.”

“He said he was really impressed at how consistently I could land,” she told him. “All those times you made me practice at Lakeview paid off.”

“I’m glad they did,” he smiled. “How did you do with air traffic control?”

“I messed up a few times, but I’m getting better. I got a little confused one time and almost turned the wrong way, but Dave caught me before I did it.”

“That’s what he’s there for,” Kit chuckled.

Kit wrote his first article that night, after Jessie made hamburgers for dinner and curled up with the laptop to practice on a simulator program

David told her to work with that night. He wrote about arriving at the program, and his first day. He stressed all the preparation work he did before he arrived, the month and more of intense study of everything they sent him, and double stressed the dedication required to be a pilot while at the same time capturing the essence of freedom and fun that came with taking off from a runway and having the whole world laid out before you. He summed it up with the line “it’s easy to fly, but it’s only easy if you’re very serious about being responsible and safe, and that means being a well prepared, well educated, and well trained.” He went on to describe his first day, which started in a classroom, not in a plane or a simulator. “Surprised? Don’t be,” he wrote. “Three quarters of what makes a good pilot isn’t how well he can fly, but how well he is trained. Skills come with training, and training comes with taking it seriously. Nothing can compare to a professional, quality flight instructor using a tried and true technique for training a pilot, and here at Cessna, they have a program that is second to none in quality.” He then went on to describe Jessie’s first day, and explained that flying on the first day actually wasn’t unusual. “It’s actually very easy to fly. It’s just as easy as driving a car, and probably even more so...if only because the only thing you can really run into is the ground, and you don’t have maniacs all around you who look at driving as a full contact sport. As long as you understand the rules, flying is safe, easy, and fun. In the sky, you’re in the wide open spaces, and the only furs who share it with you are just as determined to keep everything safe and courteous as you are. That’s the true mark of the skies compared to the roads, the defensive mindset of those you find there. Hot rods and hot dogs in aviation circles find themselves grounded very quickly, where hot dogs on the streets continue on with impunity until they either kill themselves, or someone else.” He told wrote about Jessie’s upcoming solo flight, and reminisced about his own first solo, how it was pure joy mixed with abject terror, and how he very nearly threw up when he opened the throttle and started down the runway to begin his first flight without the comforting presence of a flight instructor to make sure he didn't do something stupid. "It's the ultimate test of character, that moment where you have to look yourself in the face and ask yourself am I ready to really do this? The only answer can come from yourself, and that's in that moment you pull back on that stick and lift your plane off the runway. That is the moment that you become a pilot, not when you take your check ride and get a license, oh no. That's just a confirmation of the truth you experience in that plane, by yourself, on that runway as you accelerate and watch your speed, both terrified and anxious to hit that magic number that tells you that it's time to pull back on the stick and change forever. That is the moment a fur becomes a pilot. And while it's scary when it's happening, I don't know a pilot that doesn't look back at that moment with fondness and nostalgia." He then went on to talk about Jessie's rather unusual progression. "Is it unusual for a student to solo on her second day? Oh yes, but Jessie has a distinct advantage over other students, and that's a husband who's already a pilot. She spent months preparing for this, and her advantage was being the wife of a male who has gone through it himself, who could tell her what to study, what to read, what she needed to know, could tutor her and demonstrate for her. The fact that we own our own private plane and she had the ability to see what it takes to be a pilot from the cockpit also helped quite a bit, for she learned a great deal about being a pilot before she ever decided to pursue her own license, just by watching me. Jessie walked into the front door of Cessna already knowing most of what they teach in the classroom, because I knew exactly what she had to study to be ready to take the exams...everything! All she really needs now is to practice behind the controls of a plane, something she couldn't do with me, since I'm not a licensed flight instructor, which is what she's receiving. Tomorrow, my wife will change. She will become a pilot, for she will know that exhilarating and scary feeling when she opens the throttle on her plane, all by herself, and ask herself that question that has been asked so many times before as she accelerates down the runway. Am I really ready for this? I know my wife, and I know what her answer will be. And I'll be there to watch her plane lift off from the runway and soar into the sky. I will watch her become a pilot." He smiled. "And so will you."

He sent it off without showing it to Jessie, for he didn't want her to see it until after her first solo. He joined her in silent study after finishing his work, engrossing himself in learning the avionics system in a Citation X, since he'd already gone through everything else.

The Citation Mustang flight simulator was, in a word, awesome.

It was an absolutely perfect and faithful replication of a real Mustang cockpit, and everything Kit had read and studied all came together like a jigsaw puzzle, falling into place as Luke sat with him and grilled him on all the flight controls, then tested him on the procedures for warming up the plane, the procedures for a cold start and a warm start of the engines, and then they walked through the preflight checklists. He was absorbed in what he was doing, but but he and Luke were keeping an ear out for Kit's phone, and Kit had the video camera right at paw and ready. He had already taken extensive video of the facility with Amanda's blessing, and now he was waiting to video Jessie on her first solo. David was going to call him as she taxied out, and he was waiting for it. Luke knew of his plan, and wouldn't mind at all to go out with him and watch with him. "It's a very important moment in any pilot's life," Luke chuckled. "I remember my first solo. I almost wet myself."

"Me too," Kit laughed.

The two of them sat in the cockpit as Kit went through the checklists, occasionally having to think a second before finding the right control, mainly because the control locations were different in a Mustang from his 400, even if they did use the same avionics system. In the simulator, Kit performed his first simulated engine start, taxi, and then the video monitors that appeared to be windows in the simulators showed the end of a runway. Kit blew out his breath, checked his indicators to ensure he was good to take off, then pushed the thrust levers forward to takeoff position. The simulator leaned back slightly to simulate the G force of acceleration, and Kit pulled gently back on the yoke when he reached takeoff speed. In a smooth motion, he achieved the nominal ascent angle for their projected flight plan and retracted the landing gear, then started a very gentle ascending turn, a gentle pitch and roll to the right as he lined up for an imaginary flight from Independence, the simulated airport from which he took off, to Tulsa, Oklahoma. The flight plan Kit had been given was for a flight at 300 knots at 17,000 feet, but that was only because it was a very short flight from Independence to Tulsa, a flight of 17 minutes. He brought the simulator up to 17,000 feet and leveled out, then Luke quizzed him on all the indicators as they "cruised" along. Kit answered all of his questions quickly and correctly, then Luke watched as he began the descent and performed the landing checklist. He even remembered to bring up a diagram of the Tulsa airport on the Garmin's database and queue it so it was ready to go when he was on the ground. He made a slow turn to line up with the runway, and then landed the simulator with light grace, so much so that the simulator barely shimmied and made him wonder if the simulator thought he was on the ground. The weight on wheels switch indicated that they were indeed on the runway, so he hit the brakes and started their deceleration.

“A little slow to react to landing,” Luke noted.

“I thought the simulator was broken, I didn’t feel anything,” Kit laughed as the simulator slowed, and he turned to taxi on the indicated ramp, using the diagram that even showed the location of the plane on the diagram to guide him to where he was supposed to park.

“That’s because that was one of the smoothest first run landings I’ve seen,” Luke said with an approving nod.

“I put way too many hours on a twin engine Beech not to be able to put a multi down softly,” Kit chuckled.

“A Beech?”

“At my flight school. It was very old, it still had steam gauge indicators,” he winked.

Luke laughed. “Once you fly glass, you wonder how the hell you ever managed without it.”

“Amen.”

They sat in the simulator and discussed the flight, which was basically Luke telling him that he did nothing seriously wrong, and only made a few very minor mistakes which they corrected right then and there. But then his phone rang. They both jumped up as Kit answered it, and he heard David’s voice over a propeller engine. “She’s taxiing out now,” he called.

Kit and Luke hurried out to the flight line, and David joined them on a little platform often used to observe take offs and landings, and Kit aimed the camera at the 400 as David used a pawheld radio to tune in to air traffic control on a special training frequency which Jessie, the controller, and David would all use. They listened as Jessie negotiated with the controller to get clearance to take off, and Kit could hear the nervousness in her voice. But he expected her to be nervous. There was no pilot that wasn't nervous on their first solo that wasn't lying. She pulled out to the end of the runway, and he heard David call on the radio. "Go, Jessie, go!"

"C two six seven requesting clearance to take off," she called in a slightly quavering voice.

"C two six seven, cleared to take off, VFR."

"VFR," she acknowledged the controller telling her she was under visual flight rules, then, after a pause, the plane surged forward. Kit followed her with the camera as she raced from right to left in front of them, then right when Kit knew she was up to speed, the plane lifted off the runway smoothly and at a perfect angle. Her wings bobbed just a little, probably due to nerves, but she executed a slow speed ascending turn, by the book, as she flew off.

"Damn, that was almost perfect!" Luke said happily. "What's her course?"

"I'm having her fly up to Blackbow lake and back. I've always loved that flight, it's really relaxing."

"Wow, you're sending her pretty far out for her first time," Luke noted. "That's almost cross country distance."

“She can handle it,” he said with utter confidence.

“How long will that take?” Kit asked.

“About thirty minutes, it’s about forty miles out, and I told her to stay under a hundred and sixty knots. I want her to enjoy her first flight.” He changed channels on his radio and keyed it. “Tower, location of C two six seven?”

“Ten nautical miles heading three two two, one five zero knots.”

“Right on course and under her speed limit,” he said with a nod.

They didn’t have to do it, but all three of them waited right there on the platform, waiting for her to return. The wind started picking up, and that concerned David a little. When he called in to the tower, he frowned.

“There’s a pocket of clear air turbulence coming in ahead of a storm front that wasn’t supposed to get here so fast,” he said sourly, switching channels and calling the tower to call Jessie to warn her of approaching weather conditions and have her speed up to beat the front to the airport. She was already on her way back, so all they could do was wait and watch, and hope she could outrun the approaching bad weather.

Things got a touch more serious when Jessie appeared on the horizon, a bank of clouds appeared at an angle to her right, and the wind started getting erratic on the tarmac. She got clearance to land, and as she was making her approach, the wind suddenly shifted on the flight line as a gust of wind roared over them from an unexpected direction. “C two six seven, crosswind, wave off, wave off!” the tower called just as Jessie was about to land. A gusting crosswind hit her plane, pushing her sideways and dipping her leading wing towards the ground, but she opened her throttle and picked up her nose quickly, just as she was supposed to, using stick and rudder to counter the force the crosswind was putting on the plane. Kit almost had a heart attack after the fact, when he realized that what just happened was one of the worst things a student pilot could face on her first solo flight, a sudden clear-air crosswind gust while landing. That crosswind would have crashed a lesser experienced pilot, and of that there was absolutely no doubt. She called the tower as she flew out and away from the airport, and they directed her to the other runway, where she'd be flying into a headwind, and Kit could only feel very relieved and very proud. Jessie had just passed her biggest test, and that was reacting to a sudden and unforeseen event. She drifted out and made her turn, then approached again.

Kit narrated to the camera as he tracked her. "Jessie had to wave off because of a gusting crosswind on the runway, a rare event, almost like a microburst in a thunderstorm," he explained as Jessie approached, "and now she's landing on a different runway so she has more favorable wind because it's changing direction constantly. Landing in a crosswind is very dangerous, and pilots avoid it unless they have absolutely no other choice. What you just saw was my wife recovering from something that might have crashed another pilot."

"Did she ever," Luke agreed. "That femme can fly."

She navigated shifting wind very well for a novice, banging the wheels just a touch harder than she would have otherwise, and then hit her brakes and speed brakes. "Well done!" David called over radio, "and way to not panic, Jessie! I'm proud of ya, girl!"

"I almost wet my pants!" she admitted over the radio, probably unaware that the tower heard her as well.

“Damn fine flying, lady! You just proved you can keep your head in an emergency! Taxi back to the hangar, and be ready to get your first solo endorsement in your logbook, as well as a couple of hugs and kisses from your husband!”

“I think she just got her endorsement for her emergency situation,” Luke noted.

David laughed. “Hell yes. I’ll sign off on that right here and now. She did not panic. All she needs now is her glide training and she’s golden on her emergency procedures. And if the examiner doesn’t like it, well, we got tape of it.”

They met her at the plane, and Kit gave her a huge hug and a kiss. “Well done, pretty kitty,” he told her before she could even do her post flight.

“You’re a pilot now, Jessie,” David grinned at her. “Not many pilots can say they got their emergency response endorsement on their first solo.”

“Really? Why?” she asked.

“Because waving off in that crosswind qualifies as an emergency, mainly because it sure as hell wasn’t planned,” Luke told her. “You did exactly what you were supposed to do, and you did some great flying correcting when that crosswind hit you.”

“I just did what Kit told me to do in a crosswind,” she answered. “I didn’t get scared until after I was about twenty seconds out from the airport,” she admitted with a shy, nervous smile. “When I tried my second landing, my paws were shaking on the controls.”

“Well, you did great!” David beamed. “I want a copy of that video, Kit, we can use it as a perfect example of what to do when you’re hit by a crosswind. We can use it to teach other pilots.”

“You got it,” Kit nodded.

“So, I did well?” Jessie asked.

“That’s a silly question!” David laughed. “Here, show her the video, Kit.”

Jessie was surprised when she saw the video herself, as the four of them watched from the small LCD screen on the back of the camera. She saw how the plane slid sideways and one wing dipped, but then the plane corrected quickly and nosed up, aborting the landing. “Wow, I did that?” she asked.

“Like I said, you did great, Jessie,” David repeated. “Now, you feel up to going up again?”

“Uh, am I soloing?”

“No, I’m going up with you this time,” he smiled. “We’re going to go over some things and just let you log hours.”

“Good, I think I’ll feel a little better being with someone else this time,” she laughed nervously. “I’m a little nervous now.”

“Perfectly understandable, but you know what? I’ll feel totally comfortable letting you fly, because now I know you won’t panic in an emergency. I’ll feel totally safe flying with you.”

Jessie absolutely beamed.

And so, Jessie's first solo flight was a bit more exciting than Kit would have liked, but like David, he was now confident that she wouldn't ever crash a plane because she panicked. She had proved her mettle.

She proved she was a pilot.

When it came to getting a rating, Kit was the first one to draw blood. Four days after they began, on a blustery, windy, stormy Thursday that grounded Jessie because she couldn't fly with a cloud deck and put her in a flight simulator for the day, Kit took his first check ride. Kit was excited, anxious, nervous, and terrified all at the same time. He was looking at the day that a boyhood dream would come true, and he'd been so excited the night before that he only slept about two hours. He'd spent the rest of that time studying everything, doing the software quizzes, and reciting checklist operations over and over. He was at the Cessna facility at six, leaving Jessie to drive in on her own, and paced around for the three hours while waiting for his check ride time going over everything in his head. Then, finally, the appointed hour had arrived, and the check ride for his coveted, dreamed-of jet rating had begun.

To his surprise, it wasn't an FAA examiner that administered the check ride, it was one of the Cessna instructors, who was authorized by the FAA to perform the exam. His name was Justin, and he was a tall, slender leopard who was friendly and nice.

But being nice didn't mean that he was going to go easy on Kit. His oral exam was demanding, almost exhausting, but Kit answered every question quickly and concisely, whether he was right or wrong. Kit wasn't perfect on his oral exam, making a few mistakes, but he made no mistake worth a pink slip, which was the fail paperwork that would be given to him if he answered a critical question wrong, or made a potentially dangerous mistake during the check flight. After the oral exam, Kit and Justin got into the simulator, and Kit was given his simulated flight orders. Justin didn't remain quiet as Kit bent to the task at paw, still asking the occasional question about what he was doing, and more importantly, why he was doing it. He asked quite a few questions about the engines, and then he fell silent as Kit finished the preflights and started the engines...at least in simulation.

The simulated check ride was an hour long, with Jessie watching from the simulator control panel the same way he'd watched her solo from the platform, and Kit had been warned that there would be a simulated emergency during the check ride by Luke. The check ride for jets always included an emergency situation to which the pilot had to respond, to ensure that the pilot knew what to do. And Kit, perhaps a little indignantly, felt that they were being a tad unfair.

Kit's emergency situation ended up becoming landing the jet on one engine, on backup power, in a thunderstorm, on a short runway.

It started with the engine. He got a fire warning in engine #1, and did exactly what he was trained to do. He pulled the fire level, declared an inflight emergency, redeployed his power management and flight controls to a single engine configuration, and executed an emergency descent as he waited for control to give him instructions. As he descended, feeling the plane trying to yaw to the left because the lost engine was no longer putting thrust on that side of the plane, the plane's electrical breakers popped, and the plane went on battery power, lighting up his warning board like a Christmas tree. Kit declared that emergency, then was warned that the only airport where he could land was experiencing a thunderstorm. But he had no choice. Since he had an emergency, all traffic was cleared for him so he could land, and he had to make a very difficult approach while fighting shifting and stiff winds, and landing on a runway that was very short, forcing him to make a short strip landing on one engine, on battery power, in a thunderstorm.

But he did it. From as near as he could tell, he put the wheels down about fifty feet from the safe edge of the runway, and hit all the brakes as he executed a short strip deceleration. The simulator rumbled and shivered as it simulated a jet making an emergency brake, and then the simulator rolled to a stop about three hundred feet from the end of the runway, a runway that was just barely long enough for the plane to begin with.

Kit's paws were actually shaking on the yoke when the simulator stopped moving, and he blew out his breath, but didn't stop. The check ride was not over until he successfully completed all emergency procedures pertaining to the emergency, and that required an emergency shutdown of the other engine and to engage all the emergency fire suppression protocols to prevent another engine fire in case he was leaking jet fuel into the damaged engine or onto the runway. That required a total shutdown of the electrical system to prevent sparks and warning the tower that he had a potential fire hazard, so they would mobilize the fire trucks to come to the jet.

When the lights in the simulator controls winked out, Kit blew out his breath, and Justin said nothing, which made Kit very, very nervous. He was silent nearly a full minute, and then he looked Kit in the eye and smiled. "I'd say that's a pass," he said. "You made a couple of minor mistakes and answered a couple of questions wrong, but nothing worth a pink slip. And I think that's the most difficult emergency situation we have programmed in the simulator, which you handled very well. Congratulations, you're now rated for solo flight on a Mustang."

Kit could not suppress the whoop of delight. He jumped out of the seat and ran down the ramp, and then wrapped Jessie in a huge hug, picking her up and spinning her in a circle. "Congratulations, baby!" she said happily, giving him a big kiss on the nose, and then kissing him full on the lips. He felt absolutely ecstatic, as happy as he did the day he got his license, because he had just completed a childhood dream.

Despite everything his father did to stop him, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan III had finally learned how to fly a jet.

They awarded him his type rating after the check ride, a beautiful little form that was a temporary rating authorization until he got an updated license from the FAA. Right there, on the field on his license that marked his endorsements, were those wonderful little letters that denoted that he, Kit Vulpan, could fly a jet. And not just fly it, but fly as the Pilot in Command, which in a single pilot rated jet meant he could fly it alone, without a second pilot in the cockpit.

Luke shook his paw, Amanda shook his paw, David shook his paw, Justin shook his paw, then Luke smiled and pointed him towards the door. "It's time to go to Wichita, Kit," he declared. "You just landed in a thunderstorm, so I think we can trust you to take off in the real thing in the rain."

They took him to a different small hangar, where three jets were sitting. Two of them were Citation Mustangs, and the third looked like a CJ model. "Alright, newly rated pilot, fly me to Wichita," Luke grinned, pointing at the nearer Mustang.

Kit smiled evilly. "I don't remember how!" he whined, which made Luke give him a startled look, then explode into helpless laughter.

It had been a nervous Kit that had done the check ride not an hour ago, but Kit's paws were now trembling for an entirely different reason. He was almost too excited to stand still, but he kept his composure enough to remember everything he'd been taught. Luke watched on silently as he did all the necessary preflight checks, did the walk around, then got in and started a cold engine start checklist. The sound of the fuel pumps clicking and the batteries humming were almost like music to his ears, and then the sound of the engine starting sang through his soul like a chorus of angels when the FADEC controls started each engine in turn.

"Has this plane ever been flown?" he asked impulsively as he noticed the absolute spotless condition of the cockpit.

"Once," he answered. "This is going to be our second live trainer, what we'll use as what you might call the second check ride. Pilots will rate on the simulator, then come out here and do an actual flight, just like you're doing now. But for now, it's your personal taxi from here to Wichita and back. You're going to help shake it down so other students can use it."

"I'll enjoy every minute of it," he grinned.

"For the seventeen minutes we'll be in the air," Luke chuckled. "You won't even get to ten thousand feet before you have to descend."

"I'm still going to love it. I've worked for this day since I was sixteen," he said.

"Well, you're nowhere near done yet," Luke reminded him. "I still have four other training programs to give you."

“Four?”

He nodded. “You’ll do your CJ, Encore, and ten training in Wichita, then come back here to rate on the CJ four, which isn’t in production yet. And we’ll be squeezing in an hour here and two hours there doing your ground training for your CFI ratings. Since you’ll also be doing the FOI classes, you’ll need to be there by five every weekday starting Monday. They hold them at the Wichita facility, so it’s kinda good that you’ll be in Wichita for the next few weeks. At least you’ll be able to go from a simulator straight to class.”

“What are we going to do in Wichita today?”

“Test,” he answered. “Same as we did the first day of Mustang training. I need to see how much you remember from the study material we sent you, so I know where to focus your classroom time.”

“Ah, okay. What kind of schedule are we looking at?”

“I’d say a week for the CJ depending on how much you studied, two or three days for the Encore, then a week to ten days for the ten,” he answered. “The CJ will be the hardest for you because it uses the Collins instead of the Garmin, but so does the Encore. So you’ll skate through the Encore, and then have to study a new avionics suite for the ten. You’ll also have to get used to working with another pilot for the Encore and ten training.”

“Will I rate as a pilot in command?”

He shook his head. “No one can rate as the PIC immediately. You have to do twenty hours in the right chair first, because we train you as the PIC. But there’s no test, just the hour requirement. Once you have your twenty hours, we’ll sign you off, and you can sit in the left chair.”

“Well, I doubt I’ll pull that off while I’m here unless I spend an entire weekend in a simulator,” he chuckled.

“Nah, four hours a day in a simulator for five days, and you’re set. You can do it in a week, and from the way things look now, you’ll have a week to kill waiting for Jessie.”

Kit got an electric thrill through his tail as they taxied out onto the ramp, after he’d plotted a flight to Wichita using the Garmin’s navigation system. The rain had stopped, and the sun was peeking through a break in the clouds, sending a golden shaft of light down onto the prairie west of the airport. Kit taxied the Mustang out, then he got clearance to take off and pulled out onto the runway. He could only smile as he saw the runway laid out before him, and then his paw tingled as he put it on the thrust control and pushed it forward. The engines roared as they spooled up, he let go of the brakes when they reached the desired power, the Mustang surged forward, and he felt a wonderful push into his seat as the little jet galloped down the runway, quickly reaching takeoff speed. He picked her up off the ground with a light pull on the yoke, then retracted the landing gear even as he turned towards Wichita.

“Wonderful feeling, isn’t it?” Luke asked with a big smile. “I remember my first jet flight. I felt like I was king of the sky.”

“That’s a good description,” Kit laughed.

Kit was almost disappointed when he landed at Wichita, putting the tires down right on the second set of stripes. Wichita was 90 miles away from Independence, nearly 2 hours by car, but only 17 minutes by jet, which included take off and landing time. When one was going 300 knots, which was around 345 miles an hour, 90 miles was about how long it took to listen to a couple of songs on the radio. The Mustang accelerated up to 300 knots quickly, really pushing it to fly so fast at low altitude, but Luke let him have his fun and didn't mention how much fuel they were burning to go that fast at 9,000 feet. They didn't even really reach a cruise altitude because it was so short, it was more like a ballistic arc, ascending to an apex, then descending to Wichita.

After they arrived, they toured the Wichita flight facility. It was about ten times larger than what they had in Independence, with classrooms, hangars, and two flight simulators for every jet they taught...so that put 16 simulators in the complex; two each for the CJ1, CJ2, CJ3, Encore, XLS, Sovereign, and X. Before they started the tests, though, Luke took him to a hangar and gave him a tour of the three CJ models. "You only take one rating test for all three," Luke explained. "They're all similar, there's just slightly different handling characteristics because of size. But the avionics, the systems, the procedures, they're all the same for each of them."

"So this is the fabled Collins pro line twenty-one," Kit said, looking at the glass panels in the cockpit of the CJ3.

"Best in the business," Luke said. "After you rate on this, you'll think a Garmin is steam controls. Every jet you rate on from here out uses the twenty-one or some system based on the twenty-one. The ten uses a different system, the Primus two thousand, but it's laid out almost exactly the same way as the twenty-one you see here. That makes transitioning up through the Citation fleet very easy."

"So I just learn new systems instead of having to relearn everything every time."

"Exactly."

Luke was expecting Kit to know a great deal about the CJ and the Pro Line 21, and Kit did not disappoint. They tested not in a classroom, but in a simulator, as Luke grilled him about the jet and its systems, and Kit justified Luke's belief that Kit came loaded for bear when he came to this school to rate on jets. He had all but memorized all the material they sent him, he had really used the software they had sent him that let him apply that knowledge in a practical manner. They talked about the CJ systems the rest of the afternoon, until Luke looked at his watch. "Woah, it's nearly seven!" he said, then he laughed. "We'd better get back."

"So, what's the verdict?" Kit asked curiously.

"Two or three hours in a classroom, then you hit the simulator," Luke smiled. "And I promise we won't be that mean to you on the CJ check ride. We always introduce an emergency situation into the check ride when we use a simulator to see how the pilot responds, and we kinda decided to give you the nastiest scenario we had to see how well you'd do. I promise, your CJ emergency won't be quite so ruthless."

Kit laughed. "So, now I know whose house to firebomb," he grinned.

"Guilty," he said, raising his paws. "Don't shoot me, Sheriff, I got five kids to feed!"

"You're on the list!"

Luke allowed him to fly the Mustang back, and when they landed, he patted the console. "Damn, would I love to own a little jet like this. I bet it can land anywhere my four hundred can land, and it has almost the same range."

“Yeah, it can, and your four hundred actually has more range than a Mustang. If you want one, though, you’d better put down a deposit and stand in line. We have a line stretching back to two thousand ten for these little puppies. I kinda don’t like them, though.”

“Why is that?”

“Well, they fly very nice,” he said as they taxied towards the hangar. “But they’re really meant for short range recreation, a jet version of a private aircraft. After all, it is very small. My view is this; if I’m going to own a plane, I’d like something that can go some distance, has some legroom, and has a real lavatory, not a seat with a bucket and a pull curtain.”

“Well, that’s a step up from the portable urinal we keep in my four hundred,” Kit chuckled.

“This Mustang has just slightly less range than your four hundred, but it does go faster. And it’s pressurized,” Luke said. “But if I could afford any Citation, I’d buy a CJ three. It has almost double the range of a Mustang, able to go intercontinental if you go along the right routes, it’s very economical to fly, it can take off and land at some really short strips when it has to, it’s single pilot certified, and it’s roomy. And it has a lavatory,” he chuckled.

“And it’s what, seven million dollars?”

Luke nodded. “So I won’t be buying one anytime soon,” he laughed. “The Mustang is around three million. It’s really aimed at, pardon the comparison, furs like you. Furs of means who want a private jet for their own recreational use, the private pilot who wants to move up to a jet, and can afford it. Though, I have to admit, we’ve had quite a few orders from air taxi services to use it for short range trips, since it's very easy on the wallet when it comes to operational costs. It factors out to about three dollars a mile for total fuel and maintenance."

"That's not bad at all for a jet," Kit nodded as he taxied up to the hangar.

"If you don't mind landing to refuel and don't need a lot of space, I guess a Mustang will do you. After all, you can use the bathroom when you land to refuel," he chuckled. "But if I could afford it, I'd go with a CJ three."

"By the time I can afford a jet, they'll probably have warp engines or something," Kit chuckled as they rolled to a stop, and Kit shut down the engines. "The only reason I'm here is because my sister is rich, and she loves me. I'd never be able to afford this otherwise."

"Huh. To be honest, I was sure you'd be flying out of here in your new jet, and your wife would be flying your plane home. I thought you were just rating on more than one jet because you wanted to, you know, get the whole experience. I mean, you'll be here for six weeks, that hints that you have the time and resources to do something like this."

"She is flying the four hundred home...just with me in it," he chuckled. "I make less money than you do, Luke. Hell, half the reason I want my flight instructor rating is so maybe I can earn a little money on the side, since I have my own plane. A flight instructor with his own plane can freelance. My sister bought my four hundred for me," he explained to Luke's surprised look. "Actually, my whole family did. I couldn't afford a one seventy two, let alone a four hundred. If you come down to brass tacks, Luke, I'm actually poor. The only reason I got to do this is because my rich sister loves me and is helping me achieve a boyhood dream. When I go home, the dream will be over, and I go back to my twenty thousand dollar a year job and scrape to make ends meet, just like everyone else. All I'll have is the memory of doing what I've dreamed of since I was a boy."

"Well, that's a surprise. Really a surprise," Luke said, tapping his chin in consideration.

"I know, a poor Vulpan," Kit chuckled as they started post flight. "Shouldn't the world be exploding right now?"

Luke gave him a startled look, then laughed richly.

What was almost as good as getting his first jet rating was telling Vil. He called her that night after getting home, and didn't even give her the chance to say a word. "I got it, Vil!" he announced. "I passed my test for my first jet! I'm a jet pilot now, sis!"

"Alright!" she said with a laugh. "I'm so happy for you, bro! You finally did it!"

"And I have you to thank for it, sis," he said gratefully. "I can't ever thank you enough, for everything. For my jet rating. For sending Jessie to flight school. And for letting them give me FOI classes so I can get my flight instructor rating."

"This six weeks is all part of what the family owes you, bro," she said seriously. "The family stole six years of your happiness away from you, and if not for our bastard father, you wouldn't be missing your ear and have screws in your back."

"That's odd logic."

“If he wouldn’t have driven you out, you would have never been hit in the first place.”

“And I would never have met Jessie,” he pointed out.

“Well, I’ll be very selective about what crimes I feel you deserve compensation for,” she said flippantly. “I think these six weeks are just a pebble on the beach of what you’re due.”

“We can consider the six weeks here payment in full, Vil,” he told her.

“I’ll be the one to decide when you’ve been fully repaid, bro. I am the ruler of the family now.”

“I think you’re terribly biased.”

“So?”

Kit and Jessie had been busy.

It was almost three jobs now. Kit was doing research and writing for the magazine, taking video anywhere and everywhere he could. On top of that, he was busting his tail working on the CJ model rating. He had finished his classroom work, and had been logging hours in the simulator, adjusting to the Pro Line 21 avionics, which required a lot more work than rating to the Mustang, since it had the Garmin suite. But Kit was able to adjust, picking up the Pro Line quickly given how much different it was.

Luke was right, it was better than the Garmin. It was intuitive, comprehensive, and very well laid out, easy to use and easier to learn. It simplified the complicated systems of a jet to nearly “hit a switch” levels, automating many things pilots used to have to spend a lot of time calculating or looking up themselves. The autopilot was exceptional, and flight planning and management was a dream.

And now, on top of that, Kit was taking Fundamentals Of Instruction classes, or FOI. They were classes to teach how to teach, and while the classes weren't mandatory, they would help him pass the flight instructor FOI test that was. It wasn't a one on one class, it was Kit and two other furs being taught by a teacher, not a flight instructor. These were not flight courses in the conventional sense, though in some places, a flight instructor did teach FOI. But Cessna was a big company, they could afford to bring in a real teacher to teach pilots how to teach, so they could be flight instructors. The classes weren't hard, at least, and Jessie, who had taken similar classes in college for her preparation to be a teacher, was able to help him quite a bit.

The classroom time wasn't all he was doing, either. He was logging ground training hours on top of his FOI classes, squeezed in after simulator or classroom sessions. He needed about 40 total hours of ground training for all the ratings he wanted, and that put a real demand on his time. Luke did it in a linear fashion, but all the training he was getting was turning every day into a 14-16 hour day...and then he had to go home and study afterwards. It was a murderous pace, almost too much, but Kit was determined to squeeze absolutely everything he could out of the six weeks that Vil had arranged for him. He hadn't really come here to get his flight instructor rating, but they offered it, and with a lot of hard work, he could get it...and he may never have another chance. So he was going for it.

It was a bit funny, really. Kit and Jessie both had been very busy all last weekend, and between the two of them, they logged nearly 45 hours in flight or in flight simulators. Kit had spent 23 in the simulators on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, and Jessie had spent 14 hours flying, logging her hours for her license, then spent 8 hours in a simulator after clouds moved in and forced her to land; that was the curse of being a VFR pilot. When Monday came, he was settling in to spend a good 6 hours in the simulator, but Luke reminded him that he had to go to that class, which was also held in Wichita, and he had had to hustle there.

Jessie was moving right along. She had completed all of her logged hour requirements for her private pilot license, and was schedule to take her check ride today, 11 days after beginning, on a clear, sunny Thursday. She had taken her written exam yesterday, and had passed with a 96, only missing 4 questions on the whole 100 question test. David had decided to wait one more day to help solidify her on some parts of the oral exam dealing with the Cessna 400 itself, since questions about the plane was part of her check ride oral exam...and this actually worked against Jessie. Most pilots took their check ride in a much simpler plane, like a 172, but Jessie was taking hers in a 400, with all of its additional systems and controls. The 172 didn't have anti-icing systems, speed brakes, TCAS, and so on and so on, where a 400 did. And since they were part of the plane, she had to be able to answer questions about them as part of her oral exam.

Kit was very busy, but he couldn't miss her check ride. He also didn't want to crowd her, so he took video of her and her check ride examiner from a distance, a portly possom, as they walked around the 400. The examiner would point to something, then the two of them would talk for a while. He seemed to talk about the wings and the flaps, then they went around the tail, then they walked around to the propellor. Then they did it again, this time clearly for the walk around preflight, as Jessie tested flight control surfaces and inspected the plane.

Then they got inside. Kit held his breath as they talked in the cockpit for a while, then she started the engine. Luke and David joined him as the 400 taxied out onto the ramp, and Kit taped as she taxied out to the runway, lined up, and then accelerated to take off.

“And there she goes,” David said with a chuckle. “Tom’s in for a shock.”

“Tom?” Kit asked.

“The examiner. I was a bit ticked when he was assigned, since he’s prejudiced against femmes. He’s always harder on femmes than he is on males. But he’ll be in for a shock against Jessie.”

“He’s that bad?” Kit asked.

“He’s not blatant about it,” David answered. “But when he does Citation checkrides for femme pilots, he always asks them harder questions, and always gives them harder emergency situations in the simulator. Jessie will beat him up,” David laughed. “She will ace this.”

Kit taped it when they came back from the navigation part, and watched as she performed a slow approach, her flaps fully deployed, but too high to land. He saw the plane shudder slightly, as the examiner made her stall the plane, but she correctly got herself out of the stall without losing more than ten feet of height, powering up and retracting her flaps. Then she went around and performed a short strip landing, landing smoothly and then hitting the brakes, bringing the plane to a stop in half the runway length, right in the intersection between the runways. She then started the plane forward again, then turned on the first ramp leading to a parallel taxiway.

“That had to be her fifty foot obstacle as well,” David mused. “Typical Tom, a short strip landing with an imaginary obstacle to boot. And he always makes them stop at the intersection.”

“Yeah,” Kit agreed. “She aced that landing, didn’t she?”

“Beyond aced it,” David laughed.

They went over to the plane after it came to a stop on the flight line, and the two of them talked a minute in the cockpit before the possum opened his door and started climbing out. He approached the three of them as they came towards him, and gave David a nod. “She should have flown her check ride weeks ago,” he announced with satisfaction. “She scored perfect.”

Kit had to resist jumping into the air, passing the camera to David and rushing forward. Jessie climbed down from the trainer and got swallowed up in his arms as he gave her a nearly crushing hug, then hooked his paws under her arms, picked her up, and swung her around like a child. “Congratulations baby!” he said giddily.

“So I passed?” she asked excitedly.

“You scored perfect, Jessie!” David told her, taking video of Kit swinging her around.

“Yes!” she squealed, then leaned down and kissed Kit on the nose. “So who’s flying the plane home now, my handsome fox?” she asked.

“You are!” he told her, pulling her down into a hug. “Congratulations, pretty kitty, you’re a pilot now!”

“And now we start flying the twin engine plane, right?” Jessie asked.

“Just as soon as we get your temporary license from the FAA office here, we will,” David told her. “We only have four more weeks, Jessie, so we can’t stop to celebrate too much. You still need your multi engine and IFR, and we’ll be just squeaking you by on your requirements.”

“How long will it take to get the multi?”

“About a week,” David answered. “It’s basically just learning how having two engines changes how you do things, and the entire test is practical. An experienced pilot could pass his multi practical after as little as two full days of training, if he really buckled down and had complete access to the plane. But since you’re a new pilot, you’ll need a little more time. Then comes the IFR, and that will be what takes up the majority of your time with us, because you have to log about fifty hours of flight time under certain conditions. We can use a flight simulator for some of it, some of it will be solo, and some of it has to be in in a plane. There’s a lot to it. I figure that will take us about two weeks minimum, three weeks maximum to get the logged hours done, and then there’s fifteen hours of devoted training I have to give you, then you have to do your checkride. You should be ready for ten hour days preparing for your IFR, Jessie, and most of that either flying or in a simulator.”

“But if I get my IFR done in two weeks, that leaves us a whole week,” she realized.

“Which you’ll be spending in the Mustang rating program,” David said with a big grin at Kit.

“I thought I needed my commercial—“

“No. All you need to rate to fly a jet is your private, multi, and IFR. Once you have those, you can rate. It’s no guarantee you’ll finish in time, just to warn you. But you already know the Garmin, so that shaves a good week off the usual training. You'll have a week to try to learn enough to try a check ride. If you pass, good for you. If you fail, don't worry about it, it's enough that you tried with so little flight experience. We're of a mind to give you the chance just to see how well you can do, because you have impressed us, Jessie. You won't be able to rate as pilot in command because you have no experience, but you can rate to fly a jet as the copilot. Now, getting insurance would be ridiculously expensive, but hey, you'll have the rating, won't you?"

"They'd insure me?"

"They have to," Luke smirked. "Anyone who graduates from our training program is guaranteed insurance, since we trained you, and we don't sign off on furs who can't fly. Believe it or not, this isn't a free ride for either of you, you have to prove you can do it. An insurance company would be forced to offer you a policy, because you were given your rating by Cessna, not a flight school. They'd charge you through the nose, but they'd have to offer you the insurance."

"That's why I want to sign off on my four hundred through you while I'm here, so my insurance comes way down," Kit nodded.

"Take a test, you have it," David grinned at him. "Because we seriously doubt you don't know your plane. You've been flying it, after all. And it's very clear you taught Jessie almost everything she knows."

Kit and Jessie went to eat a celebratory lunch of hamburgers at a McDonald's near the airport, and Jessie was a mixture of happy and tentative. "Do you really think I could do it?" she asked. "Really learn to fly a jet? Like really?"

“It won’t be easy,” he warned her, taking a bite out of a French fry. “I won’t lie about that, pretty kitty. But you’re one of the most intelligent femmes I’ve ever known. It would take a lot of work, love. And I mean a lot. You’ll have to study a lot, and fly long hours in the simulator. You’ll have a hell of a lot of information thrown at you all at once, because you have to get your multi and IFR done before they throw the Mustang at you. It would be like being in the mother of all pressure-cooker crash courses. You’ll definitely have a few sleepless nights studying. And you don’t have to do it. If you find it’s too much for you while you’re doing your IFR, then tell them you don’t want to do it. There’s nothing making you, love. Hell, you’d be like me, rated to fly a plane you’ll never fly. But, it’s up to you. If you want to try it, then I’ll do everything I can to help you.”

“Well, let’s see how well I do learning to fly multi-engine planes, then decide from there.”

“A wise move,” he said with a smile and a nod.

It was a terrible burden on her, but Kit thought that it was possible. Flying was nothing but a combination of memorizing information and practicing the procedures once in a cockpit. Theoretically, they could take someone with absolutely no flight experience and teach him to fly a 747 just by letting him practice enough. And that was where Jessie, and him for that matter, had that advantage. In regular flight schools, like the one that Sheila and Allison were now attending, they were restricted by time. They only did an hour here, an hour there, and maybe a few hours on the weekends. But Kit and Jessie were here literally full time, spending 8 to 10 hours a day, every day, working on their skills, and learning what they had to learn to do it. Sheila could probably get her license in two weeks if she spent 12 hours a day on it, 7 days a week, and spent most of her off time studying the bookwork that came with the course. That was how Jessie bulled through to her private in just 11 days, because she walked into the place already knowing most of what she needed to know...and that knowledge came from consistent study and access to a plane whenever she wanted it. But from here out, both he and Jessie knew that it wasn't going to be very easy. Kit couldn't really prepare her for multi engines because he had no access to one, he could only explain things to her as best he could from memory. And IFR could not be easily prepared for, since the vast majority of an IFR rating was logged hours and training, not studying. Jessie couldn't really study in advance for an IFR, only study after she was trained. So, it was good to wait and see how well she did now that they were delving into area where Jessie's preparation and prior training would not help her.

Could she really walk out of Kansas rated to fly a Mustang? Oh yes. But would it be easy? Hell no. In fact, it would be the hardest thing she'd ever do in her life.

They separated after lunch. Kit went back to Wichita to continue logging hours in the CJ simulator, while Jessie began her work on multi engine planes. He went to FOI class after, and got back to the hotel around eight. Jessie hadn't yet got back, so he made sure to make her a nice dinner of broiled salmon steaks and asparagus. When she didn't come back by nine, he called her. She answered on the first ring. "Hey, handsome fox."

"Are you okay, love? It's nearly nine."

"It is? Oh my goodness!" she gasped. "Dave, it's nearly nine! I'm so sorry, handsome fox! I'll come home right now and cook."

“I’ve already cooked, you silly kitty,” he chuckled. “I just want you to come get it before it gets cold.”

“I’ll be there in just a little bit.”

“What made you lose track of time?”

“We just got back from a night flight,” she answered. “It’s both for my multi and for my IFR, Dave said. We were talking about how I did.”

“Ah. Well, broiled salmon awaits you, pretty kitty.”

“Oooh, you’re so good to me, handsome fox!”

“It’s a congratulation dinner for becoming a real pilot,” he told her.

She got back to the hotel in about fifteen minutes, and ate with her usual speed. She was very happy and bubbly, a welcome and wonderful change from the almost frenetic femme that had kept her nose in a book or her laptop almost continuously for the last three days. “Feels nice to finally take a breather, doesn’t it?” he smiled.

She laughed. “I’m not unhappy, though,” she told him. “All that work was worth it. Have you told Vil or my folks?”

“And ruin it for you? No! I left that happy chore to you, love. It’s your accomplishment, it’s your privilege to spread the happy news.”

She did that after dinner, calling Vil, her mother, and Sheila while Kit worked on more research for the magazine. They were definitely treating him with kid gloves, he could see. The research assignments Rick sent him were child’s play, almost like it was token busy work. But he made up for it with his articles, for he had an article to write tonight about Jessie’s victory, about getting her private pilot rating, getting her pilot’s license. It was such an easy article to write. He captured the joy of finally holding that temporary license in your paw, knowing that all your hard work had finally culminated in the right to get into a plane and fly off into the wild blue yonder, that the world was opened up to you like an oyster holding a pearl. He then described what was next for her, how she was moving on to multi-engine planes, and then would get her instrument rating that would allow her to fly in cloud cover and at night, and make instrument approaches to airports. He then talked about his own feeling of anxiety and trepidation at tomorrow, for tomorrow he would do his next check ride, on the CJ series. He would do his check ride in a CJ3 simulator, and that would also cover the CJ1 and CJ2 if he passed, since they had the exact same systems and procedures, and the differences between them were minimal, though he would be tested on those differences during the check ride's oral exam. "Even though I'm already a jet pilot, and still giddy about it, I find myself with the same knot in my stomach," he wrote. "I know it's a bit silly, but I can't help it. A test is a test, and I'm being tested on how well I learned, and that reflects on both me and my wonderful sister, who paid a lot of money to send me and Jessie to this training center. If I don't do the best I can, I'll feel as if I failed myself, and what's worse, I failed my sister. So, I guess you can say that my own desire to earn a new jet rating is only half of my motivation. The other half is to make sure my sister isn't embarrassed by me, that she has good reason to spend her money on me, that I won't let her down. I want her to be proud of me, because I love her."

Jessie spent a very happy evening calling friends and family, and then went to bed around eleven. Kit again stayed up almost all night studying the CJ series, going over everything over and over and over, until Jessie came out into the living room at three in the morning, collected him, and forced him to go to bed by literally grabbing hold of him and holding him in bed, assaulting him with her purring. It never failed to seduce him into a sense of peace and contentment, and he fell asleep soon afterward.

Kit took his check ride at eight in the morning, almost as soon as he got out of the Mustang with Luke. Justin was again his examiner, and they got right down to business. He spent nearly a half hour answering questions, and then Justin again sat in the copilot's seat of the simulator as Kit began the practical section of the test. He got his destination, plotted his course, input all the information into the Pro Line 21, and then went through the procedures to start the jet. Once he had it up and running, he taxied it out to the simulated runway, got clearance, and took off. The simulated check ride would take about half an hour, a jaunt from Wichita to Topeka, and as Luke promised, his simulated emergency was nowhere near as nasty as his Mustang one. The one this time was an indicator showing that the nose landing gear did not fully deploy, which caused Kit to undertake the procedures dealing with such an emergency. Cycling the gear did no good, did not clear the warning light, so he declared an emergency and requested a low speed fly-by of the tower so they could visually check his gear and see if they were deployed or not, if it was a gear problem or some problem with the indicators themselves. The simulated fly-by was done and the controller, who was actually Luke over an intercom, told him that his nosegear was indeed down. But, that was no indication that it was actually locked, so he decided to undertake full safety. He requested an emergency landing and permission to circle to burn fuel to lighten the plane...and at this point, the conditions of the simulator diverged from actual reality. To speed things up, Luke informed him that they would assume that Kit had circled long enough to reduce his fuel to the amount he specified he wanted on hand to make the landing. The fuel indicator on his plane magically changed to reflect about thirty minutes of flight, and then he lined up with the runway and executed a bad-gear landing. He put the back wheels down first, and ran with the nose off the runway, slowing down as much as possible before putting weight on his nosegear, and then he let the plane's nose come down. The weight hit the nosegear, and then the simulator shuddered as indicators told him that the nosegear had buckled and collapsed under the simulated plane; it had not been locked. He jacked the brakes to stop the plane as fast as possible, kept the sliding nose of the plane aimed straight down the runway, then quickly shut down the engines and the electrical systems to prevent a possible fire the second the plane slid to a complete stop.

“When do I get to land in a check ride and actually land?” Kit asked with a rueful chuckle. “You may not even know if I know how to actually land a jet.”

Justin laughed, and made a final note on his clipboard. “Anyone who can put his back wheels down and run a good six hundred feet of runway before putting the nose down can land a damn jet,” he grinned. “Oh, by the way, you passed. Congratulations.”

And so, Kit was happy all over again. He had earned his second jet type rating.

After lunch, and calling Jessie to tell her of his success, they started on the Encore. Again, they started with a quiz of what he knew, and he again did not disappoint Luke. They spent about three hours doing that, then Luke chuckled and had him go straight to a simulator. The Encore required two pilots, so Luke was in the simulator with him acting first as the pilot in command, and then as the copilot, teaching him the way two pilots worked, how the Encore had certain tasks performed by one pilot or the other.

After about seven hours in the simulator, Kit went to his FOI class, then flew back to Independence and went back to the hotel. Jessie was already there when he arrived, and had made him Cincinnati style chili. “How did you do today, pretty kitty?”

“I flew for about six hours,” she smiled in reply. “David says I’m doing just fine. It’s a lot more complicated flying a multi-engine plane,” she complained.

“That’s why they call them complex, pretty kitty,” Kit chuckled. “Did you like it?”

“That plane isn’t as nice as ours I felt really weird flying using a yoke.”

“The stick in our plane is an exception, not the norm.”

“Well, I like our plane better.”

“So do I, truth be told. The side stick feels natural in your paw.”

Kit got to spread the good news of another rating, and wrote another article about his experience that night. Jessie had taken video of her night flight in the 303, so they sent that into the magazine as well. And both of them, as if by unspoken agreement, put aside all studying that night and went to go see a movie, just relaxing a bit. Tomorrow they’d both be doing a lot of flying time, since it would be Saturday, and poor David and Luke had yet to have a day off. They’d been completely at Kit and Jessie’s beck and call since they arrived in Kansas.

Kit arrived in Wichita at the Encore simulator the next morning ready to log more hours, and Luke didn’t disappoint. They put about five hours in the simulator, and then they went to lunch, which was lunch with Jessie, since she flew their plane to Wichita to have lunch with him, and so he could show her around. After his long lunch, he was majorly derailed when Justin appeared again, right out of the blue. “Alright, let’s do this,” he said.

“What? Now? I haven’t had time to study! I’m not ready!”

“Humor us. If you fail, this check ride won’t count. Fair enough?”

“Well, I guess.”

Kit felt very uncomfortable. He didn’t answer questions about the Encore with his usual immediate certainty. He had to stop, to think, to consider, then he gave his answers. Justin quizzed him for nearly thirty minutes, asking him about Encore systems, about the differences between the Encore and the CJ, asked him about different controls in the Encore compared to the CJ, and asked him about how things were different in a two pilot cockpit, what rules he had to follow. Justin didn’t pink slip him immediately during the oral quiz, so Kit figured he must have answered enough questions correctly...or Justin was just waiting to pink slip him after the flight. From the flight standpoint, though the Encore was so much like the CJ it was almost like it was the same jet. The Encore was bigger, so it was a bit heavier and more sluggish on the controls, and Kit already knew which controls were different so he had little trouble adjusting. It was also a two pilot jet, so Luke served as his copilot, but did nothing except what Kit told him to do, just occupying the space while Justin sat in a seat behind them. Kit had to act as the pilot in command, even though even if he rated, he could not be the pilot in command until he logged 20 hours in the right seat.

They had to throw a curve ball at him as well, since he got an emergency. The emergency, though, was blown breakers and a shift to backup power. Kit declared the obligatory emergency and went through the main power loss checklist, but couldn't find the problem. So he diverted to the nearest airport, which was a short runway, and landed using just about the entire thing, bringing the jet to a stop about fifty feet from the end of runway warning stripes.

As he did the emergency condition post flight, he sighed and looked at Luke. "Alright, how bad did I do?" he asked.

"So badly we'll have to pass you," Justin answered with an amused tilt to his voice.

"What? Are you kidding?"

"You made only two minor mistakes during the flight, nothing you'd get a pink slip over, and only answered one question wrong during the oral."

"What mistakes?"

"You set the thrust levers to start the engines using the procedure in a CJ, then caught yourself and did it the right way. That had to be counted as an error, but since you corrected your error, it's minor. I'll chalk that one up to you taking your CJ check ride this morning," he chuckled. "The other mistake you made was you missed a call from ATC and they had to call you again. Again, a minor error, nothing we all haven't done, but also something I have to mark as an error during a check ride. But neither are worth a pink slip. So congratulations, that's two ratings in two days," he grinned. "That gives you plenty of time to work on your ten rating. And trust me, you're gonna need it."

"The ten is probably the most difficult rating to get in the Citation program," Luke agreed. "New avionics, and the ten handles much differently than every other plane you've flown so far. So you'll get plenty of time to work on it."

"This was a filler rating anyway, Encores are two pilot jets and I doubt you'll ever fly one," Justin laughed. "They'll be all but obsolete once the CJ four is certified. There's serious talk to reduce production on the line when the CJ four is in production."

"But it's a rating, and it looks pretty on my license," Kit said, which made both of them laugh and nod in agreement.

Kit added that little blurb in his article that night, after he spread the news that he'd completed two ratings in two days, and was now about to start learning to fly the fastest civilian airplane in the sky. "It was an ambush test if there ever was one," Kit laughed to Vil that night. "I had no idea they were going to do it. But they said I passed, and I'm positive they wouldn't pass me unless I passed for real. You don't fake things in the world of aviation, or furs die."

"What now?"

"For me, I start training on the Citation ten, the fastest civilian jet in the air. Jessie's still working on her multi-engine rating, and probably won't finish that until sometime next week."

"How long will it take you to do this ten training?"

"Probably about two weeks," he answered. "We're starting on Monday, and I'm ready for some work. They told me that the ten is the hardest of the Citations to fly, because it's so fast. It has different handling characteristics."

"That's all Greek to me, bro."

He chuckled. “When are you coming to see us?”

“The last weekend you’re there,” she answered. “So when you have one week to go. It’ll be me and Kendall, and I’m picking up John, Hannah, and Ben on the way over. Sheila said she’s coming up too. We’ve already decided to let you give us a flight,” she told him. “If you finish your rating on the ten, you’ll be carrying us in that. If not, we’ll take the biggest jet you can fly and have you give us a ride.”

“I sorta have to, since you paid for all this,” he laughed.

“Damn right, baby bro,” she said teasingly. “I want my money’s worth!”

Sunday, Kit and Luke worked on the required ground training he needed for his flight instructor rating, and he also logged enough hours in a CJ simulator to give him the magical 5 hours logged in make and model to be qualified to train students on that model. Kit intended to get enough logged hours to be able to teach the Mustang and CJ, since he fully intended to train his wife someday, when he could afford a jet of his own. He wanted to be ready, and he also wanted to be able to be able to do her training for her commercial license for both single and multi-engines. Kit intended to go back home with the ratings to teach VFR, IFR, single engine, and multi-engine, and most important of all, be able to train a pilot to rate in every jet in which he held a rating. With those, Kit could probably get a job in almost any flight school as an instructor if the magazine ever failed and closed down.

It was always smart to have a fallback plan, especially for a fur about to have a baby.

Jessie had finished early, so she was already in the hotel room when he returned. She was in the bedroom, putting on her new swimsuit, because the pool was now open. “How did it go, love?” she asked as she pulled on her bikini bottoms and snugged them over her hips. Her baby bump was more pronounced now, but still wasn’t detracting overly from her figure. She felt comfortable enough to wear a two piece, baring her belly.

“Same as always, I ground hours in a simulator,” he chuckled. “Nice suit,” he said with a wink.

She laughed. “It does have a top, handsome fox,” she said pointedly.

“I like it better like that.”

“I’m so glad that you do,” she said primly. “You just like looking at my swollen breasts.”

“This is a bad thing?”

“Behave, you naughty boy,” she laughed. “And give me the top.”

“No, I think I’ll take you out just like that,” he told her, grabbing up her top and holding it firmly in his paw.

“Kit,” she warned.

“Yes, dear?”

“Don’t you dear me, you rascal,” she told him. “Give me my top.”

“Make me.”

That, naturally, was the wrong thing to say. It was quite a lot of fun to have her chase him around the bedroom, but it wasn’t as much fun when she caught him. After what she considered was suitable chastisement with a pillow from the bed, she wrested her top from him, held him down long enough to get off of him, then swatted him rather firmly on the backside with her paw. “Bad fox!” she chided him.

“I love being bad for you, pretty kitty,” he said unashamedly, rolling over on his side and grinning at her.

“I’ll train you yet, you bad boy,” she giggled. “Now put on the trunks I bought for you and come swim with me!”

“I’d love to.”

The air was a bit cool, and the water cooler, but it was nice to swim. The hotel’s pool was large and had a diving board, and they had the pool to themselves with just a bored lifeguard looking on as they enjoyed the pool, then sat on the steps leading in from the shallow end and soaked as they talked. “I don’t think I’m going to go for the Mustang rating, handsome fox,” she told him. “I’m starting to get a little burned out. I think I’ll be happy getting my instrument rating.”

“That’s fine with me, love,” he told her, kissing her on the cheek. “I told you, it would have been very hard, and it would have been a lot of work for you.”

“Well, I can always come back and get it some other time, maybe after our daughter’s born,” she smiled. “After I have time to enjoy what I already have.”

“No shame in that, love, none at all,” he said honestly. “You know, we need to think of a name for her.”

“I’ve already got a list,” she giggled.

“How about Andromeda?”

“Oh no, no mythology, no Shakespeare,” she laughed. “How about Laura Julie Vulpan?”

“Too normal,” he smiled. “Vulpans aren’t normal.”

“Well, this Vulpan will be,” she told him.

“Alright, well, how about Laura Beth Vulpan?” he asked. “Beth was what everyone always called my mother, and Laura Beth has a nice flow to it.”

“I like it,” she said, then she sighed and leaned against him. He put his arm around her, and she leaned her head on his shoulder and started to purr.

Things got serious for both of them starting on Monday.

Kit began his training on the Citation X, which was very complicated. The X was a large jet, and it had swept wings, which was a wing design Kit had never flown before. That changed just about everything about how the jet handled, and Kit found himself in class all over again, learning about how to fly a swept wing aircraft. That lasted three days, then he had two days of marathon classroom instruction on the X’s avionics system, which was different from the Pro Line 21 used in the CJ and the Encore. He would go from X class straight to FOI class every weekday for the first week, then he studied the avionics and specs of the plane on his own at night. After that, he would do his boring, milktoast research assignments while he wondered just what real research they weren’t sending him, wrote his articles, and uploaded videos when they made them.

Jessie was busy as well. She took her multi rating practical test on Wednesday, and Kit felt awful that he hadn't had a chance to be there for it. But he was in classes now, classes with two other pilot trainees learning the X as well. David got video of it for him, though, and taped Jessie passing her multi rating practical check ride with flying colors. After she got her multi rating, she focused on logging hours, getting more and more comfortable behind the controls of a plane, and also completing the required hours she needed for her IFR, as well as the special conditions on those hours, such as her three stop cross country hours, her night time hours, and her solo hours that had to be logged in a plane, and not a simulator. She no longer used the 400 trainer, she flew the 303 trainer almost exclusively, both logging IFR required hours and also logging hours behind the controls of a multi-engine plane, which were critical hours. She'd been told that she needed to get her multi hours now, that her single engine hours would come in her own plane, since she could fly it whenever she wanted. But after she got her multi, she slowed down, considerably. She'd already told David she didn't want to try for the Mustang rating, so she was enjoying her training instead of cramming every night, enjoying her flights, getting the chance to finally enjoy the fruits of her labor. So though Jessie was busy, she was much happier than she'd been when she was working non-stop to get ready for her license. She was pacing herself to take her IFR tests in their final week.

As they entered their fourth week, and as Jessie's stomach started becoming slightly more pronounced with her baby bump, Kit entered his last week of FOI classes, and also moved from the X classroom to the X simulator. He was paired with Luke in the simulator half the time, but the other half of the time he was paired with one of the other X pilot students. When Kit was with Luke, he did all the flying, learning how to fly the finicky, very responsive Citation X. It did truly handle differently from every other jet he'd learned to fly, and it took him about ten hours of simulator time to finally adapt to the light, touchy, almost reactive controls of the X. Once Kit had gotten accustomed to the flight characteristics of the X, he was paired with the other students, where they took turns being the pilot in command and worked together, learning both how to control the cockpit and how to take orders when not in control.

On Friday, Kit arrived in Wichita very nervous, for today he was scheduled to take his check ride for the X. Again, it was Justin who met him at the simulator, and as usual, he wasted no time. Almost as soon as he shook Kit's paw, he started the questions. Kit was ready this time, though, this wasn't the ambush check ride like the Encore, and he answered quickly and confidently. After nearly an hour of questions about the many systems and the avionics, it was time to do the flight. Luke again served as the copilot, and Kit acted as pilot in command. A solid week in the simulator had gotten him used to the cockpit and the touchy controls, so he was able to taxi and take off smoothly. His flight plan was to fly to Denver at 41,000 feet at Mach .91, almost the maximum cruise speed of the plane. And yet again, they introduced an emergency situation into the check ride. As Kit began his descent to Denver, the simulated plane lost pressurization. Kit performed the proper emergency procedure, donning his oxygen mask, then making an emergency descent to under 12,000 feet as he declared an emergency. But once he was under 12,000 feet, the main urgency of the emergency faded, and he got his emergency clearance to land at Denver while he ordered Luke, the copilot, to conduct the emergency checklist to try to find out why the plane depressurized, and also to make sure no other systems were affected. Kit landed the simulator smoothly, the first time he'd got to land without some kind of landing issue that required him stop in the runway and execute an emergency shutdown, letting him taxi all the way to where ground control guided him so they could inspect the plane to find the problem.

When he shut down the engines and the simulation ended, he blew out his breath and took his paws off the yoke. “At least you let me land this time,” he said, which made Luke and Justin erupt into laughter.

“Congratulations, Kit, you’re now rated to fly the fastest civilian aircraft in service,” Justin told him with a light smile.

“The rest of today is basically yours, Kit. If you want to work on your twenty hours to get your PIC for the ten, you can start the simulator time now. Monday is a down day, and so is the rest of next week,” Luke told him. “You’ll take your FOI exam, and if you pass, you’ll have a week to prepare for the check rides. We’ll do the required flight maneuver checks and training on Wednesday and Thursday. We’ll arrange your flight instructor check rides for Friday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. Type one, type two, MEI, then MEII, scheduled for eight in the morning each day. A CFI check ride can last anywhere from three to eight hours, depending on how well you answer everything, so after you finish your check ride, Luke will take you to CJ four training. After the MEII, you’ll type rate the Mustang and CJ, and if we have enough time and you have the simulator hours, you can try to rate the ten. Remember, you have to be PIC rated to instruct on a two pilot jet, so if you want that rating, you have to PIC the ten by next week. The week after is your last week with us, and we’ll be spending that in Independence, rating you on the CJ four when you’re not doing your CFI check rides. You’ll be rated on a plane only our test pilots and instructors are rated to fly so far,” he smiled. “You’ll be our first civilian pilot rated for it.”

“Wow, I’m honored,” Kit said earnestly.

“I’d say you’ve earned the honor,” Justin said. “You’re a very good pilot, Kit. We didn’t spoonfeed you these ratings. You have definitely earned them. I’d put my entire family in a jet you’re piloting without batting an eye.”

Kit laughed. “Think I can get an instructor rating for the CJ four? That way I can teach a plane that doesn’t exist. I like the irony of it.”

Luke laughed. “Technically we can’t do it because we can’t flight rate a plane not in production to people not working for the company. But we’ll give you the check ride test in the simulator and give you an unofficial endorsement.”

“That sounds fine to me,” Kit grinned. “What time is it?”

“Oh, about eleven,” Luke answered.

“Think we can go back to Independence and let me take the check ride for my four hundred before I start my twenty hour marathon slog in the simulator? I’d really like that cert so I can get my insurance down.”

“Hell, why not?” Luke laughed. “Feel like dusting off your prop check ride hat, Justin?”

“Sure. I think we have a four hundred here. We’ll check ride it back to Independence, and Luke can fly the Mustang back. You can have lunch with your wife, then we’ll come back up here so you can start logging sim hours.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Kit nodded.

Actually, they didn't have a 400 in Wichita at that moment, but that was quickly fixed. Kit called Jessie, and about forty minutes later, as Justin filled out the forms to do a check ride on a 400, she landed their private plane and taxied it up to them at the mouth of the biggest hangar of the Citation Flight Training Center. She had a huge grin on her face as she opened the gullwing door after shutting down the engine. "Did someone call a cab?" she winked.

"I did, and you're late!" Kit teased in reply. "Now get outta there and let me borrow it."

"Where's my cab fare?"

Kit climbed up onto the wing, leaned into the cockpit, and kissed Jessie noisily on the cheek. "There, paid in full."

"That wasn't even a tenth of my fare," she winked at him. "But you can pay me later."

Justin knew it was a formality, but he also did not skimp in any way. He had the 400 sheets with him, so he asked Kit questions just as detailed and in depth as they would have been if Kit was taking his initial test. This wasn't a check ride for the FAA, it was Cessna's own type rating check ride, which would officially give him a graduation certificate from their training course, and would drastically lower the insurance that Vil had to pay on the plane. Despite the air of technicality surrounding the exercise, both Justin and Kit took it seriously. Justin would not pass someone that could not pass the test, the real test, and Kit would not just accept a piece of paper thrust in front of him saying he passed something he could pass on his own merit and ability. Luke flew Jessie back to Independence on the Mustang as Kit and Justin got into the 400, and he took off to follow them.

Justin had him go up to ten thousand feet though, and broached a subject that seemed to be on his mind. “You know they’ll make you recover from a spin to pass your flight check ride,” he warned. Without batting an eye, Kit dropped throttle and nosed up. Justin laughed and nodded. “I want to see a full developed spin!” he ordered. “None of that jacking the rudder the instant the nose drops chickenshit!”

“You asked for it,” Kit grinned as the stall horn blared.

Kit showed Justin he could, in fact, recover from a developed spin. Kit let the spin get very deep, as they corkscrewed down, and then he nursed the rudder and stick expertly to rebalance the wings, clear the spin conditions, then regain control of the plane. In all, they lost about a thousand feet of altitude when Kit finally pulled level. He looked over to Justin, who had a big smile on his face. “Kit, you’ll have no trouble passing your type one,” he announced. “I just hope you can fly a twin as well as you can fly this baby.”

He snorted. “It’s even easier to recover a stall in a twin engine plane,” he scoffed. “Which is a good thing, since you don’t want to spin a multi. That’s the express elevator to the deck.”

“Amen,” Justin nodded.

By the time they got to Independence, Justin had given over testing Kit’s ability to fly and knowledge of his plane, and they landed smoothly. As soon as they were in the hangar, Justin got out and went to the office, so he could have them file the paperwork that graduated Kit from the Cessna 400 training program.

He had lunch with Jessie in the McDonalds near the airport, and she told him about her day so far. She’d done flight time in the simulator that morning, and she had the rest of the day to herself because she and David were going to take a night flight. “Tonight and tomorrow will be my last required night hours,” she told him. “I do two hours with Dave tonight, then I fly two hours solo tomorrow.”

“Have you been doing ILS approaches?”

She nodded. “And I’ve already gone through my hold pattern training. And I’m finally getting the hang of talking to air traffic control,” she laughed.

He smiled. “Almost feels like we left our lives behind, doesn’t it?” he asked suddenly and a little wanly. “I miss home.”

“Me too, but I look at this as an extended vacation that will let me fly you around when we go back to our lives,” she winked. “Besides, only two weeks left.”

“And only seventeen weeks and two days for you,” he said with a glorious smile.

She patted her expanding belly and giggled. “Laura is going to be in so much trouble when I get her out of here,” she said. “For making me feel fat!”

“Like you’ll be mad for more than a half a second,” he teased. “When’s your next appointment with Doctor Mac?”

“Tuesday,” she answered. “I already have a ride down.”

“Oh?”

She nodded. “David worked it out for me. I’m riding in a Citation ten,” she beamed. “I think they were going to offer you the chance to fly down with me.”

“Of course I’m going, Doctor Mac will thrash me if I don’t show up with you for the appointment.”

“Then you need to talk to David after we finish lunch,” she said.

“I think they already know, now that I think about it. Luke said nothing about us doing anything on Tuesday. I’ll ask him when I get there.”

David did in fact have it all arranged. “Your sister, Miss Vulpan, arranged it,” he said. “We’ll fly you two down on Tuesday morning, and bring you back when you’re finished. So, if you want to fly the plane, Kit, get your sim hours this weekend,” he winked. “If you get your twenty, I’ll let you PIC it.”

“You will?”

He nodded. “I’m going to be doing the flying,” he said. “I am rated in every Citation jet there is,” he added with a grin. “I’m just teaching Jessie prop planes as a special favor.”

“Well, we do appreciate it, Dave,” Kit told him honestly.

“Well, your sister is paying to charter the jet,” David admitted. “So it’s not entirely because we like you.”

“She did say she’d handle getting Jessie to the doctor and back while we were here,” Kit nodded.

“I didn’t realize she was pregnant until last week,” David laughed. “She was wearing a tighter tee shirt, not her usual sweater or baggy tee, and I saw her baby bump.”

“She hides it well,” Kit chuckled. “She thinks she’ll look fat, and I’m afraid that my pretty kitty has just a slight touch of vanity. She’s very proud of her figure.”

“She’s gorgeous.”

“She’s also very shy, and thinks that if I think she’s fat, I’ll lose interest in her. I keep telling her she’s being ridiculous, but she’ll learn.”

“Femmes can be fickle sometimes,” David said sagely. “It’s all those hormones.”

“And this is why you’re not married.”

It was another long weekend, but it was long because Kit had a goal.

Twenty hours by Tuesday.

He worked out a schedule that would let him get his hours in and study for his two written tests that came with the flight instructor rating, that he would take on Monday. He returned to Wichita and put nine hours in the simulator that afternoon and evening, and flew back in the Mustang they were letting him use and got in at nearly eleven...but that was alright, since Jessie too was still out, probably just finishing up the solo night flight she needed for her IFR. He spent the next morning cooking Jessie quiche, which lured her yawning out of the bedroom, wearing nothing but a pair of skimpy panties. “Rowr,” Kit said with a smile, which made her laugh.

“Did I wake you when I came in last night?” she asked.

“You’re certainly waking me up now,” he grinned.

She blew him a playful kiss and detoured into the bathroom. “What are you doing today, handsome fox?” she called as the shower started.

“Six hours of simulator time in Wichita on the ten, then I’m coming home to study for my FOI and instructor written,” he answered. “What about you?”

“Four hours cross country solo time in the Crusader simulator. David says I’ll take my IFR practical on Friday,” she called over the sound of the shower.

“You’re not flying live?”

“I’ve been having to pee too much to want to spend a long time in a plane,” she complained loudly. “I almost wet myself trying to get to the bathroom last night!”

“Why didn’t you take a urinal?”

“Have you tried to use a femme urinal behind the controls of a Crusader?” she said immediately. “I’d rather hold it!”

“Well, you win that argument,” Kit laughed. She was right; a 303 cockpit was rather confined, and since it was a yoke, it put the controls in the way when one tried to use a urinal. For a femme, who would have to sit on the very edge of the seat to use it, it would be very awkward.

Kit fielded a call from Rick as he put the quiche in the oven. “Hey boss, how’s it going?”

“Doing great, son. I get my cast off on Monday.”

“That’s almost a week earlier than they said.”

“Well, Martha’s been the ultimate nurse,” he chuckled. “They want my leg to have a few more days, and then the cast comes off.”

“Well, this is going to work, boss. Me and Jessie are coming back for an appointment with her obstetrician on Tuesday. Want to get together for lunch?”

“Why don’t you come by the office?” he asked. “We can have catered lunch there and you can catch up with everyone, and meet the two summer interns. They’re actually not too bad.”

Kit had never met them face to face, but he’d talked to both of them on the phone at various points over the last month. Both of them were femmes, Lisa Schaeffer and Paula Yates, and from the way Rick talked about them, they were very good. They were getting no official school credit for working at the magazine over the summer, they’d signed up for the unpaid intern positions just for the experience of working in a magazine that was showing itself to be successful. “That sounds wonderful. And you can meet one of our instructors, he’s the one flying down with us.”

“You’re not flying yourself? What have you been doing son?” he laughed.

“The plane we’re going to fly requires two pilots, so it’ll be me and him. I get to fly it, he’ll be the copilot making sure I really do know what I’m doing.”

“Ah, that makes sense. So, you are learning something up there,” he chuckled.

“Yep. If you’ve been listening to me when I call you every day, you’d know that!”

“Yes, you can fly a bunch of fancy jets now,” Rick chuckled. “And as soon as you get that flight instructor license, you’ll abandon us and open your own flight school,” he accused.

Kit laughed. “No. It might be something I do for fun when I’m fifty, and I might do a little teaching on the side, but it sure as heck won’t be my career. I like the magazine too much. I find it much more challenging and exciting than having eighteen year olds try to kill me on a daily basis.”

Rick laughed. “We want you to get your interviews in with the Cessna folks so we can put it in the next issue.”

“Sure, I can do that,” Kit said as he set the timer on the oven. “I’ll do them on Monday and get the articles in by Tuesday evening.”

“Sounds good. You know something?”

“What?”

“I know I shouldn’t say this, but I miss Sheila,” he chuckled. “The office just hasn’t been as much fun since she left. The two new girls are too serious to be much fun.”

“Has she been keeping in touch?”

“Yeah, she drops by the office about every other day and still comes to the ranch to cook with Martha. She and one of her friends are taking flying lessons, but I think you know that.”

“Yeah, I knew that. She’s been keeping me up to speed on her progress over at AAIA.”

“Where is she at as things go?”

“About a third of the way there. She’s taken her first solo flight already.”

“She didn’t tell me that.”

“She did it yesterday,” he answered. “I’m sure she’ll tell you all about it when she comes over to cook tonight. She has two more months before she graduates, and she’ll have her private license.”

“So, how does it feel seeing Jessie flying around in the plane by herself?”

Kit laughed. “Go watch that crosswind video and understand that I am very comfortable seeing it,” he chuckled.

“Jeffrey’s getting nervous,” he chuckled. “You realize she didn’t leave any scripts past getting back, so she’ll have to put something on his desk like the day you get home.”

“I have no doubt she has like a month’s worth of scripts in her laptop,” Kit noted. “I’ll have her email a couple to Jeffrey so he doesn’t have a snit. How were the figures?”

“I won’t know until Monday, you know that,” he said. “But I’m hopeful.”

“Consistent increase since I got up here, right on schedule,” Kit chuckled. “You looking for that assistant for Jeffrey?”

“Yup, already put out the ads, both for that and for your assistant. I hope to have them hired by the time you get back. Oh, and the first raise goes in next week.”

“That’s good,” Kit said. “It’s about time we paid the gang back for all their hard work.”

“No argument here. I’d pay everyone a hundred grand a year if I could afford it. I certainly don’t do this just for the money.”

“Nobody believes you do,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, I’m gonna crutch on into work, son,” he said.

“On a Saturday? Why?”

“I shook off the rust and did an interview yesterday, so I want to edit it a bit.”

“An interview? You?” Kit teased.

“I used to do it all the time when I was a younger dingo,” Rick told him playfully.

“Who’d you interview?”

“Read Friday’s issue and find out,” he chuckled in reply.

“Oh, it’s on now, you old dingo,” Kit taunted, which made Rick laugh.

Kit logged 23 hours of simulator time from Friday evening to Monday morning on the Citation X, and when not in the simulator, he was getting his required ground training for his flight instructor ratings with Luke, since he needed a certain number of training hours for each rating he intended to get. On Saturday, he was there for nearly 17 hours, and on Sunday he was there 14. And when he was back at the hotel, he spent almost every moment studying. The FOI and written tests for an instructor rating were hard, and he had to be absolutely ready; the instructor rating was the second hardest test to take, only the air transport test was tougher. He arrived in Wichita just before 8:00, and that gave him just enough time to get to the classroom where the FOI exam was being held. Kit sat the exam with the other two furs what had been in the FOI classes, a 50 question test about teaching methods, learning styles, lesson plans, and other very un-aviation type subjects. Kit finished the exam first, and stole a quick hour in the X simulator waiting for the tests to be graded. Amanda had come to Wichita, and she was the one who called over the intercom. “You got a nintey-two, Kit, that’s a comfortable pass!” she called. “You need to finish up and get ready for your instructor written!”

“Yes, mommy!” he answered.

Two seconds later, the simulator went dark and settled to a rest. “Never tease the femme who has the remote control!” she shouted, which made him explode into laughter.

He did review the material over lunch, then he sat the written exam... and felt like a novice. The questions were tough, and they only got harder. Kit was spending over a minute on each question, having to carefully read it and consider it before venturing an answer...and he just flat out guessed on 11 questions out of a 100 question test. Given only a 25% chance of a correct answer, then if he got nothing else wrong, he was looking at a best-possible scenario of 92 and a fraction, going by the statistics.

It took him nearly the entire allotted time to take the test. He went back to two questions he was still pondering when he was given the five minute warning, and then handed it in with two minutes to spare. After the test, he went out to the break room and sat heavily in a chair, almost feeling like someone had just pulled out one of his eyes with a vice grip.

It was a curse and a blessing that they graded them electronically, since Amanda came out with a little piece of paper not five minutes after he sat down.

“Do you want the good news or the bad news?” she asked.

“I’ll take both.”

She smiled. “The bad news is you passed.”

He gave her a surprised look, then laughed earnestly. “Then what’s the good news?”

“You scored an eighty-nine, which is good for this test,” she answered. “The median score on the written is eighty-four.”

“I woulda took a seventy-one,” he said honestly.

“A few of our instructors did just that,” she said with a slight smile. “So, Wednesday, Luke will go through the performance requirements with you, and you’ll do your first check ride on Friday.”

“That’s going to be hell,” he groaned. “Four check rides inside a week. All those oral tests!”

“It’s the best way to do it,” she said. “The others have said it’s best to do them all at once, since many of the same questions are asked at each check ride. They say the only odd test out is the type two.”

“It’s still going to be rough,” he said, waving his paw.

“Alright then. You and Jessie need to be here tomorrow at seven,” she told him. “The plane will be at the big hangar waiting. Luke said you’ll be the PIC and he’ll be the right chair.”

“It’s nice of him to let me do it. By all rights, I should be in the right chair.”

“You earned your rating, you got your hours to upgrade to the left chair. If we didn’t stand behind our ratings, then yes, we’d put you in the right chair. But you earned the left chair, Kit, and if we didn’t believe it, we’d never have rated you for it. And I’m not just making a stump speech, I’ll be on the plane with you. I’m going to go talk to a flight school in Austin about rating one of their instructors for a CJ, so I’ll be hitching a ride with you rather than do a conference call with them. I think they’ll appreciate the personal visit.”

“Thanks, Amanda. I really appreciate the faith in me.”

Jessie was very happy for him passing the tests, so much so that she made him a huge fully decked out Kit Special hamburger, so big he couldn’t eat the whole thing. He was so drained from the effort that he went to bed early, and Jessie joined him, cuddling with him in bed as he listened to her purr, and that lulled him to sleep.

She was also the one to wake him up. She kissed him on the nose in his sleep, which stirred him, then she giggled when he slapped absently at her. “Wha?” he asked sleepily.

“Up, sleepy fox, you have to take me to the doctor,” she told him.

“It’s morning already?” he asked.

“It’s six. I’ll make you some tea, love.”

“Make it strong,” he said as she padded into the other room. He pulled himself up and scrubbed his face, blew out his breath, and then the excitement of flying surged blood through him. Jessie was humming to herself, making eggs and bacon and tea as he went into the other room. “We’re in a good mood today,” he noted as he kissed her.

“I’ve been feeling really good lately,” she answered as she flipped the eggs. “Guess my hormones are kicking in,” she giggled.

“Mmm, then this would be the perfect time,” he purred in her ear, putting his paws on her thickening waist.

“Aat, don’t you start,” she warned playfully. “We have to be at the hangar in forty-five minutes!”

“Spoilsport.”

“You can explain to everyone why we’re late,” she said. “Then you can tell Doctor Mac why we missed our appointment!”

“Ah, no, I’m not that brave,” he said mildly which made Jessie laugh.

“Now go get dressed, you silly fox.”

They managed to eat breakfast and get to the facility on time. David, Luke, and Amanda were already there, and a shiny, new-looking Citation X was standing on the flight line, a fuel truck standing beside it, with its hatch open and waiting. They greeted the Cessna furs, and then Amanda led Jessie up into the jet, who was taking video of it as they went. David and Luke helped conduct a walk-around, and then they too entered the jet.

It was clearly a special configuration. Usually there were supposed to be around eight seats in a X, but this one had only six, six large, deep, luxurious seats, spaced widely apart, and with a lavatory in the back. Each seat had its own folding table and rail-mounted LCD monitor resting against the side of the plane, which could swing out for easy viewing.

“We mocked up the interior of this ten to mimic a CJ four,” Luke explained. “That’s how a four will look inside, but not quite as spacious.”

“They’ll have those monitors?” Kit asked in surprise.

David nodded. “This is the club configuration.”

David sat with the femmes as Kit and Luke took the pilot seats. Kit felt a little thrill when he sat in the pilot’s chair, but he didn’t let his elation cloud his judgment. He had a job to do, and he bent himself to that task with total sobriety, for his pregnant wife was on the jet with him. It took Kit and Luke about fifteen minutes to get their flight plan filed—straight from the cockpit of the X to the FAA—and the preflights done. Kit started the engines once the fuel truck was finished fueling them and well clear, and then they taxied out in the dark pre-dawn, as the sun just started to rise to the east-southeast.

“What’s the weather like along the way?” Amanda called.

Kit turned on the intercom. “Should be clear all the way to Austin with a little daytime heating turbulence if we stay up too long,” he answered. “Austin weather is forecast sunny and eighty-four degrees, which is kinda normal for late May I’ve been told. Forecast up here for today is slight chance of rain and seventy-five degrees.”

Kit got clearance to take off, and then had to suppress a grin as he spooled up the huge Rolls Royce engines to takeoff thrust, released the brakes, and let the powerful machine hurtle down the runway. He lifted her into the air with a gentle touch, aware of the very sensitive controls of the X, then turned as they ascended to their planned cruise altitude of 47,000 feet. At Mach .92, maximum cruise speed, the plane would make the trip in a little over an hour. That was a trip of about 500 miles in a plane that flew at Mach .92, which was about 700 miles an hour. An hour and ten minutes, for a trip that took them nearly four in his 400...granted, because they landed in Oklahoma to refuel and eat.

It was almost like blinking his eyes. By the time they reached cruise altitude and hit top cruise speed, he and Luke were already planning their landing in Austin. They only cruised for about half an hour, and then they started descending. Kit got to see the landscape north of Austin from the front windows of a jet, watching Texas blur by under them, and then they started their approach at Bergstrom.

They landed on the same runway he used for his 400, the 9,000 foot long general aviation runway at Bergstrom at 8:46, an hour and 21 minutes after they taxied away from the hangar in Independence. Kit taxied the X to the Signature Flight Support FBO hangar terminal at the very end of the flight line. Line workers rushed out to chock the wheels after the engines powered down, and then they started post flight, shutting the jet down. “We’re here!” Luke shouted. “I hope you didn’t blink, or you missed it!”

“God is this thing fast!” Kit laughed.

“Now you know why I love flying this jet,” Luke grinned. “If I could afford this, I’d buy it sooo fast, rate my wife, and then we’d always have two pilots and be able to fly anywhere we want to go, and get there fast.”

“That’s not a bad idea,” Kit chuckled, glancing back at Jessie as she stood up. “Now I just need to borrow thirty million dollars.”

“Pft, you can find that laying in the floor in Zimbabwe,” Luke chuckled.

If not for the gang, they'd have had to take a cab to go get their own car. Martha pulled up in Kit's Pathfinder not long after they landed. They gave her a fond hug in turn and then introduced her to the Cessna furs. "Luke's been the poor fellow training me, and David here's had the joy of teaching Jessie."

"What do you do, dear?" Martha asked Amanda.

"I make sure they do it right," she winked. "I'm one of the directors of our flight training program."

"Keep them on a tight leash, dear."

"Oh, she does," Luke laughed. "She loves to choke us with it."

They went about their business then. Luke and David stayed with the X as Amanda went down to AAIA; it seemed that they were the ones looking into buying a used CJ1 for their flight school and would need to rate their instructors on the jet. Martha rode with Kit and Jessie as they took her to the office, then went on to their appointment with Doctor Mac. The doctor gave her a thorough physical, and frowned a bit as she checked Jessie's stomach. "You haven't been exercising," she said critically.

"I've been spending most of my time sitting in a cockpit and studying my tail off," Jessie said with her cheeks ruffling.

"You need to keep active, hon. Find time to exercise, even if it's just a brisk walk around school between classes."

"We well, I promise," she said contritely.

Outside of Jessie gaining a bit more weight than Doctor Mac liked, she was otherwise perfectly healthy, and so was little Laura. After the appointment, they had lunch with the gang, Sheila, and Allison, where Kit and Jessie met Lisa and Paula, and they showed them video Jessie had taken of the X. “You came in that, cousin? Now that’s riding like a Vulpan!” Sheila grinned.

“I flew it,” Kit said with a huge grin.

“You did? Wow, I guess you really are doing something up there, and not just lounging around the pool!” Mike teased.

“We’ve been too busy to sit around the pool more than once,” Jessie laughed. “This week both me and Kit are studying to finish important training. I’m getting my instrument rating, and Kit is taking the tests he needs to become a flight instructor.”

“An instructor? Really?” Sheila asked with a sudden smile. “So, you could maybe give us private lessons?”

“Lessons? Yes. Just signing your logbooks without making absolutely sure you know what you’re doing? Hell no.”

Sheila sighed. “So cruel!” she accused with a smile.

“I told you once before, brat, you earn a license. I won’t sign off on anyone and give them something they didn’t earn.”

“But, you can definitely help us keep going after we graduate from AAIA? It’s rather expensive,” Allison noted. “I didn’t realize just how expensive until I started looking at the training after the pilot’s license.”

“Now there I can help you. I’m sure you’ll find me much cheaper than AAIA.”

“You’ll make me pay?” Sheila gasped in sincere outrage.

“Well, when a Vulpan has certain marketable skills, shouldn’t he get paid for developing them?” he asked, giving his cousin a sly smile.

“Bastard!” Sheila accused, but the lightness in her Vulpan eyes betrayed her serious-sounding voice.

“What’s after you do those tests?” Lilly asked.

“Kit’s going to learn how to fly one more jet. I’m just going to putter around,” Jessie laughed. “They offered to train me to fly a little jet called a Mustang, but I decided not to, because it’s so much work, and I’d like to just rest a while. We’ve been so busy,” she said, and Kit put his paw on her shoulder. “Besides, Doctor Mac told me I’m not getting enough exercise, so I need to focus a little more on this,” she added, patting her expanding belly meaningfully.

“I’ll be type rated for a Mustang, love, I can train you if you ever want it,” he winked.

“Well, that’ll help,” she grinned back.

“Saturday, cousin, me and Ally will be up,” she said. “We’re going in style, too,” she said lightly. “We hired a jet from that place that rents you hangar space, Avia.”

“Sounds good. I’ll love to show you around up there, we’ve had a lot of fun.”

“And worked a lot,” Jessie laughed.

“Well, show it off, honey!” Marty demanded. “Show us your pilot’s license!”

Jessie laughed. “I don’t have the real one yet, just my temporary one,” she said, but she did dig it out of her purse and pass it around so they could see it. “Dave said the FAA is going to hate us,” she laughed. “Every time we earn a new rating, the FAA has to make us another new license. So, right about when I get my first one, the paperwork will hit them telling them they have to make me another one!”

“Luke told the FAA to just hold off on sending my permanent license until after I finish flight school,” Kit chuckled. “So there’s not a series of licenses stacking up for them to send out to me.”

Kit found that Rick was right about Lisa and Paula. Lisa was a short possum and Paula was a lanky cougar, and both of them were too worried about doing a good job to have much fun. They wanted to take the job way more seriously than anyone in the office took it. But despite that, they were both nice and friendly, and seemed to know what they were doing. It made him feel really out of touch, since they’d been here for a month, and Kit had only just met them face to face. He’d barely get to know them before they were gone at the end of July, and new interns took their places in mid-August. “Lisa and Paula have been doing a lot of the research that isn’t important enough to send to you,” Rick explained. “The ability to research is a job requirement for a journalist, so we indoctrinated them into your research system,” he grinned. “They picked it up fairly quickly.”

“Shh, that’s my trade secret, Rick!” Kit protested. “If you bandy that about, I’ll be out of a job!”

“I can’t get rid of you now,” he said morosely. “You’re a partner!”

“Duct tape, chains, the river, do the math,” Barry noted idly as he went by, which made Kit and Rick laugh.

They stayed about an hour, and then, regrettably, it was time to go. Martha again took them to the hangar, where she pulled up and held them a second before getting out. "I hope you don't mind, dear, but I've been using your truck," she admitted.

Kit laughed. "I don't mind at all, Martha," he assured her. "As long as you don't burn out my clutch, you're welcome to it."

"Well, would you mind if we use it this weekend to take some things to our son in El Paso?"

"Be my guest," Kit said immediately. "Is he off weekend forecasting now?"

"He's still doing it, but he's also doing real news pieces and fills in for the weekday meteorologists when they have days off, so he's moving right along," she answered.

"Thanks for being our chauffer, Martha," Jessie said after they got out. She gave Martha a warm hug. "I'll call you tonight and give you the full details of my checkup. It wasn't pretty," she sighed.

"What's wrong?"

"I'm not getting enough exercise, and Doctor Mac chided me for it."

"Well, it can happen dear. You know the problem is there now, so it's easy enough to fix."

Luke, David, and Amanda were all ready to go when they arrived, so Martha stood by the Pathfinder and took video of them all filing back into the jet after they were ready to leave, as furs removed the chocks from the wheels. Kit again settled into the left chair, but this time Jessie was standing behind and between the cockpit seats, taking video of their preparations. Kit and Luke explained what they were doing as they prepped for the flight back to Kansas, and she braced herself when they accelerated to take off; they were not in an airliner, the only rules they had about passengers were the rules they cared to enforce. So Jessie stayed braced against the wall behind the cockpit and taped them taking off. “And there you go, that’s my handsome fox taking off from Bergstrom, and we’re on our way back for our last ten or so days in Kansas.”

“Where Kit becomes our first civilian CJ four pilot,” Luke chuckled.

“And Jessie earns her IFR so she can fly our plane whenever she wants,” Kit said with a glance back to her.

“I am flying us home,” she winked at him.

The only thing that got him through Friday was knowing he’d never go through something like that again...or at least until Monday.

The check ride began at 8:00 on a clear day, and Kit had stayed up most of the night preparing for them. Justin was not his check ride examiner this time, instead he had an actual FAA examiner with him. The examiner was a short, jolly skunk named Gary Akers, who had an earnest smile and joked with Kit a bit. “So, you’re running the whole gauntlet, eh?” he grinned. “I saw your name on the schedule four times, just running up through the ratings!”

“Well, they said I should do them all at once,” Kit said.

“Cessna just loves to do that, they hate a CFI that can’t teach everything,” he winked. “But I have to admit, they do like to run their check rides in a row, and their instructors have yet to fail the check rides. They train them well around here,” he finished with a nod. “Don’t worry too much, though. The oral test is actually harder than the instructor check ride, since you’re just going to show me you can keep control of the plane when a student stalls you or spins you out or some such. So, after you finish the oral, it’s basically a victory lap. The only one that’s really different from that is the type two, that one’s where you have to demonstrate your knowledge and ability to teach IFR in the cockpit. You ready?”

“As I’ll ever be,” he said, a touch nervously.

It wasn’t as bad as the written, but it was close. For his check ride, Kit chosen his own personal plane, so he had no problems answering any question about it. But the examiner’s questions were detailed, assuming the role of a student and expecting Kit to be able to ask any question put to him about the plane, about flying a single engine, and all about the FAA regulations and rules, and also questions from the FOI, questions about teaching techniques and instruction, which challenged him more than any of the others. Kit had been flying long enough to be able to answer most of the aviation questions almost instantly and correctly, but he had to stop and think about the questions about teaching...and the questions kept coming, and kept coming, and kept coming. For three hours, he was tested, and every correct answer staved off the dreaded pink slip. But after those three hours, Gary told him it was time to start the flight. Kit and Gary climbed into his plane, Kit continued to answer questions as they went through preflight, and then they took off. While in the air, Gary had Kit perform every maneuver he was required to teach students, and then had him perform the maneuvers and flying skills he’d need to be able to recover from any predicament into which his student might place them. He had to recover from stalls, recover a spin, and forcibly abort a bad-attempt landing...and he had to do all of it from the right seat. That was where a CFI sat, so that was where he had to demonstrate his flying ability.

Gary kept them in the air for three hours. So, after a six hour check ride, Gary had him land for the last time and taxi back to the hangar. When Kit shut down the engine, Gary offered his paw over the center console. “You did excellently, sir, congratulations. You pass.”

Kit couldn't suppress a whoop of delight and a huge grin. “Thank you very much, Mister Akers!” he said.

“Now, according to the schedule, you're trying your MEI on Monday, then going for your type two on Tuesday and MEII on Wednesday, and I'm giving you those as well. What plane are we doing it on?”

“A Crusader.”

“Bah, I hate those little things,” he grunted. “Oh well. Anyway, you can be assured that the other tests usually aren't quite as hard as this one. This one is what you might call the gatekeeper test. To get your type two and MEI, the tests will certainly ensure you know what you're doing, but they're not quite as severe as this one. After all, you proved you know what you're doing to get this rating.”

“That's a relief,” Kit said earnestly. “That was the hardest test I've ever taken.”

“It's meant to be,” Gary chuckled. “Monday, eight o'clock, right here, then?”

“I'll be here. How ready I'll be is another matter,” Kit chuckled.

Gary wrote up a temporary rating license for him on the spot. "I think I'll hold off submitting it all until you finish your other rating check rides," he grinned.

"That would be a good idea," Luke said as he came up. "We have you set up for MEI on Monday so you have a little extra time with the Crusader, Kit."

"Works for me."

He wanted to celebrate, but he was derailed around 5:00 when Vil called him and told him she was on her way, literally as he shut down the engines of the Mustang and Luke did him the favor of doing postflight as he talked on the phone. "We should be there around eight or nine," she told him. "I started with Kendall, but when the family got wind of the trip, I got stowaways," she laughed. "I'm bringing Suzy, Muffy, and Terry, they wanted to come see you."

"Wow, well, Sheila and Allison are coming up from Austin tomorrow morning."

"Yeah, that's why Terry is coming," Vil chuckled. "He's still trying to woo her."

"That boy needs to take a hint."

"He's quite determined."

"He's in for a heartbreak," Kit sighed.

"I'm not so sure," Vil said. "Terry knows there's something about her that doesn't quite gel. He's a Vulpan, bro, he checked her out, and there are some big holes in her life story. He put two and two together when he saw how much money she has, he knows she's not squeaky clean."

"But it's how she got the dirt under her claws that will turn him off."

"Maybe. Maybe not. Only time and the truth will tell. Woop, there he is now, he just pulled up. Talk to you later, bro."

Kit brought the good news back to Independence only to hear the other good news. Jessie ran out to the Mustang from the back office as he opened the hatch, and she gave him a crushing hug. "I heard you passed, congratulations, handsome fox!" she declared. "I passed too! I got my IFR!"

"That's fantastic, baby!" he said, spinning her in a circle in his arms. "Now you can fly anywhere, anytime!"

"Yup, you can't lord it over me!" she giggled, kissing him on the muzzle.

"I can always lord it over you," he winked.

"Mean fox!" she laughed, hugging him again.

"Vil called, she's coming in tonight. She didn't tell me where she's staying, though. Suzy, Muffy, and Terry are coming with her."

She nodded. "She called me before you. She said she's gonna buy me my own plane," Jessie laughed. "I told her I already have one."

"Did you tell her you're gonna take her flying tomorrow?"

"No, but I think I will now that you've said it," she grinned. "I have to show her what I've learned!"

“I think she’ll love it, at least after she gets over the whole ‘I’m flying with someone who didn’t even have a license a month ago’ deal.”

She gave him a start, then laughed helplessly.

They had a light dinner to celebrate their respective victories. Jessie was watching her food now, still taking her vitamins but cutting back on the junk food they’d both been wolfing down since they came to Kansas, trying to lose the weight that Doctor Mac said was not good for her, then they just waited for Vil right there at the facility. Luke decided to play a little and let Jessie try her paw at the Mustang simulator, just for pure fun, while Kit studied the Cessna 303 Crusader for Monday’s MEI check ride. But the fun was suspended when Vil arrived at the airport on her private jet, and they went out in front of the big hangar to meet them, standing over by the two limos she’d hired to ferry them around.

Vil was wearing her usual dress attire, a skirt and blazer with a white silk blouse, and the diminutive vixen gave Kit a hug when he met her at the base of the steps. “Hey sis,” he said. “How was your flight?”

“Nice and easy,” she smiled. “Well, how is my jet pilot brother?”

He laughed. “Busy. I’m in the middle of my flight instructor check rides, so you’ll have to excuse me if I’m a little distracted this weekend. I have to study for the one I’m taking on Monday.”

“Well, I’m here to see you, not mess things up for you,” she smiled. “But I will demand my time.”

He laughed. “You always do,” he teased.

“I’m not used to being ignored,” she smiled, flicking him on the nose playfully.

“Well, you’re ignoring me!” Jessie complained, which made Vil laugh and give Jessie a warm hug.

“Look at this!” Vil said, putting both her paws on Jessie’s expanding belly.

“I know, your brother has ruined my figure,” she sighed.

Vil laughed. “It’s a good ruining,” she reminded her. “And only temporary.”

“Where’s Ben?” Kit asked as the others came out of the plane.

“He’s at Ohio State doing orientation, he couldn’t make it,” John said as he reached them. “He’s taking a summer class so he can get a head start, and also so he can establish a nice pattern for himself and get some work in with the football coaches before practice officially begins.”

“Oh. Well, good for him.”

It turned into a receiving line as Kit and Jessie greeted Kendall, Suzy, Muffy, Terry, John, and Hannah in turn, and then Kit introduced his family and friends to the three furs who had worked with them at Cessna. “This is Luke, he’s been my primary flight instructor,” Kit introduced. “And this is David, he just finished Jessie’s training so she can fly our plane. And this is Amanda, she’s one of the managers here at the training facility.”

“A Bombardier? Shame on bringing that thing to a Cessna airport,” David laughed, to which Amanda gave him a hot glare. But her hot glare softened when Vil laughed lightly.

“I didn’t order it, but I can’t complain, it’s been a good plane,” Vil smiled in reply. “I’m afraid Cessna doesn’t make anything big enough to suit me, David,” she told him.

“Well, when we introduce the Columbus, maybe we can woo you,” Amanda said with a smile. “It will be the largest business jet we’ve ever built.”

“You’ll have to suitably impress me, since my company ordered my jet here before I was even the CEO. I inherited it from the last CEO. So I’d have to really justify buying another plane so soon after we bought that one,” she winked.

“Well, I can certainly try, Miss Vulpan,” Amanda said with a light smile. “A client like Vulpan Shipyards would be a coup for any aircraft company.”

“We’re not easy to capture, Amanda. We demand the same excellence out of our vendors as our customers demand from us. But, we’re in the market for a small short-distance jet to ferry our execs from the Boston headquarters to our New Hampshire and Norfolk facilities, so we just may talk about that, Amanda.”

“Where are you staying?” Kit asked.

“There wasn’t much here, so I’m staying at the Apple Tree,” she answered. “There aren’t any luxury hotels in this little town, so I went with the best I could find, and I rather liked the pictures of the place. It looked quite nice. It even has an indoor pool.”

“So, are you going to take us flying, Jessie?” Muffy asked as she hugged her.

“I sure am!” she said with a big smile. “It’ll be an all girl flight, I’ll take you up in our plane!”

“Good, that leaves the real plane for us males,” Terry said mildly, which earned him a swat from Muffy.

“Actually, I’ve chartered one of their tens for tomorrow,” Vil announced. “So Kit can fly all of us somewhere and prove I didn’t waste my money,” she winked. “Sheila and one of her friends will be arriving tomorrow morning.”

“That sounds fun,” Terry said. “I just hope it’ll fit all of us.”

“I’m sure it will,” Kit said, kissing Suzy on the cheek in greeting. “They’re actually pretty big jets.”

“We have a ten available with seating for ten. We have seating configurations for up to twelve,” Amanda told them.

“Well then, it sounds like that’s all settled,” Vil said. “Now, unless you want to come with us and help us settle in, bro, how about we just meet up tomorrow morning?”

“Actually, that’s fine with me, sis,” Kit answered. “It’s been a long day for us too.”

Kit and Jessie did chat briefly with them as some furs from Cessna helped the two drivers load their baggage into the limos. Jessie told Suzy and Muffy all about her flight lessons and how she’d been doing with her pregnancy, as Vil, Kit, and Terry discussed recent economic trends and political developments. “Ugh, I’m still heartbroken over Romney,” she sighed. “I don’t know who I’ll support now. Huckabee’s too evangelical, and McCain is just too much a firebrand for me. I like nice predictable politicians I can buy and put in my pocket,” she said with absolute sincerity.

“My guy’s still in it, though he’ll never win,” Kit chuckled.

“Paul?” Terry asked, and Kit nodded. “I know I’m violating the Vulpan tradition, but I actually kinda liked Bill Richardson. Too bad he’s out too.”

“A democrat? Good God, Terry, did I make a mistake promoting you?”

“Muffy’s voting for Clinton.”

Well, she’s in the Party Pack,” Vil said dismissively...and in a way, Kit saw from Vil just how frustrated some of the younger cousins felt in the family. They truly did get no respect at all.

“I liked Richardson’s experience, and he was very moderate for a Democrat. I would have voted for him. Too bad the Clinton machine bulldozed him out of the way.”

“I can root for Clinton as a fellow femme, but I don’t think I’d like a third term of Bill Clinton,” Vil snorted. “God, I yearn for the days when us, the Kennedys, the Rockefellers, and the Fords ran things.”

“Things move forward, Vil,” Terry chuckled. “And we just couldn’t get away with it in the modern age.”

“We get away with it now,” she scoffed. “You think I don’t have the entire northeast wrapped around my little finger, Terry? I didn’t let the strings Dad used to pull get away from me when I took the chair.”

“Ted doesn’t interfere now that Uncle Luke’s passed?”

She shook her head. “He’s too interested in playing in the Senate to bother. They haven’t caused us any problems since the eighties, after they ceded Boston to us and moved to Cape Cod. God, the fights Ted had with Dad, sometimes I’m amazed they didn’t kill each other.”

Kit noticed that David, Luke, and Amanda, who were standing nearby, were listening with stunned expressions as Vilenne Vulpan talked quite casually about controlling politicians and states. Kit forgot just what family he belonged to from time to time.

The three of them kept looking a little fearful as the limos pulled away, and Kit and Jessie looked at them for a moment. Then Kit laughed. “Now that you’ve met my sister, we can go back to normal,” he teased.

“She’s not what I expected at all,” Luke admitted.

The next morning started early and kept going. Kit and Jessie woke up early and drove to Vil’s hotel so they could all have breakfast together, and Sheila and Allison arrived at the hotel about half an hour after they got there. Muffy folded immediately in with Jessie, Sheila and Allison, getting to know her, as Kit, Vil, Kendall, and Suzy sat at the table, and John and Hannah were over at their room, changing clothes. Terry hovered between the two, already looking to find some way to talk to Allison. “Were we ever that young?” Vil asked, a tad wistfully, as they listened to Muffy and Sheila giggle over something Allison said.

“I don’t think you were, Vil,” Suzy laughed. “Even when you were eleven. The first time we met, you stood up straight and tried to shake my paw. ‘Good morning, I am Vilenne Vulpan, it is nice to meet you,’ you said, so stiff and formal and proper. Such a backslide from then,” she winked.

“That was when Dad was sending me to that God-awful diction school,” Vil snorted. “Right before I started at Weston.”

“I won’t even talk about what my old male made me do at that age,” Kendall chuckled.

“You know, Vil’s right,” Suzy said, reaching over and tipping Kendall’s chin up. “That little black spot is cute.”

Kendall laughed. “It’s my beauty mark,” he grinned. “My old male has it too. Vulpans have their eyes, but the Brighton males have the spot. It attracts the femmes, you know.”

“I think if you two marry, Vil will make you shave it out or dye it,” Suzy winked. “There will be no femme fishing once she has you.”

“She’ll have to work for it,” he said with a grin. “I’m easy to catch, but hard to hold.”

“Isn’t he cute, thinking that he has a choice,” Suzy mentioned to Vil.

“If I decide to keep him, he’ll learn,” Vil said calmly.

“If?” he asked challengingly.

“You’re easy to catch but hard to hold. I am easy to hold, but almost impossible to catch,” she said with a light smile.

“I’ve always loved a challenge,” Kendall smiled.

“You’ll find me to be the challenge of your life, Ken,” she said, reaching over and patting him on the muzzle like he was a child.

Their flight in the Citation X was actually very fun. Everyone piled into the jet at 11:00, and with Luke as the copilot, the Vulpans, Kendall, and Allison took off from Independence. Luke gave him a little leeway to have some fun, and allowed him to push the performance of the jet by doing a maximum angle power climb, sinking everyone back into their seats as they climbed as fast as the safety range allowed. He leveled out at the maximum ceiling of the plane, 51,000 feet, flying almost on the roof of the world with the land laid out under them like a green carpet. “So, we’re going a little over seven hundred miles an hour. Where do you want to go, guys?” Kit asked over the intercom.

“Faster!” Sheila shouted.

“This is as fast as she goes, Sheila,” Kit answered. “Want to go overfly the great lakes?”

“Ooo, that sounds cool!” Suzy beamed.

“I’ll call it in so ATC knows what the hell we’re doing. We’ll let them fight with the FAA over our flight plan change,” Luke chuckled.

At 703 miles an hour, it didn’t take them long at all to reach Lake Michigan, just a bit under an hour. Kit and Luke gave them a flight up and over Lake Michigan, with Lake Superior and Lake Huron in the distance as they neared the upper peninsula, then they turned around and headed back to Independence. During the flight, they came up one by one to look at the cockpit, Jessie took a lot of video, and Kit saw Terry and Allison sitting side by side in the back row, talking quietly. Terry was leaning on the arm of his seat towards her, but her body language showed Kit that she was nervous and uncertain.

They landed smoothly about twenty minutes ahead of a coming storm front, and Kit was directed to a hangar to park the plane to get it out of the coming weather. He parked and started shutdown and postflight. “Well, did you like it?” he called.

“That was awesome!” Muffy said excitedly. “I’ve never been in a plane that seemed to go so fast before!”

“You haven’t, silly girl,” Jessie laughed. “This is the fastest there is!”

Terry's reaction was much more telling. "I have got to buy one of these," he said to Vil.

"Amanda said she'd impress me. I'm impressed," Vil laughed. "It's too small for me, though. But I think I'll see if there's one around I can charter from time to time just for the fun of it."

After the flight, they took shelter from the thunderstorm in the facility, where Kit and Jessie showed them around. Vil got to try her paw at flying the Mustang simulator, Sheila intentionally crashed into the tower when she tried, but she actually flew the 400 simulator properly and well. Allison also flew a turn in the 400 simulator, and flew it very well. Cessna brought their bigwigs in from Wichita to meet Vil, and Vil rubbed elbows with them as they talked her into going to a mock-up of a Citation Columbus, but then she talked about what kind of jet would be best to ferry one to four executives from their Boston headquarters to the shipyard facilities they had in both New Hampshire and Norfolk. That made the Cessna execs very excited, and they talked about the Mustang CJ, and Encore models, taking her aside with Terry as they went to go tour a couple of jets they had in the hangar.

Kit would have been suspicious of that, had Vil not mentioned her interest in buying a couple of small short-range jets when she got her new Bombardier, when she was talking about how the other board members would fight over the jet she was passing down. When he heard Vil say "Four million, you say? What kind of operating costs does it have?" Kit had a feeling that Vil might be closing a deal or two before going home. Vil was actually a big fan of brand loyalty. That was why she tended to buy Fords when she bought cars as gifts, because she had always liked the brand, and had had good relations with the Ford family...so she bought their cars. The Cessna furs had treated Kit and Jessie very well, far better than any other student they had taught, and she would reward their devotion to her brother by giving Cessna serious consideration when she started looking for those small jets she was interested in buying. Selling jets to Vulpan Shipyards would be Cessna's contract to lose, not to win.

Kit figured that she'd buy maybe three CJ1s for the shipyard. A CJ1 could carry five or six furs, it easily had the range to reach Norfolk, and it was economical to maintain. And they were nice to fly, though he only flew one in a simulator. He'd had to put six hours on one in the simulator in order for his blanket CJ rating to cover it.

They all went out to dinner after the storm abated, and it was a very nice, relaxing evening given how much he'd been working, and how much more work he had to do. He talked with Hannah and John about their cruise in greater detail, and listened to them go on for half the night about how fantastic it was to be treated like royalty on a cruise ship plying the Caribbean waters. "We came home broke, but we were so happy we didn't care," Hannah admitted with a laugh.

"If you don't regret spending money, then it is always money well spent," Kit nodded. "I still want to know where you took that picture of John paragliding, and how you got him up there."

"He lost a bet," Hannah smiled. "I bet him he couldn't go a full day without skeet shooting. He lost."

Jessie laughed. "Dad, you should have known better!"

"What can I say? I'm weak," he laughed. "It was free! Free skeet shooting, all day! I think I used up all their pigeons."

“Did you enjoy the paraglide?”

“After I got over the initial terror, yes, I did enjoy it,” he nodded.

But, unfortunately, it was just a quick visit. Almost as soon as they finished dinner, Kit and Jessie went with them back to the hotel to pack, and then they returned to the airport. Kit and Jessie kissed their way down the line, at least until he got to Allison. “When I get home, we have to talk,” he told her.

“I think we do,” she said, glancing at Terry. “Talk a long time.”

“It’ll be a good kind of talk,” he told her in a low tone, kissing her on the cheek.

Hannah, of course, did not miss that. “What are you up to, Kit?” she asked in a near whisper.

“My cousin has been chasing Allison. We have to talk about it.”

Hannah gave the beautiful vixen a calm, slightly frosty look. “I see,” she said.

“Paws off, Hannah, let them work it out,” he warned. “That means no long talks with Terry.”

“Kit, I—“

“I mean it, Hannah,” he said in a tone that was not the usual conciliatory tone he used with her. “If you say a word, you will be breaking my promise, and a Vulpan is his word. Do you understand?”

She drew herself up coolly. “I wouldn’t do that.”

“I know exactly just what you would do when you think you have the high ground,” Kit cut her off. “Or do I have to say the three magic words?”

“What?”

“Austin Police Department,” he said calmly.

The wave of rueful chagrin swept over her face, then she sighed and nodded. “Alright, I promise.”

“That’s all I needed to hear,” he said, kissing her fondly on the cheek. “Have a good flight, Hannah. I love you.”

“I love you too, dear,” she said reflexively, patting him on the side of his neck before starting up the steps.

“Well, bro, I’ll see you in Austin on next Monday,” Vil said with an impish smile. “We have a surprise to drop on Rick.”

“We’ll be there, sis,” Kit grinned.

“I don’t want to miss the look on his face,” Jessie giggled.

Kit and Jessie watched the jet taxi away, friends and family waving from the windows, and they waved back. “What’s going on with Allison?” Jessie asked.

“Terry’s not giving up. She wants to talk to me about it.”

“Why?”

“Because I think she doesn’t want him to stop, but she’s afraid of how he’ll react when he finds out the truth.”

“Well, if he can’t see the femme inside, he has no business being with her,” Jessie said immediately. “Because if he can’t, then all he’s interested in is what he sees, not the femme he gets to know. Allison is a wonderful, smart femme, and if all Terry can see is her face, he has no right to find out what's underneath it."

"Well said, pretty kitty. Now if you would only practice what you preach," he teased.

"I do so!"

"Then the next time that you say I'll think you're ugly when you're fat, I'm going to wash your mouth out with soap."

She gave him a surprised look, then laughed helplessly.

It was their last week there. For Jessie, it was a chance to relax, swim, get some exercise, take cookies and other goodies down to the training facility for the workers—which earned her their undying loyalty—and have a little fun.

For Kit, it was like the Marine boot camp's Hell Week.

He had three check rides in three days, and they were brutal. Gary gave all three of them, which made it feel nice and consistent, but he didn't go easy on Kit in the slightest. The Monday exam was the MEI, or the multi-engine exam, and Kit had went into it with only one day of study on the 303 Crusader he was going to fly. He had to work a little to answer the plane questions, but the other questions were indeed many of the same he had from the single engine exam, which Gary was still required to ask despite having asked them just three days prior. He stayed up almost all night preparing for the test, and he was too keyed up on caffeine to be sleepy when they started. He again spent nearly three hours being quizzed, and then they got into the plane. They flew for only ninety minutes, though, where Gary really only checked him on the maneuvers and techniques unique to a multi-engine plane.

Kit passed, but had only enough time for a short nap before beginning his CJ4 training. The classroom part took place that afternoon, as Luke trained him in the differences between the CJ4 and the prior CJ models. Kit went home early, and spent the afternoon and most of the evening preparing for his CFII, or what was also called the type two rating, which was the ability to teach IFR.

Gary had been right about that test. It was very different from the other ratings because it focused on the instruments. The oral was about teaching and the plane like before, but it also discussed methods of teaching instruments, IFR rules, IFR procedures, and approaches. After the oral exam, Kit demonstrated his knowledge of IFR to Gary in his 400, demonstrating the very things Gary had questioned him over in the oral test. The flight took about two hours, as he went through every aspect of IFR to prove to Gary he not only knew the procedures, he could execute and teach them.

Kit passed that as well.

The last rating given by Gary was a relatively new rating, the MEII, or multi engine instrument. It was, by far, the easiest of all the CFI tests, since it was based on everything else. The oral exam only took an hour, and the check ride flight only took about 45 minutes, where Gary focused on the minor differences in IFR for multi rated planes, and those were primarily in jets. Kit performed the check ride in the same Mustang they'd been letting him fly back and forth to Wichita, demonstrating he knew the IFR procedures more common in multi rated planes...which there weren't very many. So, the check ride didn't take long.

When they landed the Mustang, Gary looked at him and smiled. "Why don't you go for your ATP?" he asked.

Kit laughed. "Someday I will, since I turned twenty-three in March and I have the logged hour requirements done, but not anytime soon," he answered with a chuckle. "I've spent six weeks burning out on flying. After this is over, I'm going back to my job and be happy with what I have. But someday, I'll do it. It'd only take me about a week or so to do the ground training, then take the test and check ride."

"I'm sure you'll pass. You're a very good pilot, Mister Vulpan."

"Thanks, I appreciate that."

Thursday, Kit took his simulated check ride on the CJ4, administered by Luke, and passed that as well, but it didn't mean anything. He also earned his type ratings to qualify to instruct on the Mustang, CJ series, the Encore, and the X. But they didn't let him get completely away. After everyone heard that Kit had passed all his CFI exams and was now a certified flight instructor for everything but the ATP, they threw him a little party. Amanda was there, and got video of them putting Kit on a chair and parading him around the facility like some kind of Egyptian pharaoh. There was also a little ceremony. Out on the flight line, Kit and Jessie both were awarded little Cessna wings, keepsakes of their training there. Jessie's wings were silver, marking her as a private pilot, but Kit got silver wings with a wreath and star, marking him as a flight instructor. When he finally got his ATP and rated his CFI license to teach ATP, he'd get gold wings with a wreath and star.

Friday was their last official day at Cessna. Kit and Jessie spent the morning packing up all their things, then having a professional UPS shipper come and take the bed apart, pack it up, and ship it home. They picked up all their other boxes too, leaving them with nothing but a single suitcase and carryon holding their laptops. After they were packed up, they returned the rental cars, then spent the rest of the morning writing his final article while at Cessna, taking video, and saying quite a few goodbyes. Amanda took them on a tour of the Mustang assembly plant on their final day, treated them to lunch, and then, it was time to go back to reality.

At 1:00, on a brilliantly sunny and warm early June day, Kit and Jessie went back to their plane. Luke, Amanda, and David went with them, and quite a few pawshakes and hugs were exchanged. Kit and Jessie gave them their personal cell numbers. “Now don’t be strangers. Call us, we’d love to keep up with you guys!” Jessie said happily.

“We certainly will, Jessie,” David said, giving her a brief hug of farewell.

“When you want that ATP, Kit, call us,” Amanda told him. “We can do a two week course for it if you do enough study beforehand. I checked your record, and you qualify for the ATP now, you just need the ground training and need to study for the test and check ride.”

“I couldn’t afford it,” Kit laughed.

“Pay? Did you ever hear me mention having you pay for it? You’re almost like family here now. If I tried to make you pay, I think the training staff would lynch me,” Amanda smiled. “Hell, Kit, if you ever need a job teaching pilots, you call me. I’d hire you so fast you’d be on the payroll before the ink dried.”

“I’ll keep that in mind if Rick ever fires me,” Kit laughed. “But the boyhood dream has been fulfilled. It’s time for me to climb back into my little rubber band propeller plane and fly home very, very slowly.”

“Excuse me, I’m flying. I didn’t spend five weeks up here working the fur off my tail to sit in the right seat!” Jessie corrected, which made them all laugh.

“But really, thank you all of you,” Kit said honestly, patting Luke on the arm. “You guys gave me six weeks of hell, but you also made me very happy. It’s not every male who can say he got to fulfill his boyhood dream.”

“It was an honor and a pleasure, Kit,” Luke said, abandoning formality and clapping Kit on the back.

“You two were wonderful students, and we’re going to miss you,” David agreed with a nod. “If only all the rich brats were as smart and dedicated as you.”

Kit laughed. “That’s a contradiction in terms, Dave, dedicated rich kid.”

“Nah, you proved it wrong.”

“I’m not rich. My sister is,” Kit winked.

“We get to enjoy the occasional dip into luxury when Vil comes to see us, but then we go back home to our little apartment and return to the real world,” Jessie giggled. “Vil’s great for making us feel special from time to time, like her letting us take this training, but the rest of the time we’re just your average young couple trying to make ends meet.”

“You two will never be average,” Amanda told her with serious eyes.

“Aww, thanks, Amanda, you’re so sweet,” Jessie smiled.

They helped them pack their suitcase in the plane, and then Amanda handed them the large, thick leather satchel she’d been carrying. “It has certificates declaring all your ratings inside,” she explained. “We put them in thin frames so you can hang them on your wall, so you can look at the wall and remember your six weeks with us.”

“Wow, thanks Amanda!” Jessie said with a bright smile.

“We gassed up your plane, and since you were here, we had our mechanics go over it for you,” Luke added. “They noted their inspection in your plane’s logbook.”

“Nice, thanks a bunch, it was about time for me to find someone to do that.”

“There’s a certified Cessna maintenance facility at the airport in Georgetown that’s qualified to work on your plane,” Amanda told him. “I’ll email you the details.”

“Thanks, Amanda.”

“Hey, you may be back in your rubber band plane, but it’s one of ours, and we’re damn proud to build it,” she smiled.

“This plane is why I got my pilot’s license!” Jessie said once again, with a giggle.

They waved as Jessie taxied them away from the facility. Kit felt a little nostalgic about leaving, but was also looking forward to getting back to reality. He’d spent six weeks learning things he’d probably never use again, but at least he was going home a jet pilot, he was going home after doing something he’d always wanted to do. But, more importantly, he was going home with all his CFIs, and that was something tangible, something he could really use. He could teach Sheila and Allison if they wanted, or do freelance instructing on the side, or whatever he wanted to do.

He would take them up on the ATP offer. Maybe in the fall, but definitely after Laura was born. For now, Austin was where they needed to be, and Austin was where they were going to stay.

Jessie took off smoothly and turned the plane south, and they headed back home to return to reality after six weeks of living a dream.

Chapter 28

It was almost...bizarre.

It had been six weeks since they'd set foot in their own home, and coming back to it was almost like coming into a hotel room after a minute. Kit and Jessie both had to stand there a minute and look around, until the home feeling started to sink in. His little Capitol Building on its stand by the wall. The entertainment center unit that had cause their first fight, with the LCD TV sitting atop it and the gaping hole in the shelf under where their DVD player would usually sit. The dining room table beyond the comfy couch and sofa and chair that ringed the coffee table, which had the silver tea set resting on a lace doily in the center of the table. And in the middle of the floor in the area between the living area and dining area were the boxes they'd sent from Kansas, stacked and waiting for them.

Yes...this was home.

Lupe was running up from behind as they stepped in, Kit with the suitcase and Jessie with their attaché and the little leather case that Amanda had given them. The place didn't smell musty or stale, and Lupe had turned on the air conditioner for them after it started getting hot, leaving the apartment at a nice comfortable temperature. "Home again, home again, jiggy-jig," Jessie intoned, which made Kit laugh as he set the suitcase on the chair. "At least Lupe turned on the AC for us."

"I certainly did, babe," Lupe said as he reached the door. "Hey brash, babe, they sent something else too, something like monde huge. I didn't want to try to put it in here cause I didn't know where you wanted it, so I got it stored over in the show unit. Looks like a bed."

"Yeah, it is," Jessie nodded. "We got it while we were there, and it's really nice."

"So, you ditching' your old bed?"

"Well, we need it for the guest bedroom, but we don't have anywhere to put it until the move."

"Well, you can store it over in the show unit till the move."

"Sounds good," Kit nodded.

"Now you earn all that food we let you have, Lupe," Jessie told him. "You can help us move the bed out."

"I knew there was a catch," he grinned.

"There always is," she said gravely, which made him laugh.

"Well played, pretty kitty," Kit said with a playful nudge as Lupe went to go unlock the show unit.

"You go ahead and work on the bed, handsome fox, I'll start putting the apartment back together."

"Sounds like a plan."

It took them about three hours to get everything finally all back where it was supposed to be. Lupe called in Dan, and the three of them brought the Sleep Number bed over, figured out how to put the Sleep Number bed up with the old bed frame which matched the bedroom suit, and moved the old mattresses over to the show unit. There, they put the mattresses in the show unit's spare bedroom, which was empty. "I guess I'll need to buy a new frame for the mattresses," Kit mused. "We're going to put this bed in the spare bedroom in the new apartment."

"Why'd you buy the bed? The one in the hotel not work for yaw?" Dan asked.

"I never found out. My sis bought the bed for me and had the hotel set it up in our room before we ever got there," he chuckled.

"Dude, where can I get a sister like yours?"

"That's a double-edged sword, Dan," Kit smiled. "You get the toys, but you have to come with the cunning manipulator that tries to control your life that comes with it. Every one of Val's gifts has a hook in it."

"You seem to be hook less, dude," Dan grinned.

"I know where they are and I can steal the bait without getting snared," Kit answered. "But just remember one thing, Dan. If Val ever gives you a gift, remember that it is not free. She finds ways of getting something back for everything she gives."

"I'll keep that in mind," he nodded.

After the beds were all done, Kit helped Jessie put their apartment back together. She was almost done when he arrived, but she left him the task of putting their entertainment system back together. While he was doing that, Jessie called around to tell everyone that they were back home and they were safe. "It was a boring ride home," Jessie laughed as she talked to her mother. "I got to fly us home, but there's not much to it when you get up in the air. You just set the autopilot and read a book until it's time to do something." She snapped her fingers and pointed to the attaché, and Kit passed it to her. “Yeah, they gave me a little pair of wings and a certificate. Want me to scan it and email you a copy so you can see it? Oh, it’ll be easy, Mom, really,” she assured her. “I think we’ll hang our certificates up over our little model of the Capitol,” she mused, looking over at that side of the living room, where they had a painting of a flower and vase where her eyes were obviously visualizing their 13 certificates, one for each of their ratings and accomplishments. Jessie’s private, multi, IFR, and check ride certification in their 400 would be up there among Kit’s four jet ratings, four CFI ratings, and his Cessna 400 check ride certification.

Kit saw that coming, so he just got up and took down the painting, which made Jessie giggle. “I haven’t put the desktop back together yet,” he warned.

“Oh? Darn,” she fretted. “I’ll have to scan it later, Mom, we have to put our desktop back together and it runs the scanner.”

“Just stall her for ten minutes, I’ll get it back up,” he winked. “Think you can make her prattle on for ten minutes?”

“Kit, Mom says she heard that,” Jessie said with a grin.

“Well, then, I’ll just have to keep my eye out for another beating by proxy,” he said roguishly as he sauntered past Jessie. She swatted him on the backside as he went by. “That was from Mom!”

“Tell her that if she doesn’t stop touching my butt, I’m going to draw some very wrong conclusions.”

Jessie gasped, then laughed helplessly.

Kit got the desktop out of the box and put it back together, then tested it out while Jessie talked with Hannah about her next doctor’s appointment.

“I’m trying to lose the weight Doctor Mac said was bad for me,” she explained. “It doesn’t help much, though. I can’t look down and see just my chest, I see this bulge that’s threatening to hide my toes from me.” She laughed after her mother must have replied. “I know, but I can’t help it. I’ve never been like this before, it’s creepy. I know I haven’t been pregnant before, I mean I’ve never been pudgy before.”

“I can believe that,” Kit chuckled. “Scanner’s working, love, have at it.”

“Thanks my handsome fox,” she said, giving him a kiss on the muzzle. “Alright Mom, I’ll have it scanned in and on the way to you in just a minute.”

Kit touched base with work as Jessie did that, calling Rick. “We’re home, boss,” Kit said. “You get that last article?”

“Yup, I’m editing it now,” he answered. “Did you get video of your last day?”

“There was too much to send over the net, I’m going to bring it in tomorrow morning,” he answered. “I’ll be back at work tomorrow.”

“Nah, take Saturday off, son,” Rick told him. “Just come in on Tuesday like normal.”

“I’m an owner now, Rick, I don’t take that much time,” Kit chuckled. “I’ll go ahead and take tomorrow off so I can rest, but I’ll be in on Monday morning for our daily meeting.”

“I can’t make you stay away,” Rick laughed. “How was the flight home?”

“Smooth,” he answered. “Jessie worked very hard to be able to fly us home, and she did and did it perfectly. I got to sit in the right seat and just read and rest. After six solid weeks of hardcore flight training, I was very happy to just ride along without having to do anything.”

Rick laughed. “So now instead of fighting over who’s driving, you’ll fight over who’s flying.”

“I think I’m more or less going to be permanently stuck in the right seat,” Kit chuckled. “I’ll insist on Jessie flying anyway, because she needs to log hours to start working for her commercial license. I’ve basically written my plane off,” he said with a sigh. “She’s going to wrest it away from me slowly and inexorably.”

“I’m sure she’ll let you borrow it from time to time,” Rick laughed. “So, what’s next for our resident pilot?”

“Get ready for our daughter,” he answered. “Flight wise, I have two more things to work for, my air transport license and my air transport instructor rating. The air transport is what we call the ATP, and it’s the big daddy, the highest license there is. I’ll get mine, but not till after our little Laura is born and settled in.”

“It sounds like you’ve got your usual plan.”

“I plan everything, Rick, even the surprises. Now, how badly has the magazine deteriorated since I left?”

Rick laughed. “We’re swinging from the lights and using hammers to type out our articles.”

“Sounds normal, then.”

They again had to go to the store to replenish their food, and spent nearly two hundred dollars. Lupe had indeed stripped the kitchen of just about everything edible, even digging into their canned soups and other things that wouldn't have spoiled while they were gone. But they were expecting it; Lupe couldn't cook to save his life, so he relied on prepared food and whatever he could sweet-talk out of Jessie. Jessie had even cooked everything they had left over she could and loaded the fridge with it so he'd have plenty of food to steal. They had to restock almost from the ground up, but they wiped out and got some takeout Chinese rather than cook.

It was a warm, muggy evening after they finished fully settling in, and they spent it surveying the amazing progress the contractors had made on the new Westwood while they'd been in Kansas. The line of duplexes that contained theirs and Lupe's new apartments was now fully built both inside and outside, and only needed to have the carpet installed to finish them. The second line of duplexes were up but hadn't had their interiors completely finished yet, and the third line of them on the far side looked only about three quarters finished on the outside. They were up, but needed to have their siding installed to look complete. Hay was spread around the ground at the first line, and Kit saw that the drawings Lupe had shown them had been faithfully followed. Lupe would live in the end unit, and Kit and Jessie's apartment was right next door, with a small break to the next duplex unit, putting two luxury apartments in each unit. They had an actual yard, and then there was the parking lot holding their assigned spaces. Across the lot was the community center and the pool, and it was set up so the gate in the fence faced their apartments, giving them the fastest access to the center. The center too was already built, but they were still finishing it inside, and were indeed ferrying in paneling and carpet as Kit and Jessie watched. Despite it being nearly 8:00, they were still hard at work, and would be all night. The contractors had been working 24/7 since they started, and they used the night hours to do inside finishing work, so heavy machinery didn't wake up the residents on the other end of the block or the houses across the street. Beyond the luxury units that would be in the center of the new complex, the apartment buildings had also literally sprouted since they left six weeks ago. They were building all of the new buildings at once that they could, leaving only the far side of the block with the old Westwood untouched, so there was construction both to the side and behind the center of the complex. There were going to be thirteen buildings total ringing the center, four to each side, and five in the middle, so the contractors had been working on 8 of the 13, unable to work on the furthest one in the back because it was partially on land already covered by the old complex. The left and back buildings had been built while they were in Kansas, since they'd been nothing but foundations when they left. Four of them had been completely built and looked finished, four were constructed but waiting to have their exteriors finished, and it looked like they'd have this first stage of the construction done probably in the next three weeks. After that, Lupe would have residents of the old Westwood move into the new Westwood building by building in a set schedule, and was everyone eager for it. When they got moved and the contractors moved out to begin knocking down the rest of the block, the pool and community center would be open and available to the residents. They were still closed right now because the contractors didn't want the residents milling around an active construction site.

Lupe had promised them they'd be in their new apartment before Laura was born, and he had kept his promise. From the look of it, they'd be moving into their new apartment in late June or early July, more than enough time to be fully settled in and ready for the baby. They'd have time to set up the nursery and get their house completely baby-proofed and ready.

It would be a very, very nice apartment. It was a townhouse style apartment with two floors and a covered carport on each side of the building big enough for two cars, then with a narrow strip of grass separating them from the next duplex over. The first floor was dominated by a huge living area, taking up almost half the first floor, with the back half split between a den or bedroom, dining room and a huge kitchen that would make Jessie ecstatic. Upstairs there were four bedrooms, two smaller ones—but still very nicely spacious—a slightly larger one, and a large master bedroom that took up about half the upstairs that had a private bath with a luxuriant hot tub and a shower. They had already decided to keep the baby with them in the master bedroom for about the first six months, then move her into her own room that would start as her nursery, then slowly change over time to be her bedroom. There were two other bathrooms besides the master bedroom's bath, a full bath on the second floor and a half bathroom on the first floor, between the living room and dining room. There would be a sliding glass door in both the dining room and kitchen that led out to a deck, with an open grassy area separated from the rest of the complex by a privacy fence that ringed the inner compound and kept furs who lived out in the rest of the complex from cutting between the duplexes to get to the community center, forcing them onto sidewalks between the main lines of duplexes, at the corners. That would keep furs out of their back yard. The back yard was shared by everyone along the line, each townhouse with its own deck, but Kit and Lupe's duplex had a brick patio built behind it that shared a barbecue pit and had a few outdoor tables. The design of the driveway that ringed the community center was rather ingenious; it was gated on both sides, preventing furs from parking in the residential area, opened by a garage-door style clicker and also buzz able from each townhouse, where a resident could open the gate for a visitor. Each duplex had two visitor parking spots per duplex in front of them, and there was a small yet functional parking lot in front of the community center both for visitors and for tenants. The gate only kept out cars, leaving the sidewalks open, which was how it was ingenious. It would allow a prospective tenant to park at the community center and visit Lupe in his new office in the community center building, or walk in and visit someone in the inner ring.

“And to think, Lupe said that all sixteen luxury apartments are taken,” Kit chuckled as they looked at the front of what would be their new apartment. “Doesn’t look much like an apartment, does it?”

“I’ll feel like I’m back home,” Jessie said with a short giggle. “We’ll have stairs.”

“I’ll get used to it,” he said. “I wonder when he’ll let us start moving.”

“I’m not sure. Are we going to do it ourselves?”

“I’m not sure,” he answered. “It wouldn’t cost much to hire movers to do it for us, since they’re moving us like half a block. But, since it is so short, I guess we could do it ourselves. Hell, we could walk most of the furniture down here.”

“Hmm,” Jessie said, tapping her muzzle in thought. “Maybe not walk it, but maybe carts.”

“Carts?”

“Yeah, like they have at Home Depot, those flat carts. Some of them are big enough, handsome fox, we could probably put our washer and dryer on it. We buy some carts, use them to ferry our stuff down here, then we sell them to Lupe when we're done so he can keep them in the community center for whenever he needs stuff moved. We can do it over a few days, so there wouldn't really be a big rush. We move our bed and bedroom stuff over first, then we do a room a day until we're moved."

"We're going to need new furniture," he noted. "And remember, we have to pay him the difference between what he was going to buy for our apartment and the cost of the fridge and stove you wanted."

Jessie giggled. "Money well spent," she said. "Those appliances he wanted to put in our apartment are too small! And he'll find that out when he moves in and his tenants complain. A family of four couldn't possibly keep all the food they need in that fridge he wanted to install!"

"Yah," Kit chuckled in agreement. "I'm just not sure why you wanted a six burner stove."

"I like to cook," she said simply. "And that restaurant-style stove will let me cook better."

"Lupe looked like he was going to strangle you when he found out the contractors would have to cut almost a foot out of the counter to fit it in."

"He offered to let me pick my appliances, he should thought ahead," Jessie winked. "I'm just going to love that island in the kitchen! It's going to make cooking solo much easier, I'll have more counter space than I'll know what to do with!"

"I love that little bread oven you wanted in the island," Kit said.

"It fit perfectly, and it only cost me one cabinet," she smiled. "Those small ovens are very useful, handsome fox. I'll use it for more than just bread. It's just big enough to fit a cake, so I can bake in the little oven and fix big things like turkey in the range oven."

"Really big things," Kit noted. "I think I could crawl into that oven."

"Well, when you have the potential to be feeding like fifteen furs, you want a big oven," she grinned at him.

They wandered back home eventually, and Kit spent much of the night organizing all their videos and creating a nice timeline of them to take to work tomorrow. Jessie hung up all their certificates in a circular pattern over their Capitol model, putting her own IFR certificate and Kit's MEI certificate, their greatest individual achievements, in the center with all the others surrounding them, and with the wings Cessna gave them pinned to a silk band that was nailed up between those two center certificates. Kit rather liked the way she'd arranged it, and took a picture of it to post online. To his surprise, Luke called him while he was just finishing up. "Luke! Wow, it's a surprise to hear from you so quick! Couldn't resist razzing me one more time, eh?" he asked.

Luke laughed. "Amanda wanted to schedule you for your ATP training, and asked me to call you. Of course, she really just wants to make sure you got home okay, and so did I for that matter."

"Well, I'm not planning on doing ATP until after Laura's born, so like November," he said. "If then."

"Well then, I'll just tell Amanda to put you on the schedule for sometime in early November," he answered. "I've already sent you the ATP materials we use, so you can study them at your leisure. And hell, you'll have like five months to do it," he added.

“Wow, thanks Luke.”

“I’ve also added the manuals, books, and software we use for our commercial program for Jessie. I’ve also added some DVDs of some training films we use, and you might find useful for your own students. And we know you can do her training, but when she does her check rides, bring her here. We’ll do it for you for free, and we’d love to see you again.”

“I doubt she’ll do that until after the baby’s born either, but I’ll let her know.”

“We do demand constant picture updates,” Luke told him. “And we may sneak a jet down to come see you from time to time,” he chuckled. “Have to do those maintenance flights, you know.”

Kit laughed. “Just say the word, and Jessie will cook up a dinner to make your knees weak.”

“God, did she seduce like half the facility with her pastries,” he laughed. “That last week was just heaven, cookies and cakes and cupcakes and pies everywhere. I think I gained five pounds.”

“You should try her pineapple upside-down cake, it’s awesome.”

“Oh hush,” he laughed again. “Anyway, I’ll let everyone know you’re home safe, and expect a box from us in the next few days.”

“I’ll keep an eye out for it,” he promised.

Jessie was in the kitchen when he came out of the den, and had her paws in a mixing bowl. “Luke just called,” he said. “They wanted to make sure we got home, and they’re sending us some books so we can keep studying. You have a commercial to work for, and I have my ATP left to get.”

“But the baby—“

“It’s just for us to have as reference,” Kit told her. “He said so we have five months to study before we decide to continue our flying careers.”

“Career,” she giggled.

“And he said the Cessna furs are in despair now that you’ve left,” he laughed. “No more cookies and cupcakes on the table when they came in!”

“What do you think I’m doing now?” she winked. “I’m making up some toll house cookies and I’m going to mail them to them. And I’m sending another batch of cherry scones up to Clancy.”

“He looks forward to your scones,” Kit said. “He said yours are better than the kitchen’s.”

“I make mine with love,” she said primly.

“That or you make them with drugs,” he noted dryly.

“Kit!” she warned, then laughed helplessly. “Are you going in tomorrow?”

He nodded. “To make sure they didn’t strip my office bare of anything even remotely usable if nothing else. Besides, we took so much video and so many pictures the last few days, it would take like ten hours to upload it all. Did you get your scripts done for Jeffrey?”

She nodded. “I just have to get them to him. I can go with you and drop them off in his office.”

“How many did you do?”

“Fifteen,” she answered. “He should still have six scripts to go, unless Rick’s been doubling up.”

“I doubt he’d do that with you in Kansas,” Kit noted, scratching his cheek. “So, want to do something tonight?”

She gave him a look and laughed. “I am doing something!” she proclaimed. “Go research something if you’re bored.”

“I’d rather stay in here and rub your tummy till Laura kicks my paws away,” he teased, coming up behind her and pushing his paws up under her shirt, putting them on her expanding belly.

“Don’t start something you’re afraid to finish, love,” she warned in a calm voice, almost sounding like Hannah for a moment as she put the beating tines in her paw mixer and plugged it up.

“Oh, I’m not afraid of this,” Kit said in her ear, patting her tummy.

“It’s what that’s attached to you’d better fear,” she giggled, reaching down and grabbing his paw, letting him feel the tips of her claws through his fur and skin.

“Then I’d better placate the beast,” he said huskily, sliding his fingers through her soft, sleek fur.

“You’ll let me finish these cookies,” she said tartly. “Then you’d better find some way of making me happy.”

“Bring it on, baby,” he teased playfully.

“You’d better bring some basting,” she said impishly, swatting him on the leg with her tail.

He felt a little weird going in on Saturday, almost like it was his first day again. The office seemed familiar yet oddly new, but he was welcomed home warmly by Barry, Lilly, and Marty, who were all in to do some work. He sat behind his desk and found everything right as he left it, his computer on but his monitor off, and a little card on his planner welcoming him home. He brought up his laptop and started downloading the videos they took, then sent his last article to Rick's desktop for him to look over. Rick was off today, but he'd probably pull it off his desktop from his laptop at home and do it from there.

He visited with the others, getting to hear what had happened while he was gone, and hearing in some surprise that his series of piloting articles had been resold to Plane & Pilot magazine, and that national publication was going to run his entire series of articles, and even offer the videos they'd taken at their website; Rick had even sold the videos to them. Kit was surprised that a national magazine had picked up his articles, and that made him almost beam in pride, but no less pride than he had felt when a national newspaper had picked up their election special articles. They had even been printed in Newsweek, but that was Barry's article with the Governor, not Kit's.

He piddled around a bit, just getting back into the swing of being home, when someone opened his door and stepped in. He glanced up and saw Allison there, and almost stood up. "Hey Ally, come in," he offered.

"Kit, can we go somewhere?" she asked. "I need to talk to you."

"Sure, we can go see what Jessie's making for dinner," he offered.

"Can we go somewhere else?" she asked, a bit nervous. "I don't think..." she trailed off.

“Certainly.”

They ended up walking around on the campus of U.T. for a while, in relative silence. It was clear that Allison desperately wanted to breach a subject, but seemed terrified to do it. He didn't have to think very long to wonder what it was she wanted to talk about. He walked her over to John's Pizza, and they sat down and shared a small veggie special. “Kit, I—I don't know how to say this.”

“I think we've been friends long enough for you just to say it, Ally.”

She gave him a grateful look. “Your cousin, Kit. He just won't give up.”

“And you don't want him to give up anymore, do you?”

She looked away, her cheeks ruffling. “I don't know what to do, Kit!” she said, almost desperately. “I really like him, but, but it's me. How is he going to react? And God, what will your family say? I think they're still reeling from you marrying Jessie, but right after, he starts dating me,” she said, then she sighed somberly. “I just don't know what to do.”

“Tell him the truth.”

“I can't,” she said, giving him a powerful look. “I've tried so many times. I can't tell you how many emails I've typed up, but I was never brave enough to send them. I thought I was a strong vixen who could face anything, but I,” she said, looking away. “I can't face him. I can't face this. I never thought I'd ever care, and that it wouldn't matter. But I was wrong. Wrong!”

“First thing, Ally, is that this isn't a lost cause,” he assured her, reaching over and taking her paws in his own. “You don't know my cousin, but I can tell you that he's very different from the rest of my family. I honestly don't know how he'll handle it, but that's a good thing. Because I know exactly how the rest of the family will."

"But I'll get him in so much trouble!"

"Terry's the son of Uncle Tom," Kit said dismissively. "All his kids are a little strange. They'll just consider it one of his eccentricities. It's not him you have to worry about, Ally. It's you. If you are serious about this, you will be opening up a hornet's nest. You have to understand that. The Vulpine don't fight fair, Allison. They cheat. They'll do almost anything to get their way. Don't let me and Sheila fool you about the true nature of my family. And if you do this, then you have to be ready for it. You'd better expect it. And you had better expect to be ousted. They'll do it in a heartbeat."

"You told them?"

He shook his head. "I don't have to. It won't take them long to dig up the truth, Ally. You have no idea what kind of resources they have. My sister's bodyguards could put your entire life history on her desk four hours after she asked for it. So be ready for it, Allison. They will find it." She looked very frightened, so he squeezed her paws gently. "But also understand that you won't be alone. Sheila will fight for you, and so will I. And unlike Sheila, I have a fast track right to the most powerful Vulcan of them all. One call to my sister can step on a lot of necks."

"But won't she object?"

"Maybe," he said honestly. "But Val has a much different concept of the family than my aunts and uncles. She dismisses the actions of the younger, just like our parents, but she also is much more tolerant of them going their own way. She doesn't see the Vulcan pride and the Vulcan traditions as necessarily a good thing. I think as long as you don't flaunt yourself, you behave and show true contrition and don't embarrass the family, she'll accept you, as long as you stay out of sight. She'll get angry if there's tabloids all over the place."

"But you said they'd do that to me."

"Yes, and that will make her angry," Kit told her. "She does not tolerate any kind of inter-family spats that degrade the family name, but where she's different is she'll defend you just as strongly as she defends Jessie if you and Terry get serious. Val is the key, Ally. If you can win her support, the family will knuckle under. And you win that support by being discreet and submissive to Val's demands. She is the ruler of this family, Ally. If you obey her, she'll get along with you as right as rain. You just never, ever, ever want to cross her. Odds are, if she agrees to this, she'll set down rules that you and Terry had better follow about being quiet and discreet. As long as you follow those rules, she will be on your side."

"I...Kit. Will you do me a favor?"

"Anything."

"I just can't face him, Kit. If I looked into his eyes and saw him reject me," she said, looking down. "I can't do it."

"I will tell him, Ally. I'll be honest with him, and make it clear to him you're coming clean because you are interested in him."

She gave him the most profoundly grateful look he'd ever seen in his life.

“Don’t you worry a bit. You just go home and try to relax. I’ll call Sheila and have her come over and keep you company. I’ll call Terry and tell him I want him at my front door as soon as he can get here. I guarantee you, he’ll be on a plane to Austin within the hour.”

“He’s coming here?”

“It’s best if this is done face to face,” he told her simply. “This is not something you discuss over the phone.”

“I—alright, Kit. I trusted you once before and have never regretted it. I’ll trust you now.”

“Just keep calm, hon. You have at least two Vulpine on your side, and that’s a lot of weight. So go home, try to keep calm, and let me take care of it.”

“I’ll owe you so much,” she sniffled a little.

“You can pay me back by wearing baggy clothes for the next three months and complain to Jessie that you’re starting to gain weight. You’ll make her utterly thrilled.”

Allison gave him a startled look, then laughed helplessly. “I take it I can go on an amazing crash diet after your baby is born?”

“Isn’t it just amazing how these things work out?” he asked in a deadpan voice.

Kit was a fox of his word. As soon as Allison gave him a kiss on the cheek and left to go home, Kit called Sheila first. “Cousin,” he called. “What are you doing?”

“I’m trying to figure out how to make this soufflé not deflate like a punctured tire,” she said in an annoyed voice.

“Pack it up for now, and go to Ally’s house. She’s going to need a paw to hold for a bit.”

“She’s moving forward?”

“Yeah.”

“About damn time. Lemme guess, she wussed out and you’re doing the icebreaking?”

“Right again,” he affirmed.

“That pansy,” she complained. “Alright, lemme go over and do my girl thing, cousin. Have you called Terry?”

“I’m going to right now. I’ll make him come down, this needs to be done face to face.”

“Good plan.”

Kit had to dig Terry’s personal cell number out of his Blackberry, and called as he walked back to his truck. “Hello?” he answered.

“Terry.”

“Kit! How are you?”

“I’m fine. Where are you now?”

“That’s an odd question,” he answered. “I’m being driven home.”

“So, you’re in your car?”

“No, my car got sideswiped when I stopped at a Speedway for gas, so it’s in the shop. I’m using a car from the office, and it came with a driver,” he said, a bit disapprovingly. But that was Terry, he preferred to do for himself. “I’ll just drive my truck till they get my BMW fixed.”

“Actually, this works out. Pack an overnight bag and go to Logan.”

“Where am I going, and why?”

“You’re coming to Austin. And the why of it, well, I can’t really tell you over the phone. So consider it a special favor you can do for me.”

“I’ll be there as soon as I can.”

“Call when you have specifics, I’ll come pick you up.”

“You got it.”

“Thanks, Terry.”

“No problem.”

Kit called Val immediately afterward and warned her. “I’m borrowing Terry this weekend, Val, he might not make it into work on Monday.”

“Huh? Why?”

“It’s a personal matter between me and him,” he said directly.

She was quiet a moment. “This has something to do about her, doesn’t it?” she asked in a cool, assessing tone, a tone he did not miss.

“Yes, it does,” he said. He knew better to lie to Val when she asked him a direct question in that voice. “She’s going to tell him the truth, and let him decide where he wants to go with it.”

“Alright,” she said, “but I’ll tell you right now, bro, I do not like this. This could turn into an unmitigated disaster.”

“You gave me a chance, sis, and things turned out alright.”

“You’re my brother. Terry’s just a member of the family. I don’t owe him any particular loyalty or leeway.”

“Val, that’s not very nice.”

“I’m not really a very nice Vulcan, bro,” she said honestly. “I rule this family, brother, but I don’t particularly like them all that much. However, I do have a responsibility to the name. Allison could be an absolute scandal to the family.”

“That’s why I’ve already warned her that her only chance of making this happen, even if Terry can stomach it, is that she’d better be as quiet as a mouse and obey you utterly,” he told her.

“Well, you see to the heart of the matter at least,” she grunted.

“I know you well enough, sis. You won’t care too much about what Terry does as long as he doesn’t sully the family name. You’re not a megalomaniac overlord like our bastard father was. If they can keep it low-key, then you’d probably relent. Besides, I get the feeling you like Allison.”

“Liking her doesn’t factor into this,” she said succinctly. “But, you’re right. If I’m satisfied they’re going to keep this as quiet as possible, then I’d be inclined to give over and let it see where it goes. But if even one word of this gets out, I’ll have to put a foot down, Kit.”

“Fair enough, as long as the ones leaking it aren’t from the family trying to get rid of her.”

“They’d better not,” Val growled.

Kit told Jessie what was going on when he got home, and she was a little surprised. “So you’re going to tell him? Here?”

Kit nodded. “I thought Ally was going to faint when she was talking about it. She’s utterly terrified of the idea of telling him. So I’m going to do it.”

“I, I think that’s something you’re best doing alone, handsome fox. Poor Ally,” she sighed. “I’ll go over to her house. She probably needs some support right now, she must be frantic.”

“Sheila’s on the way over now.”

“Well, girls like lots of company when they’re upset,” Jessie said, rubbing her paws together. “You’re on your own tonight, love. I’ll pack an overnight and settle in. Ally’s house is actually really nice, and she has a spare bedroom.”

“I’ve never been there,” Kit told her. “We both consider that to be an out of bounds location for me, since you’re jealous of her.”

Jessie gave him a sharp look, then it softened to a loving smile. “I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulcan.”

“And I love you, Jessica Desdemona Vulcan,” he said as he gave her a gentle kiss.

Kit had a while to wait, so he spent his time catching up on his very rusty guitar practice. He really had no idea how this was going to go. Terry was determined about Allison, but he had no idea what he was getting into. Allison was a wonderful femme, intelligent, charming, and witty, but her dark secret might be too much for most males, and certainly one of Terry's stature and status. There was just no way of telling how he'd deal with what he would learn about the femme he wanted to court.

Kit pondered it as he waited for Terry to call him back, even going so far as to write a vague journal entry that he called Secrets, about how holding onto a secret like the one he had held had affected him, and how much responsibility came with it. "The Vulpine are a family with a lot of secrets," he mused. "I have no doubt some gossip reporter would sell his or her tail just for a chance to sneak into Stonebrook and spend one day overhearing what goes on behind the walls of the Vulcan family compound. But I can let you in on a little secret...they have the same problems your families do. They have their rebellious teens, they have their struggle to maintain a standard of living they have come to expect, no doubt much different from most furs, but still a major force behind the actions of the family. And then there is the prestige. That is the greatest secret of the Vulpine, I reckon, the need to be respected and revered. Even I suffer from my own bout of it, for I have a need to be taken seriously as a journalist, a desire to help make my magazine great. It doesn't seem like much of a secret until you think about what the family has sacrificed to gain that towering respect.

"Secrets," Kit wrote, "can be the power or the downfall of a family like mine. Secrets must be kept to maintain our status and our position in the social circles of the New England blue-blood aristocracy, where our family rules supreme. But secrets keep the family mysterious, enigmatic, dangerous qualities for any enemy that might seek to bring the family down.

“I suppose the greatest secret the family was never able to keep was me,” he mused at his computer. “When I walked out on the family and then was summarily disowned by my father, they tried to make me disappear. I won’t go into the specifics of all that, because even today it’s a very painful subject. But I was definitely a secret. I was kept hushed up by my family, and any attempt by any journalist to find me was crushed. Reporters lost jobs because of it. Two tabloid newspapers that would not back down were bought out and shut down because of it, which sent a chilling message through the world of journalism; seek to uncover the Vulcan family’s secrets at your own peril, for the entire power of the Vulcan family will destroy you.

“Even today, my family is a keeper of dark, terrible secrets. Some of them I understand why they keep. Some of them, I think are ridiculous, but what’s even more ridiculous is that I keep those secrets as well, because it is the position of the family, and I will not dishonor or shame my family unless it comes down to a choice between keeping my word and keeping my family’s honor. But, my word also binds me to my family honor, so I guess that’s not much of a difference. I pledged my silence when I left the family, and I have kept my word.

“That’s the greatest secret, I suppose, and one that has just been exposed. I guess no matter how much I want to be apart from my family, away from them, distanced from them and considered free of them, I will always be one of them. I will keep the secrets of the family, and I will obey our matriarch, which is my sister. Certainly, I will fight savagely with most of them because they are purists and object to my wife, but after all is said and done, I can’t deny that their eyes are my eyes, and that is a tie that I simply cannot break.

“I will always be a Vulcan. I won’t be one of their kind of Vulcan, but I will still be a Vulcan.”

He saved it and picked up the phone when it rang. “Hello.”

“Kit, I’m about an hour out,” Terry said. “I borrowed Val’s jet, so meet me wherever it usually lands.”

“Alright. I’ll be there.”

“Care to tell me what’s going on?”

“When you get here, sure.”

Kit had enough time to raid the fridge for a late lunch, and then he drove out to Bergstrom. He got there about fifteen minutes before Terry arrived, and read a paper, leaning against his Pathfinder on the flight line until Val’s jet taxied up to the hangar and shut down. Terry rumbled down the stairs as soon as they were deployed, and he shook Kit’s paw when he reached him “Alright, I’m here, now what’s going on?”

“We’re going to have a little talk,” he said, waving towards the passenger door. “Get in. Avery!” Kit shouted.

“Yes, Mister Vulcan?”

“Just hang here for a while, Terry’s not sure when he’s leaving!”

“I have to return by tomorrow evening, sir, Miss Vilenne needs the jet Monday morning!”

“Then just hang here till then! If you don’t hear from us by tomorrow at noon, you can go back!”

“Will do, sir!”

Kit was quiet, almost eerily quiet to Terry, as they drove back to his apartment. He had come with no baggage, wearing a dress shirt and a pair of slacks but with no tie, and he kept fingering his shirt nervously as Kit brought him back to his apartment. He ushered him into the apartment, had him sit down, then went into the kitchen to put on a kettle for tea. When he came back, he sat down in the chair facing him. "Alright, you're here to listen," Kit told him. "Not to talk, and I'm pretty sure you already know why you're here."

"Allison?"

"Allison," he nodded. "When you came to Kansas, you told me that you knew there was something about her that didn't add up. Something she keeps a secret."

"That's obvious. I've tried to dig it up, but whatever it is, it's very well hidden. I'm starting to think she's the daughter of some underworld figure, or the estranged bastard child of a rich family."

"Nothing like that. Allison is just Allison, Terry. There's nobody behind her at all."

"Then we're here because she wants me to know?"

"I knew you were smart," Kit nodded. "But she's too afraid to tell you herself. So I agreed to tell you for her."

"This isn't easy to say, Terry. It really isn't. There's no easy way to lead into it either. All I can really say is I want you to think about Ally before I tell you this and remind yourself of exactly why you're so interested in her. So, why are you interested in her, Terry?"

“She’s gorgeous for one,” he said. “But I love her mind. She’s very, very intelligent. One of the smartest femmes I’ve ever met. Every time I talk to her, she challenges me, and I’ve never met a femme that could outside of the family.”

“Then keep that in mind, Terry.” He blew out his breath. “Allison is a self-made femme. She has quite a lot of money, and she earned it all on her own. She put herself through college, and has managed to save up a nice little nest egg. After she gets a job in her chosen field, she expects to only work for about ten years before she retires...and she really doesn’t have to work at all. She’s only going to work because she wants to. Now, how she made that money is the crux of it.”

“She’s a criminal,” Terry said quietly.

“In a way,” Kit said, a bit wryly. “There’s no easy way to say it, so I’ll just say it. Terry, Allison made her money stripping and working as a prostitute.”

Terry gave him a long look, then laughed. “You’re kidding, right?”

“Not one little bit,” he said with quiet intensity, staring right into his eyes. “I have something here for you to read, Terry,” he said, pointing at the issue of Lone Star holding Allison’s article in it, already open to that page. “That is Allison’s story, as she told it to me. I kept her identity secret, and got into quite a bit of trouble with the Austin DA because of it,” he said wryly. “Now you know what she was, but I want you to understand how she got there, and why she did it. If you just look at her as a stripper and a whore, you disrespect everything else that she is, and turn your back on everything she could be. So read this, Terry, and reserve your judgment until you do.”

Terry gave him a long, searching look, then nodded and picked up the magazine. While he read it, Kit made them both a cup of tea, then brought it back to the table and set it down. Terry read it much faster than most other furs could, then put the magazine back on the table and leaned back. "I...I don't know what to say. You're right in that she's not what you'd expect. But, Kit...she was, she was a whore."

"It was business," Kit said bluntly. "Vulcan Shipyards does much worse every single day. The only difference is the company screws people on paper, where Allison did it personally. But to her, it was just a job. I thought that much was blatantly clear in the article."

"I, I...how can I even know if she can have feelings? Aren't I just another john to her?"

Kit gave him a dark scowl. "I hoped you wouldn't react like this," he growled. "When you look at only what you see on the surface, Terry, you miss everything. Why did she ask me to break this to you?" he asked, a bit harshly. "Because she's terrified of facing you herself. Do you think she'd care if she didn't have any feelings for you? She's be here herself, playing you for everything she was worth."

"But—"

"I told you the first time you met her that you didn't understand her," Kit reminded him. "That you'd be best just backing off and letting her make the decisions. Does that warning make sense now, cousin? You're the one that pursued her. Has she ever called you? No. Has she ever come to Boston to see you? No. You've been the one to chase her, and she tried to keep her distance, but I guess you charmed her enough, because now she's letting me basically bare her soul for your benefit, because she's too afraid to do it herself. She understands exactly who you are and what kind of family you're from. She's willing to look past that and live by the rules the family puts on her, because she wants to see you. She wants to date you. But that's up to you.

“She didn't want you to even ask her out for the first time without you knowing exactly who she used to be. She didn't want to keep that kind of a secret from you. So, there it is, Terry. You know Allison's secret, and what I think is more important, you've had a chance to understand who she is a little better. There's nothing else I can really tell you except for this. Allison is worth it, Terry. She's worth the hassle and the problems, because she is exactly the femme that caused you to take an interest in her. She quit working at the club because she wanted her second chance, her chance at a real life after making a brutally practical decision to sacrifice one moral to gain financial security. How does that make her much different from some other furs you've met at the shipyard, Terry?” he asked pointedly. “You know how? Because at least she's honest about it,” he answered strongly. “She knows what she was, she knows what it made her, but she left it behind. It's up to you to decide if you see the Allison you know and like, or the Allison you never met, and never will, because that Allison is long gone.”

Kit took a sip of tea. “I'm going to go see my landlord. You sit here and think about it, and I'll be back in a little while.”

Kit went over and talked with Lupe at home a while, basically just passing time, giving Terry time, space, and privacy to think it over. Again, Kit was unsure. Terry was a hard Vulcan to know, for he was much different from others in the family. He was more intelligent, driven, and enigmatic. Since Kit didn't know him very well, he had no real idea just how he was going to react, and still wasn't sure. Terry seemed unable to let go of the word whore, yet that mind of his wouldn't let him ignore the other evidence that it was a job description, not a lifestyle or personality.

He gave Terry about an hour, then went back. His tea still sat on the table, untouched. Terry sat on the sofa, leaning forward, elbows on his knees, looking at the cup of tea in quiet introspection. Kit sat down beside him on the sofa and looked over at him.

"How long have you known?" he asked without looking at him.

"How long have I known her, or how long have I known her past?"

"Both."

"Allison danced at my bachelor party," Kit said honestly. "That's where I met her. I've known about her the whole time. But it doesn't bother me," Kit said. "If I'd never have met Jessie, I wouldn't bat an eye at the idea of chasing Allison. Because I don't see her in the narrow confines of a single word. I see the whole femme."

"Did you sleep with her?"

"No."

"Well, that's something at least," he said, then he laughed ruefully. "I don't believe this. And I don't believe I'm even considering this!"

"There's no considering here, Terry," Kit said seriously. "If you want Allison, it has to be all or nothing. She won't tolerate games, and she's smart enough to see through them. This is not something you play at, and Allison is not a toy. Remember that, Allison is not some fun little toy you can have fun with until she bores you, then throw her away. She is not what she was, and if you ever treat her like that, you'll find yourself in a world of pain. Cause if you do that, I swear, you'll have both me and Sheila coming after you like you wouldn't believe."

Terry gave him a calm look, then chuckled. "She must be something to get such loyalty from you and Sheila."

"Allison is an amazing femme, Terry. If you can get past your bigoted concept of her, you have a chance to find out just how amazing she is."

"Bigoted?" he asked with a curious look.

"You're judging her by a stereotype, a word," Kit said bluntly. "That is the textbook definition of bigotry, or prejudice. Allison is not a word, Terry. She is a femme, a living, breathing femme who is witty, intelligent, clever, kind, and interesting. She has hopes, she has dreams, she has desires, and she has needs. You know her story, and you know her secret. All you can do now is decide what you want to do about it."

"I want...to think I'm insane," he said, then he chuckled. "I want to talk to her. Where is she?"

"At an undisclosed location," Kit said dryly, which made Terry laugh. "I can call her if you want."

"Please."

Kit speed-dialed Allison, and she picked it up before the first ring. "Kit? Is he there?"

"He just heard and read a story, Ally," he said simply.

He heard her gasp.

“And now he wants to talk to you. Do you want to talk to him on the phone, or meet him somewhere?”

There was a pained silence. “Put me on speaker. And don’t leave.”

Kit pressed the speaker button and held the phone out. “Go ahead.”

“Terry, I’m, I’m...I’m sorry I couldn’t tell you,” she said. “But I was too afraid. I couldn’t face you. I didn’t know how to say it, I didn’t know how I could ever say it. I know you must think I’m a coward,” she said, sniffing.

“Actually, I think I understand,” Terry answered. “Can we meet?”

“You...want to see me?” she asked in a small voice.

“I think we have a lot to talk about,” he answered. “I can’t give you an answer yet, but I would like to talk to you about it. Can we meet?”

“Kit, can you give him directions to John’s Pizza?” she asked.

“I’ll let him borrow my car. As long as he can drive a stick,” Kit added, giving Terry an appraising look.

“I can do that,” Terry said.

“Alright, he’s on his way, Ally.”

“I’ll be on my way in just a minute.”

Kit gave Terry the keys to his Pathfinder and gave him detailed directions to the pizzeria. “I’ll be here, so call me if you get lost.”

“Okay.”

“Terry.”

“Yeah Kit?”

“Be honest with her, even if it’s to say no.”

“I will,” he said with a simple nod.

And so, Kit had to wait again. He still wasn’t sure just what was on Terry’s mind, because Terry was a hard fox to know. He decided to distract himself by editing his journal entry a little, then, on impulse, sending it into the magazine. After that, he practiced guitar a little, then decided to watch some TV, trying to keep from thinking about it too much. Jessie didn’t come home, and he didn’t really expect her to, since she’d want to be there for Allison when she got home.

He’d have to have Jessie get some pictures of the inside of her house. Kit thought it would be a fascinating view into Allison’s mind.

Nearly four hours after he left, Terry opened his door without knocking. His sleeves were rolled up now, looking much more casual, and he came in and closed the door. Kit turned off the TV and looked at his cousin with calm eyes. “Well, you were gone a while.”

“We went for a walk along the river,” he said.

“And what did you talk about?”

“About her,” he said. “I made her tell me about her past, and not to pull any punches. I wanted to hear the truth from her own mouth.”

“And?”

“And I was honest,” he said, sitting down. “I told her I had to think about it, but I wanted to hear it from her, and get to know all of her, not just the part of her she was letting me see. But, I did score one little victory,” he said with a slight smile.

“What is that?”

“I got her number,” he said.

“The question is, will you use it?”

“Honestly? I’m not sure yet. I have to really think about this, Kit, because it’s not just me here. The family will have an absolute hissy fit when they discover the truth. This isn’t like Bess and her disposable boytoys. I’ll be bringing someone in from outside the family who has a notorious past, and you know they’ll object to me not marrying some New England blue-blood. No, I’ll be marrying some Texas harlot in their eyes, who they think will be a gold-digger. But she’s not that.”

“She’s already well off,” Kit nodded. “It’s not about money to her.”

“You know something? I rather like that idea,” he said honestly.

“Every femme I’ve ever dated saw my last name long before they saw my first. But Allison, she sees me as Terry, not a Vulcan. I, I rather like that.”

“I told you before, cousin, she’s worth it. Yes, there will be a lot of problems because of her past, but in the end, she’ll be worth it.”

“I’ll have to think about it.”

“Don’t think too long,” Kit told him. “Or you’ll lose her.”

The reason that Val needed the jet back on Monday was because she was coming to Austin, to spring a little surprise on Rick.

Kit and Jessie already knew what was coming, mainly since they helped plan it. So, they were both at work much earlier than unusual, at 8:00, and actually beat Rick into work. Kit settled into his office and Jessie opened her office door as Rick ambled in, still walking with the faintest hints of a limp as his leg muscles recovered from the time they spent in the cast. “Morning son,” he noted as he came into the big room. “What’s up with bein’ so early?”

“I’m still trying to get my house back in order, and Jessie came in to try to come up with something for the article you want her to do.”

“Ah, well, no hurries, Jess,” Rick told her.

“I just don’t know what to write about. I mean, you said anything, but when you can write about anything, it’s hard to pick something, you know?”

Rick chuckled. “It’s about your aspect as a young married femme, hon. You’re the only one in the office, you know. Lilly, Denise, and Janet are all single, they don’t have the same point of view you do. So it’s about how a married femme sees the world.”

“But still, I have no idea what to write about at all.”

“Well, how about this. Write about who you want to vote for for President, then explain why.”

“But that has nothing to do with me being married.”

“So, you’re telling me that you’ll get into the booth and not once think about your baby before you press the button?”

She started to say something, then closed her mouth and nodded in understanding. “So you want me to explain what I’m looking for as an expectant mother?”

“It’s part of being married, after all,” he noted.

“Now that I can do!” she said with sudden enthusiasm, unlocking her office door and hurrying inside.

Savid also got there early, because he too was in on the secret. They had to coordinate with him to arrange the time off for Rick. He came in and flashed Kit a knowing grin, then mouthed the word “when?” to him. Kit shrugged, for he was honestly unsure when Val would show up. So Savid slinked off to his office and kept himself busy, waiting for the surprise to be sprung.

The non-writing staff filtered in over the next twenty or so minutes, but Kit didn’t see it because he was in Rick’s office going over the weekend’s figures. Again, their circulation had increased by a steady and appreciable amount, which resulted in a nearly $7,000 profit for the magazine for the week. That was a huge profit, which would immediately go right back into the magazine to pay for the salaries of the new workers they intended to hire, starting this week. They talked about the upcoming interviews, and also about Rick’s plan to reorganize the magazine into departments in advance of them being big enough to need them. Rick tried to set up a payment plan for Kit to be repaid some of the money he’d pumped into the magazine, but Kit knew that they needed capital to expand, so he delayed that. They were at the perfect point to slow their rapid expansion, allow their circulation to solidify and increase steadily from their established sale points and focus on expanding their operations instead of expanding their circulation. Increased circulation was now guaranteed so long as they continued to print a magazine worth reading, and it would increase slowly but steadily for the next couple of months while they expanded their staff and instituted many of the ideas Rick had to make the magazine even bigger and better. He was planning another page count increase, increasing to 52, adding a couple of new features that would be the domain of the new hires under the supervision of the current gang. The magazine now had a waiting list of advertisers willing to buy space, and one of the reasons Rick was looking at increasing the length of the issues was to give them more space to advertise will still adhering to the 21% rule.

To Kit's shock, one of the new advertisers was AAIA, the flight school Sheila and Allison were attending. Kit figured that with the series of articles he had written about his pilot training, AAIA could strike while the iron was hot and see if they couldn't lure a few new students from those who had gotten curious about flying from the articles.

Kit could only grin hugely when Val strode into the office with Jessie right behind her and a pack of curious workers lurking outside the door. "Val!" Rick said in surprise, standing up. "It's good to see you, if a bit surprising!"

Savid hurried into the office, and Rick glanced around at the three huge smiles on his employees and the smug little expression on Val's face. "What's going on?"

"We, your workers and investors, take offense that you have not had a vacation since you started the magazine that was the result of breaking a bone," Val announced, snapping her fingers and holding her open paw up over her shoulder. Stav stepped up and handed her a small folder, which she then presented to Rick. "So, on behalf of the workers of the magazine and myself, we are hereby officially forcing you to go on vacation."

“What?” he asked in surprise.

Val pushed the folder into his paw. “On Wednesday, you and Martha will be on a plane to Hawaii, where you will spend one week at the Honolulu Diamond Hotel. I hear it’s right on the beach,” she smiled. “There, you will relax, enjoy yourself, and have fun. If you have enough fun, we’ll allow you to come home. If you don’t, we’ll make you stay there until you do,” she said with a slight little smile.

“Me and Kit are already ready to work for you,” Savid told him. “We do it before, we are happy to do it again, for much better reason this time.”

“But, but the interviews,” he protested.

“I rescheduled all interviews to take place today and tomorrow,” Kit told him. “Try to worm all you want, you old dingo, you’re not getting out of it. You will be going on vacation.”

“And my folks are going with you,” Jessie grinned. “They’ll meet you in the hotel!”

“Yes, I came straight here from dropping that little bomb on them in Cincinnati,” Val smirked. “So say thank you, you ingrate!”

Rick laughed, both embarrassed and almost awkwardly grateful. “I don’t know what to say except thank you, really. It means a lot to me that you were thinking of us.”

“We always think of you, you old dingo!” Lilly laughed. “But why didn’t you tell us about this, Kit?”

“You didn’t know?” Rick asked in surprise.

“We want it be complete surprise,” Savid grinned, looking back at her. “Me and Kit and Jessie and Miss Val been working on this for a week!”

“Yes, we have,” Val smiled. “Your tickets are first class, and a limo will take you from the airport to the hotel. While there, you’ll have a rental car available to you, and I’ve also arranged a nice helicopter tour and a one day boat excursion. The rest of the time is your own.”

“I’m...touched. Thank you, thank you so much, everyone!”

The gang erupted into applause, and Jessie hugged Rick fondly. “It’s about time you got a reward for all your hard work, Rick!” she told him. “So go have fun!”

“Oh, we will, I promise you that. Martha has been asking for a vacation ever since we expanded.”

“We can mind the shop, boss, it’s time for you to start enjoying the fruits of your labor,” Kit assured him. “But until then, we have work to do,” he winked. “We have to get you ready to go on vacation!”

After they had a little impromptu party, Val took Kit aside and took him into his office and closed the door. She sat down in his visitor’s chair and gave him a steady look. “I want to talk to her before I leave,” she told him. “Call her and arrange a meeting.”

“She’s in class right now, and won’t get out until four thirty.”

“Then I’ll see her at five. I want to explain some things to her and lay down some rules.”

“But Terry hasn’t made his decision yet.”

“I know, but I want her to understand what I expect from her before he even gets that far. I want her to fully comprehend and be ready from day one.”

“Nothing wrong with that, I suppose,” Kit noted, scratching his cheek.

Kit arranged the meeting, and then Val took her leave to go talk with someone in the city, whom she didn't name and was intentionally vague about, which worried Kit just a little that she was about to attempt to meddle somehow. But when 5:00 rolled around, she returned to his apartment, where Allison appeared right on time. Kit, Jessie, and Sheila were hustled out, and they spent the time over at Lupe's as Val and Allison had a long and probably very frank talk.

After about two hours, Val emerged from the apartment. Kit, Jessie, Sheila, and Lupe had been sitting out on his porch, just chatting away the time, and she came over to them. “I'm on my way home now, bro,” she announced.

“Alright, sis. Thanks for coming.”

“It was totally worth it to see that look on Rick's face,” she said with a brilliant smile. “That's one of the fun things about being rich.”

“If only I knew!” Lupe lamented.

“I've seen your profit projections for that,” she said, pointing at the construction behind the complex. “Give it fifteen years, you sneaky canine, and you'll know.”

“Well I'm totally honored you approve of my idea,” he said with an honest smile.

“It was the perfect idea in the perfect location at the perfect time. Just sit back and rake in the cash, Lupe. You’ll be making easy money as long as you keep the complex in good working order.”

Jessie was out of school, and she had already taken next semester off, so she found herself with little to do while waiting for Laura to be born. But, Jessie being Jessie, she kept herself busy over the next week.

Jessie was a creature of habit, but she was also open to new ideas and trying new things, and all her free time suddenly got taken up by that. On the night Terry had gone back to Boston, and after staying over with Allison that night, she had become much more involved with the Austin Party Pack. Jessie would cook or knit or work on her strip or write her article while Sheila and Allison were in flight school from 9:30am to 4:30pm. She would bake scones for Clancy every couple of days, and sent about a platter of assorted cookies, cupcakes, cakes, and pastries a week up to Kansas, which only made the Cessna furs even more devoted to the Vulpine. They’d never had such a friendly couple of students. After they were done, though, she would go join them, and the three of them became the core of a little group of young femmes. Sam was still in Austin because of Kevin, not willing to be apart from him over the summer holiday, so more often than not Sam was with them. Two of the sorority femmes were also still in Austin, Danielle and Lisa, since both of them were taking summer classes. Sometimes they joined them, sometimes they didn’t. Every night, the three of them and whoever was going with them that day would go do something. Jessie had been playing a heck of a lot of golf, since Allison also didn’t know how to play, but Sam did. So, the four of them would play doubles a few times a week. She also took them up in their plane, giving Sheila and Allison a little unofficial opportunity to fly...but only with very stringent conditions Kit set, since it was technically against FAA regulations for students to be flying with passengers, and Jessie and the student not flying would definitely be considered passengers. Jessie had to fly in the right seat, Sheila and Allison could not try any slow-speed or low-altitude maneuvers since they were not familiar with the 400, and he only allowed it after he took Jessie up for about six hours and let her practice take-offs and landings from the right seat, until she was completely comfortable as a right seat flyer. It wasn't being on the right side of the plane that mattered, it was that the controls were backwards and the PFD was on the wrong side. Jessie would have to fly holding the stick in her right paw and actuating controls with her left paw, and that took practice when one was used to doing it the other way around.

Sheila and Allison took up a lot of her time, and also introduced her to new things. Sheila took them horseback riding in the hill country, then Allison took them water skiing on Lake Travis, which Jessie didn't like all that much because her pregnancy made water skiing a bit uncomfortable. Jessie took them skeet shooting, which had been the first time Allison had ever held a shotgun, and Jessie understandably whipped their tails at it. She'd gone skeet shooting with her father way too many times not to be a good shot with a shotgun.

Kit found it amusing that Sheila and Allison both held Jessie in something akin to awe that she actually knew how to handle firearms, and Kit could see one reason why. Jessie just didn't seem the "gun" type, since she was young and pretty and shy and demure, but she was also thoroughly competent and even professional when it came to shooting. They didn't own any weapons, but Jessie would know what to do with them if they ever did. She even knew how to clean and maintain them.

Kit found himself with the femmes as well, since they spent a lot of time over at the apartment. Jessie was teaching Allison how to knit, and continued to help teach Sheila how to cook, and the three of them went over to their now finished townhouse almost every other day and talked about furniture, curtains, and other home decoration things that didn't really interest Kit all that much. Jessie was going to have a clean slate in a brand new townhouse, and she wanted to put her personal stamp on the place as much as she could. She had been the one to choose the style and color of the carpet, and Lupe had caved in and had the townhouse painted to her specifications. Jessie had honestly pestered Lupe about the apartment with things like that, tailoring their new apartment to her exacting specifications, which made their apartment quite different from the others. The six burner stove, the pile carpeting, the soft pastel paints, the chandelier in the dining room, the adjustable indirect tract lighting in the living room, those were all different from what was put in the other townhouses.

It was Jessie who had received shipment of the box from Cessna...or in this case, boxes. Luke had sent them three boxes, filled with all sorts of things. Jessie's commercial pilot books and materials were in one box, Kit's ATP study materials were in one box, and then there was a very large third box. Inside, Kit had found when he got home, was a huge amount of material. Books, manuals, charts, software on burned DVDs, everything a student pilot would need to work for his private. They were also sent a huge number of DVDs from a company called King Air, which were video tutorials for pilots for almost every level; there were even two ATP tutorial DVDs in them.

Kit called Amanda over it, wondering if they sent them by accident. “Oh no, we sent you those,” she assured him. “We used to use the King Air videos in our training program, but then we created our own videos that are tailored specifically to our own course. Those have been sitting in a storeroom for almost six months, so why not give them to someone who might actually use them?”

In all, Kit realized, Cessna had sent him enough to open his own flight school...as long as he only had one or two students. And of course, he would have two students after Sheila and Allison graduated from AAIA.

The time of the move was actually fast approaching, the opening of the new complex to tenants tentatively scheduled for July 7, when the contractors would be completely finished and allow them to move so as not to have to work around residents. Kit rather liked the cart idea Jessie had, and so did Lupe. Lupe went out and bought five large flatbed six-wheeled carts and put up a sign-up list for residents to use them at certain times, helping them move, but reserved them for himself and Kit to use first, since they had the honor of being the first ones to move. The first weekend after the contractors moved out of the inner ring, they would move, which was looking like it would be the last weekend of June, which was only two weeks away as Kit headed into work early on Friday morning. Kit no longer went in late on Fridays, he worked daytime hours the same as Rick, and today was going to be an important day anyway, for he would be interviewing three applicants for the research assistant’s position. Jeffrey had already interviewed a few applicants for the artist position that would be helping him over the week, but Kit didn’t have much chance to get to know them much. There was a hyena, a cougar, and a femme mink that Jeffrey had interviewed, going over their portfolios to get a sense of their artistic style, and he was still debating over which one he liked. Just as Jeffrey had done, Kit had interviewed the applicants in addition to a separate interview they had with Rick, since whoever was hired would be working directly under him, working in the newly created Research Department, which he was department head. Jeffrey was the new head of the Illustrative Art Department, which was part of the overall Art Department of which Savid was head. Jeffrey, Janet, and the new hire would all ultimately answer to Savid, but each was given the official “Department Head” title. Janet was the head of the Photography Department, and Lilly and Mike answered to her when they did photography work for the magazine.

Rick had departmentalized the rest of the magazine as well. There was an Editing Department, which Rick headed, the Research department, which was Kit’s domain, the Writing Department, which was headed by Barry, and the I.T. Department, which was commanded by Mike. There was certainly overlap, though. Kit ran the research department, but also answered to Barry when it came to writing, and was a junior editor under Rick. Barry didn’t get away from it Scot-free, since Barry answered to Kit when he did research. Lilly and Marty answered to just about everyone, since Lilly did writing, photography, and had her own section of the website, where Marty did writing, editing, and also was responsible for sections of the website dealing with reader feedback and interaction. Janet was split between the art and I.T. departments, doing photography for Savid and acting as their second computer god with Mike. The only fur in the office that wasn’t claimed by more than one department was Denise, who only did writing in addition to her duties at the front desk.

Kit had interviewed four furs for the job as his assistant, and devised the simplest means of all to deciding who to hire; he made them do a simple research project that would take about an hour. Two of them were clearly applying because they thought it would be an easy job, one was exposed as completely unqualified after just ten minutes, and the fourth had impressed Kit enough to recommend him to Rick for the job. He was a short, thin, almost neurotically energetic young badger named Patrick Henry Pinatiello, named for the figure out of American history. But it wasn't Patrick's energy that impressed Kit, it was his almost encyclopedic memory and vast curiosity. The young male could recite research quotes that were downright obscure, and his knowledge of current events was profound. This was a fur that must read every newspaper in America on a daily basis to be so well versed, and that kind of curiosity was imperative for a good researcher. A good researcher just fulfilled the requirements of the writer, but a great researcher wondered, and he branched out, searched for more, dug for everything, and sometimes those exploratory excavations required curiosity and the ability to think outside the box for places to look for those little gems and nuggets that might help the writer write a much better article.

Wednesday, they all saw Rick off at the airport for their weeklong vacation, and Kit and Savid again found themselves running the magazine. But this time they both knew what was going on and were completely ready for it, so it was very easy. But not everything was all light and sunshine, because Kit had been tasked with doing the hiring paperwork for two new employees, Eliza Gaunt and Patrick Pinatiello. Eliza was a tall, lanky, awkward-looking young lynx, with tufted ears and a bobbed tail that barely managed to poke out of her dress when she arrived to discuss the job. She looked like a fragile young femme, at least until they started discussing salary, bonuses, and perks. Then she bargained like a rabid wolverine, pushing Kit's Vulcan instincts on getting the best of a bargain. Rick had left a salary range that was acceptable, and Kit fought to stick her on the low end while she battled to take the top. Kit wasn't trying to short-change her on purpose, but it had been so long since someone had bargained so powerfully against him, he was determined to battle her to the bitter end, if only to see who would win. The battle took nearly four hours, even raging through lunch, as they struggled over the details. But eventually the dust settled, they shook paws, and agreed on a figure almost exactly in the center of the range, with a review of the salary after three months of employment.

Patrick was the other extreme. When Kit called him and offered him the job, he took it immediately and without hesitation. When he came in to discuss things and do the paperwork, he didn't even try to negotiate his salary. "I'm just glad to have a job," he said honestly. "And you'll pay me what you think I'm worth. If I do a good job, I'm sure I'll get a raise."

Such blind faith was touching in a way, but it also made Kit regard the badger with a curious eye, wondering if he'd really chosen the best candidate. A real researcher would have walked into the office armed with a slough of facts and figures to assault him, just as Kit had done to Rick. "So, if I offer you minimum wage, you'd take it?"

"Sure," he shrugged. "Because I'm absolutely sure that after three months, you'll see I'm worth much more than that."

"What makes you so sure of that?"

"Cause I could see it as soon as I met Rick. He's a decent and fair male, he'd never underpay me. Besides, from what I've managed to find, the furs here earn more on the average than others in comparable jobs in the region."

Kit could admit when he was wrong.

After doing their paperwork, he released them to their bosses. For Eliza, that meant Jeffrey, but Kit was Patrick's boss, so he just kept him in the office after the young badger got all his paperwork finished. Kit began by making it clear to the young male that Kit demanded that he exceed the expectations of the office. "When Barry or Lilly or Marty send me something, I make it my mission to send them more than they asked for," he explained. "I want them to know everything about the subject they ask me to research, absolutely everything. So when they get our work back, they are armed with absolutely everything they need to write good articles. The key to exceptional journalism is research, Patrick, and here, that duty falls on you and me. It's our job to make this magazine great, and we do that by making sure our writers never have to wonder what if. That's our job. We give them what they ask for, and we give them everything they don't ask for. When Barry sends you a project, what he's asking you to find out is just the beginning of what we send back to him."

"Makes sense to me," he nodded.

Kit spent the rest of the day explaining his research methods to him, and teaching him the archiving system and how to retrieve information from it. Kit kept all the research he did, every single document, in case he ever needed it again, and his archiving system made that information easy to find if one knew how it worked. Pat proved his mettle that day, asking insightful questions that hinted at what was underneath, about nearly everything. His analysis of the archive system was right to the point. "So, we keep it encrypted and use this rather tricky system to throw off anyone who tries to snoop through it without permission?"

Kit laughed. “Yep. We’ve already had one brush with the Austin police over confidentiality.”

“Right, and that was you. I remember reading about it. You refused to reveal the source of an article you wrote about an illegal whorehouse. They even tried to subpoena you, but you beat it in court, and since then the police have decided to let the matter drop.”

“That’s about right. You have a good memory.”

“I suffer from insomnia a lot,” he shrugged. “Reading gives me something to do.”

A project popped up on Kit’s desktop, sent to him by Marty. “And here we go, Patrick, your first project,” Kit said as he opened it. It was a request for background information about one of the school governors at U.T., asking specifically for his educational background and his voting record from when he was a state senator. Included in the project request was the purpose of the research; Marty was investigating the school governor for possible homophobic actions in the past. “Notice that the writer will always include the reason for the research, so it gives you an idea of where he or she is going with it, but that’s not a pair of blinders. Remember, when we send it back, they get everything.”

“But knowing why he wants it shows us where to focus our effort.”

“Exactly. This shouldn’t be too hard, so this one is all yours, Patrick.”

“Please, call me Pat,” he said. “Where can I work?”

“For now, you have a workstation set up in the big office. Rick hasn’t entirely decided what he’s going to do with our new hires. And since he’s on vacation and we didn't discuss it in much detail, I'm afraid you're stuck at an open desk for now."

"As long as I have access to a computer that has internet and our hard records, what else do I need?"

"True. And you won't be alone, the new art assistant is out there for now as well."

"I really want to meet Jeffrey," Pat said eagerly. "I'm such a huge fan of School Daze! And it's awesome that I'll be working with the writer of the strip as my boss!"

Kit laughed. "You know, I think you're the first fur ever to realize I work on the strip."

"It's right there in the panels, JD, KV, JV, Jeffrey Daniels, Kit Vulcan, Jessie Vulcan. Why doesn't your name show up on the new strip?"

"Because I have nothing to do with that one, that's exclusively the domain of Jeffrey and my wife. Jeffrey draws it, Jessie writes it."

"Ah. I still think you should get credit, it's clear the new strip split off from yours."

"I created the original Missy and Cutler, but my wife took them over after the first strip," he said. "So she's been the one to develop them. She totally rejected their personalities," he chuckled in reverie. "So I told her if she could do better, then write the strip. And she did. And God, was it hilarious," he laughed. "Ever since, Jessie's written the Missy and Cutler subplot, and now it's its own independent strip. I only get my name on it when the characters from School Daze appear in Missy and Cutler as guests."

“Yeah, can’t really completely separate them, since Cutler is Buck’s roomie, and Missy is best friends with Ginny and is friends with Jo-Jo. So, will the other subplots ever split?” he asked. “I mean, Razz could be a strip all by herself, and then there’s the whole Zeffier versus Gralbixx the Overlord thing.”

“Well, we haven’t really talked about it. Besides, the subplots give us time to develop the main plot. And they’re fun to write,” Kit chuckled.

Were they. Razz was one of Jo-Jo’s experiments that went bad, a Chinese panda pulled from the ancient era into the modern world. Nobody could pronounce her name, so they dubbed her Razz, faked her identity as Razz Beh Ree, and enrolled her in school as an exchange student from China, and what made her funny was her anachronistic outlook on the modern world. There’s a great deal of hilarity involved for a fur from 1,000BC who can barely speak English trying to unravel the mysteries of a flushing toilet, cell phones, and electric lights. Zeffier and Gralbixx the Overlord was another Jo-Jo disaster. Jo-Jo zapped Oxnard into a parallel dimension with one of her inventions, which was an intergalactic empire ruled by Gralbixx Zrff, Supreme Overlord of the Fifth Dimension. Gralbixx actually wasn’t a bad guy, a kinda clueless emperor ran roughshod over by his bureaucratic government, but he had a towering arrogance and an absolute belief that he was the paramount living thing in all creation. His personality was like a corrupted King Arthur from Camelot, with his own rather twisted sense of honor, a collection of Beanie Babies, a crush on Ginny that always delayed his return to his empire, and a fatal weakness for strawberry shortcake. Zeffier was a Lobo clone from the DC comics, a rough, tough, rude, crude, ill-mannered brute that rode a space cycle, and spent what time when he wasn’t carousing in some bar trying to kill Gralbixx for scratching the paint on his bike, which he called Jezebelle and loved more than life itself. Gralbixx's starship ran Zeffier off the road, in a spaceship sense, and ever since then the outlaw had devoted his life to making Gralbixx pay for scratching the paint on his beloved bike... but never quite managing it, since Zeffier was the worst shot with a laser blaster in the history of this or any other universe, though he considered himself the ultimate marksman. Any time he fired a shot, somehow, some way, that shot ended up starting a series of events that allowed Gralbixx to evade Zeffier and get away, and it had been both challenging and fun to try to come up with these ridiculous, outlandish, complex and subtle chains, akin to the old Mouse Trap game. Oxnard got caught up in the eternal war between the two of them, and they both got pulled back with Oxnard when Jo-Jo managed to repair her machine and get him back. Now Gralbixx was trapped in Jo-Jo's world, trying to adjust, and Zeffier was out there still trying to kill him, but never quite managing it.

Kit busied himself with Rick's work and let Pat handle the research, but he went back to his own job when he realized it was about time to start working on the next major phase of the election special, which was the conventions. Kit wanted to know everything about the conventions. He wanted to know how they worked, what they did, and how they affected the races. He wanted to contrast the difference in the way the two parties ran their conventions, he wanted to know everything about the two cities where they would take place, Denver and Minneapolis, and he wanted a very thorough history of each convention, the things that had happened either in them or around them. Barry's current piece in that series was how the races were tightening, how McCain had won the Republican nomination, but the Democratic nomination was still contested...but almost over itself. Barack Obama was quite nearly there, just needing one more good win to secure the nomination, while Hillary Clinton was still trying to come back and win.

But before that, Kit leaned back in his chair and looked at the calendar, and realized that Jessie's birthday was coming up. She'd be 22 on July 5, in 15 days, and he hadn't yet bought her a present, nor had he considered how he wanted to celebrate it with her. Her birthday fell on a Saturday, which meant that he could swap days off and be off for her, and it also meant that they could have a rather nice party.

A party was certainly necessary, but he was of two minds about it. He'd like to take her back to Cincinnati for her birthday and have a party with her family.

Her family.

Yes, now that would be a very nice birthday for her.

Kit wanted to discuss the matter with her parents, but they were on vacation in Hawaii, and he wasn't sure he wanted to bother them. But then again, this was important enough to intrude, so he called Hannah's cell phone.

She answered immediately. "Hello?"

"Hannah," he called. "How's Hawaii?"

She laughed. "We've been having quite a bit of fun so far," she answered. "Right now, we're in our room, getting ready to go to the beach. What's so important that you'd call during our vacation, dear?"

"Well, Jessie's birthday is coming up, and I have a favor to ask."

"What is it?"

“Would you mind if we had her party at your house?”

“Not at all!” she said immediately.

“Well, there’s a bit more to it than that,” he said. “Would you mind hosting quite a few furs? I was of a mind to see if we could get some of your family to come, and I’m certain that Val and maybe Sheila will come as well. They have the means to get to Cincinnati. Turn it into a family reunion type of thing.”

“Hmm,” she mused. “It would be very short notice, of course. But I can make some calls and see who might be interested. Would you mind if I called you back tonight? It might be quite late for you.”

“That’s fine. I’m not going to hide the party from Jessie, but I’m not going to tell her exactly who’s there, either.”

“Alright. I’ll call tonight, dear, we’re about to leave.”

“Thanks for the help, Hannah, and even on your vacation no less.”

“I don’t mind. It is for my daughter, after all,” she said dismissively, and then they said their goodbyes.

There would have to be two parties, of course, so Kit called Sam and told her his intentions. “So, we need a party for her here, then we’ll be going to spend the weekend with her parents so she can have another birthday party. Can you come up with something, Sam?”

“I’ve been thinking about it for a while,” she said. “As long as we don’t let Sheila plan the party, we’ll be alright.”

Kit laughed. “Amen. How has it been going between you and Kev lately?”

She was silent a second. “Well, we’re getting along quite well,” she said. “I’m not sure when he might propose, but if he does, I’ll certainly say yes.”

“I’ll give him a little nudge.”

She was quiet again. “I kinda nudged him a little in that direction last night,” she said, her voice hiding a little catch that was a touch of embarrassment. “I’m sure Jessie will tell you, so may as well hear it from me. Me and Kevin, ah, deepened our relationship last night.”

Kit laughed. “It’s about time!” he said. “I thought you were going to string that poor male all the way to the altar!”

“That’s what a femme is supposed to do,” she said, a trifle primly.

“Well, was it any good?”

“Kit!” she gasped. “That’s an entirely improper question!”

“Both of you are my friends, so what’s a few improper questions among friends?” he bantered.

She laughed helplessly. “It was good enough,” she said in reply. “And I think I’d better get off this phone before we start talking about things that are downright scandalous. Besides, I have a party to plan.”

“Wimp,” he teased.

“I’m just not a hussy,” she said in an erect tone. “And I’m going to tell Jessie about this conversation!”

“Go ahead, she hasn’t had any excuse to punish me for nearly a week, she knows it’s about time for me to misbehave,” he said flippantly. “This way it's a curve ball she never saw coming. If she punishes me by proxy, I may as well misbehave by proxy too."

Sam erupted into gales of laughter.

The next call was to Val. "Sis," he greeted, "you mind clearing your calendar enough in a couple of weeks to spend the day with us?"

"Jessie's birthday?" she asked.

"Yeah. I'm going to celebrate it with her at her folks' house in Cincinnati, and see if we can't get a few of her relatives to come, make it a little impromptu family reunion. Jessie would like that, she adores her relatives."

"I can clear that Saturday no problem," she said. "I was going to invite you two up to Boston to watch the Pops do their July fourth concert down at the harbor."

"Hey, I like that idea," Kit said brightly. "I'll have to call Sam and tell her to schedule the party here for Thursday, so we can take Jessie up for the concert, then just fly from there straight to Cincinnati. Hmm. That's going to be a long flight in our plane," he grunted. "A good nine hours."

"I can send my jet for you."

"But then what happens on Saturday when we have to go our separate ways?" he asked pointedly. "Unless you don't mind having to fly us down to Austin and then go home, I think we'll have to fly on the airlines this time around."

"That's a valid point," Val conceded. "I see I have to be in Norfolk on that Monday morning, and I also have an appointment in New Orleans on Monday afternoon for the ceremony at Avondale Shipyards.”

“So you did buy it out?”

“Sure did,” she answered. “Five hundred million and change, which was a huge bargain. Seems the owners have had a lot of trouble with the union there, and they’re still trying to recover from the hurricane even after three years. So, I bought it for a song, probably the best deal I ever made. The owners get to walk away with golden parachutes, and as you know, the change of ownership voids the contract their union had, meaning now they have to bargain with me. So Vulcan Shipyards has a new facility now, and added about thirty Navy contracts in the bargain. Vulcan Shipyards is set for about the next thirty years on Navy contracts alone. I’ll need to decide who I’m going to send down there to run it, though. Maybe I’ll send Uncle Zach down there and get him out of my hair,” she mused with an evil tilt in her voice. “God, would he explode if I ordered him to New Orleans! It’s almost worth it just to see the look on his face!”

Kit saw a real war coming there. Val was notorious as a union buster, because she was almost draconian in dealing with unions. She actually didn’t object to unions in theory, but she did take offense when employees she had treated with kindness and regard backstabbed her by demanding things that were utterly outrageous. Of the four major facilities of the Vulcan facilities, the Jacksonville and San Diego facilities were non-union and the Norfolk and New Hampshire facilities were union. Of the many smaller shipbuilding facilities and maintenance facilities they had, about half were union and half non-union, and the non-union shipyards made just as much as the union yards because Val offered very competitive salaries and good bonuses, including a very comprehensive health insurance plan. Val took it personally when a shipyard went on strike trying to get a contract that she considered to be too demanding or out of proportion with the pay and benefits of other Vulcan facilities. Since she'd taken over from her father, the New Hampshire submarine facility threatened to strike when their contract expired, and they were demanding a pay raise that was way, way higher than those given to the other Vulcan facilities. Val went to the shipyard personally, called a union meeting, and got up there and told them, in no uncertain terms, that she would close the shipyard if they went on strike, move the contracts to Norfolk, eat the penalty she'd incur from the Navy for being behind schedule, and they'd all be out of a job because she would not hire anyone who went out on strike. And to prove it, she brought a copy of the documents she'd had prepared that was already signed by the board, and only awaited her signature. And after that, she told them she'd approve the same contract signed by the Norfolk yard, which gave them a comfortable pay raise and extended their health coverage, which was good contract.

Needless to say, the union backed off and agreed to the same terms as the Norfolk facility.

That move only increased her reputation as the Ice Queen, absolutely daring a union to strike against her, and would probably make the union leaders in New Orleans wet their pants at the thought of having to deal with Vilenne Vulcan when it came time for Avondale to bargain a contract with the new owners. But, as long as they didn't ask for anything outrageous, they'd do just fine. Val was actually very fair when it came to dealing with the employees, for she understood that the company was only as good as the lowest janitor. She paid her workers very well, and in return, she demanded loyalty and excellence. For example, a Vulcan journeyman welder earned, on the average, nearly two dollars an hour more than welders in other companies, but not just any welder could get a job at Vulcan Shipyards. The welder had to pass a tough welding test that would separate the mediocre from the real craftsmen, but if he passed, he was guaranteed a good salary and benefits in exchange for doing his best, for maintaining the legacy of excellence for which Vulcan ships were famous. Of course, it wasn't the end if he failed the test, for Vulcan Shipyards offered apprenticeship programs for every trade, but those too were competitive and had high standards. They only accepted men who had high school degrees, had at least a 2.8 GPA, could pass a general test given when they applied, and had a recommendation from someone either in the company or from the high school. The apprenticeship programs were how the shipyards maintained their high degree of quality, since Val much preferred to train her own workers rather than hire them from someone else. When they earned their certification through Vulcan Shipyards, Val knew they were trained right.

And for that matter, ex-Vulcan tradesmen were never unemployed long. Other companies would hire them in a heartbeat, for they knew that they were good.

“I don't think you'd want to start that kind of a war,” Kit chuckled. “So, how do you want to do this?”

She was quiet a moment. “Tell you what,” she said. “Since you have that shiny new jet pilot rating, I'll charter a jet for you to bring whoever you want up to Cincinnati, that way we're not at each other's mercy.”

“I won't complain a bit,” Kit laughed. “But I doubt we need a ten this time. A Mustang or any CJ should do it. It will probably only be Jessie and Sheila.”

“Well, you’ll want to have a few empty chairs for anyone else that might want to come, like maybe Rick and Martha. So let’s go with a CJ three.”

“That’s an idea,” Kit said in agreement.

“Alright, lemme call over to Cessna.”

“Cessna? There are jet charter companies right here in Austin,” Kit protested.

“I’m not trusting my brother to some fly-by-night’s shoddy maintenance,” she said immediately. “I want a Cessna jet, so I’ll get one from Cessna. At least I’ll know beyond any doubt that the jet is serviceable and dependable, and since they trained you, they won’t raise a stink when I make it clear I only need the jet, and not a pilot to go with it.”

“Well, that’s a viable argument,” Kit chuckled. “Their insurance carrier would have a conniption if someone not on the policy flew the jet.”

“Oh, by the way, thanks for lowering your insurance on your plane,” she laughed. “When Cessna sent in the training certificates for both you and Jessie, they offered me a much more attractive rate. And I added Jessie to the policy, since she’ll be flying it.”

“Only wise,” Kit noted.

Kit went back to work, setting up an outline of required work for the convention research, and dividing it between himself and Pat, giving him a chance to prove himself early. That would, of course, let both of them get much more detailed in their research, since they’d have the time. Kit decided to give Pat the work on the conventions themselves, leaving it up to him to research how they worked and what they did, while Kit would research the history of the conventions and the cities in which they were being held. Pat came back to him about three hours after he started his project, and announced that he was done.

“Well, that was pretty quick,” Kit noted. “Let’s see what you came up with.”

Kit started honestly fearing for his job right about then. Pat had researched absolutely everything there was to know about the school governor, his personal life, his vinyl siding business, his family, his history with the IRS including an audit four years ago, his voting record, he’d even dug up the male’s U.T. transcript and school record. He discovered the male had three arrests for minor offenses, and there had been an attempt to purge a fourth from the records when he was a minor for an assault against a gay male. Pat had tried to use Kit’s system of organizing and displaying the information, which made it almost look like Kit himself had done the work. It was that thorough, and it was done with the same speed with which Kit usually completed his assignments.

“Outstanding,” Kit said with an approving nod. He offered a few suggestions to edit the material to more closely follow the established report style for research, and then gave Pat his next assignment, explaining what he had to research. “I want a comprehensive guide to how both party conventions work, Pat, so that someone who had never even heard of a convention could read your research and understand exactly how they work. You can leave off researching the primaries, just focus on what happens from gavel to gavel.”

“Got it,” he nodded. “Do I write this in research format, or am I writing a part of an article?”

“Put it in research format,” he answered. “If Barry wants you to put it in article format, he’ll let you know.”

“Okay, got it.”

“Good work. Have Mike show you how to send your work to Barry when you finish editing it, then it should be about time to knock off for the day.”

“He already did,” he answered. “He taught both me and Eliza how the network works after you sent me to my desk. It’s not hard.”

“Oh, well, in that case, you’re free to go after you finish the edits.”

“Thanks, boss,” Pat said with a smile, then he got up and filed out of his office.

Boss. Kit almost laughed hearing himself called by that title. He certainly didn’t feel like a boss.

He heard Jessie outside, heard her meet Pat and sound a little embarrassed when Pat gushed over her work on the strip, then she bounded into his office with a big smile on her face. “Hey, handsome fox!” she said with a smile.

“Well, we’re in a good mood,” he chuckled, then he laughed when she rushed around his desk and sat on his lap quickly.

“I felt the baby kick just a minute ago!” she said excitedly. “Quick, quick, feel it!” she urged. Kit put his paw on her baby bump, and almost immediately he felt a very faint vibration under his pads. His eyes widened, then he laughed.

“I guess there really is a baby in there, and it’s not you getting fat,” he teased, which made her laugh helplessly.

“I’ll get you for that, love,” she threatened with a smile.

“You don’t have to, you’ve already got me,” he said with a loving voice, kissing her under her chin, which made her giggle. “By the way, I’ve been planning your birthday party,” he told her.

“Oh? No surprise party?” she asked.

“Nah, I want you to see it coming. But, we’re going to have two. One here on Thursday, a special trip on Friday, and on your birthday we have your party at Cincinnati.”

“Really? That sounds wonderful!” she said happily. “What are we doing on Friday?”

“Val invited us up to Boston to attend the fourth of July concert the Boston Pops gives at the harbor. It’s quite an event, and it’s worth braving Boston to go see it. I think you’ll love it, so I accepted.”

“That does sound nice,” Jessie agreed.

“Val invited Rick and Martha as well, and odds are Sheila will want to go, and maybe Sam or Allison or someone, so she’s going to charter us a jet that I’ll fly up, so Val doesn’t have to fly all over the country picking us up and taking us home and we have room for a few passengers.”

“Ohh, I’ll bet you jumped all over that,” she giggled.

“You know I did,” he grinned in reply. “We can fly up Friday afternoon, see the concert, stay in a hotel in Boston overnight, then fly to Cincinnati the next day. From there, we either stay overnight and fly back Sunday or fly back Saturday night, whichever you want.”

“Such a silly question,” she teased. “Of course we’ll stay over till Sunday. If it’s our own rental jet, we can leave whenever we please.”

“That we can,” he smiled. “So, let’s talk about this little indigestion you have down here,” he said, nuzzling her as he put his paw under her shirt and rubbed her furry tummy.

“That indigestion is your fault,” she giggled, wrapping her slender fingers around his wrist.

“All you had to do was say no, so I’d say that the blame is shared between us,” he told her as he nuzzled her under her chin.

“Like I could ever say no to you,” she said with a bright smile, kissing him on the nose playfully.

“Hey! Get a room, you two!” Mike called tauntingly from outside the office.

“We have one!” Kit retorted. “If you can’t manage seeing how adults act, you can shut our door!”

“Janet, fetch the video camera!” Mike called. “It’s about time we put up a pay portion of the site, after what we did to our readers with the Sheila hoax.”

“What hoax?”

“We claimed to put up a picture of her naked, but it linked to the Disney website,” Mike grinned. “We Rick rolled our readers!”

Janet laughed, but Jessie gave Kit a curious look. “Rick roll?”

“An internet term for claiming a site leads to one place, but it actually leads somewhere else. It got the name from furs who would put up Youtube links saying it was some cool video, but it actually linked to Rick Astley’s video Never Going to Give You Up. So, it became known as ‘Rick rolling’ someone if you did that.”

“Oh, internet slang,” Jessie said, then she laughed. “It’s funny, though.”

Jessie went to go talk with Jeffrey in his office, and Kit chuckled when he saw Janet, Eliza, and Pat all looking at the door, wondering what they were doing. When Kit went to see Jeffrey, they weren’t sure if they were talking about the strip or some other business, since Kit was working for Rick. But when Jessie went to see Jeffrey, there was no doubt it was over the strip.

Denise sent a call to him, so he picked it up. “Kit Vulcan,” he intoned.

“Hey cousin,” Terry’s voice returned.

“Hey Terry,” he said. “What’s up?”

“I just wanted you to know. I’m calling Allison, and I’m asking her out.”

Kit was quiet a moment, then he chuckled. “So, you think she’s worth it?”

“I think I owe it to myself to see what’s there more than I owe the family to be a proper and submissive member of the family,” he answered. “You’re living proof that we can leave the umbrella of the family and make it. Besides, I doubt Val will fire me unless me and Allison do something stupid, so it’ll just be between me and the elders.”

“Well, I’m glad to hear that, Terry. Just be ready for the firestorm that’s coming over it.”

“I’m ready. I’ve already considered all the angles. There’s just one angle left that I can’t really predict.”

“What is that?”

“Allison,” he answered. “I had to think a long time before I finally came to terms with her past.”

“And what did you decide?”

“That maybe you were right. Maybe it was just a job, and she really can love me. I want to find out, and the only way to find out is to get to know her. So, I’m inviting her out for the holiday weekend. We’ll be in Boston for the fourth. I’ve got tickets for the Pops, and I want her to see it. Then we’ll go to New York for the rest of the weekend.”

“Damn, cousin, that’s going for the throat,” Kit said seriously. “You’re going to show her off in Boston? You know the tabloids are going to go nuts when they see you with a stranger vixen. You’ll be kicking an anthill. And you’re also bringing a stranger to the family without asking for permission to date her. You know the uncles are going to be pissed off.”

“It’s going to happen no matter what. Whether some paparazzi snaps of photo of us at an Austin restaurant or here, it’s going to get out eventually. So why try to delay the inevitable? As to the elders, screw them. They’ve done my family no favors over the years, treated my whole family like lepers, so I don’t feel particularly inclined to care. They can’t take away my trust, they can’t take my family stocks, and so long as I don’t anger Val, they can’t touch me.”

“Dear God, I’ve created a monster,” Kit laughed.

“You opened my eyes, that’s for sure,” he said simply. “You showed us cousins that we can be happy if we don’t toe the line set by Uncle Zach. The only line I dare not cross is the one Val draws in the sand. I don’t give a flying flip about Uncle Zach or Jake or Aunt Maxine. They’re impotent. Val is the true power in the family, and so long as we follow her rules, we’re just fine.”

Kit pondered that a second. Hearing Terry say it made him realize that there was a coming rift in the family, a coming struggle of the elders against the children. The elders gave the children no respect, and the children resented it...though they certainly didn’t behave in ways that garnered respect. The conflict between Sheila and her mother, Sarah, was a good example of it. Sheila was a shallow and selfish vixen, but when she really needed help, her mother had rebuffed her, and that drove her away.

Terry had made the one point that made that rift inevitable. The elders truly had lost their power to control the younger, because of the deal that divided up the family money among every member of the Vulcan family. The children were no longer at the mercy of the family head and beholden to their parents for their livelihood, and that freedom was starting to foment rebellion among the Vulcan ranks. Sheila and Terry were just two examples of that rebellion; Sheila had forsaken Boston to move to Austin to stay with her friends there and go to school to be a chef to open her own restaurant, and Terry was about to openly court a femme not approved by the family elders, and a femme with a very dark and sordid past to boot.

And Terry had put his finger right on the biggest truth. The true power in the family was now Val, and Val did not share the same ideals as her elders. She was much, much more progressive and lenient than the aunts and uncles were, more willing to let the Vulpine be themselves, pursue their own interests, so long as they didn't stain the family honor. That was why she was so adamant about the very stringent restrictions she placed on Terry as he pursued his interest in Allison, about keeping it discreet. He wondered how Val was going to react to him bringing her to Boston, so much so he asked about it.

“She already agreed to let me do it, you know I wouldn't even ask her without permission,” he answered. “She agrees that I have to introduce her eventually, so she gave me permission to ask her to Boston, but we don't mingle. We have to keep to ourselves, we don't answer questions, and we don't show up anywhere but the concert. So, after the concert, we get on a plane and go to New York, and we'll have dinner and see a show, and a more normal date down there on Saturday. She's only coming up to Boston for the concert.”

“If Allison agrees, anyway,” Kit noted.

“I'm going to stress that we'll have separate hotel rooms, and she'll be home on Sunday afternoon,” he said immediately. “I'm not expecting anything out of her. I just want to take her to a concert, have dinner, take her to a show, and get to know her better, get to know the real Allison.”

“You've really thought this through.”

“Of course I have. If I'm going to do this, I want to do it right, and I also want to respect Allison. No matter her past, she deserves that respect. I want to show her I won't be like all the other males who have treated her badly.”

“I think you'll do just fine,” Kit chuckled. “Thanks for telling me, Terry.”

“Feel free to tell Jessie and Sheila, because I’m going to call Allison right now. She should just be leaving her flight school. It’s a touch after five thirty, that’s when she gets out.”

Kit looked at his clock, and saw that it was indeed 4:34. Sheila and Allison had just finished ten minutes ago. It was an hour later for Terry because he was in the Eastern time zone.

“Then let’s get off the phone so you can get her before she gets in her car,” he noted.

“Good idea. See you later, cousin.”

“Oh, tell Allison that Val invited me and Jessie up for the concert too, so she can catch a ride with us up to Boston.”

“Nice! I’ll tell her. Bye-bye cousin.”

“Bye Terry.”

Kit started wrapping things up, getting the last pieces of data inputted into the computer to close out the week. They had turned a record profit that week, $13,655.68 to the black due to stronger sale figures for their sale issues and the initial payment of two major new advertisers in the same week, Papa John’s Pizza and Frontage Auto, a very large car dealership just off the interstate on the frontage road. The profit would be squirreled away for the coming expansion, building capital the magazine would need in just a month or two. There would be new salaries to pay, more costs to the printer to print both a larger issue and more copies, new expenses for equipment, and there would be only a marginal increase in incoming revenue from advertisers because of Rick’s adamant 21% rule. The expenditures would quickly swallow up their profit margin, and it would start next week, when Eliza and Pat's salaries started to be paid out, and the expense reports Mike filed for the equipment he bought to supply the two new hires would be officially tallied into the ledger, since he hadn't officially turned them in yet, he was still buying some equipment to finish and he wouldn't turn it in until he finished. Another major hit to their profits would be when Rick finally chose a health insurance plan to offer to the employees. He'd been researching the various companies and looking for the best deal, and that was going to be expensive, but it was also necessary. Rick very much wanted to offer health insurance to his workers, for he understood how important it was. His own accident proved that; one never knew when the unexpected would occur. So the profits they earned now would be the money that got them through the next expansion phase, the bankroll upon which they would draw when they were again posting losses on Fridays.

His cell phone rang, and he opened it and answered; unlike Jessie, he still used his cell phone for personal calls, leaving his Blackberry for business. "Hello?"

"Kit," Allison answered, her voice excited. "Terry called me!"

"I know, he called me to warn me he was before he called you," he answered her. "Did he ask you out?"

"He did!" she said happily. "He invited me up to New England for the holiday weekend."

"You sound excited."

"I thought he wasn't going to call me back," she said honestly. "I thought my past was too much for him, but he said it doesn't matter to him!" she said, almost deliriously happy. "He said we'd go to the holiday concert in Boston, then go to Cincinnati to attend Jessie's birthday party on Saturday afternoon, then go to New York to see a Broadway show on Saturday night."

"Well, that sounds pretty good," Kit mused, noting the change in Terry's original plan. "He told me only about his hope to take you to Boston and New York."

"Yeah, I kinda already accepted Jessie's invitation to her party in Cincinnati," she said. "So Terry agreed to go to the party with me."

"Wow, my pretty kitty moves fast, I just told her about the Cincinnati party like a half hour ago."

"She interrupted the end of my flight class," Allison laughed. "I forgot to turn off my cell phone. I'd literally just got off the phone with her when Terry called me."

"Did he stress the hotel arrangements?"

She laughed. "He did. He said we'd be in separate hotels if that's what I wanted, and he said he didn't want any kind of misunderstanding at all about his intentions, which I thought was very sweet of him. I told him that as long as we're in non-adjointing rooms, I'm comfortable with it."

"I'm glad. I'm really happy for you, Ally."

"Thank you. You've been a true friend, Kit. I wanted you to know how much I appreciate everything you've done for me, and I'm glad I trusted you."

"I'm grateful you feel that way."

“Now if we could just get Jessie over her jealousy,” she giggled. “I’d love to have you over at my house.”

“Just give her time, she’ll get used to it. But I’m afraid that as long as she’s pregnant and you’re gorgeous, she’s going to be jealous.”

She laughed. “Well, we have, what, fifteen weeks to go?”

“Fourteen weeks, three days,” he recited instantly. “If she delivers on her due date. Our doctor told us she could be as much as a week in either direction from that, but she was fairly sure she’d deliver on or around September thirtieth.”

“Well, I think I can wait that long. Besides, I’ll have something else on my mind,” she mused.

“What do you think about Terry?”

“Honestly? I think he’s the most intelligent male I’ve ever met,” she answered. “His mind is amazing, and it’s a delight to talk to him. He’s very handsome, and he’s witty, and he’s kind. And I want to get to know him better.”

“And he’s rich.”

“Like that even crossed my mind!” she challenged.

“Oh, it did and you know it, don’t lie,” Kit teased.

She laughed ruefully. “I try very hard not to think about that,” she answered him. “And after all, I don’t really need his money. I have plenty of my own.”

“You do indeed.”

Chapter 29

When Rick and Martha came home, they were both almost dreamily content, and their fur was sun-bleached from day after day out in the Hawaiian sun. Kit and Jessie picked them up at the airport, and the first thing they did after he got them home was show him an onslaught of pictures. Kit and Jessie saw quite a few pictures of the Sanders and the Williams enjoying their trip, from the luau they attended on the first night, pictures of black sand beaches, pictures of breathtaking scenes from a helicopter, and pictures of a whale they spotted during their boat excursion. Vil had put them in swanky rooms, they had a rental car at their disposal, and had paid for their helicopter tour and their boat trip.

But the vacation didn't dissuade Rick from work, for he was there the next morning, where he wasted no time getting to know Eliza and Pat better, and also talking to Kit and Jeffrey while they were at lunch to gauge their performance during their first few days. "Elly's very, very good," Jeffrey said. "She's already taken over doing the designing on the Frontage ad."

"Elly?" Rick asked.

Jeffrey nodded. "That's what she likes to be called. She can caricature as well, so she can do editorials."

"So, so far so good?"

Jeffrey nodded again. "She's a hard worker."

“What about Patrick?”

“Pat, and I’m glad you found me before you found him, or I might have missed out on this job,” Kit chuckled. “He’s easily as good a researcher as I am. He’s thorough and he’s fast. I wouldn’t bat an eye giving him any project.”

“Good,” Rick said, “because you have more important things to do than handle all the research.”

“Such as?”

“You’re a partner, son, you have other duties. I want you to take a firmer paw in the editing. So, I want you to at least split the research evenly with Pat and start working with me and Savid. Eventually, I want you to master every aspect of the magazine’s operation, from Denise’s front desk to handling the main editing.”

“Practice what you preach, old dingo, you don’t bother Mike at all,” Kit laughed.

“I avoid this modern sorcery,” he winked in reply, pointing at his computer. “I leave imperiling mortal souls to the digital Satan to the youngsters. How are the strips going, Jeffrey?”

“Fine now,” he chuckled. “Kit and Jessie have put in about five weeks of scripts in advance, and I’m about three weeks ahead on the art.”

“So, does Jo-Jo really blow up the bell tower?” he asked curiously.

“You’ll find out on Friday,” Jeffrey grinned in reply.

“I’ll find out as soon as you submit the strip so I can put it into the issue,” he snorted.

“I’ll send you a blank template that’s the same size as the strip,” he teased in reply.

“And you’ll find yourself at half pay this week, too,” Rick warned, which made both Kit and Jeffrey burst into laughter. “Have you considered who you’re going to syndicate with?”

“No one right now,” he answered. “We decided to do our own syndication, not go through a syndicate and have to pay them a share of the profits. The American-Statesman has offered to pay to run the strips, so I might just start with that and see how it goes. They only have a hundred and three, so they’ll recycle pretty quickly unless they take them weekly.”

“I’ll let it be known through the editor’s circles that School Daze is now available for reprint if you want.”

“That works for us, boss. But we wanted to let you know something.”

“What?”

“One quarter of the profits from syndication are going to the magazine,” Jeffrey told him. “The strip started here, so the magazine deserves to profit from getting the strip off the ground.”

“You don’t have to do that, son,” Rick shook his head. “We get all the readership boost we need from the fact that the new strips are only found here.”

“Well, me and Kit agreed to it, and you don’t have a say, boss,” Jeffrey told him. “We decided that the magazine is as much entitled to profits off the strip as we are, so it gets a quarter of the syndication revenue. But, I do expect steady and healthy pay raises,” he winked.

Rick laughed. “You have my promise. And next month, I’m gonna contract to a health insurance provider, so we’ll all have health insurance too.”

“That’s good to hear.”

Rick’s offer to let it be known that the strip was available for syndication didn’t seem like such a big deal...at least until Friday.

Friday, much to Kit’s surprise and delight, nine newspapers and three magazines had contacted Jeffrey to bargain with him over syndication for School Daze and Missy and Cutler. Kit had made it clear to Jeffrey that handling the business of the strip was his responsibility, and though he was young, he wasn’t dumb. He bartered very nice syndication fees from them of $50 per week, which was an extremely high fee as far as syndication went, but the other publications considered the fee acceptable to get access to the strip, because it was already popular. Jeffrey also made it clear that they could run the strips daily if they so pleased, but that the strip itself was weekly and they’d eventually find themselves out of strips. He also made it clear that reprint rights would lag behind Lone Star by two weeks, which permanently protected the magazine’s first print rights to the strip.

The publications bought the rights with those conditions without even hesitating. The three magazines were all either weekly or monthly, so the weekly nature of the strip didn’t bother them, but the newspapers found themselves in a curious predicament. The Houston paper decided to split the difference and run the strip as a daily until they ran out and then switch to weekly, but the Dallas paper decided to run the strip as a 4-strip block every week in their weekend section, which would delay them hitting the end of the available strips.

Either way, it was $600 of weekly income, which was split up as $150 for the magazine, and $225 each for Kit and Jeffrey; Jessie had declined to ask for a share, since she was part owner of the other strip with Jeffrey and her marriage to Kit gave her access to his share anyway. And they got it by syndicating themselves and not going with a syndication company, which would have probably gotten a $20 a week fee and then taken half of it for themselves. The simple truth was, Jeffrey and the Vulpans had a successful strip that other publications wanted to reprint, and they were smart enough to make those publications deal with them directly, and pay real money for it.

Jeffrey left that as the conditions of syndicating the strip to all publications, and every day another publication called the magazine to talk to Jeffrey about it, trying to bargain him down. But he was steadfast, for he knew that they'd eventually settle for the same deal if they wanted the strip.

Rick had agreed to manage the actual finances of the syndication, and it was he that cut the first royalty checks to the strip, Kit, and Jeffrey on the first Friday after they syndicated. Rick decided to put the magazine's portion of the income into a special fund that would become the yearly bonus for the magazine, splitting it evenly with all the employees except for Kit and Jeffrey, so everyone could profit from the strip that helped anchor their magazine's readership. Even though it was only $150 a week for now, it would also have a good five months to pile up before it was handed out in mid-December.

"I wish I didn't have to cash this," Jeffrey laughed as he looked at his first royalty check for his work.

"Don't," Rick chuckled. "I'll draw the money out as pure cash for you. Just frame the check, just make sure you void it on the back so someone doesn't steal it and try to cash it."

Jeffrey laughed. "Nah, I'll cash it. But I'll make a copy of it first and frame that."

"Now that's smart thinkin'," Rick grinned.

"With Elly and Pat here and taking part of the load off us, me and Kit have agreed to accelerate the strip production," he told Rick. "We're going to see if we can take it to a daily. If I have enough time to do the art, since Kit seems to be able to bang out a whole month of scripts in like an hour," he said, giving Kit a playfully dirty look.

"Hey, my part of the job's easy," Kit shrugged. "Besides, if we can sustain a daily production rate, it'll make the strip much more appealing to newspapers."

"So this week I'll see if I can produce five strips," Jeffrey told the dingo. "But we're leaving Missy and Cutler as a weekly, so that means I only have to produce six strips a week. I think I can do it. I just need about four hours a day to produce a good quality strip, and the other four hours I devote to the magazine. I can do the other strip on Saturday, and that leaves me with a day and a half off."

"If you follow that schedule, anyway," Rick mused. "The first night you go home and you're bored, you'll end up working on the strip."

"Probably," Jeffrey agreed with a laugh. "Is that alright with you, boss?"

"Surely it is," he nodded. "I told you we'd put you on part time so you could pursue your own work, so four hours a day is just fine. And if you choose to spend that free time working on School Daze, who am I to argue?"

It just helps the magazine,” he chuckled. “So, you want a block for five strips reserved in the next issue?”

Both of them nodded. “If we’re gonna run five strips a week, the newspapers will see they can run it as a daily and not run out of material for a long time.”

“If you find you can sustain the pace, I’ll announce that School Daze will print five strips a week from now on, and pass it on that it’s now a daily strip.”

“And we’re gonna adjust our deal with the syndicators and tell them they only have to stay a week behind, if they ever catch up,” Jeffrey said.

Kit took the $225 that was the Vulpan share of the royalties and banked it, but Jeffrey took his check and made 2 copies of it. One he hung in his office, the other he hung in his studio in his apartment.

That was just one way in which Elly and Pat had impacted the office. It gave Kit and Jeffrey more time to work on the strip, but they also showed that they had some unique talents of their own that they were happy to share with the magazine. Elly was quite good at both caricature and illustration in a way Jeffrey was not, and so it was one of Elly’s illustrations that graced the cover of their next week’s issue, a wonderful illustration of the Texas capitol building that highlighted the top story of the week, which dealt with U.T.’s budget and the state money granted to the school by the state government. Pat, it turned out, was good at writing poems and riddles, so he added a riddle into the issue, with a prize of a Lone Star tee shirt to the first person who emailed the right answer. But Pat’s riddles weren’t easy, and it took nearly five days before someone got the right answer.

That week, as promised, there were five strips of School Daze, all part of a running series, or arc, dealing with a one of Jo-Jo's inventions run amok, which was a self-spinning, levitating yo-yo that ravaged the entire campus, chipping bricks, breaking windows, and denting doors. The yo-yo was attracted to the color green, so it chased anyone wearing green all over the campus, or at least until they got outside and the yo-yo buzzed randomly over the grass until it wandered beyond the lawn and again went crazy. There was also one strip of Missy and Cutler.

Elly seemed inspired by Jeffrey's work and Pat's contest, so she also included her own contest in the issue, providing a three strip panel with the final panel's word bubbles left blank, and calling for readers to supply their own word bubbles to the panel to make it funny. The winner would also get a tee shirt, and their word bubbles would be printed in the next week's issue.

The week passed quickly for Kit and Jessie, though. Jessie's birthday was coming up fast, and their next issue was going to release on July 4, though Kit, Jessie, Rick, and Martha wouldn't be there. They worked hard to get everything put to bed so they could leave on Friday and come back Sunday morning, while Jessie got everyone ready to go. Kit and Jessie were bringing, Rick, Martha, Sheila, Allison, Sam, Kevin, Lupe, and Danielle with them, and it was difficult getting hotel rooms for everyone, since it was July 4 in Boston. Jessie also made it clear that this wasn't a free ride for the guests, they had to pay for their own hotel rooms. That was what made it so tricky, and eventually the Vulpans had to assert their authority, or more to the point, Kit did. Instead of trying to get everyone into hotels, he instead arranged to have them stay in the guest houses at Stonebrook.

That was easy for him to do, since he and Vil were the deeded co-owners of the property. Though he would never live there, it was his property, and if he wanted guests to stay in the guest houses on the manor's grounds, then no one, not even Uncle Zach, could reject it. Zach lived at Stonebrook by Kit's suffrage, and he had no say in what Kit did with or to the property. Kit would never sleep anywhere near that place, so Vil was going to put them up in her personal house in Chelmsford, which kept him far away from the rest of his family. Kit would stay in Boston overnight, but he would come nowhere near the rest of his family, keeping his wife far away from them, and the extent of his foray into the city would be limited to going to the concert, which would be attended by everyone, even Clancy. Outside of that, he would go no further into Boston than the hotel room near the airport.

Boston didn't frighten him as much as it did before he learned of Vil's hamstringing of the family concerning him, but that didn't mean that the ghosts of Boston wouldn't continue to haunt him.

Luke had also called him and told him that the jet was chartered and ready. A Cessna pilot would fly it down to Austin on Thursday night and stay in the city over the weekend while Kit used it, then fly it back when he returned. Kit reviewed his manuals and materials for the CJ3 in preparation to pilot it, which seemed easy now that Pat was there to help him research.

Work seemed almost...easy now. Pat was such a good partner for Kit that the two of them could plow through almost everything they were given with blazing speed, yet also provide the same standard of excellence that Kit demanded. The problem was that, right now, there was too much work for one researcher but not enough for two, so Kit and Pat found themselves with spare time, which they both used trying to help others in the office as they could. Kit knew that their workload would increase when Rick increased the pages per issue and hired another writer, both of which were slated for July. When those happened, there would be enough work for both of them. Until then, Kit would continue to learn about editing with Rick and Savid while Pat roamed the office putting in a helpful paw wherever it was needed.

When they put the issue to bed on Thursday evening, Kit and Jeffrey both received their normal paychecks and royalty checks that were now at $300, for now they had 16 publications syndicating the strip, the furthest out being the Times-Picayune in New Orleans. Again, Kit was not surprised to find that the publications were willing to pay $50 a week for the strip, which was higher than fees for comics, and again he felt vindicated in having them handle the syndications themselves, which let them keep the entire syndication fee.

Kit took the afternoon off, though, and would be off the rest of the weekend, because he was going to fly. He met the Cessna pilot down at Bergstrom because he wanted to take a short test flight in the jet with the Cessna pilot before he took it up solo. He'd only piloted a CJ3 in the simulator, and he wanted at least one take off and landing with a rated pilot in the right chair before taking it solo. The pilot was, surprisingly enough, Justin. The leopard met him outside of the Signature hangar, where they had the jet parked, shaking his paw fondly. "So, did Jessie bring me any cookies?" he asked.

Kit laughed. "None made, but I think you could come by for dinner tonight," he offered.

"That sounds heavenly. So, shall we?" he asked.

The jet was parked outside on the tarmac, and from the number on the tail, it had just come off the assembly line, and it had already been sold. It had a registration number; someone in Texas had bought the plane. It was painted with blue stripes and chasers, and when they got inside, he saw that it was set up with the eight passenger club configuration, eight seats with a lavatory in the back. “Isn’t whoever bought this plane gonna be a little ticked you lent it to me?” he asked.

Justin laughed. “We contacted the buyer, and they didn’t mind, since we’re more or less delivering it to Austin.”

“Really?”

He nodded. “A flight charter company here at Bergstrom, so when you’re done with it, it goes back with us to Kansas to hold it for the buyers until they’re ready for it, then it comes back here. The client already came out and saw it, but they don’t need it yet, so they’re letting you use it. Vil set it up.”

“That’s my sister, always finding some way to take advantage of a situation,” he laughed. “What’s the company?”

“It’s called AV Charters, it’s that little hangar up in the crossover, the one on the end on this side.”

Kit nodded, he’d passed by that hangar before, so he knew where Justin was talking about. “Why didn’t you park it up there?”

“Like I said, they’re not ready for it yet. I think they’re remodeling the hangar.”

“Oh.”

Kit hadn't forgotten his training at all. With Justin watching on, Kit finished preflight, started the engines, and taxied them out to take off on the short strip. He found himself behind a Cargomaster, and had to wait nearly a minute before he was cleared to take off. Justin just watched as they took off, and Kit took them quickly to 17,500 feet heading due east. They passed within two miles of a little Piper, keeping a very close eye on the small single prop private plane as they passed it by, then he angled more to the south, enjoying the freedom of flying a jet on VFR rules, zooming along at 306 knots and knowing he could get to 417 knots, the maximum cruise speed of a CJ3, which was nearly 475 miles an hour, if he went up into the stratosphere. The CJ3 was actually pretty large, the largest of the CJ series and the largest one that was single pilot certified, but it flew much like the Mustang they'd let him fly, light and responsive and easy to fly. The avionics certainly made it like that, since the Pro Line flight deck made the plane easy to manage for a single pilot. Kit and Justin discussed what he'd be doing for a cross country flight to Boston, and how he'd be letting the autopilot do most of the work.

“So, am I allowed out of the cockpit with the autopilot going when I'm the only pilot?” Kit grinned at Justin.

“For short and reasonable trips, yes,” he answered. “To the lavatory, to grab a snack, and so on. But no sleeping, no playing cards back in the cabin, and so on.”

Kit chuckled. “I'll be carrying so much weight, I'm may have to stop somewhere to refuel,” he noted as he adjusted the engines and prepared to turn around.

“I doubt that, this thing has a thousand pounds of payload at full fuel.”

“I think I might. We’ll be way over the payload at full fuel.”

“How many are you taking?”

“There’ll be ten of us, gonna fill this thing up,” he answered. “Between fuel, them, and their baggage, I expect we’ll be at around fifteen hundred pounds of payload, so I’ll have to fill my tanks just to max weight. I’ll be taking off at maximum weight.”

“Just remember that a max weight takeoff makes the controls a bit sluggish,” he warned. “You’re best off using as much runway as you can to get up to about ten knots over lift-off speed, that makes it a bit easier.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

“Hmm, that’ll be close,” Justin mused as he thought about it. “Boston is well within normal range at full fuel, but if you’re gonna be five hundred or so pounds of fuel down on takeoff, you’d really be pushing it to try to make it all the way to Boston on one leg. You’d have to get some help from prevailing winds.”

“That’s why I think I’ll plan for a fuel stop,” Kit said as they started a long, wide circle to turn around and go back to Bergstrom.

“Whatever you do, do not land at Tri-State Airport in Huntington, West Virginia,” Justin laughed.

“Why not?”

“It’s built on the top of a mountain, so the ends of the runway are like on cliffs,” he replied. “It’s the closest thing you’d ever come to landing on an aircraft carrier. It’s a nervous landing, especially at night.”

“It sounds like you speak from experience,” Kit chuckled.

“Guilty. I suggest Lexington Municipal Airport. Nice and roomy, and they use fueler trucks that come out to a staging area, since they get lots of refuelers landing there. You’ll be able to do a hot refuel and be on your way after like a half hour.”

“I’ll take your advice on that one.”

Kit landed softly and smoothly back on the short strip, and taxied the jet back to Signature, parking it right where it had been. After he shut down, he looked to Justin. “Well?”

“You’re already rated, don’t look at me,” he winked. “But would I feel comfortable letting you solo cross country? Without batting an eye,” he affirmed.

“That’s all I wanted to know.”

After he dropped Justin off at Hertz, Kit went on to the mall and bought Jessie’s birthday present. Jessie wasn’t big on jewelry, but he’d seen her eyeing an emerald and diamond heart pendant at Zale’s Jewelry in the mall, only $300, and he’d bought it using a piece of the money market funds he’d have to put back later. He also bought her a kitchen set for their new apartment, a whole new set of knives and other cooking implements like tenderizers and spoons, and a cast iron rack to hang over the island from which to hang pots, pans, and other utensils. The kitchen set and the rack he wouldn’t take with them, but he did take pictures of them to show her on her birthday so she knew what she got. But the necklace was going with them. He also bought a gold plated frame with Laura inscribed across the top, which would hold a picture of their baby when she was born. The most expensive thing he bought wasn’t the necklace, it was a complete $1500 set of Eagle Pro composite shaft golf clubs; three woods, nine irons, three wedges, and two putters, along with deluxe golf bag filled with golf accessories and a deluxe wheel caddy for when her pregnancy made carrying the golf bag too hard, since she had really become interested in golf over the last couple of weeks, she really liked the game. Eagle clubs were rather pricy, but were also considered some of the best clubs available, useful for every skill level. Kit had used Jessie's clothes and had snuck some measurements of her while she slept to send to the company so they could give her clubs that were right for her, since clubs sized for the golfer were critical to the golfer's game. He had also bought her a Remington 332 over-under 12 gauge shotgun she could use for skeet shooting, which put him back nearly $1,400, because it was specifically made for sport shooting, came with extra parts, and had a long reinforced barrel. He'd seen a few high-level competition skeet shotguns going for as much as $8,000, so $1,400 for a competition-grade shotgun seemed like a bargain compared to that. He was spending a whole lot on something she'd use only occasionally, but since Jessie had started shooting skeet again, he wanted her to have a good gun with which to do it, and she was worth it. Almost as an afterthought, he bought a second shotgun, a Remington 12 gauge Wingmaster pump action, which was $600 at a local gun store, to use as an emergency backup in case they had to have her regular one fixed, and also for a guest to use, so Jessie didn't have to share her shotgun with anyone else. Jessie hadn't just taken Sheila and Allison skeet shooting once, she'd taken them several times, so the idea of having a second shotgun available seemed like a good idea. The pump action was also viable for skeet shooting, with a long barrel and the proper choke, but from what he'd researched most serious skeet shooters didn't use pump action shotguns for sport shooting...but he couldn't afford a second over-under. When he asked John about pump-action skeet shotguns, he was told that many recreational skeet shooters did use them, and that it was a personal matter of choice. Some furs could pump the shotgun to reload just as easily as others moved their fingers to a second trigger or the shotgun's trigger switched over to the second barrel. They'd keep them in a locked gun cabinet he intended to buy, upstairs in their bedroom when they moved, which should keep it well away from Laura once she became ambulatory.

How a pump action shotgun could cost less than a much less complicated over-under shotgun just mystified him.

He'd considered buying her a Stairmaster, her favorite workout machine, but the community center was going to contain a small yet complete workout center, with stair machines, rowing machines, stationary bikes, treadmills, and two fixed weight stations in the workout room, with a room that could be used for dance lessons, martial arts lessons, or other activities.

In all, Kit spent over $4000 on Jessie, plus the extra $600 for the second shotgun which he didn't entirely consider a present for Jessie but he felt he didn't spend enough. She was his entire life, and he wanted to shower her with presents on her special day. But, he felt that she would like his presents. He bought her a piece of jewelry and gifts for her many hobbies, which would keep her busy and happy both before and after Laura was born. She'd golf until her pregnancy made it too hard, then move on to cooking or skeet shooting or flying.

After shopping, he called Eagle and had them next-day ship the clubs to John and Hannah's house, then called Hannah and warned her it was coming. "Golf clubs? Golf clubs, Kit?"

“She’s really gotten hooked on golf,” he chuckled. “Sheila’s been taking her to play. I have no doubt that she’ll go right back onto the course after she recovers from the pregnancy, the courses stay open here in Texas until December, then re-open in March. I think there’s one private course here that doesn’t close at all.”

“That’s really surprising. She doesn’t talk about golf.”

“That’s because Sheila kicks her butt,” Kit mused. “But when she goes out next time with her own clubs, Sheila’d better watch out.”

“I hope you got her something other than golf clubs.”

“Of course I did. I bought her a rack for pans we’ll use in our new apartment, a whole set of kitchen things for the new kitchen, I got her a gold frame with our baby’s name engraved on it, and I bought her a diamond and emerald heart pendant necklace. Oh, and I bought her a competition-grade shotgun for skeet shooting, since she’s been taking Sheila and Ally skeet shooting lately. Sheila was very annoyed,” he laughed. “She likes to lord it over Jessie a little bit in golf, but Jessie mops the floor with her in skeet shooting.”

“I would think so, since she used to go with her father,” Hannah said with a slightly smug tone.

Justin joined them for dinner, and he got to meet Danielle, Sheila and Allison, who had come over for dinner as well, a dinner that both Jessie and Sheila had cooked. They made lasagna italiano, steamed broccoli with cheese sauce, artichoke hearts, and homemade black bread. “So, you two are taking flying lessons as well, are you?” Justin asked, looking at the two vixens over the dinner table. “How far along are you?”

“We’ll do our test rides on July thirtieth,” Sheila answered.

“Do you like it?”

“I think it’s awesome,” Sheila grinned. “Me and Ally are gonna go in together on a Cessna four hundred! If we’re gonna fly a single engine, we decided to go for the best!”

“You could always borrow theirs,” he chuckled, pointing at Kit and Jessie.

“They’re stingy with it,” she complained.

“After you graduate and after I train you, I’ll let you fly my plane, but not a moment before,” Kit said adamantly. “My plane is a hell of a lot more complicated than the one seventy-two trainers you’re flying at AAIA. I’d like to keep my plane in one piece.”

“You think I’d crash?” she challenged.

“Not on purpose, but I think you’d say ‘watch this,’ and then I’d be visiting you in the hospital.”

Danielle burst into laughter, but sputtered to a stop as Sheila glared at her, which caused Allison and Jessie to burst into laughter. “What do you do, Justin?” Danielle asked.

“I’m a flight instructor for Cessna,” he answered. “When someone buys a jet, what I do is teach the owner or the pilot he hires how to fly the plane.”

“How much does something like that cost?”

“For a buyer, nothing. We train one pilot and one maintenance technician for the owner as part of the price of the jet. But if someone is buying the training, it depends on the training the pilot wants. Rating in a Mustang costs about seven thousand dollars. Rating in a CJ or an Encore is about six thousand. Rating in a Citation ten, our most popular jet, is about twelve thousand.”

“Wow, I didn’t realize it was so expensive to learn to fly,” she said in surprise.

“It can be,” Justin said, to which just about everyone else at the table nodded. “How much is your private costing you, Sheila?”

“Eight thousand,” she answered. “But that includes everything.”

“I’ll be going for my air transport license at the end of the year, and after all is said and done, I figure I’ll have spent about a hundred thousand on flight training to get there,” Kit told her.

“That sounds about right,” Justin nodded. “But if you want to learn to fly, Danielle, talk to him,” he said, pointing at Kit. “He got his flight instructor’s permit while he was training with us in Kansas, so he can train pilots himself. I’m sure he’d probably be much cheaper than learning from the school where Sheila’s going.”

“Yeah, we’re still a bit ticked over that,” Sheila grinned at him. “We both think you owe us a little, like helping us get our instrument ratings. It’s annoying as hell not being able to fly because a single little cloud is sitting over the airport.”

“I’ll help you, Sheila. But it’s still gonna cost ya,” he winked.

“Bastard.”

“I’m a Vulpan,” he said simply, which made everyone burst into laughter.

Friday morning, Kit leaned over and kissed Jessie on the ear while she slept, putting a paw on her belly and feeling a little faint wriggling down there. Little Laura had become a lot more active over the last week or so, and it wasn’t unusual to feel her kicking or moving as Jessie’s belly continued to expand and thicken. Her “thin” clothes didn’t fit her anymore, and she had started wearing maternity-style clothes, pants with elastic waistbands and loose fitting shirts and blouses. In the last couple of weeks, her baby bump had developed into full-blown, blatant pregnancy. Furs who looked at her could tell she was pregnant now, not just a touch chubby around the middle, and that subtle change had done much for her mood. Jessie was shy, but she was a beautiful femme and she knew it, and she had her own share of vanity. She liked being thin, she liked being pretty, and it had stung her ego to think that others thought she was fat. But now, they didn’t think she was fat, they could tell she was obviously pregnant, and that was like a dark cloud had been lifted off her shoulders.

She hummed lightly in her throat and opened her beautiful blue eyes, looking up at him a little fuzzily at first, but then he saw her eyes sharpen and a smile bloom as she looked up at him. “Morning, my handsome fox,” she said in a near whisper.

“Good morning, my pretty kitty,” he returned, kissing her lingeringly on the lips, ignoring the fact that both of them had morning breath. “Happy almost birthday.”

She giggled and wrapped her arms around his shoulders. “My almost birthday, hmm?” she asked with a smile. “And what present do I get for my almost birthday?”

“You get to go to the kitchen and make me breakfast while I lounge around in bed,” he said with a teasing smile.

She laughed. “Oh really? And what kind of present is that?”

“Well, you’ll be happy knowing that you’re making the most important male in your life happy,” he said flippantly, brushing her hair back away from her face. “And after I smell breakfast cooking and it rousts me out of bed and into the dining room, I’ll get to sit at the table and watch your sexy little butt wiggle back and forth while you’re cooking the bacon.”

She laughed again. “Let’s not even go there,” she told him with an amused twinkle in her eyes. “I do not want you to have those kinds of thoughts of me while I’m cooking. I’ll never be able to so much as boil water ever again!”

“You’re too late, I have those kinds of thoughts about you all the time, no matter what you’re doing,” he told her, then he leaned down and kissed her lingeringly. “I’m having those kinds of thoughts right now,” he informed her.

“Well, I think we might have to do something about that,” she giggled, tightening her grip on him and pulling him down into her embrace.

After he finally let her escape from bed, they took turns showering, and Kit cooked breakfast. They were going to head to the airport around one, since everyone had already been told that they had to be over at the complex at 10:00, where they would park their cars and pile into Kit’s Pathfinder and Martha's van to get to the airport. Everyone already knew that they needed to eat before they got to the complex, and that dinner was already planned for them in Boston before they went to the concert, as well as a couple of hours to sightsee in Boston. Kit asked them to try to limit their luggage, reminding them this was only a weekend trip and they didn't need to bring their entire wardrobes, but he did warn everyone that it was best to bring shoes to Boston if they wanted to sightsee in the time between dinner and the concert, that in some places in Boston one had to have shoes to get in; that was how they discriminated against tourists.

Since they'd decided to have a little married fun before getting up, they found that it was nearly time to go after they cooked breakfast. Kit packed Jessie's gifts in the Pathfinder in a box as she got their suitcase and attaché ready, and Lupe hurried over to his car as he was putting the box in the back. "Hey brah, I'm ready to go!" he said, holding up a small suitcase. "Two changes of clothes and Jessie's gift!"

"Bring shoes?"

"In the suitcase," he nodded. "Brah, thanks again for this trip! You know how long it's been since I took a vacation?"

"We're happy to take you, Lupe," he smiled. "You're one of our closest friends, you deserve something for all that loyalty," he winked.

Lupe laughed. "So, I finally get to see the big mansion where you grew up!"

"Only from the outside," he said. "You'll be staying in the guest houses on the grounds. I wouldn't let you stay in the house itself, there's too much danger of a confrontation with my uncle. He lives there."

“Ah, yeah, the nefarious Uncle Zach.”

“That’s him,” he nodded as he packed Lupe’s suitcase in his truck, then closed the back gate. “To prevent bloodshed, I’d rather keep us and him separate. I won’t even be staying there. I, I just can’t stay there,” he said, shivering. “Way too many bad memories. I’ll be pushing it just staying a night in Boston. Jessie’s gonna have to cuddle up to me like a giant teddy bear to keep me calm enough to sleep.”

“Well, I think you should be alright for one day. We ain’t goin’ nowhere we’ll run into your family, will we?”

“Nah, we’re just gonna run around the harbor and take the walking tour, and Jessie wants to show everyone the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, where we went to have our second ceremony to honor my mom’s wishes.”

Rick and Martha pulled up in the spot beside Kit’s truck in Martha’s van, and he saw that Danielle was already with them, having picked her up from the sorority before coming over. Right behind her was Allison in her junk Camry, the car she drove when she didn’t want furs to know she had money, who went down and parked in a visitor’s spot, then piled out of her car with a small suitcase and a garment bag which held a dress. “What are you bringing a dress for, Ally?” Danielle asked. “They told me to wear jeans and a tee.”

“I’m going to go to a Broadway show with Terry after Jessie’s party, so I have to take something nice for it.”

“Oh. Well, you gotta tell us what it was like when you get home!” she said brightly.

“I’m taking a camera, I’ll see if I can’t get a couple of good pictures,” she said as she put the suitcase and garment bag in the back of Martha’s van.

“Where’s Sheila?”

“I haven’t seen her yet, but she should be along in a minute,” Kit answered as Jessie came out with a camera bag and hurried over to the cars. “Did you bring shoes, guys?”

“I remembered,” Danielle nodded.

“We have ours in our suitcase,” Rick added.

Sheila rushed up with her own suitcase as Lupe went to go get a bag holding snacks they could eat along the way. “Sorry guys, I was making us some lunch we can eat on the plane!” she said. “Lupe! Go to my pad and get the Tupperware dish on my coffee table!” she shouted.

“Sure thing, baby! Want me to lock up for ya?”

“Go ahead!” she answered.

“It’s so weird thinking about flying in a private plane,” Danielle laughed. “We’re bringing our own food to eat!”

“If Sheila cooked it, it probably won’t be much better than airline food,” Kit mused, which earned him a swat from both Jessie and Martha, who had been teaching her to cook.

“Denigrating her cooking is denigrating mine!” Martha warned. “Now, do you want to say that again?”

“Not while I’m in paw’s reach of you, Martha,” he told the great dane seriously, which made her laugh. “Where the heck are Kevin and Sam?”

“Right there,” Sheila said, pointing as Kevin pulled up in a hurry on the other side of Kit’s truck.

“Sorry guys, there was a wreck on the interstate!” he said as he and Sam piled out of his Altima. Kevin got their suitcases as Sam brought out a plastic bag holding drinks.

“Did you remember shoes?” Kit asked as he put their suitcases in Martha’s van.

“Sure did, in our suitcases,” Kevin answered, and Sam nodded in agreement.

Jessie set the alarm and locked their apartment while Lupe returned with the lunch Sheila made, then he went back and locked up his own apartment and threw a set of keys to Dan, who had come out to see them off. “Bring back a Red Sox pennant, guys!” he called as they pulled out of the parking area, waving to him and Mickey as they headed out. Kit and Jessie were carrying Lupe and Sheila, while Rick and Martha were carrying Danielle, Allison, Kevin, and Sam. They quickly drove to the airport, and Kit led Martha between the hangars and out onto the flight line, pulling up by the jet that Vil had arranged for them. He used the keys Justin had left for him to open the cargo doors, then used the keyless remote to unlock the hatch and open it. “Stay out of the cockpit!” he warned all of them as he helped Lupe and Rick load their luggage in the plane, making sure it was balanced, as the femmes and Kevin climbed the stairs and disappeared inside. After they got the luggage loaded and secured, he locked up the cargo door and ushered Lupe into the jet, and he and Rick parked their cars in Signature’s long term lot. When they got back, Kit sent Rick into the jet, and he did the walk-around, making sure the flight control surfaces weren’t jammed, nothing was leaking, the tires were in good condition, and everything looked to be in proper order. He then climbed up into the jet himself, but didn't close the hatch, he only raised the stairs to get them off the tarmac so he could get their weight and know how much fuel to load. He saw that there had to have been a fight of some kind over the seats, for Martha and Allison were in the first row, which faced backwards, and Sheila and Danielle were in the next row. Kevin and Sam were in the next row, leaving Lupe and Rick to sit in the very back. Jessie was stowing their food and drinks in the refreshment center by the hatch. "What's next, Kit?" Allison asked, looking over the seat at him.

"I have to weigh us and then figure out how much fuel to take on," he said.

"How do you do that?" Danielle asked.

"The plane weighs itself," he told her. "It has a scale in the landing gear, part of a system called weight on wheels. The plane knows how much weight it's carrying."

"That's pretty clever," she nodded.

"Planes are full of very clever things," Kit chuckled as he squeezed past Jessie and climbed into the left seat.

The calculations didn't take long. He took the plane's resting weight, which included the fuel that was already in the tanks, and pulled out the jet's cheat sheet to calculate how much fuel he could take on without exceeding maximum weight. Once he had his fuel figures, he used the radio to call it in to Signature. In a matter of minutes, a fuel truck rumbled up to the jet. It took them about twenty minutes to load the fuel he wanted, balancing it in the tanks, then he went back out and paid for it using the Transport card that Vil had given him. The fuel furs pulled the chocks for him, and also helped him pull up the stairs. He closed and sealed the hatch, then climbed back into the cockpit. After making sure the fuel truck was well away from the jet, he started preflight. “Everyone get ready, we’ll be heading out in just a minute,” he shouted as Jessie climbed into the copilot’s seat and strapped in, but kept his paws well away from the controls. She instead watched him intently. She knew she could rate to fly the jet herself, she had all the necessary ratings to qualify, so she had an earnest interest in watching what he was doing. He started the engines, explaining it to Jessie in a low voice, then put on his headset and called the tower for permission to taxi out onto ramp for takeoff. They sent him to the long runway for some reason, but that didn’t bother him. He taxied out behind a Boeing 767, keeping his distance, and then an Airbus pulled up behind them, pulling out from the main terminal. “We’ve got airliners sandwiching us, I hate that,” he grunted. “Airline pilots like to ride your ass in their big jets,” he complained as the taxi ramp turned, and he glanced out his side window to see where the Airbus was. “I always worry that they’re gonna lose sight of me and run me over.”

“Does that happen often?” Danielle asked from the cabin.

“It never has to my knowledge, but I still can’t help feeling like I might be the first in history,” he answered, which made her laugh.

After the 767 pulled onto the runway, Kit answered traffic control and heard other traffic, including a plane which had declared a flight emergency getting ready to land, then nodded. “No wonder they put us over here, there’s a flight emergency over on the short strips,” he told Jessie.

“Yeah, I heard it,” she nodded, tapping her headset.

“Still can’t get over that, my wife the pilot who understands ATC jargon now,” he winked at her.

“You bet, handsome fox,” she smiled in reply.

“Cessna Tango one one one seven, requesting takeoff clearance three six,” he called after the 767 pulled into the air and Kit replaced it at the end of the runway.

“Cessna Tango one one one seven, cleared for takeoff runway three six, follow flight plan VFR,” the male controller answered, which Kit had put on the speaker so everyone could hear what was going on.

“Roger, flight plan VFR,” Kit answered, acknowledging that he would be under VFR rules until he got above 18,000 and then enter his filed flight plan. They usually warned of that if they’d be near commercial traffic.

“Alright, here we go guys!” Kit shouted, spooling up the engines.

They were in the air and climbing quickly, and he saw why they were warning him. “Look at that airliner to our right,” he called over the intercom. Everyone piled over on that side, those on the left getting out of their seats, and Jessie took video of it from her side of the cockpit. “That’s an Airbus,” Kit added as they passed within about two miles of the jet as it maneuvered to land, preparing to circle the airport to land. Kit saw why they had him wait on the runway, that was so the airliner could get out of the way as he climbed. “Pretty cool, eh?” he called. “You’d never see one this close in an airliner.”

“Is it legal to be this close?” Lupe shouted.

“Yeah it is, Lupe,” Kit answered. “I’m a good ways from him and moving in a different direction. He knows I’m here, and he can see that I’m flying away from him, not towards him.”

The Airbus quickly dwindled off in the distance, since it was flying away from them, and Kit monitored the pressurization of the jet as they climbed up and over 12,000 feet. He ensured that the jet was properly pressurized, then explained to Jessie what he was doing as the jet ascended up into flight plan airspace. He called into traffic control, then double-checked their input flight plan into the navigation system. With that flight plan, the autopilot could take over and keep them right on course and schedule. He optimized the autopilot so it would focus more on maintaining speed than fuel efficiency, since they had more than enough fuel to reach Lexington, then he let it take over once they were up at a cruising altitude of 40,000 feet. "Alright, we're level now," he called to the others.

It was two hours of easy flying to Lexington, which Kit spent letting the plane fly on autopilot as he taught just about everyone in the plane just how a jet plane worked, and what most of the controls did. He let them sit in the cockpit as well, usurping Jessie and letting them sit in the right chair in turns. He didn't make them sit down as they descended and landed at Bluegrass Airport, since Lupe, Sheila, Allison, and Danielle wanted to see what it looked like to land from the cockpit. Kit just had them brace themselves as they soared in over Lexington, then landed easily. A FBO there did indeed offer quick turnaround fueling in a little staging area near their hangar, so Kit negotiated with them over the radio as he taxied along a ramp approaching them, using a graphic of the airport on the center screen that even showed his location, and pointed out the location of the FBO to him. He pulled into the stretch of tarmac and parked, and a fueller truck rolled up to them after he shut down the engines. Being the solo pilot, he wasn't about to idle the engines without him behind the controls. He pulled out his cheat chart and calculated how much fuel he needed, then radioed that out to the fueler. “Everyone stay on the jet, we’re out of here as soon as the fuel’s loaded,” he told them as he opened the hatch.

He oversaw the loading of the fuel, chatting amiably with one of the crew, then paid for it using the Transport card that Vil gave him. “We can put this on file if you want, so you don’t have to get out of the jet next time,” the crewman offered as he gave the card back to Kit.

“No thanks,” he said mildly. If it was his card where he’d see the statement every month and could catch any fraudulent charges, he would probably allow it, but he wasn’t taking chances with Vil’s gift.

“Alright, we’re on the way,” Kit called as he sealed the hatch. “Next stop, Boston!”

“Vil wants to know when we’re getting there,” Jessie asked, putting her paw over her cell phone, looking over at him as he climbed into his seat and strapped in.

“Tell her about two hours,” he answered as he began a hot-start of the engines, at least after ensuring the fuel truck and all the crew were well away from the jet. “We’ll be taking off from Lexington any minute.”

“She wants to know why we landed, she said they said the plane could reach Boston non-stop.”

“If we weren’t flying with eight passengers and all their luggage, yeah, we would’ve easily,” he chuckled. “But we’re carrying an awful lot of extra weight. We might have even made it to Boston on one leg, but I didn’t want to push it, it was too close to our range on the fuel we had. Boston was right on the edge of my maximum range without violating reserves, and pilots always err on the side of caution. One headwind or unforeseen problem, and we'd have come up short. It only cost us about forty minutes to land and refuel, that's not bad. I'll take a planned forty minute layover over an unplanned layover in New York or Connecticut because air traffic control put me in a holding pattern."

Jessie summarized that to "He said that we have so much extra weight that it made getting to Boston on one tank of gas too risky to try."

"Well put," Kit chuckled as he settled his headset over his ears. After he had the jet ready to go, he bartered with the tower for taxi clearance as Rick, Kevin, and Sam crowded into the narrow doorway to the cabin, Sam with a video camera. Kit pulled out in front of a Beech King and taxied down to the end of the runway, letting Jessie explain everything because Kit was too busy to give a narrative. Jessie did a very good job, then had them brace themselves as Kit pulled out onto the runway, powered up, then executed a smooth takeoff. "Two hours to Boston, guys!" he called. "Tower, Cessna Tango one one one seven, course seven seven, roger," he acknowledged when the controller had him change course to avoid incoming traffic not yet visible to him, adjusting his course.

He went back and ate lunch with Jessie, and embarrassed her half to death when he brazenly pulled up her shirt to show off her pregnant belly to Rick, Lupe, and Kevin. "That's my daughter in there," he said with a smile, caressing her expanding tummy. "My little Laura."

"Buster, you're making sure it's your last child!" Jessie warned, smacking him on the shoulder and pulling her shirt back down, her cheeks ruffled.

"Jessie, no, if you kill him we have no one to land the plane!" Lupe laughed.

“I can land us, I saw him fly the simulator enough,” she growled as he snatched one of the sandwiches Sheila made and retreated quickly back towards the cockpit, laughing.

“Yeah, I’m just surrounded by pilots here,” Lupe chuckled as Kit got back in his seat. “Kit and Jessie fly, and the two vixen babes are learnin’! I should learn too, just to fit in with the crowd!”

“I couldn’t fly this,” Allison protested.

“Yet,” Jessie corrected her. “It’s not so hard to fly a jet, I think, there’s just lots more controls.”

“Next time we need to get a jet where I can stand up straight,” Rick chuckled.

“Sometimes it pays to be short, brah,” Lupe laughed.

It took them about 95 minutes to get to Boston from Lexington, and Kit had to pay attention, because he was landing a small jet at Logan International Airport, which usually wouldn’t even be allowed under most circumstances. Logan was a huge international airport that looked at general aviation as dirt under their claws, since it was a huge commercial airport that served airliners. The airport had a spiderweb of six runways, and Kit spent a goodly amount of time studying a chart of the airport he clipped to his yoke, so he’d know exactly where he was going when they finally told him where he was landing. But, landing didn’t come quickly, for Kit was put in a holding pattern because of a flight delay, which made him feel quite justified in landing to refuel, or he’d be declaring a flight emergency and pissing off a whole lot of furs, and probably get his tail hauled in by the FAA for a review. Finally, though, they gave him permission to land on runway 4L, which would at least make it easy for him to get to Signature

FBO, which was where Vil said she'd arranged to park the jet overnight. He touched down right on the stripes, almost in the intersection of runway 9R, then hit the brakes and thrust reversers to slow down enough to get off the runway immediately, as ordered by the controller. He pulled off and turned onto a parallel taxiway, moving slowly behind a Air France 767 as it ambled along towards the terminal. They made their way slowly yet surely to the very corner of the airport, where Signature had their hangar and terminal. A signalfur guided him in, parking him at an open-air spot right by the terminal, and then workers ran out and chocked the wheels after he shut down the engines. "We're here!" he called, taking off his headset. "Sheila, go find Vil, and you guys unpack our stuff while I do postflight!"

When three limousines pulled up onto the flight line, he figured that Vil knew they were there. He finished up postflight and secured the controls, then came down the stairs to see Vil hugging Jessie, and all the others gathered around her. Kendall was with her, as was Muffy and Terry, and much to Kit's shock and surprise, Aunt Sarah and Uncle Brian were with them. It was clear that Sarah had come to see Sheila, for the two were sharing a surprisingly loving embrace. Brian was shaking paws with Kevin. Seeing his elders there tempered his enthusiasm quite a bit, and he saw that he wasn't the only one. Allison stood just outside the group with Terry, and the two of them were talking without touching. Kit noticed Brian giving Allison a long, appraising look...which wasn't a surprise, since Allison was a drop-dead stunner of a vixen, and she was wearing a pair of half shirts that were layered and a pair of shorts, which showed off her perfect figure. Kit came up to them almost reluctantly as workers emptied their cargo hold, and hugged Vil while keeping his eyes bored on Brian and Sarah, his expression making it abundantly clear he did not want them there.

“I’m here to see my daughter, not you, Kit,” Sarah told him simply. “God help me, but I’ve actually missed her since she moved to Texas.”

“Mom!” Sheila protested.

“Muffy was coming to see you, so I decided to tag along,” Brian shrugged. “How have you been, Kit?”

“Good enough,” he said as Jessie hugged Muffy, then his cousin embraced him warmly.

“Hey you, how you been?” Muffy asked.

“It’s been fine, cousin,” he told her, patting her on the back.

“Just pack the suitcases anywhere, we’ll sort them out at Stonebrook!” Vil barked to the workers, who were trying to figure out which suitcase went in which limousine. “We’re going to go see Clancy first, bro, then go on to the city. Would you please reconsider and stay at Stonebrook tonight?” she asked, almost pleadingly. “You can stay in a guest cottage, bro, you don’t have to stay in the main house. Clancy wants to you stay there, just once.”

“No, Vil,” he said sternly. “The only reason I’ll even go there now is because Clancy is there.”

“I think you’re being a tad immature, Kit,” Sarah told him. “Lucas has been dead for over a year. I doubt his ghost is haunting the manor. You should be in the family estate, not hide in Chelmsford with your sister,” she sniffed.

“Then call me immature, Sarah,” he said, a bit coldly. “You forget, I have this to remind me of how wonderful my life in Boston was,” he said, pointing at his missing ear.

She fell silent. She knew that she had no defense against that argument.

“Let’s not start a family war right here on the tarmac,” Vil said briskly. “Let’s get going. Everyone just pick a limo, they’re all going to the same place!”

Kit made sure that Brian and Sarah were in some other limo before picking one...or more to the point, getting pulled into Vil’s limo. Kit and Jessie shared the limo with Vil, Allison, Kendall, and Terry, as Sheila went to sit with her mother. “Wot, Kit, I didn’t realize things were quite that tense in your family,” Kendall said. “Villy told me that you and your family were at odds, but that was more than just at odds.”

“I hate my family, Ken,” he said honestly. “Outside of Vil, basically anyone older than me in the family can go to hell. I’ll never forgive them for what they did to me.”

“Yet you’re friends with Sheila.”

“Sheila was too young to understand what was going on when it happened. That’s why I don’t necessarily blame my younger cousins, and I’ll associate with them. But my elders did know what was going on, and since they did nothing, I’ll never forgive them.”

“One of our few points of contention, I’m afraid,” Vil sighed. “I think he’s being entirely too stubborn. He can take his pound of flesh out of the elders, then forgive them and move on without having much to do with them. That would go a long way to settling things down in the family.”

“How would you feel if the family left you for dead, Vil?” he asked hotly. “It was bad enough laying in that hospital bed, but to do it alone, with only Suzy—“ He cut himself off when Jessie put her paw on his arm and gave him a compassionate look. “I would have forgiven them for abandoning me if they’d just come when I was in the hospital, but they did nothing. And because of that, they will never get a kind word from me.”

“Well, then perhaps your family should just stop trying,” Kendall said. “And forgive me, dear lady, for not giving you a more proper greeting,” he said, kissing Allison’s paw rakishly, clearly trying to lighten the mood by irritating both Vil and Terry. “Kendall Brighton, at your service.”

“Allison Gallagher,” she returned, giving Terry a light smile in return of his slightly jealous look.

“So, you’re going out with Terry?”

“This is our first date,” she answered. “We met when he came down to see Kit. He had to convince me I should bother with a two thousand mile relationship.”

Kendall laughed. “I know the feeling, milady, I live in London and my girlfriend lives in Boston. Yet I jump across the pond at least once a week to see Villy.”

“I will make you stop calling me that,” Vil growled.

“So, you may have a long-distance relationship, but ours is international.”

“Once a week? How do you afford it?”

He laughed. “I’m a Brighton, Allison. My old male is all but drooling over the idea of the Brightons and the Vulpans marrying, so he ferries me over on his private jet just to make sure I have plenty of opportunities to woo Villy into marriage.”

“You’re awfully brave to say that out loud,” Allison smiled.

“Nothing but the truth, Miss Allison,” he said with an outrageous smile. “But I’m rather taken with Vil despite my old male pushing me at her. I know it, she knows it, but it seems that we actually like each other.”

“There!” Vil said. “See that, Ken? You can call me by my proper name when you want to!”

“But I like calling you Villy,” he grinned. “I like seeing your hackles up. They’re such cute hackles.”

“They’re usually the last thing a fur sees before I have them gutted,” she warned, which made Allison giggle.

“Then I’ll just have to be careful,” he winked.

“I don’t think annoying your girlfriend is going to make her amenable to your marriage proposal there, Ken,” Jessie smiled at him.

“If a male wants a femme like Vilenne Vulpan, he can’t play by the rules,” he said immediately and with utter honesty. “If I knuckle under to her, she won’t respect me. If I walk on eggshells around her, she’ll think I’m being fake. If I try to assert authority, she’ll bristle, because she’s used to being in charge. So, all I can do is approach her as an equal, and equals aren’t afraid to tease each other,” he said, blowing a kiss at Vil. “So, how did you meet Terry, Allison?” he asked curiously.

Terry and Allison took turns describing how they met, and how Terry had pursued Allison despite her misgivings, which she made vague, hinting that it was the distance between them that put her off. “But he wore me down,” she said with a smile, touching Terry’s arm.

“It was worth the effort,” Terry returned, patting her knee.

“If it wouldn’t earn me the eternal hatred of two femmes in this limo, I’d say that you’re very, very beautiful, Allison,” Kendall told her, which earned him a hot glare from Vil.

“Watch it, male, I can have you replaced from my stable of suitors,” Vil warned, which made Kit laugh.

“But if they were anywhere near half as interesting and intellectually stimulating as me, I’d have been replaced already,” he said flippantly.

“He has such a high opinion of himself,” Jessie mused to Vil with a slight smile. “You need to do something about that.”

“Oh, there’s a reckoning coming, believe you me,” she warned. “I’ll knock that British superiority right out of him.”

“But I won’t let you until after we’re married,” he winked. “Until then, I’m a lump of clay your fingers are twitching to mold, but aren’t allowed to touch. Part of my irresistible charm, you know,” he said with a nod to Terry, which made just about everyone, even Vil, laugh.

Kendall amused them for the rest of the ride, at least until they turned onto Stonebrook Road. Kit fell silent and watched as they went through the huge gates of Stonebrook Manor, feeling that familiar sensation of fear and anger rise up in him as they went down a driveway road he knew so well. It had been late winter last time he was here, but now it was the middle of summer, and the gardens and lawns were bursting with vibrant color, the centerpiece being the Vulpan crest laid out in flowers in front of the grand entry, where the front drive circled around the grand front entrance, which was rarely if ever used. The limo went around to the garage, and instead of pulling into the drive-through garage, she instead had them stop in the large paved courtyard beside it. “Alright, let’s sort all this out!” she shouted as a horde of servants hurried out. “Bring up a cart for each guest house, Stanley, and load luggage accordingly,” she ordered the chief butler, who was Clancy’s son, a tall, thin, stately-looking fox that was about 45. Stanley’s son, Bartholomew, was attending him, the next generation to serve at Stonebrook. “Rick and Martha in the pool house, Lupe in the boat cottage, Allison in the garden cottage, Danielle in the autumn cottage, and Kevin and Sam in the gazebo house.”

“What of you, Master Kit? Are you staying with us tonight?” Stanley asked hopefully.

“Afraid not, Stanley,” he said, shaking his head. “I’ll be staying in Chelmsford tonight, with Vil.”

“Ah. Well, we keep your room ready for you, Master Kit, for whenever you do finally decide to come home.”

“Each guest house has a phone,” Vil called as they started milling around. “You have to dial nine to get an outside line, and if you dial zero, you get the main house. The staff will bring what you need out to the guest houses, so if you need towels or you want something to eat, just ring the house. We have two pools on the grounds, an outdoor pool and an indoor pool. The indoor pool is part of a gym, feel free to use it. We also have a tennis court and basketball court outside, and a racquetball court in the gym. The golf carts are yours to use while you’re here, but if you wreck it, you buy it,” she warned. “So no drag racing or hot rodding on Stonebrook carts! If you get lost, remember this: uphill always leads back to the main house!

The grounds are fenced, so you can't possibly end up off the grounds unless you climb the wall or go through a gate. Servants will lead you to your guest houses. Go settle in and rest a while, and be back here at the main house in two hours! Two hours, then we go have dinner and sightsee Boston before the concert!"

Stanley pulled out his cell phone, which had a push to talk feature, and he used that to summon more servants and also to have the garage bring around more carts. Kit left them to their preparations to enter the garage, and, with Jessie holding his paw, they traced the familiar path leading to Clancy's door.

Clancy allowed them in after the first knock, and they found him sitting at his chair, sipping a cup of tea. He had a quilt tucked in around his legs, and he looked much better than he had in March when they came to see him. His fur was glossier and thicker, and his eyes had lost that listless quality, though he was still quite thin. "Ah, Kit, Jessica," he said with a bright smile, and they hugged him in his chair. "I'm so glad to see you, my boy. How was your flight up?"

"Kit flew us, Clancy!" Jessie said, giving him a bright smile as they sat down on the sofa facing Clancy's chair. "Vil rented a jet for us, and Kit flew it!"

"She told me she would. Did you enjoy it, my boy?"

"I loved it," he laughed. "I finally got to use all that training Vil paid for."

"It's a sad state when a Vulpan has to rent something," he sighed, which made Kit laugh. "Now, I see that Miss Jessica is starting to look quite radiant. Have you any new pictures of the baby for me?"

“Not yet, I’m not scheduled for another ultrasound for two weeks,” Jessie laughed. “But we would like you to come down and see Laura when she’s born, if you feel up to it.”

“I’m feeling quite chipper nowadays, my dear,” he smiled. “It took me quite a while to recover from that flu, but I have recovered. Instead of catching up in this room, I’d prefer a walk through the garden. You truly must see our garden when it’s in bloom, Jessica.”

That was what they did. Clancy walked with his cane as they strolled through the large and well-maintained garden on the far side of the house. The garden was one of the physical reminders of his mother, Beth Vulpan, who had a love of flowers and had expanded the size of the garden and had also built a small greenhouse where she could grow flowers year round. Clancy could name every single flower, and gave Jessie quite the lesson in botany and gardening. “I used to tend these very flowers beside your mother, Kit,” he mused. “She introduced me to gardening as a hobby, which I pursued with enthusiasm until arthritis made it too hard to kneel down.”

“We named our baby after her,” Jessie said. “Laura Beth Vulpan.”

“It would have been more proper to name her Elizabeth, since that was her name, but she did prefer to be called Beth,” Clancy chuckled. “And she would be quite pleased to know that you thought so much of her, Jessica, even though you never knew her.”

“I’ve heard Kit talk about her enough to feel like I could have been her friend,” she said.

Clancy chuckled. “Ah, if only it were so, my dear, but no, she would not have befriended you quite so easily, my dear.” He picked a small violet flower from a bush. “Elizabeth was a wonderful femme, Jessica. She was kind, caring, loving, and strong. But, like so many in her social class, she was not the perfection that Kit recalls. She would not have approved of your marriage, my dear,” he said honestly. “She was a purist.” He saw Kit’s sudden frown, but brushed him aside. “I know it can sometimes be hard to hear the truth about someone whom we loved more than life itself, someone whom we only have memories. Time apart after they pass tends to make the blemishes fade, and leave nothing but that picture of perfection we build in our minds. But it is good for you to know the truth of Kit’s mother, my dear. I think that as a femme, she would have found you a delight and a wonderful, kind, caring young cat, much like herself. But in some things, Beth could be as blind as Lucas. She would have approved of you being Kit’s friend, but not his wife. Sometimes it’s best to remember the faults as well as the strengths, for that lets us love our friends and family who have passed on without putting them on a pedestal they would probably not entirely like to occupy.

“The truth, my boy, is that your mother would have forced you to marry within your class, as she and your father did, as all Vulpans do except for you. But that does not mean that we must love her less. I cannot come out into this garden without a thousand wonderful memories of Beth filling me so much I smile,” he mused, smelling the little purple flower, then giving it to Jessie. “But now, I’m sure she sees how truly happy you are, and she smiles down upon you from above. Beth was many things, but what defined her more than anything else was the fact that she was a mother. She would be happy for you so long as you are happy, even if she disapproves of the choices you made.”

“Why do I get the feeling I should be looking for a moral here?” Kit asked.

Clancy chuckled. “Just a little advice, from a grandfather to an expectant father. Your daughter will not be the perfection you think she will be, my boy. She will try your patience. You may even want to strangle her. But you will always love her, despite her attempts to drive you insane.”

“Oh, I’ll love her, Clancy, there’s no doubt about that. I couldn’t do anything but love something that’s a part of my Jessie.”

“Just remember that when you catch her drawing on the walls,” he said, which made Kit laugh.

They walked along and talked of less important things, hearing about Clancy’s newest hobby. Clancy was an amazingly well educated fox, endlessly curious, and as such his hobbies changed quite often. He had studied archaeology as a hobby, and genealogy, and was still an avid student of history...which was one reason why Kit had taken history as a major after the accident, since Clancy had taught him so much about it as a child. But his illness had brought about a need for sedentary activity, and he’d become quite curious about blogs and the dissemination of information on the internet. Clancy, being quite ready to embrace technology rather than be anachronistic like most furs his age, was already exploring the many blogs and teaching himself about blog culture and society. He had even started his own blog, about Massachusetts politics...and he certainly knew about everything there was to know about that, since he was a lifelong employee of the Vulpans.

Few 73 year olds could boast both a Mac desktop and a Macbook sitting on his desk.

As Jessie and Clancy walked, Kit stopped to look at one of his favorite features of the garden, a small bronze fountain of a vixen pouring a jug, from which water flowed over rocks at her feet and into the fountain pool below. He wondered why Clancy decided to bring that up, to bring up his mother in that way. Maybe he was just being honest, and didn't want Kit to forget the reality rather than his memory of his mother. But he'd only been nine when she died, and such things would have never really mattered to him. His mother had never really talked to him about when he'd get married, what he remembered of her were things like her sitting on the edge of his bed, reading him stories, her holding his paw as they walked, her gentle voice, sitting in her lap and smelling the perfume from the soap she used in her fur, and her glorious smile....

He blinked. Clancy was right. All he had of his mother was a construction, an image of the perfect mother. But she was from an aristocratic New York family, the Stocktons, who had made their money in the newspaper business. She had been born into the ranks of the idle rich, and her marriage to his father had been arranged at first. But his mother and father had come to love each other deeply, to where the fact that they had been matched had vanished in the mists. His mother had never hired a nanny like many other Vulpans did, too busy for their own children, she had been devoted to Vil and Kit. He guessed that was why it was so devastating when she died, because it had been so sudden. He still remembered her funeral, almost unbelieving that she was dead, thinking she would open her eyes and sit up and laugh at any moment, at least until they lowered the casket into the grave. That was when he knew, and he remembered that his father and Uncle Jake had to grab hold of him, then Clancy had to all but drag him away to keep him from trying to stop them from putting his mommy in the ground.

That was so long ago. A lifetime ago. That had been the beginning, where it all began. His marriage to Jessie and everything that led up to it could be traced back to that one moment, for that was the moment that the father he had always known had also died, and left him an orphan in his soul.

A paw on his shoulder made him blink, and he saw Jessie, looking at him in concern. She always seemed to know what he was feeling, for she gave him a gentle, compassionate hug. He buried his muzzle in her hair, held her close, felt her belly press up against him, reminding him of the new life growing inside her, and he felt her paws slide down and under his shirt, then come to rest on the scars on his lower back, the place to which they always seemed to be attracted. Just her presence seemed to banish the dark memories and remind him of the good that had come into his life after all that struggling...and he would gladly struggle through it again, even longer, if Jessie would be the reward waiting for him at the end of the gauntlet. “Are you alright, my handsome fox?” she asked quietly.

“Just too many bad memories,” he replied. “But you always chase them away.”

“For the rest of my life,” she whispered. “I’ll always be your guardian angel.”

“I love you, Jessica Desdemona Vulpan.”

“And I love you, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan.” She kissed him on the muzzle. “Now let’s go, Clancy wants to walk us to the reflecting pool.”

They spent the entire two hours with Clancy and then walked him back to his apartment, but when they tried to urge him to come with them, to spend the evening with them, he declined. “I’m much more content to stay here, my boy,” he told them calmly. “I’m just a bit too old to roam all over Boston and then go to the concert. So go on and enjoy your evening.”

“I wish you’d change your mind,” Kit said, giving Clancy a warm hug.

“I’m quite sure, my boy. Now go enjoy your evening, and I will see you tomorrow. Vil has agreed to ferry me to Cincinnati so I can attend the party.”

“She’d better have, I asked for you to be there,” Jessie told him, kissing him on the cheek.

He almost seemed embarrassed, patting her on the forearm. “Get on your way, before I start trying to steal you from young Kit,” he said, which made both Kit and Jessie laugh.

They hurried back down the familiar halls, heading for the garage, when he turned a corner and found himself almost face to face with his uncle Zach. Kit almost had his heart freeze in his chest when Zach and his wife, an effete bitch named Alicia, were moving through the hall that led from the garage. Kit almost instinctively put an arm out to stop Jessie, then backed both of them up, giving Zach a cold stare. He didn’t say a word, but he did get out of Zach’s way. Zach kept eye contact with him the entire time, and a muscle under his white ruff on his muzzle twitched, betraying his almost overwhelming desire to say something.

It turned out, though, that Alicia was not quite as reserved as Zach. “You have some nerve bringing her into Stonebrook,” she said snobbily, pointing at Jessie. “I’m sure your father is rolling in his grave! Or is that why you did it, just to spit on the memory of your father?”

“Alicia,” Zach said warningly, but Jessie had drawn herself up in righteous indignation, and Kit saw there was no stopping her now.

“What right do I have? What right do you have!” Jessie snapped hotly. “This isn’t even your house! You just live here to make life miserable for Vil!”

“We are the real heads of the family!” Alicia shouted. “Lucas should have never put his daughter in the chair, but no, he couldn’t let go of his pride as the family head, even for what’s best for the family!”

“So, you’re feeling betrayed and use that as an excuse for being childish, no wonder!” Jessie shouted back.

“Childish? This family has gone to the cats since Vil took control!” she said shrilly. “A Vulpan marrying outside the species, Sheila leaving Harvard to be some, some line cook, Terry dating some commoner Texas tramp, and Vil sitting back and letting it happen! It’s a scandal! And it’s all your fault, Luke! You’re destroying the Vulpan name!”

“DO NOT CALL ME BY HIS NAME!” Kit thundered, which made Alicia start and retreat back behind her husband. “He is no part of me! You ask if I’m spitting on his grave? I am, every day, every day until I die! I hated that bastard for what he did to me!”

“He obviously didn’t do enough! It’s too bad that car didn’t kill you, Lucas Vulpan!” she snapped. “Because you’re an utter failure as a Vulpan! We should never have allowed you back into the family! It’s just a damn shame Cybil’s assassin was incompetent!”

Kit only just barely managed to grab hold of Jessie, and that was a damn good thing, else Alicia would have lost some pieces of her face.

Jessie's claws were unsheathed and she snarled at Alicia, showing off her impressive little fangs. She struggled against Kit as she tried to claw out Alicia's eyes, and Zach wisely backed his wife away from her, getting between them. "You arrogant bitch!" Jessie spat at her. "Wishing for someone to die just to save your reputation? You're even worse than Cybil!"

"Jessie! Jessie, stop!" Kit said, trying to avoid grabbing her around her stomach. "Just leave it be!"

Jessie growled, laying her ears back, but then she blew out her breath in a short snort and stopped fighting him, letting him pull her back so he was between her and Alicia.

"I won't leave it be!" Alicia spat in reply. "Leeching off the family, pretending to want nothing to do with our money but stealing it from us whenever you can! You certainly didn't waste any time forcing your sister to give you Vulpan stocks, so you can leech from your father's hard work! What else have you taken from our family, hypocrite? Or are you simply content to leech from Vilenne?"

"Alicia!" Zach barked.

"But—"

"No, Alicia! Just leave it alone!"

"You'd better listen to him, Aunt Alicia. Haven't you read the agreement between me and your husband? If I return to Stonebrook and take up residence, you and your family have to leave, and you cannot come back. If you don't, then you violate the contract, and you surrender everything you gained from my father's death. That means basically everything. What Zach is warning you about is I have power over you. Just remember that this is mine and Vil's house, we allow you to live here, and I can evict you like any other landlord! So keep talking, bitch," Kit growled, glaring at her. "Just give me a reason to move back home. I dare you."

She looked like she'd bitten off her tongue, she made such a hot and angry face.

"So remember that the next time you want to insult my wife or wish I were dead," he said with a cold glare. "Because I'll move back into Stonebrook and force you out if for no other reason than to spite you. I'm still Vulpan enough to devote my life to ruining yours, Alicia, the same way Vil is crushing Cybil as we speak. The children of Beth and Luke Vulpan share the same ruthlessness when you piss us off. Remember that."

"You don't scare me, Luke," Alicia spat. "You're too much of a coward to return to Boston."

"You go too far, Alicia," Zach said in a commanding voice. "You can accuse Kit of many things, but not cowardice. Now go," he ordered, pointing down the hall. Alicia gave them a cold stare, then turned and marched down the hall, towards the east wing, her tail straight behind her and her nose in the air. "I'm...sorry about that," Zach said reluctantly. "Alicia should not have said those things."

"Don't apologize for her saying what you believe," Kit told him coldly. "Just make sure we never cross paths again. If I come to Stonebrook to see Clancy, just stay the hell away from me. Because if you don't, if I ever see yours or Alicia's face in Stonebrook again, I will move back and force you out, just because you violated your word when you said that we would never have to deal with each other again."

Zach gave him an imperious look, and looked on the verge of saying something. He finally nodded, reluctantly, and hurried after his wife.

“What a stuck-up bitch,” Jessie growled, which made Kit put his paw on her shoulder.

“Just let it go, love,” Kit told her.

“I’m not sure I want to,” she said vindictively. “She said she wishes you were dead!”

“That’s the sentiment of most of my family, Jessie. Don’t let Sheila, Terry, and Muffy fool you. You’ll notice that none of my other cousins will have anything to do with me.”

“That’s not the point!” she declared. “I don’t care how much you don’t like someone, you just don’t say something like that!”

“I ignore them, love,” he said as they started for the garage. “They’re just hateful because I’m happy and they’re not.”

She was silent a moment. “Promise me one thing.”

“What?”

“That you carry out your threat,” she said in a strong voice. “If your uncle Zach or that horrible femme he married ever give us another unkind word, we force them out.”

“That’s a promise,” he said immediately.

They met Vil and about half the others out on the paved courtyard, where Lupe was driving his little golf cart in circles around Danielle and Allison. Rick and Martha, who had the closest guest house, had walked up, and Kevin and Sam were visible driving up along one of the paved paths leading away from the house. “Brah, this place is incredible!” Lupe said to him with a huge grin. “The house they put me in by the boat dock has three bedrooms in it!”

“I think the smallest of the guest houses is the autumn cottage,” Kit told him as Lupe stopped the cart. “It’s a four room cottage, perfect for a single fur staying a few days.”

“Why are there so many guest houses on this estate, Kit?” Allison asked.

“Because the Vulpans are a very large family, and our father didn’t really like guests in the main house to stay longer than overnight,” Vil answered for him. “So he had a series of guest houses built on the estate grounds to accommodate family or other visitors, spread out so each house feels like it’s alone, to give a sense of space. There are eight of them out there. The three we’re not using are the river cottage, the gate house, and the brook cottage.”

“That house I’m in is bigger than my house in Austin,” Allison chuckled.

They again divided up into limos for their trip into Boston, and Kit and Jessie found themselves again with Vil and Kendall, but now with Rick and Martha. Kit and Jessie related their brush with Zach and his wife outside the garage, which made Vil scowl darkly when Jessie told her what Alicia had said. “I think I might want to step on that bitch a little bit,” she growled.

“I already made Kit promise that the next time they insult us, we’re moving to Boston,” Jessie declared. “We have to introduce Laura to the family, after all,” she said with a slight smile.

Vil laughed. "I'll make a Vulpan out of you yet, Jessie," she told her.

"God, I hope not," Kit sighed.

They spent most of the afternoon leading up to the concert showing the Texans the city of Boston. Vil had lived in Boston all her life, and she had a surprising knowledge of the city that someone that rode in a limo all the time. She started at the back bay, and worked her way inland, starting at Copley Square and the huge public library. They visited the museum for the Boston Tea Party, then saw Ben Franklin's birthplace, then visited the church garden, then moved on to the Cathedral of the Holy Cross. They went to the state capitol, and Vil used her clout to get them inside to tour the state houses, then they went down to the Governor's mansion and got a tour while the Governor was at the harbor, preparing for the concert. She took them to Fenway Park, to Louisburg Square, and then they went to the U.S.S. Constitution. She pointed to one of the Vulpan Shipyard facilities, just down the coast, a smaller facility that served mainly as a repair facility for destroyers and minesweepers. When Lupe professed an interest, she took them there, scaring the life out of the security guards that were keeping watch over the facility that was closed for the holiday. Vil gave them a tour of the repair facility, with its three drydocks, two of which were occupied by the destroyers U.S.S. Ingraham and U.S.S. Taylor. "They're in for repainting and inspection," she explained. "We built that one, but San Pedro built that one," she added, pointing at the Ingraham.

"You mean Vulpan Shipyards doesn't build all the Navy ships?" Lupe laughed.

"About two thirds of them, we do," she said with pride. "And now that I've bought out Avondale, it's closer to three quarters."

“Don’t they get on you for anti-trust?” Lupe asked.

“Anti-trust laws don’t apply to awarded contracts,” Kevin answered. “Because it’s a competition. If Vulpan Shipyards can beat all other competitors for the contract, then they get it.”

“Right. As long as we can build ships better and cheaper than our competitors, we will win the contracts. Most of the contracts we don’t get are for ones like that ship over there, where the Navy wants a certain number built by a certain date. We can only build so many at a time because we have all those other contracts, so other shipbuilders get those contracts. But I’ll bet you a million dollars that that ship there will be decommissioned long before our ship,” she proclaimed. “Vulpan-built ships are better than anyone else’s, because we know what we’re doing, and we don’t settle for anything less than perfection. I wouldn’t let that ship out of our shipyard unless it meets our quality standards, which are much higher than the Navy’s. Add that to our established cost-efficient system and Vulpan Steel, which cuts the cost of materials compared to our competitors, and that adds up to letting us build the ships cheaper than our competitors too. That’s why we consistently beat out all our competition for new contracts. Other companies just can’t build them as well as we can, or as cheaply as we can, and the Navy knows it. We have an unparalleled track record.”

“She’s so modest,” Lupe teased.

“I’m never modest about our family business, Lupe,” she answered with a smile. “Because I’m proud of it, and I’m proud to run it. You just ask any Navy officer which company he wants to build the ship he’s sailing into battle. I’ll guarantee you, they’ll want to be in a Vulpan ship every time.”

After the tour of the drydock facility, they went to the harbor. Vil had gotten them a private box for the concert, in an area populated by the rich and elite of Massachusetts; the Vulpans, the Reeves, the Vances, the Kennedys from Cape Cod, the O'Malleys from Worcester, the Jenkins of which Suzy was part, the Bristols, and the Astors, the last segment of that famous old family. Kit didn't recognize anyone in their stand except for a couple of his cousins, Victor and Bridgette Bristol Vulpan, with her husband Paul Bristol, eight year old son Tyler and her six year old daughter Theresa. Sheila's uncle Gordon Vance was also there that Kit could recognize. Bridgette and Victor, Kit noticed, kept their distance from them. They settled in as the audio system piped random music in for the audience, Kit sitting with Jessie on one side and Vil on the other, doing his best to ignore the occasional camera flash in their direction, as reporters and photographers took pictures of the VIPs that had come to the concert.

“Man, I feel like I'm courtside at a Spurs game,” Lupe said, looking around.

“This will be better than basketball, Lupe,” Vil chuckled. “Now sit.”

It was much better than basketball. The concert lasted nearly 90 minutes, and as per tradition, the final piece of the night, Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture, was choreographed with fireworks. The concert was the high point of the year for the Boston Pops, and they worked very hard to always make it the best part of all the festivities that took place on Independence Day. Lupe and Danielle seemed absolutely spellbound by the fireworks, and Jessie was elbowing him and pointing with every new explosion as he tried to watch the musicians. But the performance was definitely worth flying all the way up to Boston and braving the demons of his past to see it, because it made Jessie very happy, it made his friends happy, and it made Vil happy that he'd come back to Boston. He could face those bad memories if it gave those he cared about good ones.

After the finale, there was a brief silence, then a thunderous round of applause that lasted nearly five minutes. "Now that's how you have a concert," Vil chuckled as she stood up. "Let's get back to the limos before the traffic gets too heavy."

The limos were all parked nearby, more than just theirs, waiting for the VIPs to arrive. Vil got them all into the limos quickly, and they were on their way. Kit and Jessie were again with Vil, Kendall, Rick, and Martha. "My, that was definitely worth the flight up," Martha mused. "What time are we leaving tomorrow?"

"I'd like to be in the air by ten," Kit answered. "Terry and Ally have tickets to a Broadway show, and I'd like to give everyone some time before we head to the hotels. We do have all the reservations set?"

"Silly questions," Vil chuckled. "Yes, I have everything set up. You and Jessie are staying at her parents' house, and everyone else is in the Cincinnatian. I'll be heading back tonight, and Terry has chartered a private jet to fly him and Allison from Cincinnati to New York. They should get there just in time to get to their show."

They returned to Stonebrook, and Kit could only be thankful that it was dark, for it gave him this strange feeling that he was invisible to the house, to the ghosts inside that haunted him. The limos all pulled around back, and Kit waited in the limo as Vil got out to help everyone get back to their guest houses. Jessie stayed with him, holding his paw and patting it lightly. She was such a godsend, always seeming to know when he was upset and there to chase the bad memories away. "I was hoping that bitch would come out and yell at you some more,” she noted absently as she looked around outside, at their friends getting into golf carts. “So we could do something about her. I’d love to see the police pushing her out the front gates with her trying to carry her thirty suitcases full of clothes.”

Kit laughed helplessly.

Vil and Kendall rode with them in the limo as they went to Vil’s house in Chelmsford. Chelmsford was a suburb of Boston, and it was nearly a forty minute drive to reach it from Stonebrook. Boston’s suburbs were massive; the 495 outer loop around Boston was somewhere around 80 miles, and the loop was nearly 20 miles from the city. It was on 495 that they traveled once they got away from the city, avoiding I-90 both because it was a toll road and because it was always crowded. The limo driver knew every back road and street in Boston, and he guided them through a maze of secondary roads that actually got them to 495 faster than if they’d taken the interstate. After they got on the outer loop, it was a 20 minute drive to the Chelmsford exit, and another ten minutes to reach Vil’s house. It was a new house, built back away from a winding road so the trees hid it from view, with a stout iron gate manned by a lone security guard. The guard opened the gate as they approached and waved them in, and her house came into view as they cleared the blocking trees. Vil’s house was not a “house,” it was a mansion. Much smaller than Stonebrook, but still a mansion, with three stories and two small wings off the main house. Kit had never been to this house, for she had had it built especially for her about two years ago, finalizing the plans just before leaving for England and coming home to find it built and waiting for her. It was a “new old” style, looking like it was a hundred years old but was made with all the modern conveniences and with a very modern floorplan. It had no grand entrance hall like most mansions did, no wings, no ballrooms. She didn't really need them, for that was what Stonebrook was for. Her house, which she called Hart's Crossing because of the many deer that roamed in the area, was truly a house, designed for her to live inside. They entered through a door in the back, where her enclosed and attached garage was located, with a huge hangar-like garage opposite the house, which Kit knew held the classic and antique car collection that their father had left to her.

The garage was large enough for three limousines to sit side by side, a similar two-door circle design as Stonebrook where a limo or car entered through one door and left the other. A single servant met them in the garage, a tall, thin raccoon with black hair who opened the door for them as they got out. "Evening, Will," Vil greeted as she got out of the car first, and Stav and Marcus got out from the front.

"Evening, madam. Dinner will be ready in twenty minutes. Was the concert as good as it looked on television?"

"Oh yes, it was quite good," she nodded. "Will, this is my brother Kit, and his wife Jessie," she introduced. "Guys, this is Will Marks, my butler and head of staff here at Hart's Crossing."

"Hi, it's nice to meet you," Jessie said, offering her paw to him.

"A pleasure, madam. Madam Vil speaks very highly of you both," he said with shake of Jessie's paw. "We have your room ready for you, and your room as well, Master Kendall," he said to Kendall as he got out of the limo.

"I do hope she didn't put me in that closet."

“No, sir, she put you in the attic this time,” Will told him in a deadpan voice that made Jessie giggle uncontrollably.

“This time?”

“He fell asleep on the couch last time he came here, I had them put him in a guest room,” Vil shrugged as she swept past the raccoon. “Let me show you my house.”

Vil’s house inside was a reflection of the woman, for she had designed it and decorated it. The layout of the house was very practical, dominated not by large, grand-looking rooms filled with ornate or extravagant furniture, but by medium-sized rooms that each served specific functions. Some rooms were clearly for show, filled with works of art laid out for display, or pristine rooms filled with antique furniture that was for formal occasions, but those rooms were divided off into the north side of the house. The south side of the house was filled with rooms clearly meant for living, a spacious living room decorated in rich golds and browns, a large kitchen that was staffed by two cooks but looked more like the kitchen out of a large middle-class house, an exercise room, a billiards room, a home gym, a conservatory where Vil could practice playing the violin, which she learned while in England, and was still learning. She had a room for each of her hobbies, for she was an avid billiards player, she liked to run and worked out religiously to keep her slim figure, she was learning to play the violin, and enjoyed swimming, which was why there was a full-size indoor pool beside the garage, enclosed in glass. The room where she spent the most time, however, was her personal office, which looked like something out of a stock broker’s dream. She had a large desk with five computer monitors arrayed around it, two on the desk and three mounted on the wall behind it, and her office was complete with a couch, TV, and her game consoles, her Wii and X-Box 360. Vil played video games to relieve stress, and she enjoyed computer simulation games like Civilization and SimCity, games that allowed her to use her ability to organize and manage resources to produce results. She used to play tactical war simulation games like Warcraft, but she mastered them too quickly for them to truly challenge her. Kit would guarantee that one of those monitors on her desk would have a game of Civilization IV running on it when she was home and using her office.

The small wings of the mansion were, again, part of Vil's way of thinking. The east wing was where her 12 servants lived, and the west wing was a "guest wing" that had everything it needed to be its own house, even its own entrance and kitchen. It was part of her need to separate herself from "outside," even considering her own servants to be outsiders. They cleaned her house, cooked her food, washed her clothes, kept her life ordered and running smoothly, but they lived in their own wing, separated from her and her sense of personal space. And the guest wing was a similar thing, allowing a guest in her house, but walling that guest off in a wing of the house, creating a line between her and her guest. It was the guest wing where Vil brought Kit and Jessie after the tour and showed them around. "You'll be staying here tonight," she told them. "I'll stick Ken in a guest room in the main house. A small one with no bed," she said, giving him a light smile.

"Two words for you, Villy. Holiday Inn."

"Any time you want to leave, duckling," she replied. "Now let's go eat, I'm starving."

God bless Vil, because she didn't try to wow them with fancy food. A hamburger awaited Kit at the dinner table, and she'd had salmon steaks grilled for everyone else. Vil wasn't big on pomp and circumstance in private, which was another way she was different from most other Vulpans. Their dinner was intimate and relaxing, a good end to what had been both a trying, emotionally exhausting and a fun day. Vil seemed to sense that Kit was drained, so she sent him and Jessie off to bed. Kit took a long, relaxing shower, and Jessie jumped in right after him after he got out, sitting in a full body dryer next to it as she showered, and they talked about the day. "Just don't let your uncle and that horrible femme taint the day, my handsome fox," she said from the shower. "It was a good day outside of that."

"It was, but I don't think I'm looking forward to going back to Stonebrook in the morning," he answered. "I'll be glad to get out of Boston. I'll probably be rousting them all out of bed at the crack of dawn."

Jessie turned off the water and stepped out of the shower, dripping wet and looking like a drowned rat, but still beautiful to him. Her belly looked just a tiny bit bigger than it did a couple of days ago, not quite distended but obviously pregnant. But to him, she couldn't be any more beautiful. He stood up and left the dryer and took his towel in his paws, then started drying her off...maybe a little more slowly than he would himself, enjoying putting his paws on her. She glanced slyly up at him as he scrubbed the water from her back and shoulders, letting him dry her off, and letting him touch her. She giggled when he wrapped her up from behind and pressed her against his front, leaning her head against his neck and shoulder. "I'm getting you wet again," she pointed out.

"I can dry off," he answered, putting his paw on her expanding belly. "God, I love you, my pretty kitty," he breathed in her ear.

She reached up and behind her head, putting her paw on the side of his head, patting him gently. "And I love you, my handsome fox. What did you get me for my birthday, hmm?”

He laughed. “Mean kitty, trying to trick it out of me in a tender moment. I should punish you the way you punish me!”

“You wouldn’t dare hit a girl, my handsome fox,” she giggled, then she squeaked in surprise when he swatted her on the rump, right beside her soaked tail.

“You were saying?” he asked.

She laughed and grabbed hold of his paw, and marched towards the dryer, pulling him along with her. “Let’s dry off, love,” she ordered. “So we can go to bed.”

“We do have to get up early tomorrow.”

“Who said we’re going to sleep?” she asked archly.

She laughed when he started pushing her towards the dryer.

Vil just never seemed to sleep.

When Kit came out of the guest wing at 6:00am and came down into her kitchen, she was sitting at the small kitchen bay table in the corner, a cup of tea in front of her along with a plate of scones and bagels, wearing a simple white tee shirt. Kendall was sitting across from her wrapped in a terrycloth robe, a cup of coffee in his paw, and he looked not entirely awake. A possum femme and a young cat male, wearing gray uniforms, were busy at the stove and counter, cooking breakfast. “Morning,” Kit sounded. “Where’s the tea?”

“Over there,” Vil said, pointing to a small warmer on a counter holding a teapot. “Brewed and waiting. Where’s Jessie?”

“Still asleep, but she’ll be up in a few,” he answered. “She doesn’t sleep long once I get up. I think she misses me,” he chuckled.

“Of course I miss you, silly,” she said from behind him, padding into the kitchen. “Thank you for the card, love, it was so sweet of you,” she announced, coming up and giving him a hug.

“Happy birthday, pretty kitty,” he told her.

“Thank you, my handsome fox. He left a card on his pillow. He’s so romantic,” she cooed, nuzzling him.

“Only for you, love. I think if I was romantic with Danielle or Allison, you’d stripe me.”

“You bet I would,” she said with a giggle, and she sat down at the table as he went to the tea kettle. “Pour me some tea please?”

“Of course, pretty kitty,” he nodded, picking up one of the overturned teacups by the kettle before one of the chefs could do it for him. Kit swatted her paws away when she reached for the kettle and poured the tea himself, which made her chuckle softly.

“What would you like for breakfast, Master Kit?” she asked.

“Fried eggs over medium, bacon, toast, enough for two, if you please,” he answered as he poured another cup of tea.

“Happy birthday, Jessie,” Vil said, taking a small card from the table by her and giving it to her.”

“Thanks Vil,” she said with a smile, taking the card and opening it.

“Happy birthday, Jessie. I’ll give you your card at your party. Don’t want to ruin the surprise,” he said with a grin.

“Thanks, Ken. All this attention, I’m feeling a little self-conscious here,” she laughed, then she read the pink card with a frilly rose on the front. “Aww, you’re so sweet, Vil!” she gushed. He brought the two cups of tea over to the table and set Jessie’s in front of her. She gave him an appreciative smile and took a sip, still holding the card in her other paw.

“Mmm,” she hummed. “This is good!”

“We don’t drink mass produced tea in this house. Jing Sari, straight from India,” she told them.

“You’re too malely for me, Jessie,” Kendall quipped. “No milk, no sugar?”

“He started me on this, and he drinks it straight,” she said, pointing at Kit when he sat beside her. “I really like this tea, handsome fox.”

“It’s a little out of our price range, love,” Kit chuckled. “It’s about two hundred dollars a box. It comes out to about ten dollars a pot of tea.”

“And worth every penny,” Vil stated. “I’ll send a few boxes home with you for your birthday, Jessie.”

“Aww, thanks, Vil,” Jessie smiled.

Vil’s cooks were good. There wasn’t much to making fried eggs and bacon, but they got the eggs perfect, and even asked how crisp each fur at the table wanted their bacon. They even had the choice of white, wheat, rye, or black bread toast. Kendall seemed to wake up and get back to his usual chipper self after finishing his cup of tea, and was bantering lightly with Vil as Jessie finished her toast. “So, how are we all getting to Cincinnati?” he asked.

“Half with Kit, half with me,” Vil answered. “Kit has a bunch of luggage to tote in his plane, so I’ll probably fill every seat in my plane and let him carry the rest.”

“I wonder what it’s like to fly it yourself rather than hire a pilot,” Kendall mused.

“Just watch your pilot next time you fly home, you’ll get an idea of what it takes,” Kit told him. “I enjoy it, so for me it’s not work.”

“And he got me into it,” Jessie laughed. “And Sheila, and our friend Ally.”

“Yes, Villy told me, flew your plane home yourself,” Kendall smiled. “How did you survive the stress?” he asked Kit curiously, which earned him a smack from Vil.

“I played games,” Kit chuckled. “I trust my pretty kitty behind the controls with my very life, Ken. She’s a good pilot.”

“Can you fly jets, Jessie?”

“Not yet, but that’s next,” she answered. “I have all the ratings I need to be rated to fly a jet. After Laura’s born, when Kit goes back to get his ATP, I could try to get a rating.”

“You need your commercial first,” Kit reminded her. “That’s more important than a jet rating.”

“I think I need this explained to me,” he chuckled.

They did just that over breakfast and continuing after they were dressed and ready to go. Vil called Stonebrook and told the staff to wake up the guests and get them ready to go as Kit and Jessie finished the explanation. “Ah, I see,” he finally said as they pulled out onto 495. “So, you could fly a jet without this commercial license, but without it, you’re limited as to what you can do with a jet.”

“More or less,” Kit nodded. “A jet rating without a commercial is what a rich private pilot would have, someone who has something like an Eclipse or a Mustang, a VLJ, a personal jet. But pretty kitty would be much better off with her commercial. That way, in case something truly drastic happened, she’d always be able to find work as a commercial pilot. I want her to get her flight instructor’s rating too, all of them,” he said, smiling at her. “She can always find work as an instructor.”

“Well, I don’t know if I need that,” Jessie giggled.

“Sure you do, you can legally teach Sheila and Ally.”

“Oh. Ohhh, I could!” she said with a sudden enthusiastic nod. “And keep them from bugging you!” she laughed.

“That did cross my mind,” he smiled lightly.

Thankfully for Kit, the visit to Stonebrook was brief. He tensed up the second they passed through the front gates, and Jessie kept hold of his paw to keep him at least partially relaxed. He did not, however, get out of the limo. Vil and Kendall did, however, meeting his friends and watching as the Stonebrook staff loaded luggage and gifts into the limos. Allison, Rick, and Martha got into the limo with them, and all three of them looked a little sleepy.

“Sorry to drag you out of bed,” Kit chuckled. “Sleep well?”

“Too well,” Allison complained, rubbing her eyes and then yawning widely, showing off her vulpine teeth. Like Kit, she had impressive canine fangs and the next couple rows of teeth behind them were sharply ridged, made to pierce and cut meat apart like scissors, but the rest of her teeth were omnivoric teeth, not truly carnivore. Her front teeth and back molars were perfect for eating plants and grains. “I think I’m going to nap on the plane.”

“There’ll be time, it’ll be about two hours to Cincinnati. I guess I could nap too and let Jessie fly us,” Kit teased.

“No you won’t, buster,” Jessie replied with a light jab in the ribs.

“Oh, happy birthday Jessie,” Rick told her. “Did you get any presents yet?”

“Thanks, Rick,” she smiled. “And I already have the best present ever right here,” she added, patting her expanding belly with a gentle paw.

Logan was packed, but then again, it usually was. Vil acted like a general when they got there, ordering everyone around as his friends and family milled around and workers collected up their luggage. And they weren’t the only ones here. Another limo pulled up, and Sheila, Terry, and Muffy piled out of it. Muffy screamed “birthday girl!” and ran up to embrace Jessie as Kit watched a curiously chaste greeting between Terry and Allison. He almost put his paws on her shoulders but then caught himself, looking Vil’s way, and she stood there and just looked up at him, her paws folded before herself demurely. So, they started walking together, side by side, Terry with his paws behind his back and Allison with her paws before her.

Since Vil's jet was also going to Cincinnati, and it was much bigger than the rented jet, Kit only ended up with five passengers; Allison, Terry, Danielle, Sheila, and Lupe. Rick, Martha, Sam, and Kevin went along with Vil on her jet, along with Muffy. Kit had everyone settle in as the workers finished loading the luggage and while he did the preflight inspection, then he used the cheat chart to figure out his maximum fuel load as Jessie locked the hatch. "It's about two hours to Cincinnati guys, so take a nap, or grab breakfast from the galley," Jessie told them. "Vil had them put in some donuts, coffee, and tea."

"I need some coffee," Danielle yawned. "It's not even seven!"

"Get it quick, we'll be taking off soon," Kit told her, then he radioed in his fuel request, and read the note left on his yoke about which airport to use and which FBO to call when he got to Cincinnati. Vil had even had his flight plan filed for him...always thorough, that sister of his.

They were in the air about thirty minutes later, a good fifteen minutes ahead of Vil, and after he got them level, he went back and got a second cup of tea from the galley. "Jess love, can you call and warn your folks we're on our way please?" he asked as he took a sip of the tea.

"Sure thing," she answered.

The plane handled like a dream for the flight to Cincinnati, and he touched them down around 9:45 at the city's main airport, where Vil wanted him to land. He should have figured that Vil would have organized things, for it wasn't John and Hannah that met them at the airport, it was a quartet of limos. Workers rushed out as soon as he shut down the engines, chocking the wheels and opening the cargo door. Terry opened the hatch after Jessie explained how to do it, and Kit did postflight as the workers unloaded the plane. Vil's jet landed about ten minutes after them, catching up to them in the air, and it taxied up and parked beside the CJ3. The others filed out of her Bombardier as workers unloaded several boxes from the plane, boxes that were rather suspicious in nature.

“Alright, troops, let's get moving!” Vil barked. “Terry and Ally have to be in New York in seven hours, we don't have all day!”

Under Vil's militaristic commands, they were on the move within twenty minutes, and at John and Hannah's within forty. They met them at the driveway, Jessie's entire immediate family, John shaking his paw as Hannah gave her daughter a warm embrace. “We have everything all ready,” she promised as Kit shook Ben's paw and gave Jenny a warm hug. “A birthday cookout, since this is too many to have in the house.”

Jessie gasped. “Aunt Penny!” she squealed, and rushed towards the house as the plump cat came down the stairs.

“There's my little mother to be!” Penny called, wrapping the taller cat in a great hug. “Happy birthday, sweetie!”

“You came for my birthday?” she gasped.

“Sure did!” she laughed, kissing her on the cheek. “Me, Jim, and Grandma Pearl came up from Florida. Surprise!”

“This is better than a present!” she said excitedly as the plump cat pulled her into the house. Hannah had tried to get more of the Williams to come, but none could manage it given the short warning. Jim, Penny, and Pearl were the only ones who made it.

Much like Kit's birthday had been held out in the courtyard, Jessie's birthday party, which started immediately on their arrival, took place in the backyard of the Williams house. It was a chance for Jim, Penny, and Pearl to get to know the Vulpan family, as Hannah put out a feast of home fried chicken, potato salad, corn on the cob, and vegetables. Kit could only smile as he watched Jessie, saw how happy she was to be surrounded by friends and family. Jessie was a very social femme, shy in public but very kind and gentle and loving in a more intimate setting. She was radiant, she bloomed like a sunflower basking in the glow of family, laughing and smiling, firmly the center of attention without ever seeming to understand it, even though it was her birthday. But it being her birthday wasn't why she was the center of attention. It was her. She was so sweet, so wonderful, everyone wanted to be around her.

And he had the absolute gift to be married to her. What did he do to deserve such a wonderful femme? Whatever it was, he hoped he kept on doing it. Jessie was his very life. Without her...what would life be? He hadn't lived before he met her, he'd just, just existed. She had shown him what life really was, she had pulled him out of the purgatory that had been his existence before he met her.

He was the luckiest male on earth.

After two hours of food, conversation, and fun, the cake was brought out. Everyone sang to her, which made her cheeks all but stand on end, and she laughed as she tried to blow out the candles because Jenny touched a feather to her nose just as she took in her breath. Hannah had actually baked two cakes so there was enough for everyone, angel food cake with coconut icing, one of Jessie's favorites.

After the cake, came the presents. Kit was actually dreading this a little bit, because there was no telling what his rich family was going to give her. They knew better than to do anything outrageous with him, but they also knew that his one weakness was Jessie, and he would not deny her anything she wanted. Vil could truly go crazy by giving gifts to Jessie instead of him, and he wouldn't gainsay it. He wouldn't be entirely happy that Vil was trying to buy his wife, but if it made her happy, then that was that.

But it wasn't as bad as he feared it would be. Jessie's family bought her quite a few things for her, and Kit was glad that they didn't buy her baby things. Those could be given during the shower, and though Jessie would love gifts given for the baby, this was her day. Her family and friends gave her new clothes for both her maternity and for after she had the baby, a new Ipod, Sheila bought her several real and gag gifts, the most striking of which was a bomber jacket with a P-40 fighter on the back and a handsome, muscular male tiger stripped to the waist and wearing aviator's sunglasses with the caption Flying Tigers, Ben gave her one of his new Ohio State jerseys, an official player jersey right out of his locker, with his number 32 and name, Jenny bought her a book on advanced knitting and a couple of gag gifts and a book titled 101 Things To Do When You Can't See Your Feet which earned her a smack from her sister, Terry bought her a new cookbook dealing with Cajun recipes and a large wrought iron antique spice rack filled with Cajun spices for her kitchen, which accounted for most of the volume of the boxes he'd seen unloaded from Vil's plane, Jim and Penny bought her a very handsome mantle clock, and her grandmother Pearl had bought her a little model plane of a Cessna 400 they could sit on a stand in their house. But then she picked up Vil's first present, a small glove-sized box, and opened it. Inside was what looked like a credit card, but Kit saw that it was actually a gift card, much like the ones she'd given the Williams family.

“Kit said you don’t have the furniture to fill your new apartment,” Vil told her. “That card has five thousand dollars on it for you to furnish your new place, because I know you’re a little tight with money right now. Just make sure you do a good job,” she smiled.

“Thank you, Vil!” she said happily, hugging the smaller vixen. “I know just what to get!”

Vil wasn’t done yet, and that did annoy Kit just a little bit. Her next gift was also a small box, and when she opened it, inside was a key...to a car. “A mother can’t drive around in a Corolla,” she winked. “I bought you a nice Ford Windstar van, just like your mother’s. That way you never have to worry about having enough room for your baby.”

Jessie gasped. “Vil, this is too much!”

“You won’t say that the first time you have to take the baby out and you don’t have Kit’s truck,” she said seriously. “Believe me, hon, a mother needs lots of room to carry what she needs for the baby. Where are you going to put your stroller and your bag holding extra diapers and bottles in that car of yours, Jessie?”

“Actually, she’s right,” Hannah chuckled in agreement. “You’d have a lot of trouble putting your baby things in that little car of yours, Jessica.”

“I dare you to tell me she doesn’t need it,” Vil said to him as she sat back down.

Kit sighed, then chuckled ruefully. “I guess I didn’t think of that,” he admitted. “Alright, she needs it.”

Kit did feel a bit of vindication that Jessie seemed as enthusiastic about his gifts as she was about the van. She was a bit surprised when she unwrapped the shotgun first, looking at Kit and laughing. “Are you trying to tell me something, love?” she asked.

Kit grinned. “I’m telling you you’ll whip Sheila even worse in skeet shooting when you’re using your own shotgun,” he answered.

“Hey, I’ll just use it too!” Sheila warned.

“You will not, this is mine!” Jessie countered.

“Then see if I let you use my clubs again!”

“You always do best with your own weapon,” John said in agreement. “May I?” he asked. Jessie handed it to him, and he inspected it. “Very nice, Kit, you know your weapons!”

“I’m a researcher, John,” Kit laughed. “I knew nothing about shotguns until I wanted to buy one for Jessie. I spent nearly three days picking that shotgun for her.”

“Remington three thirty-two, twenty-eight inch barrel, and I see it comes with all the chokes she’ll need. This model is good because she can swap out the barrels if she wants to use a different gauge. Well researched, Kit,” John agreed. “Jessie dear, remember to buy a gun cabinet with that gift card. Make it a good one, with sturdy doors and a solid lock.”

“I will, Dad,” she nodded.

“You get a trigger lock for it, Kit?”

“Yessir, it’s in the box,” he answered.

“Good male. Never leave a weapon unsecured.”

“Oh, Sheila, about Jessie using her clubs,” Kit said, looking at her, going over to where the box holding the clubs was, then pulling the blanket off it. “She doesn’t have that problem anymore.”

“Golf clubs! Oh, thank you, handsome fox!” she said excitedly, rushing over and giving him a kiss. “And they’re Eagles, just like Sheila’s!” “And these were sized just for you, love,” Kit told her with a smile.

“Way to yank my leverage there, cousin,” Sheila laughed.

She unwrapped the photo frame next, and laughed brightly when she saw it. “Telegraphing something to me, love?” she asked with a darling smile.

“I knew you’d want one, so I beat you to it,” he countered.

She giggled. “I saw a nice one I was going to buy when we got home,” she admitted.

The next gift confused her a little bit, until she realized it was a picture and not a postcard. “Oh, did you buy this?” she asked quickly.

“I thought it was perfect to hang over the island,” he answered.

“Well, that’s one thing to cross off the list with the furniture card!” she said with a bright smile. “Yes, love, I did want a hanging rack, and it looks like it’ll be perfect for the kitchen!”

The diamond and emerald heart pendant, which was only $300 from Zales, made her eyes go wide when she took it from the box. “Oh, it’s beautiful,” she said in a wondrous voice. “Put it on me!” she said, pushing it to Kit. He took the chain in either paw, a very fine chain so it wouldn’t snag her fur, and she held her hair out of the way as he fastened it around her neck. "I thought this was so lovely when I saw it in the window," she said, touching the pendant gently. "Thank you, Kit!" she said happily, turning and giving him a crushing hug.

"For you, my pretty kitty, anything. Anything," he replied, putting his arms around her and holding her close.

Much later, the party started to wind down. Jessie sat with him, Vil, and her family at a table as they watched Terry and Allison cleaning off a table, talking quietly, and Lupe playing Danielle basketball by the garage, as Grandma Pearl bantered with Sheila. The old femme had a warm spot in her heart for the fearless Vulpan vixen. "I'm glad you had a good birthday, dear," Hannah told her. "It's not every day you get a van."

Jessie laughed. "My handsome fox bought me something I'll treasure," she said, putting her paw over the little pendant that was now under her shirt.

"What makes anything a treasure is what someone thinks it's worth," Kit told her. "That makes you my treasure."

"There's nothing wrong with me giving you a van," Vil protested with a laugh. "I may buy you what you need, but I know you'll love it the first time you need it. I was thinking of the baby as much as you!"

"I truly appreciate the van, Vil, and you're right, the first time I have to put Laura in a car seat, I'll be sending you fifty thank you letters," she giggled.

"How's Ohio State treating you, Ben?" Jim asked.

"Pretty well, Uncle Jim," he answered. "You saw my jersey?"

“Sure did.”

“Tell me when I can get one, I want to hang it on the wall in my office,” Vil told him.

“Sure, I can do that. They’ll let me buy official style jerseys that I can give away to my family, special ones meant to be worn by furs without football gear. You know, authentic material and stuff, but made for wearing, not playing. They’re forty-four dollars each. I can buy extras of my actual jerseys I use to play for fifty-two dollars each.”

“Well, put in an order for ten of each, Ben, I’ll pay for them. I want to show them off, give some to some of my friends. Suzy would love one, she’s a football nut.”

Ben laughed. “No reason to show anything off about me, Vil. They gave me my high school number, and they’re doing what they said they would. I’m learning both sides of the playbook, and get to play special teams and reserve linebacker when I’m not second string running back.”

“Second string,” Vil scoffed. “You should be the starter!”

“I’m not sure I’m gonna unseat Chris Wells,” he chuckled. “He’s a darn good running back, and he’s a senior. I’m just lucky that the sophomore they had transferred to Ball State after I committed to Ohio State, so I’m not third string anymore. But I’ve been promised carries, and like I said, I get to play some special teams and linebacker too, so I’m happy.”

“Good. I’d have to lure you to U-Mass if they don’t treat you right at Ohio State.”

Ben laughed. "I don't think Coach Tressel would appreciate you poaching me."

"If he can't keep you happy, then it's his fault if he loses you," she told him. "When's your first game?"

"Late August," he answered. "Would you like to come see me play, Vil? I can get tickets."

"You bet I am!" she told him immediately. "And I'll get my own tickets," she told him. "In fact, I think we should all come down and see Ben's first game."

"Sure, we can make it," Jim promised. "That's one of the benefits of being semi-retired. Me and Penny can go somewhere at the drop of a hat, and Pearl loves to travel."

"I'd love to," Kit said. "We can fly up the day before, that way we have plenty of time for tailgating."

"And again, I'm tossed aside and forgotten," Jenny said in a melodramatic voice, putting the back of her paw to her forehead and looking up. "What is a poor underappreciated femme to do?"

"You took a big step when you took your foot off the gas pedal," Vil told her. "I'm glad my warning finally sunk in."

"Warning?" Jessie asked.

"Vil threatened to take the car if she got another ticket," Hannah said with an approving nod.

"I didn't mean to get the tickets, they just happened," Jenny said with a grunt.

Kit chuckled. “Well, I’m glad you’re watching the speedometer now, Jen. How’s school going?”

“Pretty well,” she said with a smile. “My summer class term is over, so I’m off the next month. I’m gonna use it working at a clinic in Columbus, working with doctors.”

“Sounds good,” Kit nodded. “Sometimes practical experience is way better than the classroom.”

“Yeah, they said that it’s best for a doctor to see what it’s really like before they commit,” she laughed. “Cause it’s hard work.”

“Pays well, though,” Vil noted.

“Yeah, about paying, I have to do something or I’m gonna be the pauper in this family,” she said, giving Jessie a wink. “My older sissy marries a rich guy, my younger bro’s gonna be an NFL superstar, and the middle kid gets the shaft.”

“Thank you Janet Brady,” Kit said dryly. “Be glad you have a brother and a sister. All I have is that,” Kit noted, pointing at Vil. “Know what kind of hell it was to be her brother?”

“Why you little ingrate, after everything I’ve done for you!” Vil retorted, though she was smiling. “You can walk home, buster! You forget, I paid for that toy sitting out at the airport, and paid for you to learn to fly it!”

“This got me from Baltimore to Charlotte,” he said, sticking out his thumb. “I think it can get me home. If it doesn’t, I’ll just steal Hannah’s van.”

“You’ll have better luck with Vil, young male,” Hannah threatened.

“You wouldn’t make me walk home, would you Hannah?” he asked with outrageously pleading eyes, a trick he learned from Kendall.

“I’ll drive you to Maine and let you walk from there,” she warned.

“No sweat, I’ll just hitch to Boston and steal the Ferrari,” he winked at Vil. “I’ll drive that home to Texas!”

“You have a Ferrari, Vil?” Jenny asked in surprise.

“It’s part of my father’s antique car collection,” she answered. “It’s very old, and I never drive it. I never drive any of them. To be honest, I don’t think I’ve even driven once since I came home from England. And I’d probably drive on the wrong side of the road,” she laughed ruefully. “I drove myself a lot over in England, a little Ford Astria. I didn’t really become a limo jockey until I came home and took over at the shipyard.”

“I wonder what it’d be like to have a limo drive you everywhere,” Penny mused. “I’d feel rather weird about it, myself. For one, where do you park it?”

“It has its drawbacks, such as when you want to stop at a fast food joint,” Vil chuckled. “But, I ride in a special Lincoln going to work and back, not a limo. That’s just a big car. It’s not stretched, but it’s big enough to feel roomy, yet small enough to park in about any parking lot if I want to stop somewhere. I save the limo for after hours, and for carrying friends and passengers.”

“I always feel lost when she puts us in a limo,” Jessie giggled. “It’s nice to live the princess dream for a weekend, but it’s even nicer to go home and go back to being us.”

“We’re definitely not the limo set,” Kit chuckled. “I’m a blue-collar blue blood.”

“You’ve been ruined. Ruined!” Vil complained with a smile.

“Well, I like him ruined,” Penny laughed. “The boy’s lucky Jessie found him first, or I’d have to divorce Jim!”

“I think someone else wants to walk home,” Jim teased lightly, patting Penny on the knee.

“You’re the one trying to ruin me, sis,” he retorted. “Trying to spoil me. I’m just glad you didn’t do something outrageous and give Jessie a house or something.”

“Who says I didn’t?” she asked with a smile. “This day isn’t over yet.”

“Vil, we like our apartment,” Jessie countered. “It’s more like a house anyway, didn’t you see the pics I sent you?”

“Yes, and it’s nice inside, but it’s not a house. It’s not yours,” she said seriously. “I don’t like you living at the mercy of someone else.”

“Vil, seriously, my landlord is like one of my best friends, and he went out of his way to set up our apartment exactly the way we wanted,” Kit protested, pointing at Lupe. “I think you’re being just a bit silly. That, or trying to manufacture a reason to do what you want us to do so you can justify it in your own mind.”

“She’s been as much your mother as your sister, Kit, she has that right,” Hannah defended. “And I’m on her side. I would feel much better if you were in a house. A house is security. I could never feel the same comfort and security living in an apartment as I do here, in our house. And the kids wouldn't have felt as secure either. Apartments mean you move, that you have no home. A house is a home."

"Don't you start too, Mom," Jessie flared.

"I'm sorry dear. You're right, we'll save this for some other day," she said in a mollifying tone, patting her on the forearm.

"Hmm," Vil mused, looking at Lupe. "I wonder if Lupe would consider changing his luxury units to condos and giving the occupants the option to buy. That would settle my mind, and you'd get to keep your apartment."

"There's a whole lot of legal issues that come into play there, Vil," Kit told her. "But, if he gave us the option to buy, I'd probably go for it. Our rent would go up, since he's giving us a deal on our rent and he couldn't do that if we were buying, but it'd be worth it. We'd own but still get all the perks that come from living in the apartment, like the community center and being where we love to be."

"Well then, excuse me for a minute," Vil said, standing up and going over to Lupe.

"Oh dear," Jessie sighed, then she giggled. "I think she's about to get a surprise."

"Yeah. Lupe won't roll over for her," Kit agreed.

About sunset, the party was officially over. Terry and Allison left in a cab to head for their private chartered jet that would take them to New York, Jim, Penny, and Pearl settled in at a nearby hotel, and Vil quartered herself and the others in the Cincinnati, giving them a night in a luxury hotel. Kit and Jessie stayed in Jessie's old room, and Kit was startled to see that the room had been remodeled, and it was complete with a new bed. The room was done in simple cherrywood furniture, with a queen size bed, dresser, vanity, and an old-fashioned armoire. “Jessica told us we could box her things and convert her old room into a guest bedroom, since I doubt she’ll ever come home,” John chuckled. “We knew her old bed kills your back, so we bought this one instead. We’re going to ship all Jessica’s old things to her once you move, since she’ll probably want to store most of it.”

“I certainly appreciate that,” Kit said honestly as he sat on the bed and tested it. It was fairly firm, and that was a good sign. Jessie came in behind them and kissed her father on the cheek, then gave him a hug.

“Thanks for a wonderful birthday, Dad,” she told him.

“You’re welcome, pumpkin,” he told her, patting her on the back. “But you’d better thank your mother and Vil too.”

“I already did,” she assured him.

“Have you set a date for your baby shower yet?”

Jessie laughed. “I haven’t even thought about that yet.”

“It’s getting close to when you’d have it, you know.”

“Yeah, but I’m not supposed to be the one to throw it, you know,” she winked. “I think you’ll have to ask Sam, and Sheila, they’d probably be the ones to plan it.”

“Dear God, do not let Sheila plan your baby shower,” Kit said seriously, which made Jessie explode into laughter.

“I think I’ll let Sam, and Sandy when she comes back from summer vacation,” Jessie assured him. “That way there won’t be any strippers.”

“But at least then your shower wouldn’t be boring, Jessica,” John said mildly.

“Daaad!” she protested.

“Stop being mean to my wife, John,” Kit laughed.

“She’s my daughter before she’s your wife.”

“You gave her to me. She’s mine now.”

“Oh really?” Jessie asked archly.

“That’s right, you’re all mine,” he told her, standing up and pulling her against him. “Mine, mine mine! So go make me a sandwich.”

John exploded into laughter, and Jessie pushed him, knocking him backwards onto the bed. “Shut the door on your way out, Dad,” Jessie said with a cool look at him. “I think we can spare Kit the humiliation of someone seeing him get beaten up by a girl.”

“Have fun, you two,” John chuckled, closing the door behind him.

“I plead mercy upon the court,” Kit laughed, holding his paws out to her.

She laughed and let him pull her down onto the bed atop him, and gave him a lingering kiss. “Consider yourself on probation,” she teased.

“Oh good, I can violate my probation and get an even better punishment when we get home,” he cooed in her ear.

“We really need to take you to a psychiatrist to talk about this love of punishment, handsome fox,” she giggled, kissing him again, quite seriously.

Chapter 30

The van turned out to be rather useful earlier than they expected.

Vil had parked it out by their apartment, or more to the point had had the dealership park it there. It was a Ford Freestar, like Hannah's van, but Jessie's van was dark blue with a tan leather interior and just about every extra and perk there was for it. It had power everything, XM satellite radio, a CD player for the driver, a DVD player with multiple screens for the passengers, an integrated GPS monitor in the dash that had van functions as well, LoJack vehicle protection service, Vil had even had an infant car seat bought and put in the back, an omen of things to come for the couple. Jessie was very appreciative of the van, and after inspecting it and driving it, she parked it and basically forgot about it...until the very next time she drove her Corolla and had to work herself down into the seat. After that, it was the Corolla that Jessie parked, for she liked the roominess of the van, and she declared that she needed to learn how to drive it anyway. Gas prices were high, though, so Kit more or less gave up his truck and drove the car, since having to gas up both the truck and the van was a very expensive undertaking when gas was nearly $3.60 a gallon. So, to save them some money, Kit parked his Pathfinder and drove the car, and Jessie drove the van.

But, the truck and the van turned out to be extremely useful, because the day after they returned home from Jessie's birthday trip, the contractors declared they were finished, and allowed the residents to start moving into their new apartments. Everyone already knew exactly where they were going to live, and Kit and Jessie weren't the only ones that immediately started ferrying things over to the new apartments on the very day that Lupe made the announcement by putting flyers in everyone's mailboxes. Lupe made the announcement on Tuesday morning, but Kit and Jessie already had the keys to their apartment, and had several boxes moved over into their new apartment before anyone else knew what was going on.

Good Lord, did they have so much space in that apartment! It was a four bedroom with a small basement and a small attic, both more or less meant for storage. The attic was for long-term storage, with one of those pull-down folding stairs that retracted up into the ceiling. The small basement, actually more of a cellar, was perfect for a small wine cellar or storage room. The basement was curiously unique in that it had been dug as a single room between the two apartments and then walled off, but it wasn't the same size as the duplex's foundation, it was smaller. The basement was about half the size of the first floor of their apartment, basically under the back half of the apartment, which left the front half untouched, probably where all the utilities came in underground. Kit and Jessie moved their first boxes in on Tuesday night, mainly the gifts she'd received that they'd yet to unpack, as well as some of the wedding presents they'd honestly had no room to put up or use and had been boxed and kept in storage. But now, in the new apartment, they'd have room for everything.

Tuesday, Kit left work after the morning meeting with Rick, foisting all the research off on Pat because he had a lot of running around to do. First, they had to get the utilities put in their names, though they were already turned on in the complex's account. They had to put the electricity and the gas in their names, and call to have the cable installed and a cable modem set up. They had to change the address on their licenses, had to put in an official change of address form at the post office, and Kit had to call ADT to have them install the new alarm system over there and then remove the one from the old apartment once they were out of it. They also needed to get boxes, and they had furniture to buy for the new apartment using the gift Vil gave them. They had decided to do the move themselves rather than hire a moving company, and the complex had organized something of a pool of moving labor. Kit and Jessie would get help moving from Lupe, Dan, Mickey, and Sheila, and when they moved, Kit and Jessie would be there to lend a paw as well. Similar “moving buddy” groups had formed in the complex, where clusters of families and furs would move at the same time and help each other. When six furs were moving furniture, it got moved quickly. But they intended to move a good deal of it by themselves, getting help only on the big things. And since Jessie currently wasn’t working, she had plenty of time to ferry over a box here, a box there, all day, slowly but surely getting their things moved over.

Her plan was simple. Once ADT had the alarm installed, they would move their bedroom and the kitchen first, getting help from friends with the furniture. Once those were set up, they’d move over, and Jessie would ferry over little things during the day, then she and Kit would move over larger things in the afternoon. On Saturday, the six of them would all band together and move everyone’s furniture over to their new apartments, using the carts Lupe bought as well as a flatbed truck that Dan borrowed from his job, which would let them load up a large amount of furniture in one shot and move it the half a block over to the new apartments. Lupe had put the three of them in the luxury units beside theirs, with Sheila beside Kit, Dan by her, and Mickey in the next one over, so they could park the truck in one place and move all the furniture to where it had to go easily, and also so they were very close to Lupe, Kit, and Jessie. Dan, Mickey, and Sheila were Lupe's best friends in the complex outside of Kit and Jessie, so he liked keeping them very close. Lupe was giving Dan and Mickey a break on the rent so they could afford living in the luxury units, but Lupe expected Dan to help out when it came to fixing things, since Dan was a mechanic by trade and had been a contractor, so he was very good at fixing things and could do general maintenance, and Mickey was an air conditioning technician, so he could fix any AC unit in the complex if necessary.

Jessie split up their errands, and they got to work. Kit was tasked with ADT, the cable company, and the running while Jessie would be doing all the calling, but first they had to get their licenses changed, so they went to the DPS office and waited in line for over an hour with their official letters from Lupe and the county stating that he had moved them to a different apartment in the complex, and the county letter gave the new address. They were moving from 1642 Guadalupe Apartment 1-B to 1664 Guadalupe. Each of the luxury apartments had its own address, mainly because Lupe had bought out the entire block and freed up all the address numbers, which had to be reassigned by the county. When the TEC arrived from the Texas Emergency Commission, which handled both 911 services and allocating addresses to new buildings, he had granted Lupe's request to give the community center and the luxury units their own individual addresses, mainly because the luxury units were stand-alone homes set up in a duplex system, not multiple homes in a single building. The community center was 1660, Lupe's was 1662, and they numbered evenly around the ring from there. The large buildings surrounding the center had the low numbers, and all buildings on the block, even those closer to other streets, were all assigned Guadalupe street number addresses. The TEC could have given the buildings near other streets numbers from those streets, but it was a long-standing practice to give all apartments in a complex similar addressing as long as there were enough numbers to accommodate it so as to make it easy on the postal workers, police, firefighters, and utility workers. Generally, whichever street where the rental office was located was usually the street from which addressing numbers was assigned, and since Lupe owned the entire block, they had access to 50 addressing numbers...and there were only 32 buildings in the complex that needed addresses. That was more than enough to give every building in the complex a Guadelupe address.

It did put some residents in a kind of lurch, though. On Friday, three of the existing buildings would lose their official addresses, once the new addressing scheme was officially adopted by the county, because those addresses would be claimed by buildings built next to the existing old buildings. The old buildings would be address-less, and everyone in the complex would have to start using the addresses of their new apartments, as well as pick up their mail from the new mailboxes on the other side. Everyone already knew where they were going to be living, had their new addresses, but they'd have to go get their mail from the new mailboxes, which meant they'd be walking for a while.

Fortunately for Kit and Jessie, ADT was always quick. When Kit called them once they got home, they set up an appointment to install the alarm for the new apartment the next day. After that was done, Kit jumped in Jessie's Corolla and started the running. He stopped at the post office first to turn in an official change of address form, which would have their mail start delivery to their new address as soon as the post office could make the switch. After that, he drove down to the office for the cable company and discussed packages with them, then arranged to have the cable installed in the new apartment, which was put on the schedule for Thursday. Kit would use the same box he had, but he wanted a second box for cable they'd install in their bedroom, and the cable modem would be installed in the den on the first floor. Kit also changed their service package to include a few more channels, including spending the money to buy a Video On Demand service for Ohio State college football games. Any time an Ohio State game was televised, anywhere, it would both broadcast live on a special channel on their converter boxes, and they'd also get it digitally recorded by the cable company and accessible via an on demand channel, viewable until the next Saturday, when the game would be erased and copied over by the new game. That way they could always watch Ben play, and if they weren't home, they could watch it when they had time. Kit had already bought a bunch of blank DVD-R discs to record Ben's games, ready to build a library of Ben's football career.

Kit was also waiting for Ben's jerseys to arrive. Kit had copied Vil's idea and had left the money with Ben, Ben had bought them, and they were in the mail, five jerseys. Two for Kit, one for Jessie in maternity size, and two in her regular size. It was a well spent $220, because they were special jerseys made by the same company that made the play jerseys, only altered so they were wearable without football pads but authentic in every other way, that Ben could buy for $44 each through the school. Ben had bought them that morning when he went back to school, and the company was going to next-day air them out as soon as they made them, which they expected to finish by tomorrow. So, they hoped to have their new jerseys by Wednesday. John was going to send them some Ohio State decals for their car windows as well, but he also demanded that if they were going to put up those, they also had to put up the Cincinnati Bearcats decals he was including with them. John did work at that school, and he had his school pride, even if his son was playing for an in-state rival school.

After finishing at the cable company, he had to warn Alice that his address was changing. And that was also a problem. Kit had to move his plane by the end of the month, because the space he was using would be needed by the company. Alice had warned him that the jet that occupied that spot would be back on July 24th, back earlier than expected because they were getting their new jet a little early, so he had to find other accommodations for his plane. This...was a problem. There was no hangar space available anywhere in Austin, and everywhere he'd called had waiting lists that were ridiculously long. Once they kicked him out of the Avia hangar, he'd have to tie up the plane out on a tarmac. There was available space at Bergstrom, but it was much more expensive to rent there than it was at Georgetown, and the Cessna mechanics were at Georgetown. But, that was a good forty minutes of driving, where it was just 15 minutes or so from Bergstrom, depending on lights and traffic. Odds were, he'd just eat the higher tiedown rental spot at Bergstrom and fly the plane to Georgetown when it needed maintenance, paying for the convenience of having it close at paw.

It was almost silly, the hangar situation in Austin, and if he had the money, he'd see it as a prime business opportunity to buy some land near an airport and build a huge T-hangar complex, but the problem was there wasn't really anywhere to do it. The four airports in or around Austin were all encircled within developed land, so there was nowhere available to build.

So, after July 24, his plane was going to be out in the elements, and he'd be back to tying down the plane after getting home.

He lingered at Avia maybe a little too long, chatting with Alice and her maintenance furs. Alice was still going out with Lupe, surprisingly enough, and the small collie seemed quite content about it. “He pretends to be a player, but he always heels when I call,” she told him with a giggle. “We have a date tomorrow night.”

“Glad to hear it, Alice,” he told her. “I see you have planes in,” he noted as he looked at the two jets in the front bays of the hangar. One was a Citation CJ2, the other was a Lear 450. The old Cessna turboprop was gone. It had been sold, and now that spot was taken by a Citation CJ1, one of the older ones before they came out with the CJ1+ model.

“That’s the plane that goes in the spot you’re renting,” she told him. “It’s going out to L.A. after it gets the overhaul for a couple of weeks to replace that CJ two, then it’s back here permanently. I wish we could get it back fuckin’ now, but they need it in L.A. They have booked passengers and no jet to fly them.”

“Ah, so, that’s the plane I have to crash,” he mused.

She laughed. “I know you did it if it happens,” she winked. “So, you’re rated on Citations now?”

He nodded. “All the single pilot CJ plus models, the Mustang, the Encore, and the ten,” he answered. “My sis gave me six weeks to get as many ratings as possible. So I got those, and also got my CFI ratings, type one, type two, MEI, MEII.”

“Nice! You gonna freelance?”

“I might,” he answered.

“Hmm, you rated to instruct on Citations?”

“Yeah. I can teach everything I’m rated for. I got my rate requirement hours in on everything.”

“I might do a little business with you,” she told him. “We sold the old turboprop and the company’s talking about basing that old CJ one here permanently. We still do enough business here in Austin to keep two planes here, at least after we get our Lear back. Rather than ship any new pilots off to our trainers in Jacksonville, I could have you train on the CJ one. We’d pay you the same rate we pay our in-house instructors.”

“I couldn’t do it full time, but if you need me to fill in for a couple of days or something, that’s cool.”

“Well, how long do you think it’d take to train a pilot already rated for another type of jet on a Citation?”

“Two or three hours a night? Maybe two weeks,” he answered. “Depends on how well they know the Collins.”

“That CJ doesn’t have the Collins, it’s one of the older ones,” she answered. “It’s not a plus model, it’s a standard model. It has the combo Rockline suite.”

“I don’t know that suite, I’d have to train on it to teach that jet,” he laughed. “I think that my rating covers the older versions of the jet, I’d have to ask Amanda. If it does, I’d just need training on the older avionics and I’d be good to go.”

“Well, we can let you do that when it’s in, that way you can charter it from us the next time you need a jet,” she winked. “You’re a CFI and Cessna trained, our insurance will cover you no sweat.”

“Fly something that old? Never!” he said with mock outrage, grinning at her.

“Well, we can’t have all the shiny new toys like our new competitor,” she chuckled.

“Eh? Who?”

“AV Charters,” she answered. “According to airport scuttlebutt, they’re opening for business next week, cause it seems that they’re done remodeling that old hangar, all the contractors are gone. They towed a brand fuckin’ new CJ one into their hangar yesterday. The serial number on it was literally the last produced jet, I looked it up. And one of the airport admins says that they’re expecting delivery of a Mustang, one of those new real small Cessna jets. That surprised me, they must have been planning opening here for a while. There’s like a two year list for those Mustangs, they had to put the order in back in two thousand six.”

“Hmm, and I know for a fact that they have a brand new CJ three too, cause I rented it,” he mused. “Cessna made a deal with them to let me charter the jet and fly it before they took delivery, while Cessna technically still owned it. Sounds like they’re gonna compete with ya, Alice, they brought in small jets for short jumps or lone customers and a bigger one for more distant charters or larger groups.”

“Actually, there’s enough business for both of us,” she admitted with a laugh. “We’re booked up for the next two months, and if Avia had a third jet to send down here, they would. I’ll bet my tail that’s why AV opened, cause there is a market for two small charter outfits here. That’s why they moved that Citation in after selling off that old fuckin’ dinosaur turboprop. Nobody wanted to charter it anymore in the age of jets. This is a rare day for us, Kit, to have the jet in and sitting idle. When we're at full strength, have both planes, usually one of them is out, and the CJ one will be going out at four. Some suit chartered it to take him to Florida."

"There's that much demand?"

"Yeah. Between the businesses here and the state government, we're usually pretty busy. We've been trying to get them to get us a third jet for fuckin' ever, and then they go and yank our four-fifty and send it to London and leave us with nothing but a turboprop and whatever jet's in for maintenance that can handle a charter before it goes back to its home base. I'll be happy when we get both our planes back, then maybe I can show them how many clients we're turning away and convince them that we could use a new jet instead of them buying jets and sending them everywhere but here. They just don't wanna, cause they get higher fees at our other locations. They'd rather send the jets to where the bigger fees are than make up for the lower fees here with quantity. Which would you do, one client for a thousand bucks or three clients for five hundred each?"

"Eh, there is fuel and maintenance to think about," Kit noted.

"I know, but still, profit's profit. AV will make money, and we'll make money, but if they send us another jet, we'll make more money than AV will."

"Well, I'm glad to hear you're not afraid of the new company," Kit chuckled.

"Nah, not really. They'll have more jets than us, though. That might spur the home office to send us a third charter jet, maybe even have them buy us a new one. That CJ one is old, and the Lear isn't much younger. We could use a new Lear or Cessna, maybe even an Eclipse."

“I thought there were some major issues with the Eclipses. Didn’t the FAA ground them last month?”

“They did, and there were, but I think they got it all ironed out, cause they’re not grounded anymore. They’re not bad little jets, I checked one out at the last airshow I went to. They’re ridiculously quiet.”

“I’ve never seen one except in pictures,” Kit said as he waved to Mike, one of the maintenance furs.

“They’re kinda cramped inside, but they’re pretty nice. It’d be the perfect jet to ferry a single client.”

His personal phone rang, and he saw that it was Jessie. “Yeah love?” he asked.

“Where are you?”

“Over at Avia, talking with Alice.”

“Get back to work,” she teased lightly. “And bring home some french bread when you’re done.”

“Actually, I’ve done all the running, so I’ll be home in a bit,” he told her.

Kit picked up the needed french bread on the way home, and then caught up on the work he’d shirked to get the running done today, pulling it off his desktop at work and working on it in the den as Jessie finished making calls. He was still working on the history of the conventions, and had pulled his work from the office to finish it up. He had all the information, he just needed to organize it and send it to Barry. He did look up a little more information about the infamous 1968 Democratic convention and the riots that happened outside of it, included that, then formatted it, finished it, and sent it back to the office to Barry's workstation. When he came out into the living room, he saw Jessie in the dining room, packing the good china into a box. "You all finished, love?" he asked.

"Yeah. The utilities switch to our names tomorrow. As soon as I finish this, let's get to work."

"With?"

"Going down to Frontage Auto and furniture shopping, silly," she winked at him. "And we need to get our bed from Lupe's show unit and get it over to the new apartment."

"Oh, yeah, I ordered a second converter box, love," he told her. "Since we have the tube TV, I figured we could put it in our room, and what use is a TV without cable?"

"Did they have that College Gameday thing?"

"Sure did. We're set up for Ohio State games this season. We'll get them all, both live and on DVR, watchable any time during the week."

"Cool! Now we can always see Ben play!"

"When's his first game?"

"August thirtieth," she answered. "Remember, we're gonna go up and watch him play!"

"I'll warn Rick. I just hope you like the five hour plane ride up," he winked.

"I hope you enjoy being a passenger," she teased as he came over to help, kissing him on the nose playfully.

“Put in the right seat of my own plane. It’s a travesty of justice,” he sighed morosely as he knelt down and grabbed the next stack of plates.

“You’re the one who started it,” she laughed. “All you had to do was keep me from getting my license.”

“And deny you what you want? What kind of husband do you think I am?” he challenged with a smile.

“The very best kind,” she said with a loving smile, then she kissed him on the cheek lightly.

“Boy, do I have you fooled,” he said flippantly, which made her laugh helplessly.

They did have to go out one more time, to make three new keys to the apartment, and also to pick up the key for the van for Kit from Frontage Auto, where Vil had bought the van. She’d only brought one key and remote for it, but there was a second set for Kit that the dealership was holding. Besides, Jessie had to go sign the papers for the van to finalize everything, since Vil had bought the van in Jessie’s name, and she couldn’t fake everything the way she could with Kit. Vil had bought Jessie’s Corolla at Tucker’s Auto, which was about a mile from Frontage, and it was something of a curious departure from the norm for her. She had a preference for Fords, but she had bought Jessie a Toyota, and had bought Kit a Pathfinder mainly because she knew that Kit rather liked Pathfinders. Maybe the fact that Tucker’s sold both Nissans and Toyotas had something to do with that. She’d bought the Pathfinder there, and just picked up the Corolla from the same place as a matter of convenience. Frontage was waiting for them, and it was a quick hour there for Jessie to sign the papers, pick up her temporary title and registration, and get the second key and remote. Kit wouldn't use the remote because he used his Pathfinder remote and that was just too many things to put in his pocket. Fortunately though, the alarm was set to automatically disengage when any door was unlocked, and automatically engage when all doors were locked.

Once that was done, they stopped by Lowe's and had new keys made for the apartment, then headed for the furniture stores. Jessie had a list with her, and she already knew exactly what she wanted and where to find it. Kit had taught her the power of researching, and she was very good at it when it came to shopping for deals. They visited five different furniture stores all over Austin. They bought a cheap but nice bedroom set from Value City for one of the empty bedrooms to go with the bed they already had, then bought a kitchen table they could use in the large kitchen for informal meals and a couple of matching pieces for the living room suit at Wentmore's. Then they went all the way across the city to Dickerson's Furniture and bought their very first purchases for Laura, her bedroom suit that would be hers when she was old enough to use it herself. It would go in her room, and though she'd start in a crib, they also bought the bed that went with the suit, which they'd store in the basement until she was ready to move from a crib to a bed. Then they went to Capitol Furniture and bought two new pieces for their bedroom that matched the current bedroom suit, an armoire and another dresser, and also bought a matching china cabinet to go with the china closet for the dining room and two wine racks to put in the cellar, to make part of the cellar into a wine cellar. After that, they made their last stop at Yeager Furniture, and bought a nice cherrywood gun cabinet for the shotguns, one that had the safety features that Jessie wanted yet also matched their bedroom suit. It had both a door lock and a locking bar that locked the weapons into the rack, which used different keys. That made it that much harder for a curious child to get hold of one of the weapons in the rack...and there would be more. Jessie was already professing an interest in buying a .22 rifle and maybe a pawgun to use for target shooting... something that both was good for sport shooting and also had considerable stopping power if used in self defense, such as a .40 caliber. Rick had saved Kit's life because he had a concealed carry permit, and Jessie had never forgotten that. She saw the value of having a weapon in the house for personal protection, she was already trained in the use of them thanks to her father, and a firearm was perfectly safe in a house occupied by children so long as proper precautions were taken. Jessie arranged to have all the furniture delivered on Thursday, when she'd be there to accept it and have them put it where it was going to go. They started with $5,000, and when they were done, they had $360 left, because Jessie had done her homework when it came to planning what to buy and from where, finding both furniture that matched their existing pieces and going where what she wanted was the cheapest.

After they finished that, they went home and went back to packing. They packed everything they didn't use, things like their china, the utility closet, a good portion of the kitchen, most of their decorations and knick-knacks, and then started moving it. That was where the van was really useful, for they packed the truck and the van both with boxes, drove the half block over to the new apartments, then started carrying them in. They stored all the boxes in the corner of the dining room, and Jessie realized that they had more things they needed to buy, things like hooks for the pictures they hung on the walls, and she decided that a grandfather clock would look just perfect over in the corner of the living room. The truth of the matter was that they had money left on the gift card Vil gave them for furniture, and Jessie was just looking for a reason to use it. But, he had to admit, having a grandfather clock in the living room would look rather nice, and kinda classy. And there was a pretty nice one at Value City that was $400. Once they got the non-essentials stored over in the new apartment, Jessie cooked dinner for four, since Sheila had called during lunch at flight school and asked if she and Allison could come over. Kit was curious as to how Allison's date with Terry went, so he was more than amenable to the idea. Jessie made goulash, homemade french garlic bread, and asparagus, and was just taking the bread out of the oven when Sheila opened the front door without knocking. "We're here!" she called as she marched in.

"How was it today?" Jessie asked from the kitchen as Kit came out from the den.

"I did my first cross country solo today!" Sheila called. "I went to new Braunfels and back!"

"Nice! Get lost?" Kit teased as Allison came in.

She laughed and slapped him on the arm. "As if I'd get lost!" she challenged. "Ally does hers tomorrow."

"When's your check ride?" Kit asked them as Allison kissed him on the cheek.

"Two weeks from today," she answered before Sheila could.

"Now that the pleasantries are out of the way, what happened in New York?" Kit asked immediately, which made Allison laugh.

"Can I even sit down first?"

"No," he said bluntly.

She laughed again. "Then come to the kitchen and I'll explain as we help Jessie set the table."

“That works.”

They did just that. “I really had a good time,” she began as they came into the kitchen and Jessie gave Allison a fond hug, but she didn’t interrupt. She wanted to hear it, too. “We changed on the plane and went straight to the show from the airport.”

“What did you go see?” Sheila asked.

“It was a premiere of a musical called One Fine Day,” she answered. “It was really fun, and funny, too. I had a great time. Afterward, Terry took me to this incredibly fancy French restaurant in Manhattan, called Renoir’s.”

“Holy crap, he took you to Renoir’s?” Kit said as Sheila grinned hugely.

“Yeah. The food was amazing!” she said with a dreamy smile. “We sat at the table and talked for hours,” she continued. “About anything that crossed our minds. We were the last furs to leave. After that, he took me on a limo tour of Manhattan. He showed me the Chrysler building and Times Square, then we went to the Waldorf Astoria, showed how pretty they were when they were lit up at night. The Astoria!” she exclaimed. “The next morning he picked me up, and we went on a carriage ride in Central Park, then he took me to the Statue of Liberty, then we got on a jet and flew to Norfolk and he showed me one of the Vulpan shipyards because I was really curious about what a shipyard did and how it worked, so he took me to one and showed me. We flew back, packed up, and he flew me home. He even saw me to my door like a proper gentlemale,” she said with a light laugh and a gentle smile as she remembered it. “And he was the absolute soul of courtesy! He didn't even try to kiss me goodnight or goodbye all weekend."

"Oh, tell me you didn't let him get away with that!" Sheila laughed.

"Of course I didn't," she said with a wicked little smile. "I curled his toes quite satisfactorily on the front porch of my house. After all the hard work he put in to give me such a wonderful weekend, he definitely earned that kiss. But it wasn't all fun and games," she said with a sigh. "Terry's dad kept trying to call him all day on Sunday. I think it was because of me."

"Don't worry about any of that," Sheila told her immediately. "What Terry does is Terry's business. Remember what Vil said. Did you break Vil's rules over the weekend?"

"No!" she said immediately. "We didn't talk to any press, we didn't announce ourselves, and we didn't cause any trouble. Terry didn't throw his name around, but he must have called in a favor to get us into that restaurant," she mused. "We took the public ferry to the Statue of Liberty and everything!"

"Then that's all you need to worry about," Kit told her. "As long as you obey Vil, don't worry about the rest of the Vulpans. They can't do a damn thing about it."

"Still, I don't want to cause him any trouble, Kit. He's a sweet male, kind and wonderful, and I'd feel awful if your family gives him too much grief over me."

"Terry knows the score, Ally," Sheila told her as they sat down. "There will be some friction in the family, but Terry fully knows it, and remember that he did take you out anyway. He thinks you're worth the trouble it'll cause, and so do I."

"So let Terry manage that, Ally," Kit agreed as Jessie brought the goulash out in a huge bowl and set it on the wicker pad in the center of the table. "If he's willing to deal with the family to go out with you, then you can honor that effort."

"Oh, I will!" she said quickly. "Kit, Terry was so wonderful! I've never gone out with such a considerate or engaging male before! We must have sat in the restaurant and just talked for six hours! We already have our next date planned. He's coming down here and we're going out this weekend. I just wish he wasn't so far away," she sighed.

"Well, Vil can feel your pain, her boyfriend lives in England," Kit chuckled. "But Terry's rich, Ally. He can afford to fly down here every weekend and spend it with you."

"Well, even rich, he can't keep it up forever," she said. "Maybe I should move to Boston."

"No," both Kit and Sheila said in unison. "Don't move into their territory, Ally," Kit told her. "You're just asking for trouble. Besides, you set the stage like this. As long as Terry has to come down here or pays to bring you up there, it's very clear just who is courting who. If you move to Boston, you'll raise the gold-digger alarm."

"Seriously?"

"Seriously," Sheila agreed. "Terry can buy a jet if he wants, Ally. He certainly wouldn't be the only Vulpan with a private jet, I know Vil and Uncle Zach have their own jets, and there are like six different charter companies in Boston where a Vulpan can charter a private jet any time they want, even on a moment's notice. I know I could call and get a jet in ten minutes to take me to the beach or skiing or something. Terry's even richer than me, don't forget that. Just let him worry about how he gets down here to see you, as long as he does come down to see you."

"Yeah, I guess so," Allison nodded.

Jessie put the last of the food out and sat down. "I think you should listen to them," Jessie agreed. "Terry sounds like he's working very hard for you. Don't ruin it with a whole lot of what ifs. Just let him be the male and you get to be the femme and let him do things for you," she winked. "If Terry is anything like Kit, he'll bend over backwards for you."

"Don't use Kit as a measuring stick for the Vulpan," Sheila giggled. "Most Vulpan males wouldn't be quite so, well, romantic. Then again, most Vulpan marry who the family says they'll marry, so they don't take romance seriously. We marry our matched partner, then screw anyone we want on the side. That part's fun," she said with a wicked grin. "But it certainly sounds like Terry's gonna play this by normal furs' rules and court you."

"He'd better," Allison laughed. "If I want that kind of treatment, I can go back to work at the Top Hat."

"Wash your mouth out with soap!" Jessie told her. "You're never going back to that!"

"Oh, I never would. But Terry'd better get it through his head that despite my past, I won't stray and I won't let him stray either," she chuckled.

“One date and we’re already sitting around talking about marriage,” Sheila laughed. “Let’s get back to reality and eat!”

“And who’s the one changing the subject? The one that can’t get a date with the guy she wants,” Allison teased.

“Oh, kiss my furry ass, Ally!” Sheila growled, then she laughed helplessly. “I keep trying, but Ben won’t play with me!”

“Ben’s a very smart young male who knows better than to get involved with girls like you,” Jessie told her with a slight smile as she spooned goulash onto her plate.

“Sure he will,” Sheila grinned. “I’ve gotten quite a few hot kisses out of him, and I’ve put my paws in places no respectable girl would dare go.”

“And that’s about as far as you’ll ever get with him,” Jessie told her. “Mom taught him which girls to avoid, and I think she had you in mind when she taught him.”

“Pshaw,” Sheila snorted. “I’m not that bad.”

“Yes, you are,” Allison and Kit told her in unison, which made Jessie giggle. “Ben will never give you anything but meaningless kisses so long as you look at him as a piece of meat, Sheila,” Kit told her mildly. “You should take a long look at Terry and Allison. Would you like it if Terry treated Ally like a piece of meat, to take to bed then toss aside after he had his jollies?”

“Hell no!”

“Then why are you looking at Ben like that? Until you start thinking about something other than his body, he’ll never let you so much as get your foot in the door. Hannah's teachings are too deeply ingrained into him."

"Pft, that's how you get hold of a male," she challenged. "Males are slaves to what femmes keep in their underwear."

"And as long as you think that, you'll never get anywhere with Ben," Jessie told her bluntly. "Think about something, Sheila. Ben's a football star, he's devastatingly handsome, and he's modest and polite. The girls at our old high school used to follow him around like puppies. He can have any girl he wants. Why would he want to go out with someone who'll just toss him aside the minute she gets bored with him? If he wants an empty physical relationship, he can more or less take his pick of almost any girl in Ohio."

"Well, I'm cuter, and I'm rich."

"Those things mean nothing to Ben, Sheila," Jessie told her as she passed the basket of bread down to Kit. "Mom didn't raise just one of her kids to be traditional. Jenny's the odd one out, not me. Ben's just as old-fashioned as I am. He's a modest, unassuming sweetheart who'll make some girl deliriously happy someday, but only a girl he knows will be there for him as much as he's there for her. You won't give him that, and he knows it. That's why he won't go out with you."

"I'd listen to Jess, Sheila," Kit chuckled. "She's his sister. If anyone knows him, she does."

"Hmph," Sheila grunted, taking a bite of the goulash. "I'll show him that I'm after more than just his bod."

“You’d better do it some other way than just going after his bod,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, it’s always a good jumping off point,” she explained. “Sleep with the guy and see if he’s any good, and if he is, then get to know him.”

“Sheila, most girls like to know a guy more than a couple of hours before jumping into bed with them,” Jessie protested.

“Well, I’m not most girls. I’m a Vulpan,” she declared.

“And that’s not going to help you here. Ben’s not impressed by your name or your face or your body, Sheila. I’m sure there’s a ton of girls at Ohio State that are just as pretty as you, who will throw themselves at him. They won’t impress him either. What will impress him is your determination. You have to win him. He’s not going to fall into your lap.”

“Well, I could win him a lot faster after I get him into bed.”

“That won’t work.”

“He wants it. All males do. So do I. What’s wrong with going after what you want?”

“Because Ben won’t respect you,” Jessie told her directly. “Ben wants a girl like me, Sheila. He wants a loving wife that will be faithful to him, someone he can share his life with, someone to be his lifemate, not just someone sharing his bed. And he knows that you won’t be faithful. So, if you want any chance at all with him, you have to show him that you’re willing to commit to him, and only to him. You’d have to swear off all other boys and show him that you can commit to a monogamous relationship, and I’ll guarantee he’ll test you by not sleeping with you either.”

“Go without sex?” she asked, sincerely mystified. “For how long?”

“For as long as it takes to prove to him you can be faithful to him,” she answered. “Months. Maybe years.”

“What? No way can I go that long without sex!”

“Then you’d better look for another boy, cause he’ll never look twice at you,” Jessie said with a simple shrug, then she took another bite of her goulash.

“She’s gotta be joking!” Sheila protested to Kit. “Go without sex for that long?”

“I’d say she’s serious,” Kit said mildly.

“That’s like impossible! No one can go that long without!”

“Uh, Sheila. I was a virgin before I met Kit,” Jessie admitted, her cheeks ruffling slightly as she glanced at Allison. “I went three years after leaving home without sleeping with a male.”

“Well, you didn’t know what you were missing. I do!”

“I’ve told you what you have to do. What you do next is up to you.” Jessie pointedly changed the topic by looking at Allison. “So, what are you going to do with Terry next week?”

“I don’t know, he wouldn’t tell me,” she answered, taking a bite of goulash. “He just said that he hopes I like it.”

“Well, that could be almost anything,” Kit chuckled.

They talked through the rest of dinner, grilling Allison for a more detailed accounting of her date with Terry, which she supplied with a surprisingly demure smile. Kit saw that Allison had been quite bowled over by Terry, how he had been nothing but polite and respectful to her, treated her like she was special, and she'd probably throw herself at him the very first time he invited her, judging by that look she had in her eyes when Sheila remarked that Terry had a reputation for being quite a vigorous lover. Allison was a little shocked to be treated by a handsome male as more than a hired hooker, to be treated like an intelligent and sophisticated femme, to go out on real dates where there were no preconceptions or conclusions, and she was quite overwhelmed by how it made her feel. But she wasn't quite so emotional for her to lose her common sense or wariness. So far, Terry was doing everything right to earn Allison's loyalty, but Terry had better be careful and understand that Allison's loyalty would never be undying. She was far too worldly and cynical to believe in endless love. He would have to prove to her every day that he was worthy of her, which actually wouldn't be all that difficult. All he'd have to do would be to love her, and she would be his for as long as she knew that love was there. But the instant she felt that the love was gone, then she'd be gone too.

It would be good for him, Kit felt. Allison was probably the second most interesting unrelated femme Kit had ever known, second only to his wife, and she was definitely worth the effort of keeping her. Allison would make Terry's life rich and vibrant, and he'd love her for it. Few things could hold Terry's attention for long, because he was so intelligent, but Allison seemed to be able to challenge Terry's mind, and that would keep him glued to her. Terry would get a femme able to keep up with him, and Allison would get a male that would worship her. They'd be good for each other.

After Sheila and Allison left with Jessie to go pick up Sam and get in a quick eighteen holes of golf before sunset, trying out Jessie's new clubs, Kit called Vil and found out things weren't quite so rosy up in Boston. "I'm not surprised Tom tried to get hold of Terry all day Sunday," she grunted, the acoustics telling him she'd put the Blackberry on speakerphone. "Ally's little secret is out up here, and you would not believe the uproar."

"Already?"

"Zach was digging as soon as he saw her, and her past isn't hidden that well," she said pointedly. "The elders are all in an absolute hissy fit. Tom was trying to get hold of him all day Sunday, and Zach was waiting in his office when he came to work this morning. Terry..." she trailed off, then she laughed. "Terry's secretary called security. Terry decked Zach, Kit. Punched him dead in the face."

"Holy shit," Kit gasped. "What happened?"

"Well, from what I managed to piece together, Zach made all kinds of ugly threats, but Terry basically blew him off. Well, that pissed off Zach, Zach pushed Terry and knocked him down, and Terry hauled off and punched him. Put him on his ass," she said with a little chuckle. "So, right now, Terry's just got home after getting arrested, but Zach didn't press charges so he's been released, Zach's already trying to get Terry fired, Maxine's blaming Tom for his son being so out of control, Jake's stating he'll kill Terry before he lets him go out with a hooker, Tom's blaming Zach and Jake for trying to threaten Terry, Sarah's waiting to see who's gonna win so she's on the winning side, and Brian's staying way clear of the whole thing. Oh, and Terry asked me for something that piqued my curiosity, something I think I'll grant."

"What?"

“He asked to be transferred,” she answered. “Well, as you know, I’m in New Orleans right now, I just signed the papers that bought Avondale like two hours ago and finished up the tour about ten minutes ago. I’m in a limo heading for the airport to go home. Terry asked me to be transferred to Avondale to either run the facility or act as a liaison between the Avondale facility and the home office. He wants out of Boston, and I guess I can’t blame him,” she sighed. “Zach’s already made it abundantly clear that he’s going to make Terry’s life absolute hell until he dumps Allison. He’s already put a resolution on the schedule for tomorrow’s board meeting to get Terry fired, which I’m going to pre-empt, since Zach thinks he’s got me hanging over his barrel at the moment. Zach’s already threatened to lean on the state to cause problems for Terry in any way he can, and he’s already talked to his lawyers about suing Terry for hitting him, even though Zach started it by pushing Terry and knocking him down. And, if he moves to New Orleans, he’ll be that much closer to Allison,” she added. “I think I might just do that,” she mused, mainly to herself. “I could use a good fur there to oversee the reorganization of Avondale to our system, and Terry is definitely competent. It would be a good test of his abilities, since he did such a good job whipping the safety department into shape. It would get him out of Boston at least temporarily and give me someone I can trust in New Orleans to handle things for me. Yeah, I think I do like that idea. I can assign Terry to New Orleans temporarily as temporary director to coordinate the conversion of Avondale to a Vulpan facility without even having to run it through the board, too, they can’t interfere. I can have him there by Wednesday,” she said, clicking her teeth together. “And the sooner I get him out of Boston, the better. If Zach confronts him again, Terry might do something more than just punch him.”

“Criminy,” Kit sighed. “I knew the elders wouldn’t like it, but that’s a little ridiculous. That’s like what Dad did to me.”

“I think Zach learned the wrong things from the wrong brother,” Vil grunted. “He’s absolutely livid. I’ve never seen him so angry. And I’m sure you’ll be overjoyed to know that he blames you,” she chuckled. “That was part of his tirade when he stormed into my office to demand I do something about it. He said that you’re destroying the family, little bro, and giving the other cousins all bad ideas that make them forget that they’re Vulpans. Then, after he found out I approved of Terry’s courting of Allison so long as they keep it very quiet, he went off on me. He even threatened to try to take me out of the chair by any way he could,” she noted dryly. “So, you’re destroying the family by making us cousins rebel against the traditions the family’s built on, which basically boils down to do what your elders tell you, and I’m in your pocket, cheering you on. I’ve never been one to adhere to that old meme,” she said clinically. “The old family’s rulebook was thrown out the window the instant Dad put me in the chair. As far as I’m concerned, as long as you don’t sully the family name, live your own life.”

“Terry gets close to that line,” Kit admitted.

“Yeah, and I’m still not entirely happy about it, but as long as they obey my rules, I’ll let them see each other,” she said. “If only because Allison suitably convinced me that she wants nothing to do with her old life and hopes to start a new and better one with Terry. That really moved me, bro,” she chuckled.

“What are you going to do about Zach?”

“Pull his leash,” she answered in a grim manner. “He threatened me in his little diatribe too, and I don’t respond well to threats. I think Terry is the perfect opportunity to demonstrate to the elders once and for all just who controls this family.”

Kit was quiet a moment. “You planned it like this, didn’t you? That’s why you let Terry go out with Allison, even though you don’t entirely approve.”

She laughed. “I cannot tell a lie, I was hoping that I’d get just such an opportunity when I gave Terry my blessing,” she admitted. “I’m tired of the elders skulking around behind me and trying to push me out of this chair, especially uncle Zach. You would not believe what he’s been trying to pull, trying to undercut me, and it’s not just Zach and Jake, it’s now six other members of the board as well, which gives them a voting majority on the board. Zach and Jake and Maxine have bribed six of the other board members to help them unseat me. They’ve formed this nice little alliance to try to get rid of me. Kit, they’re willing to hurt the business, even drive us to the brink of bankruptcy, in order to make me a disaster as the CEO and force me to quit, which would let Zach step in and lead the company back to profitability,” she told him seriously, which sincerely startled him. “I can’t let that go on anymore, bro. So, I want a nice little open confrontation so I can show them just who wears the crown around here.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Start clearing out the hostile members of the board, one by one,” she answered. “I let the elders buy those furs, now they’re gonna find out how far their money went.”

“I thought you couldn’t fire any member of the board without a vote from the board.”

“I can’t. But I can make them retire for personal reasons,” she said smugly. “Kit, bro, Dad kept files on all the board members, and so do I. I don’t think they realize that I know what’s going on around here. What’s really going on around here.”

He laughed suddenly. “You’re gonna blackmail them!”

“Blackmail is such an ugly word,” she said lightly. “I prefer to think of it as using available assets against a business rival to gain a tactical advantage. I have enough on three of them to make them take an early retirement package, that or they’ll be staying in Club Fed for the next few years and change their titles to convicted felon.”

Kit laughed brightly. “Mean femme!”

“I’m a businessfemme, bro, I’m supposed to be mean,” she told him. “I’ll start with Rogers. I’ve already sent him a memo telling him I want to see him in my office first thing tomorrow morning. I guarantee you he’ll be clearing out his office by lunch. That’s a board member that the elders spent good money buying, and now he’s gone. I wonder if they’ll demand their money back,” she mused with a wicked little chuckle. “And I won’t give them a chance to even think about it, because I’m going to see Lewis after lunch. He’ll be gone by quitting time.”

“So, you’re sending Terry to New Orleans to protect him from Uncle Zach, and declaring war on the elders,” Kit noted dryly.

“That about sums it up,” she said, then she laughed. “But this has been brewing for a while. Since you left the family, really. Actually, it became inevitable the instant Dad died, and the fortune was divided up among all the Vulpans, and not just the elders. The cousins don’t have to listen to the elders anymore, and the elders don’t want to admit it. It’s not really necessary to control them like they're children, in my opinion. As long as the cousins don't do anything outrageous, just let them be themselves. The elders are totally unwilling to abide by Dad's wishes, or the agreement, so the gloves are coming off. They've been trying to undercut me, and now they're going to try to do harm to the company to force me out. It's time for a reckoning." She blew out her breath. "Reckoning my ass. It's time for war."

"I think I'm not accepting any offer you make to come to Boston anytime soon," he said seriously.

"You're right. Stay out of Boston, bro, no matter who invites you. And I'll tell Terry to stay out too. You two are the focal point of the elders' wrath right now, so just stay out of their sight."

"I can do that."

"And don't tell Sheila anything I plan," she added. "Anything you tell Sheila will end up in Sarah's ear. Sheila tells Sarah what goes on in Austin, at least what she thinks isn't important. But sometimes big things can be learned from a conglomeration of little things."

"I didn't know Sheila rats us out."

"She doesn't rat you out, bro, she just gossips with her mother. Unfortunately, Sarah knows that Sheila still wants her approval, so she pumps Sheila for information by being nice to her and getting her to gossip," she sighed. "Sheila will tell her about things that she thinks don't matter, but Sarah's very clever. She can pick through the gossip and get real information."

"I didn't want to hear that," he grunted.

“She never means harm, Kit,” she said, a bit defensively. “She’s not telling her mother anything secret. But I can learn a lot by listening to her talk about daily life in the complex, with you and Jessie, and with the furs from your company, and your friends. I don’t want any hint of what’s coming to get to the elders.”

“Alright,” he answered. “I’ll keep it quiet, but I will tell her that Terry’s moving to New Orleans.”

“That’s fine, I have no doubt she’ll find out like ten minutes after I tell Terry. And remember. Stay out of Boston, Kit. No matter what.”

“You know how I feel about Boston, Vil,” he said bluntly.

“Good enough. Let me call Terry and tell him to start packing.”

“I’ll tell Allison when they get home. They’re out playing golf right now.”

“She’s trying out her clubs?”

“Yeah, I hope I got the right size,” Kit laughed.

“They looked about right. She won’t be playing golf much longer with her belly expanding.”

“She’ll play until she has to stop, she loves it,” Kit chuckled. “I’m already looking at a country club. They’ve been playing at a public course here, I want her to play on a nice course.”

“You should play. You’re pretty good.”

“It makes my back ache around the sixteenth hole,” he answered.

“Then cut some strokes off your game,” she teased. “I should get out on the course before the season’s over.”

“Go play in Scotland this weekend.”

“Hmm, that’s a good idea. Lemme call Ken after I talk to Terry and arrange a trip to Saint Andrews.”

“Have fun, sis. I’m gonna call Jessie and break the news.”

“Enjoy,” she chuckled, and they said their goodbyes.

Kit held onto the phone for a moment, pondering what was coming. Vil was right in that this was basically inevitable. None of the elders wanted Vil in control of the company from the start, and it was no surprise that they were going to try to force Vil out of the CEO’s chair. It was surprising, though, that they were willing to go to such extremes, to damage the company in order to make Vil look so bad that she had no choice but to step down...for the board could unseat her from the chair with a unanimous vote. That was a stipulation of her takeover of the company. They couldn’t take her stocks, but they could force her out of the company and remove her voice from how the company was run. So, the positioning and the threatening were over now. Vil had actually incited Zach to do something overt in pushing Terry, and now she was going to attack, go after them before they could go after her.

It was going to get ugly in Boston very soon. Terry was wise to ask to leave, and Vil was granting his wish in sending him to New Orleans. Though Terry had no idea what Vil was planning, he really didn’t want to be there when Vil started cleaning house. Heads were going to roll, and when the family realized what Vil was doing, they’d fight back. But in business, just like in war, the fur who fired the first shot from surprise often had the advantage. All Vil had to do was hold out against the elders once she swept two hostile board members out of the company, and she'd eventually win...because she was just as ruthless as her uncles.

Yes, putting Vil in that chair rather than him was the best thing. She wanted it, he didn't. She could have it.

Terry was in New Orleans the very same day.

As soon as Vil told him, he literally ran home, packed an overnight bag, had his butler pack up the rest and follow him to New Orleans, and he was on the company jet to New Orleans at 5:00pm. And when he arrived at 8:00pm, Allison was there to meet him. Somewhat surprisingly, Allison convinced Jessie to fly her to New Orleans as soon as Terry called down and told them he was leaving Boston. Jessie reluctantly agreed, but only with the understanding that she would be flying home first thing in the morning, and Allison would be coming with her. Kit thought about going with them to see Terry, but he decided against it. He had absolute faith in Jessie's flying ability, and her IFR rating allowed her to fly at night. He was totally comfortable letting her fly to New Orleans for the night.

Though, her being out of the apartment for the night made it hard for him to sleep that night.

She called him from the plane at 7:45 the next morning, as he was on his way to work, the droning of the propeller audible in his ear. "Hey pretty kitty, on the way home?"

"Sure am, handsome fox," she answered. "About to taxi out and take off now. I should have Ally at AAIA right on time. I think it'll be the first time one of their students was delivered to the hangar from the flight line,” she giggled. “Here, talk to Ally, I gotta do the pilot thing.”

“Hey Kit,” Allison called. “Thanks for letting Jessie fly me to see Terry.”

“She doesn’t need my permission, hon, she’s a licensed pilot and that plane is half hers,” he chuckled. “How was the trip?”

“We got here at eight, and we literally met Terry on the flight line,” she laughed. “He took us out to a nice restaurant and we had a nice meal, then he put us up in a hotel downtown. Jessie got us up early so we could fly back in time for me to get to school,” she said sourly. “I wanted to stay here today, but Jessie won’t let me,” she laughed. “She said I paid too much money to skip out on school.”

“You did. Just think, once you get your license and your instrument rating, you’ll be able to fly to New Orleans yourself, no matter what time of day and what kind of weather.”

“Yeah. Yeah!” she said brightly. “Let’s get back, Jessie, I need to get to school!”

Jessie delivered Allison to school right on time, and as Kit worked, she continued packing. He left early so he could meet the installation furs from ADT at 2:00pm, and he and Jessie signed the contract and received a training session with the new system. They were installing three keypads for the alarm, one by the front door, one by the back door, and one in the master bedroom, and it was a slightly better keypad and system Kit had bought, so the installation team spent nearly an hour with them explaining the system and its features and functions. After they had that done, they cancelled the contract at their old apartment and scheduled a Monday appointment for ADT to come in and remove the system from the old apartment, and they were ready to move in. Dan, Lupe, and Mickey helped them move their bed, dresser, and dining room table over to the new apartment and set it up, and then Kit and Jessie spent the rest of the afternoon moving over the other important rooms, the kitchen and the bathroom. They intended to spend the night in the new apartment, so they needed enough to live over there. After they got in the boxes and brought over a couple of chairs, Kit put up the shower curtain in the master bedroom while Jessie hung her spice rack Terry gave her and started putting her cooking equipment up in the new kitchen. Kit went back and cleaned out the refrigerator and pantry, then brought over all their food. He left Jessie to unpack as he, Dan, and Mickey helped Lupe move his bed over to the new apartment as well, the four of them laughing as they wrestled with the king size bed.

“Such a big bed for such a little dog,” Dan teased as he and Kit picked up the box springs.

“Brah, I need plenty of space for my love harem,” he said, smoothing back his hair.

“Such a liar,” Kit laughed. “Alice has you on a leash and you know it.”

“She’s just in the dark about the rest of my girlfriends,” he said grandly.

“She’ll shave your fur off if she finds out about them,” he warned with another laugh.

“Brah, I can handle Alice,” he said with a grin.

“So, we still on schedule this weekend?” Mickey asked.

“Yah brah, eight o’clock on Saturday mornin’, be at the office. We’ll get everyone’s furniture moved all at once. We got a flatbed comin’.”

“Yeah, I’m bringing it from work,” Dan affirmed.

“Who are we moving?”

“All of us and Sheila, but furniture only,” Lupe answered. “Anything small enough to be put on the carts stays behind, we’re mainly after couches, beds, big dressers, washers and dryers, that kind of stuff.”

“I can’t believe Sheila’s taking a luxury unit for herself,” Dan laughed. “One little girl in a four bedroom townhouse!”

“Brah, you can’t talk, you and Mickey are takin’ units too!”

“Well, I’m a big guy, I need lots of space,” Dan said airily, which made Lupe chuckle.

“She’s used to living in a big place,” Kit said. “And I’m sure she can afford the rent.”

“Yah, she ain’t got no problem payin’ the rent,” Lupe chuckled in agreement. “I did make her sign a one year lease for it, though.”

“A year?” Mickey said in surprise. “Why so long?”

“So she won’t decide to move out next month,” he answered. “She wanted the apartment next door to Kit, so I made her pay for it with a long term lease,” he chuckled.

“Eh, I won’t mind,” Kit shrugged. “I get along with Sheila.”

“Ah, so she’s my duplex buddy,” Dan chuckled.

“Yah, and Mickey’s in the next one over. That keeps the poker gang all close to each other,” Lupe grinned. “I got an interesting call yesterday, too.”

“From who?”

“Kev. He’s lookin’ at a luxury unit. I think he’s gonna pop the question to Sammy.”

“Good, those two would be a good couple,” Mickey said, to which they all nodded.

“I thought you had the luxury units all booked,” Dan noted.

“Nah, I was keeping one in reserve,” he answered as they wrestled the mattresses out of Lupe’s apartment and towards Mickey’s waiting pickup truck. “Just in case. And Kev was kinda why I was keeping one held back, just in case a friend wanted one.”

“Can he afford the rent?”

“Brah, he’s a lawyer,” Lupe laughed. “You should just be glad I’m givin’ you a break on the rent, or you wouldn’t be able to afford it!”

“Yeah yeah, I know, and I also know that we keep it quiet,” Mickey chuckled. “If anyone asks, I’m paying twelve hundred same as everyone else.”

“That’s about six hundred out of my price range,” Dan chuckled as they waited for Kit and Mickey to pull the box springs up onto the truck. “I have no idea what to do with all that space. I’m gonna end up closing off some rooms. I don’t even have enough furniture.”

“I know that feeling,” Mickey laughed in agreement. “They’re gonna be echoes in my pad for like a year.”

“Take on roommates, make them pay a portion of the rent, live there for free,” Kit said idly.

Dan and Mickey both laughed. “Dude, that’s an idea!” Mickey said brightly.

“I ain’t got a problem with that, but remember that these aren’t the old units, guys,” Lupe said. “The inner ring has to maintain a certain appearance, cause I got snobby professionals moving in here. So there can’t be no beat up thirty year old cars in the carports, and you’d better find responsible furs that won’t bust shit up. The party jocks an’ shit have to stay out in the main complex. I gotta keep these luxury units in top shape.”

“No sweat, Lupe,” Dan assured him. “Alright, let’s go get the dresser so Lupe has something to wear tomorrow.”

By the time they were done moving Lupe’s bedroom over, Kit went to his own apartment and was greeted by a large, empty living room, with boxes stacked in the far corner. Where he’d go left and through the dining room to get to the kitchen, now he’d go through the short hallway almost across from the front door, which had the stairs going to the second floor, a tiny closet under the stairs, and a door for the den all on the right, a large utility closet and the door to the bathroom on the left, and the hallway ended in the kitchen, with the back door visible at the front end of the hallway. He padded back to the kitchen and saw Jessie bent down, stacking her baking tins into a lower cabinet in the island. “What a way to greet me,” Kit teased, patting her on her rump as he went by, to which she responded by swatting him with her tail.

“Get Lupe’s bed in?” she asked.

“Yah, and his dresser. He’s going back for his bathroom stuff now, but that’s his problem. Lupe said that Kevin called him about one of the luxury units, he’s gonna rent the last one available.”

“Really? That’s awesome news!” Jessie said with a bright smile as she stood up. “That means that he’s gonna propose to Sam! He doesn’t want to try to move her into that little efficiency he has, so he’s finding a suitable house for them!”

“Did you really think he wasn’t going to propose?” Kit chuckled. “He was waiting until he was established at the firm, and now he is. He’s billing hours now, a lot more than the other rookies in the firm. He wanted to be stable and secure, and he’s stable and secure. I hope we hear the good news soon. He’ll have to pop the question quick after Sam finds out about the apartment, or she’ll know something’s up.”

“Well, here’s hoping it’s soon,” Jessie smiled. “Now let’s go get more stuff.”

They did that, moving some small furniture and several more boxes, anything they could fit in the van and the truck. They wanted to move as much as they could on their own, leave only the heavy furniture and appliances, and also so they could accept delivery of the furniture they bought over the next two days. Most of it was coming on Thursday, but the overhead rack Kit bought for Jessie’s birthday was coming tomorrow, and the furniture store from which he’d bought it was going to install it and run the wiring from the light in the center. That was why it was so important to get ADT over here today, because they had things coming that were going to be installed in the apartment, and they needed the alarm installed first.

They managed to move quite a bit over in the four hours they had before they planned to stop, and Jessie made their first meal in the new, much bigger townhouse. She decided to fry hamburgers on the grill attachment that came with her new six burner stove, a layover grill that went over two burners, one of three layovers. She also had a flat griddle layover for pancakes and other griddle cooked food, and a large pot layover so a large pot could be set stably over two burners. It was just one little feature of their new restaurant-style stove, a stove which had cost Lupe a lot of money to buy and install and therefore would cost them since Kit had agreed to buy all special appliances that Jessie wanted in the apartment and pay Lupe back in installments, but a stove that Jessie absolutely demanded. And after seeing how useful it could be, Kit didn't mind paying for it all that much. He'd have to see if the other appliances built into the kitchen, large-volume washer and dryer, jacuzzi tub in the master bedroom, and the tankless water heating system that Jessie wanted and Lupe had installed would be worth it in the long run. But, he figured they would be. Jessie was very savvy about appliances and what should be in a nice house, and had been quite insistent about Lupe installing exactly the appliances she wanted, and installing several amenities that hadn't been part of the original design. But, she'd been so insistent, and Lupe had seen the practicality of her insistence, and that had made Lupe install a few of her demands in all of the apartments as standard amenities. The tankless water heating system, the small baking oven in the island, the enclosed microwave cubby by the spot for the refrigerator, the larger, family-sized refrigerators that Jessie wanted rather than the smaller apartment-standard refrigerators he initially intended to install, the intercom system in the house that had outlets in the living room, den, kitchen, master bedroom, and the front door so they could query visitors before opening the door, the laundry chute that ran from the hallway on the upper floor and into the basement, and the dumbwaiter that ran from the attic to the hallway just outside the master bedroom to the kitchen and then to the cellar, these were all original Jessie demands that Lupe had standardized for all the luxury units, for they seemed to be reasonable ideas for everyone in his eyes. He especially liked the idea of the dumbwaiter, put something in it and press a button for the floor the item was going, and one didn't have to lug it up the stairs.

He didn't have the heart to tell Lupe that the dumbwaiter was actually his idea. Dumbwaiters were quite standard in mansions, and were very, very useful, if a little pricy to install. The location of the dumbwaiter ate a little bit of attic and cellar space, but it let it run from the attic to the basement, which would give them a useful means of moving awkward items between floors. Instead of hauling a box up the stairs, they could put it in the dumbwaiter and let it take it up for them. The dumbwaiter carriage Lupe had installed had a load rating of 150 pounds and was three feet wide, two feet deep, and three feet high, which let them put a fairly good size box in it. It had also been very easy for the contractors to integrate into the designs, because of where it was located. They only had to reroute one electrical wire and an air conditioning duct to make room for the dumbwaiter shaft, since the motor was installed in the attic.

Vil called as they were eating, and Kit put it on speaker on the middle of the table. "Hey sis, how goes it?"

"It's on," she answered, a bit grimly. "Rogers and Lewis both retired today, effective immediately. Uncle Zach realized what I did as soon as Rogers cleared out his office, and he couldn't move fast enough to keep Lewis from following him out the door. In one day, I've taken away Zach's voting majority on the board, and now he knows he can't get rid of me easily. So, the elders are now on the warpath. Zach's put two names into consideration for the vacant board seats that are basically his yes-males. So there's gonna be open warfare in the boardroom tomorrow. Aunt Maxine visited me personally in my office and more or less just told me that Boston wasn't big enough for both of us, and one of us was going to be gone by Christmas. And she wasn't hinting that one of us would be moving. I got Terry out of here just in time, because Zach was looking for him this morning, and I intercepted an order out of his office to try to get Allison arrested in Austin, arrested for prostitution, but Zach learned quickly that he can't have someone arrested on a whim in a city I already control. So the gloves are now off. I'm already under lockdown. Stav and Marcus won't let me so much as walk by a window, and they hired some security guards for my house from the company they used to work for, so now my house and grounds are filled with large males wearing body armor and carrying assault weapons."

"Holy cow," Jessie breathed. "Are you going to be alright, Vil?"

"I'll be fine, Jess," she answered confidently. "I've actually been preparing for this for a while, so I'm ready."

"What's going to happen, Vil?" Kit asked.

"For now? The key to taking control of the family from me is to take my chair, so that's where the main fighting will take place, over my position as CEO. I'll be openly opposed in the boardroom by Zach and Jake, over absolutely everything. Even if I want to buy a new toner cartridge for my printer. Zach's now making it publicly clear that he thinks it was a disaster that I was put in the chair, and he wants me out, effective yesterday. He'll try to convince the board to vote me out, but I'll keep weeding out his sycophants one by one and either making them retire or having them arrested,” she said grimly. “I’ve already sent a few very interesting documents to the FBI over Simpson, because I found out she’s doing some pretty bad things. That old vixen bitch is going to get arrested as soon as the feds realize what I sent them. I’m sending a clear message that nobody that sides with the elders is safe from me. They’re going to attack me. I’m going to ignore them and strike out at anyone who sides with them against me, because they really aren’t important in the scheme of things. They need support to get rid of me, so I’ll attack them through that need. The rest of the board will learn quickly that anyone who openly opposes me won’t be working at Vulpan Shipyards for long. I don’t have to fire them to get rid of them.”

“What about the other three elders?”

“Well, Tom’s still seriously pissed at Zach for getting into a fight with Terry, so he’s too angry to be very useful. Sarah’s still riding the fence, as she usually does, waiting to see who’s going to win so she can support that side. Brian is actually washing his paws of this. He told Zach that the shipyard made a record profit last year, and he sees no reason to rock the boat. He told me earlier that Terry going out with an ex-stripper doesn’t come close to what Bess has done, so he sees that as no reason to start a war in the family over it. He certainly doesn’t approve of it, but he thinks a more diplomatic approach would be better than the older elders basically trying to unseat me from the chair.”

“What about the cousins?”

“As soon as the word got out, Boston cleared out quickly,” she answered with a grim chuckle. “Nobody wants to be in the middle of this, and they certainly don’t want their parents to know that they don’t agree with them. They want their freedom, but they’re more than happy to let me do the fighting so they can stay out of it. Every cousin in college decided to either go back to campus or go on an impromptu vacation. The femme cousins are bunkering down with their kids, and some of them left for summer houses. Bridgette took her kids to Florida, Chris sent his wife and kids to their vacation house in the keys, Louis sent his wife and kids to England to visit Matty's parents, and Wendy moved her family to their vacation house in Puerto Rico, getting way away from Boston. The short of it is that the others don't want to get pulled into this, so they're clearing out of Boston. They're giving me and the elders plenty of room to fight."

"Well, be careful, sis," Kit said seriously. "Don't underestimate the uncles."

"Oh, I'm not. But I'll have to leave them alone for now, until I cut away their support in the company. After I force out all their lackeys, then I'll push them out of the company. Maxine's right that there's not enough room for them and me in Boston. I won't stop until I'm the only Vulpan left on the board. Zach's made it clear that he won't stop until I'm gone, so I'm going to play by the same rules. By the end of this Zach and Jake will be out of the company. I may even force them completely out of Boston."

"What if they try to do to you what you're doing to them?" he asked in a roundabout way, fully understanding that if they were now at war, then no phone call was safe from tapping, at least on his side. He was fairly sure that Vil's phones were secure, but no cell phone was secure. So he had to be careful in how he phrased certain things.

She chuckled. "They're not ready to try that with me," she said. "If they want to blackmail me, they'll find that I have a hell of a lot more dirt on them than they have on me. They've had more years to build the skeletons in their own closets. All I have is a bone or two." She was silent a moment. “I’ve called Vanguard and told them to tighten up security in Austin, just in case,” she told them. “Stav and Marcus have also suggested a bodyguard to send to Austin. And I’m sending him down tomorrow. He’ll live in the complex so he’s close to you, but outside of that he’ll only be there if you need him. His name is Nick Lawson, and he’s a veteran of the same company where Stav and Marcus used to work before they became freelance bodyguards.”

“Vil, you don’t have to go that far.”

“It’s for my peace of mind, not yours,” she told him immediately. “I want a seasoned fur down there in case Zach goes crazy and does something insane, and also a seasoned security expert to be available for when me and Terry visit, someone that can make sure everything’s safe and normal. And the boys assure me that Nick is one of the best in the business. He just finished a contract working in Japan, and I contracted him for the next six months. He has extensive experience in this kind of thing, and has impeccable references. He’ll be very discreet, guys. He’ll be in the building right behind your apartment, so he’ll be close by if you need him. I’ve just finished talking to Lupe, and Lupe’s already agreed to rent him whichever apartment he wants.”

“I can’t believe you think it’ll get that out of control,” Jessie said fearfully.

“Actually I don’t, but furs in our position never take chances, hon,” Vil answered. “I’m sending Nick down there just in case. I don’t think he’ll be needed, but I’d rather have him there if you need him, than have you need him and him not be there.”

“Oh. Okay,” Jessie said, taking Kit’s paw and squeezing it.

“He’ll be calling you in about ten minutes. He should be there sometime tomorrow. Like you two, he has a pilot’s license, and he’ll be flying in using his own personal plane.”

“Well, we’ll have that much in common with him,” Kit laughed.

“He’s not the only one. Both Stav and Marcus are pilots too, though they don’t often fly. It’s considered a necessary job skill in their line of work. It’s hard to bring your weapons when you’re flying commercial, so most of them fly privately. A high-level bodyguard or mercenary usually has a pilot’s license, and most of them own their own planes.”

“They never told me,” Kit chuckled.

“They don’t tell anyone much of anything, Kit. If furs knew what they could do, it would make it harder for them to do their jobs. They like to keep their secrets, and one of those is that those two can fly my jet, and they can also fly the helicopter I often use for short trips around Boston.”

“I guess that’s a good idea.”

“It’s a matter of my safety, that way one of them can take over if my pilots get sick or hurt,” she said simply. “When I hired them, one of the things both of them did was find out what jet and helicopter I fly in and get rated for them.”

“Smart.”

“They’re professionals, Kit. Now, I’m gonna go ahead and go, I have some reports to read, and I have to get ready for battle tomorrow,” she chuckled. “Nick should call you very soon.”

“Alright.”

“Before I hang up, I want you to do one thing, bro.”

“What?”

“Make this very clear to Allison, bro. Make it clear that the family is after her, and that she must not, for any reason, leave Austin without either of you two, Sheila, or Terry with her. Zach’s already tried to get her arrested, then he found out that I control the DA and police down there. He may try to get the Texas Rangers or the FBI after her. I can prevent it, but it’s a lot easier if she stays close to my base of power, and that’s Austin. My protection doesn’t extend much past Austin. She has to stay close to the city unless she has a Vulpan with her, for her own good.”

“I’ll make sure she understands that.”

“That’s what I needed to hear. Be good you two.”

“Be careful, Vil,” Jessie said in a fearful voice.

“I’ll be very careful, sis-in-law,” she promised. “Don’t you worry about a thing. Like I said, I’ve been waiting for this, and I’m prepared for it. I’ll be fine.”

“I’m still going to worry.”

“Don’t worry too much. It’s not good for the baby,” she said. “Be good, bro.”

“I will. And do be careful, sis.”

“I’ve been planning this almost since I took the chair, bro. I’m more than ready for Zach and Jake,” she said confidently. “Bye guys. Love ya.”

“Love you sis,” Kit said, and the call was over.

“I hope she’s right,” Jessie said worriedly, squeezing his paw.

“Vil’s not one to not be prepared for what she knows is coming, pretty kitty,” Kit told her. “From the sound of it, she has a plan, and that’s always a good thing.”

“Do you really think that your uncles might try to hurt her?”

“I once thought they tried to kill me, love, I think they’re more than capable of it. But, Vil’s ready for that too. If they try, they’ll find themselves in a world of hurt.”

“Do you think we’ll be safe?”

“They have no reason to come after us, love,” he told her. “We have nothing to do with this. This isn’t so much about me as it is about Vil’s willingness to let the cousins do things the elders won’t tolerate. I may have started it, but it’s Vil that’s letting it happen. Sure, they could threaten us as a means to blackmail Vil, but to do something like that, you have to have credibility...and they don’t. Remember, Vil said that Zach tried to get Ally arrested, and he found out Vil utterly controls Austin. There’s nothing the elders can do down here, so we can just basically stay out of Vil’s way and let her crush our uncles. That she can do it, I have no doubt.”

“I hope she’ll be okay.”

“She’ll be fine, pretty kitty. Vil’s a big girl, she can take care of herself.”

“I think I’ll worry more about us,” she said fearfully. “You two were right about your family. They did go after Ally.”

“And Vil saw it coming, so she was ready for it,” Kit nodded. “She’ll be fine as long as she stays in Austin, love. Vil made it clear she’s protecting all of us, and that includes Ally and our friends. I’ll be Zach never saw that coming,” he said with a wicked chuckle.

The fur Vil hired was quite punctual. About ten minutes after Vil called, the phone rang again, and Kit answered it as Jessie picked up her plate. “Hello?”

“Mister Vulpan?” a male voice, deep, asked in a definite Australian accent.

“That’s me.”

“Nick Lawson, sir, did Miss Vulpan call you?”

“She did.”

“Good, good. As she told you, I’ve been hired to make sure you can go on about your business without a care in the world, and that’s exactly what’s gonna happen. That’s my mission in Austin, Mister Vulpan, to make sure you and your wife never feel a whit like anything’s wrong. I won’t intrude on your life in any way until it becomes necessary for me to take steps to keep you safe. Unless that happens, just consider me to be your neighbor. I’ll always be around to help you, even if it’s just to help your wife carry her groceries into the house.”

“Alright,” Kit said.

I’ll be arriving in Austin tomorrow at five o’clock, at Bergstrom. Now, I’ve been told you know the general aviation section of the airport. I’ve bought a tiedown spot out by Signature Services. Can you meet me there?”

“We can do that,” he answered.

“Good. I fly a Beech King Air. Now, may I speak to your wife please?”

“Sure. Jessie!” he called. “Nick wants to talk to you.”

She hurried from the kitchen and took the phone. “Hello? Mister Lawson? Nick,” she said with a light giggle. Kit picked up his plate as she listened. “Yes, that’s fine. I’ve never seen that plane before. Really? Yes, I have my multi rating. I’d love to!” she said with growing enthusiasm. “He offered to take us flying in his plane!” she told Kit. “Yes, we’re in the middle of moving to a new apartment right now. Yes, we have an alarm already, we wouldn’t move until it was installed. No, that’s fine. It was nice to talk to you, Nick. Here,” she told Kit, holding the phone towards him.

Kit took it, and Jessie took the plate from him and headed for the kitchen. “Hello.”

“Nice lady you have there, Mister Vulpan,” he chuckled. “She sounds like a sweetheart.”

“That’s a good description.”

“I need to ask, Mister Vulpan, do you keep a firearm in your house?”

“My wife shoots skeet, so we have two shotguns.”

“I see. Have either of you ever had training with a pawgun?”

“I haven’t. Odds are Jessie has. Pretty kitty, have you ever used a pawgun before?”

“Yeah, I used to go target shooting with Dad before he got into skeet shooting,” she answered from the kitchen.

“She has.”

“Good. Next week, both of you need to keep a day open for a training session. I doubt you’ll ever need a pawgun, but I’m a huge believer in firearm safety, so I train all my clients in the safe use of firearms as a matter of course. Consider it a free service I provide.”

“Well, that’s nice of you, Nick, but why do we need firearm safety training?”

“Like I said, I’m a big safety male,” he chuckled. “I carry a firearm as part of my duties, so I make sure that my clients are well versed in firearm safety in case they ever touch my weapon. I’m a firm believer that anyone that is even near a firearm should be trained in its safe and proper use, and you will be near my firearm. I don’t want you to visit me in my apartment and pick up my weapon by accident and not understand exactly how to be safe with it.”

“Well, when you say it that way, it makes much more sense,” Kit said with a nod to himself.

“I’ll let you get back to what you were doing, Mister Vulpan. I’ll meet you tomorrow at Signature at five.”

“We’ll be there.”

“G’day, Mister Vulpan.”

Kit disconnected the call and chuckled. Nick sounded like a nice guy. “At least he didn’t sound all professional like Stav and Marcus,” he told Jessie.

“I love that accent,” she laughed from the kitchen. “What’s a King Air, love?”

“It’s a twin engine turboprop, and a very nice one,” Kit answered as he came into the kitchen. “One of the few turboprops still actively produced. If he wanted a plane with a lot of cargo capacity and good all-around usefulness, he picked a good one. He can take off from a dirt runway with a King Air, where a jet can’t do that. I flew one of those when I was in flight school,” he chuckled. “We called it the old son of a Beech. It was an ancient King Air, made back like in the seventies. I swear, it had duct tape holding it together,” he laughed.

“That was the plane you always flew and made everyone else mad at you?”

He nodded. “Yup. An old Beech King Air, but if you just say you’re flying a Beech, pilots will automatically assume you’re talking about a King Air. I lived in that thing for about a year. I was logging twenty or more hours a week in it, and the other students could never get it, cause I always had it,” he chuckled. “Now let’s get the dishes done. We should start the dishwasher,” he laughed.

“For two plates and a skillet? Please,” she snorted, turning the water on in her brand new twin sink with a third smaller bay for washing vegetables, complete with its own sprayer. “Okay, so, what’s on the schedule for tomorrow?”

“The Lowe’s furs are gonna install the rack,” he said. “Outside of that, we meet Nick. That’s it. The rest of the furniture comes on Thursday.”

“Alright. What time are they coming to install?”

“Two, I think. If they’re still here when we go get Nick, I’ll have Lupe watch ‘em for us while we’re gone.”

“Sounds like a plan. I’ll be busy in here for a bit, love, can you go make the bed up?”

“I surely can,” he smiled in reply.

Nick Lawson wasn’t what Kit expected.

Kit had expected a dingo or other Australian breed, but Nick Lawson was a wolf, a black-furred wolf with amber eyes, fur so black that it looked like it was spun out of a moonless night. He was also huge. His voice was deep but wasn’t that deep, leading Kit to believe that he was maybe around six feet tall or so. But Nick Lawson was nearly seven feet tall, a huge, muscular, powerful wolf that had a nick taken out of his right ear and a small but visible scar on the end of his nose, the physical indications that Nick had seen combat in his life. He pulled in at Signature at 4:50pm in a white King Air with a large black stripe along its side, clearly his own private plane. It was one of the newer King Airs, one of the C90B’s, and probably had a glass cockpit...and had cost Nick a couple of million dollars. That he could afford a plane like that said much about his qualifications. This was a very high-priced bodyguard and security expert. Despite that professional pedigree, he got off his plane wearing bermuda shorts and a plain black tank top instead of a suit. “G’day!” he called as they came up to him. “Nick Lawson, nice to meet ya!” he said, shaking Kit’s paw energetically.

“Nice to meet you too,” Kit answered, and he shook Jessie’s paw.

“Hi,” Jessie said to him shyly.

“Well, bless me, I’ll be looking after a mommy to be!” he said with a toothy grin. “When’s your due date, Miss Jessie?”

“September thirtieth,” she said with a sudden smile.

“Wot, I’ll be here for the delivery, then!” he said brightly. “Let me lock up the plane, and we can go in. I should have a rental waiting here for me. What you can do for me is lead me to your complex, so I can talk to, uh, Lupe. That’s his real name?”

“It is,” Kit chuckled.

“Odd name there.”

“Lupe’s an odd chihuahua, but he’s a cool guy,” Kit laughed.

“He should have a lease for me to sign, as soon as I look over the complex and decide where I want to settle in,” he added. “Then it’ll just be a matter of makin’ myself cozy.”

“I’m hoping you were hired for nothing,” Jessie said, then her cheeks ruffled slightly. “I didn’t mean I’m not happy you’re here, it’s just, you know.”

“Of course I do,” he smiled. “Believe me, Miss Jessie, fellas in my line of work never want to actually work. As long as we’re bored, it’s all good. I’m here to make sure you never have to worry about a single thing. As long as I do my job right, the only time you’re gonna see me is when you wave to me in the parkin’ lot.”

“I don’t think it’ll be quite like that,” Jessie giggled.

“Not really, but seriously, I’ll just be your neighbor, and I hope that’s all I’ll ever be. Miss Vil hired me just in case. She said odds are I’d not have to lift a finger after I got everything all set up to my satisfaction, but she wanted me here to see that you’re not hassled or bothered, just in case.”

“That’s what she said to us,” Kit said. “Just in case.”

“Yah yah yah,” he said with a nod. “I’ll do a few inspections, install a couple of cameras, make some contacts with the police and other fellas in my line of work that are here in Austin, then it’s just settling in and earning my paycheck without you ever seeing a thing. That’s what guys like me love, when our clients never know we’re here, and yet you’re kept safe and sound.”

“Sounds good to us,” Kit told him.

“But, if you need me, I’m here for ya,” he told them. “I’m here to help in any way I can, even if it’s to help you move or unstick your garbage disposal or change that pesky ceiling light you can’t quite reach without a ladder. Twenty four seven, I’m always just a call away.”

“That sounds good, Kit can’t change a light bulb,” Jessie giggled.

“Hey! I can so! Just don’t expect it to work,” he said flippantly, which made both of them laugh. Kit was rather pleased that this Nick Lawson wasn’t quite so serious as Stav and Marcus. It made him much more affable.

Nick and Kit tied down his Beech, and then they went in. There was indeed a rental waiting for him, and it was a big Ford Expedition SUV. He followed them to the complex, and he looked around with a nod after he got out, parking on the curb in front of the house rather than pulling into the driveway. “Nice, nice,” he said approvingly, looking around. “Just built?”

“Yeah, they just let us start moving in on Monday,” Kit answered.

“Okee, take me to Lupe, and let me look around,” he said.

Kit did just that, since Lupe was in their apartment. The Lowe’s furs were just finishing installing the rack over the island, and they had it up when Kit and Jessie came into the kitchen with Lupe and Nick behind them. “It’s gorgeous!” Jessie squealed in delight, clasping paws before her. “Oh, Kit, it’s just perfect!”

“It did turn out very well,” the ocelot leading the three fur team nodded from the ladder where he was installing the wiring for the light in the island. “We installed the island on the same circuit as the main kitchen lights, Misses Vulpan, replacing the light that was here before we installed the rack,” he added with a point at a slender chain hanging down from the center. “But this chain is the switch for the light, so you can turn it on or off by itself. Just remember, the main lights have to be on to turn on the island light.”

“That’s fine, I wouldn’t use it without the main lights being on anyway,” she assured him. “Oh, Kit, I love it! I can’t wait to hang my pans up on it!”

“I’m glad you like it, pretty kitty,” he told her, putting his arm around her and kissing her lightly.

“Brah, they didn’t tell me you’d be so tall,” Lupe laughed to Nick, shaking his paw.

“I get that a lot,” Nick grinned in reply. “Now, I need to look over the units in the building behind this apartment, so I can find a good one.”

“No prob, brah, Vil explained what you’d need, and I’m ready,” Lupe said. “Said you might want to install a couple of cameras and would give me some recommendations of security I could install here.”

“Yah, I’m a licensed security analyst. I’ll inspect the complex and give you some recommendations, free of charge.”

“Cool, brah, cool. Lemme get my keys and we’ll take a walk.”

Lupe and Nick left, and Kit and Jessie watched as the installers finished with the rack. They tested the light and found that it worked, and Kit signed the installation form as the ocelot’s crew packed up their tools. “There you go, folks, we hope you enjoy it,” the ocelot smiled.

“I already love it!” Jessie gushed. “It looks perfect with the kitchen!”

“It does indeed,” the ocelot nodded. “You chose a very good piece for the kitchen.”

Kit and Jessie walked the installers out, and Kit saw Lupe and Nick come out of the community center, where Lupe had his new office. “Did the cable company come today, love?”

“Uh-huh,” she answered as he closed the door. “They ran a line to the living room and our bedroom, and the cable modem line is in our den. He tested it with his laptop and it’s working. So, we can move the computers over today.”

“I’ll call Mickey and see if he can lend us his pickup.”

With Mickey’s help, they moved the computer desk, printer table, and bookshelf, and Kit moved over the desktop. It took him over an hour to set up the cable modem and get the home network set up. He came out of the den and walked into the living room to see Lupe and Mickey talking with Nick. “Dude, how can you not have a home?” Mickey asked in surprise.

“I live where I’m needed,” Nick told him. “I keep my gear on my plane. When I take a new contract, I move in where I’m needed, like here. I’ll go out and buy a car and furniture tomorrow, then sell it all off when I’m done here and move on.”

“So, you’re here to guard Kit and Jessie like the way those panthers guard Vil?” Lupe asked.

“Nah, nah, I’m here just in case,” he answered. “Miss Vulpan wants some added security down here for a few months, because of the baby coming I’d guess, so she hired me to assess the situation and stay down here a while to make sure everything’s fine. She made it clear I’m only here as a precaution. I’ll be staying in the background unless I’m needed. Just makin’ sure,” he said with a smile.

“Well, that’s cool,” Mickey said with a nod.

“It’s an interesting way to make a living,” he chuckled. “I get to see the world, and if I do my job right, nobody notices a thing. That’s the way we like it,” he said with a smile. “Now, it’s a little late, so I’ll be headin’ to a hotel for tonight, Mister Vulpan.”

“Please, just Kit,” he corrected.

“Kit it is,” he nodded. “I’ll be back here at around nine tomorrow morning. Will you be here?”

“Jessie will,” Kit answered.

“Ah, good, she can let me in to do my initial walkthrough, and then I’ll assess the complex. Then I’ll go buy what I need to settle in. After that, I’ll sit down with Lupy here and give him my assessment of the complex from a security standpoint.”

“You got your apartment?”

“Yah, I found the one I want, and lucky for me it’s not already rented,” he laughed. “It overlooks the privacy fence, lets me make sure everything’s okay.”

“I guess he’s gonna be a peeping tom,” Kit laughed.

“It’s my job,” Nick grinned.

Nick was affable enough, but he was also all business.

Jessie told him about it during lunch. He came in and inspected their townhouse, and found it initially good. He liked the alarm package options that they’d chosen and the locations of the keypads, and his only real suggestion was the installation of locking bars to place in the tracks on the sliding glass doors leading to the deck and a deadbolt lock on the back door in the kitchen. He did not ask for the combination to the alarm, for a simple reason, Jessie said. “He said that if he needed to enter the house without our permission, he wanted the cops to come,” she told him, which Kit could understand as smart. The police were not Nick’s enemies. Kit was a law-abiding citizen whom Nick had been hired to protect, and the police and Vanguard security were part of that protection, so he would more than welcome their assistance. After inspecting the townhouse, he inspected the complex with Lupe, which took a good two hours. Nick pointed out possible problems to him, and they talked about a camera system that Lupe could install that would cover the entire complex but not be outrageously expensive, and they discussed the possibility of hiring a security guard to keep watch mainly over the community center, which might not be a bad idea given there was some expensive equipment in it. Nick even offered to help him set up his security, which Lupe rather liked. Additional security features like cameras, gates, and guards lowered the insurance for the complex. The one thing Nick liked was the gates that Lupe had installed on the inner ring, preventing unauthorized cars from entering the luxury apartment area. After the inspection, Nick left to go buy what he needed for his apartment, which was a two bedroom on the second floor of the building behind their townhouse, which would let him stand on his small balcony and see the backs of the townhouses. He was also going to meet with furs from Vanguard and the police, make the contacts he'd talked about the day before. "He said that he could be at our back door in thirty seconds from his apartment if we need him. I don't see how unless he jumps off his balcony and jumps the fence," she giggled.

"I'll bet that's exactly how he'd do it," Kit said seriously. "A wolf that tall could jump off a second story balcony without hurting himself, and I'll bet he could get over the privacy fence in about ten seconds."

"Maybe. He's out right now buying furniture for his apartment, and buying a car. He must have a lot of money to just go out and buy things like that, then sell them when he's done," she laughed.

"He's an elite bodyguard, love, I'm sure he's very well paid for what he does. I'm just glad he didn't try to move in with us."

"Well, he said he's here just in case. He doesn't need to be in the house with us unless things are for real."

“True,” Kit nodded in agreement.

“He did say that he might move into our townhouse if he thinks he needs to be there to protect us,” she added.

“I’m not surprised. Is the furniture there yet?”

“The bedroom pieces, gun cabinet, and the kitchen table are, the rest of it’ll be delivered around one or so,” she answered.

Nick was a professional, though. When Kit got off work, he saw the wolf arrive in the complex with a brand new Ford Expedition with temporary tags, the car he bought, and it was filled with suitcases, boxes, cases, and items from his plane. Some of those boxes and cases looked decidedly oddly shaped. Kit figured that they were filled with equipment, and probably weaponry, not available to him here in Texas, and maybe not even in the United States. Nick was an ex-mercenary and was now a personal bodyguard for hire, so Kit had no doubt that he was highly trained in military-grade weaponry, and most likely owned some...which was why he moved it all around in a private plane. He put it all in his apartment, and then a furniture truck arrived, pulling into the drive on the far side and disappearing behind the building. That had to be Nick’s furniture. Later, as they were moving more furniture and boxes to the townhouse from the old apartment, they saw Nick and Lupe up on the roof of the community center. Nick was installing a very small, almost invisible camera under the eaves of the roof facing their row of townhouses, Lupe on the roof and Nick on the ladder, securing the mount into place with a screwdriver. Nick motioned towards the townhouses while talking to Lupe, then both of them waved to them when they got out of their cars. After they finished, both Lupe and Nick helped them carry boxes and the small furniture they’d brought over from the apartment into the townhouse as Jessie fussed over the furniture that had been delivered earlier that day.

“You know, I should interview you,” Kit chuckled as he and Nick carried the coffee table into the townhouse. “I think it’d be an interesting article.”

“I’m a ham,” he grinned. “As long as you don’t ask me about trade secrets or what kinda guns I own, sure. I’m not a secret, Kit. I want anyone that might want to tangle with you to know that I’m here.”

“Odd position to take. Won’t that make them more careful?”

“It stops more trouble than it starts,” he answered seriously as they put the table down near the wall, since the other furniture wasn’t in the house yet. “Besides, how can I stay a secret? I’m just a tad easy to identify,” he grinned. “Anyone who works in my profession, or the professions my profession is hired to stop, already knows I’m here, they know exactly who I’m contracted to protect, and they know that me being here makes any attempt your family makes to cause you trouble much more expensive. Me being here may not stop the two-bit hoods that might try to steal your car, but me being here will scare away the professionals that might try to bug your car or try to hack into the state system to make it look like you didn’t pay your taxes or try to frame you for some crime so you get arrested.”

“Ah. I didn’t know you ranged out into those kinds of things.”

“I don’t personally, but I have mates that do,” he grinned. “When you hire me, Kit, you don’t hire just me. You hire me and any mate I call to ask a favor. I have a couple of mates makin’ sure your computer records don’t mysteriously change or vanish, and another mate is doing me a favor and making sure your IRS status doesn’t suddenly change. I also have a few mates that are in my direct line of work I can call and have them come down to help out if I think I need it,” he added. “Paying them comes out of my fee, so don’t you worry a bit about it. But I seriously doubt that you’ll ever need me to do that. Miss Vil hired those nutty panthers, and they’re very good. They won’t let anyone sneak anything up on me down here, because odds are they’ll nose it out and have Miss Vil take care of it before it ever gets down here. I’m only here just in case something gets past them...which is highly unlikely.”

Kit chuckled. “You know, I should be much more nervous that Vil thinks she has to send a bodyguard down here, but for some reason I feel much safer.”

“Then I’m doing my job,” he said seriously. “I want you to live your life without a care in the world and without ever feeling like you’re being protected.”

“Well, there’s one reason I’m glad you’re here.”

“What’s that?”

“I can slack during the move and let you do the heavy lifting.”

Nick gave him a look, then laughed brightly.

The day of the big move came with more than just the six of them ready to move some heavy furniture. Nick was glad to put a paw in, but they also got help from Sam, Kevin, Rick, Martha, Jeffrey, Mike, Danielle, and Lisa, basically most of the crew that didn’t work on Saturday. Savid had to bow out because he was taking his wife to Dallas, and Patrick wanted to come help, but Kit made him go to work and get some research done. They all met out at the old complex at 8:00am, and Jessie and Sheila greeted them all with homemade donuts made in Jessie's deep fryer, one of the gift appliances from the wedding that they'd left in a box for lack of space for it. But if Jessie had anything in her kitchen now, it was space for anything she wanted. The helpers were warned that they were moving a cluster of five apartments, which they didn't mind doing.

Lupe had a plan, and it worked out very well. Nick, Dan, Mickey, Mike, and Lupe moved the big, bulky items from apartment to flatbed while the femmes moved boxes, packing them into vehicles, and Kit, Rick, Martha, Jeffrey, and Kevin all moved smaller furniture on the paw carts, loading up an item or two and wheeling them over. Every single box or piece of furniture was either marked with the owner's name or tagged with a small colored paper tag, which indicated which fur owned it and which townhouse to which it would be taken once moved over. Once the truck and cars were full, they drove over, parked in front of Sheila's apartment, and they started unloading while Kit, Rick, Jeffrey, and Kevin continued ferrying over furniture on the carts. They would then unload, putting the furniture in the proper apartment and in the proper room but not setting it up while boxes were stacked in the living rooms of the appropriate apartment. Once the first load was done, the paw cart team traded with the box team so they didn't have to constantly walk back and forth, and they loaded up a second load. They moved the second load over and stopped for lunch, pizza, breadsticks, and soda bought by the six getting moved. After lunch, they started on the third load, which Lupe estimated would just about do it for the big stuff. They'd moved all of Kit and Jessie's furniture, Lupe's furniture, and Sheila's furniture, so they were working on Dan and Mickey's big furniture. Kit and Jessie's apartment was officially cleared out after Sheila and Martha brought out the last of the boxes and stacked them in Martha's van, and then Sheila's apartment was completely cleared when Kit and Jeffrey brought out a stand-alone full length mirror wrapped in blankets and put it on a cart, then started wheeling it the half block over to the townhouses. They managed to move all the big furniture with two more loads—more like one and a half—and then they used the flatbed to load up everything that was left. Lupe pointed to four moving vans out in the complex and chuckled. "I see we weren't the only ones that thought it was a good day to move!" he declared.

"So, when's the pool gonna be open full time?" Dan asked as he loaded a box of cookbooks from Sheila's house onto the flatbed.

"Monday," he answered. "I finally got a third lifeguard. That's why it was closin' early, brah, I didn't have enough guards. Next time I won't try to hire them in June, they ain't none left by then," he laughed.

"Could just go without guards, you know," Mickey noted.

"Not in Texas you can't," he answered. "At least not a pool used by kids. If it wasn't nothin' but adults then yeah, I don't need lifeguards. But Texas law's strict, brah. Any public pool a kid can use has to have a lifeguard on duty or the pool can't be open, even just open to adults. The only way I could get around that is to permanently ban kids from the pool, and I won't do that."

"Didn't know that," Mickey mused.

"Welcome to business, brah. They's always somethin' you don't know."

It took them about another hour to finish up. The flatbed and cars hauled over the last of the boxes, and they carried them and the small pieces of furniture into their respective houses. After the last box was carried into Dan's house, they all gathered out in Sheila's yard, then headed over to the community center. There, Jessie, Sheila, and Martha grilled steaks bought by the beneficiaries of the move, and they sat out on the outside tables, ate steak, baked potatoes, and grilled corn and sauerkraut, drank beer or juice, and relaxed after finishing a good day's work. All five of them were fully moved into their new apartments, though a few hours of work waited for them to put their new houses together to their satisfaction. "The rest of my stuff will be here tomorrow," Sheila said as she gave Kevin a plate holding a steak and a grilled ear of corn. "I had my apartment's furniture packed up and shipped down, as well as the rest of my things. The townhouse should be just big enough for it."

"What did you have up there?" Danielle asked her.

"A three bedroom condo with a den near the campus," she answered. "I may be putting some furniture out, since I have a living room suit coming, but I can fit the rest of my stuff in the new townhouse."

"Well, we could always use a new couch over at the sorority," Danielle said with a smile.

"I think I could see fit to have you guys hold it for me," Sheila grinned. "Since I'm not going back to Boston for a few years, I decided to just have my stuff sent down."

"I thought that your apartment was given to you by your mom," Lisa noted.

"The apartment yeah, but Higgins furnished it for me, and I bought the furniture. Hmm, I could hire myself a butler now that I have a spare bedroom," she mused. "Maybe I'll send up a call and see if any of the Vulpan servants want to come live in Austin for a while. I'd much rather have a family servant than hire someone I don't know."

"Never hurts to ask," Kit nodded.

"A family servant? You almost make it sound like a slave," Jeffrey noted.

"You've heard me talk about Clancy MacArren. The MacArrens have served the Vulpans for four generations, Jeffrey," Kit told him. "A MacArren has been the chief butler at my family's manor, Stonebrook, literally since it was built, and I think Clancy retired with nearly four hundred thousand dollars in the bank. It's not slavery, it's literally an institution, a tradition, for children to work for the Vulpans after their parents, and the Vulpans actually prefer it. They grew up with us, they know us and know what to expect, and we can trust them to keep the family secrets. In return for that loyalty, we pay them very well and give them good benefits. I think some of our servants have servants of their own," he chuckled.

"Yah," Sheila nodded. "Higgins is the third Higgins to serve my family. His grandfather used to work in Stonebrook, and his father left Stonebrook to serve in my mom's manor. My Higgins came to work for us after he got out of college, and he came to live with me when I went to Harvard to be my butler."

"Stonebrook isn't just a big house with one family in it," Kit explained when Danielle gave Sheila a curious look. "Some of the servants live on the manor grounds as well, and they have husbands, wives, children. Since some of the servants that work there also live there, much of what they do around the manor is for themselves as much as it is for the Vulpans who live there. I used to play with the servant kids when I grew up. There's like fifty furs working at Stonebrook, and about twenty who live there, mostly the senior staff. It's a matter of some prestige for a servant to be allowed to move to the manor. There are only like five Vulpans there."

"Wow, all the rich talk again," Lisa smiled. "I used to dream about being rich when I was a kid. Then I met you, and you ruined the fantasy," she laughed.

"Being rich doesn't solve your problems, dove, it just introduces a whole different set of 'em," Nick chuckled.

"Yah, when you cross over from earning money because you love what you do and enter the realm of earning money for the sake of earning money. That's when you get into the curse, when greed overtakes ambition. Ambition is good. Greed can corrupt it."

"Do what you love, hon, not what pays," Rick told her, taking a cup of beer from Lupe with a nod of thanks.

"What are you majoring in, dove?" Nick asked her.

"Geology," she answered. "I want to be a vulcanologist."

"Ah, now that's an interesting field!" Nick said. "What got you interested in volcanoes?"

"Well, I'm from a town in Washington State called Puyallup, and we have Mount Rainier and Mount Saint Helens near there," she said. "Mount Saint Helens erupted long before I was born, but I was always curious about it, and I've been interested ever since. So, I'm not going to school for the money," she giggled.

“Sam and Danielle are the sorority brains,” Lisa laughed. “The rest of us are taking much easier majors. I’m majoring in anthropology, but I don’t know what I want to do with it. I just like the classes.”

“Nothing wrong with that, dove,” Nick smiled. “Just don’t go into criminal justice. You’re too cute to be a cop!”

Lisa’s cheeks ruffled. “What do you do, Mister Nick?”

“Just Nick, dove, and I’m in the professional security business,” he answered. “Have you ever met Miss Vil?” Lisa nodded. “Notice those two wonky panthers with her?” She nodded again. “That’s what I do, dove. I’m hired by furs to make sure they’re safe. Miss Vil hired me to come down and check over the security here in Austin for her brother and Jessie, and also for herself when she comes visit them, and she hired me to be down here for six months. So, after I finish what I’m here to do, I’ll just kick back and take a vacation until my contract is done. So you’ll be seein’ a good deal of me if you come to see Jessie.”

“So you’re a bodyguard?”

“More or less, dove, but mainly what I do is assess security for a fur and a location, make recommendations on how to improve it, then make those changes if the client wants them. For Kit and Jessie, I’m more of a consultant than an active guard, because they don’t need me to guard them that way. I’m only down here just in case. Miss Vil wants a comprehensive analysis of Austin, so she hired me to come down here and inspect the city, inspect the new apartment complex, and assess possible security problems for her brother and sister-in-law, and also for Vil for when she comes down. But she also wants me on paw for a while, kind of on reserve, so she hired me for six months.” He chuckled. “This is a dream contract for me, wot,” he admitted. “I’ll do a month of real work and have a five month vacation, with pay.”

“Well, I certainly don’t want you to have to work,” Kit laughed.

“Too right,” Nick nodded. “Oh, by the way, I’ll be giving firearm safety training classes while I’m here, once I find a good shooting range to conduct ‘em. I’m always happy to teach anyone. Free, all you have to do is pay for any ammunition you use during the training.”

“That sounds interesting,” Danielle said.

“Always worth it,” Rick said mildly, giving Kit a slight smile.

“Thank God you thought it was,” Jessie smiled, looking at Martha.

After the steak grilling party to thank the helpers, the real work began. Kevin and Sam stayed to help Kit and Jessie get the furniture just right while the rest of the helpers went home, and Jessie unpacked boxes, hung pictures, and set up the house to her personal tastes. Kit had already given the house to her, more or less, to decorate as she wished, because he loved her sense of style and it would make her very happy to be surrounded by a place that was wholly and completely theirs. And it was truly theirs. Jessie had chosen the paint and carpeting, Kit had included some of the amenities, and Jessie had customized the kitchen to make it a serious cook’s dream. She had bought the furniture, and it was by consensus that the two of them placed it in the house. Kevin and Sam were good sports about helping them try several layouts for the living room before deciding on one with the wall unit against the wall near the door, opposite the hallway, and the couch and love seat flanking their chairs, which faced the TV and stereo. A small tea table stood between their recliner chairs, Jessie’s knitting bag was resting under the small stand, and the coffee table was in the middle. The stand with the capitol building was on the wall near the opening to the dining room, and beside it was a new stand with the model Grandma Pearl had given them for Christmas, a model of their Cessna 400. Over it was their little “wall of achievement” holding their type rating certificates hung in a circle and the silk banner upon which their wings were pinned in the center. Jessie had mirrored the layout of the old dining room for the new one, the table dominating the center of the room, with the china cabinet and china closet side by side on the far wall, and the chandelier she’d picked out hanging over the table just so. The kitchen only held one piece of furniture, a small table set near the window and right beside the sliding glass door. Kit went down and hooked up the washer and dryer in the basement, their hookups not far from the laundry chute and the pillar-like shaft of the dumbwaiter. The basement had been cordoned off into two sections. One was clearly the laundry, with a rack for detergents, a clothes hangar pole, the washer and dryer, and room for an ironing board, all close to the stairs. The wall under the stairs held three wine racks setting side by side, running from the edge of the stairs to the wall, which would eventually hold their wine collection. A draw curtain had already been installed so the wine could be kept in the dark. The other side of the basement held several boxes and totes that they were storing, mainly some Christmas decorations that Hannah had sent them, old ones she no longer used in her extravagant Christmas trees. Hannah went through decorations like crazy, buying them, using them only once or twice, then storing them away to eternally collect dust, so her unused decorations were enough to decorate three trees. Jessie’s old things from her room were also down there, but those were going to be sent to the attic once Jessie went through them and decided what to keep and what to store.

And the dumbwaiter would make that easy when they attended the matter...just load them in the basement, press a button, take them out in the attic.

Getting that washer and dryer down into the basement had been fun, and exposed one of the small design flaws of the house. The stairs came down to a landing and then turned and came down two more steps before reaching the basement floor, and that turn had been something of a bottleneck. The washer and dryer had been too big to easily navigate that turn, because of the banister pole.

The upstairs was much easier. They'd put all their furniture in the master bedroom where they wanted it when it was moved in or brought in by the furniture store furs, so there was no moving around, and the furniture furs had set up and placed the baby's bedroom furniture and the first guest bedroom furniture already. That only left them to set up the bed in the second guest bedroom, and that was basically all there was in the room. They'd not bought any other furniture for the room quite yet, nor did they really plan to do so anytime soon. But that was furniture, and there were boxes to move. Kit and Kevin carried the lighter or smaller ones, but Jessie would load one of the heavy or large ones into the dumbwaiter and send it up. Once they got every box into the room where it was destined to go, Jessie made them fruit smoothies, which they enjoyed on the back porch, which was a spacious deck with a built-in propane grill, built right into the deck, and with the bricked patio beneath it with the large barbecue pit. The deck grill was their personal grill, the pit was for old-fashioned barbecue and also for parties. The deck had a family picnic table built into the deck near the grill, and also had a retractable awning which would cover the deck with shade. The retractable awning was something extra that Kit had bought after first seeing the deck, but Lupe was thinking of buying one for his own deck.

“So, Lupe told me that you’re renting the last inner unit,” Kit noted as he showed Kevin the retractable awning, which rolled overhead to cover the deck with a sheet of sturdy nylon cloth.

“Yeah, I’m signing the lease for it tomorrow,” he answered. “It’s gonna be a bit empty for a while,” he chuckled. “I can afford maybe three rooms of furniture, and that’s also using my credit card.”

“Dude, I know you make more than that,” Kit pressed.

Kevin coughed uncomfortably, then came close to him. “If I hadn’t bought a ring, I’d have more money,” he said quietly.

“So the truth is revealed,” Kit laughed. “Congratulations in advance.”

“Dude, she’s gotta say yes,” he said nervously.

“You won’t know until you ask,” he pointed out.

“But then she can say no,” he said, scrubbing his muzzle nervously.

“Kev. Ask her. I can say with some authority that you’ll like what she has to say. Remember, she’s one of my wife’s best friends, and my wife talks to me.”

“Really?” he asked with hope in his eyes.

“Trust me. Ask her tonight.”

“I’ll be so nervous I won’t be able to get it out,” he chuckled ruefully.

“Don’t say a word, just hold the ring case out. She’ll know what you’re going to say. After she says yes, it’s much easier to ask properly,” he smiled.

“I may do that,” he chuckled. “I asked her over to my place tonight. I was going to try, but I wasn’t sure if I’d have the nerve. I’ve never felt this way, Kit.”

“In love?”

“Terrified,” he answered with a wincing smile. “I’m terrified she’ll reject me.”

“That’s love alright,” Kit chuckled. “All I can say is the longer you wait, the longer you’ll not be married. And it gets to a point where you want that more than anything else in the world. I swear, the last week of my engagement to Jessie was hell. Not because we weren’t already intimate, but it was that she wasn’t mine. I wanted that ring on her finger worse than anything in my whole life.”

“I remember, you were bouncing off the walls,” he laughed.

“Don’t get that bad, ask early,” he advised with a light smile.

“Well, since we’re basically done here, maybe I’ll ask her as soon as I get her home,” he said as Kit retracted the awning.

“Works for me, we still have some things to put away, and we don’t really need any help. I certainly don’t want you to see Jessie putting her underwear away,” he grinned.

Kevin laughed. “I’ll have to get used to five bottles of shampoo in the shower.”

“It’s worth it, bud, it’s worth it,” Kit told him sagely.

Kevin did just that. He collected up Sam abruptly, almost pulling her out of the kitchen as she helped Jessie put away some of her rarely used utensils, and Sam looked a little annoyed as he hustled her out of the house. “Well, what was that all about?” Jessie asked from the kitchen, looking down the hallway as Kevin closed the front door.

“Kevin wants to take her home,” Kit told her. “He’s going to propose to her tonight.”

“Really! That’s wonderful!” she gushed, clapping her paws happily, then giving him a quick hug. “That poor male, Sam won’t even let him finish popping the question before she says yes,” she laughed.

“He’s really nervous about it,” Kit told her. “I told him to just take out the ring box and let her see it, then ask after she says yes.”

“That’s a dirty trick, taking away Sam’s moment,” she accused, then she laughed.

“If I remember right, a certain overenthusiastic kitty proposed to me,” he noted playfully.

“Well, I did let you ask properly afterward,” she replied haughtily.

“Then nearly burst my eardrums screaming,” he teased.

“I had every right to be excited, my deepest wish had just come true,” she said with a smile, sidling up against him and kissing him on the muzzle. “Well, my second deepest wish. The deepest wish is in here, keeping me from seeing my toes,” she laughed, putting a paw on her rounding stomach.

“Eleven weeks and four days,” he purred in her ear, nuzzling her, which made her purr for real in reply. “And you are not fat.”

She laughed helplessly. “I’m not that big yet,” she told him. “We’ll see what you say when my belly’s all the way out to here, and I can’t even get out of my chair without help,” she grinned at him.

“I’ll think you’re the most beautiful femme that has ever lived,” he told her. “Hmm, I wonder if I can carry you up the stairs.”

She giggled. “After we finish. I want us to go to bed with everything in place. I want to go to bed in our new home, and not have to get up and have to unpack a single box!”

“We’re almost done,” he noted.

“Yeah, we are,” she winked. “So, the more you help, the sooner we get done,” she said invitingly.

Kit bent to the task with exaggerated enthusiasm, which made Jessie laugh. But he did get back to business, because he rather liked the idea of going to bed knowing that the unpacking was done.

It took them nearly four hours to get everything finished, because they weren’t just unpacking, they were also hanging pictures, tweaking furniture arrangements, and completely finishing all the little things that would make them officially completely moved in. It also took them longer than they expected because they took quite a few things that had been stored in boxes since their marriage, gifts from friends, things from home, Kit and Jessie’s things from their respective prior homes, all those things they’d been keeping in boxes because their two bedroom apartment just didn’t have the room. Kit went through the boxes he’d gotten from Boston and took what he wanted out, and boxed what he didn’t want and sent it to the attic. Jessie did the same, going through the things from her high school days, keeping some of it, boxing the rest. She kept out her collection of plush and figurine unicorns and putting them in Laura’s room. Around 11:00pm, Jessie carried the last box to the dumbwaiter, a box filled with broken-down boxes they intended to keep, stuck it in the dumbwaiter, and sent it to the attic. Kit, who was in the attic, took it out and set it with some of the other boxes they'd put up there. Jessie met him in the upstairs hallway as he came down the attic steps, folded them up, and pushed it back up and into the ceiling. "Well, we're done, handsome fox," she said with a naughty smile.

"So we are," he noted with a smile, slipping a paw around her waist and pulling her into an embrace. "Well, fancy meeting you here, Misses Vulpan," he said as he nuzzled her cheek. "Aren't you supposed to be home?"

"Why I am home, Mister Vulpan," she said teasingly, her fingers seeking out the scars on his back, tracing the lines she knew so well with her fingers. "Congratulations, handsome fox. We are moved in. Completely, totally and irrevocably moved in!"

"May we never move again," he said seriously.

She laughed and nodded. "Once is enough!" she agreed, then she squealed in surprise and delight when he bent down and pulled her off her feet, picking her up. "Well now, it was so nice of you to come upstairs so I wouldn't have to carry you all the way up."

"I should make you take me down just so you could," she winked.

"I'll just put you in the dumbwaiter and ship you up," he grinned.

"You will not!" she declared with a laugh.

"I dunno, I'm sure you'll fit, and you certainly don't exceed its maximum weight rating...yet," he hummed, which earned him a smack on the shoulder.

“That way!” she said imperiously, pointing towards the door to the master bedroom, at the end of the hall, with her longhaired tail.

“I thought you’d never ask,” he hummed, turning and carrying her in the direction she wanted to go.

They woke up that Sunday morning and knew they had nothing to do.

It was a glorious feeling. There were no boxes to pack. There were no pieces of furniture that needed to be moved. There was nothing to do but enjoy their new house, their new four bedroom, two story townhouse with the big swimming pool literally right across the street, the kitchen Jessie could get lost within, the big deck in the back, the jacuzzi tub in the master bedroom, the new TV in their bedroom, and still with that new house smell that told them they were the first furs to live here.

And Kit hoped they were the only furs that would be there for a long, long time.

It would take a while to adjust to the new townhouse. They’d been there since Wednesday, but before it had been half empty, and all of their stuff had been over at the old apartment. But today, Kit woke up with Jessie curled up against his back, her arm thrown over his side, and saw their furniture in the new room, which was twice as big as their old room, saw the picture of the vase and ivy on the wall, saw Jessie’s robe tossed over the back of the vanity bench, saw the dressers with the pictures of Vil and Jessie’s family atop them, saw his alarm clock and little lamp on the nightstand, and saw that it was 10:17am. Neither of them were used to sleeping so long, but they’d done a lot of work yesterday. There were new things, though. Things like the ceiling fan over the bed which turned silently and slowly, circulating the air. The soft blue pile carpet was definitely different from the beige, worn-out carpet in the old apartment. There were new pieces of furniture flanking the vanity, and the new gun cabinet was over in the corner, Jessie's skeet shotgun locked safely inside it. The ADT alarm pad was on the wall across from the bed, right near the door, and on the right wall was a pair of doors. One went to the large bathroom, the other went to a very large walk-in closet. There were windows on the wall behind the bed, flanking the bed, windows that looked out over the pool, and a single window on the left wall that looked out into the area between their townhouse and Sheila's townhouse. Sheila's townhouse was mirrored in layout to theirs, so the window over on her townhouse was to her master bedroom, which would let them wave to each other over the carports and the strip of grass between them.

Their first morning waking up to being officially moved in.

Naturally, that meant that they'd be disturbed. The doorbell rang, and Jessie groaned beside him and put her paws over her face. "Whoever that is, I'm gonna shave their fur off!"

Kit was mindful enough to realize that they had the new toys now. He got up and went over to where the ADT pad was, for right beside it was the intercom. "You have thirty seconds to run before Jessie chases you down with a pair of clippers," he said in a weary tone, which made Jessie explode into laughter from the bed.

"But I brought beignets!" Allison cried through the speaker.

Before he could even turn to look, Jessie was by him, her finger on the button. "Ally!" she said excitedly. "Wait right there, I'll come unlock the door!"

“Robe!” Kit called warningly when she opened the bedroom door and moved to run down to the front door.

Jessie laughed and skidded to a stop, and caught the robe Kit threw towards her. He turned off the alarm as she pulled on her robe and hurried down the three steps then made the turn, vanishing from sight.

Kit put on his shorts and grabbed a tee shirt, and padded down the stairs to the living room to see Jessie already giving Allison a tour of the house. Allison was wearing a pair of khaki shorts and a tank top, and she looked lovely, as usual...but she was still only second fiddle to the absolute perfection of his wife. “The living room just came together perfectly!” Jessie gushed, waving her paw towards the living room set. “Oh, and you have to see my kitchen!” she said, grabbing Allison by the paw.

“Woah, woah!” Allison laughed. “You can give me the grand tour tomorrow,” she declared as the door opened again, and Terry looked in. Terry was wearing a simple white tee shirt and a pair of knee-length shorts, the kind with the oversized pockets on the outside near the hem.

“Hey cousin,” Kit called, “come on in.”

“Sorry to disturb you guys, but we were in the neighborhood and wanted to see the new place,” he said.

“Not a problem,” Kit assured him.

“You guys hungry? We just got up and I need to cook breakfast,” Jessie invited.

Allison looked to Terry, he looked to her, then they both laughed. “Sure, why not?” Terry said. “We’re not doing anything we can’t postpone.”

“What are you doing today?” Kit asked.

“Dunno, it’s Ally’s turn to pick the things we do,” he smiled in her direction. “Yesterday I picked the activities, now it’s her turn. She told me to dress this way, so I guess we’re gonna be outside today.”

“How’s New Orleans?” he asked as Jessie and Allison went upstairs, chattering like little girls.

“A mess,” he grunted. “The employees just let everything go when they found out the owners were negotiating with Vil to sell out. The first thing I had to do was assure everyone I’m not clearing them out,” he grunted as he came in and sat on the couch. Kit sat in his chair and listened. “Right now I’m going through their paperwork trying to get a sense of where things stand. Yesterday I had to deal with a threat of a general strike by the shipyard workers,” he said with a groan, leaning back. “I think I got in over my head with this.”

“You’ll do fine,” Kit chuckled. “Why were they going to strike?”

“Because when Vil bought the shipyard, their contract was voided,” he answered. “Right now they’re working at the same pay and benefits as their original contract, but you know Vil will never keep that contract. The union furs know it, so they’re trying to get the workers to strike now, and cause all kinds of problems during the transition, which just totally mystifies me. I mean, why start off like this? They’re doing themselves no favors making this confrontational not even a week after the sale.”

“Well, Vil said the prior owners had lots of problems with this union.”

“Yeah, but this is dumb,” Terry snorted. “Do they really think threatening to shut down the shipyard not six days after the new owners take over sets a tone of cooperation? I had to call Vil to tell me how she wanted it dealt with. I can't make a call like that on my own."

"I know Vil," he chuckled. "Did the union reps pee their pants when you called them into your office?"

"Just about," he laughed. "I told them that anyone who struck would be immediately fired and not hired back, then I told them that if the union went on strike, I would fire every member of the union on Friday, whether they honored the strike or not, which means that anyone who wants to work at the shipyard will quit their union. Classic Vil union-busting tactic. When they laughed at me and said we'd never finish our contracts on time, I showed them a faxed schedule of moving workers from our other facilities to Avondale to replace them. Then I told him that they weren't dealing with a little company that didn't know how to play the game, that they were dealing with Vulpan Shipyards, and if they didn't want to adhere to our high standards and be part of our family, they could walk. They're supposed to have their vote at a meeting today. I expect the vote will pass, but I also expect that quite a few workers will quit the union and cross the picket line. We've made it clear we can build ships without them, and anyone who doesn't want to be part of Vulpan Shipyards can walk. If they want to keep their jobs, they'll be at work tomorrow morning."

"And if they strike?"

"Let them," Terry shrugged. "We'll bring in a security company and clear them out. They're not striking over the contract, they're just trying to force us to accept that bloated piece of garbage they managed to bully the previous owners into accepting. These Louisiana furs are about to find out what bullying really is."

Kit laughed. “Vil said that the previous owners sold out for a song because of the union,” he mused. “I guess this is their way of getting revenge, selling to someone that will crush the union that basically ran them out of business.”

“What will piss them off even more is after we’ve swept out that union, we’ll allow the union from Jacksonville to send representatives to form a new one,” Terry grinned. “Vulpan Shipyards isn’t anti-union, it just won’t tolerate it when unions try to blackmail us for benefits far beyond what they deserve. We treat our workers well, and we expect our workers to treat us well in return.”

“The paw of the Ice Queen reaches far,” Kit said sagely.

“It feels weird being the paw of Vil in New Orleans,” he laughed. “I wonder if she’ll put me there permanently after I finish the transition. This interim shipyard director title feels clunky.”

“Who knows? If you do a good job, maybe she will. After all, by then, you’ll know more about Avondale than anyone in the company. Who’d be better to run it?”

“If I want to stay there,” he laughed. But the way his eyes softened when Allison came down the stairs in front of Jessie, who was now wearing a pair of sweats and a tee shirt, Kit had the feeling that Terry would want to stay close to Allison, and keep Allison away from Boston for the same reason that Kit kept Jessie away from Boston.

“Hey boys,” Allison said with a smile, seeing the appreciative look that Terry was giving her. “What do you want for breakfast?”

“Jessie, love, we have the stuff for crepes?”

“Sure do,” she said with a smile and a nod. “Come on, Ally, you can see my kitchen in action!”

“I need to see this kitchen,” Terry noted, his eyes never leaving Allison until she vanished into the short hallway back to the kitchen.

“Come on, I’ll give you the dime tour,” Kit offered.

Kit showed Terry the whole apartment, from the cellar to the attic, pausing in the kitchen to gose Jessie and nearly make her spill a cup of milk, and also got them chased out of the kitchen with a wooden spoon. Terry seemed quite impressed by their townhouse, both in its construction and its decoration. “It’s a little small, but it seems to have everything,” he noted as they walked out onto the deck behind the house.

“Small? Terry, this place is huge,” Kit protested. “Room for four bedrooms on the second floor, and with the master bedroom taking up almost half the floor by itself! That’s big out here in the real world.”

“The real world!” Terry laughed. “What, Boston’s not real?”

“Real as in the world most furs live in, not the fantasy world the Vulpans occupy,” he said, leaning against the picnic table. “Out here, furs don’t own four houses, ten cars, have money in Swiss banks, and have servants doing everything for them.”

“I only own two houses, thank you very much,” Terry laughed. “My house in Boston and a vacation home in Vale. But I’m looking for something more permanent in New Orleans. I found a nice apartment in the central business district that’s a fairly straight shot to Avondale, just get on the expressway, over the bridge, and it’s an easy drive to the shipyard. It’s a little small, but it’s got a lot of amenities that’ll make it feel more homey.

I've already found a nice place here too," he smiled. "Out on Lake Travis, in a community called the Vineyard. Five bedrooms, garage, private pool and basketball court, pool house, private boat dock, boat house, two acres of grounds, fenced and gated and in a gated community, a cozy little place, for one point six mil cash up front. I had an agent buy it at auction, it was a foreclosure, and I sign the papers for it tomorrow morning before going back to New Orleans," he announced. "God I love the housing crisis, that same estate was going for two point nine mil at its highest, then came down and down and down, and finally went to auction," he laughed. "But I guess it's a sign of the times when luxury houses in exclusive communities get foreclosed upon."

"You bought a house here?"

"A vacation house, yeah," he answered. "I want someplace mine when I come to see Ally."

"Sounds like you're settling in," Kit chuckled.

"Nah, I'll sell the house after I'm done with it, or just keep it so I have someplace to stay when I come visit you. I'm sure Vil would love having a place to stay, and I could earn some bonus points letting her use my vacation house," he grinned.

"Careful or she'll make you give it to her," Kit teased.

"Eh, if I'm not using it, she's welcome to it. Besides, it's five bedrooms, I'm sure we could share it if we're here at the same time. But we'd fight over the master bedroom I suppose," he laughed.

"So, what did you do yesterday?"

“Yesterday we went all over Austin,” Terry answered. “I drove all over the city, exploring it, then we went out to a local ranch and went horseback riding. We went to New Braunfels to swim and float down the spring river, to get rid of the smell she said,” he laughed, “then we came back and went to the baseball game, the Express. I had no idea that Allison loved baseball, and the team here isn’t bad for minor league. We went to the Blanton museum, then I took her out to one of my favorite sports.”

“They play polo here?”

“Of course they do,” he smiled. “We went to watch a polo game, and then we played a round of golf. I had to let her keep it close,” he laughed. Terry was extremely good at golf. Just like Muffy had taken many lessons in ice skating and had become very good, Terry had loved golf when he was in his teens and spent a great deal of time and money taking lessons and practicing, just as he’d learned to play polo, and was actually pretty good. Terry was a very physically active Vulpan. “After that, we went to a nice dinner, then I took her to a movie. That surprised her,” he chuckled. “From polo and golf to going to see a movie. After the movie, we went to a few bars that had local bands she likes, then I took her home. I had no idea she was so into heavy metal music,” he chuckled.

“Quite a shock to a blue-blood,” Kit laughed. “I wish Jessie liked metal. I have to listen to that God-awful pop music tweenie crap when Jessie gets her paws on the radio dial.”

“Hey!” Jessie protested as she opened the sliding glass door. “You leave my good music alone, or no food for you!” she warned.

“There’s a Denny’s about two blocks from here,” Kit noted to Terry, which made him laugh and Jessie give him a hot look.

“Oh, inside, you tin-eared curmudgeon!” Jessie said, pointing behind her.

“I think you’re gonna pay later,” Terry said slyly.

“Eh, I pay every day, it’s the price I pay for what I get from her in the bedroom,” he said flippantly, then squeaked in surprise and a little pain when Jessie reared back and slapped him hard on the rump, then he laughed brightly as he rubbed his backside with both paws even as he wagged his tail at Jessie teasingly.

“We have two beds that don’t hurt your back now, you treacherous male!” Jessie warned. “You can’t keep me from tossing your tail out of the bedroom!”

“She has a point,” Terry noted as he followed Kit into the kitchen.

“I wouldn’t be there long, I’m just too loveable,” he said haughtily, which made Allison giggle.

Jessie swatted him again on the rump, more lightly this time, then kissed him on the side of his neck. “He is loveable,” she agreed in a kittenish voice. But then her claws came out and sank into his shoulder and side, giving her a grip on him that would cost him some fur, skin and blood to break. “But he forgets who has the claws in this family,” she added, which made him explode into laughter.

“One of the dangers of being married to a cat,” Terry noted clinically to Allison, to which she nodded sagely.

“Well, at least she can’t bite him that hard,” she added. “That short little muzzle has no character.”

Jessie laughed. “Stop the racist comments,” she giggled, pointing at them. “I can’t help it if I’m a cat living in a world of foxes. Blame this handsome fox here for chasing me down and making me marry him,” she giggled, nuzzling Kit’s neck from behind.

“Well, at least you’re part fox,” Kit told her. “We’ll give you an honorary membership into the snobby fox club.”

“I don’t need in a club like that,” Jessie laughed, letting him go with another kiss. “Now let’s eat.”

Terry got to enjoy Jessie’s crepes at the kitchen table, the four of them sharing it, with a selection of syrup, blueberries, strawberries, and bananas, and they listened as Allison told them about all the places they went yesterday, then smile when Jessie asked them where they were going today. “I made sure he wore his outdoor clothes,” she said with a wink at Terry. “I’m not going to ruin any of the surprises, but let’s say that he’ll be going to bed with sore feet tonight,” she laughed. “Gotta work the rich boy,” she winked at him.

“Baby, you’re looking at the most outdoorsy Vulpan of them all,” he said challenging in reply. “I fly fish, deep sea fish, ride horses, ski, ice skate, backpack, ride snowmobiles in the winter and motorcycles in the summer, play polo, golf, tennis, and hockey, I do almost everything!”

“We’ll see,” she said with a slight little smile, taking another bite of her crepes.

“That sounds like a challenge to me, Terry,” Kit said mildly.

“I do believe you’re right, cousin,” Terry answered. “A Vulpan never backs down from a challenge,” he said with a smile at Allison.

“Yo! Anyone home in there?” Sheila’s voice came over the intercom, and then the front door opened. “Kit! Jessie!” she called.

“In the kitchen!” Jessie shouted back.

Sheila strutted in from the hall, wearing a pair of workout shorts and a halter. “Hey!” she said with a smile. “So you two are taking a break from the whirlwind?”

“A little,” Terry chuckled. “How you doing, cousin?”

“Doing great,” she answered. “I’m gonna go get a workout in, then come home and unpack. I’m still getting my place set up. Good news!” she said with a grin. “Higgins caved! He’s coming down!”

“Higgins is moving to Austin?”

She nodded. “I had to give him a raise, but he’s agreed to come down and keep my new house. But I told him we’re sharing the cooking duties,” she grinned. “Higgins is actually a good cook, so it’ll rock to have him right there to help me learn. I think he refused earlier because of the apartment I was in,” she laughed. “But when I told mom about my new place and how it’s more suitable for a Vulpan, Higgins asked for some pictures of it. When I sent them to him, he agreed to come down. He’s gonna live in the first floor room, so I have to go out and buy him some furniture tomorrow after class.”

“All that work to make you normal, and it’s all gone,” Jessie laughed.

“I’m a Vulpan, Jess. I’ve been slumming down here since I came to get away from Cybil, but now that I’ve decided to stay here, I’m settling in properly. That means a nice house, a butler at the very least, and being waited on in a manner more suitable for a fox of my station.”

“Listen to this,” Kit noted to Jessie, who laughed at his tone. “Your station, eh? You’re a whiny little brat. I didn’t realize that was an official station.”

“You’re the brat, Kit,” she retorted. “And Terry would agree with me. It’s a crime you don’t have a butler, and you make Jessie clean everything!”

“He doesn’t make me clean, he does half the cleaning himself!” Jessie protested.

“And that’s a scandal!” Sheila announced, giving Kit a grin. “A Vulpan does not clean.”

“Afraid I’ll have to side with the brat on this one,” Terry chuckled. “I have a butler, a maid, and a cook. They’re still up at my house in Boston, but if I move to New Orleans permanently, they’ll either come down or they’ll fold back to Stonebrook and I’ll be hiring new servants.”

“Kit, any word on things from Boston?” Sheila asked. “I talked to my mom yesterday, and she’s all kinds of pissed off.”

“Nothing since Friday,” Kit answered, “after Vil shot down the board nominations that Zach was trying to push through, then adjourned the board until next Tuesday, when she’ll nominate her own board members. She went to England for the weekend, and hasn’t called me since she left. What did your mother have to say?”

“Just what you’d expect,” she grunted sourly. “You’ve set a bad precedent and Terry followed it, you two are destroying the reputation of the family, us kids have no idea of the proud traditions of the family, we’re all a bunch of whiny ingrates, yadda yadda yadda and all that shit,” she said. “I spent nearly an hour listening to her spew. I think she’s majorly overreacting,” she frowned, leaning against the island, her tail slashing to her side. “The tabloids don’t say a word about you and Jessie up in Boston, and while the tabloids are wondering who Allison is, they’re not sure where she comes from. She came in with Kit and nobody saw her either arrive or leave, so they have no idea who she is and where she’s from...and they’re searching for her,” Sheila chuckled, giving Allison an amused look.

“They are?” Allison asked.

“Yeah, but don’t worry about it,” Sheila chuckled. “The tabloids think that Terry got in trouble with Vil and she shipped him out of Boston, so they’re not quite so curious about it now as they were. They’re more interested now in the juicy gossip of why Terry got thrown out of Boston. Sure, that’ll come back to you, but once they know, they’ll basically let it die. After all, Terry’s not in Boston, and how can they hold attention on him the next time they get shots of Bess doing her best to make Paris Hilton look like a nun?”

“How do you keep up with the Boston tabloids down here?” Terry asked curiously.

“Muffy, George, and Joy, they call me a lot,” she answered. Joy was the fourth child of Uncle Jake, 18 years old and had graduated from Weston last month, the elite high school for rich kids that just about every Vulpan had attended since the family struck it rich back in the early 1910’s, building iron and steel battleships for the Navy. Joy was a Party Pack member in training, far more interested in parties and boys than she was in attending Yale in the fall. George was the second youngest child of Maxine, 19, and was starting his sophomore year at Harvard. As Vulpan went, George was pretty typical. He was intelligent, but had little ambition or motivation to do anything other than chase girls and play games...though

Kit had to admit, George was very good at hockey, playing goalie for Harvard. His problem would be when the NCAA finally realized they were getting the run-around when it came to testing George for banned substances. George indulged in drugs as much as most of the other younger cousins, and he'd get suspended the first time they managed to test him. "Muffy said that her dad's staying out of it, but Joy got into a fight with her mom and dad when she defended Terry and Kit. She said they called her a harlot, which Joy thought was funny," Sheila laughed. "She shot back that her parents had slept with everyone but each other since she was twelve. Her mom almost slapped her, she said."

"Well, they don't have anyone to blame but themselves," Jessie said simply, taking another bite of breakfast. "Kids learn by watching their parents, and what do your parents do? Nothing. So the kids do nothing."

"Well, I can't argue that one," Terry laughed. "My dad certainly didn't do anything. I don't know why I grew up to have actual ambition. That's something that's like nonexistent among the cousins. I think only like six of us actually work, work for real and not just pretending to work in black hole departments in the shipyard, and I think me and Kit are the only ones that have jobs that actually matter."

"The only elders that work are Uncle Zach, Uncle Jake, and Uncle Brian," Sheila said. "My mom's never worked a day in her life, and if Jessie's right, I guess that's why me and all my brothers and sisters don't do shit."

"It's more than just not working," Jessie said. "If the way your mother treated you when she came down here is any indication how the other parents treat their kids, well, I'm not surprised so many Vulpan kids hate their parents so much."

“Hey, my mom’s getting better,” Sheila said defensively. “She hates the idea I moved down here, but she does like the idea that I have a plan to do something with my life now. She thinks a restaurant is a silly idea for a business venture, she thinks I’d do better starting another kind of business, but at least I’m not cutting classes because I’m hung over from a night of raves and chasing down guys to screw.”

“See, if they’d just let you do what you want, you and your cousins would straighten up,” Jessie said darkly.

“Well, not all of us,” Terry chuckled. “Some of the Vulpan cousins are hopeless, and I’ll be the first to admit it.”

“Bess,” Kit said with a nod.

“Mary,” Sheila nodded.

“Victor,” Terry added.

“True, but look at Sheila and Muffy. They’re in the Party Pack, yet each of them has a plan,” Jessie motioned at Sheila. “The parents want to control the kids like they were controlled, but that’s not going to work. The kids have money, they don’t need their parents, and they’re rebelling against that control. The parents should just let them go and be who they want to be.”

“That will never happen,” Terry sighed. “So long as we bear the name Vulpan, our parents will try to control our lives.”

“And that’s why Vil has gone to war against the elders,” Kit said simply. “They want to control her too, and she’s tired of it. So she’s showing them that they are no longer necessary in the family.”

“That’s why I think you’re the lucky one, Kit,” Sheila said without much humor. “I’ve never seen you happier, and if you ever really, really need anything, well, Vil’s there. And so am I.”

“You introduced me to Ally, so I guess I owe you a little something too,” Terry chuckled, reaching over and patting Allison’s forearm fondly.

“I’ve said it thousands of times, Sheila. The Vulpan fortune is a curse, and I want no part of it.”

“That’s not entirely true, you know,” Terry said sagely. “The Vulpan fortune bought you your plane, and most of the furniture in this house, and your flight training, and you’re living off your dividends from the stock Vil sold you...which she sold to you for like a hundredth of what they were worth, I might add,” he chuckled. “You seem to have no problem getting some of the benefits of the family fortune, you just don’t seem to want the burdens that come with all that money. And if you had the money yourself, if Vil hadn’t have let you split it up among us, I think it wouldn’t change you too much, if anything because you truly understand just what it really means to have that money. I think what you should really say is the curse of the Vulpan fortune is that it’s become an institution rather than a family, and those of us who were born into the name never had to work for what we have, all we had to do is obey rules that are ridiculous today. That makes us jaded and robs us of our ambition. That’s something you’ve always had, Kit, and that makes you immune from the most sinister part of having money. I think you dreamed of flying fighter jets the first time you ever saw one, when you were like five,” he chuckled. “And after your accident, you just refocused that dream on your magazine and on your wife. You still have ambition, and that makes you safe from the family curse.”

“Well, the curse will be broken, then,” Sheila said sagely. “Vil will break it when she kicks our parents’ asses. She doesn’t seem to much care what we do, as long as we don’t stain the family name.”

“Vil’s a realist, Sheila. She knows she can’t change the cousins, so she’s letting them go,” Kit told her. “The ones that want to end up in an early grave from overdoses and diseases are being released to pursue that early grave. The ones that want to work and make something of themselves will get that chance, because Vil won’t stop anyone from doing what they want to do.”

“In a strange way, Vil’s doing the same thing our parents are trying to do, just from the other direction,” Terry noted, lowering his fork and pondering a second. “Vil is restoring the family’s honor by releasing the cousins from the control of the elders, and letting them be who they really are, be it bad or good. There’ll be some scandals, that’s for sure, but in the end, the cousins will be happy. And happy cousins will probably be more productive, more respectable, and less apt to be daily fixtures in the tabloid rags. You’re perfect example of that, Sheila. You went from devoted member of the Party Pack to a femme with a plan for the future, all because you felt like you got free of your mother’s control when you came to Austin and realized there is a life beyond what you knew. And we have Kit and Jessie to thank for coming to that epiphany, they taught you how to live, not just exist. Our parents want the family to be this mythical construction filled with foxes who all think the same way and march lock-step with the wishes of the family’s leader. Vil is taking an entirely different approach, one more sensible in today’s culture. But in the end, both approaches end up with the same result, a family that appears united on the outside and moves with a single purpose on the inside when it comes to family business. And Vil can pull that off because once she frees us from our parents, the cousins will obey her, obey her in ways we'd never obey our parents. Our parents use a stick, Vil will use a carrot. And when it comes to family business, well, the cousins who are pursuing their own interests aren't dead weight dragging the family down. Vil and move forward with a much lighter ship. She'll truly become the matriarch of the family, because she'll have control over everyone. She'll gain control by letting us go."

They were all quiet a moment, then Sheila laughed. "So deep," she grinned. "We should all be wearing togas and debating Socrates."

"I think Terry hits the nail on the head," Kit nodded in agreement. "Vil can control the family by giving them a longer leash to be themselves. She'll free the cousins because they'll break free of their families after they realize that their parents can't stop them, but Vil will put her foot down and lay out the new rules, which basically say do what you want as long as you don't tarnish the family name. That's how she'll control the cousins, by reining them in when they get too wild, but other than that she'll just let them go on with their lives. Everyone's happy in the end except for Jake, Zach, and Maxine."

"They could use some misery," Sheila grunted. "They've given me enough of it since I moved down here."

"How so?" Jessie asked.

"Uncle Zach tried to get me thrown out of Harvard," she said with a dark frown. "Mom stopped it and smoothed it over, but he still tried to do it. Uncle Zach seems to think he's Uncle Luke, and he uses the same ham-fisted tactics." She laughed. "But I guess Vil will fix that."

“God, the last thing we need is another one like my bastard father,” Kit sighed.

“Just another reason to root for Vil,” Terry chuckled.

“I swear, they’re better than the midday soaps, aren’t they?” Allison asked Jessie, which made all three Vulpans explode into laughter.

“The green eye is for intrigue, the amber eye is for scandal,” Terry said cheekily. “That’s how we keep our eyes on two things at once.”

“Well, let’s finish breakfast so I can make those eyes focus on one thing,” Allison smiled at him.

“And which part of your lovely body should I stare at today, hmm?” Terry asked, which earned him a smack from Allison.

“I’d say you walked into that one, Ally,” Sheila laughed. “But that’s a point. I got a lot of work to do, and I’d like to have it all done before Higgins gets here Tuesday. My last hurrah doing my own work,” she giggled. “So lemme go get my workout done, then tackle those boxes in my living room.”

“Don’t break a claw doing that manual labor, Sheila,” Terry teased, which caused Sheila to flip him off.

“I’ll let myself out, later guys.”

“You should, you let yourself in all the time,” Kit noted.

“Bite my furry ass, cousin,” she called as she left the kitchen.

They finished breakfast quickly after Sheila left, and Jessie forced Terry to help her with the dishes afterwards, make him do a little manual labor, which made him laugh, but he also did it. Afterward, Allison begged off another attempt by Jessie to give her a tour of the house. “We have to go, Jess, we have things to do!” Allison laughed, taking Terry’s paw. “And we’re wasting daylight!”

“I guess here comes that twenty mile forced march,” Terry laughed. “Eh, I’ll live, I have to prove to Ally that I’m no creampuff,” he winked at her.

“I’ve seen the pads on your feet, you’ll be begging for mercy after an hour,” Allison challenged, but she was smiling.

“I’m from Boston, dear, my pads may not be calloused, but I guarantee you that they’re five times tougher than yours,” he said with a smile. “Unlike most furs in Boston, I don’t wear shoes in the winter.”

“Then let’s see who gives up first,” she teased.

“I’ll put twenty bucks on you quitting first.”

Allison’s eyes lit up noticeably. “So, you’ll put money on it, will you?” she asked with a dangerous smile. “If you’re going to put your money where your maw is, it has to be real money. I’ll bet you a thousand dollars you’ll give in before I do.”

“I thought you said real money,” he teased flippantly. “Ten thousand.”

“You’re on,” Allison said immediately.

Kit exploded into laughter, almost falling over.

“What?” Terry asked, a bit annoyed when Kit wouldn’t stop.

“She just boonswoggled you, cousin!” he wheezed. “You didn’t ask what you’re going to do!”

“So? I can out-march her on a hiking trail no problem.”

“She just said you’d quit before she did. She didn’t say what you were quitting!”

“Kit!” Allison said warningly.

“She just has to pick something that you’ll refuse to do!” he laughed. “And you lose the bet!”

“What are you talking about?”

“I think you’ll look quite smashing pole dancing, or walking the jogging path along the river in a bikini, Terry,” Kit wheezed, which made Jessie explode into laughter herself. “You left the conditions up to her!”

Terry gave Kit a strange look, then laughed helplessly. “So I did, so I did,” he admitted, giving Allison an amused look. “But she wouldn’t do that. Allison likes to fight fair. She wouldn’t cheat me out of the bet.”

“You don’t know me very well, Terry,” she purred. “Get your checkbook out, you’re going to need it,” she warned, which made Terry laugh helplessly.

Chapter 31

Allison won the bet.

She came by the office during lunch and showed him the check she made Terry write, a $10,000 check, that had the word VOID scrawled across it in big bold letters. Allison hadn't cheated at all when she took him out, but she beat him by literally running him into the ground. Allison jogged as a means to stay fit, jogged to give her endurance when she used to dance, and she was more than capable of running Terry to exhaustion and force him to stop. She did that first, and after he recovered, they went on a canoe trip on Lake Ladybird, which turned out to be a comedy of errors since neither of them knew how to paddle a canoe, then they went on a driving tour of the hill county to the north and west and then the ranchlands to the south and east. They went to dinner and an opera that night, and when Allison took Terry back to his hotel, she made him write her the check. Then, when he wrote it, she voided it right in front of him and reminded him that their relationship wasn't about money. She kept the check, though, which was now voided on both sides and had the account number on the check cut off to prevent anyone from ever using it, and she intended to put it in a little frame and hang it in her bedroom. That fact amused Terry to no end, for some reason.

Terry also checked in, as he and Pat were going over the next and last major section of the election special, the elections themselves. They were going to research the voting method, voting laws, and the history of voting, but from the discriminatory days against African and mixed breeds and also the Trivia Pursuit style questions, like the one state election in Arizona that was won by one vote...and the losing candidate had forgotten to vote in his own election. “Tomorrow a courier is going to drop a box off at your house, cousin,” Terry told him. “Inside is a set of keys, a remote, and a code for the alarm. Those are for my new house. The remote opens the gate, and the code is for the alarm. There should be three keys. One is for the front door, the second is for the boat house, and the third is for the pool house.”

“So it’s final?”

“Yup, I signed at nine this morning and wrote a check,” he answered. “Took a huge bite out of my account, but it’s worth it. That house was being sold for a tenth of its value, so I just have to wait for real estate to come back from the bottom-out. I’ll be able to sell that house for more than I paid for it when I’m done. The agent’s gonna do the legal paperwork for me, but the house is mine. I wanted you to have a key to it, just in case you need access to the house. And when Vil comes to visit, she can borrow your key to get in.” He chuckled. “I also gave a key and remote to Ally. At first she didn’t want them, but I told her it wasn’t about giving her anything, it was so furs I can trust have access to the house in case there’s a problem. I trust her not to go in there and trash the house, I just want someone I know and trust down there with a key in case it’s needed. And I told her not to give Sheila the key to that house for any reason,” he added, which made Kit laugh. “I’ll hire a caretaker for it in the next couple of days. I may offer it to a Vulpan servant before I look locally, but I’m not sure if any of them would want to move to Austin.”

The more serious call came from Vil, who called him as he and Rick were going over the layout for the issue after next. They’d had the financial meeting that morning, and it was good news and bad news. The good news was that circulation had increased faster than Kit expected, by nearly 5% more than he expected, but the bad news was that the first bill for the health insurance plan had come in, and that took a big chunk of the good profits they'd been making right out of the mix because they had to make a larger initial payment than they would monthly payments. But they'd been expecting that, and they'd built up a solid war chest for expansion with several weeks of strong profits and few expenses. The magazine had $57,394.55 in the bank, the result of six weeks of strong sales and an average profit of $6,700 per week added to the money they already had available. Some of that money was the investment that both Rick and Kit were owed by the magazine, which they had both opted not to take, to keep the magazine flush with capital and capable of expansion. Kit himself had pumped $46,394 into the magazine since he became a partner, paying salaries, paying for radio advertising, and paying for two weeks of printing large circulation, and Rick had put $52,000 into the magazine through business loans and personal investments, and there was only one loan left outstanding the magazine had to pay. The $12,250 owed to Bank of America would be paid back immediately, the check going out tomorrow, since getting that debt off the books was their primary goal. Both Kit and Rick wanted the magazine to have no debt, because the dark clouds on the financial horizon told both of them that getting the magazine on solid financial legs was a very good idea. And one way to do that was to eliminate their major outstanding debt. It would cut some of their capital, but both of them agreed that right now, given the way the financial world was looking, clearing their debt would be a good idea.

It had been serious enough for Kit to decide to sell most of the stocks in his portfolio and reinvest that money in T-bills. Kit had a feeling that Kendall was right, and it might be a good idea to cash out of the market now, wait a few months to see what happened, and then buy back into it when things looked stable. Kit had sold the stocks that morning, and had even managed to make $433 out of the deal, his stock picks more up than down. If Kendall was right, there was a crash coming, and Kit could just buy back in when things bottomed out, which would give him a net profit in the long run. Selling a thousand stocks for $4,300 then buying the same thousand stocks six months later for $2,000 was sound business.

“Hey sis, how was Britain?” he asked as he got back to his office.

“Windy,” she answered, “but we had fun. How did the move go?”

“All done,” he answered. “We unpacked the last box Saturday night. We’re all settled in.”

“Good, you’ll need to send me a video, I want to see it.”

“Sure, Jessie already did a video documentary of the entire house, she even narrated it,” he chuckled. “It’s nearly an hour long.”

“Overnight it to me, bro.”

“Sure, I can do that,” he promised. “So, any news on the front?”

“Oh, yeah, there’s news,” she said darkly. “Simpson is gone. And I mean gone. She’s nowhere in Boston, and the FBI is looking for her. Turns out she got advance warning of what I did from someone, and she cleared out her bank account and ran. So, given that information, she was voted off the board this morning. And, on another note, it seems Uncle Zach has found a different way to come after me. Uncle Zach is suing me.”

“Suing you? Over what?”

“Breach of contract,” she grunted. “I got served the papers today. He’s pretty clever in how he worded it. He’s not suing over my ownership else he treads into the forbidden zone of the contract, so he’s instead suing me saying that I didn’t uphold my promises when I took the chair, which was a condition of me being CEO. If he wins, I lose the CEO chair...but he can’t take my stocks, so it’s a pointless exercise, since I can exercise my rights as the majority stockholder and boot anyone that takes my place. He can’t take control of the company from me, but he can aggravate the hell out of me.”

“Does it have legs?”

“Of course not,” she snorted. “It’s a nuisance suit, bro, there just to annoy me. He knows he’ll lose, he just wants to tie me up in court. He’s attacking me through my bank account.”

“Huh?”

“I can’t pay for my legal defense through the shipyard, not for this,” she growled. “I have to pay for it personally. In all, I got served with sixteen different sets of papers today, bro, sixteen different lawsuits. Add five miscellaneous lawsuits over different aspects of my running the company with eleven other lawsuits he filed this morning suing me over aspects of Stonebrook, and it adds up fast. And you know I don’t have as much money as he does. He’s trying to bleed me.”

“Criminy,” Kit grunted. “So, what are you going to do in revenge?”

She laughed darkly. “Oh, I have a plan,” she affirmed. “It starts tomorrow, when I put a new piece of business before the board.”

“And what is this?”

“Getting rid of Zach,” she said bluntly. “First thing in the morning, I’m putting his termination up for vote by the board.”

“What?” he gasped. “I didn’t think you could!”

“Oh, I can now,” she told him with dark humor. “When he filed suit against me, he violated his Vulpan Shipyard executive contract. He didn’t introduce the matter before the board before filing suit, which violates the internal resolution clause in the contract, and he also violated the non-disclosure agreement surrounding my CEO contract, which violates his secrecy clause in his contract. His lawyers filed the suit as a sealed proceeding, but the judge threw out the seal order, which made it open and violated Zach’s contract with the shipyard,” she said smugly. “And he can’t say he never signed one. I have it in front of me right now.”

“I seriously doubt they’ll fire him. Doesn’t it take a three-quarters majority and no dissenting Vulpan to fire a Vulpan off the board? I thought you said you had a voting majority, but not a three-quarters majority.”

“Yeah, I have a two vote edge since I canned Rogers and Lewis and Simpson fled the country, and that’s why immediately after I lose the termination vote, I’ll exercise my power as CEO in a way the board can’t stop. I’ll censure Zach for misconduct, levy the maximum fine I can, which is half his yearly salary, and then suspend him from the company for the maximum period without pay. That’ll be one month he’ll be suspended from the company. Hell, he won’t even be allowed into the shipyard, and I’ll take delight in watching security take his ID and escort him out of the yard. The board can’t stop me, because when I introduce the motion to terminate him, I’ll have to prove I have standing. When I prove that, then when it comes time for me to punish Zach for breaking his contract, the board can’t stop me, I’ll have already proved his misconduct.”

“That’s probably why he did it, sis. All it costs him is a quarter million and a month of sitting at home engineering his efforts to get rid of you.”

“Ah, yes, but consider this, brother dear,” she said smugly. “While he is suspended, he is not a member of the board. He officially loses that title while he’s serving his suspension. What that means is that if I can prove he got information about confidential board meetings while he’s suspended, I can temporarily suspend the entire board until such time as I discover who is leaking classified information. That’s one of my powers as CEO. And in instances where the board is suspended, the CEO can fire the offending board members without votes. Simply put, if I suspend the board, I can fire Zach and whoever told him what’s going on in the board meetings, and nobody can gainsay me. It’ll be an easy way to get rid of both Zach and Jake in one fell swoop. Jake won’t be able to resist telling Zach what’s going on in the meetings, especially after I bait him into it by doing something in a meeting that’ll make him run straight to Zach like his tail was on fire. And the instant he does, they’re both gone. I’ll sweep them out, then get rid of every fur they bribed, and reform the board with furs loyal to the company, not our uncles. And the instant he’s out of the shipyard, he loses standing to file the suit, and it gets dismissed.”

“Yes, and you telling me that just told Zach exactly what you’re going to do. This isn’t a secure phone, sis.”

“You think Nick’s down there for his health?” she asked lightly. “Your cell phone is secure now, bro, and your work Blackberry should be secure by tonight, including everyone on the network. Nick took care of it.”

“How did he pull that off?”

“Ask him if you want,” she chuckled. “He’s not down there for a vacation, bro. It may not look like it, but he’s working, and he sends me daily progress reports.”

Kit backtracked. “Wait, he’s suing you over Stonebrook? How?”

“He’s suing over operational costs and an attempt to make changes to the manor, to tear down a couple of the guest houses on the grounds. Like I said, bro, he’s trying to bleed me. He’s being very careful not to sue over anything that you can challenge as part of the agreement we signed, but he’s going after every tangent he can find. He has eleven different lawsuits suing to make changes to Stonebrook which I won’t permit, attacking me because I’m the primary owner on the deed. He’s even suing to force me to change cell phone plans at the manor. His strategy is to find any reason to sue, no matter how frivolous, and then overwhelm me with legal fees. A classic tactic of a rich fur exploiting the legal system. He’s going to try to break me defending myself from him.”

“Oh, hell no,” Kit growled. “He’s dragging me into this when he starts filing lawsuits over Stonebrook, and I’m not getting dragged into this mess. If Zach doesn’t withdraw every Stonebrook suit by tomorrow afternoon, I’ll kick his ass.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Make a very ugly threat,” he answered in a steely tone, which made Vil laugh. “Is the main phone number the same?”

“Sure is. I’ll let you have at it, bro. Have fun,” she said with a laugh, then she hung up.

Kit then dialed a number he hadn't used since he was 15 years old, but knew better than his own name. "Stonebrook Manor, this is Stanley MacArren, how may I help you?" came the rich voice of Stanley MacArren, the chief of staff of Stonebrook, the servant that ruled the house. That number used to ring into a switchboard, but now it ringed into a phone that the chief butler carried, not a cell phone but rather a landline using a floating phone that could be used anywhere on the manor just like a cell phone, and a phone from which Stanley could route calls to their destination. The number was the official number for the manor itself, and it was actually rarely used, since it dealt mainly with manor business. Those inside the manor all had their own personal cell phones, and so they were called directly. But since Kit didn't know Zach's number, he knew if he called the manor, Stanley could route the call to Zach.

"Stan," Kit called.

There was a gasp. "Master Kit!" he said excitedly. "Is something wrong? Did Father not answer his phone?"

"No, I'm sure Clancy's fine, Stan. I'm not calling to talk to him. Is my uncle there?"

"Umm, hold on. Dee!" he called away from the phone. "Has Master Vulpan returned home yet? Yes, he's here," he answered. "Sorry I couldn't answer, but I've been down at the docks. They've been replacing the dock planking the last couple of days, and I was down there fighting with the contractor."

"Put me through to him," Kit said grimly.

"Certainly, Master Kit. Should I tell him who's calling?"

“Oh, yes, do so,” he growled. “And tell him that if he does not answer the phone or shunts me off to someone else, I will come up there personally. And tell him to remember what I said the last time we talked face to face about what would happen the next time he saw me.”

There was a startled silence. “Yes, Master Kit, I’ll make sure he understands the, ah, gravity of the situation.”

Kit had to wait for about two minutes, and then the phone went live. “What do you want?” Zach asked in a grating voice.

“Neither of us wants to talk to the other, so let’s make this to the point. You will withdraw every lawsuit you filed over Stonebrook tomorrow, and you won’t file another one. Ever.”

“And just why should I do that?” he asked challengingly.

“Because if you don’t, you’ll be out of the gate by Wednesday afternoon,” Kit answered immediately. “I don’t care what games you and Vil play with each other in Boston, they don’t concern me, but you will not drag me into your fight, and you’re doing that when you start filing lawsuits over Stonebrook. My name is on that deed. You have no right to pull me into your petty bickering.”

“What makes you think you can give orders over Stonebrook? You won’t even spend the night here,” Zach sneered. “I have every right to do anything with Stonebrook I please, since my name is on the deed. The manor and its accounts are all mine, no matter what that piece of papers says.”

“What makes me think I can do it is because I can,” he snapped. “I’m not debating the point with you, Uncle Zach. You can drop the Stonebrook lawsuits or you can paw over every cent the entire family has over to me, and then you'll get to explain to your brothers and sisters why they're suddenly penniless."

"What?" Zach asked hotly.

"It's simple, Uncle," Kit growled. "Vil will sign her portion of the deed over to me if I ask her to do it, and that's legal. That's the way it's set up. And when Vil does that, then I will be the primary owner. So, if you don't drop every suit you have going concerning Stonebrook, that means that all those suits you have concerning Stonebrook aren't filed against Vil anymore, they're filed against me. And do you remember what it says in the agreement about you suing me, Uncle?" he asked. "If you don't remember, allow me to remind you. If you try to sue me, you invalidate the entire agreement, and I get everything. So, I'm going to call Vil right now and have her draw up the document that signs Stonebrook over to me as the primary owner and makes her the secondary owner, switching our spots on the deed, and she's going to fax it to me. I'm going to sign it and fax it back to her. And there's not a damn thing you can do about that, since your position on the deed doesn't change...and if you try to sue to stop it, I can bust your ass from here to Poughkeepsie because you cannot sue me. So, Uncle, if every lawsuit concerning Stonebrook is not dismissed or withdrawn by five o'clock tomorrow, she'll file that deed at the courthouse first thing Wednesday morning. And the Vulpan family will be penniless by lunchtime, because I will invalidate the agreement and take everything."

"You fucking son of a bitch!" Zach howled into the phone.

"You dragged me into this stupid fight, Uncle," Kit growled in reply, "when you started messing with Stonebrook, and now I'm going to take Stonebrook right back out of it. You forget, my name is on that deed, and I don't want any part of your scheming against Vil touching me. And when you mess with Stonebrook, you are messing with me. This is your only warning. Leave Stonebrook and anything else with my name on it out of any games you play with Vil, because you're encroaching on me when you do. I will not be pulled into your games. Just leave me the fuck alone, and I mean that in every single way possible. If you and Vil want to kill each other with a thousand paper cuts, go right on ahead and do it, but if my name is anywhere near it, it is off limits, do you understand? Just leave me alone!”

“Now listen here, you stupid child!” Zach raged at him. “You are sticking your nose in business that has nothing to do with you!”

“It has everything to do with me when you are taking Vil to court over something that has my name on it,” he snapped in retort. “You do not own Stonebrook by yourself, Uncle. You are just a tertiary owner, you are an afterthought on that deed, third in line. That gives me a hell of a lot more right to stop you from screwing with Stonebrook than you have using it as a tool against Vil. And since it's clear that you think that Stonebrook is your personal toy, Uncle Zach, I think I'm going to have to make sure you're not destroying my family's house for your own amusement. I'm going to have Duckworth and Pennington go over the accounts of the manor, which I have the right to do as a deeded owner of the property,” he added with a growl. “If there's even one penny out of place, you will be seeing me again face to face, Uncle, when I come up there and evict you,” he said in a cold voice. “That money is not yours. It's not mine. It's not Vil's either. None of us has any right to any of that money. It belongs to Stonebrook, it pays the bills and the taxes and the salaries and benefits of the workers, and it had damn well better be there. And I mean every damn penny,” he growled.

“I want you to understand one thing, Uncle. You had better leave me alone, or you will find out just how much like my father I really am,” he growled threateningly. “I forgave you and the family once before when I signed the agreement that gave you your money back and was willing to live down here in peace and away from you, but you are fucking testing my patience. I have only come back to Boston twice, once to see Clancy when he was sick and once to visit with Vil by her invitation, and I’ve kept to myself and out of family business. I’ve kept my side of the bargain, but you are not keeping yours, because you are dragging me into this by fucking with the only piece of real estate on this earth that has my name on it. If you drag me into this, if you get me tangled up in your little war with Vil, and if you ever threaten Stonebrook again, I will come up there and I will destroy you. Do you understand me?” he asked in a dreadfully cold voice.

“God damn you to hell, Luke!” Zach shouted, then he very noisily hung up the phone.

“I’ll take that as a yes,” Kit said in a low, deadly tone into the dead receiver, then he hung up the phone.

Kit blew out his breath, trying to get himself back under control. That emotion wasn’t faked, and that threat was not an idle one. Zach was honestly pissing him off with his attempts to use Stonebrook against Vil, and Kit was not going to put up with it. But, Zach’s possessive statements about Stonebrook’s finances set an alarm off in Kit’s head, and made him call back as fast as he could hit redial. “Stonebrook Manor, this is Stanley MacArren, how may I help you?” Stanley went through his ritual greeting.

“Stan,” Kit said again.

“Master Kit! What happened? Did you get disconnected?”

“In a manner of speaking, since Zach hung up on me,” Kit said without much humor. “I want you to do something.”

“What is that?”

“Call Duckworth and Pennington right now and initiate an audit of the manor’s accounts. And I mean a complete audit. I want to know if even one penny is missing, and I want that audit started right now.”

Stanley laughed suddenly. “I can most certainly do that, Master Kit,” he said brightly. “I’ll see to it right now.”

“Do that. Oh, and Stanley.”

“Yes?”

“Do an inventory of everything at the manor. I want to know if there’s anything missing.”

“I’ll have it conducted immediately. At what number can I reach you?”

Kit gave him his number for his Blackberry. “I’m sorry to make work for you, but something Zach said rang all kinds of bells and whistles in my head. I want to make sure everything is the way it should be, both in the manor and in the manor’s accounts. I may hate that place, but I don’t hate the furs who work there, and you’re the ones I’m worrying about.”

“You’re not the only one who feels that way, Master Kit,” Stanley said seriously. “Let’s just say that I’ve been keeping an exceptionally close eye on things since your uncle moved in.”

“I’m glad we understand each other, Stan,” Kit said simply.

“On this matter, we do indeed, Master Kit,” he said soberly. “I’ll take care of this immediately.”

“Thanks, Stan.”

“For you, Master Kit, anything. Goodbye sir.”

“Bye.” Kit speed dialed Vil, and she answered before the phone even rang. “Sis.”

“So, what happened?”

“Uncle Zach blew a head gasket,” Kit answered, which made her laugh delightedly. “He called me a son of a bitch, and that was the nicest thing he said.”

“What exactly did you do?”

“I threatened to have you sign Stonebrook over to me tomorrow if he doesn’t drop every Stonebrook suit,” he answered. “Since that would make me the primary owner, that means those suits would be against me instead of you.”

She howled with sudden exuberant laughter. “Oh God, baby bro, that’s going for the jugular!” she said with glee, laughing even more. “And it’s legal! The suits are against me as the primary owner of Stonebrook! If I signed it over to you, those lawsuits would transfer to you, the instant I proved to the court that I’m not the owner anymore. Zach would get caught trying to sue you through the back door!”

“I’m carrying through the threat, sis,” he said. “Send me the paperwork that switches us on the deed, with me first and you second. I’ll sign it and send it back, and if Zach doesn’t drop his Stonebrook suits by the close of business tomorrow, file it Wednesday morning. If he does, just tear them up or burn them or whatever you want to do with them. And when you see him tomorrow, show him the document. Let him see that I was not joking one little bit.”

“That’s a deal, bro. A courier will show up at your place in five or six hours with the papers, I’ll just put the lawyer on the plane and he can draw them up on the way down. Sign them and he’ll bring them back.”

“One other thing, sis. When we started arguing about the manor, he said a few things that rang an alarm in my head. I asked Stanley to have Duckworth and Pennington audit the manor’s accounts, and he’s going to inventory everything that’s supposed to be there. I, uh, I kinda have to have you pay for that, sis, I can’t afford them to do the audit, but it needs to be done. I wouldn’t put it past Zach to pillage the manor’s accounts and leave the manor bankrupt in revenge for whatever we may do to him.”

She laughed again. “God I’ve missed you, bro,” she told him. “I love how thoroughly you do things.”

“I’m a researcher, we define thorough,” he said simply, which made her chuckle.

“I’ll have the audit’s cost taken out of the manor’s accounts, bro, don’t worry about that. It’s a justifiable expense.”

“Well, I guess, because someone has to do it,” he grunted. “I can’t believe how petty Zach’s getting. You should have heard him, sis. He all but dared me to do something about him filing lawsuits against Stonebrook. I took him up on it.”

“God, did you!” she laughed delightedly. “I think Uncle Zach’s gonna be too busy tomorrow putting the money back in Stonebrook’s accounts to be able to pay much attention to anything else,” she snickered.

“He’d better, or I’ll come up there and punch him in the nose,” Kit growled. “Just like Terry.”

“I’ll send a jet down for you to come up,” she offered.

He laughed. “No thanks,” he answered. “I’d much rather go home and nuzzle Jessie than go to Boston and punch Zach. I’m a lover, not a fighter.”

“Lightweight,” she teased. “I’ll go take care of this, bro. Remember, stay close to home tonight.”

“We don’t have any plans, we’re both still recovering from the move.”

“Oh, give the courier the video instead of sending it.”

“Sure, I’ll send it with him.”

“Okay, baby bro, I’ll call you tomorrow and tell you what happened.”

“Alright, sis, be good.”

“Never,” she chuckled. “Bye-bye bro.”

“Bye sis.”

Kit hung up the phone and pondered for a moment. He didn’t really want to get involved in the fighting between Vil and Zach, but them dragging Stonebrook into it was going too far. Not only were they dragging him into it as an owner, they were messing with the lives and livelihoods of the furs who lived and worked at the manor. Kit wouldn’t like it at all if the manor was damaged in the fight between Vil and Zach, if the court made some kind of injunction freezing the manor’s assets or something like that. And that was definitely possible if Zach didn’t stop hounding Vil over the manor. Kit had no happy memories of that place, but it was where he was born, and it was part of the family’s history. Kit wouldn’t let it get destroyed in a power struggle between Vil and Zach. If worse came to worst, he'd take it from both of them to protect it from their machinations. Vil would sign over the manor to him if he asked it, redo the deed where he was the primary owner and Vil was the secondary owner, and if he feared she was losing her objectivity where the manor was concerned, he'd make her give it to him. Then he'd go up to Boston and force Zach out of it, thereby protecting it from them. After that, he'd just let Stanley take care of it until Laura was of age, and he'd give it to her. He sure as hell didn't want to live there.

The manor had ten million dollars in its accounts thanks to the agreement that Vil had him sign after Cybil's lawsuit was killed, money that belonged to the manor, not the Vulpans living inside it, and that was enough for the manor to literally be self-sustaining for perpetuity. The interest the manor made from safe investments like T-bills more than covered the operating costs the manor incurred over the year. The manor's accounts were managed by Duckworth and Pennington, one of the most prestigious accounting firms in Boston, and they had specific rules about how to invest that money that prevented them from losing it in bad investments. That was Vil's intent when she set it up, because she knew that the manor would be a point of contention and didn't want the manor to become a hostage to the family, then fall apart when it was starved of money during the fight. So, she made sure the manor didn't need any outside money nor any Vulpan to operate. The manor ran itself, and while Zach had access to the manor's accounts, that money was not his, and neither was he the primary fur that managed that money. That responsibility was actually Stanley's, since he was the chief butler and primary overseer of the estate. Zach only had authorization to use that money to pay any unusual expenses the manor might incur, such as a renovation, contract work, emergency repairs, or other similar things. Zach would have a lot of explaining to do when withdrawals from those accounts authorized by Zach did not appear in Stanley's meticulously kept records, because the conditions under which Zach could access those accounts was laid out in writing. If he violated those rules, he could be arrested and charged with embezzlement, unless he tried to frame Stanley for the missing money. That wouldn't be easy, though. Stanley wasn't kidding when he said that he'd been extremely careful since Zach moved in, according to Clancy, making sure that he had written authorizations from Zach personally for everything Zach wanted done around the manor, and Stanley was extremely thorough and careful when it came to his own management of the manor, capable of producing a detailed trail of exactly where the money he took from the accounts went. If Zach wanted to frame Stanley, he'd have to spend almost as much money in the attempt as he took from the manor in the first place...but then again, he wouldn't be taking the money because he wanted it, he'd be taking it to spite Vil and force her to spend her own money keeping the manor going.

Yes, thinking of it that way, he was sure that was exactly what Zach was angling to do. All the lawsuits were just the groundwork to try to tie up the entire manor account in court, and then he'd simply refuse to pay for anything, since he wasn't the primary owner. He'd try to blackmail Vil into giving him the manor else she'd have to lay off workers who had been in the employment of the family for generations and see Stonebrook fall into disrepair. And Kit's threat to retaliate, forcing Zach to withdraw all present and future lawsuits over Stonebrook, would just shoot that right in the foot. Kit had to chuckle when he imagined Zach sitting there realizing his intricate plan to bleed Vil dry over Stonebrook fell apart in his lap...and not because of Vil, but because of Kit.

No doubt Zach was screaming in frustration right about now.

Good. Kit hated Zach and his other uncles and aunts for what they did to him, and if he could make Zach miserable without really having to do anything, then he was more than happy to do so.

Rick knocked and opened his door. “Hey, son, what’s going on?”

“Not much, just family stuff,” he grunted, motioning sourly at the phone. “What’s up?”

“Just wonderin’ if you were coming back,” he smiled. “We’re not done yet, you know.”

Kit laughed. “Yeah. I’m done,” he nodded. “Sorry. That wasn’t exactly a good call.”

“Mind if I ask what’s goin’ on?”

“Just typical Vulpan skullduggery, Rick,” he sighed as they went back to his office. “And they were pulling me into the middle of it, so I had to put my foot down. They can fight among themselves, I want nothing to do with it.”

“Well, you can get back to reality by helping get this ad on this page,” he laughed, pointing at the monitor.

The magazine was going to do pretty well this week, Kit felt. They were now running at 52 pages, which was huge for a small local magazine, and it was filled with content...and was working the nerves of the employees. Filling 52 pages with good articles and material was working them all hard, almost as hard as their first expansion, even with Marty, Jessie, Lilly, Mike, and even Denise all doing writing for the magazine now, and Janet, Pat, and Elly contributing non-article content of their own. But Rick was going to address that, for the next round of hirings were taking place this week. Rick was two new staff writers to help fill the magazine's pages, both of which would be splitting time between writing and researching, as well as a new art assistant who was well versed in computer graphics, mainly to help Savid, and Rick was going to hire his 16 year old nephew Timmy to be their office gopher until their interns arrived next month. Rick had a stack of resumes to pick through to decide who he was going to interview, and Kit knew that Rick would pick good ones; Rick had a knack for finding the perfect furs to work in the office, and had yet to choose wrong. This week, they had another installment of their election special, Kit had written another article about flying, Jessie had written two articles, Rick had edited another story from Kit's journals for Through My Eyes, Marty and Lilly had collaborated on a special article about the upcoming semester and the changes taking place on campus as far as entertainment went, and Barry had done a pretty good article about the big debate about them raising tuition at U.T. on top of his election articles. There were five new School Daze strips, two new Missy and Cutler strips, and Marty had done his usual good job with the mailbag and Ask Away, this time nailing Janet for the weekly question. Elly had drawn a hilarious editorial cartoon lampooning the board of governors and their decision to raise tuition, them deciding to raise tuition so they could get raises to afford $3.75 a gallon gas, and another one needling the infighting between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination, them beating each other with spiked bats while John McCain cheered from the background. Kit had to admit, Elly was awesome at drawing caricature, and that was the bread and butter of an editorial cartoonist. They were buying reprint rights to a couple of stories, and they'd gotten a few outstanding pictures from readers for the submitted photo gallery and got a pretty good column from a journalism student about the parking situation on campus for 15 Minutes of Fame. Savid would put a very handsome weather forecast graphic in for the weekend, that added at the last minute so it would be as accurate as possible, and this week they were starting a new advertiser, Thunder Outfitters, which sold skateboards, skateboarding supplies, and clothing.

They were expecting to pay out $7,237.34 this week in printing costs, salaries, insurance, and expenses, but were projecting to take in $13,250 in advertising revenues, reprint royalties, syndication royalties from School Daze, website revenues, and unit sales. The magazine was heavily outperforming its costs, and that infusion of profit was being bankrolled to fund further expansion, which would start taking place this week with the three new hires. They were doing that thanks to strong unit sales, revenues from the website, which was a recent and surprisingly strong source of income, and a heavy amount of reprint royalties, which was something of a prestigious matter for the magazine. Lone Star was one of the most reprinted magazines in Texas when it came to articles and features in the magazine being picked up by other publications. A Lone Star article could be found in nearly every other magazine in Texas. And in addition to that, no other city magazine in Texas could boast articles being reprinted in national magazines. Newsweek, The New Republic, Plane and Pilot, Rainbow Magazine, Aviator, and Photography magazine had all reprinted material from Lone Star, and School Daze was now in 29 newspapers and 16 magazines nationally, which was also a nice source of personal income for Jeffrey and Kit.

Their success made both Rick and Kit hopeful, but both of them saw the dark clouds looming, and were preparing to nurse the magazine through hard times ahead. The best way to do that was clear the magazine's debt and make it an appealing buy for a cash-strapped populace, which they felt they'd done already. Lone Star's main difference from other magazines was the somewhat irreverent way it approached things. It wasn't afraid to laugh, even at itself, and it entertained even as it informed. In a recession, furs would want to buy their magazine because it would make them laugh.

And still, another project was itching under Kit's fur...his CFI, his adamant intent to get his ATP and ATP trainer certificate, and to see Jessie get her CFI. Getting his plane, Vil's gift of the training as a pilot, the rekindled love of flying his training had imparted into him, and the local flight situation, they all combined to offer a couple of unique opportunities. Kit may not have anything to do with his family, but he was a Vulpan to the roots of his fur, and he had a nose for business, and there was money to be made in the central Texas aviation business. They could open a nice little flight school on the side, maybe even a charter flight company, which he could anchor by building some T-hangars somewhere. The recent major downturn in real estate would make buying the land for it affordable, but the trick would be finding an airport where there was enough room to expand T-hangars. There was a very large bank of T-hangars at Bergstrom and a fairly good sized one at Georgetown, but Georgetown had no room for expansion, where Bergstrom, well...Bergstrom had some empty land around the short runways, primarily on the south side. He wondered if they'd entertain a proposal to build another bank of T-hangars down there in that empty area. With so many hangar complexes all with waiting lists, there was a business opportunity.

But was there really an opportunity there, or a chance to lose some money? With gas prices so high, employment falling, housing still tumbling and a credit crisis starting to loom, a high-price item like a plane might become a luxury some couldn't afford. Maybe Kit could pick up a few bargains in used planes, sold off by furs who couldn't afford them anymore, and maybe buy someone else's hangar space to boot. Families like the Vulpans were actually overjoyed by recessions and depressions, because their main source of income was absolutely guaranteed, and had very little to do with the economy in general. Navy contracts were guaranteed money as long as they built the ships on time and within budget, and recessions actually drove down their costs, which ended up with more profit for them. Much of the non-shipyard wealth of the family had been accrued during the Great Depression, the recession of the 70's, the 80's crash, and then through the boom years of the 90's. Furs like his family had money when no one else did, and that let them buy stocks and land dirt cheap and just sit on them and let them mature as the economy recovered, then sell them at a profit. Kit had already moved into a recession mindset, selling off his volatile investments and retreating into safe T-bills, which also would give him a good supply of cash on paw for bargain purchases. If he played his cards right, Kit could make some wise purchases and investments when Kendall's predicted crash came and the bottom fell out, scoop up some bargains, then reap the rewards when the economy recovered. He'd watch mainly for some bargains on planes. If he wanted to train pilots, he needed a real trainer, like a Piper Scout or a Cessna 152 or 172, and a Beech King Air would be the twin engine of choice for training multi engines, though an older Piper, Cessna, or a Grumman might be cheaper. If he could snag a couple of good trainer planes and buy them in a down market, he could train pilots freelance and keep his 400 for himself, he'd just have to carefully weigh what he might earn training in them against how much it would cost to maintain them.

But the shameless kid in him wanted to own an entire hangar full of planes, his personal toys, from a vintage P-51 to a shiny, brand new Cessna Citation X. How to buy all those planes, and the hangar, and pay to keep them maintained didn't intrude on that dream...but that was the point of dreams, to ignore the frivolous little details and concentrate on the good parts.

His daydream persisted when he got home, when, in his first official workday after moving in, Kit went to the den, dug out his ATP study books, and carted them into the living room and sat down after greeting Jessie properly and getting chased out of the kitchen when he offered to cook dinner. "Not in my new kitchen you won't," she protested with a smile. "This is my toy, I get to play with it first! You can have it when I get bored with it," she added with a wink, which made Kit laugh.

"Just for that, I'm gonna have to sneak down here tomorrow before work and play in your sandbox," he teased.

She giggled. "Alright, you can cook breakfast. But don't break anything, clean up after yourself, and put everything back where it belongs. I worked too hard to get my kitchen just so to have you come in and wreck it!"

"God, you sound like Hannah," he told her, which made her blink, start, and erupt into gales of helpless laughter.

Kit started studying the first of the ATP study guides that Luke suggested, giving him a study guide to tell him which books to read first and explaining the training software to him, which he had yet to install on any of the computers yet. He quickly got engrossed in the highly complicated and detailed world of the air transport pilot, pilots who knew just about everything about flying, the most highly trained pilots there were. Luckily, Kit could go straight to the coursework, ground training, and the specific flight instruction when he went for his ATP, because he already met all the FAA requirements to get his ATP rating, having accrued the necessary logged hours in the necessary planes, and had all the necessary ratings. When he started his ATP, he'd be looking at three to four weeks of dedicated flight school training to get all his training requirements complete, and then it would be a six to ten hour check ride, the hardest and most demanding check ride in all of aviation. Not even the ATP CFI check ride was as tough as the ATP check ride, because ATP pilots could be responsible for the lives of hundreds of furs and be flying jets worth hundreds of millions of dollars. The CFI check ride for ATP was more or less a victory lap compared to the ATP check ride.

He'd all but be torturing himself to get his ATP and then his ATP CFI, but he wanted them, and he was willing to work for them...even if they were never more than just a piece of paper hanging on his wall. He wanted to walk the path of the pilot to the very end, and the very end was the ATP CFI. He wanted to have every rating there was, even wanted to get his rotorcraft and amphibious plane ratings, which would literally require him to start over from the very beginning for each one. He doubted he'd ever use an amphibious rating, but he could see using a rotorcraft rating.

“Uh oh,” Jessie giggled when she came into the living room from the hall. “Here we go again!”

“Just using my time wisely, love,” he smiled. “What are we having?”

“I’m baking a tuna casserole and I’m making some shrimp scampi to go with it, I’ve been having a craving for seafood lately,” she told him, rubbing her stomach. “I think Laura here is cat enough to want seafood before she’s even born.”

“I already won the muzzle,” he winked.

“I’ll get her claws,” Jessie teased.

“Speaking of spoiled brats,” he said dryly, “I had a little run-in with my family today.”

“Uh oh, what happened?” she asked as she sat down on the love seat, the closest seat to the hallway.

Kit related what Vil had told him, and then his ensuing spat with Zach, without much emotion. “So, after I threatened to strip the entire family of its money if he didn’t take Stonebrook out of the pissing contest he’s having with Vil, he said some pretty ugly things and hung up on me,” he finished. “Then I immediately called Stanley, Clancy’s son and the current chief butler, and told him to conduct an audit of the manor’s finances and do an inventory of everything on the grounds. The way he said it, pretty kitty, I just get this gnawing suspicion that Zach’s pillaging the manor’s money in an attempt to blackmail her into giving him the manor. He doesn’t need the money, he’s just doing it to spite Vil, I’ll bet my good ear on it.”

“Well, it sounds like you stepped on that. I’d be really mad if poor Clancy got kicked out of the only home he’s ever known just because Zach and Vil are fighting.”

“Yah, that’s the main reason I warned Stanley. I can’t step through the gates of Stonebrook without having a panic attack, but there are some good furs there that I care about. So I basically took Stonebrook out of the sandbox while those two fight over the rest of the toys.”

“Did your uncle really say something awful to you?”

“Pretty much, yeah,” he nodded.

“Well,” she said, slapping her knees with both paws. “Maybe you should think about taking a trip.”

“Huh?”

“Remember what I made you promise? That the next time they said something awful to you, you’d force him out of Stonebrook? Well, he said something awful to you, and a promise is a promise.”

Kit laughed. “Well, I’m not quite so furious that I’d leave you to go up there and kick Zach out of Stonebrook, love,” he told her. “I’d have to stay up there long enough to clearly establish residency, so it’d be at least a few weeks, maybe a month. Besides, Vil told me to stay out of Boston no matter what, and that trumps the promise. Anyway, I don’t want to be away from you for a day, being away from you for weeks would destroy me.”

“Who said I’m staying here?” she winked.

“You are staying here,” he declared immediately. “I would never in a million years take you to Boston right now, love. And if I was that insane, you’d never leave your room while you were there. If you think Alicia was awful to us when we were there for the fourth, you have no idea just how brutal they can be when they think they have good reason. The entire family would be enraged if I go up there and kick Zach out of Stonebrook, because I’m supposed to stay out of family business. That’s what the whole us here them there deal is about. The only reason I went as far as I did was because my name is on the Stonebrook deed, and Zach was dragging me into a fight between him and Vil by virtue of that. And I was very careful to make that lone point when I threatened him, that him dragging me into it was inciting me to take immediate and drastic action to take me right back out of it. Now Zach knows where my line is, and as long as he keeps me out of it, I won't interfere again."

"That's what you told him, but what's the truth?" Jessie asked with a wink.

He laughed. "Well, I'm clearly on Vil's side in this and he knows it, I'm just not giving him a reason to think that I'm actively fighting him."

After dinner, the promised courier arrived with the lawyer, meeting Nick on the front step, whom Jessie had invited over to dinner, but he'd been late because he was out doing something. The courier was an Australian koala, a rare fur in America, and the lawyer looked a typical Boston fox, both of them wearing tailored suits, the koala in gray and the lawyer in black. "Mister Vulpan," the fox said, shaking his paw. "Art Merriwether. I have a document for you to sign, correct?"

"That's right," he said.

"Wot, Kit, trouble?"

"I know you already know everything, wolf," Kit teased, which made him laugh and nod guiltily.

"Yah, the nutters and Miss Vil both keep me up to speed in the shenanigans of Boston," he admitted. "Jessie! Sorry to be late dove, but I was out inspecting shooting ranges!"

"I'm in the kitchen!" she called back. "Come get your leftovers!"

Kit and the lawyer sat down at the dining room table as Nick ate in the kitchen, as the lawyer meticulously explained the document in simple terms. “This is nothing but a change in an existing deed,” he said, pointing at the sheaf of four papers. “Basically, what this document will do is change you and Vilenne’s order on the deed to Stonebrook. You’ll become primary owner and the fur responsible for the manor, and Vil will become secondary owner. The change is only between you and Vilenne, Mister Vulpan. Vil’s first child will still have primary claim to the manor over your child as per the original agreement, and Zachary Vulpan’s position within the deed hierarchy doesn’t change.”

“Alright, where do I sign?” he asked.

Kit signed two copies of the two page document, Kit gave him the DVD of the video to take back to Boston, and the lawyer and courier shook his paw and went on their way. Kit went into the kitchen to see Nick enjoying the casserole at the kitchen table as Jessie did the dishes. “That’s all taken care of,” Kit said. “What were you doing out there, Nick?” “I was inspecting shooting ranges and gun clubs,” he answered. “And I found the range where I’ll be doing my teaching. Place called Red’s out in Oak Hill. They agreed to let me teach there.”

“You mean you paid them for the opportunity to teach,” Kit corrected.

Nick laughed. “Yah, yah,” he agreed. “Tomorrow after Kit gets off work, we’re going out for our first training, mainly for you, Kit. Once I get you two trained to my satisfaction, maybe I can talk you into getting concealed carry permits.”

“I’d never carry a gun, Nick,” Kit scoffed.

“We’ll see,” he smiled. “Where do you shoot skeet, Jessie?”

“Capitol Skeet and Trap,” she answered.

“Ah, I visited them this mornin’. Nice place they have.”

“Yeah, and they’re not too expensive,” Jessie agreed. “When the four of us went, it was forty dollars for a round for each of us, twenty-five targets. That’s not bad.”

“Not bad at all. Do they offer memberships?”

“Yeah, but I don’t shoot skeet often enough to need a membership,” she said. “I haven’t even taken Kit yet,” she giggled.

“That’s your fault,” he answered. “You haven’t shot skeet since we met until just last month.”

“What kind of skeet shotgun do you have?”

“Kit bought me a Remington three thirty-two for my birthday,” she answered. “He also bought a Remington Wingmaster pump, mainly for himself and anyone I take with me.”

“A pump for a beginner? Ouch!” Nick laughed.

“It’s a pretty good shotgun,” she said, a bit defensively. “Wingmasters are almost perfect skeet guns as is, and though I haven’t used it yet, it seems to have a fast reload action. Not all skeet guns are over unders. I’ve seen guys at the range back home use pumps before.”

“I’m not accusin’,” he laughed. “Want to go try it out?”

“What do you say, love? Want to learn how to shoot skeet and try out our shotguns?” Jessie asked.

“Sure, I’ll try it,” Kit nodded.

“I’ll go get my shotgun after dinner, then,” Nick smiled. “I didn’t bring my K-eighty with me, but I have twelve gauge pump with a thirty inch barrel and skeet-friendly chokes with me I can use.”

“You have a K-eighty?” Jessie gasped.

“Yeah. Don’t use it, though, bought it from a mate for five K who was selling his collection,” he grunted. “Thought I’d try it out. It doesn’t fit me well at all, I do much better with my Beretta when I’m shooting competitively. I have it up for sale on Ebay right now for six K, so I can make a profit off the deal.”

It was an interesting experience. They arrived at the skeet range about two hours before sunset, and it was actually busy. Nick carried a long bag holding the three shotguns they brought with them, and they went into a lobby and retail store where Jessie greeted the raccoon behind the counter with a smile, bought a couple of boxes of shotgun shells, and bought them time on the skeet range. Kit followed her out to a pair of skeet ranges with one set of the target launchers back to back, launching them in opposite directions, and another launcher on the other side, with a semicircle between them. Along the semicircle there were little marks and small metal boxes, which he saw were foot pedals, seven in total and with an eighth in the middle of the semicircle. The launcher buildings were actually a lot taller than he expected. He saw that the back to back launchers weren’t both for their range, one of them was for the range beside theirs. The other range was occupied, and Kit found the constant sounds of shotguns being fired both on their range at other ranges on the site to be rather noisy. Kit then received his first real lesson with a firearm, as Jessie explained the basic safety rules of never, ever point it at anything one didn’t intend to shoot, and always assume the gun is loaded. She showed him how to hold the shotgun and how to line up the sights, then she explained skeet shooting to him. “There are launchers on both sides that throw the pidgeon in an arc in front of us,” she explained. “The left house them throws them high, the right one throws them low. You see the seven circles? Each of those is a shooting position. We shoot certain shots from each position. For example, the first position, we shoot at one target from each trap house, then we shoot a double, where they launch targets from both houses at the same time. That’s why you see most serious skeet shooters with an over under, love,” she told him. “But some skeet shooters use a pump, if it’s a fast pump and you’re quick. I’ve seen shooters who can pump a shotgun as fast as others can move their finger to the second trigger on an over under. And I’ll be learning how to do that, I’m going to try out the pump shotgun first to see how well I do and let you use the over under,” she giggled. “This is the first time I’ve used a pump action shotgun shooting skeet, Dad won’t use anything but over unders, and I’ve always used his guns. You watch it move, draw a bead on it, then shoot. I know it’s terribly unfair to make you try to shoot something moving the first time you’ve ever shot a gun before,” she giggled. “But Sheila, Sam, and Ally had never shot a gun either, and they gave this a try. Sam’s actually getting pretty good,” she laughed. “After their first try, we went to a stationary target range and let them get the hang of aiming, and we’ve been shooting skeet ever since.”

“Hey, I’ll give it a shot,” Kit assured her, putting the shotgun to his shoulder and keeping it pointed safely down the shooting range, eyeing the sights. “But after you embarass me here, we can go to that shooting range you were talking about and I can learn how to do this the right way.”

“I think you’ll do alright,” Nick told him as he took out a sleek-looking black-stocked pump action shotgun with a reinforcing bar running over the barrel and a carrying handle, a piece of equipment that blatantly had no business being on a recreational target shooting range. “This is my baby,” Nick chuckled. “Mossberg X nine pump action twelve guage. This was actually a combat model shotgun, made for the battlefield, but it can load both light and heavy shells without changing tubes and it’s pretty damn accurate because it has a thirty-two inch barrel and I have it choked for target shooting. They stopped making these when they developed rugged and dependable automatic shotguns for combat.”

“They make automatic shotguns?” Kit said in surprise. “I read about semi-automatic shotguns when I bought Jessie’s gun, but I’ve never heard of an automatic shotgun.”

“Sure do. I own one, I’ll show it to ya when we get home,” he answered. “It’s not meant for skeet shooting, though,” he laughed. “It’s designed for use on a battlefield, it only shoots big shells and heavy shot. You don’t use heavy shot for skeet shooting, you use light shot.”

“This is all Greek to me,” Kit laughed.

“It’s a combat shotgun, Kit, it’s meant to stop furs, it loads three or three and a half inch shells filled with heavy shot. We’re shooting shot here to hit a little clay target, using little two and three quarter or three inch shells filled with light shot. Big difference.” He patted the shotgun. “This baby can load and shoot any size twelve gauge round without changing hardware thanks to the way the barrel is designed, which is a requirement for a combat weapon. That’ll let me shoot birdshot today, then I can take it home, clean it, and load it with buckshot rounds meant to stop furs.”

“I didn’t realize there was such a big difference,” Kit chuckled.

“Oh yeah, there is,” Jessie told him as she started loading their shotgun. “Can I go first? I’d like to get a feel for this shotgun, and let you use mine, since it’ll be easier for you,” she said with a wink at Kit.

“Be my guest, love,” Kit laughed. “I think I want to watch and see how this is done.”

The range was actually automated. Jessie started on one side of the semicircle, at one of those marks right beside the right launcher house. When she was ready, she stepped on the foot switch, which would launch the target exactly three seconds later, giving her time to set her feet and get ready. Kit watched as Jessie quickly tracked the little flying target with the shotgun, and then the target shattered when she pulled the trigger. She reloaded, following her own rule she gave Kit and only loading the shells she intended to fire with the next round, and stepped on the switch again, and this time the target came out of the other launcher, much lower than the first. Jessie moved quickly and fluidly, tracking the target, then it too shattered when she pulled the trigger. “Now we see how fast I am,” she giggled as she loaded two shells and pumped the shotgun to chamber the first shell. She stepped on the switch, and Kit saw a target come out of each launcher. She went after the low target first, shooting it down, then quickly pumped the shotgun with it braced against her shoulder even as she drew a bead on the other target. She pulled the trigger as it soared almost away, and it broke into two pieces and wobbled to the ground. “Yes!” she said excitedly, pumping her fist. “I can do it!”

“Why is there only one launcher over there?” Kit asked, pointing at the other side as Jessie moved to the next position, then loaded one shell into the shotgun.

“That’s a trap range,” Nick answered. “Trap is something like skeet, except the targets all come from the same side. The launcher randomly changes its height and direction to give the shooter a challenge. When you do a double in traps, they come from the same launcher.”

“Oh. I didn’t realize there were different ones. Do you ever shoot trap, love?” he asked her.

“Uh-huh,” she answered as she stepped on the foot switch. She shot down her skeet, then glanced back at him. “But it’s easier than shooting skeet. I like the challenge.”

“Well, if you want a challenge, you should shoot skeet with a rifle,” Nick teased.

“I’d never hit anything!” she laughed as she reloaded. He watched as she shot down the single target, then she had to shoot another double. She shot down the low one, pumped the shotgun, and fired at the second one, but missed. “Dang!” she said in frustration, stamping her foot.

“You’ll get the hang of it, love.”

“I know, I just don’t like to miss.”

“Who does?” Nick laughed.

Kit watched as Jessie shot her way through the positions, and ended at the position in the middle. In all, she fired 25 shots and hit 23 targets, which Kit thought was amazing. She only missed on doubles, because she was adjusting to learning how to pump the shotgun to reload it rather than just pulling a second trigger. “Alright boys, who’s next?” Jessie asked as she pumped the shotgun, ejecting the last smoking shell from it.

“Did you ever win the lottery when you found her, eh?” Nick asked Kit with a chuckle. “I’ll go.”

Nick made Jessie a little mad, for he was, simply, amazing. He fired his shotgun almost immediately after each target was launched and shot it down. On the doubles, he pumped the shotgun so fast that it was almost a blur and fired his second round almost seeming like before he finished pumping the shotgun. He waltzed through each of the positions with utter confidence, and when it was over, he didn’t miss a single shot...and not only that, no target managed to go for more than half a second before it was shot down. “Not bad,” Nick said with a nod.

“Compared to what?” Kit asked, then he laughed. “So, now that you’ve set the bar, allow me to fail miserably,” he said cheekily.

“Eh, it’s your first time, you expect to score a perfect?” Nick grinned.

Both of them gave him some detailed lessons about shooting a shotgun, from how to aim it to the recoil to how to reload. Nick had him aim the shotgun and swing it to and fro on his shoulder while it was empty several times to get a feel for it, and then Jessie taught him how to load the weapon. When he was ready, he blew out his breath, stepped into the first position, shouldered the shotgun, and stepped on the switch to launch the first target. The target flew out, and he did his best to lead it the way Jessie explained, getting the barrel in front of it but in line with it, then he pulled the trigger. For the first time in his life, Kit fired a shotgun, and missed the target completely. He was surprised by the recoil, since it didn’t seem that hard when Nick and Jessie shot...but then again, they were experienced. They knew what to expect. Kit missed the second target, and when the double came, he got so flustered trying to hit the first target that he didn’t even try to shoot the second target, which made him laugh ruefully. He kept his perfectly awful record all the way to the very last position, where he finally managed to hit on the first target. “Finally!” he shouted, pumping a fist in the air, and accidentally stepped on the switch. “Oh crap!” he gasped, shouldering the shotgun quickly, which made Jessie burst out laughing when he pointed it at the wrong trap house. He saw the target come from the other side, wheeled around, and rushed his shot, which naturally made him miss. “Okay, I suck at this,” he laughed ruefully as he loaded two shells into the shotgun the way Jessie showed him, for his second to last set, the double. After the double, there was a “bonus” target which he could shoot at from any position.

“You’ll get better, handsome fox,” Jessie assured him. “It’s the first time you’ve ever tried!”

“We’ll go to the static target range they have here so you can get some experience shooting at something that doesn’t move,” Nick told him.

“That would help,” Kit laughed as he closed the shotgun. “But this is actually kinda fun.”

“I never minded it when Dad brought us,” Jessie agreed. “But Jenny’s actually a lot better than me.”

“I want to try this again, and hit more than one target next time,” Kit said with a chuckle.

“I’ll have to go buy us another round and some more shells,” Jessie said.

“I’ll go get it,” Nick said. “I gotta pay for that dinner you fed me, Jessie,” he grinned.

They were there until sunset, when the range closed, and Kit actually enjoyed himself. Jessie was a very good skeet shooter, and Nick was just godly, but he could see the appeal in target shooting. It was actually fun. In the second game, Jessie used her new shotgun and Kit tried the pump shotgun and did a little better, hitting four out of 25, and in the last try he used the pump shotgun again and hit five of 25. He was terrible at it, hitting a total of only ten targets out of the 75 he shot at in three games, but he sincerely enjoyed himself. “We are so doing that again!” Kit declared when they walked back towards Nick’s Expedition. Nick had driven them out.

“I’m glad you had fun, love,” Jessie told him, kissing him on the cheek. “Maybe I’ll have you buy an over under for yourself, they’re a little easier to use than a pump for skeet shooting, as I’m sure you noticed.”

“Yeah, and I need all the help I can get,” Kit laughed, “but I’ll learn. If you and Nick can do it with a pump shotgun, so can I. Your shotgun is yours, my love. I bought the pump for the rest of us, and I’ll learn how to use it.”

“We’ll try some target shooting tomorrow when I give you your lesson, but we’ll be working with pistols, not shotguns. But, I’ll bring a few different weapons with me to show you, so you can get an idea of the different types of weapons there are,” Nick said as he opened the back gate of the truck and put the bag holding the shotguns inside. “I’ll take care of cleanin’ your shotguns, guys,” he added. “Gives me somethin’ to do, ya know. I’ll bring ‘em with me tomorrow and you can take ‘em home.”

“That’s sweet, thanks Nick,” Jessie nodded as she got into the truck.

That night, they got the official announcement from Kevin and Sam, who came over unannounced for dinner, but were more than welcome.

Jessie was still being militant about keeping Kit out of the kitchen, so he was again studying his ATP books. The first thing Sam did when she came into the living room was hold up her left paw, which was now decorated by an engagement ring. Kit laughed, Jessie gave a little squeal of delight and rushed over to hug her, and Sam could only smile foolishly. “He proposed!” she finally announced as Kevin came in.

“And she said yes!” Kevin added, receiving a hug from Jessie.

“Congratulations, you two!” Jessie gushed. “Did you set a date yet?”

“We haven’t set a solid date, but we want to marry in October,” Kevin answered. “Right now I’m trying to convince her to say yes to my other proposal,” he laughed.

“He wants me to move in with him before the ceremony!” Sam protested.

“Hey, it worked for Kit and Jessie,” Kevin told her. “I think their marriage is even stronger because they lived together while they were engaged.”

“You just want to sleep with me before we’re married!”

“Well...haven’t we already? And wouldn’t you like the chance to decorate the townhouse before you move in?”

Sam’s cheeks ruffled immediately. “We’ll talk about this later,” she promised, pointing at him.

“Don’t look at me, I’m biased,” Jessie laughed when Sam looked at her. “Come on, you can help me cook, and tell me all about the proposal!”

she said happily, taking Sam's white-mittened paw and dragging her towards the kitchen.

"So, did you get it out?" Kit asked with a chuckle as Kevin sat down on the couch.

Kevin laughed. "I surely did. I was nervous as sin, but I got it out. She almost knocked me down taking the ring from me. We hit one little problem, though."

"What?"

"The ring I got was too small," he said. "She doesn't wear any rings for me to steal and get her size, so I had to guess. I guessed wrong, but at least I guessed on the side of caution," he chuckled. "If it had guessed too big, I might have heard you think I'm fat for the next fifty years."

Kit laughed brightly. "She wouldn't do that to you."

"Sure she would," he grinned. "We went to the jeweler after I got off work and they resized it for her."

"That's good. It's also good they got it back to you the same day. Jessie never takes hers off. It's already worn the fur off her finger. So has mine," he laughed, holding up the paw where he wore his wedding ring. "And God did I get in trouble when I took it off to check," he laughed. "Jessie scolded me for half an hour straight."

"Why would she do that?"

"She wasn't being serious," he grinned. "She likes to play the bad cop, pretend to be stern like her mother, so I indulge her. It's good for her," he shrugged. "Gives her confidence, and she needs practice being stern to keep Laura in line. Besides, I like to be punished,” he said with a sly smile. “So I have to make sure I misbehave at least every few days.”

Kevin laughed. “I don’t think we need to go much further,” he grinned.

“You’re engaged, soon to be a married male, Kev,” Kit told him. “I think you’re old enough to hear about the truth of marriage.”

“What truth is that?”

“That marriage is a curse put on males by God because Adam was too much of a wuss to go it alone,” he called loudly, with a light smile.

“Dude, you’re askin’ for it,” Kevin laughed.

“Ten seconds,” he said confidently, leaning back and putting his paws behind his head. “Four, three,” he mouthed as Jessie stalked up behind him, coming from the dining room, “two, one,” and then Jessie put her paws on his shoulders and looked over his head, down at him.

“Did you say something, love?” she asked sweetly, but with an edge in her voice. She was smiling lightly.

“Yes, I did,” he answered, reaching up and grabbing her by her own shoulders. “I said I know exactly how to get you in here so you can give me a kiss.”

She laughed and acceded to his demand, kissing him on the top of the muzzle. “Naughty boy,” she chided, swatting him very gently on the top of his head, between his ears. “What do you want for dinner, Kevin? Sam decided that since you finally maled up enough to pop the question, we’ll let you set the menu.”

Kevin laughed. “All this time, the secret to making Jessie cook for me was hiding right in plain sight,” he lamented. “How about some steaks grilled out on the deck, salad for Sam, and some baked potatoes done grill style?”

“That sounds great to me,” Kit agreed.

“I don’t have any steaks, you’ll have to go get some,” she warned. “I have everything else.”

“Consider it done,” he nodded.

“I’ll go with you, I need to get some toothpaste,” Kit offered. “And that way the girls can feel free to gossip all they want without fear of us eavesdropping,” he winked at Jessie.

Kit and Kevin ran down to IGB, where they liked to buy their meat, and Kevin had four steaks custom cut to make them huge while Kit bought the fixings for a salad. Sam was usually vegetarian, but she would eat meat rarely and for special occasions, and she did like steak. She also had a weakness for hot dogs. Kit also bought a cake on an impulse and had Congratulations Kevin and Sam written on it in icing. He bought chocolate with white icing, and Kevin gave it a curious look when he came back to the meat department. “Can’t go without a cake,” Kit grinned. “Get used to cake, you’ll see a lot of it from here out.”

Kevin laughed. “That reminds me. You have the number for ADT?”

“Yah, you gonna get an alarm?”

“Naturally. I’m moving in on Saturday.”

“Cool,” he said. “Which one is it?”

“Lupe put me in beside Mickey. Creating a buffer between us and the rich furs I guess,” he laughed. “I’m part of the poker gang, but I’m also one of those snobby professionals Lupe rented out all the other units to. So, I’m the buffer between us and them. So, the six of us are all together,” he chuckled. “I hope we don’t get mad at each other, since we’re all neighbors.”

“Then you’d better stop cheating at poker,” Kit noted, which made Kevin laugh. “No more musical apartments though. Lupe said from now on, the games will take place in the community center.”

“Right near the keg dispenser,” Kevin noted.

“You know it,” Kit laughed. “Lupe had to dance through some hoops to be allowed to install it in the center, after he swore up and down it would only be used for private parties as a courtesy for the guests. So, from now on the two dollars each goes into the keg fund, and the winner chooses the brand once we finish the last keg.”

“Six of us on a pony keg? It’ll take a month to finish it,” Kevin laughed.

“More like two weeks, given how much Dan, Mickey, and Sheila drink when they play,” Kit corrected lightly. “But, at least it won’t go bad with a gas pump. As long as we don’t buy any cheap beer,” Kit grunted. “God help us if Mickey wins on the week we replace the keg. I think a pony of Milwaukee’s Best will go bad before we finish it.”

“Not if we sneak over and pour it out before Sunday,” Kevin said, which made Kit laugh. He laughed even harder when the butcher gave Kevin four steaks that were slightly smaller than roasts, that had to be two pounds each.

“Dude, I don’t think even I can eat a steak that big!” Kit protested.

“It’s a celebration,” he replied airily.

“I’m glad you’re paying for them,” Kit noted.

Jessie was almost as startled to see the steaks as she was the cake when they got back. “Did you buy four roasts or something?” she asked when she took them out of the bag in the kitchen, as Kit put the cake on the kitchen table.

“They’re steaks. I wanted something momentous for a momentous occasion.”

“Well, they’re certainly...big,” she said, holding one up.

“I’ve grilled them this big before. But, I like ‘em rare, so it’s not hard,” he chuckled.

“Well, you wanted big, you’ll get big,” she laughed. “Can you start the grill please, love?” she asked Kit.

“Sure thing. Want help making the salad?”

She gave him a light look. “You’re not sneaking into my kitchen,” she teased. “You can light the grill, and that’s it.”

Kit laughed. “She won’t even let me make toast,” he complained to Kevin and Sam. “And she used to let me cook all the time in the other apartment,” he said accusingly.

“I was in school then. I have no job and no school, I’m literally just waiting for Laura to be born, and cooking keeps me busy and happy,” she answered with a smile. “Besides, you’re not even touching my kitchen until I’m finished playing with it.”

“Girls and their toys,” Kit sighed.

“At least we’re not talking about Sheila here,” Kevin said sagely.

Jessie’s cheek fur instantly stood straight out, and Kit gave a startled laugh.

They decided to eat out on the deck, and once the grill was shut off, Kit extended out the awning to take the sun off them; they’d warned him specifically never to run the grill with the awning out. And then they enjoyed a fantastic meal of steak, potatoes, salad, and the celebratory cake for the engagement, as Kevin talked excitedly about the townhouse and the furniture they were going to buy for it. “I got her to do that much,” he laughed. “That’s going to be our apartment, so we’re going out tomorrow to buy a bedroom and living room suit, and whatever I have left over will go into a table and pots and pans for the kitchen. She picks, I pay. I hope that’s not going to be an ongoing thing.”

“Of course it will be,” Kit chuckled, giving Jessie a sly look. “Femmes are very good at spending the money we make.”

“It’s the natural order,” she teased. “You have no style, so you need us to keep you from getting utility spools and folding chairs.”

“They work,” Kit laughed.

“No style at all,” she winked. “Just like when you tried to furnish the apartment. Did you know he bought food to cook, but didn’t buy pots or pans to cook it in?” she asked Kevin.

“Every time I look at you, all I think of is scissors,” Kit bantered.

“Oh that is such a lie!” she laughed.

“Yes, scissors. Her and a pair of scissors...and no clothes,” he told Kevin. Jessie gasped, and he erupted into laughter when she stuck her tongue out at him.

“I’ll have to do what you did, Kit, buy a piece here and a piece there. As long as we get matching pieces, it should look alright. We’ll just have some empty rooms for a while,” he chuckled.

“Close the door, you’re good to go,” Sam said with a smile.

After dinner and a nice evening watching the sun set from their deck, Kevin and Sam helped them do the dishes, then went back to Kevin’s apartment for a little private celebrating. Kit made sure to leave Jessie’s commercial pilot books out where she could find them, then got his daily briefing on the war in Boston from Vil. “Hey sis,” he said as he drew a bath up in the master bedroom, sitting on the edge of the tub, which was built in a raised area with two steps leading to it. “How did it go?”

She made an indelicate grunt. “About what you’d expect, bro. The board nearly had a heart attack when I called Uncle Zach up for a vote to fire him. He certainly wasn’t expecting it. Neither were they. He tried to shout me down in the boardroom, but when they found out about the lawsuit, there wasn’t anything they could do. He did break the terms of his contract. They didn’t fire him, but he was suspended. So, Uncle Zach is out for a month, and he put a check for a quarter million on my desk before walking out, after promising to skin me and hang my pelt on the wall behind the CEO’s chair in the boardroom. I had him escorted out of the yard by security as a thank-you for his lovely death threats. In the meantime, the press has caught wind of what’s going on, mainly because some freakin’ yahoo took a cell phone photo of Zach being pushed out the front gate without even his car, and standing there waiting for his limo to come out to get him. The tabloids are all over the family, even chasing down the cousins who left town. I'd expect some annoyers, bro."

"We'll be careful," Kit assured her. "Are you alright?"

"I'm fine, bro. How is Nick panning out?"

"We like him, he's a nice guy," he answered. "He went skeet shooting with us today, and humiliated both of us," he laughed. "He's unbelievable with a shotgun."

"He's paid to be so, bro," she answered. "How did Allison take being grounded? Is she getting second thoughts?"

"Surprisingly well, and no she's not," he answered. "She's pretty tough, sis. The only time she ever seemed to show any fear is when she outed herself to Terry. When I told her that the family was gunning for her but you were making all of us safe in Austin, she just shrugged and said that that was fine. She promised to stay in the city unless she was with a member of the family."

"Good. She can't be a wuss if she's going to date a member of this family."

"Girls who work in her former career aren't known for timidity, Vil. Ally's a tough girl, she can take it."

She laughed. "I guess not. From the sound of that water, you're about to take a bath, so I'll let you have at it, bro."

"Yeah. I'm gonna see if I can't get a little company in here," he said lightly.

"Oh, hush," she laughed. "I'm alone until Friday."

“Pft, it’s not like you do anything with Ken,” he teased.

“Oh really?” she asked archly, which made him laugh.

“Yes, really, or I’d have heard all about it,” he retorted.

She laughed ruefully. “Okay, okay, point. I’d have been gossiping to you like the house servants used to if I did, but I’m certainly putting it on my calendar,” she said with a little hum. “I got Ken out of his clothes last weekend, and I liked what I saw.”

“You got him naked? How?”

“Scotland has fickle weather,” she purred in reply. “We got rained on, and I got a good look at him when we changed. What I saw has changed my schedule this weekend,” she hummed.

Kit almost fell in the tub laughing. “You’re the only femme I know who pencils in a seduction!” he accused.

“Oh, he’s definitely on my calendar,” she said eagerly. “I haven’t had a good fling since Oxford, and I’m missing the fun part of a relationship. I can’t so much as stop at Burger King here without the tabloids making note of it, it’s been all but impossible to have a nice dirty little affair,” she mused. “I’ve known him long enough now, I think it’s just about time to see how well he can use that impressive equipment.”

“I don’t think I’m old enough to hear the next sentence,” he teased.

“Hush, you gossiped all about Jessie, now you have to endure listening to me go on about Ken,” she retorted. “But you’ll get that after I have reason to gossip,” she said with a smile in her voice. “Now, just to prove you wrong, I think I’ll be a little spontaneous and call Ken and tell him I’m desperately lonely and need a male to comfort me in this time of emotional crisis and see how fast he gets here,” she said with a trill in her voice.

“Sis. You. Are. Evil.”

“Yes, I know,” she purred. “I am a Vulpan, after all.”

The promised call came early the next morning, not five minutes after he settled in at his desk to get his notes together for the daily meeting with Rick. Vil called him at his work phone, and he pressed the button to put it on speaker when it rang into his office. “Kit Vulpan,” he said absently as he rearranged his budget projections, which were good, but not as good as they were a month ago. The magazine was still making money and was still going to expand, but they were scaling back some of their plans a little so they had some cash in reserve for emergencies.

“Now we can gossip,” Vil said triumphantly.

Kit laughed helplessly. “How long did it take for him to get there?”

“I called him at eleven. He was at Hart’s Crossing by four. I left him sleeping at home and came to work.”

“He’s whipped,” Kit laughed.

“He knows he’d better keep me happy,” she said with a wicked chuckle. “And did he make me happy last night,” she added in a content voice. “I forgot how much fun intense, passionate sex could be. Ken almost made me late for work,” she laughed.

“Now you sound like Sheila,” Kit grunted, which made her laugh.

“I could never be that bad,” she protested. “But he’d certainly make Sheila talk about him,” she chuckled. “That’s the good thing about rich boys, bro, they know what they’re doing.”

“I wouldn’t know.”

“Sure you would, you are one of the rich boys,” she teased. “I told Ken to stay, too,” she purred. “He doesn’t know it yet, but he’s here for good. He’s moving into Hart’s Crossing effective today.”

“That desperate?”

“That clever,” she chuckled. “With the family war going on, I want to keep him very close to me when he’s here. And I keep him at paw for when I want some attention,” she purred. “Now that I’ve experienced every aspect of Ken and I find I like them all, and add to that what’s going on, I’ve made a decision.”

“That sounds like there’s a proposal coming,” Kit laughed.

“There’d better be,” she said immediately. “I know it’s dreadfully fast as far as courtships go in our circles, but I can’t deny that I want Ken. After last night, I want him badly. I think we’re a good match. He’s my intellectual equal, he makes me happy, and now I know he can keep me happy in bed. And besides, being married to a Brighton will make any subsequent attempt to take me off the chair much harder because Winston Brighton may have something to say about it. And between Vulpan Shipyards and Brighton industries, our families will control the largest combined shipbuilding companies on Earth. So the marriage is good for me, good for the Brightons, and good for the shipyard.”

“Always keeping an eye on politics,” Kit chuckled.

“Naturally, but the advantage here is I like the male I’m marrying for politics,” she chuckled. “I think I could learn to love him, easily. So, after giving him a suitably enthusiastic greeting this morning, I left him at home after hinting that there’s something I want him to ask me when I get home tonight.”

“Hinted?”

“Naturally. You never just come out and say something like that, bro. But I told him that it would be slightly scandalous for him to be staying at Hart’s Crossing for a few weeks without some kind of official announcement to give the press, and that he’d better think of something official we can tell our families. The look on his face when I left told me he got the point.”

Kit laughed. “So, you think he’s on the phone to his father right now crowing?”

“He’d better be,” she laughed. “That dodgy old fox certainly had wedding bells in his ears when he introduced me to Ken, I’m sure he’s having the engagement ring sent over by courier as we speak. From what Ken said, if he engaged, he’d be giving me his grandmother’s engagement ring, and we’d be wearing his grandparents’ wedding rings. It seems that there’s a something of a tradition in the Brighton family. There are two identical sets of wedding rings and engagement rings that are passed down from one generation to the next, to the firstborn. His father and mother are wearing the other set. And the funny thing is, his grandmother is still alive, so she’ll be giving up her engagement ring to me. I hope she doesn’t mind,” she mused.

“You think he’ll propose tonight, then?”

“If he doesn’t, I’ll be very angry,” she answered immediately. “I want a fast engagement, too. I want to be married by the first of September. I want to be married before Laura is born.”

“Holy cow,” Kit breathed. “You’re serious?”

“Deadly,” she answered.

The door opened, and Jessie came in, carrying a plate of home-cooked bagels. “Morning again, handsome fox,” she smiled.

“Close the door,” Kit called. “Vil, Jessie’s here.”

“Hey sis-in-law!” Vil’s voice came over the speaker as Jessie closed the door.

“Hi Vil! How are things going up there? Is everything okay?”

“Just fine, just fine. But I thought I should let you know something.”

“What?”

“I more or less told Ken this morning that I’m waiting for him to propose to me,” she said. “And I’d better not wait long.”

“Really? That’s wonderful!” she said happily. “Congratulations!”

“I expect him to propose tonight. He’d better,” she said seriously. “And I intend to marry before you have Laura. Very early in September, or late August.”

“Wow, so soon? Why?”

“Because the sooner we’re married, the better off we’ll be,” she answered. “The family will be a lot less willing to mess with me if I’m married to a Brighton.”

“I hope that’s not the only reason you’re marrying,” Jessie said, slightly accusingly.

“Of course not. I think Ken is a wonderful male who’s intelligent and engaging, and I found out this morning he can satisfy me in bed,” she said in a purring voice that made Jessie’s cheeks ruffle. “So, I’ll be sure to let you know what happens tonight.”

“I’m sure we’ll like what we hear,” Kit chuckled. “What happens today outside of that?”

“Today, first thing this morning I get rid of Abermathy, which will leave only two of the elders’ bribed members on the board. He has a meeting with me in twenty minutes, and I’m sure he already knows what’s coming. After Abermathy’s history, probably after lunch, I’ll call a meeting of the board and I put the bait on the table,” she said. “Now that I’ve gotten Zach out of the way,” she said lightly, “I’m going to introduce an idea before the board that’ll make Uncle Jake go up in flames. I’m going to propose that we take Vulpan Shipyards public.”

Kit almost swallowed his tongue, then he choked and coughed enough to make Jessie slap him on the back. “Good God, femme!” he wheezed, then he laughed helplessly. “You know how to bait a trap!”

“What does that mean, go public?” Jessie asked.

“To sell shares of the shipyard to the public,” Vil answered over the phone. “Which would decimate the money the family earns from the shipyard, because we’d have to share it with anyone who bought stock. The offer might make them vote me out, if some of the board wasn’t privy to what I’m doing.”

“You told them?”

“The ones I can trust, yes. I told Akers, Longwell, and Sievers that I think someone is leaking Vulpan secrets to the public, and then I trust explicitly not to say anything to the rest of the board, so I’m setting a trap. Something like this would be huge, huge news. I told them that if rumor of this hits the public, then we know someone on the board is doing something naughty. The side effect is that if anyone tells Zach, I can fire everyone involved. The only way Zach could get out of it is if he comes to me and tells me someone tipped him off on his own. If I can prove he was told and said nothing, he’s gone.”

“I hope it doesn’t get too messy,” Jessie said.

“Just the usual family intrigue, Jessie,” Vil chuckled. “I’ll be fine, trust me.”

“Well, I’ll worry anyway.”

“I know, but trust me. I have everything under control.”

“Well, it’s just a little nervewracking, especially since what’s going on up there can spill over down here.”

“Well, I’m doing my best to keep that from happening, Jess. Just trust me. And keep your laptops close tonight, I’ll want to show you the ring when he gives it to me,” she chuckled.

“We’re going out with Nick after work, he’s going to teach us about guns,” Kit told her. “He said that since he carries a pistol and we’ll be around him, he wants to train us in gun safety.”

“That sounds familiar,” she laughed. “The first week after I hired Stav and Marcus, they did the same thing. I haven’t shot a gun since then, but they taught me how to use the guns they carry.”

“Wow, who knew Vil could use a gun,” Jessie giggled.

“I’m full of surprises, sis-in-law,” she answered cheekily. “Anyway, I gotta go, it’s time to go drop a bomb in the boardroom. Talk to you tonight.”

“Be good, sis.”

“Good luck, Vil!” Jessie added.

After the call ended, Kit and Jessie looked at each other. “I hope Ken proposes to her,” she said.

“Oh, that’s a given,” Kit laughed. “She all but hit him over the head with it. If he doesn’t ask her tonight, she’ll probably toss him out. He can’t be that dense.”

“What did she say?”

“What she told Ken is literally hitting him over the head with ask me to marry you.”

Jessie giggled. “She should just ask him herself, like I did you.”

“Vil doesn’t work that way, love,” he smiled. “She asks without asking, and does without doing. She’s told Ken she wants to marry him, and that’s all she needs to do. Ken had better do what she told him to do and propose to her. So she did propose to him in a way, by telling him that he’d better propose to her. The same way you told me I’d better propose to you,” he winked.

She laughed. “Liar! I proposed to you!”

“Only because Cybil interrupted me from doing it first,” he countered. “I already had the ring!”

“Suuuuuure,” she teased, sitting on the edge of his desk with the platter in one paw as the other tapped him lightly on the forehead.

“Don’t make me get Rick to prove it,” he replied, putting his paw on her belly. “In the end, all that matters is we’re married, and there’s a little something in here that’s waiting to be spoiled rotten,” he smiled.

“We will not!” she laughed, putting her paw over his. She laughed harder when he slipped his paw under her shirt and ran his fingers through the silky fur on her expanding belly. “Kit,” she said in a sudden purring voice.

“Hush, I’m petting our daughter,” he told her.

“Petting?” she asked, giggling uncontrollably, then she put the platter down and wrapped her arms around him and slid down into his chair. “Such a silly fox!” she laughed, giving him a kiss on the cheek. “So, I’m going to have a brother-in-law,” she purred in his ear. “I like him. I should have stolen him from Vil and abandoned you. After all, I love the boy foxes,” she purred in his ear.

“Such a mean kitty!” he laughed, nuzzling her neck. “I guess I’ll have to lock you up so I can keep you for ever and ever,” he teased.

She giggled. “Nah,” she retorted. “I might stay with you if you give me a kiss.”

“Such a hard bargain,” he hummed, then he paid her price.

“Hey, hey! No hanky-panky in here!” Lilly called as she opened the door. “Rick’s waiting for ya, Kit,” she winked.

Jessie laughed. “I have to do my article anyway,” she said, kissing him on the muzzle. “Go make us some money!”

“Yes, mistress,” he replied, slapping her playfully on the rear when she got up.

The training session with Nick wasn’t bad at all.

It lasted about three hours. He spent an hour with them thoroughly teaching them about his weapon of choice, the Glock .45 caliber Model 38 compact semi-automatic pistol, a powerful yet not overly large pistol that was favored by professionals for both its stopping power and its rugged reliability under even the worst conditions. It was the same model pistol Nick carried at almost all times, and therefore the one with which they may come into contact, and then an hour using it. Kit learned how it worked, completely, even learned how to take it apart and clean it. He learned how to load it, how to check to see if it was loaded, learned how to unload it and clear a chambered round safely using dummy rounds that looked like bullets but would do nothing if he pulled the trigger with the dummy round in the chamber, learned about safe use and storage, learned how to aim a pistol, learned the proper technique to shoot it, and then he got the opportunity to fire it. It had more recoil than he expected, but it wasn’t that bad. Nick let him fire about 100 rounds total, having to load rounds into the clip himself, and after a little practice and getting the hang of the sights, he found that he wasn’t a bad shot. Steady paws, Nick said he had. Jessie received similar training, and after he let them fire the two pistols he provided, he showed them some other weapons he'd brought with him and gave them the chance to test fire them. He showed Kit the automatic shotgun he'd talked about the day before, a Mossberg product that was illegal to be bought by civilians, though it wasn't illegal to own, due to a loophole in American gun laws. The fact that it was automatic, that it would fire a shell about every second, was what made it illegal to be sold in the United States, but since it was a shotgun, it wasn't illegal to own, at least not since the repeal of the assault weapons ban. It was sleek, black, evil-looking thing that looked heavy and rugged, and fired large shells filled with buckshot or slugs. Nick let him fire it, but wouldn't allow him to fire it in its automatic setting, and the thing nearly dislocated his shoulder...as well as attracting quite a bit of attention from both visitors and workers at the range. He was shown a Colt AR 15, which was the civilian equivalent of the military M-16. He was also shown two different pistols. The first was a classic revolver, a Smith and Wesson .38 special, what many called a police standard revolver, and the second was an small Beretta .25 caliber pistol, showing them how small a pistol could be. Nick allowed them to fire a few rounds from the AR 15 and the pistols, which showed Kit the big, big difference between an assault weapon like the AR 15 and a pistol.

After learning how to shoot the pistol and letting them test fire the other weapons he brought with him, Nick produced their own shotguns, and Kit practiced with the pump shotgun at a static, non-moving target. Kit fired about 20 rounds with the shotgun, and then Nick showed him how to clean it. After it was cleaned, Nick bagged up all the weapons and drove them home. He brought their shotguns into the house with them and made sure they were locked in the gun cabinet before he was satisfied, and then bid them goodnight and went home.

Once the playing was over, Kit called Vil to find out what happened. She didn't answer her phone, going straight to voicemail, so Kit figured that she and Ken were talking—or something else—and didn't want to be disturbed. So, he dropped Jessie's commercial rating study books in her lap and ran into the kitchen to cook dinner. He made one of her favorites, lemon grilled salmon, using the grill and hurrying because there was a thunderstorm brewing out to the west. Salmon wasn't exactly cheap, but Kit never scrimped when it came to Jessie. She loved salmon, so he bought salmon. She loved shrimp and lobster, he bought shrimp and lobster. What Jessie wanted, Jessie got.

“Kit! Vil texted me!” Jessie shouted from the living room when Kit brought in the freshly grilled salmon. “She wants us on conference!”

“Set it up, love, I have to shut down the grill before it starts raining!”

He got into the living room, where Jessie had her laptop on the coffee table and Vil was already on the monitor. “Vil!” he said with a smile. “So?”

She held up her paw, showing off a very impressive diamond ring. Her smile was almost smugly victorious.

“Congratulations!” Jessie beamed as Kit laughed lightly. “Where's Ken, we have to say hi and congratulations too!”

“He'll be back in a few minutes, he's up in our bedroom.”

“Our?” Kit asked with a chuckle.

“Ours now,” she answered. “He proposed, I told him from now on, when he's in Boston, he stays here. It'll be something of a scandal, but at the present time and under the current circumstances, I want him right here if he's not in England. He'll be living here after we're married anyway. Ken may have his manor in England, but he'll live here. And we've already had our first fight," she laughed.

"Over what?"

"Vil refuses to take my name!" Kendall said from behind her, coming into view. "She's keeping the name Vulpan!"

Congratulations, Ken!" Jessie beamed.

"Thanks, thanks," he grinned. "But seriously, I'm the male, here!"

"Ken, no femme Vulpan has ever given up her name after marriage," Kit told him. "If Vil follows tradition, she'll adopt your name in front of her Vulpan name and go by Vilenne Brighton Vulpan."

"That's exactly what I'm going to do," Vil nodded, patting Kendall on the shoulder. "Sorry, Kenny boy, but a Vulpan never gives up the name."

"Not even when taking on a more important name?" Kendall grinned, which made Vil laugh.

"There's no name more important than Vulpan," she teased. "I should make you go by Kendall Brighton Vulpan too."

"Bugger that," he retorted. "I'm a Brighton, lovey, not a Vulpan."

"I'm happy for both of you," Kit told them. "I'm also glad you're not dense, Ken."

Kendall laughed. "I almost peed the bed when she kissed me on the nose and told me that she was waiting for something official to tell our families," he said, putting his paw on her shoulder fondly. "Totally floored me. I thought she'd dangle me on the end of her string for at least six more months, but wham, right outa the blue! The old male had to get the ring here before she got home from work so I could be ready for her,” he laughed. “But wot, I can say that I’m very happy she accepted,” he smiled at her. “Villy’s some kind of woman, and I’m gonna enjoy making her love me.”

“You’re doing a good job, Ken,” Vil chuckled, patting the paw on her shoulder. “And you will stop calling me Villy,” she said, gripping his paw and digging her short claws into the back of his paw.

He winced, then laughed. “I guess I’ll have to be nice now,” he grinned at her. “And call you Misses Brighton from now on. Just anything but what you want.”

“Remember that speech about unformed clay I can’t touch? Well, I can touch now,” she told him.

He laughed. “Then I’d better run back to England,” he winked at her. “I have to go back for a few days and get everything ready for me to move over. You know, go on a leave of absence from Brighton Industries, lord it over my brothers and male cousins that I’m marrying the biggest prize across the pond, and open that bottle of hundred year old scotch the old male has waiting for me for accomplishing my mission of wooing young Vil with my irresistible charm and roguish good looks and making her fall head over heels in love with me,” he said with an outrageous smile into the camera.

“Oh, go pack your suitcase!” Vil barked, swatting him on the shoulder, then kissing him soundly on the muzzle before pushing him out of the camera’s view. “God, what have I done,” she grunted, which made both Kit and Jessie explode into laughter, then she continued. “He’s going back home to get himself ready to move, while I arrange our wedding. We decided on August twenty-ninth, and we'll marry at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, just like mother wanted. It'll be both a social event and also something of a scandal, but I want a little harmless scandal right now. I'm sure the sudden announcement of our engagement and the almost unheard-of short wedding date will get furs talking more about me and less about the family war going on right now."

"Probably both," Kit chuckled. "After all, they can point at your very abrupt wedding plans and say it has something to do with what's going on. Which it does."

"Only abstractly," she chuckled. "It just hastened an inevitability. I'd have married Ken no matter what."

"So nice to know!" Kendall's voice burred from the background.

"Pack, you!" she ordered, looking away from the camera. "I see I'm going to have to work a while to train this one," she noted to Kit. "Good thing too, I'm running out of room in my garden for the unmarked graves."

He laughed and gave his sister a smile. "And you'll enjoy it as much as I enjoyed taming Jess."

"You did not," Jessie laughed. "If anyone got trained in this house, it was you, you scurrilous scoundrel!"

"I love being married to an English professor, she never insults me the same way twice," Kit sighed lustily, looking at Jessie, which made both femmes laugh. "So, how do you think the family will react?"

"The cousins, eh, like they care," Jessie shrugged. "But the elders will probably pee themselves when they hear about it. It's hard enough to get rid of me on my own, but when I'm married to Ken, then suddenly the Brightons have a big say in just who's sitting in my chair. They'll want to keep their daughter-in-law in control of the Vulpan companies, since that puts Kendall literally in bed with me," she chuckled with a wicked little smile. "Maybe they'll think I'll be too distracted with my upcoming wedding to keep an eye on what they're doing," she mused. "And they'll make a foolish mistake that lets me crush them in one fell swoop."

"Doubtful," Kit answered. "I take it you're gonna make me come to the wedding?"

She laughed. "Why did you even bother asking that, you silly boy?" she told him. "This is justification enough for you to come to Boston. Your sis doesn't get married every day, you know."

"I'm going too, and when we go, we are staying in Stonebrook, handsome fox," Jessie told him. "I want to be there so that horrible femme Alicia can just baste in her hatred when she sees me in my last month of pregnancy, which she'll only see from the window since they'll be too afraid to come out of their room as long as we're there."

"Now she's a Vulpan, bro," Vil told him with a bright smile.

"I'm not sure about that, pretty kitty," Kit said uncertainly. "I don't think I could ever stay there. You know what that house means to me."

"I know that that house means more to you than you think it does, else you wouldn't have gone after your uncle Zach so furiously over what he did. You were really angry, handsome fox. I think that the ghosts are starting to fade a little, love. And I think Clancy would be overjoyed to have you in Stonebrook one more time, just so he has a chance to have one more good memory of you in your family home."

“I don’t know,” he said, his paws starting to shake.

“I think we can manage one night,” she said gently to him, putting her paw over his.

“I’ll think about it.”

“You don’t have long, you have a little over a month,” Vil grinned at him.

A rumble of thunder echoed through the house, and Kit laughed. “Think we’d better call this short, sis. I need to go cover the grill before the rain starts, anyway. I hope it’s cooled down,” he mused.

“Too late,” Jessie giggled as the first sheet of rain hit the living room windows.

“Well, we’d better pack it up anyway, I have some things to do,” Vil said. “I think I’ll waylay Ken while he’s packing,” she hummed, licking her chops in an anticipatory manner. “Get my last hurrah before he goes home.”

“Be nice, sis,” Kit laughed.

“Oh, it is nice,” she purred.

“I think I should have never married, I’ve created a monster,” Kit teased. “You saw the good life and now you want it too!”

“Excuse me?” Jessie asked archly, though she was smiling.

“Pft, the Ice Queen had to melt sometime, she does have hormones after all,” Vil said, which made Kit and Jessie explode into laughter. “I’ll give you a status report tomorrow, guys, and I’ll send you some newspapers with the official announcement.”

“Sure thing, sis.”

“Have fun, Vil,” Jessie called.

“Oh, I will,” she said in a seductive manner, and she ended the conference.

“Have fun?” Kit asked, then he laughed. “You naughty girl!”

Jessie was about to say something, but the lights wavered, then went out, as they lost power. She laughed and closed the laptop, then wrapped her arms around him. “Yes, I’m a naughty girl, and I demand my male be naughty too,” she purred in his ear.

She laughed when he got up and picked her up out of her chair. “Now, to the dumbwaiter!” he called, which made her laugh in his arms.

Vil’s sudden announcement, quite simply, knocked Boston on its ear.

Vil emailed a bunch of links to websites to him the next morning, and Kit spent the morning surfing them out of curiosity. The first, out of the Boston Globe, had a huge headline dominating their front page, supplanting all other news, VULPAN MATRIARCH ANNOUNCES ENGAGEMENT TO SON OF BRITISH INDUSTRIALIST. In the Boston Herald, the headline was VILENNE VULPAN ENGAGED TO KENDALL BRIGHTON. The Boston tabloid Boston Today had a big picture of Vil and Kendall at the basketball game Kit and Jessie attended, with the caption IT’S OFFICIAL! underneath them. The Back Bay, another gossip paper, had a picture of Vil and Kendall kissing, taken by a paparazzi with a telephoto lens, with the title Vulpan Ice Queen and British Boytoy engaged, and under that was the teaser August wedding date set...is the Ice Queen pregnant? It even went national. The Furs website had Vil and Kendall as their top story, showing a picture of them at the July 4th concert with the headline Vilene Vulpan of the storied Vulpan family announces engagement to Kendall Brighton, son of British industrialist Winston Brighton. It even hit the major news networks, with a link to CNN that showed a file photo of Vil and the headline Vulpan CEO to marry son of Brighton Industries CEO. It even got into Fox Business Channel's website, a picture of Vil and a very austere middle-aged fox that had to be Winston Brighton, with the headline Mergers: Vulpan and Brighton families to marry. International shipbuilding dynasty in the making?

Kit just had to step back for a moment and admire the pure, raw cunning of his older sister. This marriage was so many things on so many levels that it took a detailed analysis to fully comprehend its impact, and that was a reason to admire Vil for her intelligence and savvy. The short engagement was brilliant, absolutely brilliant. By Kit's estimation, Zach would only have about ten days after he got back from his suspension before Vil got married, and when she did, she'd have the shield of Kendall Brighton to stand behind. And when she gained that defense, she would be almost untouchable. Winston Brighton, Kendall's father, had probably been praying that throwing Kendall and Vil together would lead to marriage, for he was drooling over the idea of a corporate alliance between the Vulpan companies and Brighton Industries. He was probably dreaming of access to Vulpan shipyards, of the two companies exchanging teams so they could study each other and learn from each other, both becoming better by learning the tricks the other company had developed to increase quality, efficiency, and safety while reducing costs. Winston wanted to study their shipbuilding methods, which were the most efficient and cost-effective in the world while still producing some of the highest quality ships and doing so with an outstanding worker safety record. He was looking forward to the two companies trading their master tradesfurs, their master welders, shipfitters, pipefitters, painters, sandblasters, and electricians, so they could compare their skills and see where they could learn from each other to become even better. And Kit was certain that he was all but foaming at the mouth at the idea of being able to buy Vulpan steel below market, since it was a bit expensive on the open market because of its outstanding quality; Vulpan steel was considered one of the best quality commercial steels made, and it could be custom ordered to spec for special requirements. More than anything else, Winston wanted that direct line to Vulpan Steel, which would allow him to buy top-quality steel below market and increase his profits...and Vil would sell to him at the same price that Vulpan Steel sold to Vulpan Shipyards, which was 1% over cost. Once Vil was married to Kendall, his uncles would have to contend with the powerful Winston Brighton if they tried to unseat Vil from her chair. To keep his direct access to the Vulpan companies, Winston would fight on Vil's behalf, and Winston would be a powerful, powerful ally.

And if that wasn't good enough, the sudden announcement and speed of the engagement would be weapons unto themselves. The uncles would not want Vil to marry Kendall because of the support she would get from the Brightons, but they'd have virtually no time to come up with some way to delay or prevent the marriage, and the engagement itself was a bombshell, something that he was absolutely sure none of them expected to happen so soon. Three months from now, maybe, five or six months, definitely, but not after just three months of dating! It was literally scandalous in the upper crust, the speed from which Vil and Kendall went from meeting to engagement, and since it was so scandalous, it was a curve ball that literally nobody saw coming...not even Kit, and he knew his sister very well.

Which also explained why the elders were moving now. Kit and Terry were an excuse, the match to the fuse that was already laid down, the straw that broke the camel's back. The simple fact of the matter was that they had to unseat Vil before she married Kendall or they would never get her out, and they knew it. They knew that Kendall and Vil got along and that a marriage was virtually inevitable, so they had to move before that marriage could take place.

And then Vil comes along and drops an anvil on their tails.

Something like ruining a marriage usually took a couple of months to plan and execute, and Vil wasn't giving them a chance. She had ambushed them with the engagement announcement, and by the time they managed to get some plan in place to prevent the wedding, it would be too late, they'd already be married. And since Vil already told Kendall everything that was going on, they couldn't even try to scare him off with threats of the Brightons getting embroiled in scandals; in Britain, the reputation of a family was almost as important as its money. Cybil had been crushed by Vil both financially and socially, for Vil had ruined her reputation and stained the Whitmore name, and as a result, she was an utter pariah in Britain. The threat of scandal wouldn't scare the Brightons in the slightest, because they had far more to gain in Vil marrying into their family than they had to lose.

The simple problem for the elders was that Vil was too firmly entrenched. She was in the position of advantage, and she had prepared herself for the possibility that she might have to defend her perch from jealous family members who wanted to knock her off of it. She had had over a year to get ready for this confrontation, and they were finding out that Vil was both ready for them, and she fought dirty. Kit was fairly sure that his elders had no idea that she could force their bought and paid for board members to retire, quit, or simply run away as in the case of Kay Simpson, and that swift reaction to Zach's open declaration of war had left his elders flustered and out of sorts, unsure of what to do next. They had plans, yes, but they were probably having trouble executing them against Vil, who was dug in behind her walls and was doing a damn good job of lobbing hand grenades over her wall while they tried to batter it down.

And on top of all that, Vil could use the wedding as a viable and devastating excuse to all but shut down the board. She didn't schedule the board meetings, but with her preparing for her wedding, she had a valid reason to veto any attempt to schedule regular business for the next month. She would cull a day here and there at first, then cut board meetings in half, then probably all but put the board on hiatus until after her wedding... probably right about when Uncle Zach got back from his one month suspension, thereby robbing him of even a single paltry attempt to call for a vote for her dismissal.

And while they may hope that she'd be too busy with her wedding to pay attention to what was going on, they'd find out that Vil was quite an effective multitasker. She would plan her wedding and loom over the board at the same time, even as she fought with the elders over control of the family business, and therefore the family's power.

In one simple move, Vil was panicking the elders, drastically reducing their chances of stopping the wedding, securing Kendall for herself, and wrapping herself in the added protection of the Brighton family. And all it cost her was marrying a male she intended to marry in the first place a little earlier than she planned.

Vil was just so damn cunning, it was almost criminal. Well, actually... it was criminal, given she didn't exactly use her cunning for legal pursuits.

"Yo, son, what's up?" Rick asked. "You comin' to the meetin' or what?"

Kit chuckled. "Sorry. I don't know if you've heard, but since it's now official, I can tell you. Vil got engaged last night."

"Really? To the British fox?" Kit nodded, and Rick chuckled. "Well, Martha is right yet again," he declared. "She said the first time she saw them together that they'd tie the knot. That femme of mine is never wrong when it comes to pickin' couples. She pegged you and Jessie, she picked Sam and Kev, and she picks Vil and that Brighton fella."

"Well, why didn't she tell me?" Kit laughed.

"Why does she have to tell you somethin' you already know?" Rick challenged. "Now come on, Savid's waitin'."

Kit was going to announce Vil's engagement at the wrap meeting later that day, but he wasn't the only fur who checked the news in the office. Pat was the first to find it, and he quickly spread the news while Kit, Rick, and Savid were having the morning meeting. When Kit came out of the meeting, he got a round of pawshakes and congratulations on behalf of his sister. "Dude, we so have to go!" Jeffrey said. "Do you think Vil would invite us, Kit? She's been so awesome to us, I'd love to return the favor by being there to see it. I'd love to go to her wedding!"

"Think of the story that'll make!" Barry said. "And we could score an interview with both the bride and groom, since Vil's an investor here...she's family!"

“We could wrap the issue a day early and go up,” Rick mused. “But the magazine couldn’t afford flying everyone up there. I guess we can make it optional. If you wanna pay your way up, you’re more than welcome to go. Provided Vil invites us, that is,” he said, scratching his chin. “Vil’s a big important femme, guys, and I’m sure there’ll be like princes and billionaires fighting for spots in the cathedral. She might not have room for us.”

“Let’s find out,” Kit said, opening his phone and speed-dialing Vil. “Sis,” he greeted, “Rick has a favor to ask.” He held his phone out to the dingo, who took it with a slight wince.

“Uh, Vil, congratulations, hon,” he said first, then he smiled. “Ain’t no thing, hon. But the gang kinda wants to come to the wedding. I’m sure you have lots of invites to send out, and may not have room for us. That’s fine, that’s fine! I told them they have to pay their own way up, though. Good. Thanks, hon. Need to talk to your brother? Okay then, bye-bye. She said we can come, all of us,” he announced as he closed Kit’s phone and gave it back to him, which was greeted with a round of excited cheers. “She said we were silly to think that she wasn’t gonna send us invitations!”

“Well, you never know, she might not want me to outshine her in the cathedral,” Marty said flamboyantly, striking a little pose. “She’d better be looking her best, or Princess Marty’s gonna make her sun set!”

“Well, we’ll talk this over at the wrap meeting, guys. Until then, back to work, you freeloaders!” Rick said with a grin. “Where’s that article you said you’d have finished, Lilly? Why are you standing here when you should be in your office working on it?”

“Watch it, old male, or I’ll pierce your ears!” Lilly shot back at him.

Rick laughed. “Seriously, though, send me what you have and estimate how much more it’ll be, we need to fit it in.”

“No prob, boss, all I have to do now is spellcheck it,” she said with a smile, hurrying towards her office. “I’ll send it right over!”

Vil’s good news made it a quick and happy day for them. They got the issue put to bed, and once it was put to bed, Kit left work a little early to pick up some lobster tails to take home for dinner. Again, it was expensive, but Jessie was on a seafood kick, and money was no object when Jessie wanted something. Jessie only really liked lobster tail, she didn’t eat whole lobster the way Kit did. He got home, however, to see a trio of Vanguard cars in the visitor lot in front of the community center, and there were two uniformed security guards standing out in front of the community center, one of them smoking a cigarette. Two armed security guards, he noticed. The front door was unlocked, and when he came in, he found himself in a room with Jessie, Nick, and two others he didn’t know. One was a tall lioness with long tawny hair pulled into a ponytail, the other a short badger with his black hair in a crewcut, like a shoeshine brush between his ears. Both of them were wearing jeans and button-down blue shirts with the Vanguard logo embroidered on the left breast. Both of them, Kit noticed, were carrying pistols in holsters at their belts.

“Kit,” Jessie called, hurrying over to him and kissing him.

“What’s going on, pretty kitty?” he asked uncertainly.

“Heya,” Nick smiled. “Kit, meet Tanya Jackson and Ernie Ayers from Vanguard.”

“Mister Vulpan,” the tall, powerful-looking lioness said with a smile, shaking his paw. Her grip was rather firm. “Nothing to be alarmed about.

Nick here invited us over to talk about security at the complex, and he brought us over to meet Misses Vulpan.”

“The owner’s going to hire Vanguard to provide security here at your complex,” the badger said, shaking Kit’s paw. “We’ve been discussing things with Nick. Your sister was clear to us when she sent him down that he has a primary interest in your personal security, Mister Vulpan, so we’re coordinating with him.”

“Armed guards? Is that really necessary?”

“The guards here won’t be armed,” Tanya assured him with a smile. “We’ll just have one guard here during the evenings and nights, who’ll basically just make sure all is well and be available to help any of the tenants if they need it. You must have seen our males out at the community center?” Kit nodded. “Those are roving Sergeants, who move from site to site to deliver paperwork, assist when our guards need help, or check to make sure everything’s alright,” she explained. “They have to have an intimate knowledge of all sites in their territory, and this is their territory. If you saw them there, they must have completed their walk of the complex. And they are armed.”

“Ah, I see,” Kit nodded. “I brought lobster tails, pretty kitty,” he said, holding up the bag.

She laughed. “You read my mind!” she told him, taking the bag and hurrying towards the kitchen with it.

“I have to say, Mister Vulpan, that you married an angel,” Tanya said quietly and with a gentle smile. “She is the sweetest femme I think I’ve ever met.”

“That’s my Jessie,” Kit smiled. “So, now that she’s busy in the kitchen, you can tell me what’s really going on.”

Nick’s smile faded. “Vil sent down a warning to tighten security,” he said. “Lupe really is hiring Vanguard to watch over the complex, so we’re using that as a convenient excuse to increase a visible presence around the complex.”

“There’s going to be a marked Vanguard unit and an unmarked unit at or near the complex at all times,” Ernie told him. “There will be the one visible unarmed guard, but there will also be two plainclothes armed guards within a one minute response time to the complex.”

“Did Vil say what was going on, Nick?” he asked.

Nick shook his head. “Afraid not, Kit,” he answered. “She just told me to tighten up. It might just be a precaution, because I’m sure if she knew of something specific, she’d have told me so I’d know what to look for. I think she’s just being careful. She loves ya, you know, and she wants you to be safe.”

“I guess so,” Kit chuckled.

The Vanguard furs stayed for about twenty more minutes, then they and Nick both took their leave to continue whatever it was they were doing. Kit did call Vil about it, after he knew she was home. “Oh, I’m just covering the bases, bro,” she told him. “I’ve had Vanguard step it up all over town, not just with you. You forget, I’m not just protecting you down there. Besides, they didn’t strike their first blow at you.”

“What happened?”

“They went after Terry,” she answered. “Terry was arrested on suspicion of drug trafficking by the N.O.P.D.”

“That’s ludicrous!”

“That’s what the DA said when he got the case. Terry spent about two hours at the precinct, bailed himself out, then the DA dropped the case a couple of hours later. I didn’t even have to do anything,” she chuckled. “Whoever tried to frame Terry didn’t do a very good job, Terry’s bodyguard was able to unravel the whole scheme in about four hours. No doubt the DA read the cops the riot act about believing unsubstantiated anonymous tips. I’m sure Terry is about to have a little something to say about that, since I told him who did it to him. And that’ll also piss off Tom. He’s still angry with Zach over punching Terry, and now Maxine attacks his son. Tom may hate that Terry is going out with Allison, but he will not tolerate the others trying to destroy his son, not when Terry is the brightest star in Tom’s family. Zach, Jake, and Maxine are quickly alienating the other elders.”

“Terry has a bodyguard now?”

“You think I’d let him walk around outside of Boston right now without protection?” Vil asked. “Stav and Marcus dug up another of their business contacts who could come quickly. He got there yesterday, and the very next day he has to clear his client of a frame job,” she sighed. “At least he proved he’s good.”

“Wow,” Kit breathed. “I didn’t realize it was getting...messy.”

“This is war, brother,” she said grimly. “The elders will attack me any way they can, and they know one way to do it is through you, Austin, and Terry. It won’t be easy for them to attack Austin because I own the city, so they took a cheap shot at Terry while I get New Orleans settled and under my control, striking in a moment of opportunity. Besides, you're the root cause of of this, in their minds. Your lurking on the edges the family and Terry's defiance in dating Allison are intolerable to them, and you two would be...corrected, once they remove me and take control of the family. Terry would be forced to stop seeing Allison, and they'd basically disown you."

"Like I'd shed a tear if they did," Kit grunted.

"Well, I would," she told him. "And so would Sheila and Muffy. Those two really love you, bro. The rest of the family may hate you, but you have four Vulpans who care, and one more that would care if you let him."

"Brian can go to hell," Kit said immediately and with heat. "There is nothing he can say or do for me to forgive him. Nothing!"

"Forever is a long time, brother," Vil said gently. "I think that over time, you may change your mind."

"Not anytime soon," he declared. "You don't know what it was like, Vil, to lay in that hospital bed, not knowing if I would live or die, with nothing but the pain and knowing that I was alone. Where was Brian when I was in the hospital? Why didn't he come to see me? Why didn't he try to call from a pay phone, write me an anonymous letter? He did nothing, sis. Nothing! He left me there to swim in an ocean of pain with nothing but Suzy and her messages from you to keep me company! If it hadn't been for you and Suzy, I think I would have died in that bed, she was the only thing that kept me from giving up. They didn't care about me. They wanted me to die, because I was an embarrassment to them!" he said angrily. "I will never forgive them, Vil. Never!"

Jessie was there. Soothing paws came to rest on his shoulders, and his paws, which had been shaking with both anger and the memory of that traumatic time, sought her out. Jessie sat down beside him and took the phone from him and put it to her face, wrapping her arm around him and holding him close. “Vil, I think he’s done talking now,” she said gently. “He’ll call you back when he feels better. Bye-bye.”

Jessie comforted him through the worst of the anger and fear. Even now, he couldn’t think back to the time he spent in that hospital without shivering, and her presence soothed him in ways nothing ever had, or ever could. The feel of her fur under his fingers, the smell of her, her warmth, and the life growing inside her, they were balms on the raw, open wounds of the past, soothing the pain away. He clung to her for quite a while, until she had his head in her lap, and his damaged ear was pressed up against her swelling belly, feeling the little nudges from within that was their daughter Laura. Kit felt much better, holding Jessie’s paw close to his chest as her tail swished back and forth over his stomach and lower chest, her gorgeous longhaired tail that was even thicker and more luxurious than his bushy fox tail, with that adorable dark tip, her fox markings that betrayed her mixed heritage. The dark tip of her tail, her dark-mittened paws and feet, the black backs of her ears that were so obvious against her blond hair, they were all fox markings. “Thanks, pretty kitty,” he said with a loving smile at her.

“Any time, my handsome fox,” she smiled, stroking his hair back from his face, then playing with his good ear absently. “I love you.”

“God, I love you, too,” he declared emphatically. He started when little Laura kicked him in the head, and he laughed. “But I think our daughter is a little mad at me right now.”

“Nah, she’s just telling you she loves you too,” she winked, putting her other paw on the top of her belly, just over his muzzle. “I can’t wait until she’s out of there,” she laughed. “I want to see my feet again!”

“Hush, you are not fat, you are pregnant.”

“I never said I was fat. I’m just starting to feel what Mom said was coming. The back strain, the need to pee every half hour, the cravings, the mood swings,” she told him.

“I haven’t noticed any mood swings.”

“I’m careful to keep you out of them,” she winked. “Anytime I feel a sudden change in mood, I just go lie down or put on a good face until it passes. Besides, you keep me too busy to suffer too much with them.”

“I keep you too busy? You’re the one who I have to drag out of that kitchen,” he teased. “How many boxes of pastries did you mail to Kansas yesterday, hmm? You’re the cooking freak here, not me.”

“Speaking of that, why don’t we put dinner on hold for now, and go flying? I’ll let you sit in the left seat,” she offered.

He laughed, then sat up and kissed her lingeringly. “I would love to go flying with you, my pretty kitty. And you can fly. I love it when you chauffeur me around.”

“Sounds like I need a little chauffeur’s uniform,” she teased.

“Then I can bring you home and we can play naughty boss,” he said, nuzzling her neck.

She giggled. “Well, you were a fox of your word,” she sighed, putting her paw on his neck as he nuzzled and lightly nipped at her neck. “You said me being fat wouldn't keep you from wanting me.”

“Mee-yow, baby,” he said into her neck and pushed her down onto the couch, which made her laugh.

Chapter 32

There was a war going on in Boston. But, the war had multiple fronts, and Austin was one of those fronts.

In the week since the war began, Austin had become a front in the war, but the invaders were stymied by the powerful defenses that Vil had put in place in the city. Vil owned the city of Austin, lock, stock, and barrel, with the police and the DA's office in her pocket, and a personal line straight to the Governor of Texas. An example of Vil's power was the old DA that went after Kit. He wasn't a DA anymore. He wasn't even in Texas anymore. While Kit and Jessie were in Kansas, he suddenly retired, "to spend more time with his family" was the official reason, but the truth was that Vil retaliated for the male daring to go after her brother, and she did it when Kit wasn't in town to see what was going on. Vil didn't just force him out of the DA's office, she forced him out of Texas. He moved his family to Albuquerque, New Mexico, where he was now a private practice attorney after passing the New Mexico bar. He was stark evidence of what happened to furs that crossed Vilenne Vulpan and the Vulpan family. The new DA was much more "sympathetic" to the Vulpans, which in other words meant that he was owned by Vil. Kit could probably blow up a bus full of kindergartners and confess on live national television, and the Austin DA wouldn't prosecute.

Their elders had to fight an uphill battle against the protections Vil had put in place in Austin to get at those she protected, and that was a very tall order. Their knee-jerk attempt to get Allison arrested showed them that Vil had planned for this very event, and was ready for them. This left Kit, Jessie, Sheila, Allison, and everyone else free to live their lives, to ignore what was going on up in Boston, which was a brutal, knock-down drag-out slugfest. The elders had pulled out all the stops and were attacking Vil any way they could, from the cruel to the ridiculous, filing lawsuits against her, mocking her, spreading false rumors about her in the press, and trying to use their money, power, and influence to turn the furs of the shipyard and Boston against her. But Vil didn't bite on their attacks, she just hunkered down and played defense against their attacks, but she was also fighting back in other regards. She had filed a harassment case against her elders, pointing at the dozens of lawsuits filed against her in a matter of days and claiming that they were using the court system to harass her. She walled herself off in her manor and didn't talk to the press to answer the charges her elders had leveled against her in the court of tabloid public opinion, just letting the tabloids print whatever they pleased, but she did release a single press release stating that everything going on was part of an attempt by the elders to wrest control of the company away from her.

That single release all but dropped a bomb in Boston. The press knew something was going on in the Vulpan family, for Zach's assault on Terry was now public knowledge and the Vulpans had cleared out of Boston like they were running from the law. Vil's release suddenly made everything make sense, and it put the elders on their heels. They never expected Vil to aire Vulpan dirty laundry in public like that, thought she would keep the reason for their war secret, as the Vulpans kept everything secret. Reporters that had been eating up the slander and rumors spread by the Vulpan elders literally turned on the paws that fed them. The pack of reporters that had been all but camped out outside Hart's Crossing were now stalking Zach, Jake, and Maxine, trying to get the juicy details on this war within the Vulpan family, which put them as much on the defensive as Vil. Now they had to explain themselves to the public, and that was something that none of them wanted to do.

So, since the Vulpans weren't talking, the press started digging, and their actions were making it much harder for the elders to continue attacking Vil. Every single car that left Stonebrook, Twin Oaks, and Sun Garden was followed. Everyone anywhere near the families were questioned, and any strangers that moved in and out of the manors of the elders were noted and checked out. All they could do was call, and when one was arranging potentially illegal acts, one didn't like to do it over the phone in the age of federal wiretaps.

They even went so far as to send clandestine agents to New Orleans to whip up the workers of Avondale against Vil. They spread leaflets and told bald-faced lies to try to incite them to strike, but the simple fact of the matter was that they were too late for that, by about a week. Terry had already stamped out any strike talk because he did exactly what he threatened to do. On the Monday morning they were to vote on striking, there was an army of security guards waiting right across the street from the shipyard entrances, a naked show of force to prove that Terry would carry out his threat to fire anyone who went on strike. When the union representatives indignantly claimed that management couldn't fire strikers, that it was against the law, Terry dared them to try and see what happened. Literally. He said to them "I dare you to strike against Vulpan Shipyards, gentlemales. We are not the spineless cowards you dealt with before. When we are threatened, we don't capitulate, we retaliate."

It was an example of the willingness of the elders to hurt the family business in order to get rid of Vil. But she was ready for them here too. In the week since the war began, the six board members the elders had bribed to form a majority alliance against Vil were all gone. Five had retired, and one had fled the country. There were now only eight furs left on the board, because Jake had vetoed every single candidate that Vil had put into consideration for election to the board, and Vil had blocked every attempt by Jake to fill the board vacancies with furs loyal to the elders, paralyzing any attempt to fill the empty seats. The usual complement of 15 members was down by six due to Vil's actions, and Zach was suspended, leaving only eight left, which would have made it ridiculously easy for Vil to push through anything she pleased were Jake not on the board wielding his power as a Vulpan to gridlock the board. The six remaining board members were absolutely terrified of Vil, and would not vote against her, no matter what, leaving only Jake to block Vil. They didn't want to be called into her office next. Vil's draconian actions had scared the board and Jake enough that they didn't take her bait when she proposed taking the company public. Despite having ears near Zach and Jake both, neither Jake nor any member of the board leaked that bait beyond the boardroom, probably smelling it out as the trap it was.

But that didn't slow her down. Since she now had an iron-fisted grip on the board, she moved decisively. She made her move on a hot, sunny Monday. Kit should have been at work, but he, Jessie, and Sam were all at the airport, sitting on the back of Kit's Pathfinder gate watching as Sheila taxied out in a Cessna 172, going on her check ride. Still on the flight line in the other trainer, Allison was standing by the wing of the 172 talking with the FAA examiner, still undergoing her oral test before they got into the plane and took off. Today and tomorrow were test days for the summer flight class. The seven furs in the class would be doing their check rides, and Sheila and Allison had volunteered to go first. Kit and Jessie had helped them study for it all weekend, and Kit was utterly confident they would pass. Sheila was actually serious about learning to fly, but she was nowhere near as serious as Allison was. Kit's casual comment that her IFR was the only thing standing between her and being able to fly to New Orleans to see Terry whenever she wanted had lit a fire under that femme's tail. She had been studying like mad ever since, and had also already enrolled in a three week IFR course that AAIA offered, which Kit would help augment with personal lessons and also by giving Allison lessons in his plane. Sheila and Allison were still quite serious about going in together on a plane, but Kit had convinced them to hold off on a Cessna 400 and consider other possibilities, like a used King Air or a Crusader or a Grumman. A used twin engine might be cheaper for them to buy and still give them the same functionality as the 400, and Kit was certified to train them in multi engine planes.

Sheila's fun of flight and Allison's burning need to be able to fly to New Orleans had prepared them well for the check rides. Kit, Jessie, and Sam were watching from a discreet distance as Allison motioned at the wing, the ferret examiner nodded, and then they climbed into the plane.

"There goes Sheila," Jessie said, pointing as the 172 took off, climbed, and then started a banking turn to the left.

"Think she'll pass?" Sam asked.

"Oh, heck yeah," Jessie giggled. "She's ready."

"Let's watch Ally take off, then go do the deed," Kit sighed.

Today wasn't just all fun and games. Today, Kit had to move the 400 out of Avia's hangar. The Lear 450 would be back this afternoon, and he had to surrender the spot. Alice had agreed to lease him a tie down outside the hangar, at one of their tie down spots, which would maintain the plane as based at Bergstrom and allow them to evade several fees levied on visiting planes. In a show of faith, they even let him keep the remote to their hangar doors and gave him and Jessie access to Avia's building, letting them use their flight plan computer, lounge, and bathrooms. Alice had been quite fair to them, and she honestly regretted having to kick Kit and Jessie out, but they all knew that the day would come, and it was just business. Kit had rented the space fully knowing that it was only temporary, and he did not begrudge Alice or Avia one bit. They had been very kind to him, and he honestly appreciated them letting him rent the open space in their hangar while he could. The 400 would just have to sit out on the flight line until he could get hangar space for it.

They watched as Allison took off in the flight school's other trainer, then they got into the truck and drove to Avia. Alice met them in the hangar, and there were quite a few pawshakes all around as Kit and Jessie greeted Alice, Mike, Tommy, and Hank, the maintenance furs that worked on the jets. "I really hate to do this to you guys," Alice said earnestly.

"We knew it was coming, Alice," Kit chuckled. "But thanks for the tie down and the run of the hangar."

"Hey, we may have kicked you out, but we can still pretend to be your FBO," she winked. "Any leads on hangar space?"

"Nothing," he said with a shake of his head.

"We put ourselves on the waiting list for those tee hangars down on the south end," Jessie added. "It'll be a while til we get in, though."

"Well, you can always bring the plane into the hangar to load it, guys," she told them. "That's why you're keeping the remote for the hangar doors.

We don't mind that at all. That way only Kit has to get wet untying the plane and getting it in so you and the baby can board it under cover," she said with a grin at Jessie.

"That sounds good to me," Jessie laughed, winking at Kit.

"Mean kitty," he teased.

"You want to taxi it out, or want us to hitch it to the crawler?" Alice asked.

The crawler was how they got the jets in and out of the hangar. It was a low-slung motorized towing unit about the size of an exercise treadmill that hitched to the front wheel of an airplane and then pulled it, guided by a controller using a remote steering device. It moved at a slow walk, which was why they nicknamed it crawler, but it could tow just about any small jet. Despite being very small, the thing had a lot of towing power, and was more than capable of towing about anything up to a Cessna CJ3 or a Lear 450.

"I'm going to taxi it out," Kit answered.

They took care of that quickly. Kit didn't bother with preflight, since the plane wasn't going very far, so he just went through cold start, started it up, and Tommy guided him out with paw signals as Jessie picked up their wheel chocks and followed him out. The tie down they gave him was at the corner of the hangar, the first available tie down, which would make it very easy for him to taxi the plane into the hangar when he needed to do so. It was also close enough for the auxiliary AV gas hose to reach his plane without him having to move it. "Are you guys going to even bother with carrying AV gas now that you've gotten rid of the turboprop?" Kit asked as he and Jessie got help tying down the plane from Alice and Tommy, basically giving Jessie a refresher course on how to tie the plane down. From now on, it would be a necessity.

“Actually, no,” she answered. “What we have left is basically yours,” she chuckled. “There’s about enough left in the tank to fill your plane up twice. We’ve put in a work order to have a contractor come convert the AV gas tank to jet fuel. Until they get here, feel free to use what gas we have left.”

“Hmm, I think we could do that,” Kit chuckled. “We’re planning on taking a trip tonight.”

“Not a trip insomuch as a joyride,” Jessie corrected. “I’m taking the girls flying to celebrate Sheila and Ally getting their pilot’s licenses. They’re taking their check rides as we speak.”

“Really? Well, tell them congratulations from me.”

“We will,” Jessie nodded. “This’ll be my last hurrah too,” she laughed. “After today, I’m grounded until I have the baby.”

“There’s nothing stopping you from flying while pregnant, Jessie,” Alice protested. “I think the FAA doesn’t ground a pregnant femme until she’s two weeks from her due date, but I’m not sure.”

“I’m getting to where I don’t feel comfortable in the seat while flying,” she explained, patting her rounded belly. “I’ll be a passenger after today until Laura’s born.”

“Ah, well, in that case, I understand completely,” Alice smiled.

They returned to the flight line close to AAIA and waited. Both of them were still out, and would probably be out for about another half an hour, so Kit tuned a portable scanner to the local tower frequency so they could listen to the girls calling in, and Jessie and Sam discussed her baby shower. They'd set the shower for August 23rd, which was fairly early to have a baby shower given Jessie wasn't due til September 30th, but Jessie wanted it done before Vil got married. Vil intended to attend her baby shower, and that meant that Jessie had to have it before Vil went on her honeymoon. August 23rd was about the only day that Vil could spare to come down for the shower.

Jessie and Sam fell silent when Sheila's voice came over the scanner, as she requested permission to land. They heard the controller grant her permission, then they watched the runway. Sheila's trainer appeared from behind a hangar as it slowed on the runway, coming to a stop at or near some spot the examiner chose for her runway positioning test; a pilot had to bring the plane to a stop within 200 feet of a determined point to pass a check ride, and within 100 feet of it for a commercial rating. Sheila stopped the plane, sat there for just a second, then started moving again, turning off the runway at a taxi ramp and entering the flight line, taxiing towards AAIA's hangar.

"If the examiner aimed her at the taxi ramp, she passed," Kit noted.

"Huh?" Sam asked.

Kit explained the landing test, then pointed. "She's pulling in. I think we can go over now," he said.

As they approached, Sheila's actions told them everything they needed to know. The examiner, a short femme raccoon wearing a white blouse and a pair of black slacks, got out of the plane and came around as she chocked the wheels, then after she said something to her, Sheila gave out a squeal of delight, jumped up and down, then hugged the startled raccoon. She let go and ran towards them. “I passed!” she screamed ecstatically, and then literally jumped into Kit’s arms, giving him a fierce hug. She hugged Jessie, then Sam, then she ran over and hugged several AAIA teachers and the other students who had come out to see how she did. “I’m a pilot now, cousin!” she beamed, accepting a form from the examiner after she called Sheila back over. “I’m going to go get my temporary license from the FAA office right now!”

“Let’s wait for Ally,” Jessie urged. “Then you can go together.”

“She’s still out?”

Jessie nodded. “She left about five minutes after you.”

They didn’t have to wait long. Allison’s confident voice came over the scanner in Kit’s paw, and then they all looked to the runway. Allison’s trainer landed near the end of the runway and rolled to a slow and smooth stop right at the turn-off to AAIA’s section of the tarmac, then moved forward and turned towards them. Allison taxied the plane to a park beside Sheila’s trainer, then she turned off the engine and performed postflight actions inside as the ferret seemed to be talking to her. They got out of the plane, and Allison immediately rushed over to them. “I passed!” she declared with a smile, hugging Jessie fondly. “And tomorrow I start the IFR training course!”

“So do I!” Sheila added. “She talked me into it!”

“Congratulations, Ally!” Jessie beamed.

“Thanks guys, for all your help!” she said as she hugged Kit.

“No problem, Ally, no problem,” Kit told her. “Now, you and Sheila need to go get your temporary licenses from the office, and I’m sure AAIA has other things for you to do,” he added when Allison hugged Sam.

“And when you’re done, we’re going on a victory flight in our plane,” Jessie told them.

“Ooooooh, can I fly it?” Sheila asked, which made Kit laugh.

“Not til you’re thoroughly trained on a four hundred, cousin. I told you, my plane is a lot more complicated than the trainers you’ve flown. There will be no flying our plane til we know you won’t crash it.”

“What? Don’t you trust me, cousin?” she gasped.

“You? Hell no,” he answered immediately, which earned him a slap from her.

“Girls! We have paperwork to do!” the ferret called to them. “And there are other students waiting for their turn!”

“Go, go, go,” Jessie shooed them. “And call me when you’re done, so we can go flying!”

“I’m going to head on into work, love,” Kit told them. “Got your keys with you?”

“Mmm-hmm,” she nodded. “Can you lock up my van on your way out? I don’t think I locked my door.”

“Sure thing, pretty kitty. See you tonight, have fun, and remember what Nick said.”

“I know, no extended stays anywhere. If we land, just get gas and go.”

“That’s my girl,” he smiled, then he kissed Sam on the cheek. “Have fun, Sammy.”

“This should be fun, especially when I make those two sit in the back seat,” she winked.

Kit laughed. “Let the front seat war begin,” he told them as he headed for his truck.

He was happy for them. Sheila had been bitten by the flying bug just like Jessie had, but Allison was very, very serious about getting her IFR, already with an appointment with Kit tomorrow evening to go over things and go for a flight in his plane so he could show her IFR in action. Kit wouldn’t be formally teaching Allison, AAIA was going to do that, but Kit could teach her if she wanted to spend the time. Kit couldn’t get her her IFR as fast as AAIA could through their training program, and she was willing to pay the $4,500 to take their dedicated IFR course, which covered everything, to get her IFR as fast as possible. Sheila didn’t mind blowing $4,500 on something she liked to do, so they’d both enrolled in the IFR training program. In about three weeks, right before the wedding, they’d be getting their IFR ratings. And they’d work for them. There were a lot of requirements for an IFR, and they’d be in a very demanding program to get it, one requiring a lot of work and was scheduled for their check ride the Friday before Sheila’s first semester at U.T.; the next semester started August 18th, and the program scheduled the last possible day to take the check ride the Friday before, on the 15th. AAIA set it up that way on purpose so their IFR program didn’t overlap U.T. They had to do the logged hours, the ground training, and the studying to learn the procedures and rules of IFR. They’d be looking at 8-10 hour days in school, most of it spent in the cockpit getting the logged hours done, flights at all kinds of times, including the required night flying, and a lot of studying. The only real advantage they had was that since they were trained at AAIA and it was on Bergstrom, they already had experience dealing with air traffic control, and they also had Kit and Jessie to privately tutor them.

Kit got to work around 11:00, but nobody said anything. Nobody ever really did, since Kit got all his work done even if he left early or came in late, often working from home. They all knew that he had to go move his plane today anyway, so it wasn't like he didn't have a good reason to be late. What was out of the ordinary, though, was the three furs waiting for him in his office. All three were foxes, two males and a femme, wearing dark suits and a dark skirt with a blazer respectively. "Mister Vulpan," the taller of the two males said as he stood up, offering his paw. "Arthur Bridgestone. I'm from the legal office attached to Vulpan Shipyards. My associates, Leah Manchester and Richard Cooper." Both of the younger foxes nodded to him upon hearing their names.

"What's a company lawyer doing down here?"

"I was instructed to have you call Miss Vulpan upon our arrival, Mister Vulpan. She'll explain it."

"Uhh, sure," he said, sitting down and picking up the phone on his desk and speed-dialing Vil. She picked up.

"Hey bro, are they there?" she asked immediately.

"Uh, yeah, but what's going on?"

"First things first. Is Jessie there?"

"No, she's down at the airport."

“Call her and have her get there as fast as she can,” she commanded.

“Why?”

“I’ll explain when she gets there, so I only have to do it once. Call me back when Jessie’s there.”

Kit hung up and dialed Jessie’s cell phone. “Any idea what the hell this is about?” he asked the lawyers.

“We’ll abide by Miss Vulpan’s wish, Mister Vulpan, and allow her to explain it.”

“Alright, but all this secrecy is a touch ridiculous. Pretty kitty,” he called when she answered the phone. “I need you to come to the office, right now.”

“What’s wrong, handsome fox?”

“I...honestly have no idea. Vil wants you here, she has something she wants to talk to us about.”

“Oh, okay. I can be there in about twenty minutes.”

“Alright. See you then.”

“Do you have a coffee maker in the office, Mister Vulpan?”
Bridgestone asked amiably.

“Sure, in the break room. It’s across the main room, you can’t miss it. It has no door.”

The three lawyers left his office and went over to the break room to get coffee. While they chatted with the gang, who was curious as to what was going on, Kit could only guess at what was going on. Was this part of the war? If it was lawyers, then it meant something pretty serious. But he had no idea. He could only wait and find out.

Jessie got there about a half hour after he called her. “Sorry, love, I caught every red light all the way here,” she fretted when she came into his office. The three lawyers quickly joined them, and Kit picked up the phone again and redialed Vil as Jessie sat at the extra chair Kit kept near his desk just for her, so he and Jessie could look at his computer monitor while sitting down.

“Is Jessie there?” Vil asked without even a greeting.

“She just got here.”

“Good. Close the door and put me on speaker.”

“Could you close the door please?” Kit asked. One of the lawyers hurried to do so, and Kit turned on the speaker and hung up the receiver. “Alright, Vil, what’s going on?”

“We’re burying the uncles, effective today,” she said immediately and in a very brusque tone. Vil was in her business mode, and he knew that he’d get nothing but terse replies and exacting comments from her right now. “Bridgestone?” she called.

“Yes, Miss Vulpan?”

“Give them the contracts.”

Bridgestone opened his briefcase and withdrew two sheafs of papers and put them on the desk and pushed them towards them. Kit saw that they had their names on them, and Kit’s was nearly twice as thick as Jessie’s. “What are these, Vil?” Jessie asked.

“If you’ve ever trusted me before, bro, sis, trust me now. Sign them. Both of you have to sign Kit’s, but Jessie has to sign her own. Sign them immediately and in the presence of Bridgestone.”

“What’s in them?”

“I’ll explain later.”

“I don’t like where this is going, Vil,” Kit said suspiciously.

“It will take too long,” she told him. “I need those contracts back in this office by four, so you don’t have time. So sign them. I’ll explain after Bridgestone is on his way back here.”

Kit really did not like this. He trusted Vil...up to a point. Her willingness to meddle in his life was an established pattern, and now she shows up telling them to sign thick contracts when he had absolutely no idea what was in them, and being very pushy and intentionally evasive about what they were for. “Right here, Misses Vulpan,” Bridgestone said, flipping papers to the very end, where there were five pairs of signature lines separated by short paragraphs. “Sign here and here on Mister Vulpan’s contract.”

“It’s Vil, handsome fox. If she does something naughty, she knows we’ll spank her,” Jessie told him with a slight smile, taking the pen that Bridgestone offered, and she began signing. Kit grunted and sighed, then he took a pen from his desk and pulled the contract over in front of him.

“Where do I sign?” he sighed

“Hold a second, Mister Vulpan,” he said, opening Kit’s pages to about the middle, where there were two sets of signature lines separated by a large paragraph. “Sign here, and here. And on the back page, sign here and here.”

“Can you tell me what the hell we’re signing while we’re signing?” Kit asked in irritation, but he did start signing his name.

“Are they signing, Bridgestone?”

“Yes, Miss Vulpan,” he answered. “I witnessed Misses Vulpan sign her sections of Mister Vulpan’s contract and is now currently signing her own contract, and am currently witnessing Mister Vulpan signing, as are our two notary witnesses.”

“Good. Make sure they do it exactly right, and make sure they don’t scrawl. We don’t have a second chance.”

“Yes, Miss Vulpan.”

Kit and Jessie dutifully made all their signatures, and then Bridgestone took the sheafs from them. “Will the witnesses to the contracts please sign and affix their seals?” the lawyer prompted. The male and female took the contracts, signed them twice on the back page, then they used notary crimping stamps to stamp their signatures, notarizing their validity. “The contracts have been legally signed and notarized, Miss Vulpan.”

“Good. Return immediately.”

“We are on our way. Good day, Mister Vulpan, Misses Vulpan. Congratulations,” he said with a smile, nodding to them, and then the three foxes quickly hurried out. They almost ran.

“Vil, what the hell are you up to?” Kit demanded.

Vil laughed brightly. “Congratulations, bro. You’re a member of the board of directors of the company.”

“What?” Kit gasped.

“Just what I said,” she answered. “You are now a member of the board. That’s what the contract was, guys, that was the executive agreement contract with a few extra clauses for Jessie. Jessie is also an employee of the company. You are a member of the board, and Jessie is now your executive assistant, who has the right to vote for you by proxy should you send her to the board in your place.”

“Vil!” Jessie gasped. “Why would we want to move to Boston?”

“You’re not moving to Boston,” she purred.

“How did you pull that off, sis?” Kit demanded. “If any Vulpan vetoes the election of a board member, it’s shot down! And it takes a three quarter vote to vote in a new board member! It’s in the company charter!”

“Usually yes, but this morning, Uncle Jake got into a car accident,” she said. “He should be checking out of the hospital any minute. That’s why this had to be done fast.”

“Is he alright?” Jessie asked in concern.

“He’s fine, actually,” she answered. “They put ten stitches in his leg and splinted his tail, but outside of that, nothing major. But, what’s more important is the hospitalization clause of his contract,” she said in a purring voice. “It clearly states in the contract that any board member hospitalized for any reason surrenders the right to vote at board meetings while hospitalized. When Jake was taken to the hospital this morning, I simply walked into the boardroom during a previously scheduled board meeting and nominated six new members of the board. All six were voted in unanimously. And you are one of them. Terry is the other one that you’d know. The other four are just company executives who are loyal to me.”

“I don’t understand,” Jessie said in confusion.

“Vil cheated. Outrageously,” Kit said, nodding as he understood what Vil had done, and more importantly, what it meant. “Vil used a loophole in the way the company runs to basically sneak her nominated executives through a vote, and there’s nothing our uncles can do about it. Uncle Zach is suspended, and Uncle Jake was in the hospital, which removed his ability to vote. Since neither of them could vote, there was no Vulpan on the board to veto our nominations. The other board members are too terrified of Vil to vote against her, so they voted for who she told them to vote for.”

“That about sums it up,” Vil said smugly.

“Why Kit and Terry?” Jessie asked curiously.

“Simple, pretty kitty,” Kit said, looking at her. “Vil is absolutely untouchable now.”

“That’s right,” Vil laughed victoriously.

“The only way the uncles could get Vil out of her chair was with a unanimous vote of the board to fire her,” Kit explained. “Well, think about it, pretty kitty. Will you vote to remove Vil from her chair if I send you to vote for me?”

“No!”

“Exactly,” he said simply. “You and me and Terry are absolutely unbribeable. There is no way our uncles can convince us to vote with them against Vil, not unless Vil deserves to be fired. And so long as just one of us refuses to vote Vil out, she can’t be removed as CEO. Vil has a problem with two Vulpans on the board working against her, so she put two more Vulpans on the board that will support her. Vil, this has to be the most sneaky, cunning, underpawed, and brilliant thing you've ever done," Kit told her with strange pride in his voice. "I thought your engagement to Kendall was brilliant. This puts that to shame." He blinked. "Vil. Did you arrange Jake's accident?"

"Ask me no questions, and I will tell you no lies, brother," she said cheekily.

"Vil!" Jessie gasped in shock.

"I was joking, Jessie, seriously! Jake's Cadillac was hit by a school bus. A school bus, guys! Go look at it on the news! Do you think I'd arrange for a bus full of kids going to summer school to hit Uncle Jake's car? Get a grip!"

"Oh. Well, in that case, I guess I'll believe you, Vil," Jessie said. "Are the kids okay?"

"Nobody was hurt but Jake and his driver," she answered. "Jake got a lacerated leg and a broken tail because he wasn't wearing a seat belt, he slammed into the wet bar in the back of his car and cut himself. His driver suffered a mild concussion and a broken finger, and that's all." She laughed, then sighed and blew out his breath. "Of course, this is where it gets touchy," she admitted. "They'll never get me out of the chair now, and they know it, not when I have two absolutely unbribeable Vulpans on the board backing me up, and one of them with proxy powers for his wife. So, Zach has to either accede that fact and try to take control of the family in other respects, or he does something desperate to try to force me out. When he finds out about it, we'll see what he decides to do."

"Well, sis, congratulations. You win," Kit noted.

She laughed. “Not yet. I just scored a huge victory on the battlefield, but the war is still being fought,” she said. “So, you two gonna attend our next board meeting tomorrow?” she asked winsomely.

“You’re serious? I thought Kit was just a board member on paper,” Jessie protested.

“Oh, no, Jessie, not at all!” Vil said brightly. “He is a member of the board, and you are his executive assistant, a company executive yourself! You’re employees now, just like me and Terry. I’ll have to make some IDs for you two. You even get keys to the executive bathroom here at the main shipyard,” she said with a giggle. “I guess I can give you Lewis’s office, bro, and Terry can have Simpson’s. They’re fairly nice. Both of them overlook the back bay.”

“Vil, be serious,” Kit snorted. “I’ll just be a phantom. We’re not really employees, we’re just a clever trick you set up to keep them from threatening your chair.”

“Be that as it may, you’re still a member of the board. If you don’t want to vote, you can always allow Jessie, or me, to vote for you by proxy.”

“Which you want, naturally.”

“Naturally,” she laughed. “There’s absolutely no way the elders can vote me out, not when I can cast a no vote by proxy. And since I’m casting the vote by proxy, I can even get around the stricture preventing me from voting in a matter of my own termination,” she said smugly. “I’m not voting myself, I’m just casting a vote on behalf of someone else.”

“You realize, sis, that Zach will go absolutely ballistic when he finds out you gave Jessie the power to vote on the board by proxy, and you put the two Vulpans he hates the most on the board of the company. I mean ballistic. He may have a stroke on the spot.”

“Yes, I know,” she said seriously. “I want him too angry to think straight, bro. Sure, it makes him more dangerous, but it also makes him more prone to making a critical mistake that can allow me to can him.”

“Why can’t you just fire him since nobody will vote against you?” Jessie asked.

“Because I can’t fire a Vulpan off the board for no reason,” she answered. “I have to show cause. When I tried to fire Zach once before, I had cause, and the board didn’t vote to fire him. And the board has what you might call double jeopardy rules for Vulpans, sis-in-law,” she explained. “I can’t call him up for another vote to fire him using the same evidence. That’s also why I can’t fire Jake since there’s no Vulpan on the board to oppose me. I have to prove that I have a reason to fire him, because he’s a Vulpan, where I could call a vote to fire any other member of the board for any reason, even if I just don’t like them. Getting a Vulpan off the board is very, very hard. The same rules that keep them from getting rid of me also more or less protect them.”

“Sis. You said I’m a member of the board.”

“That’s right, bro. Fully and completely,” she said pointedly. “Your salary was in your contract.”

“Vil!” he barked angrily.

She laughed. “Your salary is one dollar. Read the contract when I send you a PDF of it,” she soothed. “You earn one dollar a year. You do, however, get a twenty thousand dollar bonus for employment because I know you drained your bank account investing in the magazine and buying Jessie her birthday presents and paying out expenses with the move. You're eligible for bonuses like any other board member, and you get the typical shares of Vulpan stock that comes with the chair, which you have to surrender when you quit. So, put your outrage back in your pants, bro, I didn't throw money at you through the back door. You'll earn about quadruple the norm at the next dividend check because you control much more stock now, but I can't do anything about that and you know it. You know as well as I do, those stocks come with the chair. That is established policy. If I put you on the board without awarding you the stocks, the uncles would claim you have no authority to vote. Aside from those future dividends, you're still disgustingly poor."

"I'm glad you thought about that," Kit said.

"I almost put you in at a million a year, but I figured that might tempt you to vote to fire me," she said honestly. "But Jessie is another matter," she purred. "I gave her a low salary for an executive assistant, but still a good salary. A hundred grand a year. I know better than to give you money, bro, but I also know you won't say a word when I give to Jessie," she said smugly.

"We can invest more in the magazine, Kit," Jessie said, a little soothingly. "And put more money back for our children. And she's right, we can take the money and put it back in our investment portfolio, we've taken out so much to put into the magazine. And maybe buy a few more things for the house. And maybe help Ally buy a plane so she can go see Terry."

"I guess, but I'm not happy about that, sis."

“Bro, you deserve something for your help, and I do not want you to even have to think about money with Laura coming,” she said seriously. “My niece is not going to be poor! You think I like the idea of you being in danger because of me? Hell no! That’s why Nick is down there. As far as I’m concerned, what I’m paying Jessie is danger pay for me embroiling you in this. And you’re not getting even a fraction of what you’re due. Between your dividends and Jessie’s salary, that’s enough steady income for me to feel completely secure that Laura will have everything she needs.”

“It’s far more than what I want.”

“Well, we’ll just have to compromise between nothing and millions, then,” she said cheekily. “So, anyway, I’m going to have to go. Jake should be getting here, and boy, do I have something to tell him,” she said with an amused chuckle.

“Okay, I guess I can go back to the airport. Sam’s still down there waiting for me to come back,” she laughed. “Bye Vil, love ya!”

“Love you too, sis-in-law, and congrats on your new job!”

“Job, yeah, right!” Jessie giggled, then she kissed Kit on the muzzle and hurried out. Kit picked up the phone to take it off speaker as she left.

“Sis,” he said as she closed the door. “Perhaps you can explain how you had two thick contracts all ready to go when Jake had his accident.”

“My, isn’t it just amazing how I just happened to have those contracts at paw in the brief window where Jake was in the hospital and unable to vote, which happened so fast he was unable to arrange a proxy to vote for him?” she asked knowingly. “What an amazing coincidence.”

“You’re upping the ante, sis.”

“It’s Jake’s fault for not having a proxy agreement on file that would have let his assistant vote in his place. They can’t whine when I beat them at their own game.” She chuckled ominously. “We’ll see if Zach has a stroke when he finds out that Jessie can vote by proxy.”

“That was a very bad idea, sis. I can appreciate why you did it because Jessie won’t turn on you, but you just pressed the one button you had no business pressing. You know how rabid a purist he is, and now you just gave my pregnant mixed breed wife the power to vote on the board of the company. And on top of that, you just put the two Vulpans that he sees as destroying the family on the board. That’s the worst thing you could have possibly done. Zach would probably try to kill her right there in the boardroom if she showed up to vote in my place.”

“From my view, it was the best thing I could have done,” she hummed in reply. “An angry opponent is easier to beat. He’s much more prone to making a critical mistake if he can’t think straight.”

“He has Maxine to hold him in check,” Kit reminded her. “She doesn’t get angry like that.”

“We’ll see. So, brother,” she said with a chuckle. “Welcome to the family business. All that running, and look where you ended up.”

“And I will get you for this, Vil,” he answered seriously.

“Just don’t try to vote me off, and you can punish me all you want,” she chuckled. “I take it you’ll give me proxy power?”

“Of course. You know I’m not about to set foot in Boston.”

“I’ll email you the form. Print it, sign it, fax it to me.”

“Fine. Do you think Terry will take the board position?”

“We already talked about that. He’ll stay in New Orleans to finish the Avondale work, and then decide from there. It’ll depend on how much heat he’ll take from the family over Allison. If they won’t give up on it, he’ll stay in New Orleans and run Avondale, but hold his seat on the board and vote by proxy and attend routine meetings via videoconference. He’s on the board now, bro, you know what it takes to get him off. He’s basically set for life in that regard. But for now, he’s given me proxy until we set up a system that lets him attend board meetings by videoconference. I already have our IT guys on the job.” She giggled. “Terry also brought up the ultimate weapon to use against the uncles, should it look like they’re about to do something really, really stupid.”

“What?”

“If it looks like they’re about to get out of control, Terry will threaten to sue you.”

Kit drew a breath, choked on it, then exploded into laughter. “Dear God, sis, that is brilliant!”

“Yes, I’m quite proud to call Terry my cousin,” she agreed. “Terry could challenge the agreement in court, which would invalidate the entire thing. Yes, that strips him of his fortune, but it also strips the rest of the family, and leaves it up to you how to redistribute the family assets...which would allow you to cut off the family members that have been mean to you,” she giggled girlishly. “I couldn’t do that because I’m blood related to you, but Terry could. I’ll be honest that I never considered that possibility, because I can’t do it. The agreement specifically states that I can’t challenge the agreement in any manner, just as you can’t. Terry would take a big risk that you'd backstab him when he killed the agreement, but it would be a threat so dire that it very well might make the uncles back off."

"I should say so!"

"We decided that using that will be the last resort," she told him seriously. "To make a threat like that might tear the family apart, disintegrate the whole family and turn this into an open civil war, because it brings everyone into it. And whoever did sue you would be an absolute pariah in the family forever afterward. They'd never be forgiven for disrupting things and stripping them of their fortunes."

"You're right. If Terry ever did that, it would be over for him. And it would be the absolute last resort." Kit sighed, then laughed ruefully. "Sis, you'd better live in a bunker for the next month," he warned.

"Yes, I'm expecting it," she agreed. "All week I've been running around putting out the fires they set, answering their lawsuits, countering their gossip and rumors, chasing them away from Austin, and tightening my grip on New Orleans to protect Terry, and have done nothing in reply except get engaged to Ken. They knew I'd eventually retaliate much more directly, and I think they won't really like the way I've done it," she laughed. "In a month, I'll be married to a Brighton, and my brother and a Vulpan who owes me way too much to go against me is on the board. Zach has no chance of taking the company from me now unless he does something drastic."

"And that's exactly why you need to be very, very careful. I would not put it past Zach to try something drastic."

"I know, bro, I know. I won't be leaving Hart's Crossing except to go to work, and effective today, I'm commuting via helicopter. Stav and Marcus don't even want me riding to work in my car. They don't want me having an accident," she chuckled. "Anyway, I need to go, bro. I do have some work to do, and Jake will be here soon. When he gets here, I'm going to tell him all about the six new members of the board and watch his tongue flop out of his mouth," she laughed. "I'll call you tonight, bro, and tell you what happens."

"Alright. Despite being mad at you at the moment, I love you, Vil."

"I love you too, Kit. Bye now."

"Bye sis."

Kit hung up the phone, both mightily impressed and a little angry with Vil. He could see the utter brilliance in her move. By putting Kit and Terry on the board, she ensured that it would take something very, very big to get her out of the chair. Zach couldn't bribe Kit or Terry; in fact, both of them hated Zach as much as Zach hated them. Kit's hatred of his elder was the same hatred he held for all his elders, while Terry had a very personal and very viable reason to hate his uncle, the fox that tried to get his girlfriend arrested and had gotten him arrested after pushing him down in his office. Vil had stacked the board not just with furs loyal to her, but with two furs that the elders could not buy off. Just as Vil had wrapped herself in the protection of the Brighton family when she engaged Kendall, she solidified her hold on the company by loading the board with two allies that would fight Zach and Jake to the bitter end. He could admire her cunning and intelligence, but he was a bit miffed that she had included Jessie in her little games. She'd employed Jessie as well, made her an executive in the company, and gave her a huge salary that rang Kit's bell just a little bit. She certainly knew better than to try to give Kit that money, but she also knew that Kit would not say a word if she gave that money to Jessie. What Vil and Jessie did was their business, and he would never give a single word against what Jessie wanted. She had proclaimed that she was alright with the salary, and that was that. But he was still a bit angry with Vil for sneaking it around him, for pressuring them into signing those contracts without letting them read them first. She may have only given him a dollar's salary, but she could have easily given him a million dollar salary, and given Jessie a similar salary. Instead, however, she went on the side of caution, giving Kit basically no salary and giving Jessie probably one of the lowest of the upper executive salaries, so at least nobody in the company could accuse her of loading up the payroll.

Of course, Kit having no salary also made a statement. It said that he wasn't there for money, that he was there more or less to back up Vil.

He was taking sides.

He may take some heat for that, but he honestly didn't care. Zach had tried to get Allison arrested, tried to frame Terry, and was harassing his sister. Damn right he was taking sides.

Terry's idea of the last resort was also clever, but it was very, very dangerous. If Terry made that kind of threat, then the entire family would explode, which would make it almost impossible for anyone to maintain any kind of control, even Vil or Uncle Zach. The family would shatter into bickering factions, and it would be the social death of whoever made the threat. Such a dangerous weapon was like a nuclear bomb...it would only be there as the deterrent of last resort to prevent the uncles from doing something inexcusable, stopping something outrageous with something equally outrageous. Vil was too right in deciding that Terry's idea would be the last thing they'd try, since it had such an awful risk of backfiring and destroying the entire family.

His involvement certainly didn't escape attention, either. After lunch, he got another phone call from Boston, and this time it wasn't from Vil. "Kit Vulpan," he answered absently, pointing to a filename on the computer screen to Pat. "This one, Pat."

"Got it, boss," Pat nodded.

"Kitstrom Lucas," came a low, angry voice. It was Maxine.

Kit's tail nearly stuck straight out when he heard that voice. He shoed Pat out of the office quickly and switched the phone to the other ear, to his undamaged ear. "What do you want, Maxine?" he asked coldly.

"To find out what insanity possessed you!" she answered. "This is not your business, young male! You agreed to stay out of family affairs when you moved to Austin, and you are breaking your word!"

"No, Maxine, I'm not, because you broke your word to me first," he answered flatly. "Uncle Zach had no right to drag Stonebrook into this, and you have no right trying to change what everyone agreed to when we sent Cybil back to Britain! We all agreed to the way things were, and Vil being in the big chair was part of that agreement! You're trying to change the agreement, so damn right I'm going to say something about it! You want me to get out of family business? Stop fighting with Vil!"

"Do you think we relish this, Luke?" she asked tersely. "We do not, I assure you! I for one think that she's doing an excellent job as CEO, but your sister is allowing this family to crumble! She is allowing the children to run wild! What is the company and the money if we lose our pride and our reputation? We'll be a laughing stock in Boston! We'll be no better than new money," she said with an audible sneer in her voice. "We gave Vil a chance, but she has failed to uphold her duties as the family head, and so she must step aside!”

“What? No accusations that I’m destroying the family, Aunt Maxine?” he asked caustically.

“You may have been the first to rebel against the family, but you won’t be the last,” she answered, a bit ruefully. “The children are drunk with their trust funds and have let the money blind them to the proud traditions of the Vulpan family. It was a mistake to divide the money among all the Vulpan. It should have been left in the paws of the elders, for it’s becoming clear that the children were not ready for the responsibility of it.” She blew out her breath. “That is why we are fighting Vil, Luke. She won’t rein in the children. She’s allowing Terry to date that, that, that, whore. Allowing it!”

“First off, watch just what you’re calling Terry’s girlfriend, Maxine, because she is my friend. It’s not her fault that Terry came after her, she tried to warn him off several times, and so did I, but he was insistent. He eventually wore her down and charmed her enough to go out with him.”

“But that’s what she is, young male!”

“I can’t deny that,” he admitted. “Or more to the point, I can’t deny that’s what she was, Maxine. She was only in that line of work for the money, and she left it behind the instant she had enough money to be comfortable. Besides Terry, Vil knows what she’s doing. She’s giving the cousins a little leash now so she can get a tighter hold on them later. You’re right, Maxine, the cousins are going to rebel if you keep trying to treat them like little soldiers. They don’t need the elders anymore, and they know it. You’ve totally jumped the gun going after Vil, because she’s actually trying to do the same thing you are, just from a different angle.”

“No, Luke, we didn’t.”

“Don’t call me by his name,” Kit retorted, almost automatically.

“Well, it’s not easy,” she said. “You’ve been Luke to me all your life, young male, and I’m not trying to insult you using it. But aside that point, we’ve had quite a few talks with Vil, and she refuses to take any action against the children to rein them in. You we have let go, but this business with Terry, and Sheila wanting to be a cook, and Joy dropping out of college before she even begins, and her refusal to banish Bess from Boston and institutionalize Dahlia when that poor girl needs professional help, it’s unconscionable and totally against the traditions of the family! And what is worse, it’s spreading. Why, even Victor is defying me!” she said in an outraged voice. “He refuses to come home from New York!”

“He’s staying out of the line of fire, Maxine. Victor’s spoiled rotten, but he’s not crazy.”

“That’s my son you’re insulting, Luke!” she said with heat.

“Then you shouldn’t have raised him as a brat,” Kit shot back.

“Luke. Kit. I didn’t call you to trade insults. I called to try to make you see reason. Vil refuses to take control of this family before it flies apart, so we are forced to usurp her and do it ourselves. We thought you would be a fox of your word and stay out of this, but now we find out you’ve gone behind our backs and let Vil appoint you to the board!”

“I’ll be on that board as long as you try to overthrow Vil, and not a moment longer. The instant you leave it be, and I’m convinced you’re serious about it, I’ll resign. I’m there to remind you that we had a deal, and you're going back on your word. You just need to trust Vil, Maxine. I do. I know she knows what's best for the family, even if it doesn't look it."

"What you think is best for this family is obviously not what we think is best for this family," she said icily.

"You said it yourself, Maxine. The youngers are rebelling. They don't need the elders anymore, and that means that the vaunted traditions you're trying to uphold need to change with the times. This is the modern era, Maxine, not the Victorian age. I for one am shocked you're defending family traditions that stuck you with marrying that unmitigated ass of a husband of yours, denied you a position at the company, and let you watch your younger brothers take what was rightfully yours!"

She was silent perhaps half a second longer than she needed to be, telling Kit he hit a nerve. Maxine's disdain for her husband, Robert Graham, was almost legendary in the family, and it was worthy disdain. Robert Graham was an unmitigated ass, on top of being stupid, selfish, petty, and spoiled. If there was any Vulpan elder Kit felt had a right to cheat on his or her spouse, it was Maxine. If Kit had been forced to marry a female version of Robert, he'd have strangled her after a week. But Maxine was a devout Catholic, and she would never divorce him. Catholics did not divorce.

Which was truly a pity for her. Much as he hated her for what she did to him, Kit could admit that Maxine deserved better than that asshole.

"My personal desires have nothing to do with the needs of the family, young male," she finally said, rather tartly.

"Oh yes they do, Aunt Maxine," Kit answered. "Your personal desires are to keep the family in the past. We're not in feudal England anymore, we're in modern America. The family is a black and white picture in the era of Youtube. It has to change, or it's going to die."

"It needs to maintain its traditions or it won't have respect!"

"It's been forty-four years, I think you can take the steel rod out of your ass!"

"Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan, don't you dare talk like that!" she gasped.

Despite it all, Kit erupted into laughter. "I'm a big boy now, Maxine, I can talk however I please," he finally said. "But you get my point. The family can change and still be respected. The traditions you're trying to defend just have no place in the world anymore. The family needs new traditions that let us keep our respectability but also let us move into the future."

"That's a point we'll discuss later, young male," she told him tartly. "You have to convince Vil to either step aside and allow us to get this family back under control, or fulfill her responsibilities as the head of this family and do it herself."

"My, this must be the good cop version of it," Kit mused. "Because what you said to Vil last week was much less friendly. It went something along the lines of one of us will be six feet under before this is over."

"I said no such thing! Vil was overdramatizing things, as usual!"

"So, Boston is big enough for the both of you now?"

There was a short silence. "I was angry, Luke, don't you say things you don't mean when you're angry?"

“Ah, but now that you’re losing, you’re suddenly feeling much more accommodating,” he reasoned lightly. “You realized rather quickly that with me and Terry on the board, Zach and Jake can’t touch her, so now you’re trying to negotiate when that’s what you should have done in the first place. If you and Vil would have just sat down and talked it out rather than getting on your high horse and demanding she do as you say, we could have avoided all this stupidity. It’s not too late to do that, Maxine. Vil’s not unreasonable. I’m sure if you talked to her, you could work something out. She doesn’t like fighting with you any more than...well, I guess that would be a lie,” he chuckled. “She enjoyed bashing your heads in. Revenge for you treating her like a child and then trying to push her out of her rightful place. I’m sure after she gets over her period of insufferable smugness, she’ll listen.”

She sighed. “If only it could be that easy now,” she admitted. “But we can’t trust her to do what’s right. She has failed in her duties to the family, and she must step aside.”

“She won’t do that.”

“She must. A trained sea otter can run the company, Luke, it basically runs itself. But if she will not do what’s right for the family, she must surrender the chair.”

“To who? Zach? You’ll put us all back under the rule of a tyrant, Maxine?” Kit pressed. “I don’t relish the idea of putting someone in control of the family whose first action will be to banish me from the family again. Not that I really care about most of you, but I do rather love my sister, and I don’t want to have to go back to sneaking around in back alleys to talk to her.”

“Stop thinking about yourself, young male, and consider the needs of the family!”

“And who’s thinking about herself, Maxine?” he challenged. “Isn’t making the whole family miserable just so you keep your reputation being selfish? What is a reputation? Do you really care so much about what others think of you that you’re willing to live in misery and pretend that you’re happy? Doesn’t that defeat the purpose of having money, if you use it to make everyone think you’re happy when inside you’re screaming and screaming and screaming? I was there once, when that bastard father of mine tried to make me do what I didn’t want to do, and I said no. I don’t care what you think about me, or what others think about me, and guess what, Maxine? I’m happy. I’m broke but I’m happy, and you’re rich but you’re miserable, yet you pretend to be happy so you don’t sully the family name. And you of all Vulpans know what it’s like to scream inside, Maxine! Jesus Christ, why are you trying to do to your children what your parents did to you? Do you want Kate to marry a male like her father? Do you really want that?”

“This isn’t about me,” she flared, but without much conviction.

“It’s about reputation, isn’t it? Well answer me this, Maxine. How can a family with an impeccable reputation like the Grahams cause you to end up with that asshole you call a husband?”

There was a long silence on the other end.

“At least with Vil running the family, you could leave Robert and not be forced to go back to him the way my father did to you when you walked out on him when I was a kid,” he pressed his advantage. “You could throw him out and banish him to your house in Los Angeles and finally be free of that parasite. Because God knows, you deserve a little happiness!”

She hung up on him.

“Think I don’t know how to fight back, Auntie?” Kit said with a humorless chuckle as he hung up the phone.

But the phone call was enlightening. Maxine was very smart, very stable, and was actually probably the most dangerous of all the elders because she didn’t lose her temper. Years of dealing with that ass of a husband of hers had toughened her in ways her brothers didn’t have to endure. She was losing, so she tried calling Kit to state her case and try to get Kit to talk Vil down. She knew that was impossible, but what she was doing was a very coy way of offering a white flag. Maxine wanted to talk it over with Vil, but she was too proud to come out and say it, so she instead tried to be reasonable with Kit. And Kit was impressed. Not once did Maxine harp on him about his wife or the past, she tried to be very civil to him. She got a little short a couple of times, but that was an amazing exercise in self control.

Why she was defending family traditions that screwed up her life was beyond him.

Things were relatively quiet for a few days after Vil’s devastating counterattack against the elders. Kit knew from Maxine’s call that they had no real answer to it, and they had withdrawn somewhat to mull it over and consider their course of action...which would doubtless be dramatic and extreme. Vil had quite effectively boxed them into a corner, and left them with few options to pursue to try to force Vil out of the chair. About all they had left was blackmail and violence, and both of those would be virtually impossible to pull off. Vil couldn't be blackmailed for threat of her retaliating in kind, and she was now behind the safety of her manor walls, not even driving to work anymore, which made it extremely hard for anyone to reach her.

Kit spent that time actually using the CFI ratings he'd worked so hard to attain in Kansas, for he had two students. Sheila and Allison went out with him every afternoon, and he both helped them retain what they'd learned that day at AAIA and also taught them related material to what they were learning, using his personal plane as the schoolroom. AAIA's trainer planes also used Garmin glass cockpits, though his 400 had a little more functionality and was therefore more complex, but it was similar enough for them to be able to understand what he was teaching. Each day he would have them tell him what they'd learned that day, and he went over it again, then branched out, explaining related material. Then he would take them up and show them what they were learning in action. He would also teach them things AAIA hadn't started yet, such as the procedures for entering and running a holding pattern, and the basics of the ILS approach. He also allowed them to get used to his plane. After teaching them about IFR material, he taught them about the systems in his 400 they'd never encountered before, things like TCAS, the function of mode S transponders, the speed brakes, and the anti-icing systems in the 400, systems that one usually didn't find on a single prop private plane and why the 400 was considered the Rolls Royce of single props. Sheila learned quickly, but Allison learned like a femme possessed, spending almost all her time focusing on her flight training.

The two of them were also looking at planes. As Kit suggested, they were looking at both new and used, and also looking at both single engine and multi-engine. Kit had promised to train them for their multi ratings if they bought a twin prop. They had agreed to go in on a plane together, which was more or less a necessity for Allison, since she didn't have enough money to buy a good plane that would make the trip to New Orleans fast and comfortable. Trying a flight like that in a 172 would be a three hour slog in a cramped plane where a femme would have fun trying to use a urinal. If they spent just a little more money, they could get a faster plane with more room that would make the trip much more comfortable. They'd need a plane capable of at least 150 knots cruising speed, which cut out most cheaper small single engine planes. They'd need at least a Cessna 182, but a twin engine would be more comfortable and give them more space. In the downturning aircraft market, they could pick up a deal if they kept their eyes open and buy a very nice plane, like a used King Air, Piper Seneca, or Cessna 310.

Vil had carried through on their contracts. She'd direct deposited to their regular checking account Kit's $20,000 bonus and also Jessie's first weekly paycheck, which was $1,407.25 after taxes, her salary for being an "employee" of the shipyard. That $1,407.25 would be a weekly occurrence, deposited into their account every Thursday morning at midnight. Jessie was now making a heck of a lot more than him, her official salary for "having to put up with a male like you," as she had so teasingly put it when they got the money. Kit didn't like the idea of it too much, but it was Jessie's money, Jessie didn't seem to mind, and that was that. What Jessie wanted, Jessie got. But then again, she also didn't let it go to her head. She promptly arranged it with the bank that a thousand dollars of her weekly deposit would be placed in their money market account automatically. The money in their money market account was off limits to daily expenses, that was their investment money, so Jessie was making a clear statement that she considered that money to be their children's money rather than theirs.

Kit was honestly fearing next year's taxes. They were going to be in the "mugged in the alley" tax bracket.

"Oh, this one's nice," Sheila said from the back seat of the plane as Kit let Allison fly. Sheila had her laptop out and was using the internet connection in the plane to surf plane listings. "A Beech King Air for a quarter mil."

"How old is it?" Kit asked. "Ally, we're VFR. Why aren't you checking for traffic before making your turn?" he chided.

"Sorry," she laughed. "But I looked already!"

"You never already looked when it comes to VFR, silly femme," he teased. "I don't want some little Skyhawk to come along and cut me in half because the pilot's too busy gawking at a cloud. So check for traffic."

"Yes, Master," she giggled, looking upwind before making a planned turn.

"It's a 1983 King Air," she said.

"Too old," Kit said. "You want a C ninety minimum, so look for one built after 1997. The only old twin you should consider is a Piper Seneca, because they're very rugged and age well. Anything else you want as new as possible."

"I still think I should just buy a four hundred," Sheila protested.

“You can, but you’re looking at a half million, and the insurance will be very ouch,” he warned. “You could pick up a Skyline or Stationair much cheaper that’ll do the job, or find a good used twin that’ll give you plenty of room.”

“I’m not used to buying anything used,” she laughed.

“I’m just giving you advice, girls. What you decide to do is up to you. Okay, what’s the first step of making an ILS approach, Ally?”

Kit allowed Allison to land them at Bergstrom, which she did smoothly. She’d had a few days behind the controls of his plane, and after a day practicing touch and gos over at Lakeview, he felt comfortable allowing her to land. Kit turned his phone back on, and it rang almost immediately. “Yeah, hello?” he called as Allison unbuckled herself from the left seat.

“Kit!” Jessie said urgently. “Vil’s chopper crashed!”

“What?” he gasped.

“It crashed taking off from her work!” she said hurriedly. “She’s okay, but she broke her leg and they have her in the hospital right now. They showed it on the news, a camera caught it! Oh, Kit, it rose up and then the tail rotor stopped, and it spun in circles crashed back onto the landing pad!”

“Oh my God,” he said. “Is she okay?”

“Kit, she’s okay,” she said. “She broke her leg and the fur on her arm got singed off when the chopper caught fire, and Stav broke his arm, but nobody else got hurt. Stav and Marcus carried her out of the chopper.”

Kit swore sulfurously, fear going through him. They really did it! They tried to kill his sister, he’d bet money on it! There is no way that was an accident! Damn Maxine, calling him and trying to be reasonable, and then turning around and trying to kill Vil!

A fury unlike anything he'd ever felt raged through him. His eyes narrowed dangerously as Allison and Sheila looked at him. "Jess. Make up a suitcase for me and ship it next day air to Stonebrook," he said in a low, dangerous tone. "And for God's sake, stay safe. I want Nick in the house with you. Do you hear me?"

"I, I hear you, Kit," she said uncertainly. "You're going up there?"

"Yes, I'm going up there," he growled.

"Kit? What the hell is going on?" Sheila asked.

"Our elders tried to kill Vil," he said gratingly in reply, which made both Allison and Sheila gasp. "Her chopper crashed on takeoff and she broke her leg, and there's no way that was an accident. I want both of you in the complex," he told them. "I want you all together where Nick can watch over you. So go get what you need and go to the complex, Ally. I don't care if you stay with Sheila or Jess, but you're staying close to us."

"You're welcome with me, Ally," Sheila told her.

"Handsome fox, how are you getting up there?"

"I'm going to find a jet that'll take me right now," he said.

"Do you have your wallet with you?"

"Of course I do."

"Do you want anything specific shipped up?"

“My birth certificate,” he answered. “I’m going to need it. I...I may be up there a while, pretty kitty.”

“That’s fine, we’ll deal with it, love,” she assured him. “I’ll pack you an overnight and your laptop right now and have Lupe run it down to Avia. If he can catch you before you leave, you can take it with you. I’ll next-day you a box of clothes. I’ll send them to Clancy, okay?”

“Alright,” Kit said seriously. “I’m going to tie down the plane and send my keys home with Sheila, alright?”

“Alright. I’ll call Rick and tell him what happened.”

“Alright. I’ll call when I have more information, love. Try to get in touch with Vil and have her call me as soon as she can.”

“I will, I promise. Kit, please, be careful,” she said fearfully.

“I will,” he said.

Moving with dreadful urgency, Kit climbed out of the plane and was helped by Sheila and Allison in fearful silence as they tied it down. When he tugged on the securing lines and nodded, he dug his keys out of his pocket and gave them to Sheila. “Take my truck home and give my keys to Jess,” he told her. “Do not burn out my clutch,” he added, which made Allison giggle helplessly. He was a little startled when Sheila gave him a crushing embrace, digging her claws into his back.

“I hope she’s okay,” she said in his damaged ear. “Go up there and kick their asses, cousin!”

“I intend to,” he promised.

Allison gave him a hug as well, patting him on the back. “Keep us up to speed, Kit,” she said. “And we’ll keep ourselves safe for you.”

“Thanks, Ally,” he said, patting her on the back.

He waved to them as he backed up, then he turned and literally ran into Avia’s hangar. Mike, who was elbows deep into the engine housing of a CJ2, nodded to him as he rushed in. “Mike, is Alice still here?” he called.

“Afraid not, Kit, she went home two hours ago.”

“Damn,” he growled as he realized that both the CJ1 and the Lear 450 were not in the hangar, which meant that they were hired out. “Are the jets due back anytime soon?”

“What, what’s wrong?”

“I need to get to Boston, Mike, like yesterday. It’s an emergency!”

“Aww, damn, male, I’m sorry to hear that,” he said, taking his paw out of the housing and scratching his chin. “I’m afraid both jets are due back tomorrow,” he told him. “And this one’s in no shape to fly right now, I have it in about fifteen pieces.”

“Mike, can you run me up to that new place, AV?” he asked.

“Dude, I didn’t drive today, my wife is gonna pick me up. Sorry.”

“I heard that!” Sheila said as she came in behind him. “We’ll drive you up there. Ally, call Jessie and tell her to tell Lupe to take Kit’s overnight up there instead.”

“On it,” she nodded, taking her phone out of her purse as she came into the hangar behind him.

AV Charters was in a relatively small hangar, but it was newly remodeled, the exterior of their hangar painted red and with flowing white script. The doors were open, and there was a rather cute femme badger sitting behind the reception desk, wearing a red polo shirt with AV embroidered on the left breast. “May I help you sir?” she asked in a pleasant voice.

“Yes, I need to charter a jet to Boston. Right now.”

“Uh, now? Well, let me call the manager so you can discuss it.” She picked up the phone and dialed a number. “Yes sir, I have a gentlemale here who wishes to charter an immediate flight to Boston,” she said in the phone. “Your name, sir?”

“Kit Vulpan,” he said.

Her eyes widened slightly, and her voice quavered just a bit. “Uh, Kit Vulpan, sir,” she said in the phone. “Yes sir,” she said, putting the phone down. “He’ll be out in just a second.” She looked closely at him, at his eyes, and Kit had to chuckle despite everything.

“Yes, I’m one of those Vulpans,” he told her.

“I’m so sorry to stare,” she said, her cheeks ruffling slightly.

“Happens all the time,” he assured her, crossing his arms.

The manager was a gray fox who was slender and a little short, his fur a smoky color and his eyes a piercing green. “Lou Billings, Mister Vulpan,” he said as he offered his paw. Kit noticed that his fingers were all tipped with large curved claws, like a cat’s claws, and they looked sharp. Kit shook it firmly. “You need to charter a flight to Boston?”

“Yes, and I need it right now. It’s an emergency.”

“I only have one jet in, sir, and it’s not exactly conducive to a long flight. It’s a Cessna Citation CJ one. I could charter it for you, but it won’t make the flight in one leg.”

“I’m a pilot, sir, so I know all about that,” Kit told him. “I’ll take it. It’ll still get me up there faster than anything else.”

“I, uh, don’t have pilots here at the moment, sir. I’ll have to call them in.”

“They’d better get here fast,” he said.

“Sandy, call Tom and Jack in please,” he said to the badger, “while I take Mister Vulpan here back to my office and we arrange the charter.”

“Oh, a chihuahua is going to bring me an overnight bag here,” he told the receptionist. “He should be here any minute.”

“I’ll take it for you, sir, and let you know when it gets here.”

“Thanks,” he said as the gray fox led Kit back into the hangar.

In the office, Kit wasted no time accepting the terms of the charter. It was $2,000 an hour, which included fuel and refreshments, and Kit would leave immediately upon the arrival of the pilots. Kit signed the charter agreement, then sat through a safety briefing which was required by the Transportation Security Administration. The badger opened the door and came in, offering Kit his black canvas overnight bag. “Your bag, sir,” she said, and he took it with a nod. “Tom should be here in about ten minutes, and Jack twenty. They’re preparing the jet for departure now. Is there anything specific you’d like stocked in the refreshment center, sir?”

“I don’t really care,” he answered.

They took him to a very nicely appointed waiting room complete with a TV and a coffee maker, which included a hot water tap and teabags. Kit made himself a cup of tea while he waited, and his phone rang just as he finished getting his tea to his liking. He saw it was Vil on his phone, and he almost dropped the teacup opening his phone to answer it. “Vil! Vil?”

“Hey bro,” she said in a very weak voice.

“Thank God!” he cried. “Are you alright?”

“I feel nauseous and dizzy,” she answered. “I just got out of surgery not long ago. They had to put the bone back in my leg,” she explained. “Outside of a broken right leg, a singed left arm and one hell of a headache, I’m alright.”

“What happened?”

“My chopper crashed trying to take off,” she told him. “It happened so fast, bro. We’d just lifted up off the ground and then suddenly I hear this bang, and then I was flying all over the place. I felt like a rag doll in a dryer. Next thing I know, Stav is pushing me into Marcus’ arms out of the chopper and the sleeve of my blazer is on fire. Stav broke his arm and the pilot has a concussion, but thankfully there’s no permanent damage.”

“Sis, I’m on my way up,” he told her. “I’m waiting for the pilots of my charter to get here and I’ll be on my way up.”

“I’ll be happy to see you, bro. They have me at General.”

There was a pause, and then the deep voice of Marcus was on the phone. “I’m afraid Miss Vil needs to rest, Mister Vulpan,” he said. “It’s not easy to focus after surgery. I'll let her call you back after she takes a nap and shakes off the anesthetic."

"Alright. How is Stav?"

"Broken forearm, but otherwise just fine. Thanks for asking. Are you coming up?"

"I am," he said grimly.

"Call back on Vil's phone when you're an hour from landing. I'll have a car and a guard waiting for you."

"Alright. Keep her safe for me, Marcus."

"That is a promise, Kit," he answered earnestly.

He waited about ten more minutes before they came and got him. They brought him out into the main hangar, which was larger than he expected, and was also empty. The jet was sitting out on the tarmac just outside the doors, the hatch open and a tall lynx in a similar red polo conducting a walk-around of the jet. The lynx stepped up and offered his paw to Kit. "Tom Rivers, Mister Vulpan, I'll be your pilot for this flight. We'll be leaving as soon as my co-pilot arrives. The flight plan is filed, and if you'd board, I'll get us ready to taxi out as soon as Jack arrives."

"Thanks for being quick," he said honestly.

"I heard about the crash, it was on the news. Is your sister alright?"

"I just talked to her. She's going to be okay, but I still want to be up there as fast as possible."

"We'll get you there as fast as we can, that's a promise."

“I appreciate that. Where did you decide to stop for fuel?”

“Lexington. They have a very fast turnaround fueling system there.”

“I’ve stopped there myself,” Kit agreed. “We landed, fueled, and took off in a half hour.”

“That’s exactly why we’re stopping there,” the lynx nodded, motioning with his paw for Kit to mount the steps and board the jet. “Luckily, since we’re only carrying you and no baggage, we’ll be taking off with max fuel. That’ll let us get there with only one stop for fuel.”

“Do you have a wireless router on this plane?”

“Just installed yesterday,” he chuckled. “I’ll let you know when it’s on.”

“Thanks.”

The interior of the jet was what he expected. The club configuration was the most popular seating arrangement because it allowed the most seats and still gave the passengers the most room, and this jet used it. There were two seats facing backwards just behind the entry hatch and two seats facing forward at the back of the cabin, with the lavatory’s door behind and between them. The interior of the cabin was in fake wood with red trim and indirect LED tract lighting, the seats were light tan leather just like the seats in his 400, and the refreshment center was across from the entry hatch. Kit saw that they had a coffee dispenser in the refreshment center. “Is there coffee or tea in that?” he asked.

“It’s empty. Shall I make tea for it while we’re waiting for Jack?”

“I’ll do it, I’m not afraid to work,” he said curtly. “Just get us ready so we can literally taxi out when your copilot arrives.”

“I can do that,” he chuckled.

They did exactly as they promised. Kit made tea and poured himself a cup, and the captain finished all the preflight up to starting the engines. Kit sat in one of the rear-facing chairs and pulled out his laptop, then pulled out the folding table and set it on top of it as a short weasel rushed into the plane. “I’m sorry, traffic was a mess!” he said. “Tom, where are we?”

“Waiting for you!” he answered from the cockpit. “Close the hatch, Jack, we’re leaving!”

The weasel hurried up into the cockpit, and a moment later the captain called over the intercom. “The router is up and ready, Mister Vulpan, and you’ll find a satellite phone along the bulkhead to your right. We’ll be taking off in just a moment. It’s about two hours to Lexington, we make a fuel stop, and another two and a half hours to Boston. Barring any unforeseen delays, we’ll land at Logan Airport at about twelve fifteen Eastern time.”

“Thank you, Captain,” Kit called, and he just barely heard the copilot’s voice over the engines as the first one started.

“Vulpan? We have a Vulpan on board?” he asked quietly, but not quietly enough. Kit didn’t hear the reply, but he was fairly sure what it was.

Kit spent almost the entire first leg of the flight on the satellite phone and on the internet. He kept in contact with Jessie and the furs at home, and also called Terry several times. Terry was already in Boston, for it had been nearly two hours since the crash before Kit heard about it, where Terry was informed almost immediately. Terry was at the hospital, and he gave Kit constant updates as to Vil's condition. She was sleeping, sleeping off the anesthetic, and from Terry heard the doctor's assessment. His sister had a compound fracture of her lower leg, almost what they would call a "ski boot" break, probably caused when her leg got caught on something and the rest of her body kept going. She had first degree burns on her left arm, which was basically just being singed, for her jacket sleeve had caught fire as the panthers got her out of the chopper. Stav had a broken arm and some burns on his back and tail, and Marcus had a few minor cuts and bruises. The pilot of the chopper had suffered a mild concussion and a broken finger. From the internet, Kit saw the crash via a video on CNN. It was caught on a security camera that always pointed at the landing pad, which was beside the Vulpan Shipyards headquarters building. The chopper took off normally, then the tail shuddered and the tail rotor seized up in a sudden gout of sparks and smoke when it was about fifteen feet off the ground. The pilot quickly tried to bring the chopper back down, but without the tail rotor, there was nothing to prevent an effect called autorotation. The chopper blades spun in one direction, and simple physics meant that while the chopper was in the air and wasn't braced, the rest of the chopper's body would want to spin in the opposite direction, the equal and opposite reaction. The tail rotor prevented that reverse rotation, and without it, the chopper quickly began to spin. It got out of control of the pilot, wobbled in the air, and crashed back to the landing pad tail first, snapping the tail clean off the body of the chopper. It hit the pad, turned sideways, then fell the rest of the way in a spray of shattered rotor blades, dust, and chunks of concrete and aluminum. A fire started near the shattered tail almost immediately, and within seconds of the wreck coming to a stop, Marcus appeared, punching the mangled side door of the chopper open, which came to rest on its side, scrambled out, and then reached down into the chopper as the fire quickly spread. He hauled Vil out of the chopper with a paw gripping the back of her blazer, almost by the scruff of her neck, then reached down and pulled Stav out, whose lower arm was at an odd angle and was most definitely broken. Vil's leg was also twisted unnaturally, which became very clear when Marcus flinched away from the rapidly spreading fire, slung Vil over his shoulder, then jumped off the wreck. Stav slid off after him, and the pilot appeared, wobbling on his feet, around the back side of the wreck, staggering away. Marcus carried Vil away, her sleeve still on fire, and they disappeared from the angle of the camera.

At least the captain understood Kit's haste. When he came to look into the cockpit, he saw that they were flying at the maximum cruising speed of the CJ1 at 40,000 feet, close to the operating ceiling of the jet, and were burning a whole lot of extra fuel pushing it.

They landed at Lexington in a light drizzle but no wind, and the jet immediately moved to the same area where Kit had taken the CJ3, where a fueler truck was literally sitting there waiting for them. It took a while to refuel the jet, however, since the captain had burned quite a bit of fuel getting them there nearly fifteen minutes faster than expected, but they were back in the air about thirty minutes after they landed.

When they crossed into Pennsylvania, Kit called Vil's phone, and Marcus answered. "We're about ninety minutes out," Kit told him. "The captain said we're landing at Logan and they're dropping me off at Signature. He said we should land around twelve fifteen."

"Very well, Mister Vulpan, I'll have a car waiting there for you, as well as an escort. He'll be a rather burly brown bear named Will."

“Alright. Are you bringing me to the hospital?”

“Yes. The staff won’t try to stop you from seeing Miss Vil.”

“Is she awake?”

“Not yet. The doctors assured me that it’s natural, she has strong vital signs.”

“That’s a relief,” he sighed. “Has anyone else come to see her?”

“Terry, Suzy, and Clancy have, but no one else. I think they’re honestly afraid to,” he said.

Kit chuckled. “I wonder why,” he said dryly. “I’m going to call Jessie and give her an update. I’ll see you in about two hours.”

“I’ll be here.”

Kit made quite a few phone calls over that ninety minutes. He called Jessie, Rick, Terry, and then called Clancy to keep him up to date, and those calls made the time fly by. When he got off the phone with Clancy, Tom the lynx was telling him that they were making their descent to Logan, and that it might be a little bumpy because it was raining and a little windy in Boston. They had him put his table away and buckle up, and Kit felt a little turbulence as they landed at Logan.

Boston. He was back in Boston. But this time, instead of feeling fear or the ghosts of his past, he felt anger. He did not come this time like a thief, sneaking in to do what he came to do and then sneak out, oh no. This time he was here with a fanfare of trumpets, and he was too mad to feel the familiar old ghosts try to lodge themselves in the back of his mind. Just about the only thing that could make him come back to Boston for anything other than a brief visit had happened, and that was that Vil needed him. His love for his sister was ten times more powerful than his fear, and now that she needed him, he would be there for her. After years of her taking care of him, now he would take care of her.

And the first thing he would do was kick the asses of the Vulpans who tried to kill her.

There was a car waiting when they pulled up, a small limo; bigger than a car, but not big enough to really be called a stretch. A very large, very wide grizzly bear stood by the back door of the car, waiting patiently for him, a newspaper under one arm and an umbrella in his other paw. He advanced once the jet came to a stop and its engines powered down, and Kit saw him when the copilot opened the hatch for him. "Mister Vulpan!" he called, stepping up to the bottom step and holding the umbrella out so Kit would stay dry. "I'm Will, sir. I'm going take you to the hospital, sir!"

"Any word on Vil while I was landing?" he asked as he came down under the umbrella, and the bear took his overnight.

"Not that I've heard, sir," he answered as he helped Kit down to the tarmac.

"Thanks a ton, guys, and thanks for getting me here as fast as you could!" Kit called back up towards the plane.

"Any time, sir!" Jack answered with a wave, and Tom appeared and waved as well. "I hope your sister is going to be okay."

"Last I heard, she'll be just fine, and thanks for your concern," he said as Will hurried him towards the limo, where, he saw, a driver was already behind the wheel and waiting to drive away. Will opened the door of the limo for him and helped him in, then he rounded the car quickly and got in the front seat passenger side. Kit settled himself into the seat, and Will handed his overnight bag back to him once he was inside. "Let's go, guys, let's go!" he said urgently.

The driver took them through Boston speedily, but not recklessly, getting them on Interstate and sending them down into the heart of the city. The Vulpan headquarters was on the back bay, a large ten story office building surrounded by grassy lawn and with a landing pad beside it, not far from Boston General, so that was naturally where they'd take the injured from the accident. Kit tapped his foot impatiently as the limo weaved through slower traffic on I-95, then exited the interstate and rushed down the streets of downtown Boston, along streets Kit knew intimately, streets where he had lived as a homeless fox for nearly four months as he tried to get himself back on his feet. He passed by an intersection where there was an alley a half a block down where he'd been beat up by a trio of street toughs, and over there was a day labor center where Kit had stood out among other indigents and illegal immigrants, trying to find work...work at which he'd been awful, since he had no real job skills. But fortunately, Kit was in decent shape despite being rich, and carrying something didn't take much skill, so he'd spent most of those months working as a manual laborer at construction sites, and had even worked on a section of the Big Dig. He'd been doing menial labor mostly, but one day he got to wear a vest and be a flagman to wave traffic away from the work site. That wasn't that bad, actually. They passed the homeless shelter where the police had dropped him off after taking him to the hospital the night of his 16th birthday, the night he left the family, and the night he very nearly froze to death trying to walk from Stonebrook to Boston with no coat, no shoes, just a shirt and a pair of thin slacks.

In Boston, it was still very much winter in late March. Spring didn't come to Boston until early May.

Finally, the hospital came into view. The limo pulled under a covered loading area in front of the hospital, and Kit didn't wait for Will to open the door for him, something nearly any other Vulpan would not have done. There were several reporters outside the front door, and as a result several cameras flashed in his face as Will met him by the limo, and the bear instructed the driver to wait nearby and be ready to come at a moment's notice. Will escorted Kit in through the double doors, shielding him from the reporters as best he could. "She's on the third floor, sir, in a private room," he said, motioning Kit to go ahead of him. There were several reporters in the main lobby as well, but Will intercepted them and slowed them down as Kit hurried past the main desk and towards the elevator. Will ran up behind him as he pressed the button to call a car, and when the nearest doors opened at the button, Will escorted him into the car with a huge paw lightly on his back and shoulders.

Familiar faces met him at the elevator. Suzy buried him in a fierce hug before he fully stepped out, and he guided her back to let him out. "Oh Kit, I was so worried!" she said in his neck, holding him almost painfully tight.

"It's alright, Suzy, it's alright," he said soothingly. "Is she awake yet?"

"Yes, she's awake now," she answered, kissing him on the muzzle. "Clancy, Corey, and Terry are in the room with her, and Kendall just called, he just landed at Logan and should be here in just a few minutes. She's a little out of it, they have her on some strong pain meds."

"Good. Let's go see her, Zee."

She laughed. "I haven't heard you call me that in forever!"

Vil was surrounded by friends and family, in a hospital bed that was of the mobile variety, the type that would allow them to just wheel her out in her own bed. She was sitting up thanks to the head of the bed being elevated, and Clancy was helping her drink a sip of water. Her right arm was wrapped in bandages from her wrist to her elbow, and she had her left leg in a sling elevated at the foot of the bed, the leg wrapped in bandages but not put in a cast. A single sheet covered her from knees to breast, and he could see that she was wearing a hospital gown. An IV was strapped to her right arm, the needle entering into her arm just above her wrist, held in place with tape wrapped around her entire forearm. Corey was sitting against the table near the window, Terry was sitting at the chair by her bed, and Marcus stood opposite Clancy at the head of her bed. “Kit!” Corey said in a hushed yet excited voice as Suzy led him into the room by the paw, and Will took up a place by the door in the hall. Kit shook paws with Corey and Terry and hugged Clancy, then sat down in the chair and pulled his sister into his arms as she hugged him as strongly as she could. “You’re a wreck, sis,” he chided, digging his claws into her back as his arms started to tremble.

“I’m alright, little brother, I’m alright,” she told him, patting him on the back. “The docs have already cleared me to go home tomorrow afternoon, as soon as they put a cast on my leg and they make sure I won’t get an infection. They didn’t have to do much but set my leg and sew up my skin when they did the surgery. They said the breaks of the bones in my shin were clean and set without any help, they didn’t even need to put pins in my leg. It looked much worse than it really is, they found that out when they got me here and took some X-rays. So I’ll be fine.”

He placed her gently back in bed and held her paw, gazing at her with worried yet relieved eyes. “I made Jess stay at home,” he told her. “I didn’t want her to be up here.”

“I can agree with that, Kit,” Vil nodded wearily, leaning her head back on the pillow. “God, I feel like I drank a whole barrel of scotch. It’s that damn medicine they gave me.”

“Who did it?” he asked after a second.

“We don’t know yet. The FAA is still going over the wreckage,” Terry answered.

“Well, I’ll be here until we find out,” Kit declared. “Someone tried to kill my sister, and I’m all kinds of pissed off at the moment. Heads will roll,” he growled angrily.

“That’s good,” Vil laughed weakly. “You can do me a favor, bro.”

“Anything.”

“I want you and Terry at the board meeting tomorrow at eleven,” she told him. “I don’t want Jake to think that he’ll have a whole day to jam the gears at the company, because you know I can’t vote while I’m in the hospital. And I made the same mistake he did, I don’t have a proxy agreement to allow anyone to vote in my place.”

“We can do that, cousin,” Terry assured her. “Just oppose anything he brings up?”

“Yeah. Oppose anything he introduces, vote to reschedule the issues that were on the schedule for the meeting, and move to adjourn the meeting every chance you get. Eventually he’ll give in and won’t object. I’ll be back the day after tomorrow, so you only have to run interference for me tomorrow.”

“I’ll be there,” Kit promised with an angry voice. “Right now I’m too angry to care what it is I’m doing, as long as it helps.”

“You’ll be helping, bro, trust me.”

Kit listened as he got another version of what happened from Vil and the others, this time including her being tended at the scene by paramedics. “I was laying there looking at my own bone sticking out of my leg,” she chuckled weakly. “I felt like Rick, but at least I didn’t break mine falling off the roof. Something a little more spectacular had to happen.”

“They showed a video of the crash,” Kit told her. “I saw it on the internet on the way up.”

“Yeah, they showed it to me. God, that looked awful,” she said ruefully.

The door opened, and Kendall rushed into the room. The usual lightness and joviality that normally graced his features was gone, leaving behind a very worried, very serious looking young fox. He rushed over and gave her a fierce hug, then kissed her several times on the face and muzzle. “Dear God, Vil, you scared me to death!” he declared. “Are you alright, love?”

“I’m alright,” she assured him. “They’re sending me home tomorrow afternoon. You’re not getting out of marrying me, boy,” she said with a weak smile. “I’ll be on crutches for our ceremony, but it is going to happen.”

“I wouldn’t dream of anything different,” he said frankly, kissing her again, then taking her paw and kissing it tenderly. “Oh no!” he gasped, looking at her bandaged arm. “Oh, Vil, you’ve lost your ring! I’ll run right out and get you another one, an even better one!”

“It’s fine, it’s fine,” she smiled. “Marcus has it, and it came through the crash without a scratch. But that’s touching, Ken, that you’d go get me another one.”

“You’re my bride to be, Vil, you can’t very well go around without a nice and fancy ring to show off to your friends,” he told her, getting back a little bit of his playfulness, probably because he was relieved to see that she was indeed going to be alright. “Why, I’d be laughed out of Britain if my fiancée didn’t have an engagement ring!”

“They can laugh you out of Britain, because you’re coming to America,” she teased with a tired smile.

“Only you could drag me out of England, love,” he told her, kissing the back of her paw again. “And I won’t be going back. I’ll be right here with you, my love, to help you, until you’re right as rain and dancing the tango again. My old male is going to finish up my preparations to move to America for me. I don’t want to be anywhere but right here.”

“Well, you’re going to have to share the bedrail with my family,” she smiled at him.

“I do get the best spot at the rail,” he said airily.

She laughed weakly. “I’ll let you and Kit fight about that. But now that I’ve seen everyone that matters, and they’ve seen me, I think I’d like to get some sleep. I'm really tired, and this medicine they have me on is like someone is stuffing my head with wool."

"Of course," Kit told her. "I know what that feels like, sis. Just get some sleep and let us take care of you for a change."

"I've never felt safer," she said, holding her bandaged paw out to him. He took it, then leaned over her bed and kissed and hugged her, and she nuzzled his neck. "I'm so glad you came home, Kit," she whispered in his ear.

"I love you so much, Vil," he breathed to her.

"I love you too, brother mine, I love you too. Now let me get some sleep, but don't waste your time sitting around here waiting for me."

He nodded in understanding. "I'll be in that boardroom at eleven tomorrow," he promised. "And I'll be back here when they release you."

"I'll call you when I wake up," she promised.

"I'll have news for you when you do."

Kit left Vil to hug the others goodbye, hugging Suzy and Clancy and shaking the paws of Corey and Clancy, then he stalked out of the room. Will started and hurried to catch up with him as he hurried towards the elevator. "Mister Vulpan? Are you done?"

"For here, for now," he answered as he pressed the button to call the elevator car. "Vil told me to do something, so we're going to go do it."

"What is that?"

"Clean house," he said as the elevator door opened.

Kit ignored the reporters that tried to stop him outside the hospital as he waited for the limo to come around, called by Will when they were in the elevator. Several more pictures of him were taken, but then hospital security rushed out of the doors and started pushing them off hospital grounds. The limo pulled up, and Will just barely managed to grab the handle before he did. He climbed into the car as Will shut the door behind him, and then the bear got into the front seat. “Where to, sir?” the driver asked.

“Stonebrook,” he answered, his voice grating like claws on a chalkboard.

“Y-yes, sir!” he said, putting the car in gear.

The fear didn’t come. It didn’t have a chance. Nothing but the image of his sister laying in that hospital bed was in his mind and memory as they left Boston and then exited the interstate, going down familiar roads that Kit could walk with a blindfold, roads that, long ago and in a different life, were the roads down which he used to ride his bicycle. They turned onto Stonebrook Drive, and there was no fear, there were no ghosts. They came up to the gates of the manor, where a uniformed guard stepped out of the small house to challenge them, but he never had the chance. The limo driver had a remote to the gate, and when the gates started swinging open, bisecting the Vulpan family crest, the guard still held up his paw to stop them. “I’ve been instructed to call in any visitor to the manor,” he said apologetically.

Kit rolled down the window and stared him in the eyes. “You will not call ahead,” Kit stated adamantly. The guard started, then stepped back and waved them through without another word.

The house was lit and abuzz with activity. The limo pulled around the house and into the garage, and a young fox hurried in, wearing a tee shirt and a pair of flannel night pants. Kit identified him as Weathers, Jim Weathers, the son of Carrie Weathers, one of the cooks. He was a second generation servant, who worked in the garage as a driver and mechanic when he wasn't working out on the grounds as a groundskeeper. The limo pulled to a stop and Kit opened the door before Jim or Will could reach it, and he stepped out. Jim gasped and almost took a step back, then laughed. "Master Kit!" he said brightly. "Welcome! Nobody told us you were coming, sir!"

"They didn't know," he said. "Get Stanley out of bed and—"

"He's still up, sir, I think everyone is. We're all worried sick about Miss Vil."

"Call him and tell him to meet me in the foyer," Kit ordered as he took his overnight out of the limo, and he marched off as Jim used his cell phone to do just that.

The ghosts were afraid of him, now. He stalked through the halls of Stonebrook, and he could feel them out there. The ghost of his father, the spectre of his family, the shade of a life he had once despised. They were all lurking in the shadows, behind the walls, but they would not come out. Kit was too angry to be easy prey for them, and so they kept their distance. The halls of Stonebrook didn't seem foreboding right now, they only seemed empty. The ghosts were still here, oh yes they were, but right now they wanted nothing to do with Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan.

Stanley wasn't the only one that met him in the foyer. Several Stonebrook servants scurried in as he came in from the garage hall, and on the second floor balcony to the west wing, Kitstrom Zachary Vulpan hurried out of the hallway leading to the wing where he lived, wearing a pair of dark slacks and a polo shirt, stomping along the elegant balcony with its burnished marble and cherrywood banister, then padded quickly down the marble staircase covered with red carpeting. Kit turned and pointed at him before he even got halfway down the stairs.

“Get out of MY HOUSE!” he screamed at Zach, then he clenched a fist and shook it at him. “I want you out by sunrise, you and your entire scummy family, Zach! I am moving back in, effective right now!”

“Lucas—”

Stanley was the only thing that stopped Kit from charging up those stairs at hearing that most hated of all names. “DO NOT CALL ME BY HIS NAME!” he shrieked so loudly that Zach nearly fell down trying to back up, as Stanley and Jim physically restrained him from going up there and beating his uncle to death with his bare paws. “You tried to kill my sister!” he screamed, foam flying from his mouth as a look of absolute rage invaded his features. “You will never set foot in Stonebrook again, not you, not your bitch wife, not your brat kids, not your entire diseased line! Get out! Get out! GET OUT, you bastard!”

He didn’t say another word. He couldn’t. Abject terror crept into his face as he saw Kit in such a state of rage that he’d never seen anything like it before, and he knew in that moment that if Kit wasn’t being held back, Kit would kill him. Zach did the only thing he could do in that situation, and that was turn and literally run back up the stairs, run back to the hallway and quickly out of sight.

“Let it go, Master Kit, let it go, let it go,” Stanley said calmly, soothingly, even as he kept a very tight hold around Kit’s chest and middle. “Marge, bring a glass of wine and a glass of tea to the parlor,” he ordered as Kit stopped struggling against Stanley, then wilted to his knees and covered his face with his paws, his shoulders shaking, as the rage exploded into fear and grief at nearly losing his sister, drowning him in a tidal wave of uncontrollable emotion. “Dee,” Stanley called, and a matronly vixen, Dee the head maid, hurried over and knelt by Kit, wrapping him in her arms.

“There there, dear, it’s all over,” she said gently, patting him on the back and pressing her cheek and muzzle against his damaged ear as he clutched at her, sobbing uncontrollably. “It’s all over, it’s all over, and you’ve come home, my young Master Kit. You’re home now, and everything will be just fine.”

Chapter 33

He felt a little dead inside.

He sat on the huge windowsill of the sun room, his tail laying in his lap like a blanket and his legs stretched out over the cushioned seating area, looking down over the front lawn with sloe eyes and an emotionless mask. The sun room had always been one of his favorite places in the manor, for it was off the beaten path, rarely used, and the south-facing window almost always had sunlight streaming into it at any time of the day. The room was on the third floor, filled with Napoleon-era furniture, elegant white furniture with flowing lines and gold filigree, with red satin upholstery in the chairs and sofas. But in his entire life, he had never sat in those chairs and sofas. He had always sat here, on the padded sill that was designed to be a seat itself, looking through the bay window over the roof over the front door. Some manors had a balcony on top of their entry porch, using the roof held up by those towering columns, but Stonebrook did not. It instead had two bay windows that framed the top of that columned roof, the two huge windows of the sun room. And the right window had always been Kit's special place when he was a kid, his favorite place to be alone in a manor filled with family and servants.

Zach, his wife, and their three teenage kids were gone. They piled into a limo at four in the morning and drove away, as Alicia and the kids whined; Alicia about leaving Stonebrook, and the kids at having to wake up and get dressed. But Zach knew not to tempt fate. Kit was absolutely enraged, and he knew that it was a threat to his own life and safety to be in the same house with Kit. If they chanced to meet in a hallway, Kit would attack him, and he knew it, as much as he knew that he was no match for the much younger and much tougher young fox. Zach could not deny Kit his right to be in the manor, and so he decided that it was the wise course of action to retreat. So, Zach had probably returned to Swan Cove, the manor he owned and had lived in before invading Stonebrook, which was actually only about three miles and a little upriver from Stonebrook. It was just about a mile further down the road if one passed Stonebrook Lane, and it too was on the Charles River.

He leaned his head back against the velvet-covered wall behind him, watching a riding mower roll back and forth across the football field-sized front lawn, part of the meticulous grooming the entire manor underwent on a weekly basis. Even the woods behind the house and within the fence were carefully maintained, each tree watched over and the ground between them kept clean of branches. He watched the mower run from one edge to the other, turn around, and then come back.

God, how did he end up back here? Stonebrook. Stonebrook. But he was stuck here now. To drive out his uncle, to get that murderous bastard out of their house, the house that belonged to him and his sister, he would stick it out. The terms of the agreement were clear. Kit had to establish reasonable residency, which meant that he would have to live up here for a while, change his driver's license to Massachusetts, and change his official address to here. But it was worth it. It was worth anything to drive that disgusting bastard out of their house, someone that would try to kill his sister—

He blew out his breath. There was no use getting worked up over that again, he'd have plenty of time for vituperous accusations in about ninety minutes. It was 9:32am, and he had to be in Boston for an 11:00am meeting, where he would come face to face with Uncle Jake...and resist the impulse to jump over the table and try to strangle him with his bare paws, or sink his teeth into Jake's throat.

He hadn't slept all night. Not long after Stanley and Dee calmed him down, he came up here, to his place, and had been sitting there ever since. He watched the limo carrying Zach leave Stonebrook, and Kit hoped he was looking back, because he would never set foot on the grounds again. Kit had already made that very clear. If Zach showed up and tried to get in, they would refuse him entry. If he decided to get cute and use a remote to the gate to get in, he'd be arrested for trespassing. And Kit made sure that Stanley let Zach know that in a phone call. Zach was exiled from Stonebrook, banished the same way Kit had been banished from the family, and it would be Zach's ass if he dared try to come back to the rightful home of Vilenne and Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan.

It certainly didn't feel like home to him. Home was in Austin, in his townhouse, where he lived with and loved his wonderful wife, where he had a job he enjoyed, fantastic friends, and plans for the future. He wanted the magazine to go statewide, maybe even national. He wanted to take advantage of several opportunities he saw there to build an aviation business on the side. He wanted to live...and he couldn't live here. There were too many ghosts, too many bad memories. All he could do up here was exist, return to that bleak, empty existence he had endured before he had met Jessie, go back to a life without joy, where there was only money.

Money. That was almost a joke. He had spent $12,000 getting up here, six hours at $2,000 an hour, which was more than half of the bonus Vil had sent him. He could have bought a car for what he spent getting up here, but he'd spend it again in a heartbeat. He'd bet that most of the servants at Stonebrook earned more salary than he did every week, and had more money in the bank than him. Kit was destitute as Vulpans went, the poorest of them all, and the only reason he could come up here and take residence of the manor was because the manor had its own money, its own accounts. Without that, Kit would have had to lay everyone off. Right now, he couldn't even afford to pay the staff of Stonebrook a single week's salary. It was a good thing the manor had its own limo and driver, else he'd have to call a cab to take him anywhere, he didn't even have a car.

The door to the sunroom opened, and Clancy stepped in. Of course. Clancy would know where he was, the old fox knew him so well. He ambled in, his cane tapping on the carpeted floor as he crossed the room, and then he sat on the edge of the sill right at Kit's feet. "Kit," he said. "It's nearly time for you to go."

"I know," he sighed, watching the mower turn and go back across the lawn. "I feel..."

"I can imagine, my young male," Clancy said compassionately, patting him on the shin. "Have you slept at all?"

"No, not really," he answered. "Have my clothes got here yet?"

Clancy nodded. "Did you not see the truck come up the drive?" he asked with a chuckle, motioning towards the window.

"Around here, you never know what's in a Fed Ex truck, Clancy," he answered.

"True. My boy, we are happy you are home," he said honestly. "You belong here, Kit."

“No, I belong where I call home, Clancy. Austin is my home now,” he told him, looking at him soberly. “This is just a place I can’t stand, yet can’t let go. I don’t know why I feel this way. I hate this place, Clancy. I hate it. You of all foxes know what I went through here. And yet what do I do when I come up? I reclaim Stonebrook. Why can’t I let this place go, Clancy? Why?” he asked plaintively.

“Because this house belongs to you, Kit,” he answered. “You were born here, in a bedroom not two hundred feet from this room.”

“You mean it’s Vil’s. She’s the first born.”

“No, Kit. It is yours,” Clancy told him. “Vil knew when she was a child that this was not her place. That’s why she lives in Chelmsford, in a house that is hers, just as much as this house is yours. Stonebrook belongs to you, just as surely as you sit here. The hatred you feel for this house isn’t because of the house, my boy, it’s because of your father. Your father is dead, Kit. He is long gone. Don’t let his spirit haunt you, or this house. This house was here long before your father was born, and will be here long after he is gone.”

“That’s not easy, Clancy. You know what he did to me. I’m reminded of it every time I look down, or look in the mirror,” he said, his paw running over the crisscrossing white streaks in the fur on his right forearm.

“That is the past, my boy.”

“The past is looking me in the face, Clancy,” he sighed, looking out the window.

“I think you’ll find that the past doesn’t hold you as tightly as it once did, my boy,” he said with a knowing smile, patting him on the shin fondly.

“Now, we must get you ready for your first day at work!”

Kit laughed. “We? You’re retired, old male,” he teased.

“Not for this, I am not,” he said, standing up. “I am certainly aggravating my son by taking his rightful place as your butler, but he can’t deny me the privilege of serving my young master Kit one final time,” he said with a smile. “I’m coming out of retirement for this last service, my boy, and then I’ll go back into retirement once we have you dressed.”

“I can dress myself, Clancy,” Kit smiled wanly.

“Hold out your paw.” When Kit did so, he saw that it was trembling slightly. “Mmm-hmm. Let’s go, my boy.”

He didn’t have the heart to refuse. Clancy took him into the east wing, and he almost gaped in wonder when he opened the door to his old room and looked inside. It was unchanged. Everything was exactly as it was left when he left six years ago. A proper Vulpan didn’t have things like posters or silly toys in his room, but the room was definitely Kit’s own, for it had small models of airplanes and jets on many of the flat surfaces. “Where do you think you’re going, my boy?” Clancy chuckled.

“My room—”

“That is the room of a child, my boy. You are the master of this house, and so the master bedroom is now your rightful place.”

“No. I can’t—”

“It is not the same room, Kit,” he said gently. “When your father died, we had it remodeled. I think you will... appreciate the room as it is now.”

It was indeed nothing like the royal room it had been, back when it was filled with antique 18th century English furniture and a four-poster bed. The master bedroom was palatial, as befitted the master of a house the size of Stonebrook, on the third and top floor of the manor. It used to be full of expensive antique furniture, but now it was spartanly decorated. Kit had to laugh; the furniture was slightly more upscale versions of the bedroom set he had back home! It was almost like walking into his own bedroom, if that bedroom was ten times the size of his own, with a bathroom the size of his master bedroom back home and two walk in closets larger than the small bedroom in his townhouse. The bed was between the huge windows that looked out over the front lawn, and there was a writing desk, computer desk, four dressers, an armoire, a vanity table, chair, and mirror, a free-standing full length mirror near the closet door, and a backless cushioned divan commonly used for dressing. A sofa and two recliner chairs and an coffee table were arrayed in front of a sixty inch widescreen plasma TV and home theater system complete with component stereo system at the far end of the bedroom, something of an internal living area within the bedroom, and on the other end was a large desk that had three monitors where his father would run stock program displays and business channels on the wall facing it, and there was a second large TV on the wall facing the bed, so he could lay in bed and watch TV. There was a pair of French doors on the end that led to a small balcony with a wrought iron rail that looked out over the gardens, and had a pair of rather nice outdoor chairs with soft padding flanking a round glass table. A small waiting table near the door held a freshly brewed pot of tea and a plate of scones, as well as a Wall Street Journal newspaper.

“Miss Jessie sent those scones for you with your clothes,” Clancy told him. “And thank goodness she packed you nice clothes! Is it true you don’t own a suit, my boy?"

Kit laughed. "I own one, and I don't think I've ever worn it. I've never really needed one," he answered. "I do my business visits for the magazine in a nice shirt and a pair of slacks."

"Well, we'll have to see about that!" he said in an offended tone. "Brookington's will send over a tailor this afternoon, and you will have a proper suit by tomorrow morning!"

"I don't need a suit, Clancy. I won't be here long enough to need one."

"A male always needs a suit," he scoffed.

"I can't afford a Brookington's suit," he protested.

"Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan!" Clancy said with a gasp. "You dare bring up money?"

"It kinda matters, Clancy," he chuckled. "I'm not my dad, or Zach. I can't just order whatever I want. I have to pay for it, and I can guarantee you you have more money than I do. The only reason your son and the others have a job right now is because the manor has its own money."

"A Vulpan worrying about money," Clancy scoffed, then he chuckled. "Well, we'll see what we can do, my boy. Now let's get you ready."

Kit didn't have the heart to make Clancy stop. He seemed to thoroughly enjoy helping Kit dress in his dark slacks and a simple white dress shirt, and then he had someone bring him a nice simple black tie to wear with his shirt. Clancy settled the tie into place, then patted him on his shoulders. "There, now you look presentable," he said with a warm smile.

“Now, you eat some of the fine scones your wife made for you while I have Stanley bring the car around for you.”

Kit dragged the old fox into a warm embrace, which made him chuckle and pat Kit’s shoulders. “I love you too, my boy. Now try to relax a moment while I get you on your way.”

Kit could certainly tell that Jessie made the scones after the first bite. There was a certain something in her cooking that made it easy to identify, and always delicious. He stood by the table and poured himself a cup of tea, and a thousand memories flooded through him with the first taste. It was a special blend of custom tea blended from different tea leaves, made only for Stonebrook, by a local tea company. Stonebrook blend tea was unique, and one of the many vanities of the Vulpan family. Tasting it brought the old ghosts lurking around him, but he pushed them away with a wall of rising anger. He would be here for a while, long enough to ensure Zach could never come back, because no bastard who tried to kill his sister would ever set foot in their ancestral home. For now, he’d do as Vil wished and go fight for her on the board, but as soon as she was back at work, he wouldn’t go back. He would stay in Stonebrook, avoiding the family, avoiding the press, avoiding everyone, and hold the house if only to spite his uncle.

In some ways, Kit was definitely a Vulpan.

Stanley did get in on the act, coming in to get him, fussing with his tie, and promising to put the rest of his tea and some scones in the limo for him. A maid scurried in and took the platter ahead of them as Stanley told him what the audit had found. “They just sent over the report,” he explained. “All the money is where it’s supposed to be, thank goodness, but there was some unusual activity concerning the accounts.”

“He took the money out and put it back?”

Stanley shook his head. “The opposite. There was more money in the accounts than what was supposed to be, then all the excess was withdrawn, leaving the accounts to the penny where they should have been. It seems that your uncle was using the accounts to hide money.”

“Why that bastard,” Kit growled. “He does lose access to the accounts now that he’s kicked out, right?”

“I’m not sure, to be honest. But we did report the unusual activity, and I’ve told the accountants to put a flag on the accounts so any activity in them is automatically checked by an accountant. Anyone with access to the accounts can access them, but with that flagged oversight, I’m fairly sure nobody will use them improperly again.”

“Well, he won’t ever use them again,” Kit growled. “He doesn’t live here anymore, he has no business putting his paws into Stonebrook’s accounts. I want you to call them back and tell them to block Zach from access to the accounts.”

“Only Mistress Vil can issue an order like that. She’s the primary owner.”

“Then I’ll have her do it.”

“The inventory of Stonebrook is finished, and all the valuable items are accounted for,” he continued.

“Good. I guess even Zach is too afraid of my bastard father’s memory to violate Stonebrook,” he grunted.

Instead of taking him to the garage, the limo was sitting out in the back courtyard near the garage, letting them walk out into the warm, sunny Boston morning. Much to his surprise, the 27 employees of Stonebrook were all standing out in the courtyard, all the maids, butlers, cooks, drivers, groundskeepers, and maintenance furs waited for him. Kit found himself shaking paws and giving hugs almost everywhere, as each and every member of the staff made him feel welcome. “My, it feels like you’re glad Zach’s gone,” Kit laughed.

“We’re just happy you’re home, Master Kit,” Dee told him. “Or, I should say, Master Luke,” she chuckled, kissing him on the cheek. “You’ll have to forgive a few of us old femmes and males for calling you that from time to time. You always were our little Luke.”

“I guess I’ll have to let you slide, Dee, or you’ll have Carrie poison my tea,” he teased, kissing her on the cheek.

She laughed. “Oh, get to work, now,” she told him.

“I’m surprised all of you feel the same way,” he chuckled. “I know a few of you aren’t happy at my choice of wives.”

“We are the staff of the manor, not the Vulpans who live in it,” Stanley told him simply. “Vulpans come and go, but the manor will always remain.”

“Way to make me feel important there, Stan,” Kit laughed.

Stanley smiled. “Good luck in the city, Master Kit,” he said as he opened the door of the limo for him. Will was already in the limo with the driver, and he saw his thermos of tea and scones on a table in the car, waiting for him.

It was like living a past life, driving to Boston in the back of a limo, a life he gave up long ago. He was very tired, and drained, and that made it nearly surrealistic to him. He drank two more cups of tea just to try to wake up, and ate another of Jessie's cherry scones to be reminded a little of home. An image of her came into his mind, her standing in front of her new stove wearing an apron, her tail swishing back and forth in time to that horrible music she liked, turning her head and looking at him, her head tilted slightly, and a radiant smile on her face as she put her paw on her rounded belly—

“Mister Vulpan,” Will called. “We're here.”

“Already?” he asked in surprise, looking at the ship on ship on ship logo of Vulpan Shipyards, the I-beam in front of a bold V of Vulpan Steel, and the blocky letters VC of the Vulpan Corporation, arranged triangularly on a sign by the entrance to the office building and its grounds.

“We let you take a little nap, sir. We thought you might need it,” Will told him with a slight smile.

“Huh. I don't remember falling asleep,” he said with a yawn, showing off his impressive fangs.

Kit had been here enough when he was a child to remember where everything was. Will followed him as he walked down carpeted hallways, as foxes and others gaped at him, got out of his way, or offered him nervous greetings. The eyes showed him as a Vulpan, but the ear gave away exactly who he was. He only made one wrong turn, which Will quickly corrected, and then the large bear followed him into the boardroom.

He almost laughed when he saw Vil sitting at the chair at the head of the long table, facing the door, a pair of crutches leaning on the table beside her, and Stav and Marcus standing behind her, Stav with his left arm in a sling.

“Vil!” he gasped, running down the table as she turned in her chair and opened her arms. He bent down and gave her a strong hug. “Why didn’t you call me?” he demanded.

“And have you beg off showing up here? Never!” she said with a grin. “They just released me about half an hour ago, and I thought I’d surprise Uncle Jake,” she winked.

“How’s your leg?”

“It hurts like a bitch,” she answered honestly. “They casted it this morning and let me out as soon as they felt it was dry.” She held up her left arm, showing a bandage extending out of her sleeve. “This is worse, though. It itches.”

Kit laughed and kissed her on the side of her muzzle. “I’m just glad you’re okay, sis.”

“I hurt like hell, but I’m okay otherwise,” she answered. “I’m starting to get an appreciation of your little brush with the family,” she told him, reaching up and pinching the ragged edge of his half-missing ear. “And why you hate them.”

“Did you ever doubt why I hate them?” he asked, a little tersely.

“I always thought your hatred of them was a little unreasonable,” she told him, taking his paw. “I always hoped that you’d see that the elders weren’t all your enemies, that they were as much victims of our father as you were. I thought that with time, you could reconcile and if not come back home, at least return to the fold, so I’ve tried to moderate things on both sides. Even after all this started, I thought we could just settle it and move on. I can see that I was wrong, brother,” she told him honestly. “I was very wrong. Now I have a reason to hate them, and I won’t try to moderate things anymore. I never honestly dreamed they’d actually try to kill me. I thought Stav and Marcus were being a little overprotective, and now I have a broken leg to prove them right. Oh, and Stav gets a big bonus,” she said, smiling in his direction. “So, it comes down to this, little brother. You and me against them. Until they beg for mercy.” She held out his paw to him, bandaged from the wrist up.

“Amen,” he said, clasping her paw with his own, which had jagged white streaks through the fur of his forearm.

“Now, I’ve heard that you kicked Zach out of Stonebrook,” she smiled. “Are you going to keep him out?”

“I’m going to go change my license to Massachusetts after this meeting,” he declared. “And I told Stanley that he will never be allowed to set foot in Stonebrook again.”

“Good.”

“Sis, I need you to block Zach from the manor’s accounts, too,” he said. “He was using them to hide money.”

“Oh really?” she asked with sudden interest. “We’ll talk about it later, bro,” she said, looking at the door. A few other furs, two foxes and a rabbit, filed into the room, and stopped with a start to see Vil sitting in her chair, and Kit standing beside her. “Well? Come in and sit down,” Vil said, a touch harshly.

“We hadn’t heard you were back, Vil,” the rabbit said as they reached the table.

“I just got out of the hospital,” she answered. “Kit, this is Don Roberts, Jane Sanderson, and Irwin Lange. They were just elected to the board a few days ago, along with you,” she smiled. “Where is everyone else?”

“They’re coming,” the rabbit said.

“Where do I sit, sis?” he asked uncertainly.

“Right here,” she said, pointing at the seat behind him. “For the one and only time you’ll be here,” she said with a smile.

“Damn right,” he answered with a nod. “I’d walk out right now if not for the fact that I don’t want to leave you right now.”

She gave him a loving smile and took his paw, squeezing it gently. “I love you too, brother mine,” she told him.

Terry came in next, and gasped and immediately hurried over to Vil. “Cousin, thank God!” he said, hugging her in her chair. “When did you get out of the hospital?”

“About half an hour ago,” she said with a smile. “Just in time to get over here.”

The others in the room went suddenly quiet, and Kit looked up to see his uncle Jake standing in the doorway, his tail with a bandage around it near the end, the splint for his broken tail. Jake stood there a moment, his eyes wide, then he rather boldly hurried down the table and to her, limping slightly as he did so because of the stitches in his leg. “Vil, we did not do this,” he said quietly and intensely. “We may be against your leadership of the family, but we would never try to hurt you!”

“I don’t know, uncle, your compassion towards my family has a certain track record,” Vil said coldly, reaching over and pinching Kit’s torn ear. “You once wanted one of us to die. I don’t think it’s a stretch that you might have tried to help me along. I guess Stav, Marcus, and the pilot were just afterthoughts.”

“Well, it wasn’t me,” he said in an intense whisper. “And if Zach or Maxy did it, then I’ll wash my paws of them. I’ll have no part of such barbarism.”

“And what you did to my brother wasn’t barbaric?” she asked with an icy stare. “It’s just business as usual, isn’t it? You try to kill him by refusing him medical care, but, well, your try on me was just a touch more direct.”

“I’m telling you, it was not,” he said strongly. “I don’t know what happened, Vil, but we had no part of it! Or at least I didn’t!”

“Why don’t I believe you, uncle Jake?” Vil asked in a barbed voice.

“I wouldn’t,” Terry said darkly. “By the way, Uncle, the next time you’re in New Orleans, I highly suggest you pick the cell block on the second floor. It has a lovely view of the alley through the six inch window that was in my holding cell.”

“What did you expect, Terry? You went against the family, and that made you a target.”

“I was doing my job,” he hissed, “and my private life is none of your damn business!”

“When your private life demeans the reputation of this family, then it becomes our business,” Jake answered calmly. “We may give the brainless children a longer leash, but you are one of the upstanding and promising Vulpans who will lead this family when we are gone, Terry, and we expected more from you than a Texas whore.”

“My whore is a better femme than half the blue-bloods in New England,” Terry said with a savage hiss. “At least she’s honest.”

The other board members filed in, slowly, seeing the four Vulpans clustered around the end of the table, glares flying all around. But then they broke up, Kit and Terry sat down at the chairs beside Vil, and Jake went down to the far end of the table, getting far away from the other three Vulpans. Eventually all fifteen were there, and several assistants, mostly foxes, scurried among them, setting cups of tea and coffee as well as small binders holding papers before each board member. There were six foxes aside from the Vulpans, a badger, a rabbit, a mink, and a raccoon on the board. “Now that we’re all here,” Vil said crisply, “as you can see, I’m fine. I’m a little less worse for wear, but I’m otherwise fine.” She picked up the papers that a young fox put in front of her. “So, since we’re all here, first allow me to introduce the two new members of the board you haven’t met yet. Terry I’m sure most of you know, but this is my brother, Kit Vulpan. Enjoy his visit, because this is the first and last time you’ll see him.” She gave Jake a penetrating stare. “So, let’s move on, shall we?”

“Are you sure you’re alright, Miss Vulpan?” one of the members asked.

“My leg’s killing me, I’m dying for a drink, and I need to sleep for about ten years, but I’ll make it,” she answered. “I can easily last the half hour we're going to be here." She slapped her paws on the table. "So, what shall we argue about today?"

Jake cleared his throat. "Given your, ah, position, Vil, I move that we move quickly, but also that we agree to adjourn immediately if you feel unwell."

"My, how considerate of you, Uncle Jake," she said with a dark smile.

Kit had never been at a board meeting before, and though this one was charged with hidden tension, it was a curious experience. Despite her broken leg and bandaged arm, Vil was fully in control as she moved the board through four votes that made absolutely no sense to Kit. It was accounting stuff, then a five minute discussion about some acquisition, a steel mill in West Virginia that Vulpan Steel was considering buying, then there was talk about pursuing a new Navy contract to build some kind of experimental submarine. Kit was honestly lost through the whole thing. The other board members were a little hesitant to talk, but they did discuss the steel mill thing for a little bit before deciding to do a cost analysis. The last order of business was a real estate thing, buying land near one of their smaller facilities in Philadelphia to expand. Kit had no idea what any of it was about, and he was too busy watching Vil to make sure she was okay to do much other than vote in the same way she did each time.

After it was over, Kit stood up and Jake hurriedly rushed from the boardroom, but Kit wasn't too worried about him. He was more interested in Vil. He took up her crutches and both he and Terry helped her get up on her foot, then she shouldered her crutches. "I'll be by in a few hours and we'll talk," she told him. "Go get it done, bro."

“You’ll know where to find me, sis. Once I get in there, I won’t come back out until I go back to Texas.”

“No need to go that far, bro.”

“Yes, there is,” he said simply.

And he did exactly what he said he would do. He went to the Massachusetts DMV and had his license changed over, which took about two hours, mainly because the clerk wanted to fight with Kit over not having anything in writing or any bills to prove his Massachusetts residency. “I’m afraid I just can’t do it,” the vixen clerk said, chewing her gum aggressively. “You have to have proof that you actually live in the state, and you can’t produce it.”

“Lady, come here,” he said, leaning over the counter and crooking at finger at her. “Now, look at my eyes.”

“So?”

“You’re not from Boston, are you?”

“Gee, did my southern drawl clue you into that?” she asked caustically.

“Fine, I’ll give you that much. Does the name Vulpan mean anything to you?”

“Not particularly.”

“Mmm-hmm. Call your supervisor, and watch and learn,” he said with a grim face.

She frowned at him, but did call her supervisor, which was an older vixen. She gasped and almost took a step back when she came to the counter where they were, and hurried up to him. “U-uh, is there a p-problem, Mister Vulpan sir?” she asked nervously.

“There won’t be one now,” he told her mildly. “I’m trying to change my driver’s license back to Massachusetts, but this young vixen here doesn’t seem to believe that I live in Boston.”

“Well, we’ll just take care of that!” she said quickly. “You can proceed without proof of residency, Darla.”

“But it won’t let me—“

“I’ll fix it later!” she said quickly. “Just put anything there!”

“I can’t falsify an official record, I’ll lose my job!”

“Hon, I can assure you, as long as you let me walk out of here with what I want, you won’t lose your job,” Kit told her calmly. “I’ll have my butler send you an affidavit that I’ve moved back to Boston if you like.”

“B-Butler?” she asked.

“He’s a Vulpan, Darla!” the supervisor said in a hissing tone. “Now change his license!”

“Uh, yes ma’am,” she said uncertainly.

So, after a little wrangling, Kit managed to walk out of the DMV with a new license. And true to his word, he went straight back to Stonebrook.
Again, there was that feeling of foreboding as they went past the ornate gate, along the drive around the house, and again stopping out in the courtyard rather than going into the drive-through garage. He got out of the limo and sighed as he looked around, feeling very much like he was about to enter prison. And it would be a prison for him. He would not leave Stonebrook until he went back home, maintaining a constant presence to prevent Zach from trying anything, and he certainly did not want to be here. Now that the anger had dimmed somewhat, he could almost feel baleful eyes glaring down at him from the windows, the wardens and guards that would keep him company inside this self-created prison.

“Kit!”

His tail almost broke from snapping straight out, and he whirled around to see Jessie in the doorway to the garage, wearing a white maternity blouse and a pair of slacks. He could only gape at her as she ran up to him, then he folded her into a powerful embrace.

“I won’t let them pull you away from me,” she said fiercely in his ear, almost creaking his ribs with her strong grip on him. “I will not let them win!”

“Oh, pretty kitty, you shouldn’t be here,” he protested.

“I will not be apart from you!” she declared. “I’ll just stay in the house all the time, love, safe behind the fence,” she promised. “But I’m here now, so just try and make me go home!”

He chuckled ruefully and swung her from side to side. “I spoil you too much, love,” he told her.

“You just know when to accede to the inevitable,” she teased, kissing him on the muzzle. “I couldn’t let you come and try to be here by yourself. How can I be your guardian angel when I’m in Texas and you’re up here?”

“You can be my guardian angel anywhere, my love,” he told her, kissing her. “All I have to do is think about you, and you chase the ghosts away.”

“Well, you’re going to have to settle for me in the flesh,” she winked. “I called Vil and she knows I’m here, Nick came with me, Lupe’s watching the house, and Rick wants you to call him later. But right now,” she said, taking his paw. “I want you to show me the house as you know it.”

“What do you mean?”

“You grew up here, Kit. I know you know everything about the house, even things the servants don’t know. Show me everything!”

“Everything, eh?” he asked.

“Everything!” she said with a smile.

“Well, there’s a lot of house here,” he said with a chuckle. “And Vil’s going to be coming over later, after she gets a little rest.”

“Then we’d better get started,” she winked.

“Well, first off, let’s introduce you to the staff, and we’ll see what we can see until Vil gets here.”

Jessie was an absolute Godsend. The idea of living in the house, day after day, seemed almost like a prison sentence, and then she shows up. He certainly wasn’t going to allow her to stay here, but he’d give her a couple of days, show her the house now that there was no one here to keep them out of it, and then send her home. He wanted her nowhere near his family, especially right now with his elders trying to get rid of everyone stopping them from taking control of the family and those who were rebelling against the family traditions. And Kit was both of those. But, for the few days he would let her stay, he’d enjoy her company.

But God, one thing was for sure. Nobody was setting foot in Stonebrook while she was here except for the staff, Vil, Terry, and Muffy. He wouldn't even let a delivery truck in while she was here.

Kit took care of that immediately. He told Stanley that only Vil, Terry, and Muffy would be allowed onto the grounds, and that all deliveries had to be handled at the main gate, that no one was setting foot in Stonebrook so long as his wife was there. Once that was done, and he released Nick, who had come up with Jessie, to inspect the grounds, Kit showed Jessie Stonebrook. He showed her every room, from the cellar to the attics and the three floors in between, and told her his own memories and stories about each room. He showed her the old secret passage that ran from the master bedroom to the conservatory on the first floor, passing through a dead space on the second floor, and the secret room in the master bedroom with the large safe meant for cash and small valuables and a single table and two padded chairs caked over with dust, which had been built into the house back when it was constructed. The secret room opened through one of the closets, and it had a peephole that looked through one of the wall light racks into the bedroom so one could make sure nobody was in the room when they came out. There was a second such secret vault as well, a larger one in the cellar, which was literally a vault holding several antiques and once held cases full of gold, hidden behind a false wine rack in the wine cellar. There were five other secret rooms in the house, hidden in various places, built because the house had been built during Prohibition and the Vulpans needed somewhere to keep their illegal wine and spirits hidden. There was a large one just off the kitchen, and small ones, little more than hidden closets, in the main parlor, the sitting room, the billiards room, and the very sun room to which Kit was attached, and Kit was one of the few who knew of them all. There was also a room that wasn't hidden or secret, but had been sealed off during a remodel back in the 60's and had been recently reopened when they redid the ballroom, since it had been an anteroom off the ball room, a second coat room, which they'd sealed over because they felt they didn't need it anymore. He also showed her all the passages, both the main hallways and the smaller servants' passages, some of which were almost never used anymore. Jessie was right that Kit knew it all, because there was no way a child would not explore everything there was to know about a house. Kit had wandered the house as a child, and after he started fighting with his father, he learned three ways to get everywhere so he could avoid him, as well as the servants he'd send to find him. Kit knew every room, door, passage, window, and cubbyhole in the entire house, as well as virtually every building on the grounds and every tree in the woods. Stonebrook was a huge manor, and often he'd had to hide out on the grounds, out where he would be extremely hard to find. After he set fire to his father's Bentley, it took them nearly four hours to find him, and that was only because he came out of his hiding place to get food.

They were just about finished with the grand tour, going through the west wing and the rooms that had once held Zach's family, their things boxed and waiting to be moved out, which Kit solved by telling Stanley to put it all in the pool house. Kit wanted nothing from his uncle in the house. He almost wanted to disinfect and decontaminate the entire west wing to get rid of the every trace of them. It was as Kit was showing Jessie the terrace balcony that opened from the west wing master bedroom, which looked out over the courtyard and helicopter landing pad across from the drive, that Stanley came in. "Master Kit, Mistress Vil is at the gate and coming up," he said.

“Thank God,” Kit said, taking Jessie’s paw. “Come on, I’ll show you the fastest way to the garage from here!” he told her.

Vil wasn’t the only one who got out of her limo as Kit and Jessie hurried out to them. Bartholomew had brought out a wheelchair for Vil to use, and she was in the middle of transferring from the limo to the wheelchair. Kendall was helping Vil from the car to the chair. Terry was already out, and Muffy was getting out of the other side. She gasped when Kit and Jessie came out of the garage and laughed. “Jessie!” Muffy called happily running around the limo. The two hugged fondly, and Muffy was patting Jessie’s rounded belly and giggling as Terry came over and gave her a hug as well. “I thought Kit wouldn’t let you come up here, Jess,” Terry told her.

“He can forbid all he wants,” she said with a wink in his direction. “I promised not to leave Stonebrook, but other than that, he can tell me to go home all he wants. My place is wherever he is.”

“I see a fight coming,” Kendall laughed.

“A fight she’ll lose,” Kit warned.

Jessie flicked her tail at him insultingly as she bent down and hugged Vil. “Now, are you really okay, Vil?” she asked.

“My leg feels like a magician screwed up the saw me in half trick,” she said, “but I’m okay otherwise. After they set the bone and sewed my skin back together, they let me go. My break wasn’t half as bad as Rick’s was. Rick’s bone was sticking way out. Mine just barely broke the skin.”

“You should be at home resting!” Jessie protested.

“I can rest here,” she said. “I’m staying here tonight.”

“We all are!” Muffy said happily, putting her arm around Jessie. “I hope you have room for us here,” she winked.

“I think we can find you a couch somewhere, Muffy,” Kit told her dryly, but he did accept an embrace from her. “Thank you for showing me who my real family is, cousin,” he told her gently.

“The few, the proud, the rebels,” she grinned up at him. “Now, I’m hungry!” she said. “Let’s get something to eat!”

“Stanley,” Vil called. “Start dinner. Nothing fancy.”

“Hamburgers it is,” Stanley said with a smile at Kit. “Salad, fruit, and some wine.”

“Grape juice for me please!” Jessie said. “I feel soooo weird, not cooking!”

“I’ll feel weird not eating your cooking,” Kit chuckled. “Thanks for the scones, love, that was very thoughtful.”

“Well, I’m here now,” she smiled. “I’ll let them cook for us today, but they’ll have to surrender the kitchen to me tomorrow.”

Kit laughed. “I think Carrie may have something to say about that,” Kit told her. “She’s run that kitchen for twenty years. She’s very jealous of her kitchen.”

“Well, I like to cook, so she’s just gonna have to let me have it,” she laughed.

“She’ll banish you to the small kitchen, which is near the servant entrance,” Kit countered.

“I thought this was your house, Kit,” she grinned at him.

“It’s hers,” he countered, pointing at Vil as Bartholomew wheeled her towards the garage. “My only part of this was I’m the one who had the power to evict Zach.”

They all sat in the family dining room, an informal dining room just off the kitchen, and they talked mainly about what had happened. Vil described the crash again in complete detail as Nick quietly caught up with Stav and Marcus, and she showed them her bandaged arm. “The docs said my fur will grow back no problem, and the break on my leg was clean, so all they had to do was cast me up and stitch up my leg.”

“I can’t imagine how scary that would be,” Muffy breathed. “I’d be afraid to get on a chopper ever again!”

“It wasn’t fun, that’s for sure,” she said as two cooks brought in plates filled with hamburgers and a bowl of salad. “But I’m not afraid of choppers, Muffy. The only reason mine crashed is because it had help,” she grunted. “But my boys certainly made all that money I paid to them worth it,” she said, looking back at Stav and Marcus with a smile. “I wouldn’t be here if it wasn’t for them.”

“About time they did something right,” Nick teased with a laugh, accepting a hamburger from the cook with a smile.

“It’s our job, madam,” Marcus said, taking a hamburger with a nod.

“So, you kicked out Uncle Zach, cousin,” Muffy grinned. “How did that feel?”

“Like it was long overdue,” he answered, taking a bite of his hamburger. “After what that bastard did, he will never set foot in this house again.”

“So, you’re staying?”

“I’m staying long enough to fulfill the terms of the agreement so he can never return,” he answered. “I already changed my license to Massachusetts, and I’ll sit here until it’s official that I’ve taken up residency. After that, I’ll go home, and come up every once in a while just to make it plain that he’s not welcome here.”

“How long will that take?” Kendall asked.

“Three months,” Vil answered calmly. “He has to live here for three months to establish residency to satisfy the agreement.

“Three months?” Kit asked.

“Three months,” Vil nodded.

“Well, I wonder if Doctor Mac would make one hell of a house call,” Jessie mused.

“Jess!” Kit gasped. “No! You are not staying here! You are going back home!”

“You’re crazy if you think I’m staying in Texas when you’re here,” she declared. “You are my husband, Kit! I won’t leave you alone, and I won’t be alone! You have to stay here, so I will be here with you!”

“No! You’re insane if you think you’re staying in Boston!”

“And you’re crazy if you think I’ll live without you!”

“Guys, guys! Fight about this later,” Vil told them. “Right now, we have other things to worry about.”

“Your pain pill, madam,” Marcus said, taking a bottle out of his suit jacket. “It’s time.”

“Thank God,” she said, holding her paw out greedily. “Marcus won’t let me have the bottle,” she complained.

“He’s a smart panther,” Kendall said with a smile and a nod at Marcus. “Keeps you from getting too comfortable with the pills.”

“Trust me, that’s not something you want,” Kit said. “A little pain now is much better than four months of wanting another pill. That was almost as bad as the pain.”

“I think I’ll take your word for it, brother,” she said, swallowing the pill, then taking a drink of water. “They said I have to take them with meals.”

“So, now that we’re all here, and they tried to kill my fiancée, what are we going to do about it?” Kendall asked bluntly, then he took a bite of his hamburger.

“Plenty. Next time I see him, I’m gonna kick Uncle Zach in the nuts,” Muffy said savagely, which made Kit explode into laughter.

“I think we find out exactly who did it,” Vil said calmly. “Then we do to them what we did to Cybil.”

“I think I can agree with that plan,” Terry said with a nod. “What’s the word from the FAA?”

“Nothing yet, they just started the investigation,” Vil answered. “They told me it’ll be a couple of weeks before they have any news. Jake is swearing up and down he had no part of it, and I’m almost ready to believe him,” she grunted. “I haven’t heard a peep out of Zach or Maxine. Tom is still too angry with Zach to say much, Sarah’s still sitting on the fence, but Brian...” she trailed off with a slight smile. “Brian is sincerely furious. He was never much inclined to the idea of pushing me out, and he was outraged. That might be useful. He may be the youngest of the elders, but he’s still an elder. In the meantime, I’ll call your Doctor Mac and arrange for her to come up here and give you your exams,” she said, looking to Jessie.

“Absolutely not!” Kit said adamantly. “Are you insane, Vil? Jessie can not stay in Boston!”

“She’s totally safe within Stonebrook, bro,” she said dismissively. “She can have the baby right here, in the same room where you were born,” she said with a smile.

“Oh hell no!” Kit said heatedly. “She needs to be in Austin, where it’s safe!”

“Do you think I’m afraid to be here, Kit?” Jessie flared.

“Jessie, you are pregnant!” he said hotly. “Does this register to you, love? Pregnant cat married to blue-blood fox whose family funded the purist movement?” he asked in a hiss. “Do you have any idea what Zach would do if he found out you’re here? He’d blow a head gasket! You and me represent everything he hates the most! Dear God, I think he’ll die of a stroke if you give birth to Laura in this house!”

“Then let him,” Jessie said calmly. “This has nothing to do with him. This has everything to do with me staying with my husband, and I don’t care what’s trying to get between us. If I have to stay in this house for three months to stay with you, then that's exactly what I'll do. If that means that Laura is born in the house, well, then it just continues the tradition."

Kit laughed cynically. "Tradition? I've broken every tradition there is in this family, pretty kitty. It's not that I don't want you to be here with me, but I don't think it's safe here. Even here. All he has to do is row down here in a boat and get on the grounds. Swan Cove is just a mile upriver, and we have no fence at the boat dock."

"Beggin' your pardon, Kit, but I can secure this place," Nick said calmly. "I'll call in a few mates who wouldn't mind an easy job playin' defense in a swanky manor like this. If you're serious about not leaving this place for three months, I can make it safe as can be. I can turn it into a fortress."

"See? We'll be okay, handsome fox," Jessie told him, putting her paw on his arm. "I will not leave you, Kit. I don't care who's trying to stand between us. I told you before, you are worth it."

"But our baby—"

"Our baby will be safe here," she told him. "If Nick says he can make us safe, then he can make us safe. And it's a big place, love. I can spend three months here. We have cable, and a nice pool, and a gym, and I can catch up on my knitting and maybe learn some new recipes from your cook, and I'll have plenty of time to study for my commercial rating. You do have a skeet shooting range here, right?" she asked Vil with a smile.

"We can build one," she grinned in reply.

"I think we can bring in a trap launcher in the meantime," Nick said. "There's a lot of clear space around for us to set it up."

“Well, love, you can get in some practice,” she smiled at him.

“I think this is crazy,” he protested.

“Look at it this way, brother. Do you want to take every precaution you can and put Jessie in a fortress, or have to scramble to do so when she disobeys you and comes right back up here after you send her home?”

“I will, I swear I will,” she declared.

“Jessie,” he said, his heart in his eyes.

“I told you long ago, handsome fox, I will not let them scare me away,” she declared.

“I appreciate the notion, love, but I think one thing needs brought up. I can’t pay to hire security guards, or do anything else.”

“Kit,” Vil scoffed. “Do you really think we’ll just leave you here? That’s a pretty weak attempt to make Jessie go home.”

“Jessie, I love you, but you can’t stay here,” Kit told her. “You have to go home. You have to go home because I love you.”

“And I’m telling you, I have to stay here, because I love you, Kit,” she told him, gripping his paw. “You can fight about it all you want, but in the end I will be right here at your side, where I belong,” she declared. “You can’t make me stay away from you, and I will not leave you.”

He knew that tone. For right now, arguing about it would be pointless, and he knew it. Jessie could be extremely stubborn, and it seemed that she’d dug her claws in over this matter. They’d fight about it more later, but for now there was no reason to beat a dead horse. Hopefully after a couple of days of being trapped in the manor, she’d get restless and agree to go home.

“We’ll discuss it later,” he acceded.

“We can discuss it all you want, you won’t make me change my mind,” she declared.

“Has anyone actually tried to confront Zach over this yet?” Muffy asked.

“Not that I know of,” Vil answered. “He hasn’t left Swan Cove since yesterday. Maxine, on the other paw, has shuffled between Swan Cove and Oak Hill a few times.”

“Oak Hill?” Jessie asked.

“Maxine’s manor,” Kit answered. “Just about all the elders live in manors that have names. Uncle Jake lives in Still Waters, which is downriver from here.”

“That one was built about ten years after Stonebrook by our great uncle Lance,” Vil noted. “Our grandfather’s only brother.”

“Shame what happened,” Terry sighed.

“What?”

“My great uncle and his whole family died in a plane crash in Nineteen sixty,” Kit answered. “A whole branch of the Vulpan family died.”

“That’s terrible!” Jessie gasped.

“What was worse was the fight over Still Waters after they died,” Vil grunted. “It’s just as grand as Stonebrook, and everyone wanted it. That was when Grandfather set down the rules of conduct for the family, because the family disgraced themselves fighting over the manor. Grandfather claimed the manor, then gave it to Dad. Dad sold it to Jake after Zach started building Swan Cove. It should have gone to Maxine, but Dad wouldn't give it to her. He felt that only a male Vulpan deserved it," she scoffed. "Our wonderful father, a bastard from the day he was born."

"What happened to Maxine?"

"She built Oak Hill," Vil answered. "It's on the south side of Boston. I think she built it down there to get away from the family. Maxine didn't speak to Dad for a couple of years after he gave Still Waters to Jake. Oak Hill is exactly the same as Still Waters, even down to the granite used, it's from the same quarry. She built an exact duplicate. Maxine's own Still Waters."

"After your father was so awful to her, she's siding against you?"
Jessie said in surprise.

"Maxine is all about the family's prestige and reputation," Vil answered. "She'll do anything to keep the Vulpan family on the top rung of the social ladder. Even after how badly Dad screwed her out of what was rightfully hers, she'll struggle against what she sees as the family losing its social status. She sees what I'm doing as hurting the family's reputation, so she'll fight me over it."

"But this," Muffy said. "I never dreamed Aunt Maxine would be party to trying to kill you, cousin!" she said in disbelief.

"From what Jake said, I think this might have come from Zach, and without the knowledge of the other two," Vil said, tapping her chin thoughtfully. "Jake was pretty convincing after the meeting. I'm inclined to believe that he really had no idea of it."

“Then it sounds like we should eliminate Maxine and Jake as possible suspects, and then focus on Zach once they’re cleared,” Kendall said. “Now, how do we go about that?”

“Stav?” Vil asked.

“I’ll see to it,” he said with a nod. “Until my arm heals, I won’t be much use to you except to make phone calls.”

“In the meantime, we turn Stonebrook into a fortress,” Terry said. “Vil’s right about one thing. Zach will go nuclear when he finds out that Jessie is up here and in this house. But that’s his own fault. He should have known that Kit would rush up here.”

“Yes, he would,” Vil said, her eyes narrowing. “Drawing him out of the safety of Austin.”

“Which is another reason to lock down Stonebrook,” Terry said. “Outside of that, there’s still the fact that they’re trying to push Vil out, and we have to fight them.”

“Kit can do his fighting from in here,” Vil said. “He doesn’t take a single foot out of Stonebrook if we can help it. The threat of Kit being able to take everything if they screw up is too much. They’ll try to remove him from the game, because he can stop it all if they make even one mistake. Kit is the king in this chess game, and the piece we have to protect the most.”

“No argument from me,” Kit nodded.

“He can attend board meetings via conference.”

“Vil, I’m not going to be on the board,” he scoffed.

“You’re on the board, and you’re here,” she told him. “And your continued presence sends a message that we’re more than happy to up the ante. Terry will do the same, listening to the board meetings over the phone or whatever we set up. They will see that all they’ve done is united us against them, openly. And we make it open. I’m going to make it clear to the press that we don’t think this was an accident. In the meantime, we continue to fight them, and maybe take the fight to them,” she grunted. “Muffy.”

“Yes, Vil?”

“Call the other cousins and tell them to come back to Boston.”

“What? Why?”

“A show of force,” she answered. “If the cousins want the elders to give them room to live, they have to make it clear. Zach, Jake, and Maxine can ignore the four of us and continue on, but if they suddenly find themselves facing half the kids in open revolt, then they’ll have a lot more to worry about.”

“Why me? If you tell them to come, they’ll do it. You’re the family’s leader.”

“If I do it, the elders will just say I made them come back. If they come back on their own, they make a much bigger statement.” She took another bite of her hamburger. “I’d call Sheila back too, but she has school coming up, and she can’t miss another semester if she wants to open her restaurant soon.”

“Sheila can help just by staying in Austin. Holding down our fort while we’re up here,” Kit noted. “I need to call Rick and have him send me up some work.”

“You’re going to be busy up here,” Vil winked. “You think you’re just gonna sit in here and watch TV? You’re gonna help,” she grinned at him.

“I fully intend to help,” he told her. “But the magazine needs us, Vil. I write articles and do a lot of work there. Jessie writes and works there too. We can’t leave the gang in the lurch. We can do our work from up here, but we still have to do our work. Besides, we’re heavily invested. If we don’t work, the magazine might go under, and we lose our money,” he chuckled.

“Money,” Vil snorted. “If I have my way, you’ll be leaving Boston with a very large piece of the Vulpan fortune.”

“And I’ll just give it back, Vil,” he said calmly. “Just because I’m up here, don’t for a minute think that I want to be a Vulpan again. I’m only here to kick Zach out of Stonebrook and get to the bottom of who tried to kill you, then punish them for it. When this is over, I go back home and back to the only life I want. You’re the one that’ll get the money, not me.”

“Hmph,” she grunted, taking a rather savage bite out of her hamburger.

They discussed it more after dinner, but basically talking in circles over wine and grape juice. They were all going to stay at Stonebrook for the night, so Stanley arranged rooms for them while Kit showed Jessie the one room he’d avoided during the tour, the bedroom. She laughed when she came in, looking around. “They copied our furniture!” she declared, touching the bed. “And it’s a Sleep Number bed, too!”

“Vil took the pictures we gave her of our room and she did this,” he said, sitting on the bed. “Pretty kitty—“

“No! Absolutely not!” she cut him off. “We’re not debating this, love. I will not leave you. They can keep us safe, so I’m staying with you!”

“But we’re going to be all but prisoners here, love. Three months locked inside this manor.”

“I can take it if you can,” she winked, putting her paws on his shoulders. She pushed him down until he was on his back, and she snuggled down atop him, rubbing her nose against his. “Hello there, Mister Vulpan. Whatever are you doing in such a strange place?”

“Trying to send you back home where you belong,” he answered.

“I think you’ll finally manage to convince me...in about three months,” she smiled, then she kissed him and began to purr against his lips. No matter what protests he had, there was no way he could withstand that kind of determined assault. Jessie knew him better than he knew himself, and she was more than capable of getting her own way. “Now,” she breathed in his ear, “I think you need to take a nap. You look very tired.”

“Don’t change the subject,” he warned. She answered him by purring and putting her throat against his as she nuzzled, which made him laugh ruefully even as he wrapped his arms around her. “Such blatant manipulation,” he accused. “I know you’re faking it!”

“Just try and prove it,” she hummed in his ear. “I will not live without you, my love,” she told him. “I couldn’t survive three months apart from you.”

“You’re not safe here.”

“I’m not safe anywhere, handsome fox. If I’m going to be in danger, it’s going to be at your side. Now relax,” she said soothingly, sliding down against him, putting her head on his chest, and her arm over him, “and try to take a nap. You’ll feel better.”

“Jessie,” he said, almost plaintively.

“Shhh,” she sounded, then settled in against him, purring away.

He really was tired. Jessie was the ultimate teddy bear, and her purring just destroyed any attempt his brain made to ruin the moment, to make her stop purring for any reason. All he could do was put his arms around her and close his eyes. And not a minute after he closed his eyes, he was asleep.

Kit and Jessie had never really fought before...until now.

Sure, they’d had a few disagreements over small things, but those things tended to smooth themselves out of their own volition. After all, what they were fighting about wasn’t really important, it wasn’t like they were fighting over money or anything. But in this regard, they had a real fight. Kit just could not in good conscious allow Jessie to stay in Stonebrook, but Jessie absolutely refused to go home. And thus did the fight begin, when Kit told Jessie that he wanted her to go back to Austin.

And they fought. He’d never lay a paw on her, and she would never stripe him, but they shouted at each other, shook fingers in faces, and there was quite a bit of door slamming. Both of them had no inclination to listen to intelligent debate. Kit felt he was doing what was best for both of them, and Jessie felt he was utterly wrong. The moment Kit told her he wanted her to go back to Austin, the shouting began.

The only problem with having a fight in a place like Stonebrook was that nothing in the manor was truly private. The servants heard them shouting at each other when they came to prepare the bedroom for the occupants' going to bed that evening, and if there was one universal truth when it came to a large manor, that was that servants gossiped. What they saw and heard never left the manor, but it flowed freely within the manor, and it didn't stay just with the servants. The three Vulpans staying in the manor quickly heard about the fight, but they had the sense to stay out of it until it was over.

And, as usual...what Jessie wanted, Jessie got.

Kit lost the fight. In the end, after all the shouting, it came down to one simple fact, and that was that he couldn't make her stay in Austin, and her threat to just keep coming up, and coming up, and coming up was a threat that destroyed any argument he made about how insane it was for her to be here. He couldn't make her stay away, and a part of him was overjoyed that she loved him so much that she would be willing to come up here, but he was desperately worried for her and Laura. His wife and unborn child being up here so raised the stakes, because now it wasn't just him.

God, Nick had better turn Stonebrook into a fortress, because the most precious treasures on Earth were here now...his wife and unborn child.

In the end, he ended up in the sun room, sitting in his favorite spot, his tail in his lap and looking out over the front lawn, still feeling a little foolish over the fight. He'd never had a leg to stand on, and all he did was shout at the femme he loved for no real reason. He hadn't made Jessie cry, but he did make her fairly angry, and she said some very choice and unpleasant things to him about not wanting her to be with him. He picked at the fur in his bushy tail absently as the sun lowered enough to shine right into his face, scratching through the three colors in his tail, the red, the white band, and then the black tip; the white-banded Vulpan tail that was as much a signature of the family as the eyes.

The door opened, and Vil stepped in. She hobbled across the sun room on her crutches as he sighed and looked away, back to the window. She awkwardly sat down by his feet and put her crutches on the floor beside her, then leaned back on her paws and looked up at the ceiling. “So,” she hummed lightly.

“Vil,” he sighed.

“Don’t let it eat too much at you, bro,” she told him. “All couples fight sometimes. So, did you win or lose?”

He burst into rueful laughter. “What do you think?”

“That you wouldn’t be up here brooding if you won,” she smiled at him. “Don’t worry about it, bro. I know you won’t believe this, but Jessie means as much to me as she does to you.”

“Yeah, you’re right, I don’t believe it,” he said with a wry smile. “I never knew you had thoughts like that about my wife, sis.”

She laughed, then winced. “Don’t make me laugh, bro, it hurts,” she protested, then she reached down and patted his foot and ankle. “So, the rebel children of Lucas Vulpan are together again,” she mused. “What kind of mischief are we planning for tomorrow?”

“Trying to convince my wife to go home,” he answered, looking out the window. “Then I think I’ll invite Zach over here, shoot him in the head, and bury him out near the autumn cottage.”

“That sounds fun,” she laughed. “We should send it RSVP. Now, since that’s over, mind telling me what your problem is?”

“I don’t want her here, Vil!”

“I know you don’t. I’m not particularly happy with her being here either, but as far as I can see it, she’s safer here than anywhere else. At least here, she’s safe in the fold.”

“The fold,” he said, then he blurted it out. “Will I be taking home the same wife I married, Vil?” he asked. “Three months here, three months to find out what it’s like to be rich. How is it going to change her, sis? Every day, she’ll have maids to clean for her, butlers to wait on her, cooks to make her anything she wants. Will I take home the same femme that came here, Vil? Money changes furs. It’s a curse. Is it going to change my wife? Am I going to go home and hear I wish for the next year every time she does the laundry?”

“That’s a bit unfair, Kit,” Vil told him. “And you know better than that. That femme loves you, she loves you more than I’ve ever seen a femme love a male. You think a few months here is going to change her? Will it change you?”

“Of course not,” he told her. “I left all this, Vil. I know what to expect. Jessie doesn’t. She doesn’t know what it’s like to be waited on paw and foot. She doesn’t know what it’s like to be rich.”

“Do you? Will three months in here being waited on like the king of Siam change you? It’s been a long time since you’ve been rich, bro. Six years. Who’s to say that you don’t get really comfy in here and remember what it is you’ve been missing? I’ll help, of course,” she smiled at him. “I want you and Jessie to get nice and acclimated to the life to which you should be accustomed, because you are a Vulpan.”

“Vil,” he said warningly.

“So, you’ll have me here trying to spoil you rotten,” she grinned. “But you know what I think? I think Jessie is far stronger than you’re giving her credit for. She’s easily as strong as you, and you have the disgusting strength to deny your birthright,” she snorted, which made Kit chuckle in spite of himself. “I think she’ll have fun up here, utterly charm the entire staff the way she charmed the Cessna furs right out of their socks, then go home with your new daughter and settle right back into the life she loves. She’ll see this is as a vacation. A vacation where she gives birth to her daughter, but a vacation nonetheless. And if you don’t believe that, then you don’t really know Jessie as well as you think you do.”

“Knowing and dreading are two different things,” he sighed, leaning the back of his head against the frame. “I don’t want my wife to be corrupted by the curse of money, Vil.”

“I think the only one that can decide if it’s a curse or not is Jessie, Kit,” she answered. “In the meantime, I’ll call Doctor MacNair and arrange a couple of house calls, then have what we’ll need for her to deliver Laura at the house and waiting. You’ll just have watch and see, bro. Jessie just might surprise you.”

“I don’t want her to surprise me,” he said quietly.

“Then she might not surprise you,” she said, patting his foot, then awkwardly getting up onto her crutches. “Now, I’m going to go make a few phone calls. Oh, and by the way, Jessie’s looking for you,” she told him, then she hobbled out and closed the door.

That statement told him that Vil would seek Jessie out and tell her where he was. He could move to some other spot and potentially make her mad, just sit there and wait for her to show up, or seek her out himself. He leaned his head back and closed his eyes, and a different option forced itself upon him...he fell asleep.

“Kit,” a soft voice called, stirring him from his nap. “Wake up, handsome fox.”

He looked up to see Jessie leaning over him, or at least as much as her pregnancy would allow.

“Are you alright, love?” she asked, sitting down on the padded sill beside him.

“I...yeah, I guess. Are you still mad?”

“A little,” she admitted. “I talked to Vil.”

“And of course, she won’t keep her mouth shut,” he sighed.

She giggled. “You’re being silly, my handsome fox,” she told him.

“No, I don’t want to lose you, pretty kitty,” he said, taking her paw. “And I can lose you to this just as easily as everything else.” He motioned towards the window and the huge lawn outside. “What would you have said if I came out and said that one of the reasons I don’t want you here is so you don’t get used to being rich?”

“I’d say you were being ridiculous,” she answered. “Because we’re not rich, Kit. We have, what, about ten thousand dollars in the bank?”

“We have about a hundred thousand if you include our T bills and other investments.”

“Well, there you go. How can I get used to being rich when we’re not?”

“Because of this house,” he answered. “Where you’ll be treated like a queen. Money corrupts, Jessie. Half the reason I don’t want it is so I don’t get corrupted. I don’t even trust myself with the idea of being rich, for fear I’ll turn into my father. What we have is perfect, love, and I guess I don’t want to risk losing it.”

“I promise you, handsome fox, that you’re not going to lose me to a house,” she declared. “Now, Stanley on the other paw,” she noted, which made Kit look at her wildly. She just grinned and winked at him, and he burst into helpless laughter and pulled her into an embrace.

“I do love the boy foxes,” she purred, and her purring continued as she wrapped her arms around him, her paws dropping low and sliding under his shirt to seek out the scars on his back. “But I especially love the ones with only half a left ear and those darling white lines on his back for me to play with.”

“Well, what do you know, I think I meet your requirements,” he told her, holding her tightly. “I’m sorry I yelled at you, love, but I just hate the idea of you being here.”

“I love you too much to stay away for three months, Kit. And if you think I’ll give birth to Laura without you with us, you’re crazy.”

“I’m going to be terrified every minute,” he complained.

“And I’ll love you for it,” she replied gently. “But this is where I belong, my handsome fox. Not in this house, but by your side. I will never leave you.”

“I love you, Jessie,” he proclaimed, hugging her tightly.

“And I love you, Kit,” she answered, digging her claws into his back, almost painfully.

Jessie wasted no time claiming Stonebrook as her own...but certainly not as a Vulpan.

She proved to Kit after just one day that his fear was an irrational one, more a reflection of a fear in himself than one he held for his wife. For one, when they woke up that morning, Jessie made the bed. Then she quite happily rearranged the drawers of the dressers to mirror the arrangement they had at home, having to include some of their clothes that had arrived over the night, thanks to Nick. Nick had returned home to Austin, packed up his things, had Lupe watch over his apartment and gave him the keys to his Expedition, then he came back up also with a couple of boxes of things that Jessie wanted. Jessie’s commercial pilot materials, her knitting bag and books, and a couple of her favorite cookbooks came up with her clothes and their shotguns, and she was quite happy to settle them into the bedroom to make it feel more like home. Once she finished that, she stayed in the bedroom most of the morning, curled up on the couch with the stereo playing that annoying tweenie pop music she liked, her knitting bag beside her and one of her books open on the sofa, as she read up on how to make a new kind of sweater.

When the maid came in to make the bed and tidy up, she almost sulked to find out that Jessie had already done it all. She didn’t get out of the room without talking to Jessie first, though, which Kit heard about from the manor’s rumor mill. Jessie had made the maid, one of the younger ones that Kit didn't know very well named Luann, help her set up her rings to start the sweater, and had quite effectively charmed the vixen into chattering away with her like they were old friends.

Kit had left her in the bedroom, to her own devices, because Vil was quite serious about him being involved in the operations of the board. He certainly didn't want to do it, but she was quite insistent. So, in his father's old office, Kit listened on a phone as the board discussed some matter involving transportation fees for steel to ship it from mills in Pennsylvania to the main yards in New Hampshire and Norfolk. Kit spent most of his time listening for the voice of his uncle Jake, but Jake never said a word until they voted to commission a cost benefit analysis to change their shipping procedures.

After the board meeting, Vil went home early, and called him from Hart's Crossing. Kendall was making himself at home, moving both into the house and into her bedroom, which was exactly what Vil wanted. Vil had had a taste of living with Kendall and she liked it, so Vil being Vil, she made sure to get what she wanted. She wanted Kendall in her house, right now, and that was exactly what she got, despite the fact that it was already a headline on every Boston tabloid that Vil had moved her fiancée into her house before the marriage. Kendall's things had already started arriving from England in discrete shipments, but he wouldn't be bringing a whole lot. He was the one moving into Vil's house, so all he really wanted to bring were clothes and some personal effects and knick-knacks to introduce a sense of his own style into Vil's home.

Kit moved from pretending to be some member of the board to doing his own work at his own company. Kit had arranged it with Rick to be sent projects, but Rick also demanded that he write a series of articles, complete with pictures, about the history of Stonebrook, some of its architecture and décor, and the things that had happened in the house. Rick wanted him to more or less write a biography about the Vulpan family using the house as a central theme, talking about the males and females that had walked the halls of Stonebrook, as well as those who had labored to build it and worked even today to maintain it. That, Kit didn't mind, for some of the servants were far more interesting than the Vulpans they served.

After lunch, Jessie almost got herself in trouble, for she invaded the kitchen. The three cooks, Carrie, Francis, and Henri, were not used to anyone meddling with their kitchen, and Jessie got a little bit of what she dished out to Kit after they moved into the new house. Their hackles weren't up long, though, for the two foxes and the French wolf found Jessie to be sincerely curious about their kitchen and some of their recipes, and from there she learned that the kitchen didn't cook just for the Vulpans, but for everyone. The Vulpans' meals were prepared in the main kitchen, while there was a smaller servants' kitchen for anyone to use that was near the servant entrance in the back of the house. Most of the servant apartments on the first floor had their own kitchens, but sometimes a servant would use the main kitchen for something particularly large or challenging, or required the special appliances they kept in the main kitchen...which had everything. Kit came into the kitchen to scrounge up something to eat and found Jessie standing right in the middle of the chefs, an apron around her expanded belly and laughing as she kneaded a bowl full of what looked like bread dough.

“Henri is teaching me how to make French bread from scratch!” she told him with an excited grin.

“I think I have already taught you, madam,” Henri said in his slight French accent. “You have made that dough yourself, with no help from me!”

“Thank goodness my oven at home is big enough to bake a whole loaf,” she said in relief.

Kit went back to his work, finishing a small research project and then starting on the last of the main research projects for the election special, which was the historical nature of the election itself. It was historic in that an African-American mixed breed was a nominee, it was historic in the fact that the Republican nominee was the oldest nominee for first time, it was historic in the amount of money spent, and it was historic in that, if the rumors were true, McCain was going to select a femme to be his running mate...so, if that did in fact happen, they were guaranteed either a mixed breed or a femme in the executive, and both were firsts. Pat was finishing up the convention work, and he'd also done the work on the Electoral College, but Kit was going to do this work and leave Pat available to do the day to day research the writers needed, since he was there and could more easily talk to them. They were going to do two articles for each side, the first pointing out the historic nature of the election concerning that candidate, and then a second that would exhaustively go over the platform and beliefs of the candidate so the readers would have a better idea of where they stood on the issues.

When it was about time for dinner, Kit returned to the kitchen to find Jessie right there with the cooks, teaching them some of Kit's favorite recipes as she shook a dab of spice into a pan holding her special homemade spaghetti sauce. And what was probably more surprising, Muffy was standing nearby watching. Where Vil and Terry had left the manor to go home and go back to New Orleans, Muffy had stayed over. She'd woken up around noon, went swimming, worked out in the gym, then she'd vanished for a while, but now she'd resurfaced in the kitchen, gabbing away happily with Jessie. It wasn't surprising that she'd vanished, since Stonebrook was a very large place and it was very easy to vanish from sight in a place so big, and Kit figured she'd gone home. "I thought you went home, cousin," Kit said as he came in.

"Nah, I took a nap," she answered. "Jessie's gonna teach me how to shoot skeet after dinner!"

"I will if I can," she answered. "Nick said he was going to track down a portable trap launcher and set it up out where we won't accidentally shoot anything. He brought our shotguns, love," she told Kit with a smile. "You can get in more practice!"

"Where is Nick anyway?"

"Well, he finished his inspection of the grounds, then he made a few phone calls and disappeared," Jessie answered. "He came into the kitchen right after lunch to tell me he was going out. He promised to look into a trap launcher while he was out."

"I guess that works. Spaghetti?"

"Mmm-hmm," she answered.

"I'm amazed they're letting you cook."

"She said she would cook for you, Master Kit, and we would cook for your guests," Carrie said, a touch annoyed.

“I said I’d cook so you could learn Kit’s favorite recipes,” Jessie said. “But you owe me recipes in return! I want to go home with a bigger cookbook!”

Carrie actually laughed. “We could let you copy some of our recipes,” Carrie mused, looking at Henri. “But not the secret ones.”

“Oui, there are special Stonebrook recipes we keep top secret,” the wolf agreed, smiling at Francis. “Recipes only the three of us know.”

“Well, we could train her to be a real chef,” Francis speculated. “She’s not that bad.”

Jessie laughed. “God, Sheila will kill me when she hears that you’ve been teaching me recipes!”

“We are very surprised Miss Sheila has such an interest in cooking,” Henri said.

“Interest? It’s almost an obsession,” Jessie laughed. “She owns nearly an entire bookshelf full of cookbooks, from pastries to barbecue, and just about every tradition. She even has a cookbook on Turkish recipes,” she said. “She just needs to be taught how to use those cookbooks the right way, and I think she’ll be a good chef. She certainly has the desire.”

“Sheila found her dream,” Muffy giggled. “She has her restaurant, I have my nightclub! Maybe we should open them side by side here in Boston,” she mused. “We could even connect them together! Fine dining, then a night of fun!”

“Why settle with just one?” Jessie asked her. “Build one here in Boston, then another someplace where it’s warm, like in Florida. That way you get the summer and the winter crowds.”

“I think just one will do to start out,” Muffy smiled. “Once I get the hang of running a business, then maybe I’ll think about building another one.”

“Well, you’ll have name recognition, cousin,” Kit told her. “I think you’d get a lot of business because everyone will want to come to the nightclub run by a Vulpan. After all, the whole city knows how Vulpans love to party.”

“So true,” she laughed in agreement.

They had a very un-Vulpan dinner of spaghetti, homemade Italian garlic bread, and salad in the kitchen, at the bay table, and what shocked the cooks even more was that Jessie had them join them. They looked very uncomfortable sitting with two Vulpans and a Vulpan by marriage, so they ate in silence and listened as Jessie and Muffy chattered away happily, talking about nothing in particular. Muffy liked his wife a great deal, and it was no surprise that she hadn’t left the manor yet. But Muffy was still a Vulpan in her behavior. She made the cooks get her everything she wanted, even had Francis spoon spaghetti onto her plate for her, and demanded fine wine from the cellar with her spaghetti. Jessie tolerated her behavior as understanding that Muffy felt like it was proper behavior here in Stonebrook.

Dinner broke up, and irked Muffy a bit, because Jessie gently chided her about not putting her plate in the sink. “That’s what the servants do!” she protested.

“I think it won’t kill you to carry your plate to the sink once in your life, Muffy,” Jessie grinned at her. “I’ll take you out and show you my shotgun if you do.”

“Okay!” she said immediately, jumping up with her plate in her paw.

Kit could only chuckle. What was it about the Williams clan that tamed the Vulpans?

Jessie took Muffy out to a far corner of the manicured lawn in an area she had Stanley proclaim as safe, out where the archery target used to be set up; archery was one of Dad’s hobbies. Stanley warned everyone to stay clear of that area as Jessie taught Muffy about safe gun usage, not even letting her hold it while empty until she fully understood the dangers involved. Kit didn’t go with them, for Vil called him to tell him about what had happened that day. Kit was up in the bedroom when she called, looking over the huge video library his father had amassed, some thousand or more DVD’s, which were all arrayed in neat shelves in the smaller closet, which had become a media storage room. There were no new movies in that collection, but hundreds and hundreds of older ones. “So, Zach finally came out of his hiding place?” he asked.

“Yup, he went to Oak Hill earlier today,” she answered. “From what I heard, Alicia is utterly pissed off that Zach gave up Stonebrook without a fight. That reminds me, what happened to all their stuff?”

“It’s boxed up in the pool house,” he answered. “I’m going to have Stanley get it out of here tomorrow.”

“Well, that’ll just pour salt all over Alicia’s wounds,” Vil said with an evil chuckle. “And, as expected, he knows Jessie is up here now, and he’s predictably pissed. But, the main thing is, I’ve invited all three of them to have little talk with me tomorrow.”

“Why?”

“To capitalize on their chagrin,” she answered. “Their plot to kill me failed, and they have to know that I’m pretty annoyed with them right now. I’m going to make it common knowledge, as well as your determination to hold Stonebrook. I might be able to wrestle a concession out of them,” she chuckled.

“What is that?”

“The one thing Zach does not want, no matter what, is for your daughter to be born in that house, bro,” she told him. “And you made it clear that you’re pretty pissed off and you have no intention of leaving Stonebrook until you’ve established your residency. And neither of us are too happy with Jessie being up here, because I don’t want her to see how nasty we get. So, I’ll offer Zach a deal. He signs away his stake in Stonebrook and agrees never to set foot on the grounds again, and in return you and Jessie will pack up and go back to Austin. He might jump on it, because he doesn’t relish the idea of you being up here either. Despite everything, Zach has to admit that you’ve gotta be tough and smart if you survived everything Dad threw at you, and he might not feel very safe with you only three miles away. And he certainly doesn’t want both of us up here together. So, he very well might go for it to get you out of the house and out of Boston.”

“I seriously doubt that, sis,” Kit said. “He won’t give up his claim on Stonebrook because he can’t pretend to be the head of the family from Swan Cove. If he relinquishes Stonebrook, he’s all but admitting the fact that he’s given up, and we win.”

“Possible, but I’m gonna offer him anyway. I want the idea of it floating out there.”

“Eh, I’d rather take a boat up to his manor and shoot him.”

She giggled. “I share that sentiment,” she said impishly. “Is Jessie becoming a debutante?”

Kit chuckled ruefully. “Last I saw, she was taking Muffy down to teach her how to shoot a shotgun. And no, she’s not becoming a debutante. She cooked dinner.”

“Wow, and Carrie didn’t try to shave the fur off her tail?”

“She gave her a few dirty looks,” Kit chuckled. “Jessie’s just being her usual sweet, charming self.”

“I told you not to worry.”

“We’ll see if that holds in a month,” he grunted. “After she gets used to the idea that they’ll cook and clean for her.”

“I’m telling you, bro, stop worrying,” she told him, a bit sternly.

“Meh. How’s your leg feeling?”

“It doesn’t hurt as much today as yesterday,” she answered. “But it still throbs all the time. I have an appointment with the doctor tomorrow morning. They’re going to inspect my leg and change the bandage on my arm. God it itches,” she complained. “They said it’s because my fur is growing back. They shaved my arm, from the elbow to the wrist!” she complained. “They even shaved off the unburned fur!”

“They needed to clear the fur out from under the bandage,” he told her. “And they didn’t want your fur matting into the burn.”

“It’s not even that bad!” she complained.

“Let them be the judge of that.”

“I’ll buy the hospital and fire the lot of them if they shaved my fur off for no good reason,” she fumed.

Kit chuckled. “How was your first night living with Kendall?”

“Almost insufferable,” she growled. “He wants to baby me. Between him, Stav and Marcus, and my servants, I can’t even settle into a chair without five pillows being shoved in my face, but he’s the worst of the lot. He’s almost as bad as Jessie was when you were hurt!”

“Well, that just proves he loves you,” Kit told her.

“That or his father will kill him if he goes home unmarried,” she said darkly. “It’s all about self preservation for him.”

“Just put him in bed, grab hold of him, and make him hold still until he falls asleep. That’s one of Jessie’s favorite tactics against me.”

“If I do that, I’ll be doing something that my doctors told me not to do,” she said with a wicked little tilt to her voice. “I could barely keep my paws off him last night.”

“Don’t,” Kit told her. “I’m sure you can find some way to keep your leg immobilized. Maybe strap it down, or maybe you can just keep that leg up in the air or something.”

There was an embarrassed silence from the phone that made Kit smirk. “Don’t start with me, young male,” she finally said. “I’m practically your mother!”

“Then stop saying things like that in the first place,” he teased in reply. “You forget, I’m a married male, sis. I have experience.”

“What Vulpan doesn’t?” she laughed in reply. “Except maybe your wife,” she teased.

“I’ve corrupted her in that regard,” he said dryly. “I may be the only partner she’s ever had, but she’s very...daring in bed.”

“Oh, do tell,” Vil said with amusement.

“I’ll leave that up to your imagination, sis, and you won’t be far from the mark,” he drawled, which made her laugh. “When are you coming over again?”

“Probably tomorrow night.” She was quiet a moment. “So, how is Stonebrook?”

“The same as it was yesterday, sis.”

“No, bro. How is it?”

He was quiet a moment. “I still don’t feel comfortable here, sis,” he answered. “I don’t think I ever will. I feel like an invader, and I almost feel like that bastard is watching me from the walls. Jessie made me show her everything there is in the manor, and for a little while it felt...I don’t know, fun to be here, showing her the secret rooms and the vault and such. But when she’s not here, this place presses in on me like I’m under a thousand blankets.”

“You showed her the secret rooms?”

“Yeah, all of them.”

“Even the vault?”

“Especially the vault,” he retorted. “I don’t feel that bad in the master bedroom since I guess you had them decorate it to resemble our room back home, but I just don't feel...happy here."

"Just give it time, bro. That feeling will fade over time."

"I dunno. I don't think so."

The door opened, and Stanley looked in. "Master Kit, Miss Bess is at the front gate and wants to come in."

"Bess?" he said in surprise. "My cousin Bess?"

"Yes, Master Kit," he nodded. "She's at the front gate and wants to come in."

"Why?"

"To talk to you."

"Huh," he grunted. "Vil, Stanley says that Bess is here, and she wants to talk to me. Did you know about it?"

"No, but maybe Muffy got in touch with her," she answered. "Invite her in, bro, and see what she has to say."

"Is she here alone, Stanley?"

"Yes, Master Kit. She's in her personal car."

"Alright, let her in. I'm coming down."

Bess. Why would Bess be here? She was one of the most notorious Vulpans in Boston, the leader of the Party Pack. She was 25 years old, the oldest child of Uncle Tom, and ever since she graduated from Weston, with surprisingly good marks at that, not legacy grades, she'd descended into a frenzy of hedonism. There wasn't a drug Bess wouldn't try, or a male she wouldn't lay, and her entire life revolved around the next party she planned to attend. Bess' outrageous behavior had been a staple in the Boston and even the national tabloids, on par with Paris Hilton and Britney Spears, and had often been the nexus of very angry fights within the family. The other elders had ridden Tom for years to do something about Bess, but Tom was reluctant to do so. Kit felt that ever since they'd discovered the truth about Dahlia's behavioral problems, that Dahlia was schizophrenic and manic depressive, Tom was afraid that Bess too was suffering from some kind of mental condition that she covered up with sex, drugs, booze. Tom would rather have a daughter that was intentionally broken than another daughter that had mental problems. But why was she here? Had Muffy got in touch with her and told her to come back to Boston? If so, why did she come here? He guessed he'd find out, but he wondered at it as he jogged down the servant stairs near the master bedroom, that put him in a side corridor that would take him to the main hallway that led to the garage.

Bess was...harmless, as things went. She was old enough to understand what happened to him when he was hit by the car, but Bess was Bess. If she was sober enough to comprehend what happened, it would have been a miracle.

He went out into the courtyard just as she pulled up. She was driving a 2002 Porsche, a surprisingly old car, but from the sound of it, it was well maintained. She looked at him through the windshield, her eyes wide, then she got out. Bess was like Vil, a bit petite and thin, a slender little vixen whose ability to drink was legendary in Boston. Bess could drink absolutely anyone under the table. Bess had a slightly shorter muzzle and long auburn hair she kept tied back in a pony tail, and she didn't look quite herself. She was almost always dressed to a tee and with her hair done and claws manicured, but this Bess almost looked...normal. She had her hair tied back in a simple tail, and was wearing a very expensive sleeveless yellow silk blouse with a pair of designer blue jeans. “God, when did you get so tall, Luke?” she asked in surprise.

“You haven’t seen me since I was fifteen, Bess, and don’t call me Luke,” he answered. “My name is Kit.”

“I’m never going to remember that,” she said seriously. “May I come in?”

“As soon as you answer me one question. Where the hell were you, cousin?” he asked harshly. “I needed you, and you weren’t there! Nobody was there!”

“Where was I? The same place I am every day, cousin, trying to forget I’m in this family,” she answered seriously. “Now let’s go inside. I need a drink,” she complained, rubbing her muzzle.

He didn’t take her far. There was a small entertainment room near the garage mainly where one could wait for a limo to be brought around, but it doubled as a TV room. “Bring me something to drink,” Bess ordered of Stanley as he approached. “Wine, whiskey, I don’t care. Just make sure it has alcohol in it.”

“Go ahead. Bring me some tea, too, please.”

“At once, Master Kit,” Stanley replied with a short bow, then he scurried off.

Bess sat on the couch, and Kit sat on the other side of it, and they turned towards each other. “Uncle Zach is out of control,” she said. “He called me yesterday and made some really ugly threats if I didn’t openly support him taking over for Vil. He threatened to get me evicted, take my car, make sure that no club in Boston would let me in, and said the next time I get pulled over, he'll make sure I get arrested and convicted of drunk driving and go to jail," she said, bristling slightly. "I've always tried to just stay the hell away from the family, kinda like you, Luke. The only family I really see often are my brothers and sister and Mary. But this is really just totally unfair," she fumed. "Us girls aren't allowed to have any say in the family, and now he wants us to try to pressure Vil to leave?"

That one sentence actually told Kit a great deal about Bess, since he didn't know her that well. Sheila had some similar attitudes, that since she was a femme why should she even care, since her voice meant almost nothing in the family. A lot of Sheila's partying was because she had nothing else to do, but some of it was because she felt as if no matter what she did, she'd never get any respect in the family...so why bother? It seemed that Bess shared a similar outlook, but unlike Sheila, Bess had never let go of her bitterness, so she drank away the pain. There was also that she was a member of Tom's family, and Tom's family had been the black sheep of the Vulpan clan until Kit rebelled against his father. Bess herself had been a part of that when she was growing up, since Tom's oddness started it, her wildness had perpetuated it, and Dahlia had cemented it. Bess had been as much a hellion as a child as she was an adult, but despite that, she'd gotten good grades, hinting that Bess was smarter than the family thought.

"What do you expect, Bess?" Kit asked. "One way he can exercise his control over the family is to make you do what he wants."

"But it's not fair!" she almost whined. "Why are they dragging me into this?"

“Because they can, I imagine,” he answered. “What you have to decide is what you want to do.”

“I want them to leave me alone,” she retorted. “I want to be left alone and go back to my own life.”

“Good luck with that,” Kit grunted. “That’s what I’ve been trying to do since I was sixteen, and where am I now? Back here. This family is a damn black hole. Nobody can get out.”

“I’ll agree to that much,” she said, and then her eyes brightened when the door opened and Stanley brought in a cup of tea and a glass of wine. She downed almost half of it with one swallow, then smiled in satisfaction. “Much better,” she sighed, leaning back and swirling the wine in the glass as Kit took a sip of tea. “So, what’s it like, cousin? Being married to a cat.”

“You’re treading on dangerous ground, Bess,” Kit warned in a dark tone. “I’ll boot your tail out of here so fast your fur will be left behind if you make even one comment about my wife.”

“Did you hear me insult you? I just asked what it was like,” she said. “I’d never marry anything but a fox myself, but I’ve had quite a few lovers who weren’t foxes. I was just wondering what it was like living with a cat.”

“The same as if she was a fox,” he answered. “But that’s beside the point. What you have to ask yourself is what you want the rest of your life to be like. Do you want to live the rest of your life under Uncle Zach’s foot, or live the rest of your life with Vil, who’ll just demand you keep the outrage restricted to private clubs?”

“I don’t want to take sides,” she said. “I just want to be left alone!”

“I don’t think that’s going to happen now, cousin,” he told her seriously. “Think about it. They tried to kill Vil. Do you think they’re going to let someone just stand on the sidelines right now? I rather doubt it.”

“Do you really think they did it?”

“I can’t say for absolute certain, but that’s just way too much of a coincidence to be a coincidence,” he said. “Vil’s chopper crashes just days after she suspends Zach from the company and starts getting rid of the yes-furs the elders had on the board? I’m convinced someone tried to kill her, cousin. That’s why I’m up here. I think Zach did it, so I’m here to push Zach out of Stonebrook. I’ll stay here until he can’t come back, no matter how long it takes. He will never set foot in Stonebrook again.”

“I don’t want to get involved in this, Luke!” she told him. “No matter what I do, it’s going to be the wrong choice, and someone is going to punish me! It’s not fair! If I do what Uncle Zach wants, Vil will skin me and hang my hide on her wall. If I don’t, Zach will make my life hell! It’s just not fair! I don’t have anything to do with anything! Why can’t they leave me alone? Why?”

“Why didn’t my father leave me alone after I left?” he asked bluntly. “You’re dealing with furs that don’t take no for an answer, Bess, on either side. You’re gonna have to pick a side and deal with the consequences.”

“Every time I pick a side, I get screwed,” she complained. “What should I do, Luke?”

“For one, stop calling me that,” he said. “Don’t call me by my father’s name.”

“I can’t help it,” she told him. “You were always Luke to me. Besides, they called your father Lucas, not Luke.”

“Well, get used to it,” he told her. “My name is Kit. Say it, Bess. Say my name.”

She laughed ruefully. “Kit,” she obeyed.

“Second, I’m not the one you should ask, because I’m obviously biased,” he continued. “I’m supporting Vil. Not because she’s my sister, but because she’s the only member of this family that has ever been on my side. I can’t just walk away from that commitment and not support her when she needs me.”

“God, I remember that,” she sighed, taking another sip of wine. “When your father warned that anyone that tried to see you would get disowned, I think I spent three straight days drunk out of my mind. I think that’s when I knew that this family had gone to hell. I was actually happy when your father died,” she admitted.

“You’re not the only one,” Kit agreed, taking another sip of tea. “I thought I was finally free of the family after he died...but noooooo,” he sighed. “They interfered with my life as soon as I settled down.”

“You were going out with a cat, cousin,” Bess told him. “It’s no wonder.”

“Yeah, well, I married her too,” he declared.

“Whatever makes you happy, cousin,” she shrugged. “I wouldn’t do it, but if it makes you happy, who am I to argue?”

“That’s another reason why I’m up here,” he said. “If Zach is running this family, you know he will never give me and Jessie a second’s peace. I’m up here fighting for my marriage as much anything else. If he takes control, he’ll start doing to me what dear old Dad did, ruining my life until I do what he wants.” He took another sip of tea. “That’s the fate waiting for all of us if he takes control, Bess. That’s why you’d better pick a side, because if he’s running things, he won’t leave you alone. He’ll make you marry some blue-blood and settle down.”

“Why would he? I made sure that no respectable male would want me,” she said, giving him a steady look.

Kit chuckled. “So, there was a method to your madness.”

“Damn right,” she nodded. “Do you think any male in New England will want to marry Bess Vulpan?”

“Actually, quite a few,” Kit told her. “Just for the tie to the family. But he’d never love you, and you’d probably never love him. And I’m sure Zach would find some male who could keep you under control.”

“Hmph,” she snorted, finishing her wine. “They forget, the money’s in my name, and I’m not dumb enough to open joint accounts without one hell of a prenup. What can my husband do? Use harsh language?”

“That or the unpadded side of his paw,” he answered.

“Oh, hell no would I let any male lay a paw on me!” she declared hotly.

“Mmm-hmm. I’m sure Maxine used to say that too,” he said, taking another sip of tea.

She blew out her breath. “It’s just not fucking fair!” she said, slamming her empty glass on the table, and almost breaking it. “What am I supposed to do? I’m damned if I do and damned if I don’t!”

“Well, you can always go with the third option,” he said.

“What is that?”

“Tell Zach to go to hell, then get out of Boston so he can’t retaliate.”

“There’s nowhere I can go to stop that!” she protested.

“I don’t think Zach can reach far into England, Bess,” he said. “Matty’s already over there, hiding out with her kids. You could always ask her if you can come visit.”

“Matty doesn’t like me, Luke. Kit,” she said before he could say something.

“Well...I guess there’s always Austin,” he said, with honest reluctance. “Vil controls Austin, and Zach can’t do much of anything there. Sheila’s already there, so she could show you around, help you get settled in.”

“Austin? Why would I want to live in Austin?”

“Would you rather live under Zach’s foot?” he asked pointedly. “It’s a huge college town, so there’s plenty of clubs and things for you to do, and as long as you’re there, Zach can’t touch you. I guess I could let you hide out down there, if you support Vil.”

She gave him a suspicious look. “What do you mean, if I support Vil?”

“Austin is my home, Bess,” he told her calmly. “Sheila’s only there because I allow it. I actually kinda like Sheila, she’s a lot of fun, but if you tell her that I’ll strangle you. But, if you want my protection, it’s gonna cost ya in the form of rejecting Uncle Zach and supporting Vil openly.” He took another sip of tea. “And I think you’re not far from that already. You don’t want Zach to be in charge, and trying to run your life, do you?”

“No!”

“Then what’s so hard about it? Just pack up your stuff and move to Austin, flipping off Zach every step of the way. Let him just try to get revenge on you when you’re in the one place in this country where he has absolutely no influence or control. Once Vil has control of the family again, move back.”

She leaned back on the couch, pondering his words. “You’re absolutely sure he can’t do anything to me?”

“He never managed to do anything to me. And he tried to go after Terry’s girlfriend, but he didn’t get far at all. Vil owns Austin, cousin.”

“Is she really a prostitute?” she asked in a nearly conspiratorial voice.

“She used to be,” he said honestly. “She’s very beautiful, and she came from a broken home, so she realized she could make a lot of money doing it. She worked in a sex club basically to work her way through college, but she saved up so much money she didn’t really need college to make it. She finished college anyway because she likes what she was taking in school, and now she’s just having fun taking flying lessons while she decides whether or not she’s going to work...and she could do it easily. There’s a demand for chemists with Master’s degrees. She’s not rich, but she never has to work a day in her life if she doesn’t want to, even if she stops seeing Terry.”

“Huh. All I ever hear about her is that she’s a slut gold-digger trying to bilk Terry out of his money.”

“Allison has her own money,” Kit said simply. “She’s not dating Terry because he’s rich. She’s dating him because he wouldn’t stop chasing her. And watch what you say about her, because both me and Sheila are her friends. She’s not in any way what the elders are saying she is.”

The door opened, and both Muffy and Jessie were outside the door, Jessie holding her skeet shooting shotgun. “Bess!” Muffy said with a smile. “I thought that was your car in the courtyard!”

“Muffy!” she said with a smile, standing up and accepting a hug from the taller vixen. “How’s my favorite streaker?”

Muffy laughed. “Reformed,” she grinned. “Oh! Bess, this is Jessie, Kit’s wife. Jessie, this is Bess Vulpan. Revered leader of the Party Pack!” she said with a giggle.

“I don’t know about revered,” Bess laughed, offering her paw to Jessie. “It’s nice to meet you, Jessie.”

“You too,” she said, just a touch defensively. Jessie knew better than to accept a Vulpan’s friendship at its face. Kit had taught her well in that regard.

“What are you doing here, Bess? You know that Uncle Zach is gonna be pissed that you came here.”

“He’s why I’m here,” she answered. “He threatened to ruin my life if I don’t support him against Vil!”

“He didn’t!” Muffy gasped.

“Oh yes he did!” she answered. “But Kit made an offer.”

“What’s that?”

“Hide in Austin, where he can’t touch me,” she answered. “I don’t want to get involved in this, but if I don’t do something, Uncle Zach will come after me!”

“So, since he proved he’s a dick, don’t support him,” Muffy giggled. “Be on the winning side!”

“You’re taking sides, cousin?”

“Where am I right now, Bess?” she asked simply. “I’d be here anyway. I adore Jessie, and I can’t very well let her be up here by herself! She needs a girl with her. Males just don’t understand,” Muffy grinned at Kit. “She’s trapped inside the manor until they go home, so I’m gonna be here all the way up until school starts to keep her company!”

“And just who said you’re staying here, Muffy?”

“Why Kit, would you leave your wife with no company at all?” Muffy grinned at him.

“What am I, raw lobster?” he protested.

“You’re a boy,” she said dismissively. “Besides, I’ve taken sides. Do you think I’m safe out there? Uncle Zach would skin me alive if he could get his paws on me. I’m staying in here, where it’s safe.”

“I could stay here,” Bess said hopefully.

“No,” Kit said adamantly. “I’ll trust Muffy up to a point because she was one of the few who went out of her way to make contact with me. She came down to my wedding. I’ll trust her way more than I’ll trust the rest of the family. If you want our protection, Bess, then you should look at taking a little vacation in Austin.”

“But I don’t want to leave,” she almost whined. “This is my home! I don’t know what I’d do if I lived somewhere else!”

“Well, then you’d better decide what you’re going to do, because if you’re staying up here, someone is going to make you pay for your decision.”

“This is so unfair!”

“Welcome to the real world, Bess,” Kit told her, and not very compassionately. “The simple fact of the matter is that they’re not going to let you just ride the fence on this one. You have to decide who you want running the family, Zach or Vil. Both choices have consequences. If you choose Zach, he runs your life until he dies. If you choose Vil, Zach might retaliate. What you want to do is up to you.”

“Why don’t you talk to Vil, cousin?” Muffy asked. “It won’t hurt, and maybe she’ll have a different idea.”

“I don’t know,” she said, actually wringing her paws.

“Look at it this way, Bess. What can it hurt?” Jessie asked in a gentle voice. “You’ve heard what your uncle has to offer you, from the sound of it. See what Vil has to offer you. And then, once you know what each side has to offer, make a choice.”

“You make it sound like I’m buying a new purse,” she laughed mockingly.

“No, you’re choosing who’s going to run your life for the next thirty or forty years,” Kit told her. “Find out what Vil intends to do, then decide where you want to stand. And there’s always Austin,” he reminded her.

“Sure, why not?” Jessie asked. “It’s a big city and there’s plenty to do, and Sheila is there to keep you company,” she urged.

“I don’t know,” she said nervously.

“Then go find out,” Kit told her. “Vil is at home. Go see her.”

“I...I guess,” she said. “But you promise to let me go to Austin if I decide to?”

“As long as you don’t cause any trouble,” he warned. “Unlike Boston, I actually have a good reputation in Austin, and I don’t want you to ruin it. If you go down there, you keep the debauchery to a minimum. Sheila can show you where you can go have fun without attracting attention.”

“Attention is the last thing I want right now,” she said with a morose expression. “I guess I’ll go talk to Vil,” she said. “Thanks for the wine, and your time, cousin.”

“I’m always here to listen,” he told her.

She actually hugged him. “I’m glad you’re home, Luke,” she said quietly to him.

“I don’t think you’re entirely happy I’m here,” he chuckled ruefully as he patted her on the back.

“You don’t understand,” she said. “We know you know what to do. You lived by yourself for six years! You know what’s going on, and you know how to make it, how to deal with these things,” she declared. “So who better to come to ask for advice but someone who knows?”

“I don’t know about that,” Kit said. “But you’d better get moving. Vil has her fiancée there now, so you might want to get there early, before she gets...distracted.”

She giggled. “The Ice Queen is melting,” she said. “That’s a good sign. How’s her leg?”

“She’ll be fine,” Kit told her. “She’ll be getting married on crutches, but she’ll be alright.”

They saw Bess back to her car, and she waved to them as she turned in the courtyard and headed back down towards the gate. “Wow, did Zach really do that?” Muffy asked.

“She said he did,” Kit answered.

She laughed. “He’s making it easy for us!”

“He’s certainly not doing himself any favors,” Kit said, rubbing this finger along the edge of his jaw. “He’s acting the same way he acted towards me when we got married. He just can’t bring himself to ask when he’s used to commanding. And it seems he thinks the cousins will just fall all to pieces and get under his tent when he barks threateningly at them. And that might be the key to getting rid of him,” he said, turning quickly and taking his cell phone out of his pocket and speed-dialing Vil. “Sis,” he called when she answered.

“What’s up, bro?”

“I’m sending Bess over to you,” he said. “She showed up here, and she’s frightened. Uncle Zach threatened to ruin her life if she doesn’t side with him.”

“Well, that’s certainly his usual operating procedure,” she said with dark amusement.

“I told Bess if she sided with you, she could go to Austin where Zach can’t touch her,” he said. “And I think if you made similar promises to the other cousins, you’d garner some real support.”

“Of course,” she chuckled. “He wants to be the bad cop, I’ll be the good one. But sending Bess to Austin, that’s damn clever, bro,” she said with an appreciative catch in her voice. “I’ll just let Zach threaten each cousin, then tell them I’ll put them someplace nice and safe where Zach can’t touch them.”

“Woah, woah, you mean send all the cousins to Austin?”

“Those that want to go,” she said lightly. “Zach can’t touch them down there. That’s already been proved. I’ll offer them freedom and safety. I think I’ll get quite a few cousins,” she purred. “I think I’ll call Rick and have him do me a favor,” she said to herself.

“Vil, don’t get my friends involved in this,” he warned.

“Trust me, I wouldn’t do anything dangerous,” she said. “But Rick’s there, and he can make a few calls and a few visits for me to check some things out.”

“What things?”

“You’ll see,” she said teasingly. “We wanted the cousins back in Boston to show they want to make their voices heard. This is just gonna help us. Lemme call Rick, bro, I’ll talk to you later.”

“Alright, but don’t get too exotic,” he warned.

“Me? Never,” she laughed, then hung up.

“Well, Vil is waiting for Bess, and she’s talking about sending any cousin afraid to stay to Austin,” he told the femmes.

“Well, that’s good,” Muffy told him. “Now, Jessie, think I can actually shoot the gun now?”

“We’ll see,” she smiled at the shorter vixen. “Do you think Vil was serious about sending all the kids to Austin?”

“Fairly,” he answered her. “I don’t much like the idea of a bunch of cousins running around our city, though. They’ll cause all sorts of trouble.”

“Our city,” Jessie giggled.

“It is our city, Jess,” he told her. “Vil owns it, but she’s part of the family, so it also belongs to us. Austin is our city, the same way Boston belongs to my family. That’s what being a Vulpan is about,” he told her with a dark smile.

“It’s a good thing,” Muffy laughed.

Chapter 34

When Nick returned later that afternoon, he was both bearing gifts and he was also not alone.

He returned at the head of a procession of four rental cars, and from what Kit was told when they arrived, these were professional bodyguards and even a couple of mercenaries that had answered Nick's call for protection for Stonebrook. There were seven of them, and except for two of them, they were all very large, muscular, and very dangerous-looking, much like Stav and Marcus. The two exceptions to that rule were a small, wiry marten with a nick missing from his right ear and, much to Kit's surprise, a very slim, slender German Pinscher femme with her ears unbobbed and her tail undocked, which was unusual for any of the pinscher breeds. Nick had specifically went out of his way to track her down and hire her, and her primary mission was to protect Jessie, in ways that only a femme could when paired with a shy client. Sylvia was the only guard that could follow Jessie anywhere if it became needful, because Jessie would be far too shy and modest to allow a guard to follow her around or be in the room with her when she changed clothes.

Kit got an idea of how serious they were when, after Kit was introduced to them and they all conducted a inspecting sweep of the grounds and every building on the grounds, they armed themselves openly with weapons that were illegal in the United States. Each of them carried a different weapon, but they were all automatic weapons, submachine guns, compact weapons they could easily carry, yet also had considerable stopping power. They also came with their own radios, which were quickly all synchronized to a common frequency. Additional radios were immediately ordered next-day air for the guards, who used the push to talk feature of their cell phones to communicate both with the other guards and with the staff. They even moved in and set up their own cameras around the manor, focusing on the unfenced boat dock where anyone could tie up on a boat and enter the grounds. These furs had come loaded for bear, and they meant business.

That made Kit feel safer almost immediately.

Nick had arranged a schedule of four hour shifts for the eight of them so there were always at least two on guard and ready at all times, yet no one guard worked so long that he got tired or inattentive, then he brought everyone together, both the normal Stonebrook guards and the new temporary security, and they had a meeting where they coordinated everything and established a chain of command that ended with Nick as the commander of the operation.

The gifts he brought were for Jessie. He had brought back a portable clay pigeon launcher and several boxes of both clay pigeons and shotgun shells, enough to last them quite a while, and he also brought his K80 over-under competition shotgun for her to inspect and play with. Supposedly one of the best competitive shotguns made, it was worth about $8,000. It had replaceable barrels so the shotgun could fire different gauge shells, making it highly modular, where one K80 could be changed to fire 20 gauge, 12 gauge, or .410 shells. He had set it in front of her in a large black case, and when she opened it she found the weapon and all its different barrels, chokes, and extra parts in padded slots inside. He taught her all about the weapon that evening, how to put it together, how to change the choke, how to take it apart and clean it, and promised to take her out and shoot trap with her in the morning so she could fire the gun and see if she liked it.

But Jessie was still Jessie. She interrupted Nick's lesson to make dinner, being true to her pledge to cook for them, and forcing the cooks to basically help her as she made beef stroganoff and steamed broccoli with homemade cheese sauce, with a peach cobbler for dessert. Muffy again joined them for dinner, but Clancy also came out of his apartment to eat with them as Nick and a very, very large black bear named Adolph took their first four hour shift. The two guards weren't going to sit with them or follow them around, but they would always be close by as well as helping the normal guards patrol the manor both via cameras out on the grounds and patrols of the fence and river made on golf carts. One guard would be either in the manor or nearby if they were outside, and the other would be actively patrolling or overseeing the guards. After dinner, as Kit worked on a project that Rick had sent him, Jessie finished her lesson with Nick on his K80, then sat down with him in the master bedroom to knit. Jessie was being a little quiet and a bit more considerate of him because she knew that while he wasn't mad at her, he could never stay angry with her, he was still very nervous about the idea of her being in Boston. She had her sweater about a third done, and was finished with the hard parts of the neck and shoulders and was simply knitting her way down to the tail. She would make the sleeves separately and attach them at the end.

He finished the project and sent it to Lilly's workstation from his laptop, then shut it down and closed it. "I'm going down to get some tea, do you want anything?" he asked her.

"I want to watch a movie in a little bit. Can you make some popcorn?" she asked.

“I think we have some around here,” he told her. “Though I’m not sure.”

Kit went down to the kitchen, where Francis was chopping vegetables in preparation for tomorrow’s breakfast. “We have any popcorn, Franny?” he asked as he reached for the pot of tea that was almost always kept available.

“We surely do, Master Kit,” she answered. “We have instant and old-fashioned. Which do you want?”

“Whatever,” he shrugged. “Show me where it is.”

“Aat, we’re having enough trouble keeping your wife out of our kitchen!” she said with a smile. “I’ll make it up for you and send it up as soon as it’s done. Want butter with it?”

“Please, and no salt,” he answered with a thankful nod. “Can I take this?”

“Such a silly question, Master Kit,” she smiled. “Of course! There should be a warmer plate up in your bedroom for a teapot.”

“I, yeah, I saw it. Thanks, Franny.”

He took the tea back upstairs with two cups, for him and Jessie, then put the pot on the warmer plate that was on a small table near the TV over in the living area. “Where’s the popcorn?” Jessie asked as she started a new row in her knitting.

“Franny chased me out of the kitchen, she said she’d make it,” he answered. “Butter and no salt.” He poured tea for both of them and set Jessie’s on the coffee table, then sat down beside her and pulled out his ATP study book from the endtable, where he'd set it. "I should have brought my guitar," he sighed as he turned to the bookmark and settled in to read.

"I'm sure there's one around here somewhere. What movie do you want to watch?"

"You choose," he told her.

He didn't even get through the first paragraph when Jessie took the book, set it on the coffee table, then snuggled up against him. Kit put his arm around her and put his other paw on her very round belly, sliding it under her shirt to feel her warm, soft, furry tummy. "I'm sorry if you're still angry, my handsome fox, but I just can't be apart from you," she told him, settling her head against his shoulder. "Remember when I went home for Thanksgiving? I couldn't bear feeling that way for three months. I just couldn't."

"I'm not angry with you so much as I'm angry you're here," he told her, nuzzling the top of her head. "I love you, pretty kitty, and while I'm happy you're here, I'm not happy that you're in danger up here. I'm not joking about Uncle Zach, love. If he could find a way to do it, he would kill us. His hatred of our marriage is that intense. But, I can also say that if you weren't here, I'd be utterly miserable. Not only would I be apart from you, I'd be here, in this house, where I have nothing but bad memories. Sometimes I think this house hates me."

"It's not the house, love. When you showed me around, you knew everything about this place. I'll bet you know more about it than Clancy, and he's been here almost his whole life. And you seemed happy."

"I was happy I'm with you. We could be naked and penniless, and I'd be happy if I was with you, my pretty kitty."

She sighed in contentment and snuggled a little more into his arms. “What femme wouldn’t be happy being in the arms of the most wonderful male in the world?” she asked simply, putting her paw on his side and pulling him a little closer, and she began to purr.

Even after over six months of marriage and months of courtship before that, Kit was still utterly entranced and enthralled by her purring. In a way, it was a way she could control and manipulate him and he knew it, but he was just powerless against it. Anytime she purred, it induced a sense of peace and contentment into him that made everything seem alright with the world. He just sat there and held her, listening to the most beautiful music in the world...at least until the door opened and Stanley came in, carrying a good sized bowl of popcorn. “Your popcorn, Master Kit,” he said, setting it down on the table before them. “Will you need anything else tonight?”

“I don’t think so. Thank you, Stan,” Kit said without opening his eyes.

“Thanks, Stan,” Jessie mirrored, then went right back to purring.

She didn’t forget about the movie, however. She snuggled with him for maybe five more minutes, then she got up and picked a movie from his father’s large collection of older movies. She eventually chose All The President’s Males, and they had a nice evening munching popcorn while watching TV on a screen so large that it was almost a movie screen, and with Dolby surround sound supplied thanks to the stereo system. They finished almost all the popcorn, drank a final cup of tea, then went to bed around 10:00, which was almost sinfully early for a Vulpan. Except for those who worked at the shipyard, most Vulpans went to bed around dawn and got up some time after noon.

The next morning, they found a pot of tea and fresh baked scones sitting on a warming plate outside their door, on a table set up just for it. Kit was quietly thankful that the staff was going to respect their privacy, that he wasn't a Vulpan that wouldn't even wake up if a servant came into the room. "Mmm, do I smell tea?" Jessie asked as she stirred.

"Yup, it was outside the door," he answered, pouring a cup for himself. "Morning, pretty kitty. Sleep well?"

"Very well," she answered. "What are you going to do today?"

"First thing I'll talk to Rick. Then I'll pretend to be at the board meeting over the phone, then work on whatever they send me from the office, then just putter until Vil gets here. She said she's coming over tonight after work. Maybe I'll invite Suzy over as well, I'd like to see her."

"Ooh, I can make something nice for them!" she said with sudden excitement, jumping out of bed. Her belly was quite distended now, but wasn't near as big as it would get...but Jessie was very pregnant now. Despite that, she was still a sexy beast, and he would never get tired of seeing her without her clothes on. She giggled when he intercepted her on her way to her robe, wrapping his arms around her from behind sensually. "Now that I think of it, we haven't kissed and made up," he said huskily in her ear.

"Go lock the door," she said urgently.

Jessie made him about ten minutes late for the board meeting, getting his conference call set up. He again listened without comment as the board discussed the upcoming labor contract with Avondale, then he happily hung up when Vil called the meeting to an end. He called Rick immediately afterward, sitting at the desk in the bedroom. “Sorry I’m late, boss, I got... detained,” he said with a chuckle.

“That sounds like a good kind of detainin’,” Rick chuckled.

“Me and Jess were making up after our fight.”

“Yeah, that’s the good kind,” Rick laughed. “First off, open the file I sent to your Blackberry.”

“Okay,” he said, reaching for his Blackberry. He found the file in his inbox and opened it, which turned out to be the spreadsheet of the magazine’s finances. “Hold a sec, I can never read it on this tiny screen,” he said, opening his laptop. He put the phone on speaker and transferred the file to his laptop, then opened it. “Okay, got it. Nice!” he said as he read the bottom line. “Where’d that extra sixteen thousand come from?”

“Actually, that came from Vil,” he said honestly. “She wired it to our account last night. I called her about it, and she said it was for yanking you out of the office for a while. She said sixteen thousand was a fair compensation for losing your services for a while.”

“Pft, you’re not losing my services, I just can’t do anything face to face.”

“Well, we lost a few,” he answered. “Besides, I’m not gonna give it back, Vil would be insulted. And we can use it. I’ve put out the ads for the new workers, son. I’m hiring three more, two writers and another combo writer researcher. When we get them settled in, we’ll do that small expansion plan you wrote up. We should have enough capital built up by mid August.”

“Right on schedule, then,” Kit said with a nod to himself as he perused the figures. “How’s the trip up looking?”

“We got our invites, and so far everyone’s going,” he answered. “We’ve all decided to go as a group, so I’m gonna make thirteen plane reservations today,” he chuckled. “The gang, Martha, and Nawa. Vil invited Sandy too, but Jeffrey said Sandy said she can’t go.”

“School will be back in,” Kit said with a nod. “Sheila shouldn’t be coming either, but she’ll only miss one day if you do it right.”

“She’s chartering a jet to take her up,” he grunted. “She’s bringing Lupe, Sam, and Kevin with her, though. Vil sent them invites as well. She said she’s going to stop in Cincinnati and pick up Jessie’s family on the way, which will make eight.”

“Seven. Ben has a football game the next day, he can’t go.”

“He’ll be there,” Rick told him. “Sheila was talking about it when she visited. Sheila’s leaving on Friday, and will pick up Jessie’s family already in good clothes. They’ll go straight from the airport to the church, then after the reception, she’s taking them right back to Ohio. That way Ben won’t miss his game.”

“Clever girl,” Kit mused. “It also minimizes exposure to the family. How does this week’s issue look?”

“Pretty good,” he answered. “We themed the issue about the upcoming semester, so a lot of that research you did was used. Lilly and Marty did articles about the changing social scene, Barry did an article about how the police are cracking down this semester, and Lilly did a pretty damn good piece about the burgeoning club scene going on down in San An. We have a couple of election articles and a piece Barry did about the economy and how it's impacting the younger furs. Oh, and our interns for the fall semester have been picked, and one of them has already showed up at the magazine," he chuckled. "A very eager young ferret named Trish. She's cute, too."

"If Martha hears you calling a nubile young college coed cute, she'll neuter you," Kit warned.

Rick laughed. "She showed up like three weeks early, but she's local, so I put her to work. She's born and raised in Austin, lives out in Lakewood. She's still not getting paid and nothing she does until the first day of school counts towards her internship, but she understands that. She just showed up and said she was bored and asked to start her internship now, so I said what the hell. We need a gopher around here."

"Evil dingo, making her work for free," Kit laughed.

"It's called smart business," he answered. "Jeffrey wants Jessie to send her scripts, and tell her I'm waiting for that article she promised me. And where are my pictures?"

"I haven't taken them yet," Kit admitted. "I'll take care of it today. You want pictures of every room?"

"Every one you're willing to show to the world," he answered.

"Well, I guess I can leave out the torture chamber and the satanic cult room that's painted in blood," he mused, which made Rick sputter, then laugh helplessly.

"Remember, you need to write the articles. Make it good, son, this is a chance to show off your manor to the common furs, and also show them something they've never seen before.”

“They've seen a rich mansion on TV before, Rick.”

“No, son, they'll see your house. You always say that everyone has a story. Well, every thing also has a story. I don't just want the stories of the furs in the house, son, I want the story of the house itself. So pick your articles based on the house. Remember, they all have to relate back to the house.”

Kit sighed. “I was hoping you didn't mean it quite like that. Me and this house have something of a bad relationship, Rick.”

“Think of it as your chance at therapy,” Rick told him. “Besides, all that goth angst crap is always a popular storyline.”

Kit laughed. “You're an evil dingo, Rick.”

“Yeah, I know. Remember to tell Jessie.”

“Will do. You have the number to the manor?”

“I do. If you don't answer your cell, call that number, right?”

“Yup. They'll be able to track me down, cause I won't be out the gate until I either come home or it's time for Vil's wedding.”

“Okay then. Call if you need anythin'.”

“I will. Later Rick.”

Kit leaned back after he ended the call, thinking. He could do what Rick wanted, and it would probably be best to start with a history of the manor itself. And a picture of the front gates, with the Vulpan crest on them, that would be a nice photo to lead off the article. Stonebrook Manor;

A House of Secrets he could title it. He could even take pictures of a couple of the secret rooms and tell the readers what they were, but not where they were...introduce an air of mystery into the house to go along with the stories of power, betrayal, heartbreak, and discord that had infused into the very walls of the place.

He picked up one of the manor phones and clicked the push to talk. "Jessie," he called.

"Yes, love?" she answered almost immediately.

"I'm glad you're carrying your phone. Did you pack our cameras?"

"I brought the good one and our video camera. It's in the closet, left shelf just inside the door."

"Thanks. By the way, Jeffrey wants that script you promised him, and Rick's still waiting for your article."

"I sent the scripts," she said in irritation. "Oh, bother. Is my phone up there?"

"Just use the one you're holding, silly kitty," he chuckled.

"I have too many phones!" she protested with a giggle. "Oh! Nick said he'll have the trap launcher set up by lunch! Want to come shoot trap with us, handsome fox? We're gonna give Muffy a try, and I'm going to try out Nick's K eighty!"

"Sure, but remember that you do have work to do," he told her.

She laughed. "My article just needs a conclusion and you to edit it and it's ready to go, Jeffrey should have the scripts I sent, and we're not going to be out there all afternoon! Besides, I have to cook dinner for Vil and Suzy!”

“Oh, okay then. You may have fun.”

“Thank you for your permission, silly fox,” she giggled. “You gonna take pictures for the articles?”

“Yeah. I’m gonna start with the main gate and work my way in. How many blank memory cards did you bring?”

“Whatever you put in the camera bag. Two plus the one in the camera, I think. That should be enough, cause you can just upload them to the laptop when you fill them up and keep going.”

Kit took care of the other errand, having to get Suzy’s work and personal cell numbers from Vil, and he called her using her work number. “Susan Jenkins,” she said absently after her secretary transferred him.

“Is that any way to talk to an old friend?” Kit asked.

She gasped over the phone. “Kit!” she squealed in delight. “I was hoping you’d call!”

“Why didn’t you call me?”

“Vil warned me not to, at least for a few days,” she answered. “So what’s up, cutie?”

“Want to come to dinner tonight?”

“Sure! Corey’s still in town, mind if he comes along? Or is this a private dinner?” she teased.

Kit laughed. “Jessie is here, Suzy,” he warned. “So get that out of your head.”

“She is?” Suzy asked, then she laughed. “Darn! And here I was hoping you wanted to lure me away from Corey.”

“I wouldn’t live long if I tried,” he said dryly, which made her laugh. “How’s the job?”

“Right now? Bleh,” she grunted. “The economy’s turning down. We’ve put our expansion plans on hold and we’re shoring up. We crunched the numbers and we’re pretty sure Yankee Bytes will survive even a depression, because we serve both the common fur and the upscale. Our upscale business will cover for our drop in low-end merchandise sales, since the upscales take advantage of the lower prices in a recession economy. I guess it helps to be in the right social circles, I can pitch the store to our friends,” she giggled. “So, how’s the war?”

“It’s getting dirty,” he answered. “Uncle Zach has started threatening the cousins with ruin if they don’t support him.”

“That’s...stupid,” she said.

“Actually, it’s typical Zach,” he answered. “He’s too arrogant to ask for anything from someone he believes is under him. He won’t try to win over the cousins with promises, he’ll do it with threats.”

“He’s just making it easier for Vil.”

“He seems to be utterly incapable of being nice to anyone beneath his station, Sue-Sue,” he grunted as he got up and started for the closet. “I’m not sure when Jessie’s gonna finish dinner, so just show up after work. I’m sure we’ll eat eventually.”

“That works for me. I get a chance to get to know your Jessie a little better.”

“Such a liar, I know you talk to her at least once a week.”

She laughed. “Talking to someone over the phone is different than face to face. Why is she up here, anyway? Isn’t that a bad idea?”

“She came up on her own and she won’t go home, no matter how much I ask, demand, beg, order, plead, or insist,” he answered with a grunt. “I can’t make her leave outside of physically tossing her out of Stonebrook, and I’m not that stupid.”

She laughed. “Yeah, there would be snow in Austin when you came home.”

“No doubt. So, see you this afternoon?”

“You bet! I’ll call Corey and tell him about it. What are we having?”

“No idea,” he answered. “Any requests?”

“Cincinnati style chili, I’ve never had that before.”

“Jessie,” he called over push to talk, “Suzy wants Cincinnati style chili. That sound good?”

“Cincinnati chili it is,” she answered.

“Request granted, Sue-Sue,” he answered, which made her laugh.

“I’ll be sure to thank Her Majesty when I get there.”

“So, around six?”

“I get off at four, so around five-thirty,” she corrected. “Traffic between here and Stonebrook is a beast in afternoon rush hour.”

“I’ll tell Jessie.”

“Sure thing, cutie. Bye now.”

“Bye.”

He told Jessie about when Suzy planned to get there, then got to work on what Rick wanted. He went down to the main gate and they opened it for him, then he stepped off the grounds of Stonebrook and waited for the gates to close. “Taking pictures, Master Kit?” Oscar asked, who was one of the regular security guards for the manor...such as it was. Their only real function was to keep the press and other unwanted visitors from lurking around the front gate, and they checked the outside walls and the back gate once a day to make sure no damage was done. That was all they really did, and they were something of a new feature. The little guard house by the main gate had only been put in two years ago, at the death of his father, and it was only manned from sunrise to sunset. At least it used to be. Now there would be a guard at that gate 24 hours a day. There was also a guard from the local security company, Valiant Security, with a car sitting at the entrance to Stonebrook Drive. The drive was still considered a public road and therefore the car couldn’t stop anyone from coming down the road, but their job was to call the manor and warn them that someone was coming. Oscar was a tall, rather meaty possum who had been a driver and groundskeeper in the manor before taking up a position at the main gate, where he worked three days a week one week and two days a week the next, from sunrise to sunset. In the winter that was easy, but in the summer that made for very long days. In the summer, the guards usually switched off after about 12 hours and covered each other so they didn’t spend 14 to 16 hours out here. In mid-June, the sun rose at 5:00 and set nearly at 10:00, because they were so far north. They had it set up, though, so they never worked the gate two days in a row, so the guards didn't have to go to bed and get up and come right back out for another 14-15 hours.

“For my magazine, my boss wants to see where I grew up.”

“Well, I guess we can't stop the press when the press is the owner,” Oscar laughed.

“Yeah well, these pictures are going to show up in a small city magazine,” he said, centering the camera on the gates of Stonebrook, focusing on the Vulpan family crest. He took a picture, then stepped back a bit. “Move in, Oscar. The articles are about the furs who live and work here as much as it is about the house.”

“Sure thing, Master Kit,” he said, edging in beside the Vulpan crest and giving a salute, which made Kit laugh.

“Hold that pose,” he said, then he took the picture. “Thanks, Oscar. Enjoying the new gig as a security guard?”

He laughed. “I actually don't mind it,” he answered. “I still work in the garage on weekends. Sitting here watching TV, sitting in there waiting on when you need a driver, it's all the same. I'd rather do something than just sit around.”

“This is doing something?” Kit asked.

“I'm keeping the press away from your front door,” he grinned. “And I guess that means I have to chase you off!”

Kit laughed. “Open the gate and you can chase me off so you can go back to watching your soaps.”

Oscar opened the gate for him, and Kit hurried back inside.

Using a golf cart, Kit decided to use both the video camera and the regular one to first document the grounds, and he had company. The femme pinscher rode with him. Kit found out her name was Sylvia, and she was originally from Germany. She’d gotten into the security business because she’d always been more than a little bit of a tomboy as a young girl, had competed in the Olympics as a shooter and had won a gold medal with rifles and a silver medal using pistols, had been a cop after that, and there was a niche for femme bodyguards to serve certain femme clients who didn’t want male guards. Like many Europeans, she spoke multiple languages, English, German, French, and Russian, and she had been in the bodyguard business for five years since quitting the Berlin police. He did have one question he couldn’t resist asking as he took pictures and video of the garden. “Why didn’t you dock your tail?” he asked as he took a picture of the rose trellis, which framed the fountain almost perfectly. “The Pinschers I’ve known all have had their tails docked.”

“My tail’s not that long, and in Germany only boys dock their tails,” she answered in a German accent. “Girls who dock their tails are not German. Boys often bob their ears too, but I rather like my ears this way. They make me look less butch. That’s always a problem with Pinschers, you know.”

“Good reason,” Kit nodded as he got back onto the cart. “I don’t see how anyone that looks at you would think you’re butch. You’re cute,” he said, giving her a sidelong glance.

“I think your wife might be interested in your opinion, Herr Kit.”

“Go ahead and tell her, she knows it’s about time for me to misbehave.”

“Eh?”

“I misbehave fairly frequently so she has a reason to punish me,” he said with a wolfish grin.

“Mein gott, one of those,” she sighed, which made Kit laugh.

They took pictures and video of the grounds, the many cottages on the grounds, the boat dock and the river, and the large outdoor pool behind the house, and Sylvia helped by taking video as he took pictures. After they were done, Sylvia dropped Kit off at the garage and parked the cart, and he went in and transferred the pictures and the video to his laptop. He then went through the house as Jessie cooked lunch and took pictures of many of the rooms, using a digital voice recorder to make comments about each one. He took a picture of the ballroom with its checkered floor and fluted columns near the walls, the main kitchen, several of the museum-like rooms which were almost never entered except to clean, and then took a pictures of one of the secret rooms. “Doesn’t look like a secret, does it? Looks like a closet. This room was designed to hold alcohol back during Prohibition, it’s one of several secret rooms in the manor. But Prohibition ended during construction. However, nobody told the builders to change anything, so they built it with the secret rooms just like on the plans, and I think one of them was used to hold wine for a while. My great-Grandfather kept the rooms secret, even after Prohibition ended, because a family like mine almost always needs a secret room to hide things.”

He finished up the photo tour with pictures of the staff, both at work and posing for the camera, then sat down and went through them with Nick over his shoulder. “Can’t send that one,” he said, pointing at the dock. “Can’t show folks that there’s a hole in the fence.”

“Alright. I’ll just mention that we’re on the river and use this close-up of the dock itself, so they can’t see anything behind it.”

“Good. I’ll make a security guru out of you yet,” he smiled.

“I hope not,” he grunted.

“So, you rode with Sylvie, eh? Ain’t she something?”

“Sounds like a male pining there, Nick.”

He laughed. “We all pine after Sylvie,” he admitted. “Nice little gal, and she can put a bullet between your eyes from three hundred meters. In our circle, that’s an attractive aspect of a gal. Some guys like models, we like Olympic sharpshooters. Besides, in our profession, cute girls are few and far between.” He laughed. “She makes a lot of money to boot, almost as much as me.”

“Why is that?”

“Some femmes who want protection don’t want males, and that’s where she fits in. She also doesn’t look like a bodyguard. She’s the best there is at what she does, which is wear a party dress while armed with three pistols and a bowie knife.”

“Where does she hide it all?”

“Males have died trying to find out,” he said gravely, which made Kit erupt into laughter.

With Nick screening the photos, they finished the layout, and Kit wrote up a quick description of each one, then bundled it all into a single file and sent it to the office with the promise that articles were coming. Jessie called him down for lunch, which Muffy woke up in time to attend. Jessie made them tuna salad sandwiches and homemade potato chips, baked rather than deep fried. “Tuna?” Muffy asked.

“She’s a cat, expect seafood,” Kit shrugged as he took a bite.

After lunch, with Nick and Sylvia in attendance, they went down to the corner of the manicured grounds, where Nick had set up the trap launcher. He had put it on a flat area just at the top of a gentle rise, but what was more important, there was literally a mile of forest between their downrange and the nearest inhabitation. Birdshot of the kind used for sport shooting didn’t even go a quarter of that distance, which made it safe. They first assured that nobody was out in the woods downrange of them by getting a headcount of the staff, then they started first by stressing to Muffy the basics of safe gun use. Jessie had Nick’s K80 broken and in the crook of her arm, Kit was carrying the Wingmaster, and Muffy was carrying Jessie’s shotgun, also broken. For nearly a half hour, Nick and Sylvia taught Muffy about the safe use of the shotgun, then Nick loaded the clay target launcher as Kit loaded a shell into his shotgun. Muffy would go last so she could see how it was done. Kit had never done this either, but at least he’d been skeet shooting before. “Okay, how do I make the launcher work?”

“Foot switch, I’ll put it down for you,” Nick told him. Kit helped Nick set out the foot switch, then load the trap launcher with 25 targets. “It’s a two second delay from press to launch. Mind that it randomly changes the trajectory of the target after each round, and after the second launch, it can randomly throw out two targets about a second apart.”

Kit nodded and pumped the shotgun to load the shell, then shouldered it. He stepped on the foot switch and set his feet, and he heard the launcher's motor rev. The launcher threw out a clay target, and Kit tracked it with the shotgun and pulled the trigger. The shotgun bucked and reported loudly, but to Kit's delight, the clay target shattered. "Woo, first try!" he laughed. "You're right, this is easier than skeet."

"You're only saying that because you hit the target," Jessie teased with a giggle.

"Yeah, yeah, I'll show you," he said as he loaded another shell into the shotgun and pumped it. "I'll miss this one just to spite you."

Kit was too competitive to miss on purpose, but he missed anyway, or at least partially. The majority of the clay target was undamaged, but a small piece of it sailed off away from the clay, and the main clay wobbled down to the ground. "Nicked it," Jessie told him. "But that counts as a hit."

"Ja, any visible clay breakage counts as a hit," Sylvia agreed. "At least by Olympic rules."

"So, not much spite left in you, is there cousin?" Muffy grinned.

"Oh, I have lots of spite for you, Muffy," Kit said as he loaded two shells into his shotgun.

In all, the trap shooting was easier than skeet shooting to him. He kind of liked not knowing if one or two were coming, but since he didn't have to quickly turn his whole body or shotgun to aim at a second target, he did fairly well...for a beginner. Out of 25 targets, he hit 12, which was almost 50%. For his second ever day shooting at a moving target, he didn't think that was bad.

Jessie, naturally, put him to shame. She was using Nick's ultra-elite competition shotgun, and she loaded it confidently and closed it. And she used it effectively. She didn't miss a single target through her whole 25 target game. "So, you like that shotgun, dove?" Nick asked as she opened it and the two shells ejected.

"It feels nice," she said. "I've never used a thirty-four inch barrel before, but it didn't feel front heavy at all."

"I don't really like that one too much, just doesn't fit me well," Nick said. "That's why I have it up for sale."

"How much is a gun like that, Nick?" Muffy asked.

"The K eighty? Retail for about eighty-five hundred American dollars."

"You bought a gun you didn't like?"

"I bought it off a mate who was selling off his collection," he answered. "I figured if I didn't like it, I could resell it at a profit. Turns out that's what I'm gonna do." He and Kit began reloading the trap launcher. "Alright, dove, your turn. Remember, never point the barrel in any direction but down range," he reminded Muffy.

Kit felt just a little vindicated. Muffy missed the first 19 targets, then finally scored a hit on the 20th one, and then got her second hit a second later because it was a double throw. When she finished, she hit only 3 out of 25, which was better than his first ever attempt, but still made him feel like he didn't totally suck at sport shooting.

"Well, did you like it, cousin?" Kit asked.

“That was fun!” she said with an honest smile. “I’ve never done anything like this before. I never knew girls shot guns!”

Sylvia coughed lightly, which made Kit laugh. “They have femme’s divisions of Olympic shooting and archery events, dove,” Nick told her. “Sylvie here has a gold medal from the two thousand four games.”

“Really?” Muffy asked in surprise.

“Ja, in fifty meter rifles,” she nodded. “One of only fourteen gold medals for Germany.”

“That’s so cool!” Muffy said excitedly.

“It makes all the mercs swoon at her feet,” Nick grinned. “We love a girl that can drop a hostile from fifty meters!”

“Mein gott,” she sighed, slapping Nick on the upper arm lightly, which made the ebony wolf laugh.

After their target shooting, Jessie went to finish her article, and Kit sat down to write the first article about the manor for Rick. He didn’t have to do much research for it, since the staff could tell him almost anything he wanted to know. He wrote about the general history of the manor, from its construction from 1933 to 1936, during the height of the Great Depression and during Prohibition, but Prohibition ended after the manor construction began. He wrote about the expansions, such as the garage in 1942, the pool expansion in 1943, the maintenance shop in 1954, the gym and second indoor pool in 1964, the external garage for antique cars in 1975, the helipad in 1981, the systematic construction of the seven houses out on the grounds from 1989 to 2001, the second pool expansion and renovation of the entire pool area in 2003, and the gym renovation and indoor pool expansion in 2004. After he went through the dusty facts and figures, he wrote about the essence of the place. He pulled no punches as he described his unease in the house, describing several of the bigger fights he'd had with his father to set the tone that had been the norm in the house when he was a teenager, and then describing the oppressive weight he felt around him when he was in the house, as if the ghosts of the past Vulpan were staring at him from the walls, and they were angry with him. He wrote about his fear for his wife, and though he wasn't specific about why, he did explain that he brought his mixed breed wife into a nest of rabid purists. "You don't know what it's like," he wrote, sitting in the master bedroom with the windows open and a glorious breeze blowing through the room. "To be married to not just a different breed, but to a mixed breed, in a family of rabid purists. My wife Jessica represents everything my family detests, because not only is she a mixed breed, but she is a beautiful, intelligent, charming femme that gives no one any reason to hate her, and exposes the irrational and senseless hate my family harbors deep inside. They cannot look at her and hate without seeing the hatred within themselves and realizing that it is hate for the sake of hate.

"That hate isn't just a recent development. The Vulpan family has a proud tradition of bankrolling the purist movement, and though I can't prove it, I'm fairly certain they were part of the original PPC. Whether they were or not isn't as important as the fact that hatred of mixed breeds, or the mongrelization as they call it, is a cornerstone of the family's history. Not only did I marry a mongrel, I'm having a mongrel child, which will forever stain the purity of the family line.

"That was the magnitude of my crime against the family, that I committed the one unforgivable sin in their eyes. I didn't just go against the family, I went against the entire history and tradition upon which my family is built and have permanently damaged the purity of the Vulpan line and the Vulpan name. Will my daughter have my eyes? Who can say. But the eyes of the Vulpan family are a sign of our breed purity, my father would always say. They have bred true from our great-great Grandfather, Arthur Vulpan, through every single Vulpan descendent. When my daughter is born, she will be the first ever mixed breed in the Vulpan family, and I know that my family will hate both her and her parents for what I have done. And if she has my eyes, they will hate her even more, because they will see the one thing that defines a Vulpan in a mixed breed. One thing is for sure, me, my wife, and my daughter will never be welcome in the family, or in Boston, for I have committed the one unforgivable sin. I fell in love outside my breed.”

He finished up the article then sent it off, then leaned back in his chair and pondered. It was no wonder Zach was so evisceral in his anger at Kit, but it said a hell of a lot that the entire family wasn't so fanatical. For Kit, the reason why was the kindness of a mixed breed when he ran away, who showed him in the flesh that everything his family had taught him was a lie, that mixed breeds were nothing what they said. That male had listened to him when no one else ever had, had bought him a meal at McDonalds, sat down with him, and listened. He wondered why Sheila and Muffy too weren't purist, despite the purist mentalities of their immediate families. Brian, well, Brian wasn't quite so vehement in anything he did, but Sarah was a purist to the roots of her fur. All of Sheila's brothers and sisters were purist, so she said, but Sheila herself was not.

He didn't get long to ponder, however, for the door opened, and Kendall poked his head in. “Kit!” he called. “We're here!”

“You’re early, it’s not even four,” he mused.

“Vil finished work early and had me come to the office, and here we are,” he smiled. “We’re down in the TV room on the first floor.”

The TV room was just that. It had been the same as a living room of a normal family’s house when Kit was a kid, where he spent a great deal of his time. It was between the kitchen and the ballroom, and had no windows. But it had no windows for a reason, for there was a widescreen 72 inch plasma TV dominating the far side of the room, with a smaller 42 inch television in the far corner that was dedicated solely to console game systems. There had been a 60 inch projection TV in that main TV spot when Kit was a kid, which had been replaced by a 54 inch plasma TV when he was a teen. There were three couches and four chairs arrayed near the big TV so everyone could see it, with tables scattered among them so they had room for snacks, tea, and other things. The one thing the room had that was different from many others, though, was the wet bar and refrigerator against the left wall, stocked with wines, liquors, and other drinks. Vil was already there, sitting on the near couch with her crutches leaning against the wall, and to Kit’s shock, Sheila’s older brother, Kitstrom Samuel Vulpan, as well as Kitstrom Travis, who was Zach’s third child, both wearing suits and obviously having just come from work. Zach had seven children, and while Bridgette had been his first, his pride was satisfied because the next five of his kids were all boys. The three that still lived with Zach were two boys and a girl, who was his youngest. Zach’s kids were all boys except the bookends, which were girls. Jake was almost a reverse. Jake had had five kids, and his first and last were boys, with three girls in the middle. Jake also had the dubious honor of having three children in the Party Pack, Lynn, Angela, and Joy.

“Hey bro,” Vil said. “I brought some cousins with me. Have room at the dinner table?”

Kit gave the two older males a dark, penetrating look. “That’s going to depend.”

“I sure as hell didn’t come here because I’m happy with my father,” Travis told him immediately. “You should have heard what he said to me this morning.”

“What about you, Sam?” Kit asked bluntly.

“Same. I got a very ugly phone call this morning. Uncle Zach threatened to fire me from the shipyards if I didn’t support him.”

“So, I’m reassigning Travis and Sam to Avondale,” Vil said with a slight smile. “They’re going to be working under Terry.”

“Working under someone younger than me,” Sam sighed. Both Sam and Travis worked at the shipyard, as did many of the male cousins. Unlike some of the cousins, Sam and Travis actually did real work, unlike the other old males, Steven and Patrick, who basically had do-nothing jobs where they collected a paycheck without any real responsibility. Sam and Travis, however, wanted real responsibility, real jobs, so Vil had given them their chances.

“Well, Terry’s pretty smart, Sam,” Travis said, a bit defensively. “He proved himself when he whipped the safety department into shape, and I’ve seen the reports coming out of Avondale. He’s doing a good job down there.”

“So, you’re going against your own father?” Kit asked.

“Hell yes,” Travis snorted. “If he really tried to kill Vil, then he went way too far. He denies it up and down, but the facts speak for themselves. Vil offered to send me to New Orleans so he can’t harass me,” he sighed. “I’m loyal to the family, Luke, and I don’t think the family is better served with my father running it. He’s too entrenched in the past, and the past is not the path to our future. I love him, but he’s wrong. He’s furious with me right now, but what else can I do? If he takes control of the family, he’ll shatter us. The cousins will openly rebel against him, and the family will fly apart.” He took a sip of tea. “I wish I could say I had company. Steve is supporting Dad, and Louis, I dunno. He sent Matty to England to get her and his kids out of any fighting, but I dunno if he has the balls to openly disobey Dad.”

“What about Chris?” Kit has to ask.

“Who knows? Chris never talks to any of us,” he answered.

Kendall came in behind them, and with him were Muffy and Jessie. Kit tensed up when he saw his wife come in and stop suddenly, looking at the two male Vulpans. “You must be Jessie,” Sam said, standing up. “My sister Sheila goes on and on about you. Hi, I’m Sam,” he said, offering his paw to her.

“Nice to meet you,” she said with a slightly defensive smile, shaking his paw.

“This ugly guy here is my cousin Travis,” he said, motioning at the taller male.

“Jessie,” he said with a calm nod.

“You have to forgive him, he has an unreasoning belief that the world will explode when you deliver,” Sam said lightly.

“Sam!” Travis said in surprise. “I can object to their marriage and still be polite! I’m sure Jessie’s a wonderful femme. She has to be to capture a Vulpan.”

“Kit wasn’t hard to catch,” Jessie laughed.

“I made myself very available to be captured,” he agreed dryly.

“I’m making Cincinnati style chili for dinner. Would you like to stay?”

“You’re cooking? You’re living in Stonebrook, and you’re cooking?” Sam asked in surprise.

“I love to cook,” she said with a smile. “I’m about to start, so if you want to stay, let me know now. Suzy is coming with Corey, so I have to make sure there’s enough for everyone.”

“Sure, I’ll stay. I don’t think I’ve ever had this dish before,” Sam nodded.

“I think I’d enjoy it,” Travis agreed.

“Come on, Muffy, I’ll show you how to cook,” Jessie said.

“I’ll never use it,” she laughed.

“Everyone should know how to cook,” she said as the two of them left.

“Well, she’s very pretty,” Sam noted, giving Travis a sly look.

“She has fox markings,” Travis noted.

“She’s part fox,” Kit told him bluntly.

“She is? Wow,” Travis said with a curious look to the door.

“I should warn Jessie to make some extra,” Vil said as Kendall sat down beside her. “I invited a few other cousins to come over tonight.”

“Who?”

“All of them in Boston,” she answered simply. “Bess, Mary, Steve, Louis, Pat, Chris, Will, Randy, and Duncan.”

“Mary’s still here?” Sam asked in surprise.

“She came back this afternoon,” Vil answered.

“You invited all the cousins over?” Kit asked in surprise.

“Just about,” she smiled. “And I’m going to have Sylvia escort Jessie everywhere she goes,” she added.

“You’d better,” Kit answered. “With her machine gun in open view.”

“Oh, come now, Kit, there’s no need for such drama,” Sam snorted.

“She’s not your wife,” Kit answered immediately.

While Kendall got to know his cousins, Kit tuned out to consider what Vil had done. She had invited all the cousins in Boston to Stonebrook, and while that was in her right, he felt a little violated that she would so casually invite them in when he was so adamant when he told everyone that no Vulpan would set foot in Stonebrook while Jessie was here. And yet, despite that declaration, Vil just invites the family into Stonebrook without telling him. He didn’t much appreciate that. And because he was angry, he stayed almost completely silent as Kendall chatted amiably with Sam and Travis, until he excused himself quietly while Kendall told them about his moving to America...but he didn’t get very far before being interrupted. His manor phone rang, and he opened it to hear Stanley's voice. "Master Kit, Miss Bess is here again and wishes to come in."

"Is she alone?"

There was a pause. "No, Master Kit. Your cousins Mary and Lynn are with her."

"Naturally," he grunted. A good piece of the Party Pack right there. He debated for a long moment as to whether he should let them in, then sighed and answered. "Let them in," he said, cursing himself for his own weakness. He went down to the kitchen, and saw that Jessie was actually teaching the cooks a new recipe. They'd never cooked Cincinnati style chili before, and Jessie was explaining the recipe to them as she chopped onions, Sylvia stood nearby, and the cooks listened. "You might want to make more," he said, in a growl. "Vil invited every cousin in Boston to Stonebrook tonight. There might be like twelve foxes here."

"She did?" Muffy asked in surprise.

"That's what she said. Sylvia, do me a favor. Go get your submachine gun, and keep it prominent. I want my family to have no illusions about how I feel about them being here. Oh, and after you get back, don't let Jessie out of your sight, even if she has to go to the bathroom."

"Kit!" Jessie protested, her cheeks threatening to ruffle.

"Ja, Herr Kit. I'll be right back," she said, then she turned and headed towards the second floor, where all the guards had rooms.

"Is that necessary?" Jessie asked him, a bit sharply, as she brushed her chopped onions into a nearby pot, and the other chefs began preparing to cook as well.

“I think it is,” he told her bluntly. “You forget, pretty kitty, my family isn’t like Sheila and Muffy. Most of the cousins object to our marriage. Travis does, but at least he’s being civil about it. Some others may not be quite so kindly. I want Sylvia standing right beside you carrying her gun and making it very clear that you’re the most precious thing in this house, so they’d better not even think about trying anything.”

“Well, you’re being a bit silly, handsome fox,” she told him as she reached for another onion.

“You can call me silly after they all leave,” Kit told her. “Until then, I’m just being safe.”

Sylvia returned, much faster than he expected, and she was carrying her submachine gun on a strap around her shoulder, the strap falling down between her breasts. The weapon she carried, he’d found out, was a Heckler and Koch MP-5SD-N, a compact automatic submachine gun with a retractable buttstock and sights, capable of both semi and fully automatic firing, which was also built with an integrated suppressor to help muffle the sound of the weapon firing. Her version, the N version, was also capable of firing with water in the barrel, making it very rugged and versatile. It had been built for and was used by the U.S. Navy, but how Sylvia had gotten her paws on one was beyond him. Kit had researched it and the other weapons the guards carried out of curiosity, and had discovered that the H&K MP-5 was a very popular weapon, had a lot of variants, and was both powerful and dependable. Heckler and Koch was a German firearms company. Another of the hired guards, a nearly seven foot tall, burly Siberian tiger named Krichek, also carried an MP-5, but he carried the MP-5K, which was smaller, had no buttstock, but fired faster than other MP-5 variants. “Thanks, Sylvia,” Kit said gratefully.

“I’ll keep her very safe, Herr Kit,” she said with a nod. “It’s why that crazy wolf brought me here.”

Bess came into the kitchen, and behind her were two more of Kit’s cousins, Mary Grant Vulpan and Lynn Kennedy Vulpan. Mary was very tall for a femme, even taller than Jessie and Sylvia, with a very attractive figure and very thick, lustrous fur. Mary was the most attractive of all the female cousins, and she knew it. Lynn was about the same size as Jessie, almost waifishly thin and with surgically enhanced breasts to go with her wide hips. Lynn had battled bulimia when she was a teenager, and though she had recovered, she was still very thin and obsessed with her figure. The three of them looked at him for a second, then Bess came over and held her paws out. Almost instinctively, he took them, but then his scowl at her stopped her from kissing him on both cheeks. “Hello, Luke,” she greeted. “I brought Mary and Lynn like Vil wanted.”

“They’re in the TV room,” Kit said, giving his other cousins a strong stare.

“Don’t look at me that way, Luke,” Mary protested. “And before you ride me about what happened to you, what was I supposed to do? Get disowned just like you? We’re not like you, Luke, I know I’d have died out on the streets.”

“Don’t call me Luke,” Kit demanded. “My name is Kit.”

“Well, at least let me say I’m sorry for not being there,” Lynn said, coming up and putting her paw on his shoulder. “We hated what they did to you, but...we’re just the kids. I was too afraid to say anything. Your dad was a heartless bastard, and we were terrified of him.”

“I’ll agree with that much, Lynn,” Kit said. Jessie came over, wiping her paws on her apron, and Kit put his arm around her. “Jessie, this is Lynn Kennedy Vulpan, and this is Mary Grant Vulpan. They’re my older cousins.”

“Hi,” she said, a bit warily, offering her paw. To Kit’s surprise, Lynn took it.

“I see why he likes you,” she said with a slight smile. “You have fox markings.”

“My grandfather was a fox, I got my markings from him,” she answered simply.

“You’re mixed? Wow, it doesn’t show at all,” Mary said.

“Maybe it’s the fox in her that attracted him,” Lynn noted to Mary.

“Girls, you’re on dangerous ground,” Kit warned with a dark look. “One word against my wife and I’ll have the guards drag you out by your whiskers.”

“I don’t have whiskers!” Mary protested indignantly, which made Bess laugh.

Muffy came up and hugged Lynn fondly, then kissed Mary on each cheek. “I’m glad to see you guys here,” she said. “You joining the Rebel Alliance against the evil Empire?”

Kit laughed suddenly, but the femmes gave him a curious look. “I never knew you liked Star Wars, Muffy,” Kit told her.

Stanley came in quickly. “Master Kit, uh, there’s someone else at the gate who wants in.”

“Who?” he asked.

“It’s Brian and Ruth Vulpan,” he said in an uncertain voice.

“What?” Kit gasped.

“He wants to come in, he said it’s urgent.”

“Absolutely not!” he declared. “There is no way in hell I’ll allow an elder into Stonebrook!”

“T-Then maybe you should tell him, Master Kit,” Stanley said, holding out his manor phone.

Kit snatched it away and put it to his ear. “Now listen—“

“Wait, Kit, wait,” Brian called suddenly. “I’m here to talk. That’s all. I even brought Ruthie and Misty,” he said in a mollifying tone. “Just hear us out, then you can throw us out if you want.”

Kit’s emotions raged for a long moment between his fury at his uncle and his curiosity as to why he had come. Was he here to side against his elder siblings? Was he here to try to talk them down? Or was he here to finally show he was no different from his older brother?

“Kit, he’s my dad,” Muffy said in a gentle, pleading voice. “Trust me. Let him in.”

Kit closed his eyes and his fist, so tightly that his paw trembled, a pained and angry look on his face. Then he finally nodded, almost in defeat.

Jessie was there. Her gentle paws slid around him, and he found himself clutching to her, feeling the new life inside her pressing against his stomach. “It’s alright,” she told him. “Come, let’s go sit down for a minute.”

She pulled him over to the table and sat down in his lap, just staying near him for a few minutes until he could get control of himself. When he finally felt better, he saw his four femme cousins looking on with strange expressions on their faces. “After you put everything you hold dear at risk, you can laugh at me for being a coward,” Kit growled at them as he stood up, taking Jessie’s paw.

“Kit, you’re the bravest fox I’ve ever known,” Muffy told him quietly.

Brian entered the kitchen, and Jessie gave a squeak when Kit’s grip on her paw became almost crushing. Along with him were his wife, Ruth Astor Vulpan, the last female of the Astor line, with only her and her two brothers left from that legendary family. Beside Brian was their youngest daughter, Misty, who at 13 was just starting to grow and fill out, and was wearing a pair of shorts and a surprisingly skimpy tee shirt that ended above her belly button. She looked at Kit with curiosity. “Mom, Dad!” Muffy said, folding her slim, handsome mother into a hug.

“Hey, baby,” Ruth said, kissing her on the muzzle.

Muffy hugged her father, tickled Misty, making her giggle. “Hey, squirt!” she greeted.

“I’m just here to talk, Kit,” Brian said calmly. “To you, Vil, and any other Vulpan who shows up. I’m on your side, Kit,” he declared. “I don’t want Vil off the chair. I’m against my older siblings in this matter.”

“You’re serious, Uncle Brian?” Mary asked in surprise.

“Of course I am,” he said calmly.

“The company has never done better under Vilenne,” Ruth agreed. “And if they try to control the kids the way Lucas did, they’re just going to drive them away. I for one do not want my daughter and sons to be afraid the rest of their lives, or under the control of a ruthless bastard,” she said, stroking her daughter’s face lightly, which made Muffy giggle. “Have you been alright here with Kit and Jessica, little kit?”

“They taught me how to shoot a shotgun!” she said with a grin.

“That’s not very ladylike,” Ruth laughed. “But as long as you had fun, I guess it’s okay.”

“It was very fun,” Muffy nodded. “I sucked at it, but it was fun!”

“You must be Jessica!” Ruth said, stepping towards Jessie. But she stopped fearfully when Kit quickly got between them, and Sylvia took hold of her MP-5.

“It’s okay, handsome fox,” Jessie said soothingly, patting him on the shoulder. “It’s okay. Yes, I’m Jessie. You’re Brian’s wife?”

“Ruth,” she said, taking Jessie’s paw and shaking it. “I’ve heard a lot about you, dear. I’ve heard you’re quite a good cook.”

She laughed. “My handsome fox likes my cooking, so I guess that’s all I need,” she said with a charming smile. “And who is this pretty young girl?” she asked, bending over slightly to look down at Misty.

“I’m Misty,” she answered. “Are you really married to my cousin?”

“Yes, I am,” she smiled at him. “We’ve been married since December.”

“But you’re not a fox.”

“No, I’m not,” she agreed seriously.

“Baby girl,” Brian said warningly.

“You’re kinda pretty, though,” she said boldly. “You have dark paws and a tip on your tail just like a fox.”

“My grandfather was a fox,” she told him. “I got my fox markings from him.”

“Oh, that’s why he likes you.”

Jessie giggled. “I hope he married me for more than this,” she said, holding up her dark-mittened paw.

“Vil is in the TV room with Travis and Sam,” Kit told them. “You can go in there and wait for dinner.”

“It should be about an hour,” Jessie said, kissing Kit on the muzzle and patting him on the shoulder before going back to the counter.

“You’re cooking?” Brian asked in surprise.

“I love to cook,” Jessie answered as she took another onion. “We’re having Cincinnati chili and garlic bread.”

“Well, I look forward to trying it, Jessie,” Brian told her. “Come on, Ruthie, let’s go see Vil and talk to the boys.”

“Can I stay here? Talks are boring,” Misty complained.

“I have an X-Box upstairs if you want to play it,” Kit told him. “And we have a few laptops. Didn’t you bring your Game Boy?” Misty was a gamer girl, much like Jenny.

“I brought my PSP,” she said, “but I’d rather stay here.”

“She can stay with me,” Jessie offered.

His relatives left the kitchen, bound for the TV room, except for Kit and Muffy. Misty sat down at the kitchen table and pulled out her PSP, but Jessie just gave Kit a calm look. “They need you in the TV room, handsome fox,” she told him. “You too, Muffy. I’m sure they’re going to make a plan, and both of you should be there.”

“I don’t want to be in there,” he told her. “I want to be right here.”

“I’ll be right here,” she said, giving him a reassuring smile. “Besides, you’ve made sure that I have plenty of help to keep me safe,” she said, looking at Sylvia, who simply smiled.

“She’s right,” Muffy said. “Though I don’t know what help I’ll be.”

“Well, come on then,” he sighed.

There weren’t only Vulpans in the TV room. Bartholomew, Dee, and Luann were attending quietly, since a Vulpan wouldn’t get up and walk five feet to get something on a counter, and Suzy and Corey arrived not long after Angela and Joy, who gladly joined the congregation. Muffy sat down with the other members of the Party Pack, and Kit sat beside Vil. She patted him on the knee, and just as Jessie predicted, they started talking about what was going to happen, and what they should do. Surprisingly to Kit, Brian didn’t try to take control of the conversation. He seemed to be serious about keeping Vil as the head of the family, and acceded to her in front of the other children. Vil, on the other paw, wasn’t picky. She actively engaged Mary, Lynn, Muffy, and Bess into the conversation, asked their opinions, which startled them quite badly. They’d never had their opinions count for anything in the family before, and here was the head of the family, asking them what they thought, asked them what they thought the best thing to do was. That seemed to surprise more than the girls. Sam and Travis seemed honestly surprised that anyone would bother asking someone like Bess for her opinion, but what was more shocking to them was that Bess was actually a very smart young lady, who knew almost everything that was going on.

Their numbers also increased. Sam's younger brothers, Randy and Will, arrived at the manor about half an hour after Brian did, and Muffy's two younger brothers, Daniel and Jonathon, arrived about five minutes later, Daniel driving his 16 year old brother in. About five minutes after that, Angela and Joy arrived, and they had their luggage with them; they had just flown back to Boston. The TV room was completely filled with Vulpans, but there were a few notable absences. Christopher, Patrick, and Steven, the eldest sons of Zach, Maxine, and Jake, were absent, as were Louis, Victor, George, Bridgette and Duncan, who was Sheila's immediate older brother, and who had not come back to Boston when Muffy made the round of calls.

Kit felt...odd. He wasn't enjoying being in a room filled with his cousins and his uncle and aunt, for all he could see were Vulpans who were nowhere to be seen when he was in a body cast and in so much pain it made him shudder to even think about it. He could feel the stares when he wasn't looking, stares that were both accusing and insulted. They disapproved of his marriage, and though he didn't care what they thought, it made it a very uncomfortable time for Kit to be surrounded by family members who objected to his decisions. But, confusingly, every time he spoke, everyone listened quietly, even Brian. Why would they listen to him when they hated what he had done?

It seemed that after only a few minutes, Jessie opened the door and came in. The conversation stopped when she came in, and Jessie found herself confronted by a dozen Vulpan eyes. Vil held her paw out to her, though, and kissed her on the cheek when she took it, pulling her down.

“What’s up, sis?” she asked.

“Dinner should be ready in about ten minutes,” she announced. “I’ll let you know.”

“Why didn’t you send a servant to tell us?” Randy asked in curiosity.

“Why should I make someone else do what I can do myself?” she asked simply, then she kissed Kit on the muzzle, patted his shoulder, then scurried out.

“She’s cooking?” Joy asked in amazement.

“Jessie loves to cook,” Vil answered before Kit could. “Her cooking for us is a way she’s welcoming us into her home.”

“Is that why Sheila wants to be a cook?” Will asked. “She watched Luke’s wife cook?”

“Sheila wants to be a chef,” Muffy said distinctly. “There’s a big difference. She wants to open her own restaurant.”

“It’s demeaning,” Will said.

“Not if she truly enjoys what she does,” Brian said simply. “If she can make a career out of it, and she’s successful, how can that be demeaning?”

“She’s doing, manual labor,” Will bristled.

“If her customers enjoy her meals, she’ll make them happy, and she’ll earn money,” Muffy said defensively. “Isn’t that a good thing?”

“Vulpans shouldn’t serve anyone,” Will said arrogantly.

“You serve this family, Will,” Vil told him sharply. “And I serve the family too. Don’t ever forget that. The only Vulpan in this family that doesn’t owe this family a thing is Kit, and that’s because this family failed him just as surely as our father did. When we failed to live up to our obligations to him, he became free of his obligations to us.”

“Then why are you here, Luke?” Sam asked.

“Because I still have one Vulpan I consider family. My sister needs me, so I’m here for her. And for God’s sake, stop calling me Luke! My name is Kit.”

“It’s going to take a long time to remember that,” Sam chuckled.

“Well, there’s too many of us to eat anywhere but the formal dining room,” Vil announced. “Help me up, Ken.”

“Sure thing, love,” he answered, standing up.

The group moved to the formal dining room, which held a table long enough to seat 34. Ken settled Vil down at the head of the table as maids and the cooks scurried in, setting wine glasses and pouring wine and tea. Frannie brought out baskets of garlic bread, then Jessie, Carrie, and Henri came in carrying large bowls. Jessie set hers down and took her seat by Kit, then the maids and chefs began serving, bringing out plates already prepared with Cincinnati chili served from Jessie’s own family recipe. Cincinnati chili was chili served over spaghetti pasta and with cheese liberally coating the top, and Jessie’s family recipe made the chili rich and flavorful and just a hint spicy, but not hot. It was not a rich fur food, but that didn’t mean that it wasn’t excellent.

“You made this, Jessie?”

“I made about half of it, they helped with the rest, it was too much to cook too fast,” she smiled.

“So what is this?” Brian asked as a plate was set before him.

“I’ve had this before,” Ruth told him. “When I went to that symposium in Louisville. It’s actually pretty good.”

He mixed it a little with his fork, took a cautious bite, then his eyes widened. “This is good!” he declared.

“It’s an old family recipe,” Jessie told him demurely. “My mother makes it much better than me.”

Either they liked it, or they were like Kit and had learned to pretend to like something while they ate it anyway. That was a required skill in the Vulpan family, when one ate things like cow’s tongue or sheep pancreas. They ate dinner more or less in silence, as the maids and cooks attended them, but Kit felt distinctly unsettled, and he could tell that Jessie was a little nervous. After dinner, after the plates were cleared and they sat the table enjoying mousse and ice cream for dessert, Vil finally breached the subject. “Alright, so, here’s what we’re going to do,” she began, taking a bite. “Tomorrow, we tell Zach, Jake, and Maxine to back off, and we also tell them that all of us oppose what they’re doing. Meanwhile, boys, I’m going to assign you to Avondale tomorrow, so be ready to head out tomorrow around noon. Girls, you’re going to Austin, so you’re in a sheltered area where they can’t get at you. I’ll call Sheila tomorrow morning and tell her you’re coming, and I’ll make some arrangements for you so you’re put up at the nicest hotel in Austin, the Armitage. Sheila’s lived there for quite a while, so she can show you where you can go and what there is to do...and there’s lots to do in Austin. I think you’ll actually enjoy it. Brian, you and me are going to have fun at work tomorrow,” she said with a grim smile. “And will Zach be pissed.”

“What’s going to happen?” Jessie asked curiously.

“I’m going to move to have Zach removed from the board and replaced with Brian. And when this is all over, Brian will have it. Loyalty to the family is rewarded,” she said simply. “And so will yours, girls. When you come home, if you want, I’ll find you places in the company where you do real work, and have real responsibility. One of Sheila’s biggest complaints was that nobody in the family would take her seriously. Well, I’ll take you seriously. You’ll suffer the consequences of getting fired if you fail, but if you want to try, I’ll give you the chance. Kit and Jessie will go back home to Austin, and everything will settle down and get back to normal.”

“What will the elders do?” Randy asked.

“Fight back, of course,” Vil said. “But they can’t get to any of you. Leave this work to me and Brian. We’ll take care of it. What I basically want is all of you is to openly take sides, then get out of Boston and let me and Brian deal with the elders.”

“You want us to hide?” Travis asked, a bit harshly.

“I want you out of the way so this doesn’t happen to you,” she said, holding up her bandaged arm. “The more who are against him means the more targets he has to go after. I want to minimize his options to where the only ones he can go after are the most heavily defended. Let us take care of it, Travis.”

“But I want to help!”

“You can help by getting Avondale whipped into shape. We need the shipyard up and running up to Vulpan standards. Terry can get it done faster when he has three assistants down there who know our system and can get the place up and running. You want to prove yourself? Here’s your chance.”

Travis nodded.

“Mind, boys, I don’t have New Orleans quite as locked down as Austin, but I’m working on it. So take some protection with you, and keep alert. Terry’s in a gated apartment and condo combo building, I suggest you live in the same building. If you’re all together, your security can work together with the building.”

“What about us?” Will asked.

“Just go back to school, and keep your eyes open.”

“What about the ones that side with Uncle Zach? I don’t see Louis here, and he’s in some of my classes next semester.”

“Don’t say anything. What’s family business is family business. Be polite to Louis while you’re there.”

“But…” he said, glancing at Suzy.

“Don’t worry about Suzy, guys,” Vil smiled. “She’s my best friend, as has basically known what’s going on in the family since I was fifteen. She keeps her mouth shut.”

“I’m not stupid,” Suzy laughed. “Besides, I’m also here to help. Vil’s my best friend, think I’m not in her corner when she needs me?”

“I guess I could make a propaganda film against your uncles,” Corey offered, which made Vil laugh.

“I’ll keep that in mind, Corey,” she grinned at him. “The other thing we need is communication. So, once a day, I want all of you to call in here, and check in with Kit. This is our headquarters, and Kit’s job is to make sure everyone’s okay, and if you need help, to make sure I know about it. He’s not leaving this manor until he goes home, so he’ll always be here and always be available.”

“More or less. Except for Vil’s wedding, I won’t set foot out of Stonebrook until Zach is permanently banished from here and I can go home,” Kit said.

“And I’ll be here right beside him,” Jessie declared.

“That can cause almost as many problems as it solves, Jessie,” Brian said. “Zach is utterly livid that you’re living in this house. He sees it as the ultimate insult, that Kit would bring his cat wife into this house, which he sees as the bastion of the family’s honor.”

“Well, it’s his fault I’m here,” she said simply. “He’s the one that started this, so it’s his fault. And when our daughter is born here, I hope he chokes on the news.”

“Jessie has almost a Vulpan’s sense of vindictiveness,” Vil chuckled.

“You’re having your baby here?” Joy asked.

“Right here,” Vil nodded. “In the same room where Kit was born. Unless they surrender early,” Vil smiled at Kit. “If so, they’ll go home and have the baby there.”

“I hope so. I hate being up here,” Kit growled.

“Well, I don’t hate it,” Vil smiled, patting him on the forearm.

“You’re biased.”

“So?” she asked with a grin, then pointed her fork down the table. “When can you be ready to go, girls?” she asked.

“I guess I can pack a bag and leave in the morning,” Angela said.

“Can I stay with you, sis?” Joy asked.

“Sure, Joygirl,” Lynn answered, nudging her sister.

“I’ll call Sheila and warn her that you’re coming, but be warned, guys. She has school coming up, and she’ll be busy with that. So give her the space she needs.”

“Sheila, being serious about school?” Lynn asked with a giggle.

“Yeah, she’s serious,” Muffy answered.

“Very serious,” Jessie agreed. “She has her pilot’s license now, too.”

“Yeah, we heard about that,” Angela said. “Hard to imagine, two Vulpans in the family with pilot’s licenses.”

“Jessie’s also got hers,” Kit corrected.

“Wow, really?” Joy asked.

Jessie nodded. “When you bought Kit his plane, I loved it so much I learned how to fly it. Thank you for that, by the way. It was a wonderful gift, and we love it.”

“No problem, Jessie,” Brian told her. “I’m glad you two like it.”

“We get a lot of use out of it,” Kit chuckled.

“I’m sure Zach, Jake, and Maxy would love to take it back now,” Brian laughed.

“They probably would,” Vil nodded.

“I can be ready to go tomorrow morning,” Sam announced.

“I’ll call Terry and tell him he’s getting three executive assistants. Pack your whips, you may need them,” Vil chuckled.

“I can be a bad cop, no problem,” Travis assured her.

“I wish I wouldn’t have taken that semester off now,” Will fretted. “I’d be graduated already and headed for New Orleans.”

“Well, think of it as your last hurrah at Harvard, little brother,” Randy told him.

“And I have three classes with Louis,” he sighed. “Oh, that’s gonna be fun.”

“Maybe I’ll transfer to Yale,” Angela noted.

“Hey, it’s in Connecticut at least,” Muffy told her.

After dinner, they started to file out. Randy took his brothers home, and Travis and Sam left with Lynn, Bess, and Mary. Angela took Joy home, and Daniel, who had been totally silent the whole time, took Jonathon and Misty back to Brian’s house. After everyone else left, Suzy and Corey sat with Vil, Kendall, Kit, Jessie, Brian, and Ruth in the TV room. “When’s your due date, dear?” Ruth asked as Dee handed Brian a glass of wine.

“September thirtieth,” she answered, putting her paw on her belly. “I’ll be glad to see my feet again!” she laughed.

“They’re definitely more fun outside than inside,” Ruth told her.

“I wouldn’t know that. I hope to soon, though,” Vil said, giving Kendall a sultry look.

“Now now, we’re not even married yet, and you need to heal.”

“I’ll be healed enough soon,” she told him archly, which made nearly everyone else laugh. “I don’t want Kit’s daughter not to have a cousin of her own for very long.”

“It’s not a race, sis, cause you’ve already lost it,” Kit teased.

“I’m not sure I like where this conversation is going,” Corey noted, which made Suzy slap him on the arm.

“I’d better be getting a little piece of hardware soon, or I’ll just have to become Kit’s mistress,” Suzy told him.

“He’d better never let me catch him with a mistress,” Jessie warned, unsheathing her small yet sharp claws and holding them in Kit’s face. “Or I’ll peel off your hide in strips.”

“One of the dangers of marrying a cat,” Kendall noted. “All the sharp pointy things on the ends of them.”

“How are you holding up in here, Kit?” Brian asked.

Kit fixed Brian with an icy stare at first, then he sighed and closed his eyes, shaking his head. “It’s like living in my own private nightmare, but I’ll be alright,” he said. “This place is nothing but bad memories for me.”

“Well, that’s sure to change after a while, once you’ve been here a bit,” he answered.

“It’ll be worth it to evict Zach,” Vil said. “If he can never set foot in Stonebrook, it’ll be a big blow to his effort to take over the family. This house has always been seen as the throne.”

“I just want to get this done and go home,” Kit grunted.

“What are you doing here to pass the time, Jessica?” Ruth asked Jessie.

“Oh, there’s plenty for me to do here,” she answered. “I’m still working, writing articles and comic scripts for our magazine. I’m also learning new recipes from the cooks, and Nick set up a little trap shooting range in the corner of the grounds, and there’s a pool and gym, and lots of books and movies, and I have my knitting, and I have my books to study for my commercial pilot’s license, and Muffy’s staying with me to keep me company.”

“Yes, we know, she told us she was,” Brian told her.

“Now much trouble will you get into with your siblings over siding against them, Brian?” Kendall asked.

“Oh, they’ll be pissed off, I’m sure,” he answered. “I might even find myself fired and more or less banished from the family if Zach wins. But if he takes over the family, I’ll leave regardless. This family will disintegrate if he runs it, because he still thinks it’s the fifties and he can rule us like a dictator. The kids all have their trust funds, and they don’t rely on the family to get by anymore.”

“That one of his own sons is siding against him should tell him something,” Ruth added. “And Maxy and Jake’s girls should tell them something.”

“As if they’d listen,” Vil snorted darkly. “The one who’d better listen to her kids is Sarah. All of them are against Zach except maybe Duncan, and Jacob, but he’s too young to really have an opinion. She needs to come down off the fence.”

“That’ll happen when she knows someone’s going to win,” Brian noted dryly. “But, if we had Tom and Sarah on our side, it would definitely help.”

“What has Tom had to say about it?”

“He’s more interested in how Zach pushed Terry down, then tried to get him arrested to care about anything else,” Brian answered. “You know how he feels about his kids. Bess may not believe it, but Tom would go to the mat for her as much as Terry. That’s why he lets her run wild, because he just wants her to be happy.”

“Tom loves his kids nearly as much as we love ours,” Ruth said, putting her arm around Muffy and kissing her on the muzzle.

“Moom,” Muffy protested, which made them laugh.

“Well, we should get going,” Brian noted, looking up at the clock. “No telling what Dan’s letting Jon and Misty do.” They stood up, and the others stood up as well.

“It was nice to meet you, Jessie,” Ruth said, giving her a hug. “If you stay here to have the baby, I’d love to come to your shower.”

“Umm, sure,” Jessie said, a bit uncertainly.

“Keep her company, sweetie,” Ruth said as she hugged Muffy. “A girl needs company, especially when she’s pregnant.”

“I will, I promise.”

“Kit,” Brian said soberly, standing before him and offering his paw. “I’ve told you before, but I’ll tell you again. I’m sorry for what you went through, and I was wrong not to try to help.”

“Keep your apologies,” Kit said coldly. “Just sticking your paw out and saying I’m sorry doesn’t come anywhere near far enough to make up for this,” he said, pointing at his half-missing ear.

“Well, then I guess I’ll just have to go far enough, Kit,” Brian told him with surprising calm and candor. “You’ll find out that not everyone in this family is your enemy, and if I have to prove myself to you, then that’s exactly what I’ll do.”

“You’re gonna be doing it a long time,” Kit told him.

“We’re both young, Kit. I’m sure we have time,” he said with a surprising smile.

Brian and Ruth left after kissing and hugging their way out of the room, then Kit blew out his breath and sat down. “Way to keep them on our side there, bro,” Vil told him as Kendall sat back down beside her.

“Just because we’re on the same side doesn’t mean I’m just gonna pretend what they did to me never happened,” he said. “I tolerated the family here and near Jessie because we need them, but I’m not going to walk paw in paw with them into the sunset. When this is over, I’m going back home, and if I never see any of the elders again, I won’t shed a single damned tear.”

“So, you’re willing to bend a little on the cousins, eh?” Vil asked with a sly smile.

“Maybe, but you said it yourself, Vil. I have a reason to hate them. And so do you.”

“The ones who tried to kill me, you bet your ass I do,” she said. “But the difference between us, bro, is I don’t blame the entire family for the acts of some. You’re starting to see that for yourself, cause you don’t blame the younger cousins. I think soon you’ll see that there’s only some in the family you can really blame for what happened to you.”

“As long as you don’t blame me, I’m happy,” Suzy winked at him.

Kit laughed. “How could I blame you, Suzy? The one vixen that came to visit me day after day?”

After Brian left, they had a very nice time just talking, for nearly three hours. Jessie got to know Suzy and Corey better, and vice versa. It turned out that Kendall already knew Suzy and Corey very well, since they’d come over quite a bit when he’d come over for weekends to see Vil. They traded stories, Jessie told Suzy and Vil in detail what it was like to be pregnant, and Kendall tried to get them to talk about basketball, and promptly had pillows thrown at him. Kit told stories about the magazine and what it was like to work with more of a family than an office, and Kendall told them about working in Brighton Industries as a PR executive, which basically meant he ran around the world telling everyone how great Brighton ships were and they should buy them. Corey told them about the documentary he was going to shoot in Maine next month about the coastal life, how life was different in a place where there were hundreds of inhabited islands, and the coastline was such that a one hundred yard trip in a boat could take an hour by car. “We used to spend a few weeks every summer in Maine, and it’s totally different up there,” he said. “So we’re gonna go do a movie about the lifestyle on the islands and along the coast. We think it'll be pretty good."

"Sounds nice," Jessie said. "I've never been to Maine before."

"It's nice up there in the summer. In the winter, it's about like Boston," Corey chuckled. "Cold."

"Cold isn't our problem," Jessie giggled. "In the winter, it's in the fifties and sixties during the day, but sometimes it can get pretty cold at night in the winter."

"Sixties? That's like summer around here," Corey chuckled.

"We are definitely visiting them this winter," Suzy laughed.

"You're always welcome down in Austin, Suzy," Kit told her.

She yawned. "I think it's time to go home, Corey," she told him. "I have to be at work in the morning."

"I think I'd better go buy her something nice or I'm in trouble," Corey said with a smile at her.

"You better, buster," she winked at him.

"We should be heading home as well," Vil said. "Help me up, love."

Kit and Jessie walked them back to the garage as Stanley got their cars ready for them, Vil on her crutches and the others following her. When they got to the garage, Kit gave her a strong hug. "Be good, sis," he told her. "I'll talk to you tomorrow."

"Sure thing. Later, sis," she said, hugging Vil as Kit hugged Suzy.

"Call anytime, Sue-Sue," he told her.

“Oh, you’re using a pet name for my girl, are ya?” Corey laughed.

“He’s called me that since I was fifteen,” Suzy said, grinning at him impishly.

“Watch her, Corey, she’s a bad girl.”

“You like us bad,” she giggled.

“I’m trying to make Jessie bad, but no luck yet,” he said, smiling at her.

“I’ll make you respectable yet, handsome fox,” Jessie said, blowing him a kiss.

“See, that’s why you should never get married. It just sucks all the fun out of life,” he sighed mournfully, then he winced and laughed when Jessie grabbed him by his good ear.

“I think someone needs to be punished,” she threatened.

“Oh baby, you know what I like,” Kit said while hunched over, which made the others erupt into helpless laughter.

The next day, it was all carried out.

Bess, Lynn, Mary, Angela, and Joy left Boston at noon, and boarded a commercial jet—first class of course—bound for Austin. Angela and Joy were attending Harvard, so they’d be leaving Austin and coming back the day before the first day of their semester started, but the other three were there until it was over. By 2:30, Sam, Travis, and Randy were on one of the brand new Vulpan Cessna business jets, one of three they bought and were delivered the month before, aboard a Citation CJ3 en route to their temporary duty assignment in New Orleans. But before they left, all of them signed a letter to Uncle Zach telling them that he was wrong, that they supported Vil, and they wanted him, Jake, and Maxine to accept Vil as the family head. Vil delivered it to Zach by means of courier, and followed that up at the board meeting by moving to remove Zach from the board permanently, demote him, and replace him with Kitstrom Brian Vulpan. It failed, of course, because any Vulpan could veto any board proposal with just a no vote. But it also sent the message, mainly because Vil declared that she'd be bringing the same proposal up for vote tomorrow, and the next day, and the next day, for as long as it took until it passed.

But the bigger message, by far, was the open revolt of quite a few children, and what was more damning, some of Zach, Jake, and Maxine's own children were openly siding against them, one each from Zach and Maxine and three from Jake. That wasn't just them against the rest of the family, that was elements of their own immediate families siding against them. This one fact, Vil confided to them the next afternoon, both infuriated and worried the three of them, for while they still believed they were right, they saw that their actions had divided their own families. Travis had called his father and endured a five minute episode of being screamed at, threatened with being disowned, and even a threat to fire him from the company, to which Travis answered by hanging up on his father.

And then there was Brian. Kit found out later the next day that Brian had gone to see Zach, Jake, and Maxine at Swan Cove and told them, flat out, that they were wrong, and he was opposing them. For his trouble, he was nearly punched in the face, and raced through the door of the manor about five seconds ahead of an incensed Zach, who had chased him out of the house with a golf club.

Sheila and Terry were ready. They picked up their family members at the airports and took care of them. Terry took his male cousins first to the shipyard, and then to his condo building, where they rented furnished apartments on a short term basis. Sheila picked up the Party Pack at Bergstrom and rode with them in a limo to the Armitage, where they checked in for an extended stay. They expected to be in Austin for about three weeks or so, for that was how long Vil expected it to take to finally wear the three elders down.

They weren't alone, of course. Patrick, Christopher, Steven, Victor, George, and Louis all openly supported their parents, but that was it, and there was a good chance they were supporting their parents because they were too afraid of them to rebel. Far more youngers were siding with Vil, and there was one that was remaining silent. Bridgette wasn't answering any phone calls from anyone, and had vanished with her husband and children to parts unknown.

What Kit could see, sitting at the desk in the bedroom the next afternoon, that this wasn't shaping up to just be all of them against the three elders. Not all of the youngers were siding with Vil, either out of fear of their parents or because of honest desire to see Zach ruling the family. He could see that Vil had to be very, very careful here, or the family would be torn apart. If she was too rough with the elders and their kids, then the family really would shatter the way Brian feared, at least if they weren't responsible for the attack on Vil. If they were, though, no amount of consideration was necessary, and the family would know it. Whoever tried to kill Vil was basically disowned, and everyone knew it. As soon as she found out who it was, they were toast.

He should care less about it...but he couldn't do that. Even if he hated most of them, they were his family. Besides, if the family was at war with itself, then nobody would be safe. Not him, not Jessie, not his sister, not anyone. The family had to be at peace with itself, it had to have a single ruler, and what was more important, Vil could not exact the punishments she had in mind if she came out on top, because that would alienate the rest of the family. She could punish Zach, but couldn't drive him out and destroy him, else his kids would want revenge on Vil, and it would start all over again.

She'd be walking a fine line, he could see. But if anyone could do it, it was Vil. She'd know when to use a feather, and when to use a sledgehammer.

God, did he love that wife of his. She'd given him extra-special attention last night, which prevented him from brooding or worrying. Then again, his family had shocked him with their behavior last night. Not one of them made one comment about his marriage or his wife, either in his face or in private so far as he knew. They'd been amazingly well-behaved, and a few of them had even engaged Jessie in conversation. He'd dreaded the idea of his family being around his wife, but it seemed that he'd gotten off lucky. No doubt it was because of Vil. Vil's approval of his marriage was common knowledge in the family, and her fondness for Jessie was also well known. No doubt they were afraid to say anything about Kit's marriage with Vil right there.

What was more disturbing, though, was how they acted towards him. They...listened to him, even Brian. It was almost the way they treated Vil, like they thought he was in a ruling position in the family. That was ludicrous, because he wasn't even a part of the family anymore. He was up here for two reasons and two reasons only, to evict Zach from Stonebrook and to help Vil find out who tried to kill her. When this was over, he would leave the family and go back to Austin, back to his own life, back to where he was happy. He could never be happy up here.

Austin. By now, his femme cousins were settling into their hotel rooms, in his city. Why on earth did he ever suggest that they go to Austin? Five wanton, wild Vulpans running wild through the city with large bank accounts and few inhibitions. Well, it was a good thing that Vil owned the police, he supposed. He had no doubt that she'd have to use her power to bail one of his cousins out of trouble within three days.

The phone rang, and when he answered it he realized he was about to find out, for it was Bess. "Hey Luke," she called, "we're here and settled in. I'm calling in for all the girls."

"Any trouble?"

"None at all. Sheila was here waiting for us when we got here, and she hired a limo to take us to the hotel. This place isn't bad. We've rented the whole top floor. That leaves one extra empty penthouse, but we rented that too to keep everyone out and keep our privacy. My suite's a bit small for my taste, but at least there's enough room to feel comfy."

"It's a hotel, Bess," he told her.

"Well, we'll see. Sheila's taking us out tonight, and I'm going to meet her."

"You must mean Allison."

"Yeah, she's coming with us."

“Just be nice, cousin,” Kit warned. “Sheila will kick your ass if you say anything to Ally. Then I’ll kick it when you come back up here.”

“I’ll reserve judgment until I meet her, Luke.”

“Don’t call me that,” he said wearily.

She laughed. “Kit. I told you, it’s gonna take me a long time to call you Kit. Just keep hounding me until I change.”

“I’ll do that, trust me.”

“Did the boys call yet?”

“Yeah. They’re in New Orleans and have already rented some apartments in Terry’s building.”

“Sounds better than this.”

“At least you have room service.”

“Yeah, but they can bring down servants.”

“I doubt that. Sheila tried to get Higgins to go down to Austin for months.”

“Still, I’m not used to having to get things or do things.”

“It’s good for you,” he said dryly. “Remember, Bess, no outrage,” he warned. “If you get me in trouble down there, I’ll whip your tail.”

“Don’t worry, cousin, we’ll keep it quiet,” she said. “I’m fully aware that this is your home, and we’re just visitors.”

“Remember that,” Kit said bluntly.

“Kit!” Sheila’s voice called. “How you doing, cousin?”

“Keep them out of trouble, Sheila.”

“Oh, sure I will,” she said teasingly.

“I’ll kick your ass, Sheila,” he threatened. “I know where you live.”

She laughed. “And I can talk Lupe into giving me the key to your house.”

“That’s a quick way to end up back in Boston, little girl,” he retorted, which made her giggle.

“We’ll keep Sheila from getting too fancy when she tries to show off your home city, cousin,” Bess said lightly.

“You’d better, or I’ll have to come down there and send all of you home with your butts shaved and raw from the spanking.”

“Why Luke, I never knew you loved me,” Bess teased.

“You’ll find out how much I love you if I go back home to a mess I have to clean up.”

“We’ll be careful, cousin,” Bess assured him.

“Just make sure you do,” Kit told her.

“Alright, talk to you later, cousin. Be good.”

“You’d better do the same.”

She laughed. “Bye Luke.”

“Kit,” he corrected.

She giggled. “Kit,” she amended.

“Bye Bess and everyone else listening,” he said dryly, then hung up.

He leaned back and sighed. The very faint sound of a shotgun told him that Jessie had to be shooting trap again. She was doing pretty well here so far, keeping her head and keeping herself busy, and she also did so well facing his family with both strength and kindness, and though she was a bit shy, that was just Jessie. But she wasn't as shy as she used to be, he realized. Six months ago, she would have been quiet as a church when faced with his family, but instead she had been calm and gentle in interacting with his family, especially with Misty.

Jessie was growing stronger, he realized. But as far as he was concerned, that was a good thing. She'd been so shy when he first met her, but since getting married, she'd been growing more confident, more sure of herself. It was nice to see, and in his family, it was something of a requirement. If she was afraid of his family, they'd come after her like sharks.

He wanted to be with her. He stood up and hurried out of the bedroom, heading outside to shoot trap with his wife and whoever was with her. All these other problems could wait until tomorrow.

Chapter 35

There was only so much that they could do trapped inside Stonebrook, but they did the best they could.

Things stalled after the family divided up into the battle lines, and July faded into August as they simply waited for both the FAA and Vil's own investigations to track down exactly who had tried to kill her. They were more or less waiting for that, because nothing else was really happening or changing.

Every day settled into a routine for Kit and Jessie. They would wake up, eat breakfast, then Kit would listen in on the boring board meeting while Jessie either knitted or went down to the gym and pool for a low-intensity workout. Kit would work out himself after the meeting, they would eat lunch, then they would do something with Muffy, who was awake by then. More often than not, they were shooting trap. It was something all three of them could do, it was new to Kit and Muffy, and it was actually rather enjoyable and relaxing for them. And they were getting good. Kit could consistently hit 20 or more targets out of 25 now, and Muffy could hit 15 to 20 out of every 25. After they did something with Muffy, both Kit and Jessie would retire to the master bedroom to study their pilot materials while Muffy either did her own thing or sat with them reading or watching TV, and it was usually during this time that Kit would start getting the calls. Every day, all his cousins in New Orleans and Austin would call him to check in, just to make sure they were okay and also to receive any news that Vil wanted passed down, but wasn't so important that she would have them all called and told immediately. The calls usually lasted less than a minute, since some of his cousins weren't exactly on speaking terms with him or there really wasn't anything to say. After they studied, Jessie would drag Muffy down to the kitchen and cook dinner, also teaching Muffy how to cook. After dinner, they would watch TV, study, or watch a movie, sometimes with Muffy and sometimes not. Then they would go to bed while Muffy stayed up, since she was much more of a night owl. And in the morning, they did it all again.

It was far from routine for Vil, though. She kept him up to speed on what was going on with daily calls or visits, and every day she was fighting off some new attack from her elders. It was a new lawsuit, or a new rumor, or a new accusation or even an attempt to get Vil in trouble with some law agency. They attacked her any and every way they could. She was still basically playing defense, holding out until she was safely married and until she found out who sabotaged her chopper. Maxine and Jake visited Vil at work almost every day to either demand or cajole her into giving up her position, but she would not budge. And though she was playing defense, she did strike back in her own ways, with subtle moves that aggravated their elders.

What she did to Zach was a classic example of her very subtle maneuvers. She had any number of ways to attack her uncle directly, but Vil was a manipulator at heart, and so it was her preferred method to simply be the femme holding the strings of a puppet that did the attacking for her. It was her way, and she was very good at it. Vil had taken Stanley's discovery that Zach was using the Stonebrook accounts to hide money, compiled a pretty detailed history of the activity, and had it FedExed to the auditing departments of the Internal Revenue Service and the Massachusetts

Department of Taxes and Revenues. The Vulpans had control of a great many state and federal agencies, but nobody...nobody...screwed with the IRS. The IRS took Vil's little tidbit, immediately decided that there was an issue of unpaid taxes involved with this mystery money, and they started digging. A week after she sent the tip, the IRS pulled an audit on Zach, which distracted him because his accountants had to quickly come up with some trick to hide the money he'd been hiding in Stonebrook's accounts.

Vil had a knack for doing tremendous damage with the smallest pieces of information.

She focused her attacks on Zach, but Jake and Maxine didn't entirely avoid her attention. Her attacks on them were as petty as they were amusing, and were done more or less just to annoy them. For Jake, she convinced the county that it was time to "pave" the road to Jake's manor, so they then proceeded to tear up the road leading to Still Waters, which forced Jake to call a car from his manor to come out and get him, then have his car go to Swan Cove to wait. Sure, it did little and it was petty, but for a Vulpan used to everything being their way, a closed road between them and home was an intolerable situation. Maxine found her electricity shut off when she got home one hot August day, and thanks to Vil's meddling, it took her nearly a full day to get it back on. The house ran on its backup generators the whole time. Again, it did nothing serious, but it did aggravate Maxine.

Kit's discomfort in Stonebrook didn't really fade all that much. When Jessie was with him, he was happy and content, but whenever she wasn't near, if he was out of the master bedroom, he felt like all his ancestors were scowling at him from the walls. For some reason, the master bedroom felt comfortable to him, probably because Vil had had it decorated to where it resembled a much larger version of their room back home.

Just like he was in Kansas, Kit was able to get things done for the magazine. He called Rick at least three times a day, called Pat about six times a day, continued to do the books, and even interviewed the applicants for the new writer/researcher job over the phone. But what was more important to Rick, Kit had been writing his articles about Stonebrook, and they were smashingly popular. His first article had been about the manor itself, its history and appearance, and later articles had described daily life in the manor, both for him and also for a “real” Vulpan, the lives of the servants, and the rich history of the furs who had lived there, both Vulpan and servant. His most popular article yet hadn’t been about the Vulpan or the lifestyles of the filthy rich, it had been the article about Clancy, who was the quintessential Vulpan servant; educated, refined, intelligent, and most importantly, loyal. Clancy had lived in the manor since he was five, the longest living resident of the manor, and Clancy had described his life serving the Vulpan family in a way that made it incredibly compelling. Clancy had served four generations of Vulpan, describing how he used to play with Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan when they were kids, then served the adult Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan when Kitstrom Daniel Vulpan passed away. But he also described the hereditary post of chief butler, and how a MacArren had held that post since Stonebrook was built and became inhabited. Stonebrook would not be Stonebrook without a MacArren standing at the door to welcome family and guests and running the manor to keep it in perfect operation. He described the sense of pride he had in serving the Vulpan family, and also quite effectively described the nearly symbiotic relationship the rich had with their servants.

The life of a servant wasn’t actually all that hard, his articles revealed. The average servant worked about six hours a day officially, but was “on call” to be used almost any time of the day or night. Clancy described the shift system and the pairing system, where servants worked set shifts to do the daily work, but certain servants were paired with certain house members to provide a sense of normalcy for the resident. The servant would learn the quirks and needs of that Vulpan, and would become effective servants for them. Stanley and Luann, for example, were Kit and Jessie's servants. Stanley as the chief butler had the honor of being the personal servant of the master of the house, and Luann had been chosen to be the maid that would serve Jessie because she was young and friendly. A Vulpan servant worked "on the clock" about six hours a day, cleaning, polishing, mowing, gardening, whatever it was they did. The rest of the day was spent in a state of leisurely readiness, where they enjoyed their time in their own way, but stayed on the manor's grounds in case they were called to work. They would stay that way until the manor's master declared that they were done for the night, and then they were considered "off" except for the two servants who were scheduled to work the nightshift, and their only job was to be awake and available in case they were needed. Two days a week they were considered "off" and could leave the grounds to shop or whatever it was they wished. A curious deal with Stonebrook was that the servants had no cars of their own. If they needed to go out, or they were off for the day, the manor owned four Chevy Cavaliers that were kept in the exterior garage for their use, and they could also use the limo if they got prior permission.

Many common furs didn't know that when they saw a limo riding down the street, it might contain the servants of the rich family instead of the family itself.

In many ways, the servants of a rich family enjoyed many of the perks and luxuries the family did itself. Since they lived inside the manor, they had access to the manor's amenities, and though it was different from family to family, in the Vulpan family the servants had always been allowed access to the entertainment features of the manor on certain days or at certain times during the day, known as “servant’s hours.” They were allowed to use the gym, the pools, the archery range his father had built near the wall, the home theater on the second floor, and had free access to the manor’s phones and internet service provider. They were paid well, but they didn’t have to use their own pay to buy furniture or food, since those were provided by the manor. The only things the servants had to buy were “luxury items” like home electronics, personal items, and personal clothing. Their apartments were rather nicely furnished, their groceries were delivered to the house, and there was plenty for them to do, even if their “normal” jobs weren’t actually all that strenuous.

The hardest worker in the manor was undoubtedly the chief butler. He didn’t work six hours a day, he worked more like ten hours a day, since he was responsible for all servant scheduling, the appearance and upkeep of the grounds, managing all matters of discipline among the servants, and he was also the one that managed the manor’s finances. And all that was on top of being the personal servant of the master of the house. But, Kit didn’t give him much to do. Jessie refused to allow Luann to clean their bedroom, and Kit didn’t need a butler to help him get dressed or fetch and carry for him.

Their focus was changing, however. Vil’s wedding was only two weeks away, and because many of their friends were coming up for the wedding, Jessie decided to have her baby shower the day before the wedding. Kit had decided that it was silly for his friends to be spending money to stay in hotels when he had plenty of room right here, so he called Rick and told him that everyone who came up from Austin would be staying at the manor.

Stonebrook would be hosting as many as they could pack into the grounds, so as to help assuage the cost of coming up and eliminate food and lodging from the expenses of his friends. He could easily house everyone here in Stonebrook. There were 25 available bedrooms in the manor outside of the master bedroom, including the master bedroom in the west wing that had once housed Zach, but would house Rick and Martha. There were eight bedrooms and one master bedroom in each wing, three bedrooms on each floor, and there were six special guest “master bedrooms” on the second floor in the main part of the house, in addition to four currently unoccupied servant apartments that were one bedroom affairs on the first and third floors of the main house, where most of the servant apartments were located. Muffy was occupying one bedroom, Vil’s old bedroom just down the hall, and the guards were occupying the six bedrooms on the second floor and two of the empty servant apartments. Between those 17 available bedrooms, one apartment, and the 7 cottages, three of which were multiple bedroom affairs, he was confident he could house every single friend or family member who was coming from Austin, as well as perhaps a dignitary or two. He knew for a fact that Vil had invited Governor Rick Perry, and it was only polite to offer him a cottage at Stonebrook for his stay.

That news had caused a change in plans. Rick had rescheduled their flight so they arrived on Wednesday instead of Thursday, so they had an extra day to explore the manor and the city and enjoy a little Vulpan hospitality, as well as giving the femmes the chance to attend Jessie’s baby shower on the day before the wedding.

Not everyone would have their own bedroom, though. Sam had quite delicately told them that she and Kevin would be in the same bedroom, which cut their bedroom needs by one. Rick and Martha would share a bedroom, and Savid would be given the largest cottage on the grounds, which had room for him and his children as long as two of them shared a bedroom. Jeffrey and Sandy would share a bedroom if Sandy decided to come as well, but so far, Sandy still had said she wasn't coming.

And if worse came to worst, they could bring in rollaway beds or air mattresses and double up furs in the bedrooms.

Stonebrook was a huge manor, one of the largest in New England, easily as large as some hotels, and when he looked at it like that, its true size became apparent. He could house every single wedding attendee from Austin in Stonebrook, and probably have room left over.

But for the staff, it was both a very exciting and very busy time, and the manor had exploded into a frenzy of preparation. They hadn't hosted a large number of guests since Kit's father's funeral, and they wanted the manor to put its best foot forward and be what everyone thought it to be, the jewel of Boston and the most exquisite manor in New England. They were already hard at work getting the manor ready for visitors by giving the bedrooms an extra-special cleaning and inspection, bringing in enough food to feed approximately 30 guests in addition to the residents and staff, the cooks were preparing a menu for the visitors, and Stanley was even having the exterior walls, drive, and courtyard pressure washed to make the old tan granite, pavement, bricks and cobblestones all shine to present the best image. He was having flowers planted along the drive, and was pulling some staff from other manors and hiring a few temporaries to help fully staff the manor for the large number of guests.

That irked the other members of the family. It was an old standing arrangement that when the chief butler of Stonebrook needed more help, he could commandeer one or two servants from the other family manors and houses to fill the holes on a temporary basis, and he had made that call. But, as Kit expected, Zach, Jake, and Maxine refused to allow their servants to go to Stonebrook, though Tom and Sarah did. Stanley called one servant in from each manor and also appropriated all the servants of the cousins who were in New Orleans and Austin, as was his right as the chief of all staff for Stonebrook, and by proxy, the entire Vulpan family. The exterior garage was prepared so the extra servants had somewhere to park—they would continue to live in their current homes and commute—and they had already begun working in the manor, cleaning absolutely everything to make it suitable for royalty to stay at the manor, redecorating, fixing anything that even looked broken, and getting the grounds to immaculate condition.

Stanley had never been happier, Kit mused as he came down to see him rushing by, talking sternly into his phone, scolding the groundskeepers for not having the floral pattern planted near the front gate, a floral version of the Vulpan crest on a small slope that would be the first thing a visitor saw when the gates opened and they passed through the trees and reached the first curve, preparing to come up the hill to the manor house. Stanley loved hosting guests so they could gawk at the perfection in which he kept the manor, and he wanted everything to be just right for the first visitors, who would be Sam and Kevin. Sam was planning Jessie's shower, so she and Kevin decided to come a week early and stay the week, almost like a pre-honeymoon vacation, which Kit and Jessie considered a good thing. Sam was one of their best friends, and he'd love to have her and Kevin at the manor. Kit moved through several scurrying servants, one carrying new sheets just bought and delivered to one of the bedrooms, as Nick ambled over to him. "Hey Kit," he called, carrying a clipboard and his small yet bulldog-looking black submachine gun that Kit had discovered was a

Heckler and Koch MP7A1, a new submachine gun that was as small as any other submachine gun, but fired a round that was more like a rifle round, which gave it much more stopping power. The gun was quickly becoming very popular among the military and police forces around the world, and Nick was trying to sell the other mercs on the superiority of his gun. Nick had never fired it in his presence, but he boasted that he could fire the weapon with just one paw, that its recoil was so low that he could aim and control it like a pistol even when firing it fully automatic. Given how strong Nick was, Kit did not consider this an idle boast. “I’ve got the security schedules set up for the expansion. I’m not hiring other mates for the increased security, we’re going with Valiant Security. They’re gonna put guards on the grounds and me and my mates will be commanding them like officers.”

“Sounds good,” Kit answered, looking at the clipboard and the estimated staffing numbers. They were increasing security for the wedding, since there would be so many furs in the manor.

Kit’s phone rang, his Stonebrook phone, and he picked it up with a paw out to Nick. “Hello,” he called.

“Hey bro,” Vil called. “Got a moment?”

“That’s a silly question, sis,” he snorted.

She laughed. “Well, I have a favor to ask.”

“Go ahead.”

“Kendall’s asked for you to be his best male,” she said. He offered it to his father, but his father doesn’t want to participate in a Catholic wedding. Ken tried to argue for a protestant wedding.”

“He did, eh?”

“Yeah, but it’s going to be a Catholic wedding, bro, I won that little argument with that Anglican heathen,” she told him, which made him laugh. “We’ve decided to trim it down and not make it ridiculous, so we’re going with one best male, a maid of honor, three grooms, and three bridesmaids. You’ll be the best male and also the ringbearer. Ken’s brothers Harry and Michael and his friend Charlie are going to be the grooms, and Suzy will be my maid of honor. I thought about making Jessie the maiden of honor, but that’s a role traditionally held by a single femme, so I’m giving it to Suzy. Jessie, Muffy, and another friend of mine named Sonya will be the other maids. I woulda offered it to Sheila, but she won’t be here to practice.”

“Well, that’ll depend on what Jessie has to say.”

“Silly boy, she already agreed. I called her first to add more pressure on you,” she told him, which made him laugh.

“Evil femme,” he teased. “I guess I can do it.”

“Good. We have four rehearsals, but they’re on the days leading up to the wedding, and before you say it I’ll make sure the Thursday rehearsal doesn’t interfere with Jessie’s shower. So, you’ll be coming out of the manor four times, and I’ll talk to Nick tonight to arrange security for your excursions. I’ll send some tailors out there tomorrow to fit you for your tux and Jessie her dress.”

“As long as we don’t have to pay for it,” he chuckled.

“Such a silly question. You’re certainly being goofy today, bro,” she teased.

“You still coming over tonight?”

“Yeah. Tell Jessie I want some of that killer tuna casserole she makes for dinner.”

“I’ll tell her,” he promised. “So, does this mean the wedding’s all planned out?”

“Yup,” she answered. “I wanted to have our reception there at Stonebrook.”

“Well...why don’t you talk to Stanley about it, sis? I think I can tolerate the family being around me, and I doubt anyone we don’t want here is going to attend your wedding anyway. This place doesn’t mean much if you can’t use it when you want to. It’s yours, after all.”

“Oh, Jake and Maxine already said they’d be there,” she said. “But I seriously doubt they’ll come to the reception. So, you’re officially giving your blessing to hold the reception there?”

“I guess I am.”

“It’s a deal,” she said with a bright voice. “I’ll call Stanley right now and give him the bad news.”

“Bad? Do you have any idea how happy he is at the idea of hosting the Austin guests? If you tell him you’re having the reception here, he’ll swoon in delight. He might scold you for giving him such short notice, but I’m sure he’ll be ecstatic.”

“The reception is going to be simple, bro, just some music, some food, a little dancing, cut the cake, and that’s about it.”

“Well, call Stanley.”

“I will. Later bro.”

“Later sis.” Kit closed the phone and looked at Nick. “It just got a little more complicated, Nick,” he said.

“I heard. You’re going to be in the wedding procession, and the reception will be here.”

Kit nodded. “Sorry for the short notice.”

“No worries, Kit,” he smiled. “I can arrange security for the reception no problem.”

“I don’t think you can carry that with you, though,” he noted, pointing at the submachine gun.

Nick laughed. “I don’t think so. I do think we’ll need suits though. I’d better talk about that with Miss Vil,” he said, scribbling on the clipboard. “Maybe Sylvie will torture us with a sexy dress that has a neckline all the way down to here,” he sighed, putting his paw at his belt.

“I’m sure she could fix you, Nick,” he noted, which made the black-furred wolf laugh. But his smile faded when he put a finger to his earpiece, then barked a quick command into the mic at his shoulder. “There’s an unauthorized boat approaching the dock. Stay in the house!” he ordered, then he took hold of his MP7 and rushed towards the garage, where a golf cart would hurry him to the dock. “Sylvie! Stay with the PFs!” Kit heard him shout.

“Herr Kit, come to the kitchen!” Sylvia shouted. Kit hurried into the kitchen in time to see Sylvia load and cock her MP-5, which showed that she meant business. Jessie was in the kitchen with Henri, making lunch, but both of them had stopped what they were doing, watching fearfully as Sylvia pulled her earpiece jack from her radio and allowed them to listen to the chatter. Two other hired mercenaries, Nick, and five Valiant units were converging on the dock, and then they heard one of the Valiant guards call out.

“It’s filled with photographers!” he barked.

“Shoo ‘em off while we get there, Tommy!” Nick called, using the guard’s name. “ETA twenty seconds! Krichek, Grizz, keep your PDWs outta sight!”

“PDW?” Kit asked Sylvia curiously.

“Personal Defense Weapon,” she answered, holding up her MP-5, which she was now uncocking. “Term for any weapon we might use on the manor that’s illegal to American law.” She removed the magazine, removed the round from the chamber, replaced it in the magazine, then put the magazine back in her belt. “I don’t think we want those photographers to take pictures of guards on the grounds carrying illegal weapons. It might cause you problems.”

“Well, that was scary,” Jessie laughed. “Alright, Henri, what’s the next step?”

“What are you making, love?”

“Duck l’orange,” she answered. “Henri’s teaching me!”

“We’re having duck for lunch?”

She shook her head. We’re having bratwurst and sauerkraut,” she answered. “I’m making this for Nick and the other guards, cause I know you don’t like duck,” she smiled. “Carrie and Frannie’s making some sandwiches for the Valiant males. They're so polite!" she said appreciatively.

"Sounds like they're on the ball, too," Kit said as he heard more chatter, as Nick coordinated them driving the boat filled with photographers away from the manor's dock.

"They're not bad for amateurs," Sylvia said simply.

"You know, I've always wondered what it's like to shoot a gun like that."

"We can show you," she answered. "With Stanley's permission, Nick has been converting the archery range down by the back gate to a shooting area. It has an earthen embankment behind it, so it's perfect for it. He bought some targets but hasn't installed them yet."

"Yeah, that's why they put the archery range there," he remembered. "Because it's a flat area with the base of the hill behind it. Dad used to spend hours down there practicing, at least until Mom died," he said in a distant tone. "He gave it up after that. It hasn't been used since."

"And yet they keep it up?"

"It's part of the grounds," Kit shrugged. "They maintain it just as it was until told different."

"You mean you'll let us shoot your machine guns?" Jessie asked.

"If you'd like, Fraulein Jessie," she answered with a nod. "I'd be happy to teach you."

"Sounds interesting," Kit noted to Jessie, who nodded.

“I’ve never shot an automatic before. It should be really neat!” she agreed.

Sylvia keyed her mic and rattled off something in German. Nick’s voice replied, also in German, and she nodded. “Nick says he’ll get it set up by three.”

“I didn’t know Nick spoke German,” Kit laughed.

“Most furs in our line of work speak English and Spanish, and quite a few also speak French, German, or both, because they are useful languages in our line of work just because so many of us speak it. Russian used to be a very useful language to know, but not so much anymore, and Chinese is starting to become an important language for us, too.”

“French? Why French, and why German?”

“There are a lot of French and Germans in our line of work, Germans like me,” she answered with a demure smile. “There are a lot of Russians too, but they tend to hire out to be combat mercenaries more than bodyguards, so Russian isn’t as important in the line of work we do. If you do mercenary work, though, Russian is a very useful language to know. A lot of our clients speak Spanish, and if you speak English and German, you can function in most of Europe.” The radio chattered again, Nick sounding the all clear, and Sylvia acknowledged and plugged her radio earpiece back in. “Chinese is becoming important if we work in Asia, many there speak Mandarin even if they’re not Chinese. I learned French and English while growing up, and I was taught Russian when I was in the Berlin police, because there are a surprising number of furs who live there who speak Russian, a leftover from the days when Germany was divided.”

“Wow, and all we speak here in America is English,” Jessie mused.

“Many of us think that’s actually a bad thing,” Sylvia said. “If I only spoke German, I wouldn’t be able to function unless I didn’t want to earn any money or do anything with my life. Knowing only one language isolates you. If you live in Europe and you have contact with furs outside of your home village, knowing English and German at a bare minimum is a must. Knowing Russian, French, or Italian is very useful. For a German, learning Polish or Czech can also be useful, depending on where you live in Germany.”

“Learn something new every day,” Kit chuckled.

“Guess we’re luckier than most, German is spoken in several countries in Europe. That’s why it’s such an important language.”

“Anyway, pretty kitty, Vil just called about the wedding and reception,” he said, looking at her.

“Did she ask you?”

He nodded. “I accepted, so she said there will be tailors here tomorrow to fit us. I also gave her permission to have the reception here.”

“Oh, that’s nice!” Jessie said with a smile. “I hope she has it catered!” she laughed. “That would drive the poor chefs crazy trying to cater a reception!”

“I would consider it a professional challenge,” Henri told her with a roguish smile.

Later that afternoon, Nick did just as he promised. Around 2:30, he called Kit and Jessie down to the back gate, nearby which was located the old archery range, and Sylvia, Krichek, and Grizz went with them down to the range. It was an area about 50 yards long and 15 yards wide that was cleared of trees, the far side the base of the hill upon the top of which the manor house was built. The hill had been excavated slightly to form an embankment with about a 40 degree slope, a safety bank covered with ivy to ensure no arrows went flying off and hurt someone by accident. It was hidden from the rest of the manor by the forest, and the only way to reach the range was by a cart path that turned off the drive to the back gate. On the range, the old archery targets had been pushed far to one side and lined up neatly, and in their place were wood-framed targets that stood about five feet high at the bull's-eye. Nick had placed a table holding several boxes of ammunition and a cleaning kit behind a line he'd laid out using a piece of white nylon rope. There were also a few chairs further behind the line for spectators.

“As promised, your very own shooting range,” Nick smiled. “Stanley told me to leave the archery targets here and make the firearm targets portable so the place could be converted back and forth.”

“Pretty clever,” Kit nodded in agreement.

“Alright, very first thing, the safety briefing. We'll explain the safety rules, teach you about the weapons, then we'll let you fire them.”

Jessie decided to try Sylvia's MP-5, and Kit wanted to try Nick's MP7. The two of them gave them a thorough safety briefing, explaining the different dynamics involved in using an automatic weapon, then they were extensively trained in the operation of the weapons. They wouldn't let them try firing until they could immediately point out every feature of the weapons, and also explain in detail exactly how to load the weapon, chamber a round, where the safety was, what the selectors on the safety meant, how to aim the weapons using their sights, and then how to unchamber a round safely and unload the weapon.

“Alright, I think we’re ready for a few test fires,” he said. “We’ll start on semi, so you get a feel for the recoil of the weapons. Once you’ve fired off a clip, we’ll let you try them on auto.”

“This should be really cool,” Jessie said as Sylvia offered her a clip of live ammunition.

“Attention, live fire at the range is about to commence, live fire at the range is about to commence,” Nick warned into his radio. “Keep away from the downrange side of the range, and that includes no patrols of the wall until I give the all clear.” He gave Kit the clip from the weapon. “Alright, load ‘em up,” he ordered.

“Can we play too?” Grizz asked, smiling toothily. Grizz was just that, a grizzly bear, and he was even bigger and more burly than Barry. He carried a futuristic-looking FN P90, a weapon almost encased in a solid piece of aluminum.

“Semi only for now, guys,” Nick said as he put on his ear protection and gave Kit a pair of safety glasses. “And only two on the line at a time, let’s not crowd Kit and Jessie on their first time,” he added as he pulled out his Glock and checked it, then put it back in its holster. “We can take turns while they reload.”

“Sounds good,” Krichek nodded, pulling out his own MP-5, which was smaller than Sylvia’s and had no integral suppressor or retractable buttstock. In the huge Siberian tiger’s paw, it almost looked like a pistol.

Kit and Jessie loaded the weapons, extended their retractable buttstocks, then shouldered them and prepared to fire. His first shot with Nick’s gun showed him that it had even less recoil than the shotgun he used for trap shooting. The sights of his gun were a little odd, nothing like on the shotgun or the pistol that Nick had taught him to fire, but he understood how they worked and was able to hit the target. Jessie fired her first shot, which was considerably quieter because of the suppressor, and she seemed a little surprised. “It doesn’t kick as much as my shotgun,” she remarked.

“No, they’re designed to minimize recoil,” Krichek said in his Russian accent, “because they’re designed to fire in automatic. Imagine that same recoil hitting you twice a second or more, and that’s what it’s like to shoot them in full auto.”

“Oh, I get it,” Jessie nodded as she shouldered the MP-5 again.

After Kit and Jessie emptied their clips, which took longer for Kit because it had a 20 round clip where Jessie had an 16 round clip, Sylvia and Nick stepped up to the line with their pistols. Nick had his Glock, but Sylvia carried a Beretta 92. “Five bucks a point?” Nick offered as he chambered a round.

“You’re on,” she answered. “Five seconds, ten shots.”

“Deal.”

Clearly understanding what they meant, Krichek stepped up and raised a paw as he looked at his watch on his other wrist. “Three. Two. One. Fire!” he barked, jerking his paw down quickly.

Kit understood after they started shooting. Each of them fired off rounds in rapid succession from their semi-automatic pistols, and he realized they had to fire ten shots in five seconds or less. They were firing at the other two targets, and as Kit watched, small holes appeared in both of them as the two professionals more or less emptied their clips into the targets in about four seconds. “Time!” Krichek barked, waving his paw, but that was moot. Both of them were finished before he made the call.

“No shooting guys, we have to go check our targets,” Nick called.

“What’s five bucks a point?” Jessie asked Grizz.

“They’ll add up the points, and whoever wins gets five dollars for every point over the loser. So, if Sylvia scored a fifteen, and Nick a twenty, she owes him twenty-five dollars.”

“Gambling on shooting. Now I’ve heard of everything!” Jessie laughed.

“That’ll probably be the other way around,” Krichek chuckled. “Sylvie is good with pistols. She even has Olympic medal.”

From what Kit saw, it was probably about even, and the bullets weren’t centered in the middle. Shooting so fast made the recoil spread their shots around the target, but Kit did see that each target had ten holes in it. At least they didn’t miss. Sylvia laughed, and Nick reached into his pocket.

“I think you’re right, Krichek,” Jessie giggled.

Nick surrendered money to Sylvia, then the two of them replaced the two outside targets with fresh ones. When they came back up, they both attended Kit and Jessie. “Alright, auto this time,” Nick said. “Sylvie, load five rounds in the clip. We’ll give you five rounds so you can feel what it’s like in auto. But we don’t want you to shoot all of them at once. The trick to shooting auto is short controlled bursts. Just squeeze the trigger, and as soon as you feel the gun buck, let go. You should fire three rounds by the time you take the pressure off the trigger. We load you up with five rounds so if you forget to let go of the trigger, the gun isn’t up here by the time it’s empty,” he said, holding his arm at a high angle. “Now remember, the gun will recoil with every bullet you shoot, so the muzzle of the weapon is going to climb. Your job is to keep it level, to keep it from bucking higher. It’s going to surprise you the first time, it always does. That’s another reason we only start off with five rounds.”

“Okay,” Kit nodded, adjusting his glasses as Nick loaded five surprisingly slender rounds into the clip for the MP7. Kit loaded the magazine and chambered the round, then shouldered the weapon. “Am I good to go?”

“Fire when ready,” Nick nodded as Jessie chambered a round in the weapon she was using.

He tried to do as Nick said, press the trigger, then let it go when he felt the recoil. He felt the gun buck, and he tried to let go of the trigger, but then it bucked again almost immediately, which surprised him, and delayed him from letting go of the trigger. By the third recoil, the muzzle was indeed significantly higher, and Kit finally reacted by quickly taking his finger off the trigger and pulling the weapon back down. It fired again before his finger came off, but his increased pull on the muzzle kept the weapon from getting any higher. By the time it stopped firing, he’d fired four rounds, and had one left in the clip.

“Not bad,” Nick nodded as Jessie fired. She gave a surprised look as the gun chattered in her paws, but she did a much better job of keeping it level. However, she too fired off four rounds instead of three. “Very good, dove,” Nick said appreciatively.

“That is so different from a shotgun!” she exclaimed with a surprised smile.

“Yes, it is, isn’t it?” Nick nodded. “Let’s try eight rounds this time. And let’s let the boys play while we load up.”

Kit and Jessie moved off of the line, and Krichek and Grizz replaced them. “Five bucks a point?”

“Don’t be pansy, ten,” Krichek challenged. “How many rounds in that toy?”

“Thirteen, yours?”

“Fifteen.”

“Thirteen in eight seconds,” he offered.

“Bet,” Krichek grinned. He chattered at Sylvia in Russian.

“Da,” she answered, then looked at her watch as she stepped up beside them at the line. “Three. Two. One. Fire!” she called.

As Nick supervised them loading rounds into the magazines, the two big bodyguards all but emptied their pistols into the targets down range. They both finished before Sylvia called time, then they holstered the weapons and hurried down to their targets. “Change only the outside targets while you’re down there!” Nick shouted. “And keep the old ones, we’ll reuse them for Kit and Jessie!”

“Da, boss!” Krichek called.

“Alright, just wait here until they’re back up here,” Nick told Kit as he gave him the loaded magazine. Kit slotted the magazine in place, but did not chamber a round, to which Nick nodded in appreciation.

For nearly an hour, Kit and Jessie were given the privilege to learn how to fire automatic weapons. Kit learned how to minimize the muzzle climb with some tricks Nick taught him, and after an hour, he could fire the desired three round burst and keep the muzzle level. Nick had let him shoot as many as nine rounds at a time, letting him shoot as many as he could before he felt he was losing aim with the weapon, which was nine shots. Kit had to admit, he liked Nick's weapon. It really didn't have much recoil, it wasn't that heavy, and it was easy to aim, shoot, and to reload. Kit and Jessie weren't the only ones to fire at the targets on automatic. Krichek and Grizz also used their submachine guns on the range, Krichek showing how he fired his MP-5K with one paw like a pistol, the weapon rock solid in his paw as he emptied the entire clip at the target without the gun's muzzle climbing. Grizz showed off his P90, which looked almost like a laser gun from a Sci-fi flick, but it looked solid, and the bear could fire the weapon confidently. Kit and Jessie also got to test fire the assorted pistols they used, from Sylvia's Beretta 92 to Grizz's Walther P99 to Krichek's Kel-Tec P11, and right before they ended, they traded weapons and fired them, then Grizz allowed them to test fire his P90 on automatic after he loaded it for them and showed them where the safety was, letting them fire the weapon without as much training because they were literally just firing it with him right there to observe to make sure they did it safely. They picked up their shell casings as they went, and they kept them separate, since certain brass belonged to certain weapons, and all four of them knew how to make their own bullets, re-using the shell casings for new rounds. That made the brass casings ejected from the weapons valuable.

When they were done, Nick keyed up his radio. "Firing at the range is now complete, repeat, firing at the range is now complete. Wall patrols may recommence."

"That was fun!" Jessie said brightly.

“Da, the shooting is always fun, but now comes the not fun part. Cleaning,” he grinned as he moved towards the table.

“You shot ‘em, you clean ‘em,” Nick smiled slyly at Kit.

“No sweat, Nick, show me how to take this apart.”

All of them bent to the task of cleaning the weapons, and Grizz laughed. “This is why private ranges rock. We’d never be allowed to use our machine guns at a public range.”

“We could, but would get very unfriendly visit from ATF if we did,” Krichek chuckled as he broke down his MP-5K with professional speed.

Another cart rolled into the cleared area, holding Vil and Kendall. “So here’s where you’re hiding!” Vil called.

“Hey Vil!” Jessie said with a bright smile. “They converted this to a shooting range and let us try out some of their guns!”

“I heard some of it when I was driving up,” she grinned. “Have fun?”

“It was a lot of fun!” she said with a nod.

“Well, we have planning to do guys, get a move on,” she commanded.

“We’ll be done in a little bit,” Kit told her. “Just go up to the house and we’ll be up when we finish. We can’t leave until we clean up the mess we made.”

“Sure, if you don’t want me here,” Vil grinned.

“You can sit in that cart and wait or you can go up to the air conditioned house and wait in a comfortable chair and a cup of tea,” Kit noted.

She laughed. “Good point. I’ll be in the ballroom with Stanley when you’re finished playing with your toys.”

With their help, Kit and Jessie learned how to take apart and clean the weapons, then they reassembled them under the watchful eyes and step by step instructions of their owners. Once they were done, Nick boxed up all the ammunition they didn’t fire and drove Kit and Jessie back up to the house while Sylvia, Krichek, and Grizz rode in the cart behind them. “So, did you like shooting a real gun?” he asked.

“Yes, and thanks for the lesson, Nick, it was fun,” Kit answered.

“So, tell me. You shot all four autos...which did you like the best?” he asked with a grin.

“I’d be inclined to say yours, since I used it the most, but I think that’s what you want to hear,” he answered, which made Nick explode into laughter.

Stanley was almost trembling with excitement when they went to the main ballroom, a cavernous room just off the main dining room with a checkered floor and fluted columns near the walls along both sides, behind which chairs were placed in rows along the walls. The far corner of the ballroom had a raised platform large enough for a nine piece musical ensemble, and there were professional speakers along the columns high up, near the ceiling. That ceiling was nearly twenty feet high; there were no rooms on the second floor over the ballroom, it took up that area. The ceiling above was painted with radial designs around the three chandeliers that hung from the ceiling, and that ceiling was about four feet lower than the floor of the third floor. Up on the second floor, the six guest bedrooms flanked the void space created by the ballroom’s walls and ceiling. Stanley and Dee were talking excitedly with Vil and Kendall, as Vil, in a wheelchair with Bartholomew behind her diligently, made sweeping motions with her paws as she explained something to the butler. “So, you heard the happy news, Stanley?” Jessie asked.

“She just told me, Mistress Jessie,” he said with a beatific smile. “I was so hoping she would have her reception here. Where else would be proper? But I’m not entirely appreciative of the short notice, Miss Vilenne,” he said, slightly accusingly.

“We weren’t entirely sure if we should have it here, because of the security precautions, but Stav and Marcus assured me that we can keep Kit and Jessie safe and still have my reception here. Besides, you can handle it, you’re a tough fox.”

“I’ll prove to you just how good we are, Miss Vilenne,” he smiled. “We will give you a reception worthy of a Vulpan!”

Kit and Jessie listened as Vil explained what she wanted, which was something almost akin to a formal ball. She wanted the ballroom decorated in white and red silk buntings and white and red roses, a live band, and a dinner that would be served on tables in both the formal dining room and the ballroom that would be spaced evenly, with Vil and Kendall sitting at the head table near the dais. The first few rows of tables could be moved after dinner to make room for dancing, and they could use the space between the columns and the walls for chairs, champagne tables, appetizers, and tables for dishes and glasses.

“What kind of meal do you want, Miss Vilenne?”

“Offer three main courses, lamb chops, lobster, and filet mignon,” she answered. “As far as the side dishes, appetizers, and desserts go, let the cooks decide on the menu.”

Both Stanley and Dee were writing furiously on clipboards. “How many guests are you expecting?”

“Around a hundred will be invited to the reception,” she answered. “That’s why we’re going to have the spillover in the formal dining room. I don’t think we can pack that many in here without making it too crowded.”

“Actually, I can fit a hundred in here, Miss Vilenne, I’ll use round tables that seat fourteen each. I’ll line them up in two rows of four, that will give us some extra seating just in case, and that should just about perfectly fill the room with just enough space between the tables so they don’t seem jammed together. We can remove the four near tables for dancing after dinner and direct the guests to chairs along the walls if they wish to sit, yet leave some table space for those who wish to sit at a table. I’ll still prepare the formal dining room for possible spillover, however, just in case.”

Vil and Stanley continued discussing the reception as Nick arrived, grinning at Kit and Jessie. “Miss Vil,” he said, shaking her paw. “Now, we need to talk about security for the reception.”

“You’re next on the list, Nick,” she told him, patting him on the wrist. “Just listen for now so you know what’s going to happen.”

Kit and Jessie listened in relative silence as Vil described how she wanted her reception to go. “It’s not going to be traditional,” she told them. “I want it to be fairly simple. We come in after the ceremony, we greet the guests at the head table because I have this little problem,” she noted, pointing at her casted leg. “We eat, then after we eat, the band comes in and we dance a while, then we cut the cake. After we cut the cake, we kick everyone out. I want it to run about three hours total.”

“That’s fairly simple,” Stanley chuckled. “So, to go over the decorations, you want red and white silk buntings, red and white trim and tablecloths, roses, did you want candles on the tables?”

“I’ll leave the exact details of the décor up to you, Stanley, that way I can be a little surprised.”

He smiled brightly. “Certainly, Miss Vil,” he said, making a note. “And you just gave us the schedule. I’ll have to convert the helipad to a parking lot,” he grunted, making another note.

“We’re leaving by chopper, Stanley.”

“Can the chopper land on the lawn, Miss Vil? It will be much easier to repair to chopper strut divots in the lawn than dozens of tire marks. If you’re expecting a hundred guests, that will be fifty to seventy cars limousines.”

“We can park the limos out on the county road and arrange the valet system so we can call them back in,” Vil told them. “Just worry about where to park the cars that come. You can always park them out on the back roads. Keep the helipad clear.”

“I’ll talk to the county and get special permission to park cars on the roadway,” he said with a nod, making a note.

“Alright, Nick, let’s talk,” Vil told him.

“I’d like a force of at least fifty hired from Valiant, Miss Vil.”

“That’s reasonable,” she nodded. “You want them as soon as possible?”

He nodded. “I have to train them. We’ll need radios for them.”

“Stanley, take care of it,” she said.

“I’ll have them here by tomorrow morning.”

“What I intend to do is set up three lines of security,” Nick said, borrowing Stanley’s clipboard, getting a clean sheet, and making very rough drawing of the house. “We’ll have static security checkpoints at the gates, at the docks, in the house stopping visitors from entering unauthorized areas, and also at strategic points on the grounds so nobody can slip off into the woods without being seen,” he began, making a series of X marks on the paper at certain locations. “We’ll use two fur teams except here in the ballroom, where I’ll have ten furs stationed in discreet locations. The second line of security will be roving patrols that will rotate through the entire manor grounds as well as through the manor itself. Inside the manor, I want to use furs I hire from my mates, because there’s no telling how tempting some of the things laying around inside the house might be to a fur making eight dollars an hour. I can trust my mates not to touch anything. They’re professionals. It also places more than just the eight of us in the manor in case something drastic happens.”

“Reasonable,” Vil nodded.

“The third line of security will be surveillance. We need to buy some portable cameras and install them and set up a command post where we can keep an eye on things. We can make them pretty obvious, just cameras on stands, and cameras in the manor on critical points, like the doors to the wings. It’ll also keep the point guards honest,” he chuckled.

“Do it. But coordinate with Stanley when you start trying to drill holes in his walls.”

“I’m gonna use a microwave transmission system so there’s no cords. This kinda job is right up Barnett’s alley, he specializes in setting up camera surveillance.”

“One of your guards?”

He nodded. “The mate that looks like a big jackal, but that’s because his dad was a wolf,” he said. “Good mate, knows his business.” He glanced to the side. “I’m going to have Sylvie escort Jessie everywhere during the reception. She should not be left alone, even for a second.”

“Amen,” Kit said with a strong nod. “I guess we’ll find out if Sylvia can look good in a party dress while carrying three pistols and a bowie knife.”

Nick laughed. “She’s a stunner, alright,” he grinned.

“I don’t need that,” Jessie said, a bit modestly.

“You’re the most important thing in the world, love, you do need it. I won’t take even one chance with your safety,” Kit told her. “What’s the problem, anyway? You like Sylvia.”

“Well, sure, she’s really nice, but I think it’s kinda silly you’re treating me like the Queen of England.”

“You’re more important than that,” Kit smiled.

“Alright, I’ll call Valiant and have them dig up fifty guards and have them here as soon as they can get them here,” Vil said. “And I’ll let you two chew on the details, I want to spend some time with my brother and sister-in-law,” she said, smiling at them. “Barty, mush!” she called cheekily, pointing towards the side door to the TV room.

Bartholomew laughed and took hold of her wheelchair. "I'll let you get away with that, Miss Vil, if only because you used to let me win when we played Trouble."

Vil laughed. "Just warn me before you dump me out of the chair, okay?"

"Will do."

Kit, Vil, Jessie, and Kendall sat in the TV room and just talked a while, as Bartholomew poured them each cups of tea and retreated quietly to the bar. Kit and Vil explained a Catholic wedding to Kendall in detail, and also to Jessie, since she would be part of the bridal party. "Kit's going to be the best male and the ring bearer," Vil explained. "He'll be right beside you when the ceremony starts, Ken. Suzy will be my maid of honor, she'll be the last one in the procession. Jessie, you'll be a bridesmaid, you'll be escorted down the aisle by one of Ken's grooms. Since Dad is dead, tradition demands that I come down the aisle alone. However, to make a statement to the family, I'm going to ask Ken's dad to give me away."

"He'd do it in a heartbeat, Vil," Ken assured her.

"Good. You two will have the whole week before the wedding to learn how a traditional Catholic wedding works. We'll do the whole thing, communion and all."

"God, I haven't taken communion since I was sixteen," Kit grunted.

"Well, what about us? I'm not about to take communion from a Catholic priest," Ken grinned.

"You just nod at the priest and step aside," Vil told him. "After the ceremony, we'll come back here for the reception, then it's all done. We live happily ever after.”

“Where are you going for your honeymoon?” Jessie asked.

“Well, Saturday I have a promise to keep,” she said. “So we’ll be staying at Hart’s Crossing overnight. Saturday morning we go to Columbus to watch Ben play. I promised him I’d be there, and I don’t break my word.”

“He’ll understand, Vil. It’s your honeymoon!” Jessie protested.

“He may understand, but I’ll know I broke my promise,” she said adamantly. “After his game, we’re going to my vacation condo in the keys for a week, then Ken’s taking me to Monaco for a week on the Riviera. If I’m lucky, I’ll come home pregnant, and we settle in at Hart’s Crossing.”

“I’m going to have to find a job,” Ken laughed. “The old male fired me!”

“Why did he do that?” Jessie asked.

“He doesn’t want me to travel, he wants me to stay close to home, and my job required me to run all over the globe. I can’t give him a grandson if I’m in Bahrain or Thailand and Vil’s here.”

“Oh,” Jessie said, then she giggled girlishly. “It sounds like he’s serious.”

“If I don’t present him with a grandson in a year, he’ll probably disown me,” he said, giving Vil a smile.

“A grandson, eh?” Vil asked. “And if we have a girl?”

“We’d better not. My life is at stake here,” he said with insincere fear, which made Kit laugh.

“I’m hoping that I’ll be walking down the aisle by the time we have the ceremony. I don’t relish the idea of trying to come down the aisle on crutches or a cane,” Vil said with a sober look.

“When do they say you’ll get out of the cast?”

“A week after the ceremony,” she sighed. “That’s part of why we’re going to the keys for the first week. Tomorrow they’re supposed to take off the bandage,” she said, patting her arm. “But, my fur is starting to grow back where I was burned,” she said with a relieved sigh. “And it’s not white! They said there’s always a risk that fur growing over a former burn may come in white, but my fur’s perfectly normal.”

“So, it’ll be long sleeve shirts for a while?” Jessie asked.

She nodded. “They wanted the bandage to stay in place until my fur started growing back in, to prevent some condition where the sun burns the skin from exposure.”

“Never heard of that.”

“It’s a condition that affects some boars and pigs,” Ken said. “They call it sunburn.”

“Weird,” Jessie mused.

“Like I’d go around with my arm uncovered,” Vil laughed.

“How’s your leg?” Kit asked.

“On the mend, faster than expected,” she answered. “The doctors are hopeful that I’ll be walking by the wedding. They’re going to recast my leg tomorrow with a rubber pad on the bottom, a cast that will let me walk on it. I’m supposed to stay on my crutches for a few days, then we’ll see how well I do on a cane. They said that my break is almost exactly like a classic ski boot break, and ski boot breaks can walk on their casts. So, after I mend enough, I should be ambulatory. At worst, I'll be using a cane. If I'm lucky, I'll be walking."

"Well, here's hoping," Kit said, patting her on the shoulder. "You'll look silly coming down the aisle on crutches."

"I'll feel silly," she agreed.

"Well, I promise not to laugh until after I see our wedding video, Vil," Kendall said.

"You'd better not," she warned, but she was smiling.

"I'll make sure to laugh, just for you," he winked, then he stood up. "Now if you'll excuse me, I need to visit the exiled male's room," he said, scurrying out.

Jessie giggled. "He's so silly," she said, "just like my handsome fox."

"I am not silly," Kit corrected airily. "So, when's the important part?"

"What important part?"

"The lawyer," he said.

She chuckled. "We already took care of that," she answered. "Typical rich fox prenup. Our assets remain separate, the only communal property will be that gained after marriage, my salary, dividends, and stock are not considered communal property ever, one recognized joint account, ability to gift money and property back and forth, so on and so on, but there's also a penalty clause in there."

"What's that?" Jessie asked.

“I’m Catholic, Jessie, and we don’t divorce,” she answered. “Ken isn’t. There’s a penalty clause in our prenup that states that if he tries to divorce me, he loses all right to try to sue for half the amassed value we accrued while married. My side of it flatly states that there will be no divorce,” she said. “That I am forbidden from seeking a divorce. It doesn’t stop me from seeking an annulment, but I can’t file for divorce.”

“Keep that in mind, love,” Kit said lightly. “Catholics never divorce. You will never get rid of me.”

“Like I’d want to,” she winked at him. “What happens if you two sour?”

“I’ll banish him from my house,” she said simply. “He’ll probably move back to England. But I still won’t divorce him, even if I hate him. If he wants to be free of me, he’ll have to divorce me, and if he does he leaves with nothing more than what he was married with, which really isn’t that big of a deal, since he’s actually much richer than I am. Oh, and I have automatic custody of the kids if we divorce,” she added. “That’s also part of our prenup.”

Kit’s phone rang, and he saw that it was a call from Austin. “A cousin,” he said, opening the phone. “Hello?”

“Checking in for all the girls, cousin,” Angela called. “We’re about to go to the movies.”

“The movies? That’s rather tame,” Kit noted.

She giggled. “Sheila took us to a very interesting place last night.”

“Oh, let me guess,” he said blandly. “The Top Hat.”

Jessie started giggling. “Yup yup,” Angela said in a trilling voice. “Who knew such a fun place existed in this cattle town?”

Over the two weeks they’d been down there, his femme cousins had settled in and settled down somewhat. When they called, they always seemed cheerful and upbeat, which was a good sign, and Sheila had certainly shown them all around town so they always had something interesting to do. They’d certainly gone to their share of nightclubs, but they were also doing other things, amusing themselves when Sheila was busy with her flight school. What was more interesting, however, was how every single one of his femme cousins had accepted Allison into the fold. Once they got their preconception of her out of their minds that she was a gold-digging whore, they found out that Allison was much, much more than that, that she was intelligent, educated, observant, and very interesting. Bess had noted absently that she understood exactly what Terry saw in her after she’d gotten to know Allison. Allison had been absorbed into the Vulpan Party Pack, as did Sam, Danielle, and Lisa, whom had been introduced to the cousins by Sheila, and had quickly been subverted to the dark side. They were a strong core of relatives and friends who liked to go out together and have fun together, and much to Kit’s relief, they were doing more than partying, drinking, and chasing males. Sheila and Allison had taken the cousins flying in rental planes, they’d gone and done things like golf, horseback riding, and water skiing, Sheila had convinced Rick to give his cousins a tour of the magazine office, where Barry interviewed them for an article in the magazine and quite a few pictures of them appeared in the magazine and on the website. They did a fair share of shopping, and they did go clubbing almost every night, but so far Kit hadn’t heard of Vil having to bail them out of jail, so they’d been behaving themselves up to a point. But the important thing was, Bess, Lynn, Mary, and the younger girls weren't only partying the way they did in Boston. They were actually doing things. But in a week, Angela and Joy would be leaving Austin and returning to Boston so they could go back to school.

"Why does that not surprise me."

"We bought Joy a guy," she added lightly. "We had to make sure she goes home with a smile on her face, you know."

"I did not need to hear that," he told her.

"What fun is doing it if nobody knows about it?" she asked with a laugh. "Talk to you later, cousin."

"Later Angie." He closed the phone, and the look on his face made Jessie explode into laughter. "They bought Joy time with one of the males at the club," he grunted.

Vil laughed. "Well, I hope she enjoyed it," she said boldly.

"I hope her Jake doesn't hear about it."

"He has three Party Pack daughters, he's probably numb by now," Vil laughed.

Ken returned, kissed Vil on the cheek, and sat down beside her. "So, what slanderous rumors did you make up about me while I was gone?"

"Not you, our cousins called in from Texas," Vil told him. "Sheila took them to the Top Hat last night."

"What's that?"

"A private and somewhat illegal sex club. Seems our cousins bought a male prostitute for Joy, who's eighteen."

“Well, that’s adult age here in the states,” he said with a slight smile. “Besides, if Joy is a proper rich girl, she hasn’t been a virgin since she was thirteen.”

“Fourteen,” Vil corrected lightly, which made Kendall gasp in mock astonishment.

“Dear lord, you mean to tell me I wasn’t your first?” he cried.

“Not even close,” she said with an arch little smile, taking a sip of tea. “You’re somewhere in the teens. High teens.”

“My world is crumbling!” he declared, putting his paw over his eyes. “My bride to be can’t wear white at the wedding!” He fell back onto the couch, which made Jessie giggle, then put both paws to his chest. “Shoot me now, put me out of my misery! I can’t go on!”

“You’d better go on,” Vil said. “Or I’ll nail you to a board and stand you up at the altar if I have to. Besides, tonight we have to celebrate me getting a smaller cast. One that allows me a little more movement,” she said pointedly, which made him sit back up so far that Jessie almost fell on her side on the couch laughing.

Ken stood up. “Was so good to visit, Kit, Jessie,” he said quickly, shaking Kit’s paw as Kit tried hard not to laugh. “But I feel this pressing need to return home. Right now.”

“Mmm-hmm,” Vil grunted with a simple nod. “We’re staying for dinner, Ken.”

“Might I borrow your shower, Kit?” he asked, which was too much for Jessie. Her head crashed into Kit’s lap as she laughed uncontrollably.

They had dinner with Muffy and Suzy, stuffed peppers and au gratin potatoes. “Where have you been all day, Muffy?” Jessie asked as she set down the platter.

“I got a little drunk last night,” she admitted. “I had a hangover this morning, so I slept it off.”

“You went out?”

She nodded. “I finally decided to risk it. I went to a club I like, danced a little, and drank a little too much. I got up around one, then I went out to do some shopping. I had to look for a wedding present and a baby shower present, after all,” she smiled.

“Well, stop that. I won’t have my bridesmaid sloshing into the church lit up like a Christmas tree.”

“Bridesmaid? Me?” she asked suddenly.

“If you want the job,” she said dryly in reply.

“Yes! Sure! Thanks, Vil!” she gushed.

“You need rewards for at least trying to stick it out with Kit and Jessie.”

Muffy laughed. “Sorry, but I was feeling a little cabin fever last night, and today was kinda a shopping requirement.”

“Be here tomorrow at eleven, the tailors are coming to fit you guys for your wedding clothes.”

“Okay Vil.”

“You missed the fun, Muffy, Nick and the guards let us shoot their machine guns,” Jessie told her as she sat down at the kitchen table. “It was really interesting!”

“I bet it was,” Muffy nodded. “Was it hard?”

“It took a little getting used to at first, but there at the end I could keep the gun aimed at the target,” she answered.

“Where’s Corey, Sue?” Kit asked.

“Maine,” she answered. “They’re starting that documentary. He’ll be back for the wedding.” She laughed. “Vil tried to hire him to do the wedding!”

“Well, he’s a filmmaker,” she said defensively.

“Not that kind of film,” Suzy winked. “Besides, he has a contract, he has to honor it.”

“Who did you hire to do the photos and video for the wedding?” Muffy asked.

“Patriot Productions,” she answered. “Will has been dealing with most of that stuff for me, and he’s doing a great job. I tell him what I want, and he gets it done.”

“That’s what a chief butler does, gets it done,” Kendall nodded. “I rather like Will. Nice chap, but very professional. When you ask him to do something, it gets done quick and right.”

“That’s why I took him from Stonebrook,” Vil nodded. “He may be young, but he’s good.”

“I need to get a wedding present too,” Kit mused.

Vil laughed. “My wedding present is right here,” she said, pointing at him and Jessie. “But I need to get Jessie a shower gift,” she noted to herself.

“Don’t go crazy,” Kit warned.

“I was only going to buy her Rhode Island,” she said flippantly. “It’s the smallest state, after all.”

Jessie broke out into laughter. “I don’t need a state, Vil. Wanna make me happy? Buy me a baby seat that’ll fit in our plane.”

“Done,” Vil nodded. “I’ll get you an airplane baby seat on top of Rhode Island.”

Jessie giggled. “Eat your dinner,” she commanded.

“Yes, ma’am,” Vil smiled, taking a bite of her stuffed pepper.

They talked about the upcoming wedding with Suzy during and after dinner, as Vil described the upcoming ceremony in greater detail, which was easy for them to follow. Suzy was Catholic too, and she knew the Catholic wedding ceremony. Vil explained the ceremony in detail for Kendall and Jessie, who learned all about the marriage sacrament and also how Vil was going to slightly deviate from the accepted tradition. Having Winston Brighton give her away was one way she was going to alter the ceremony. Dee and Stanley served wine around the room except for Jessie and Kit, who took grape juice. “We’ll have daily practices at one o’clock starting on Monday,” Vil said. “Sue, come to Stonebrook tomorrow around ten thirty, the tailors are going to be here fitting for the clothes. May as well put you here too. I’ll have Sonya show up too.”

Sonya was the rarity among Vil’s circle of friends. She was Sonya Cooper, a rich kid to be sure, but she wasn’t a fox, she wasn’t “old money,” and she wasn't from Boston. Sonya was a coyote from Omaha, Nebraska, "new money," whose family had made it in the laser, munitions, and GPS businesses. Cooper Arms and Technologies was a relatively new company as a Vulpan would reckon things that manufactured military electronics and technologies. It had literally started as a garage company run by her father, who was an engineering genius, who invented the first laser system that was used in laser guided bombs. He borrowed money up to his ears and started a small manufacturing company, made prototypes, and with those prototypes he won a contract to build the systems, which were adopted into most laser-guided bombs used even today. They'd won several defense contracts for other laser-based systems like sights for light arms, rangefinders, "paint" lasers that ground-based troops used to guide munitions fired from aircraft, and offensive "blinding" lasers that were designed to jam enemy systems. After they became successful building laser guided bombs and laser systems, they then branched out to help develop the current Global Positioning System. Cooper was one of the main companies that developed the technology and software used in GPS satellites, which they then adapted into their munitions to build "GPS bombs" that used GPS to strike static targets. Recently, the company was dabbling in light arms by buying out Kel-Tec, who made pistols and was currently developing an assault weapon to try to sell to the military, and had also bought out a company known as Dragon Defense, which made military grade body armor, bullet proof vests, armored glass, metal and polymer armors, and other protective systems. What had started as a garage business was now a solid and impressive member of the defense industrial complex, with 12 factories in five states in the midwest and Washington state, two brand names bought out and under the company umbrella, and worth nearly $2 billion. The Coopers themselves weren't billionaires, but they were pretty damn close, with Sonya's father worth an estimated $850 million in non-company assets and cash. Cooper Technologies earned a tiny royalty for every GPS system made, which in the last few years had turned into massive royalties because of the explosion in popularity of GPS systems, showing that Sonya's father truly was a visionary businessman. Every Garmin Nouveau and Tom-Tom, every Onstar system installed in GMC cars, every LoJack, every child or pet locator system, every hiker's handheld GPS map and emergency beacon, every single GPS system produced by civilian companies had to pay a small royalty to Cooper Technologies for the privilege of using the GPS satellite system for every unit they produced. They'd met by chance at one of the country clubs in Boston, one of the four clubs where Vil played golf, and had been friends ever since. Kit actually had never met Sonya. She'd been Vil's friend for only about a year. She was 24 years old and in her final semester at Harvard, getting her MBA. After she graduated, she would join her family company as an executive.

What started purely as a business move had turned into a friendship, Vil had confided to him during one of their talks. Vil had known who Sonya was when they chanced to meet at the club, which was just luck, and had gone out of her way to talk to her and get to know her, so as to get a connection with her father and her company. But she sincerely liked Sonya, and so a genuine friendship had blossomed from what Vil had meant to be a calculated business move. But that didn't stop Vil from using her friendship with Sonya to the company's advantage, as much as it didn't stop Sonya from doing the same. Because of that chance meeting, Vulpan Shipyards had signed a contract with Cooper Technologies a few months ago to supply GPS systems for the non-military ships the shipyards produced.

"I'd like to finally meet Sonya."

“Well, she’s been in Nebraska,” Vil told him. “She went back home for summer vacation. She’s coming back to Boston, and should be in the air now and on the way. She’s coming early because she agreed to be my bridesmaid, so she has to be here for the rehearsals.”

“Sonya’s nice,” Suzy said with a nod. “Kinda plain, but nice.”

“Here, I have a picture of her,” Vil said, pointing at her purse. “Barty.” Bartholomew retrieved her purse for her, and she dug a picture out of it, showing her and a shockingly tall coyote out on a golf course, a coyote that was actually rather cute...in a coyote kind of way. She had strong features rather than feminine ones, short brown hair done in a pixie style through which her ears poked out, but she wasn’t ugly. She was no knockout like Allison, but she was definitely worth a second look. Handsome. That was a good word for Sonya, handsome.

“Woah,” Muffy breathed. “She’s like a flagpole!”

“Wow, is she really that tall?” Jessie gasped.

“Six foot four, and as strong as a bull,” Vil sighed, which made Suzy laugh. “She played center on Harvard’s basketball team when she was an undergrad. She’s not a bad ball player.”

“Wow, she’s taller than me,” Kit laughed.

“By five inches,” Vil teased.

“And I always thought I was tall,” Jessie giggled. “She makes me look like a little girl!”

“God, we’ll have to keep her away from Nick,” Kit said with a snort, then he laughed helplessly.

“Nick? He has to get in line. Marcus has a huge crush on Sonya,” Vil said with a grin. “I can hear his heart speed up every time she’s around him.”

“Where is he anyway?”

“They’re out talking with Nick and the other mercs,” Vil said. “They all know each other.”

“Oh.”

“I’ll have Sonya show up here around ten thirty too.”

“I can pick her up and bring her,” Suzy offered.

“Sure, that works,” Vil nodded. “That way the tailors can get four of you out the way. Ken, you need to get your brothers and your friend over here, as well as your father.”

“It’s a little late to call right now. I can call around one in the morning, and they’ll be here by eleven.”

“Can your friend Charlie drop everything and come over?”

“He’s one of the idle rich aristocrats, has his own title and everything,” Kendall smiled. “He’ll see it as an adventure, he’ll be here.” Kendall laughed. “Baron Charles William Duke, Knight of the Realm. Goes around and calls himself Baron Duke, which makes everyone give him a double take.”

“He was knighted?” Kit asked curiously.

Kendall nodded. “Like most aristocrats, he was in the military. He served six years in the Royal Marines as an officer, earned a knighthood due to valorous action when the Royal Marines occupied Basra. His unit was ambushed and he led them while they held off their attackers for three hours until reinforcements arrived. He even has a scar he loves to show off,” Kendall laughed. “But don’t ask to see it.”

“Why?” Suzy asked.

“It’s on his bum,” he answered with a grin. “He got shot in the bum while in Iraq.”

They all laughed, but Vil said “well, at least he proved he’s a brave male to go into combat.”

“Oh, Charlie’s fearless, no doubt about that,” Kendall agreed. “I just giggle at the idea of him in military gear shooting at someone. He doesn’t look like a Marine.”

“Short?”

“Well, he’s a British hare for one, and it’s very hard to take a male seriously with those big bunny ears and that bunny tail. How could the Iraqis concentrate on the fight with Lieutenant Cute and Fuzzy Bunny barking orders at his males on the other side?” he said seriously, which made Kit explode into laughter.

“He sounds cute!” Muffy gushed.

“He’s a cute devil, that’s for sure, but watch out. He’s one of the most notorious feminizers in England,” Kendall winked at her. “And he loves the vixens. Says it’s a case of the prey hunting the predator,” he grinned.

“Sounds like we need to take him down a peg, Vil,” Suzy smiled at her.

“Sounds so,” Vil nodded with a smile. “So, sounds like all the bridal party will be here tomorrow by eleven. Good, that’ll make it easy for the tailors.”

After about another hour, Suzy, Vil, and Kendall went home, Kit and Jessie retired to the bedroom to watch a movie, and Muffy decided to stay in as well, enjoying a glass of wine down in the TV room. They arranged it with Nick that the tailors and all the wedding party would be arriving at the manor the next day, around eleven, so they were all set up. “We’ll meet Ken’s dad tomorrow,” Kit noted. “Winston Brighton.”

“That should be nice,” Jessie said with a yawn. “Let’s go take a bath, love, and go to bed. We can finish this movie tomorrow.”

“Getting you naked is always a good thing,” he said with a smile as he stood, and offered his paw to her.

“There’s getting to be a lot of me to see,” she laughed, patting her belly. “If I get any bigger, I’m afraid I’ll pop like a balloon!”

“Five weeks, five days,” he said with a smile. “You know, when Doctor Mac comes up next week, we need to ask her how long we can have sex until it’s not safe,” he mused.

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled slightly, and she laughed. “Like you’ll want me when I’m like this,” she said, holding her paw way out in front of her.

“You’re not far from that already,” he noted dryly. “I told you, silly girl, you’re not fat, you’re pregnant,” he told her lightly. “You’re still a sexy beast.”

The first ones to arrive the next day were Suzy and Vil’s friend Sonya.

She really was that tall. She was taller than Kit, sleek and athletic, wearing a Harvard Basketball tee shirt and a pair of knickers that could be worn as full-length pants by Suzy or Vil. She was taller than Kit by nearly a half a foot, and taller than Jessie by about eight inches. At 5'9", Jessie was considered tall for a girl, yet she looked like a little girl standing beside the towering coyote. "Nice to meet ya," Kit said, shaking her long-fingered paw as they met out in the courtyard.

"A pleasure," she said in an alto voice, which was quite melodic. "I've heard quite a bit about both of you from Vil."

"I hope nothing bad," Jessie giggled as she shook Sonya's paw.

"The bad parts are the best parts," she said with a warm smile, which made Jessie and Suzy laugh.

"Vil said you're from Nebraska?" Kit asked as he ushered them into the house.

"Yah," she answered. "Just outside Omaha."

"What's it like there?" Jessie asked.

"Flat," she answered. "But I love it. I wouldn't live anywhere else. Besides, we're not all that welcome here in blue-blood territory," she laughed.

"New money," Kit chuckled. "The old money doesn't respect new money. You don't know the rules."

"They can keep their damn rules," she grunted. "I was born and raised in a three bedroom tract house in Nebraska, not a place like this."

"Hey watch it, I was born in this house," Kit challenged lightly.

“Well, you don’t act like you fart rainbows,” she noted, which made Jessie explode into laughter.

“I think we’re gonna get along just fine, Sonya,” Kit said seriously as they went into the garage.

Sonya was earthy. She was polite and friendly, but she was very practical, and she was a middle-class femme in a rich femme’s world. She didn’t have a debutante’s manners. She had the manners of a girl born and raised in the middle class and who went to public school all her life, even after her father got rich. He’d insisted that his three kids continue to feel normal, and instilled a work ethic into them. All three of his kids had to work, and if they didn’t work, they wouldn’t get a dime from him. Her very normal upbringing despite money gave her a practical mindset and an honesty rarely encountered in the circle of the rich.

He could see why Vil liked her. Vil wasn’t against her own class, but her position as CEO meant that she appreciated strength and honesty in her friends, furs tough enough to be her friend, furs she could depend on when the chips were down. Sonya was both strong and honest, and that was the perfect combination. Vil had “old money” friends as well, but they tended to be much more deceptive and less courageous. Vil rewarded those she felt would be there for her when she needed them, and most old money wasn’t quite that dependable. They had their own reputations and fortunes to worry about. That was why Vil decided to give Sonya a spot on her bridal party, because she knew she could trust Sonya.

Right now, being able to trust someone was important.

They barely had time to have a cup of tea with Sonya and Suzy—coffee in Sonya’s case—when Stanley warned them that the Brightons had arrived. They all got up and went to the courtyard in time to see a stretch limo pull in around the curve and into the paved courtyard, the driver bringing the car right up to them. The driver got out, as did a rabbit dressed in a dark suit, who opened the back door for the occupants.

The first one out just had to be Winston Brighton. He was a middle aged male, tall and thin, with wise amber eyes, wearing a smart gray suit and carrying a silver-topped cane. He even wore a bowler hat, which had holes cut in the top to make room for his ears. And like Kendall, he had the same dark patch of fur in the white under his chin, the “Brighton spot” that was as much a distinguishing feature for the Brightons that the eyes were for the Vulpans...just not as obvious. He offered his paw to Kit as a tall, broad-shouldered young fox piled out of the limo behind him, wearing a dark suit. “Winston Brighton,” he introduced himself. “You must be Vilenne’s brother, Kit. It’s a pleasure to meet you.”

“Pleased to meet you,” Kit said politely as Nick hovered nearby, and a third fox climbed out of the limo, who was wearing a dark suit as well and was about a head shorter than the first one. “My wife, Jessie, and friends of the family and two of the bridesmaids, Suzy Jenkins and Sonya Cooper.”

“My, they make them big in America,” a brown-furred hare said as he stepped out of the limo, looking at Sonya. He was shorter than Jessie by about an inch, and was roguishly handsome on top of filling out the shoulders and arms of his suit impressively.

“Looks like they make them small in England,” Sonya retorted, which made Suzy and Jessie giggle.

Winston chuckled. “My sons, Harry and Michael, and a friend of the family, Charlie Duke.

Kit shook paws as Winston kissed Jessie and Suzy on the cheek, then stepped up to Sonya, laughed, and pulled her down so he could do the same. “We’ve heard quite a lot about you, Kit,” the taller Harry said as he shook Kit’s paw.

“No doubt,” he chuckled. “You certainly look like your brother.”

“The old male made sure to stamp his face on us,” Michael chuckled as he shook Kit’s paw. “So, you run a magazine?”

“I partly own one,” he answered. “Do you work for your Dad?”

“I do, Mike’s still in college,” Harry answered. “He goes to Leeds.”

“One more year,” Michael chuckled.

“Thanks for the invite,” the hare said with a crooked smile. “This should be fun! A wedding in the middle of a war, complete with soldiers,” he grinned, looking over at the huge wolf.

“Well, welcome to the headquarters of the rebellion,” Kit said with a dry smile as Winston gave Jessie a second hug, and put a paw boldly on her belly.

“Why, you’re absolutely radiant, Jessica!” he said with a bright smile. “There’s nothing lovelier than a pretty young lady expecting. When are you due?”

“September thirtieth, Mister Brighton.”

“Please, call me Winston, my dear,” he said with a smile. “After all, we’re going to be family in just two weeks!”

“Why don’t we go in?” Kit called. “We have tea waiting, Jessie made some scones for us, and the tailors should be here in about fifteen minutes.”

“You cook, my dear? A hobby?”

“A necessity,” she laughed, allowing Winston to take her paw and lead her towards the door. “I’m sure Ken told you about us.”

“Naturally, but that doesn’t mean that you can’t enjoy what you must do. If you do, then it’s a hobby rather than a chore.”

“Well, I love to cook, so I guess it is a hobby,” she said with a smile.

Kit learned after sitting with his future in-laws that they were quite interesting. Harry and Michael were very vocal and teasing of their father, who was just as teasing with them, which was diametrically opposed to his own family. If anyone had ever made a joke about his father, his father would have destroyed them. Nobody showed disrespect to his father, not even his own siblings...nobody except Kit. Harry and Michael were warm, friendly, and funny young males, but the true rooster in the room was Charlie Duke. He was swaggering, boastful, boisterous, and quite funny, and Kit felt that Kendall was right...how could a combatant take the hare seriously in a fight? The idea of him dressed in a military uniform and barking commands at soldiers was a little funny. Kit could also see why Kendall liked him, since Kendall had similar personality aspects to Charlie, just a bit more muted. Kendall was a lighthearted yet intelligent fox who enjoyed a good joke, liked to make furs laugh, yet was very smart and was capable of playing the game. This Charlie Duke seemed much the same kind of male as Kendall, as were his brothers, and to a lesser extent, his father.

After about twenty minutes of honestly enjoyable conversation, the tailors arrived, and there were a lot of them. Nick cleared them first, and then they broke into two teams. One team, half males and half females, fitted the males, while a team of femmes fitted Jessie, Suzy, and Sonya. It was the same tailors who had fitted him and Jessie with their wedding clothes, and they had come prepared. They still had Kit's measurements, and they showed up with his best male's tuxedo already made for him. It even fit. "Now that's service," Charlie noted as a vixen put him up on a stepstool and started measuring him.

"We have Mister Vulpan's measurements on file," the vixen helping him answered as she tied his tie. "And it seems you're still the same size, sir."

"Almost," he chuckled, patting his stomach. "I'm a touch thicker down here."

"It doesn't show," she told him.

"Well, they know how to flatter," Harry laughed as a fox measured his arm.

They did have to make a couple of tiny alterations to his tuxedo, so Kit took it off and gave it back to them as the others continued to get measured. He was about to pour himself a cup of tea when his manor phone rang, and he saw it was Vil. "Hey sis," he called. "Mister Brighton and the others are all here and getting measured."

"Well, that's good, but that's not why I called. Me and Brian are on our way over right now."

"What's wrong?"

"They know what happened to my chopper," she answered, a bit ruefully. "Turns out it was a real accident, bro."

“You’re serious!” he gasped.

“As a heart attack,” she answered. “Another Sikorsky chopper the same model as mine crashed in Utah two days ago, and they linked them. Both choppers had their tail rotors basically explode on takeoff. They’ve grounded the whole model while they figure out how what’s wrong with them and how to fix them.”

“Well, I’ll be shaved bald and thrown on a stage,” Kit breathed in shock. An accident. A real accident! And after he’d all but threatened to kill Zach for trying to kill his sister, it turned out that he was actually innocent of that particular crime...but Kit wasn’t feeling contrite enough to budge an inch. They were still fighting against his sister, trying to push her out of her hard-won and rightful place, and he would do everything in his power to help her fight back. That included holding firm in Stonebrook to keep Zach out, to deny him the ancestral base of power of the family.

An accident. This was going to change things, but not all that much. Vil wouldn’t be able to destroy Zach in the way she might want to now that it was apparent that he hadn’t tried to kill her, and in a strange way, he was actually glad of it. The idea that Zach had tried to kill Vil would have been a dark stain on the family, that they had truly plunged into a dark pit that would make the family almost irrevocably tainted. But it didn’t change the fact that Zach, Jake, and Maxine were trying to evict Vil, and they had to be opposed.

But he could still give a small sigh of relief. His uncle was a bastard, but at least so far, he wasn’t a murderer...though Kit felt that he was fully capable of it. He had once supported his father’s attempt to kill him by denying him medical treatment. If that didn’t define a bastard, Kit didn’t know what did.

“Why is Brian coming?” Kit asked.

“We have to talk this through and decide what to do,” she answered. “If any of the cousins check in before we get there, let them know what happened.”

“I will. When will you be here?”

“I’m going to go pick up Ken right now, so we’ll be there in about an hour.”

“Alright. I’ll have lunch ready about that time.”

“Good deal, bro. See you in an hour.”

“See you then.” He closed the phone, lost in thought. How were they going to proceed from here? Now that they knew that they really hadn’t tried to kill Vil, how was that going to change their plan? He stood there a moment, tapping the phone on his chin, pondering. Actually, it wouldn’t change it much. The plan was basically playing defense, stalling until Vil was married, which would introduce a new level into the game and make it virtually impossible for them to unseat her from the chair, and therefore would make it almost impossible for them to remove her as the head of the family. Once Vil was that deeply entrenched, with two friendly Vulpans on the board and Ken and the Brighton family backing her up, the elders would be forced to realize that they would never take Vil out of the chair, and thus would probably try to negotiate for some kind of favorable terms to reconcile the family. Vil would probably make a couple of concessions about reining in the wilder kids, by offering them jobs and responsibility, Kit realized, and then the family would return to an uneasy peace.

Damn, was his sister one clever, clever little vixen. That was what that whole offering jobs to the Party Pack was about, it was a means to get them under control by putting them in the company and under her direct supervision. And the femmes, so starved for attention and a need for being respected in the family, would probably jump on it. He could admit it so easily, that Vil was the true chessmaster between him and her, and she was so much more suited for the big chair than he was.

God, was he proud of his sister.

“What are you smiling about, young Kit?” Winston asked as the tailor finished measuring him.

“My sister. She’s the most cunning femme I have ever known in my life,” he said lavishly. “She’s on her way over here, and there’s some important news.”

“Oh?”

“Turns out that my uncle did not try to kill her. Her chopper crashed because of some kind of design flaw, another one crashed a couple of days ago the same way hers did. So she’s coming over with my uncle Brian and your son and we’re going to talk about what happens next.”

“Next? Why, she gets married,” he said simply. “With my son as her husband, your uncles wouldn’t dare try to forcibly remove her from the board.”

Kit chuckled. “And also opens Vulpan Shipyards up wide open for Brighton Industries.”

“And vice versa,” he smiled. “We already have some mutually beneficial agreements in writing and waiting to be reviewed by the board, we we've decided to hold off on that until after Vil and Kenny get back from their honeymoon." He chuckled. "Besides, for us, the true gem is Vulpan Steel," he said with a light smile. "Vil will sell us ship-grade steel cheaper than we can get anywhere else, and Vulpan Steel will still turn a profit."

Kit laughed. "I was right about that," he grinned. "I figured that was what you were after the most."

"That and a solid connection between our families. Together we are a much more powerful force than we are separate. Your family controls most of the shipbuilding in America. Mine controls most of the commercial shipbuilding in the former British empire. Together, our families control nearly half the commercial large-scale shipyards in the industrialized world, and we can strangle our competitors with our alliance. That is a dynasty, my young male. When I pass on, the shipyard goes to Kenny. He's married to Vil. Their son will control it all. Vulpan Shipyards and Brighton Industries will merge in all ways but on paper to be controlled by a single family, and our united family will have a stranglehold on shipbuilding in the industrialized world for the next century. The Vulpan-Brighton family will be one of the most powerful families on this planet."

"You do think ahead, Winston Brighton," Kit said appreciatively. "I thought Vil was devious. You, sir, are a master, and I bow to you."

"It's why I'm where I am today," he said seriously.

Kit used his manor phone to call Jessie. He could go see her, but Suzy or Sonya might not be decent. "You could have walked, we're in the next room," she giggled.

“And get slapped for seeing something I’m not supposed to see? No thank you,” he answered dryly. “Vil just called, and she had big news.”

“What is it?”

“Vil just got word that her chopper crash really was an accident,” he told her. “Another chopper the same model as hers crashed in Utah two days ago the same way hers did, so they think it’s a design flaw. She’s on her way over here right now with Ken and Uncle Brian, and we’re going to talk about what to do next.”

“Oh, okay. I doubt you’ll need me for that,” she chuckled. “They had my measurements already, but they have to alter the dress because I seem to have this little problem, as they put it,” she laughed.

“Alright, I just wanted you to know what’s going on, love.”

“I’ll call Rick for you and let him know.”

“Go for it, pretty kitty.”

The Brightons and Duke continued with their fitting while Kit tried to make lunch, but promptly got chased out of the kitchen by the chefs, who were already preparing a lunch fit for Winston Brighton and his sons and guests. Having nothing else to do, Kit decided to call the cousins, Rick, and Sam and spread the news. He called Rick last and chatted with him and random members of the gang until Vil arrived with Kendall and Brian.

Kit kissed his sister on the muzzle when they came into the TV room, and gave Brian a cool, distant stare which put him off. Winston and his sons and Charlie Duke came in almost immediately afterward, and Kit watched Kendall interact with his brothers and father. He saw that they were a very close family, the smiles and kind words very honest and sincere among them. Charlie, he saw, was almost a brother in the family from the way Ken greeted him, and the way Winston patted him on the back and held his arm around his shoulder. The Brightons were old money, and Kit was happy to see that at least one old money family was close and happy.

“You’re looking well, you old meddler,” Vil laughed as Winston gave her a gentle hug, mindful of the new smaller cast on her leg, still gleaming white, with only Kendall’s signature scrawled across the shin.

“I’m glad you succumbed to my meddling, or I’d have had to send Harry and Mike over too,” he grinned. “One of the Brighton boys was going to marry you, Vil. And if they failed, well, I’d marry you myself.”

She laughed. “I’m too smart to marry someone like you, Winston,” she winked at him. “My uncle Brian,” she introduced, stepping aside and motioning to him.

“Nice to see the reinforcements arrive,” Brian laughed. “It’s been quite a campaign so far.”

“Vil keeps me up to date,” Winston nodded as he shook Brian’s paw. “I’m just glad at least one of Vil’s elders is on her side.”

“I’m the youngest, I have this radical idea that Vil is actually better suited for the position due to these little things called ability and leadership,” he chuckled. “The fact that she managed to lure her brother back into the family tells me everything I need to know about her ability to get things done.”

“Yes, Vil is quite a femme,” Winston smiled. “I was so impressed with her when she was at Oxford. I knew she was special. And I knew she had to be in my family.”

“You’re in my family, you old meddler,” Vil laughed. “I’m a Vulpan before I’m a Brighton.”

“I see we’re going to have one fight,” Winston smiled. “The last name of your son.”

“Brighton Vulpan,” Vil, Brian, and Kit said in unison, which made Winston laugh.

“Kenny is the male, his son should carry his name.”

“Now you know why they call us those damn Americans, Winston,” Vil told him, patting him on the cheek.

Once the jokes were over, though, the discussion began. They all sat down, Stanley, a terrier butler named Virgil, Dee, and Sally served them tea and Jessie’s homemade scones, and they discussed the revelation and how it would impact their campaign. As Kit expected, the main thing Vil stressed was that this information wouldn’t change their primary goal, and that was to hold out until Vil was married, play defense with just enough offense to keep the elders wary and honest and force them to invest some resources into protecting themselves. The fact that the elders really didn’t try to kill Vil was good news all around, though, since it showed that at least so far the elders weren’t willing to take it to that level. Either they wanted to keep it civil or they hadn’t had an opportunity to take a shot at Vil yet, but it was considered a good thing that Vil’s accident was just that, an accident.

“Really, the only thing we have to do is just keep going the way we’re going,” Vil declared after about an hour of debate. She was about to say something else, but the door opened, and Suzy led Sonya and Vil in. “Hey girls, you all finished?”

“Just finished,” Suzy answered as Jessie sat down beside Kit, and he put his arm around her and kissed her on the muzzle. “It took them a while, they had to get the measurements just right for our circus clown costumes.”

“They’re not that bad,” Vil protested, which made everyone laugh. “I think sapphire blue is a lovely color!”

“Oh, the dresses are lovely, Vil, but they fitted us for our circus outfits for the reception,” Suzy winked.

“You’ll be in a clown suit now, Sue,” Vil teased. “Brian, this is Sonya Cooper.”

“Ah, a Cooper!” Brian said, standing and shaking her paw. “I’m impressed at how fast your family rose, my dear. Your father is a genius, both in tech and business.”

“We’re proud of him, Mister Vulpan,” she smiled, looking down at the shorter male.

“Please, call me Brian,” he said, then they all sat back down, reviewed for the new arrivals, and continued the discussion.

Kit listened without injecting much as Vil laid out her strategy of stalling for the next two weeks, which would basically entail laying low and harassing the elders using outside agencies while giving them no means of getting at her either in a business sense or a personal sense, and by extension those allied with her. Vil now had full and complete control of New Orleans as well as Austin, and that meant that the youngers who were openly rebelling against Zach’s clique were untouchable. Kit excused himself to go to the bathroom, but Nick stopped him when he came back. “We have a little problem,” he said in a low voice.

“What is it?”

“Let’s go up to your bedroom,” he said. Kit nodded, and he followed Nick up to his room. When they were inside and the door was locked, Nick pulled a picture out of his pocket showing a jackal of middle age wearing a Valiant Security uniform. “This is one of the new hires for the reception,” he said. “But he’s no security guard. His name is Jahal Mevas, he’s an Israeli Arab who used to work in the merc circles about twenty years ago, but he retired. He worked in Mossad as an infiltrator, since he’s a loyal Israeli yet he’s also obviously Arab.”

“Maybe he’s working for Valiant just part time?”

“I doubt it. He’s old and hasn’t played the game for a while, but that doesn’t mean he’s not capable of playing. None of us would have recognized him, he quit the game before we got into it, except Donny’s dad was also in the game and worked with someone who worked with Jahal. Infiltration is his specialty...and now he shows up here at Stonebrook posing as a security guard. It can’t be a coincidence.”

“Well, shouldn’t we throw him out?”

“I think we need to talk to Vil,” he said. “If your uncles hired him, then he’s here for a reason. If we can figure out what that reason is, we can maybe score some major intel.”

“But Jessie—“

“I have an idea for that, Kit, don’t worry. Barnett’s a surveillance expert, and he also has access to some intelligence-grade bugs. I think if we take the proper precautions, we can find out why he’s here without him doing any damage, because we know about him. We’ll make sure he’s shadowed every second, I'll assign him to a post where we have complete cover on him, and Barnett will plant some bugs on and around him. So, call Vil and have her come up here, just her. The more furs know about Jahal, the more chance he finds out about it."

Kit felt a little uncertain about this, but he did take out his manor phone and call Vil. "Sis, can you come up to my room real quick?" he asked.

"Why?"

"Let's just say I need your opinion on something," he answered.

"Bro, we're kinda in the middle of something important."

"Trust me, sis."

There was a brief pause. "Alright, be right up."

When Vil got up to the room, Nick again showed the picture and explained who he was. Vil started grinning almost immediately. "And you're sure he doesn't know you know?"

"I had no idea until Donny came up and told me about him after I sent them home," he answered. "Today was just a four hour briefing and general training day. They'll all be back tomorrow for a full eight hours."

"And you think he was hired by my uncles?"

"Why else would he be here? A retired merc wouldn't be working as a security guard. He'd be doing freelance security consulting."

"And you're sure you can ferret him out without putting anyone in danger?"

“Absolutely.”

“Do it,” she said immediately. “But I want Jessie and Kit escorted twenty-four seven.”

“Sylvie and Donny will take care of it,” Nick nodded. “Kit, I want you to start carrying a pistol.”

“What? But—“

“I trained you myself how to safely use and carry a gun, Kit, I know you’ll manage it safely. I’m going to give you a Glock twenty-nine, they’re specifically made for concealed carry and are pretty powerful to boot. I want you to be armed, because that’s the last thing anyone would ever expect. A Vulpan wouldn’t be walking around in his own house carrying a gun. If a disaster happens, I want you to be able to defend yourself and Jessie.”

That was all he had to say. Kit nodded grimly, which caused Nick to pat him on the back. “Good mate,” he smiled. “I’m also going to put a little present in here. I have an extra MP seven, and I know you know how to use it. We’ll hide it here in your room, that way you have some serious firepower if you ever feel threatened.”

“Alright.”

“Remember, both of you, the key to making this work is silence,” Nick told them. “Kit, you can tell Jessie, but don’t tell the staff, don’t tell Muffy, don’t tell anyone else. The more furs who know, the more chance Jahal finds out we know about him. I’m going to assign Jahal to a static post on the drive, out in plain sight and a hundred meters from anything, and we’ll go from there.”

“I’m not too happy about this,” Kit said. “We’re letting a dangerous male inside the walls.”

“We know about him, that makes him much less dangerous,” Nick said calmly. “I’ll talk to Barnett and the others, and we’ll work out exactly how to keep you safe while we give Jahal a chance to lead us to whoever hired him.”

“Then I’ll leave it in your paws, Nick,” Vil told him. “I’ll get back down there before they wonder what we’re doing up here. Keep me informed.”

“Will do, Miss Vil,” he nodded.

Kit blew out his breath. Maybe his elders weren’t being as gentle as he first thought, if they’d gone out and hired a professional mercenary to infiltrate the manor...for whatever reason. Now there would be a potentially hostile force inside the walls of Stonebrook...and two weeks of starting to feel a little relaxed and secure in this place of old ghosts and bad memories went right out the window.

Chapter 36

There was an enemy lurking in Stonebrook, and Kit was looking right at him.

He certainly didn't look all that dangerous. Jahal Mevas was a middle aged jackal with no hair, just fur on his head, which wasn't unusual for jackals. He wore round wire-framed glasses and looked quite mild and unassuming, and his white shirt and blue pants that were his Valiant Security uniform were pressed and neat, and he had a silver chain going from his epaulet to his right pocket, where a whistle was attached to it and hung from his pocket by a small hook. He looked quite normal, and didn't seem the slightest bit ruffled or out of sorts sitting on a folding chair and under a portable beach umbrella with a partner about halfway down the front drive, which gave them a full and commanding view of the front lawn. Their job, as Nick told them, was to ensure that guests did not wander the front lawn, and to act as a presence for those both entering in and leaving so they knew that the grounds were actively being watched.

The reality was, that post had three cameras on it. Barnett had set it up, pointing one camera at the site from the house, one from the woods, and an obvious patrol camera just behind the post that also kept the post covered. Jahal was only going to be on the manor grounds for one more day, after Nick completed training the Valiant guards in their duties, then they'd come back for two hours the day before for a "dress rehearsal" for the reception, then the reception itself.

In the one day since Nick had ferreted out Jahal, the panthers had really gone to work. They had his alias, John Richards, his address, his telephone number, and now he was the one being watched. The mercs had put a camera on his apartment, they'd tapped his phone, and the panthers had dug up his entire life history, all in one day. While Jahal was here sitting at his post, Barnett and Donny had gone to his house to bug it, and they'd already called in and reported they were on their way back.

"Donny said he kept his apartment pretty well defended," Nick chuckled as he closed the phone. "It took them nearly four hours to get in and set it up. He's definitely who we think he is."

"I wonder why he's here," Kit said grimly, looking at him on the monitor.

"We'll find out soon enough," Nick said calmly, leaning back in his chair. They'd set up the surveillance in one of the secret rooms on the first floor. Nobody could know about Jahal, so they put the surveillance equipment in a secret room on the first floor near the kitchen, one of the old wine rooms. It had ventilation and opened into a rarely-used hallway which itself had a camera on it to make sure nobody saw anyone come in or go out. There would be someone in here at all times while they ferreted out Jahal's intentions, as well as more working to find out who hired him. "We have him wired six ways to Sunday, Kit. Barnett's good, he'll have that apartment where Jahal can't fart without us knowing."

"I don't think I want to know about that," Kit said with a slight smile. "I'll leave you to it, Nick, I have something more important to do."

"What is that?"

“Taste Jessie’s sweet and sour pork,” he answered. “I can smell it from here.”

“Another new recipe?”

“Carrie’s been teaching her how to make some Chinese dishes,” he nodded.

“Well, she makes good duck,” Nick grinned.

Kit stood up, and he felt the holster for the Glock 29 pull a little on his shoulder. It was a special concealed holster that put the gun under his shirt and low on his left side, almost invisible under his baggy tee shirt. Nick had taken him down to the archery range that morning and thoroughly trained him in the use of the weapon, how to load it, how to use it, how to disassemble and clean it, and the tenets of safe gun ownership. It was a powerful weapon, firing a 10 millimeter round that was strong enough to stop just about anyone on the first shot, but the pistol was compact and easy to carry...but using, not so much. The small pistol had a strong recoil, and Nick worked with him all morning to teach him how to control that recoil. Kit was especially impressed with the Glock’s safety trigger, which made it almost impossible for the weapon to discharge without a finger being on the trigger. Nick had him fire nearly two hundred rounds that morning, giving Kit a thorough feel for the weapon and its recoil, to where he was used to it bucking in his paw when firing and using Nick’s teachings to smoothly and quickly return the pistol to aim. Nick even went so far as to have Kit unload an entire 10 round clip into a target quickly without missing the target, learning how to control the pistol and fire quickly despite its recoil. Kit was in good shape, but the gun had made his arm sore from trying to control its recoil. He rubbed his shoulder and rotated it, which made Nick chuckle.

“Trust me, if you ever have to use it, you’ll kiss my feet for choosing that one for you,” he said. “It has more recoil than the twenty, but the twenty’s a big pistol and hard to hide. You shoot someone with that, they’re not gonna get up.”

“I feel like I did a thousand one-armed push-ups,” he complained.

Nick laughed. “You won’t have to do that again,” he assured him. “You know exactly what to expect now.”

“It feels...weird. I don’t like it,” he said.

“I know, but you’re carrying that thing for a reason. To protect Jessie.”

“That’s the only reason I’m carrying it,” he said seriously, remembering how Rick had saved his life because he had a concealed carry permit. He hated the idea of carrying a pistol, but he’d do it to protect his wife. She and their unborn daughter were the most precious things on this planet.

“At least you didn’t shoot yourself in the foot,” he grinned.

“I’ll shoot you in the foot next time,” Kit said with mock seriousness.

“Oh, go on with ya,” he laughed.

Jessie was in the kitchen with all three chefs, and they were cooking sweet and sour pork. Jessie was humming to herself pleasantly, an apron tied over her large stomach as she put on a pot of rice. “Hey, pretty kitty,” he cooed as he put his arms around her.

“Hey, handsome fox,” she giggled as he nuzzled playfully at her neck. “Lunch will be ready in about twenty minutes.”

“So you’ll be up in the bedroom in twenty minutes?” he breathed huskily in her ear.

He felt her shiver. “Stop being mean, handsome fox,” he told him. “Go finish your article while I cook.”

“Meanie,” he protested, putting his paws on her swollen stomach. “I’m sure Laura wouldn’t run me out of the kitchen. I should ask her for permission.”

Jessie laughed. “She knows who feeds her,” he told him archly. “Don’t look for her to let you get around proper discipline.”

“Well, will you at least massage my shoulders?” he asked sweetly.

“After lunch,” she told him.

“But I want a massage now,” he whined, sounding almost exactly like Victor.

She laughed. “I’m gonna do more than give you a massage, you brat! Now let me finish cooking!”

“You heard her promise, you heard it!” Kit said triumphantly as he let go of her and started on his way out of the kitchen. Jessie threw the chopped-off top of an onion at him, which he evaded and caused him to beat a hasty retreat before he was assaulted with more decapitated vegetables. He did as she ordered, went up to the master bedroom and started editing the next article, which was an interview and detailed article about the MacArren family. Kit had interviewed all three MacArrens about what it was like to work in Stonebrook, from Clancy’s almost encyclopedic knowledge of the Vulpan family and the manor to Stanley’s perfectionist approach to keeping the manor running smoothly, to Bartholomew’s more mellow yet no less meticulous approach to his duties. Kit wrote about what it meant to be a MacArren, the hereditary duty they felt to Stonebrook, which was as much their home as it was the Vulpans, the level of training and education they pursued to fulfill that duty, and the fierce sense of pride the family had in making sure everything in the lives of the Vulpans was smooth and predictable, and Kit ensured that the readers understood that the Vulpans would not be the Vulpans were it not for the MacArrens. Most of the readers would probably be surprised to know that Clancy had a Doctorate in English literature, Stanley had a Doctorate in economics, and Bartholomew had two Master's degrees, one in political science and one in economics, and was working on his dissertation for his Doctorate in economics. Kit knew that even his arrogant bastard father had often asked advice from Clancy, and then from Stanley when Clancy retired, and that advice was good advice. The MacArrens were highly educated, very capable, and the Vulpans would not be where they were today were it not for servant families like the MacArrens and the Higgins and the Smiths and the Longbridges there to both serve them and support them. "It's a communal effort," Kit wrote to summarize the article. "The MacArrens have worked both for and with the Vulpan family since 1907, when Clancy's father, James MacArren, was first employed by my great-great grandfather, Arthur Vulpan. That's over a century of service, but it's more than that. It's a century of the Vulpans and the MacArrens working together for success. Stonebrook was finished in 1936, and since the first day it was completed and the Vulpans moved in, a MacArren was here to greet them, since the MacArrens moved in before the Vulpans. This house, Stonebrook, is as much the home of servant families like the MacArrens as it is us Vulpans.

“You might think that most rich furs treat their servants like servants. Well, some do, and some in the Vulpan family do, like my uncle Zachary. He’s one of those males who sees a servant as little more than a piece of furniture, a useful tool that’s little more than background scenery unless he needs it. But here in Stonebrook, it’s different, a difference so dramatic that not even my uncle Zachary would dare to change it. While he lived here, he had the ability to hire and fire any staff member, yet he made not a single staff change. That’s because here, service to the family and to the house isn’t just a job, it’s a family tradition, a tradition the Vulpans are more than comfortable with continuing. The Vulpans continue it because it’s always easier to hire the son or daughter of a servant, since they already know exactly what to expect and exactly what’s expected of them. But the servant families continue it because Stonebrook is their home, they are paid well, they are treated well, and passing on the family tradition is almost the same as them passing on Stonebrook to their children.

“In the 72 years that Stonebrook has been here, there has been a Vulpan in the master bedroom, but it has been the MacArren down in the apartment right beside the kitchen, a four bedroom affair with its own patio, that truly owns this manor. Stanley runs this place like a general, not because it’s his job or what he’s paid to do, he does it because this is his home, and he has tremendous pride in his home. And at least one Vulpan appreciates all his hard work, and would feel totally lost without him. We could sell Stonebrook and it would still be Stonebrook, but if the MacArrens were to leave their employment and leave Stonebrook, then it wouldn’t be Stonebrook anymore. It would be just another big mansion. A manor is just a building and a lawn. It is those inside it, both family and servants, that truly make a manor a unique place. The servants who work in the manor are the true essence of what I call Stonebrook, and no servant family represents that truth better than the four generations of MacArrens who have worked within this manor. Without them, this is just a building.”

He finished it up and sent it to work along with several pictures he took of the servants, documenting the family lines in Stonebrook in pictures. Carrie’s family, the Longbridges, would be the next article, for all three of her children also worked on the grounds. He then called Rick for the second time that day. “Article and some pictures are in your inbox, boss,” Kit told him.

“Good, son, good,” he answered. “I’ve made the new hires. And the assistant you wanted is hired,” he added. “Julie Gardner, right?”

“That’s her,” he answered. “She was the best of the bunch. She’ll work well with me and Pat.”

“The two writers are the ones I told you about, and you should know one of them,” he chuckled. “I hired Paula back as a writer.”

“The twitchy cougar?”

He laughed. “That’s her. But she’s a good journalist, much better than the other intern. The other one I hired is RJ Childers. Turns out he goes by RJ because his parents named him Renault Jefferson.”

Kit laughed. “And I thought I had a bad name,” he said. “Is he as friendly in real life as he is on the phone?”

“So far, you bet,” he answered. “But he’s a tenacious reporter. He’ll be good for investigative reporting.”

“Sounds good. What time are you guys getting here on Wednesday?”

“Our flight arrives at one at Logan,” he answered. “Vil already called to ask the same thing, she said she’ll take care of getting us there. I can’t wait to see the inside of your house live,” he said eagerly. “The pool house was nice and all, but I want to see if the pictures do it justice.”

“You’ll find out in about nine days,” Kit answered. “I’ll let you guys run the house.”

“I want to see that vault room in your bedroom,” he said slyly.

“Why? There’s another one just like it in the bedroom where you’ll be staying,” Kit said. “The two wing master bedrooms are exactly alike except for one thing, which I won’t reveal because it’s a secret. Your bedroom has its own vault room.”

“Ah, so that’s where you’re keeping all those special toys you and Jessie own,” he said lightly.

“Rick, don’t be a Mike,” Kit warned, which made him laugh. “Though I’m surprised Jessie still wants to be intimate so late in her pregnancy.”

“That’s not unusual, Kit,” he said. “Martha got even more affectionate as she got closer to her date. In her case, she said she was having her fun before the couple of weeks afterward when she wouldn’t be able to. Our doctor even told us that it’s safe to make love almost right up to the delivery date.”

Kit chuckled. “I hope Jessie feels the same way,” he said. “The belly gets in the way a little, but working around that little problem is half the fun.”

“I think we’ll stop here before you assault my youthful impressionism,” Rick said dryly.

Kit chuckled. “Yah, Jessie should be calling me down to lunch any minute.”

“She still cookin’?”

“Cooking, cleaning our bedroom, and yesterday she completely scrubbed every inch of the bathroom. And that’s a big bathroom,” Kit grunted. “She’s making sure she doesn’t get used to being waited on paw and foot by doing for herself. I’m pretty proud of her for that. She’ll let them bring her something from time to time or fetch something she forgot, but she cooks every meal we eat. I rather like it that way. I love her cooking.”

“And I’m sure you’re saying that because you heard me come in,” Jessie said playfully from the door. “Lunchtime, handsome fox.”

“Speak of the sexy little devil, and she saunters in through your door,” Kit laughed into the phone. “I’ll talk to you later, Rick.”

“You’ll call in about four hours,” Rick chuckled.

“About that,” he agreed.

Kit found that Jessie’s sweet and sour pork was just as good as he’d get at a restaurant, and so did Muffy, who’d woke up just before lunch. After lunch, they decided to split up for their afternoon exercise, because Kit felt like swimming to rest his sore arm, and Jessie and Muffy wanted to practice driving. Both of them loved golf, and they were frittering away the prime Boston golf season stuck in Stonebrook. While that was a problem for Muffy, for Jessie it wasn’t quite so bad. There were a couple of golf courses in Austin that stayed open until December, and there was one that was open all year round, they’d discovered. The front lawn was perfect for doubling as a driving range, since if they went to the edge of the woods near the helipad and drove them across the lawn towards the trap launcher, that was nearly 200 yards. Sally, Luann, Bartholomew, and Oliver, the youngest son of Carrie, both helped them by shagging balls and also did some driving themselves. Jessie's clubs were down in Austin, so she used Muffy's spare set brought from her house, the set she kept at her father's manor for when she was in Boston. While the girls were slicing balls towards the front wall, Kit was relaxing in a floating chair in the pool, enjoying the quintessential lazy day with a ginger ale in his paw, sunglasses over his eyes, and the water lapping pleasantly against his legs. Though he never felt very comfortable in the house, at least in the pool he could relax. It wasn't much smaller than the pool at the complex, twelve feet deep at the deep end and with both a diving board and a slide, but here he didn't have to share the pool with screaming kids or overly enthusiastic splashers jumping off the diving board. He did, however, have to share the pool at one, when servant's hours started, and Sally and the most junior butler, a 27 year old fox male named Walter, came padding out in their swim suits and towels.

“Oh, we didn't know you were here, Master Kit,” Walter said apologetically. “We'll use the gym's pool.”

“There's plenty of pool, Walt,” Kit chuckled. “And I never mind sharing it. Pull up a piece of water.” He noted Sally's slightly worried expression, then he chuckled. “Unless I'm bothering you, that is.”

Walt laughed, and Sally's cheeks ruffled quite attractively. “I think we can stay here,” Sally said, almost primly, claiming a lounge chair.

That was another feature of the servants that Kit had already written about in a prior article, his third one...the availability of the staff to certain attentions. Servants were nearly as available as their Vulpan employers, and there was also quite a bit of Vulpan-servant naughtiness that went on in most Vulpan households. Though his father had been unswervingly faithful to his mother when she was alive, after she died, his father partook of the servant femmes quite liberally. In the other houses, it was much the same story. Sarah was almost notorious for her aggressive attentions on her male servants, from her chief butler to the groundskeepers, and her husband, Harland Vance, was just as bandy with the femmes. Kit also knew for a fact that Zach's family had a rite of passage at thirteen where he ordered one of the house maids to spend the night with the birthday boy, for his first taste of true adulthood. Sheila had something of an ongoing casual sexual relationship with Higgins, turning to him for satisfaction when she failed to get it from her most recent conquest. And Vil was no angel in that regard either. She'd enjoyed several secretive dalliances with males on the staff when they were growing up, which were frowned upon by the elders because girls were supposed to at least pretend to save themselves for marriage, and he knew for a fact that she'd also had sex with her chief butler at least once. That, too, was considered part of the job description for a Vulpan servant, and it went for both the males and the females. They worked for the Vulpans fully knowing that a Vulpan may demand favors from them, and acceding to those demands was literally in the contract they signed to work for the family, though it was couched in fancy words that didn't make it sound quite so blatant. Kit knew for a fact that Muffy had already seduced Walter, sating herself with a male in the manor and available since she was seriously curtailing her usual clubbing activities, and those activities included taking some guy home with her and having sex with him. For the servants, dalliances were a part of the job and also part of the fun for both the males and the females, between the staff and the Vulpans and among the staff itself, and more than one marriage had resulted from a little inter-staff hanky-panky. And not just because of an unexpected pregnancy. Walter and Sally were clearly interested in each other, their trip to the pool was literally a date, Kit could see it as they talked and joked as they spread their towels on lounge chairs. Sally most likely knew that Muffy had seduced her boyfriend, but she had to accept that as just one of the complications of working for the Vulpans, that her boyfriend might be hijacked from her, but she would also know that the femme Vulpan who did it would have literally no interest in him afterwards. Sally would have to live with allowing a Vulpan to borrow her boyfriend's body, but she never had to worry about a Vulpan competing with her for her boyfriend's affection.

It was an interesting paradox in the family, and also in many other "old money" idle rich families, he had written in that article. The Vulpans were almost lavish with their servants when it came to salary and benefits, they opened their houses to the servants for them to use as the Vulpans used them, and the Vulpans were sincerely interested in the welfare and well being of their servants. The Vulpans took a great deal of pride in their servant staffs, which were the best in New England, paws down. But on the other side of that was what many would consider to be both illegal and immoral, the expectation that anyone who worked in the house had to submit to their sexual demands. But that was one of the aspects of the idle rich that "regular" furs just wouldn't be able to understand. Vulpans, and other rich families, saw servants as there to cater to their every need, and one of those needs was physical. In return for that very serious and considerable demand, the servants were very well paid and given exceptionally good benefits. It was just one of the ways that rich furs were different from normal ones, how they lived by a different set of rules and saw the world much differently than normal furs did.

Kit had been quite different. Kit didn't lose his virginity to a maid on the staff as most of his male cousins did, he lost it to Suzy. And he'd always been too angry with his father, and the maids too afraid of the wrath of his father, for him to "enjoy" the girls on the staff the way his male cousins did. That certainly didn't mean that he didn't have the occasional fling, but he'd done most of his oat sowing outside of the manor with the daughters of other families of the idle rich. That too was a form of rebellion, for both him and the girl, doing what they weren't supposed to be doing just to spite their parents. Suzy was the first, but she certainly wasn't the last. Kit had never touched a single servant femme in the manor, but he'd sampled five of the debutantes of Boston aristocracy before he was disowned, and had a few pretty fun affairs after he got into college with girls who didn't mind a one night stand. Then there was that farewell that Suzy gave him right before he graduated and left the apartment she'd arranged for him....

He shivered a little. That had been wild. Suzy had been the last femme he'd had in bed before he met Jessie, and in a way, that seemed...right. It was almost as if Suzy had given him away, set him down the road that led him to the love of his life. In a way, he felt almost embarrassed about his past exploits when compared to a paragon of purity like Jessie, who remained chaste even after she left home, waiting for the one with which she would share the rest of her life. But, they were from different backgrounds, and at least she wasn't anywhere near a paragon of purity now. She'd only shared her bed with him, but Jessie was not timid, shy, or passive when the bedroom door was closed.

Not that she was really like that now. A year of knowing Kit and her pregnancy had put steel in her backbone and made her much more confident and resilient, which he rather fancied. Then again, he'd fancy Jessie if she weighed two hundred pounds and had her ears surgically removed, because the mind and personality he so dearly loved would still be the same.

“So, Sally,” Kit called, taking a sip of his drink. “What do you think of Jessie now?”

She laughed. “I can see why you married her, Master Kit,” she admitted. “I thought you were very wrong to marry a cat, but she’s just so adorable,” she said wryly.

“She’s a total sweetheart,” Walter agreed as he slipped into the pool. “I’ve never had a Vulpan offer to bring me something before.”

“Well, that totally vindicates me,” he chuckled. “And Walt, go get me another glass of ginger ale, this one doesn’t have a proper number of ice cubes in it!” he said in a thoroughly insincere haughty and arrogant voice, which made Walter laugh. “There must be exactly four ice cubes in this glass! I’m going to fire the entire staff for this!”

“Master Kit. Bite me,” Walter said, which nearly made Kit fall out of his lounge chair laughing.

Kit felt much better once Jahal was off the manor. They had their short day the next day as Nick finalized training the guards in their duties, and then they were released around lunchtime, and they wouldn’t be back until the day before the wedding, the day of Jessie’s shower. Nick, however, didn’t give Kit a chance to rest. After he again listened in on the board meeting that morning, which lasted only fifteen minutes, Nick dragged him out to the range to practice with his pistol. This time, however, Muffy wasn’t about to be left out, specifically getting up early just so she could catch them at the range. As Kit practiced with his Glock, she badgered Nick and Donny into letting her try to shoot a machine gun. She got an extensive safety lesson with Nick's MP7A1, and then Nick let her try with a five round clip. She fired all five rounds, and the gun ended up almost straight up in the air as Muffy panicked feeling the gun try to buck up and up and up, and she laughed ruefully about not doing a single thing Nick told her to do when he taught her. However, she got better as she practiced, and by the end of their shooting session she could keep the gun from rising too high. The Valiant guards were all gone by lunch, and after lunch, and Kit was about to remove his holster harness before Nick stopped him, warning him that the fact that Jahal was here in Boston at all was reason enough for him to continue wearing it.

Two days had shown nothing about Jahal's reason for being here, though. The night before, he'd gone home, made dinner, watched TV for a while, then went to bed. He received no calls, and he said not a single word in his apartment, clearly not the kind who talks to himself. He cooked in silence, ate in silenced, laughed a couple of times watching a sitcom on TV, then turned in at 10:24, after catching enough of the 10:00 news to see the weather. As soon as the weather was over, he went to bed.

He repeated that pattern the next night, going home early with bags of groceries from the local Wal-Mart at 1:19. He watched TV for an hour, then stopped to read a book. He ate a snack, then partook in what was clearly his hobby, playing six games of chess against a computer opponent that took nearly four hours. After that, he cooked dinner, ate, watched TV until the weather came on the 10:00 news, then went to bed.

What was even more curious was the panthers' bio on Jahal since he came to Boston. He wasn't a new arrival, it turned out. He'd been in Boston for four years, and had worked at Vanguard for two of them, according to the records, where he worked as a floater. A floater was someone who would work this post, then that post, on an on-call basis. When they needed someone to fill in for someone, they called Jahal. He had never failed to show up for a scheduled shift, and he had never turned down a call to work, no matter what time of the day or night. While working for Vanguard, he had been a model employee, and had even won an award for foiling an attempt to rob a barge facility, catching the thieves as they tried to cut through the fence and scaring them away.

“Very odd,” Nick said with a frown as he read the information in the secret room, with Kit and Sylvia with him. Jessie was taking a nap upstairs, so Sylvia felt it was safe to leave her alone. Nick and Sylvia were very serious about Jessie not being unescorted for a single second until after the wedding. Anywhere Jessie went, Sylvia went with her. “It’s almost like he’s really who he pretends to be.”

“Records are easy to fake,” Kit noted.

“True, and that’s something those nutty panthers are checking right now. It’s almost creepy, this guy is. He never makes a sound in his own house unless he’s laughing at the TV. He didn’t even curse at the computer when it beat him in chess. Have you ever known anyone who does that?”

“Not really,” Kit admitted. “Can he talk?”

“Of course he can,” Nick answered. “Well, there’s not much we can do about it until we learn more, so may as well worry about something else. Has Stanley even taken a breath today?”

Kit laughed. “I don’t think he’s slept since Vil told him we’re having the reception here. I’m amazed he’s letting anyone take any time off. He’s having the staff thoroughly scrub and clean rooms that nobody's even going to use."

"But he'll know they're not clean, and that'll shame him," Nick chuckled.

"Even the attic?"

Nick exploded into laughter.

Despite the sore arm, Jessie invited him to shoot trap after lunch, and he could never deny his pretty kitty anything she wanted. "Well, this isn't as hard on my stomach and back as golf," she giggled as she loaded two shells into Nick's K80. "Laura did not like being twisted on the backswing."

"Who would?" Kit asked as he loaded the clays in the launcher. "So, you're done with golf?"

"For now, yeah, until this little pain in my butt gets out of here," she said, patting her stomach fondly. "I hope she has lots of time for hobbies," Jessie giggled. "The poor girl, she'll be run ragged keeping us with all the things we do. Golf, skeet, knitting, cooking, flying, all the toys Vil will undoubtedly throw at her as soon as she's born, she's gonna be one busy little girl."

"She's a Vulpan, she can multitask," Kit said as he laid out the foot switch. "Where's Muffy?"

"Not sure," she answered. "She said she was gonna lay down after lunch. Guess she's napping."

Kit was interrupted during his round by the phone. He saw that it was Austin and opened it. "Hello."

“Hey cousin,” Bess called. “I’m checking in for all the girls.”

“Okay, Bess. Do you have your flight set up for coming back for the wedding?”

“Yup, we do,” she answered. “And after the wedding, I’ll be leaving again.”

“Back to Austin?”

“Nope. Vil gave me a job!” she said excitedly. “But, we both agreed that I just can’t work in Boston for now, both because of what’s going on and because I’m too notorious, so I’m going to go to work in New Orleans. I’ll be working in Avondale as an assistant to Terry. He’s going to teach me all about what the family does, and after I’m trained, Vil offered to let me run a division of one of the Boston repair docks if I want to come home, or run one of the small facilities we have all over if I want to try my paw on my own.”

“Finally putting that business degree to good use, eh?” Kit chuckled.

“I hope I remember it all, college is kind of a haze,” she said distantly, which made Kit laugh.

“What are the others going to do?”

“Mary and Lynn are coming back to Austin until everything settles up there. They’re not interested in working, at least not right now,” she said. “I think Mary’s about ready to give up the party girl life and look for a husband. Lynn, well, I hate to say she’ll be a party animal for life.”

“Well, I’m glad to hear that, cousin,” Kit told her. “When do Angie and Joy go back to school?”

“They leave here on Friday,” she answered. “Their first day is Monday. I wanted to say thanks, cousin.”

“For what?”

“For letting us come here,” she answered. “Sheila’s been awesome, and we really love your city and your friends. I’m glad I’ll be in New Orleans, that way I can see you when you come over to see Terry.”

“You’re welcome, cousin. I’m gonna go ahead and go, you kinda interrupted something.”

“Oh, and what did I interrupt? Is Little Lukey being a bad boy?”

“I’m about to take my shotgun and murder innocent little clay targets,” he replied blandly.

“What?”

“Jessie got me into target shooting as a hobby,” he told her. “That’s what we’re doing right now.”

“Jessie’s shooting a gun as pregnant as she is?”

“She was driving golf balls yesterday,” he chuckled. “Jessie’s very... energetic,” he said, giving her a sly smile, which made her cheeks ruffle appealingly.

“Did Bess get the sweater I made for her?” Jessie asked.

“You made Bess a sweater?” Kit asked.

“She made me a sweater?” Bess repeated, then she laughed. “No, I haven’t got anything yet.”

“She didn’t get it,” Kit relayed.

“Well, it should be there any time, I sent it to Sheila so she could give it to Bess.”

“Knowing Sheila, she kept it herself,” Kit noted, which made Bess laugh. “Anyway, I’ll talk to you later, cousin.”

“Okay. Bye Luke. Kit,” she said quickly.

“You’re learning,” Kit chuckled, then he hung up the phone.”

“Well, Vil’s already on the move,” Kit said as he put up the phone. “Vil gave Bess a job.”

“Really? That’s great!” Jessie said with a smile.

“She’ll go to work in New Orleans first and train with Terry,” he told her. “That’s only smart, because Bess slept and partied through her college. Technically she has a Bachelor’s in business, but I doubt she remembers any of it. After that, she said Vil was gonna put her in a small facility off the beaten path and let her try to run it.”

“Well, good for her!” Jessie said approvingly. “When does she start?”

“After the wedding,” he answered. “She’ll be in New Orleans I guess Friday night, and odds are Terry’ll start her on Monday.”

“Well, that’s wonderful,” Jessie smiled.

Kit laughed suddenly. “God, Uncle Zach is gonna blow a fuse. Vil hired Bess. But Maxine won’t be able to complain about Bess being an embarrassment to the family. Vil has her claws in Bess now, and she’ll make her behave by threatening her through her job.”

“You know, I don’t think that’s gonna be a problem,” Jessie said. “Bess reminded me a lot of Sheila, and all Sheila wanted was respect. She feels like she gets it back home, so she stayed instead of going back to Austin. We treat her kindly, Rick and Martha treat her with respect, and the guys love her. I think Bess is gonna be the same way. She'll find out that she suddenly has duties and responsibilities, but she'll also be respected and furs will listen to her, and that'll make her try hard to succeed. As long as Terry treats her fairly, I think Bess will be alright. What about your other cousins? Lynn, and, and...."

"Mary. Bess had the biggest reputation, but Lynn's the hardest of the hardcore party girls, Jessie. Bess said she doesn't want a job, she just wants to keep partying. Mary, well, Bess said that Mary's actually thinking about getting married, which should make Maxine overjoyed. It burns the fur off her ears that there are Vulpan girls who are unmarried past the age of eighteen, and Mary's a particular burr in her tail because Mary is her own daughter. She's thrown like ten different males at Mary, and Mary just blows them off. The one time she tried to put her foot down and threatened Mary to marry or else, Mary just moved to her parents' vacation house in Barbados for a month. Maxine coddles her kids, and she broke before Mary did, which really amuses me. Maxine bitches about the other girls being unmarried and nags her brothers and sister to make their daughters settle down, yet she can't even make her own daughter get married. Bridgette's the only married femme cousin, and that's because Bridgette is Zach's oldest. Bridgette was more or less forced to get married back when my father and the elders had absolute control of the family, just before I started fighting with my father."

"Well, your aunt needs to learn that if its not her own child, it's none of her business," Jessie said simply.

"Amen, pretty kitty, amen."

The mystery of Jahal remained as the days marched closer and closer to the wedding. Stanley was both almost psychotic with his preparations and had never been happier in his life. Under his almost tyrannical direction, the manor gleamed more than it had in years. Every room was immaculately clean, new drapes were present in many rooms, several rooms had been repainted, and the lawn looked absolutely spectacular. It was being mowed daily now to keep it perfect, and to mollify Stanley and keep him from having a nervous breakdown, Kit and Jessie allowed him to take down the trap launcher, because that corner of the lawn was starting to show some worn grass from them trampling it. Stanley would never ask for such a thing, but Kit knew that he wished the trap machine wasn't on the front lawn, and he spent nearly an hour over there with Brandon, the head groundskeeper, discussing how to repair the damage the day before the reception. When Kit got wind of that through the rumormill, he had Brandon and Nick pull the launcher and store it in the storage building until after the reception. They could live with not shooting trap for a few days, and besides, Nick still had him practice shooting the pistol every morning after his phone calls to Rick and to listen in on the board meeting. For him, that was enough shooting to last him the whole day. Besides, he had to admit, he was getting good with a pistol. After a week of practice, he was starting to develop decent aim, and Nick had even had him practice quick-draws from the holster, first with the gun empty, then with it loaded, taking it from holster and firing at the target.

They were at the range on the Wednesday before the wedding, basically staying out of the way while the staff ran around like maniacs getting the manor ready for Vil's reception. Stanley was decorating the ballroom and main dining room today, and after lunch, Nick was picking up twelve more mercenaries that would patrol the off-limits sections of the manor during the reception to keep everyone out, two guards for each floor in the two wings. They would need very little formal training, not like the Valiant guards, so Nick was going to pick them up, give them a tour, give them assignments, then bunk them at a nearby hotel because there wasn't enough room for everyone at the manor...and since they couldn't house everyone at the manor, it was only fair that they house none of the newcomers.

The gang from Austin would be arriving today at 4:15pm at Logan. They had to reschedule their flight this morning because their original flight was canceled due to some maintenance problem with the plane, so they got a later flight. Kit wouldn't be meeting them at the airport, but Vil and Kendall would, then bring them here. Stanley had already assigned everyone to a room or cottage, and they were pretty much well filling the place up. Rick and Martha would get the west wing master bedroom, Savid and Nawa would take the pool house with their kids, and everyone else would be in bedrooms in the manor.

Jahal had yielded absolutely no information. The panthers couldn't tell if his records were fake, and he was almost boring in his off-duty life. He did nothing, almost never spoke, just ate, watched TV, played chess on a computer, and watched the 10:00 news until the weather came on before going to bed. He didn't receive a single phone call from anyone, he called no one, he got nothing but bills and junk mail in the mail, and so far as they could tell, he did absolutely nothing out of the ordinary. The only unusual part of the entire surveillance against him was the day he paid his bills, filling out six checks, putting stamps on the envelopes, and mailing them out the next morning. He confounded Nick, who was sure he was hired to be here, but for the life of them they couldn't figure out who hired him, or even why.

Things would be moving nice and smoothly from here. Tomorrow was the day of the baby shower, and also the day that Vil would be coming to Stonebrook to spend the night. She'd agreed not to evict Rick and Martha from the west wing master bedroom, and would instead be taking one of the guest master bedrooms on the second floor. She'd be getting ready for her wedding here at Stonebrook, getting dressed, and then they'd leave for the Cathedral of the Holy Cross at 11:00 and meet the Brightons there. The Brightons and Charlie were all staying over at Hart's Crossing, giving Kendall's brothers a chance to get to know Vil better, and they'd been coming over for dinner about every other day since they'd arrived.

Kit liked Kendall's family and friend. His father and brothers were intelligent but also very funny and engaging, and they were all very close, the way a family really should be. They joked with each other, pulled pranks on each other, even their father, and all of them loved to play golf, so Vil had taken them to some of the choice golf courses in Boston while she stayed in the golf cart. Charlie was, in a word, outrageous. He was bombastic, talkative, boastful, and fearless, but he was also intelligent and very amiable. What he lacked in size he more than made for with raw charisma, and he certainly never made any visit boring.

After firing nearly two hundred rounds, Kit and Nick decided to call it a day on the range. They stacked the targets in a line in front of the archery targets along the side, then released the patrols to resume around the range. Nick drove them back up to the house in a golf cart, and he went into the kitchen expecting to see Jessie there cooking lunch for them. But she wasn't there.

“Where's Jessie?”

“She was cleaning your room last I heard,” Frannie answered, a bit unapprovingly.

Kit pulled his phone out and hit push to talk. “Jessie? Where are you?”

“I'm checking something out. You done?” she asked.

“Yeah, we're finished.”

“Good. Come to the conservatory.”

Nick tagged along as he ambled in that direction. The conservatory was the furthest room from the central house on the first floor in the east wing, where proper Vulpan children were supposed to practice playing piano or other musical instruments...but neither Kit nor Vil had ever done so. Vil had taken up the violin after leaving the house, and Kit had taken up the guitar after as well, because their father felt that frivolous pursuits like music were a waste of time and energy. Inside the conservatory was a grand piano and several musical instrument cases on a shelf near the back, filled with instruments that hadn't been opened for years. Kit closed the door and went over to what looked like an unassuming stretch of wall, then touched the corner of a large painting near it. Nick laughed when the wall swung inward, revealing the secret passage.

“Bonzer,” Nick said as he looked in. “This house has everything, doesn't it?”

“Just about,” Kit said with a chuckle. “I didn’t show you all the secrets, Nick. Jessie!”

“Around the corner!” she called.

Kit went around the corner and saw her standing there, a kerchief holding her hair back and a broom in her paws, which made Kit laugh helplessly. “You’re cleaning?” he asked in surprise.

“Well, it’s all dusty,” she told him. “And that’s why I called you here. Look at this,” she said, kneeling down and pointing at the floor.

Kit came over and bent down, and after his eyes adjusted to the gloom of the single naked light bulb in the short passage before it opened to the stairs, he saw a curious mar in the dust of the stone floor, that was almost perfectly three feet square, offset in the floor so one edge was on the edge of the wall. The dust was striated and disturbed in straight lines...almost as if something brushed over it. But only on that one section of the floor. “Did you sweep it?”

“No, it was like that when I got here,” she said. “Look down. Remember when you showed me the passage, how it was all dusty? Well, where are our footprints on the floor? Nobody else has been in here since we were, else there would be prints in here from them.”

“She’s right,” Nick said, looking around. “The only prints on this side are ours. Did you come all the way down?”

“Yeah, we came out through the conservatory when I showed her,” Kit answered. “There wouldn’t be so much dust it would cover our tracks after just a few weeks, would it?”

“Not without the tracks themselves being visible. Someone must have swept away both your tracks and theirs,” he said seriously, then he keyed his radio. “Sylvia, Donny, come to the conservatory. Bring flashlights and come ready for business,” he ordered. “If Jessie didn’t sweep the floor, then the only reason this part of the floor is like this is because someone screwed up trying to cover their tracks. Or,” he said, taking his pistol out, kneeling down, and striking the stone floor with the butt of his Glock.

There was a distinctly hollow sound.

“Or there’s something under the floor,” he said with a satisfied nod. “Is this another secret passage?”

“Not one I know,” Kit said. “But it’s possible that it is.”

“Who else knows about this passage we’re in?”

“Just me, Jessie, Vil, Clancy, Stan, and Bart. The other servants don’t know about this passage. We don’t advertise that there’s a shortcut to the master bedroom from the first floor.”

“Well, someone does know about it,” Nick said, feeling around the edges of the disturbed section of floor. “Help me find the seams, we gotta get this open.”

Donny and Sylvia arrived moments later, looking around in the secret passage with curious eyes, then they saw Kit and Nick feeling around on the floor. “What’s up, boss?” Donny asked.

“We have a trap door here even Kit didn’t know about,” Nick told him. “Let’s find how to open it and see where it goes.”

They felt around the floor to find the seams, but they were so tight that Nick could barely get his knife blade between them. After about fifteen minutes of fiddling with it, it was Jessie that finally figured out how to open it. The stone was flat and level everywhere except for up against one wall, and she puzzled out that by stepping hard on that side, it lifted the other like a lever. Nick stomped it with his seven foot frame and got it up high enough for Kit and Donny to get their fingers under it, then the two of them lifted it up and lifted it to discover that the heavy stone slab was nearly a foot thick and was hinged, opening like a trapdoor. Sylvia shined her flashlight into the hole, and they saw a six foot ladder, a small landing, and another ladder leading down.

“Hello, nurse,” Nick mused. “I do believe we found something interesting. Jessie, dove, can you be an absolute doll and run up to your room and get my spare MP seven? Oh, and make sure it’s loaded.”

“Uh, sure, hold on,” she said, turning and hurrying up the stairs.

“It’s been used recently,” Sylvia noted, shining her flashlight. “Boot prints and the cobwebs are all cleared out.”

“Yah, and it was used by someone getting in, not someone coming out. Soon as Jessie gets back with my PDW, we’ll go see where it goes.” He keyed his radio. “Barnett, Krichek, come to the conservatory. Bring your headcam, Barnett, we need it.” He looked to Kit. “Barnett has a head-mounted minicam he uses to take video when he needs his paws free. It takes video of wherever his head’s turned. He’ll use that to give us some video of the place so we can refer to it.”

“Well, let me get a head start,” Donny said, slinging his mini-Uzi and climbing down onto the ladder. “I’m the smallest anyway, I’m best suited for point.” He climbed down to the landing holding the flashlight, then dropped down, knelt by the second ladder, and shined his light down. “Looks like it goes down about ten meters,” he reported. “Goes really deep.”

“Sylvie, spotlight for him so he can go down with both paws,” Nick ordered as Jessie ambled down the stairs carrying Nick’s spare MP7A1 in her paws, carefully. Nick took it with a nod and slung it over his shoulder as Sylvia started down the ladder. Nick gave Kit a wild look when he started to climb down as well.

“What, you think I’m not curious enough to go with you?” Kit asked with a smile.

“I wish I could, but I don’t think I want to try to climb a ladder with this,” Jessie laughed, touching her stomach.

“Jessie, dove, be a dear and go to the kitchen.” He keyed his radio again. “Grizz, meet Jessie in the kitchen and stay with her while Sylvie’s busy helping us in the conservatory.”

“On the way, boss,” Grizz answered.

“You can always make lunch for us,” Kit winked at her.

“Be careful down there,” Jessie told him. “You fall off that ladder and break your arm, and I’ll spank you.”

“Don’t tempt me,” he winked, which made her cheeks ruffle as he climbed down to the landing with Sylvia and looked down as Donny climbed down the second ladder.

“It’s all stone down here, and looks fairly old,” Donny called from the ladder when he reached the bottom. “I’m in a small room, and there’s a tunnel heading off, umm, I think to the north. It slopes down.”

“Goes downhill inside the hill to maintain depth,” Nick noted as he climbed down. “What’s the roof like, Donny?”

“Reinforced, buttressed and arched,” he called back. “It’s about two meters high, Nick. You’re gonna be hunched over.”

“Won’t be the first time,” he called back as Krichek and Barnett arrived. Barnett was a curious mixed breed. Both of his parents were big cats, so he was all feline, but one of his parents was a lion and his other parent was a cheetah. He was tall and sleek, with tawny fur run through with black spots. His tail was tufted and had bands on it, and he had no mane. Barnett was also something of an oddity among the mercs in that he had a Master’s degree in electrical engineering. He was a gadget male, the male they called when they needed tech, but Nick had been in actual combat with Barnett, some place in the middle east, and Nick praised Barnett’s fighting skills. Barnett was a male who could set up your sophisticated electronic surveillance equipment, repair it, modify it, and also fight off the bad guys, all rolled up into one.

“Woo, so we’re exploring the secrets of Stonebrook, are we?” Barnett asked.

“This one’s even a secret to Kit,” Nick answered. “And it’s been used recently.”

“Ooh, well, let’s see where it goes.”

Kit found himself solidly in the center of the formation as they climbed down the ladder, then started down the narrow, cramped tunnel that sloped downhill. It was narrow enough to where Kit would have trouble trading places with someone, and Nick, Krichek, and Barnett had to hunch over to keep from banging their heads on the ceiling. Kit could feel the ceiling against his one good ear, the tip of it brushing the arched top, which forced him to walk right down the center. The walls around him were clearly old, dusty, damp, and eroded; it looked like this passage had been built at the same time as the house because the walls were lined with tan granite the same as the house, irregular blocks and pieces that were clearly the leftovers from the construction of the manor, but that tan granite yielded to what looked like gray stone blocks about a hundred feet in, where they must have used up the leftover granite and started using other materials. It had to be a secret escape tunnel, but it had been unused for so long that everyone forgot it was there. There were even some tiny limestone stalactites forming on the arched ceiling, arched for strength and probably the only reason the tunnel hadn't collapsed over the years. Clancy didn't even know about this tunnel, and Clancy knew everything about Stonebrook. Donny was in the lead with Barnett right behind him, and Kit was flanked by Sylvia in front and Nick behind, with Krichek bringing up the rear. The passage both sloped downhill and curved to the left, and while it was very dusty, it was also free of cobwebs and there were bootprints disturbing the dust and dirt that had caked on the floor over the decades. Not footprints, bootprints, which said something in and of itself. Few wore shoes in the summer, and there weren't many others who would wear boots.

It took them nearly five minutes to reach the end of the tunnel. It opened to a round pipe that was about two feet wide that was grated, looking like a long-abandoned water drainage pipe near the river. The grating was rusty and looked solid, but Kit could see the single hinge on the right side, and a very clever bolt lock that would be all but invisible from the outside, hidden behind the frame and crossbar of the grating. “Well, what have we here,” Nick said as he unbolted the grating and crawled out first, his MP7 in paw.

“I think we’re outside the wall,” Sylvia said as she climbed out with him.

“Stay in there, Kit. Krichek, Donny, stay with him. Barnett, let’s find out where we are, and look for cameras.”

Kit waited in the small chamber just on the far side of the pipe for about ten minutes, waiting in almost tense anticipation until Nick’s face appeared in the opening. “We’re about twenty meters away from the wall, and the river’s right over there,” he pointed to the side. “We’re on the northwest side of the manor, and about fifty meters from the back gate. What’s out past here, Kit?”

“Umm, a bunch of forest. The closest building is my uncle’s manor, Swan Cove, it’s about a mile upriver. The family owns all the land for about a mile in every direction from Stonebrook, and Zach owns most of the land around his manor. That keeps anyone from building around here.”

“Well, well,” Nick said with a slow smile. “I do believe we just found out why Jahal is here. Barnett, I want two hidden cameras on the gate at different angles, and two cameras in the passage up in the house. One on the trap door, the other on the door leading into the master bedroom. After he sets that up, we’ll just put everything back the way we found it except for one thing and see who wanders into the tunnel.”

“And we keep strike team at back gate, da?” Krichek asked.

“I was thinking the very same thing,” he said with an evil little smile. “If we can catch our little moles, we might find out who gave them their orders. Donny, when we get back, I want you to go into town and buy me two hydraulic jacks, the little potbelly ones. And we’re gonna need some four by fours.”

“What are those for?”

“That’s how we’re gonna seal off the entrance,” Nick answered. “A jack at each load bearing corner, across from the hinges and we put posts on top of them that reach to the ceiling. We jack them just enough to hold the posts securely. That way, whoever comes along and tries to get in using that tunnel finds out they can’t get in, and no amount of pushing is going to budge two jacks. We’ll have Stanley rearrange the conservatory to put some heavy piece of furniture in front of the door to the passage, and we’ll take care of the door up in your room by keeping your room locked and with someone at the door when you’re not in it.”

“Clever,” Kit said approvingly.

“I am a professional,” he grinned.

“After we catch our little tunnel rats, I suggest you have your maintenance furs come over here and seal off the gate, and maybe even brick off the tunnel,” Nick suggested. “I wouldn’t feel comfortable with something like this in my house. I’m sure it was built to be an escape tunnel back in the day, but as you noticed, someone’s using it to get in now.”

“I think that’s a good idea,” Kit nodded.

When they got back, Kit explained everything to Jessie, who was standing at the opening with Stanley, staring down into it with fascination.

“They’re going to seal off the trap door with jacks to keep anyone from opening it, put cameras on the entrance, and wait and see who tries to use it.”

“Stanley, think you could put something nice and heavy in front of the door to the conservatory?” Nick asked as he climbed up and out.

“Yes, I have a nice shelf I can have brought in here and loaded with books,” he answered.

“Sounds good. Sylvie, set up a sentry rotation for the master bedroom. Four hour shifts should do it.”

“What about when they’re sleeping?” Sylvia asked.

“Hmm. That’s a point. Alright, instead we’ll do this. We put the guard in the passage watching the trap door and the door to the conservatory,” he said. “We can put a nice comfy chair in there. That way we keep both critical points covered, and we have camera backup just in case something happens.”

“Do you still want me to block off the conservatory door?”

“No, we’ll need to get in from there,” he shook his head. “Sylvia. Someone’s snooped in the house uninvited. I’d like you and Barnett to organize the mates to sweep the house from top to bottom and make sure they didn’t leave anything behind. Barnett, check for microwave transmitters or broadbands, if they put cameras in the house they’ll be remotes or they’ll be piggybacking the manor’s wireless network. Stanley, I think you should make sure all the valuable things are where they’re supposed to be. Oh, and keep this quiet. Don’t tell anyone else.”

“I’ll put Bart on it, and he’ll get started immediately,” Stanley said with a sober nod.

“I wonder how they built an arched ceiling underground,” Kit said curiously. “That could not have been easy.”

“Excavated over the arch, built the arch, filled in the gap,” Nick answered brusquely. “Let’s get moving. I want this house cleared by two.”

Kit and Jessie stayed in the kitchen, and after she cooked lunch, they read in their bedroom as Muffy watched a movie, and Nick went to work. After they were all done around two, Nick explained what they’d done. They’d thoroughly checked the house and found nothing left behind or out of place, and Batholomew’s check of the house found everything where it was supposed to be. Whoever had infiltrated the house had only looked around, maybe gone no further than the conservatory just to make sure they could get in, and then had left. There were no cameras, no bugs, no nasty little surprises anywhere, at least that they could find. Kit decided to check the secret room in their bedroom just to make sure, and found that was also empty and undisturbed. While they’d been doing that, Barnett had set up the remote cameras, putting two on the grate entrance and one in the passage focused on the trap door, and Krichek and Donny had sealed the trap door using two hydraulic jacks and 4x4 posts that were braced against the ceiling...and they got some funny looks from the staff trudging through the manor carrying them. By 4:00, the place was completely swept clean, the trap door blocked off, and they now had cameras watching the entrance and four mercs near the back gate ready to rush in and capture anyone who tried to use the tunnel.

But the excitement of the tunnel faded around 5:00 when the front gates opened and a procession of limousines rolled in, carrying everyone from Austin. Kit and Jessie met them out in the courtyard, shaking paws and hugging their way down the line of limos as their friends and family filed out of them. Kit shook Pat's paw and chuckled when he gawked at the house, the courtyard nestled in behind the west wing and with the main house bordering it on two sides and the pool, pool house, exterior garage, gym, and helipad all visible from the paved area. "Welcome to Stonebrook," Kit told him with a slight smile.

"Duuuude," he breathed, looking around. "The pictures don't do this place justice, Kit, they just don't," he proclaimed in a reverent voice.

"You want it? I'll sell it to you," Kit offered.

"Master Kit!" Stanley barked in protest, which made Kit laugh.

Kit shook Rick's paw and then hugged Martha as they got out of the last limo with Allison and Marty, then he dared give Allison a hug. "God, I've missed you guys," he said as he shook Lupe's paw.

"Austin ain't the same without you, honey," Marty told him. "Jessie! Holy crap, you're pregnant!" he declared, which made Jessie laugh helplessly as Martha hugged her.

"How have you been, dear?" Martha asked.

"I've been fine, Martha," she answered. "Doctor Mac came up and gave me a checkup just two days ago, and she said that I'm right on schedule."

"That's good, dear. Are you coming home to have your baby?"

"We're still not sure," she answered. "It's all going to depend on what happens up here. Odds are, I'll have the baby here, though. Kit can't leave Boston for another month and a half to keep Zach out of the house.”

“A month and twelve days to be exact,” he answered. “After that, Zach is permanently evicted from Stonebrook. And we’ll be flying home the day afterward,” he said fervently. “This is a nice place to visit, but I hate living here.”

“Yah, who could live in such squalor,” Mike teased as he waved towards the swimming pool.

“It’s not the house, it’s the baggage,” Kit said seriously.

“Hey bro, I brought ‘em,” Vil said as she hobbled up without any kind of assistance. Kit could tell that walking on her cast wasn’t without pain for her, but she wasn’t about to go back to the cane or crutches. She was bound and determined to walk down the aisle in two days, and she’d do exactly what she meant to do. “Now let’s get them all settled in. Stan!” she shouted.

Suddenly, Stonebrook seemed...welcoming. The old ghosts hiding in the walls seemed to be too afraid of the laughter and smiles within the house to lurk behind the paint and wallpaper as Kit and Jessie gave the gang and some friends from Austin the grand tour of the house. They showed them every room in the house, and got the expected oohs and ahhs when they showed them the billiards room, the home theater, and Stanley showed off the lavishly decorated ballroom, done in white and red roses, white silk buntings and tablecloths, and the manor’s best china was laid out on the head table while some of the manor’s formal china was laid out carefully on the eight 14 seat round tables set in perfect rows of two along the black and white checkerboard marble tiled floor, which had been polished to the point where it was almost mirrorlike. It had taken four furs nearly six hours with buffers to get the floor like that, and Stanley made sure nobody had shoes on before entering his gorgeous ballroom. They all wanted to see secret rooms, so Kit showed them the ones it was safe to show them, avoiding the room holding the surveillance equipment and the conservatory, but they did show the gang the secret vault room similar to the one in Kit's room that was in the west wing master bedroom. "Back in its heyday, this room would have had money, art, stocks, and the really valuable family jewelry in it," Kit told them. "The manor has two identical master bedrooms because my great-grandfather wanted someplace for his brother, but it turned out that my great uncle built another manor instead of living here. He built Still Waters, which is a couple of miles downriver, which is where my uncle Jake lives. My uncle Zach lives in a manor named Swan Cove, which is just a couple of miles from here in the other direction. In a way, I'm kinda surrounded here," he laughed.

"That's why there's nothing but forest out here," Allison realized. "There's houses and apartments and stores everywhere, then bang, nothing but forest."

"That's the boundary of what my family owns," Kit nodded. "Which is about four miles up and down the river, and about two miles wide, centered around Stonebrook. There used to be houses and a couple of farms out here near the house, and some along Stonebrook Drive, but my father decided he didn't want anyone around the manor, so he bought everyone out and had their houses torn down. He even bought out the houses on the other side of the river, since he didn't want to go down to the dock and see someone else's house on the far side. There were some houses upriver of us too, but when Zach bought the land to build Swan Cove, he bought everyone around him out too to make his manor private, just like ours."

"Wow, he convinced everyone to sell their houses?"

“This is Boston, Pat,” Kit said bluntly. “The Vulpans rule this city, and this state, for that matter. If Zach wanted that land, he’d get it. If they didn’t sell, he’d just pull strings to have the county seize the land through eminent domain and sell it to him, or cause the holdouts so much grief they’d give up and sell just to make it stop. And if anyone complained about it, Zach would crush them like a bug, destroy their lives, and chase them to the west side of the Mississippi river. That’s the extent that my family controls this area, and the regard many in my family have with normal furs, Pat.”

“Nobody who’s been here any amount of time would be insane enough to refuse to sell,” Vil said simply.

“The land downriver of us was never developed. It’s been part of Still Waters since my great uncle built it. You can still see some of the driveways out there on Stonebrook Drive, when you come in. They’re overgrown, but they’re there. There’s nearly a square mile around Stonebrook that my uncles don’t own.”

“Do you own all that land?” Emmy asked.

He shook his head. “The land is deeded to Stonebrook, so that means it’s owned by Vil primarily. I’m on the deed, but as a co-owner, but as far as the law’s concerned, Vil owns it all.”

“I always wondered what it’d be like to live in a place like this,” Jeffrey mused, looking around the bedroom.”

“For you guys, great. It’s all the perks but none of the responsibilities. For me, it was great until my mom died, then this place was my own private hell,” Kit said grimly. “Since some of you have never been here before, let me show you around out on the grounds.”

Pat and Emmy were impressed by the pool, but they were awed by the gym and indoor pool that was just behind and beside the pool house, on the far side of the exterior garage. “It’s a full gym, with free weights, weight machines, a rowing machine, stationary bikes, treadmills, and a stair climber. The indoor pool is heated, but it’s not really used during the summer. The golf carts in the garage can take you all over the grounds so you can tour the cottages and houses that are scattered around out there. If it’s locked, that means that it’s in use, so don’t go in it. The entire compound is walled in, so as long as you don’t jump in the river, you can’t leave the grounds without coming across a wall or the back gate. Just to warn you guys. Just before you get to the back gate, on the left, there’s a track that leads to an outdoor shooting range. If you hear shooting, stay out of the woods on that side of the grounds. We usually make an announcement over the ground’s radios and push to talk when the range is in use, so if you’re in doubt, just ask. Don’t blunder around in the woods without a manor phone, and make sure you’re listening in case we open the range.”

“We’re getting manor phones?” Mike asked.

“Yeah, as long as you’re here. We have plenty for everyone,” Kit answered. “Stanley will give them out just before we let you guys go to trash the place,” he grinned at Stanley.

“I’m making spaghetti for dinner,” Jessie called. “It should be ready around seven.”

“You’re cooking? Don’t you have chefs to do that?” Lilly teased.

“They help,” Jessie giggled.

“Tomorrow morning we’ll arrange a shopping trip for those slackers who haven’t bought Jessie her shower gifts,” Vil announced. “But the shower’s gonna be held promptly at four, so we need to be done and be back by then.”

“Just please remember two things,” Stanley said, stepping forward. “First, the staff here at Stonebrook considers you guests. If you need anything, just ask for it. But more than that, if you want to do something and you’re not quite sure how, say, to work the home theater system, just ask, and we’ll be glad to show you. But also remember that the manor has been set up, decorated, and is prepared for Mistress Vil’s wedding reception, so I ask you to please be careful in the rooms. Please don’t rearrange or move anything without asking, and please minimize your visits to the ballroom and the main dining room, so we may preserve it in its prepared state.”

“You’re going to leave the dishes out for two days?” Martha asked, a bit sharply.

“We have sheer covers we place over the tables to keep the dishes from collecting dust,” he answered calmly. “All we have to do is remove the glasses and floral arrangements. But given that it takes nearly two hours to set or clear the tables, and I wanted to set them early to make sure they looked proper, we decided to set them now and cover them until the reception.”

“Clever,” Savid said as he reined in one of his sons.

A golf cart rolled up holding Sally and Bartholomew. “Master Savid, if you’d follow my son Bartholomew, he’ll take you to the pool house and help you settle in. Everyone else is in the house, your rooms are already assigned, and your luggage is in your rooms waiting for you. If you'll come back to the manor with me, the staff will escort you to your rooms. Dinner will be in the small dining room at seven."

"What he means is until then, have fun," Kit smiled.

Having the gang in the house almost made it feel like a home. Kit and Jessie weren't alone as they sat in the TV room, chatting with Lilly, Marty, and Jeffrey, then Martha went with Jessie when she went to go help make dinner. Allison and Lilly joined Muffy at the pool, Jeffrey took a golf cart and roamed the grounds, Barry, Emmy, Marty, Denise, Savid and his family explored the manor on their own, as Kit, Rick, Mike, and Pat went up to the billiards room, which held a regulation pool table and also a billiards table. Mike and Pat played on the pool table while Kit explained to Rick how to play billiards, which was an entirely different game, which gave them a chance to talk, catch up, and have a good time.

Dinner was a large affair, and Stanley decided to make a real big deal out of it. It was fully served by the staff, with six of them serving, attending, and ferrying basically what amounted to spaghetti with two types of sauce, meat sauce and marinara sauce with meatballs and home made garlic bread on the side. Muffy had surrounded herself with Kit's friends, chatting animatedly with them, getting to know them much better, and it seemed like Muffy had really hit it off with Lilly. The two of them were giggling together like little girls. Allison was sitting with Kit and Jessie, telling them all about what Sheila and his other cousins had been up to back home, but using selective language so they didn't upset Savid or Savid's kids. She also showed off her brand new IFR rating, her temporary license. "How did you do on your check ride?" he asked.

“The examiner said I aced it,” she said with a grin. “Sheila’s already looking at planes,” she laughed. “We were thinking of a used King Air or a Cessna four hundred like yours. Both of them are pretty fast and are a comfortable flight. I wanted something cheaper, but Sheila has it in her head that she has to have the best.”

“You rode in one?”

She nodded. “The salesmale took us on a flight in the King Air,” she answered. “If we go for the King Air we have to get our multi first, so we’re leaning towards the four hundred. We could be in the air with that faster.”

“You could always get a Mooney,” Kit urged. “It’s just as fast and has retractable landing gear.”

“I’d like something with a pressurized cabin,” she said.

“Oxygen isn’t that bad,” Jessie told her. “We’ve used our oxygen a bunch of times. We use noseclamp style masks. The oxygen in the four hundred lasts six hours, and that’s almost longer than the plane can fly before it has to refuel. The only part I hate about it is the popping ears,” she giggled as she twirled pasta around her fork.

“Well, get what you feel best with, Ally, and don’t let Sheila browbeat you into it,” Kit told her. “Besides, to get to New Orleans, you don’t really need to pressurize,” he added with a smile. “You can do that at twelve thousand easy.”

“We flew it in about ninety minutes in our plane from runway to runway,” Jessie said. “That’s not bad at all.”

“Not bad at all for what, four hundred miles,” Allison agreed as she took a bite of spaghetti.

“I don’t really remember how far it is, I’d have to look it up,” Kit admitted.

After dinner, they had a wonderful time. They decided to go watch a movie up in the home theater, which had a projection screen that took up most of the wall, a DVD to projection system, Dolby 5.1 sound, and stadium style seating for 16. There were also couches and chairs along the edges of the stadium seats, and a bar in the back where a servant could make drinks, popcorn, or other snacks and serve the family as it watched the movie. Walter served popcorn and drinks as everyone watched Iron Male, which just rocked on the big screen. After the movie, they all sat around in the TV room downstairs and talked until nearly midnight, as Kit, Jessie, and Muffy told them all about everything that had happened in Boston while the gang told them all about everything that had been happening down in Austin.

At about 1:00 in the morning, Kit and Jessie finally went to bed. They undressed and slid into bed, and Jessie snuggled up to him contentedly. “It’s so nice to have all our friends here,” she said.

“I know. This place feels more like a home when it’s full of smiles and laughter. Those things were in very short supply around here when I was a kid. So, tomorrow’s the shower,” he noted. “I wonder why Sam decided not to come, since she’s coming up with Sheila and Sheila won’t be here til Friday.”

“She will be up here tomorrow,” Jessie corrected. “Sheila and the others are flying up tomorrow so they can be at the baby shower, and she volunteered to fly with the plane when it goes to Cincinnati to pick up my family on Friday. I guess so she has extra time with Ben,” she giggled.

“She’s still doing that all wrong, isn’t she?”

“Totally,” she answered with a giggle as he started to caress her back, which caused her to purr. “Ben said she calls almost every other day, and he likes her, but he just can’t trust her.”

“Well, we told her what she has to do. It’s her fault if she can’t do it.”

“Mmm,” she hummed, then her purring lulled him to sleep.

They slept in later than usual because they were awake longer than usual, and they awoke to a hurricane of activity.

As soon as they opened the door to the master bedroom, they found Sylvia standing outside with her MP-5 in her paws and loaded. She didn’t even say good morning, she simply called Nick on the radio, and Nick responded that he was on his way up.

“What’s going on, Sylvia?” Kit asked curiously as Jessie tied the waist of her sweatpants and came towards the door.

“Our trap caught a few rats last night,” she answered with a slight smile.

“Really?” he gasped.

She nodded. “Nick will explain everything, Herr Kit.”

Nick ran up the hallway from the central stairs and almost skidded to a halt in front of them. “Back in the room,” he said, ushering Kit, Jessie, and Sylvia into the room. He then shut the door, turned, and smiled beatifically. “We got ‘em,” he announced.

“Details, male, details!” Kit pressed.

“It’s a bit complicated,” he said, ushering them over to the living area, and they sat down as Sylvia went back to the door and brought in a pot of tea and a plate of scones which had been left for them. “Alright, here’s what happened. At about four this morning, the cameras caught four males enter the pipe. Donny was pulling camera duty, so he called it out. We scrambled a team to the entrance and took up a position to keep them from getting out alive and allowed them to advance up to the trap door. They tried it, naturally, and when they found it blocked off, they panicked. They ran back to the entrance, but then they found out they were pinned inside by six heavily armed males carrying automatic weapons, so they surrendered.”

“That’s the dusty report part of it,” Sylvia said quietly.

“Yah. We’re still questioning them, but we’ve already got more or less what we wanted. We used...direct methods to get them to talk.”

“You beat them up?”

“Oh please, furs expect that,” he snorted. “Sometimes the threat is far better than the act. We told them that if they didn’t talk, we’d kill them one by one. They didn’t believe us and stonewalled, so Sylvie and Krichek dragged one of them out and they pulled the old fake murder gag. Krichek spattered Sylvie with blood drained from the meat in the refrigerator, she fired a few shots of her pistol into the ground, and Krichek dragged the muffled prisoner away as Sylvie came back, sprayed with blood, and pointed to another prisoner and said he was next. The other three started talking real fast about then,” he noted dryly. “Sylvie’s such a good actress.”

“All Germans are good at acting,” she murmured.

“What were they going to do?”

Nick looked right at him. “Kill you,” he answered flatly. “You and Jessica. Their plan was actually pretty clever,” he said with a grim nod. “They waited until you had all your friends and guests in the house, and what they were going to do was sneak up here through the secret passage and murder both of you in your bed. Then they just sneak right back out, clear their tracks, close the trap door, and nobody knows they were ever here. The next morning, they find you dead, all our cameras show that nobody came on or off the grounds all night, and the police spend the next five years trying to figure out which of the thirty-some furs in this house was the one that killed you, because they’d be convinced that it would have to be someone that was in the house the night of the murders.”

Jessie’s face became horrified, and she put both paws protectively around her stomach. Kit immediately put his arm around her, and she leaned against him and held onto him, almost painfully tight.

“Now here’s where it gets interesting, mate,” Nick told him. “They aren’t mercs. They’re PPC. They’re Paladins.”

The PPC. The Protect Purity Crusade, the original terrorist organization against not just mixed breeds, but also “inferior” breeds which weren’t European in origin. They’d been around since the late 1800’s, and they’d started right here in Boston. Kit couldn’t prove it, but he was fairly certain that his family had helped start the PPC, and it was Vulpan money that funded many of their operations over the years. He knew for a fact that his father was a member of the PPC, he’d grown up listening to his father spew purist diatribe...but there was no public record anywhere that any Vulpan was in any way connected to a radical and unpopular organization like the PPC. The Paladins were a radical wing of the PPC, and they were the ones most responsible for the lynchings and murders of mixed breeds, sympathizers, and inferiors. They believed that there was a war coming against the pure by the mongrels, so many of them had paramilitary training. An operation like this, infiltrating the Vulpan house and murdering a breed traitor and his mongrel wife, would be something most of them would drool over.

“Paladins,” Kit growled. “Did you find out who ordered it?”

“They won’t say. The one thing they do say is that it wasn’t the Paladins that sent them, they all say that they were hired by someone else. Some guy paid them ten thousand each, told them about the tunnel, and told them when and how to do it. Their screw-up was coming early to make sure the information was good, which left evidence that Jessie discovered. But, since they’d get to kill a breed traitor and a mixed, they were all for it.”

“I thought the Paladins were all thrown in jail twenty years ago,” Jessie said fearfully.

“Oh, they’re still around, but now they’re all militia wingnuts, training out in the woods for the Breed Wars they say are coming.”

“I don’t believe they tried to kill us. They tried to kill my baby,” Jessie said weakly, then she burst into tears.

Kit held her close and rocked her gently, but his eyes were cold and ominous when he stared at Nick over Jessie’s head. “Call Vil.”

“I already did. She’s on her way. I didn’t give her specifics, I just told her that something serious happened and she needed to come right away.”

“I want to know who did this. And I want their heads hanging on my wall by dinnertime,” he said in a deadly voice.

“We’re working on it, mate, we’re working on it.”

“Are those Paladins still here?”

He nodded. “We have ‘em handcuffed to the back gate with six guards on them,” he answered. “Now that we’ve milked all the information we could get out of them, we were about to call the police and have them come arrest them.”

“Don’t do that until Vil gets here,” he said. “Who else knows what happened?”

“Nobody I know of,” Nick answered. “We’ve kept them all back at the back gate, and nobody’s been down there.” He looked down. “Think we’ll give you two a few minutes,” he said, nodding towards Sylvia. The two of them left the room and closed the door, and that allowed Kit to comfort Jessie as only he knew how.

So close. It was almost frightening how close they came, and how close that scheme came to working. If it hadn’t been for Jessie’s compulsive neatness, that secret tunnel would have been undiscovered, and odds were they’d both be dead. They would have never known what hit them, and whoever came up with the scheme was right. With the cameras locking down the entrances, the police would have been absolutely convinced that the murderer was someone in the manor overnight, and right now that was some 40 or so when one added up the staff, the guards, and the guests. It would have been like some twisted real-life game of Clue, the police scouring one of the largest manors in New England to try to discover who killed the Vulpans and how it was done. They’d spend years trying to figure out who killed Kit and Jessie Vulpan, and would either abandon the case or railroad an innocent fur to save face. And it was all stopped because of dumb luck, because Jessie decided to sweep the floor of the secret passage.

Kit let Jessie cry it out for a little bit, rocking her and stroking her hair, then he held her close and kissed her on the top of her head, between her ears. “You saved us, baby,” he told her quietly. “You saved our lives, and you saved Laura. Thank you.”

She laughed wryly, then sniffed. “I certainly didn’t mean to do it,” she told him.

“That doesn’t make me any less thankful. You saved my life by getting me off the streets, and now you save us all. You truly are my guardian angel, Jessica Desdemona Vulpan, and I love you.”

“I love you too Kit, and I won’t leave you, no matter how scared I am,” she told him.

“It’ll never happen again, Jessie. That is my solemn promise to you. I’m about tired of my family. It’s about time to do something about this, once and for all.”

“I won’t say no, Kit,” she said quaveringly, still clutching to him with her claws dug into his back and side.

Just about when she got back most of her composure, Vil stormed into the room awkwardly on her casted leg. “Dear God, are you two okay?” she asked as they stood up and folded her into a group hug.

“We’re alright, sis,” Kit answered, holding both her and Jessie tightly. “I’m glad you’re here. It’s time to put a stop to this.”

“Oh, that’s exactly what’s going to happen,” Vil said darkly. “I was mildly amused when I thought they took a shot at me, but they undeniably tried to kill you, brother. And that’s the one thing they never should have done!” she declared hotly. “I think it’s time to stop playing games and go right for the throat. I was hoping we could work this out and return the family to normal after we punished the elders, but no way now. There’s no chance in hell the family can stay unified after this, so the gloves are off.”

“That’s what I was thinking,” Kit agreed. “Have your lawyers draw up the papers, and also draw me up a will that gives everything to Jessie and stipulates that Jessie has the right to assume all the privileges I have in our agreement. That means that Jessie can take the family fortune if I die. The sheer threat of that should be too much for them.”

“I have a different idea, brother,” she told him. “I guarantee you, they’ll never bother you again. I’m afraid me and Kit are going to be out for a while, sis. We have to go out and do a few things, and unfortunately they have to be done right now. We can’t wait. I promise I’ll have him home as quick as I can.”

“That’s alright,” Jessie said, taking in a deep, cleansing breath. “I think I’ll go sit with Rick and Martha for a while. They always make me feel safe.”

“Nick,” Vil barked.

“Yah, Miss Vil?”

“Take those four down to the sheriff’s office and explain what happened,” she ordered. “I’m not going to need them. But, if they’re Paladins, that means they have the shield. Take them from them and bring them to me. I’m going to need them.”

“I already took ‘em. I’ll bring ‘em to you right now.”

“Good. Make it very public, Nick. I want everyone in the world to know that someone tried to kill my brother’s family.”

“I can do that,” he said with a nod.

“What about that Jahal fur?” Jessie asked suddenly. “Maybe that’s why he’s here, to find out what happened after those, those males tried to kill us.”

“That’s entirely possible,” Nick nodded. “Sylvie, stay with Jessie at all times.”

“Ja,” she nodded.

Nick brought the shields to them, which were four very small silver shields with a PC etched in the face on two sides of a sword, which stood for the Paladins of the Crusade. Vil clutched them in her paw with a dark expression, then stood up. “Excuse us for a while, Jessie dear, we’re going to go kick our uncle’s ass.”

“Let me get dressed,” Kit said. “I don’t think I want to show up wearing a bathrobe.”

“You have five minutes,” she said tersely.

Kit threw on jeans and a tee shirt, and Vil hustled him out of the manor and into her limo. Stav and Marcus were with them, Stav out of his cast already and driving as they pulled out. “Where are we going?” Kit asked curiously.

“Swan Cove,” she answered shortly, her face still pinched with barely contained fury.

“I had a feeling you were going to say that,” he breathed.

It took them about five minutes to get to Swan Cove from Stonebrook, even though the two manors were only about a mile apart. Swan Cove, unlike Stonebrook, was only about a quarter mile from the main road, but there was nothing else on that road, just like Stonebrook Drive. They reached the gates of Swan Cove, which were almost identical to the gates of Stonebrook instead they were made of black metal, and the guard stopped them outside. “I’m afraid nobody’s being permitted inside right now, madam,” he said apologetically.

“If you don’t open that gate right now, I’ll have one of my panthers open it for you,” Vil said in a tone so cold that it even made Kit shiver.

“Miss Vulpan!” the guard gasped in shock.

“Marcus, open the gate. If Danvers tries to stop you, break his arms,” Vil commanded.

The guard Danvers was honestly at a loss, standing there in confusion as Marcus got out of the car, came around it, and bodily took the remote for the gate from the guard’s belt. He pressed the button, and the gates of Swan Cove began to open smoothly.

“We’ll keep the remote for now, Danvers, because I don’t want anyone disturbing us. We’ll give it back to you when we leave.”

“C-Can I at least warn the house you’re coming?”

“Oh, you do that,” she said in a dangerous hiss. “I want them to know I’m coming.”

Kit had never been to Swan Cove before, and he hoped he never would again. It was a large mansion comprised of a single three story house without wings that had about fifteen bedrooms in it, as well as many of the perks and luxuries one would expect on a manor of a male worth hundreds of millions of dollars. The manor had a grand front entrance and a smaller side entrance with a drive-through garage, much like Stonebrook's, built on the west side of the house. That was where Stav drove them, into the garage, where a black-suited fox was running up from the door to the house as he stopped the limo. Vil didn't even wait for Stav to get out and open the door for her, she opened it herself and swung her legs out, then stood up. "Mistress Vil, we had no idea you were coming!" the male said, who was the chief butler of Swan Cove whose name Kit couldn't recall. He used to work at Stonebrook, though, Kit remembered his face from his childhood.

"I'd be surprised if you did," Vil growled. "Get my uncle. If he's not awake, wake him up. I want to see him in the parlor right now."

"Master Vulpan is in the sun room eating breakfast," the butler said uncertainly.

"That's fine, I'll go there," she said, hobbling towards the door as Kit got out of the limo, and he and the panthers hurried after the surprisingly fast vixen.

The sun room was an extension built into the back of the house, facing south, that was three walls of glass. It held a table and a sitting area for eating or relaxing, and Uncle Zach was there eating dinner with his wife, Alicia, and their three teenage children, David, Joshua, and Crystal. Zach looked quite shocked to see Vil, then he took on a dark scowl when he saw Kit come in behind her, throwing down his fork and moving to stand. But Vil got to the table before he managed it, and as he put both paws down on the table to stand up, Vil tossed the four shields down onto the table, a vicious look on her face.

“They failed,” she hissed. “And now you have pissed me off beyond any form or measure, uncle. I was willing to give you the benefit of the doubt when my chopper crashed, I waited to see what the investigation said before pinning any blame to you, but there is no doubt about this one.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about!” he said indignantly.

“It’s just too bad for you that Kit knows Stonebrook even better than you do, Uncle, he set a trap for your little Paladin assassins and he caught them. They’re being shipped off to the sheriff’s office right now. We interrogated them, they confessed, and as soon as I track them back to you, you can kiss every penny you have goodbye.”

“Now see here, Vil, I have no idea what you’re talking about!” he said in outrage, jumping to his feet.

“I’m sure you don’t,” Vil hissed. “I’ll make this very short and very plain, because every second I look at you, I have to resist the urge to order Marcus take his gun out and shoot you like a dog. Before I go on my honeymoon, I expect your resignation on my desk and a notarized deed showing that you have signed over your share of Stonebrook to Kit,” she grated coldly. “If you fail to do that, when I get back from my honeymoon, I will destroy you. I’ll take every penny you have and throw you out the front gate of Swan Cove naked, you and your entire family,” she promised with burning eyes. “I’ll enjoy every minute of it, too. Kit was too soft-hearted when he gave you back your money after the trial, but I’m going to rectify that little problem. When you’re flipping burgers at McDonald’s to scrape up enough money to pay for a one room hovel down in the projects, you won't cause us any more problems." She crossed her arms beneath her breasts and glared at Zach. "And if you do obey me, I might be inclined to be merciful and leave you with ten million dollars. I figure if you invest it right, you can live without any needs for the rest of your life and not have to work, but you won't have enough money to cause any mischief. But the rest of your hundred million, uncle? Your houses, your cars, your private jet, your yacht? Gone. I will break you over my knee, and when this is over, you'll regret trying to kill my brother, sister-in-law, and their unborn daughter every day for the rest of your life."

She collected up the four shields from the table and gripped them in her closed fist. "Your reckoning is here, Uncle. Take a good look around, because you won't be in this house by this time next month."

She then turned and did as good a job as she could to storm out of the room, given she was hobbling on her walking cast. Kit gave Zach and his family, who were all staring with open-mouthed shock, a cold glare, then he turned and swept from the room with the panthers following him.

"Well, that was brief," Kit said quietly to her.

"I wasn't joking. I almost ordered Marcus to shoot Zach."

"We can go back in there," he urged.

She laughed darkly. "No, I need answers, and now Zach will be a good boy and help get them for me," she told him. "If he did it, he'll clear out his bank accounts and run like hell, which just means I get to entertain myself with tracking him down and ruining him the way I'm ruining Cybil. If he really didn't do it, which is always a possibility given he didn't sabotage my chopper either, he'll be hell-bound and determined to find out who did, to clear his name and prevent me from coming down on him like the sword of Damocles. But when I find out who did this,” she said, still clutching the shields in her paw, so tightly that her paw was trembling. “I may do to them what they tried to do to you.”

When they were back in the limo, Marcus looked back at them. “Where to, Miss Vil?” he asked.

“Take us to the office,” she declared, picking up her Blackberry from the tray in the back of the car. “I’m going to have the legal team there to meet us.”

“Let’s not stay out too long, Vil, I don’t want to leave Jessie alone,” Kit reminded her.

“Well, we’ll do what you need to do and I’ll send you back,” she said. “You’re going to sign a few papers and let me get busy.” She dialed the phone and put it up to her face. “Uncle Brian. Someone tried to kill Kit and Jessie,” she declared bluntly. “No, they didn’t manage anything. Are you in the office? Good. Call the legal department and have them send Smith and Jensen up to my office. Alright, see you there.” She killed the call and looked up. “Marcus, when we get to the office, I want you to take pictures of the shields, then take them down to the sheriff’s office and turn them in. If they ask why, just tell them that I needed them and that’s the end of it. He won’t dare gainsay me.”

“I’ll handle it, Miss Vil,” he nodded. “I take it you want me to look into these would-be assassins?”

“I want to know what their grandmothers made them for breakfast when they visited them,” she said darkly.

“I’ll have it ready for you by tomorrow morning,” he promised.

Inside the Vulpan compound, it was both busy and standing still. Kit could see from the shocked and fearful expressions of those around them as they moved through the building that the attack had become public knowledge, and Vil's dark scowl kept anyone from approaching or do anything except look very, very busy. They went to Vil's office, which was a large and warmly decorated suite with an office with a glass desk overlooking the bay, and a kind of one room apartment off from it where Vil could take a nap, rest, watch TV, or whatever she wanted to do. A male fox and a gray fox vixen were standing by the office door when they arrived, and the two followed them in when Vil's secretary opened the door for her. "Alright, let's get down to business," Vil said curtly as she hobbled towards her desk. "I want you two to draw up a deed transfer and courier it to my uncle Zach, which signs over his part of Stonebrook. Make simple, but iron-clad," she told them as she got around her desk and eased down into her chair. "While you're at it, draft a letter of resignation for Zach and deliver it with the deed."

"Then it's true?" the vixen said in surprise and a little fear.

"I'm not sure what you heard, but someone tried to kill Kit," she told them. "They hired purist Paladin bastards to try to invade Stonebrook and murder them. I will find out who did it, and when I do, they'll regret it," she growled.

"Are, are you going through with your plans for the wedding?" the male asked.

She nodded. "I'm still going on my honeymoon as well. I can take care of everything over the phone. Which is why we're here. I want you two to draw up a memo stating that while I'm gone, Kit will serve as the temporary chairman. I want to give him proxy to vote for me, and the ability to call meetings. Uncle Zach's suspension is over next week, while I'm on my honeymoon, and if he doesn't resign I want him to be so afraid to show up he won't even bother. Putting Kit in my chair while I'm on my honeymoon will do that nicely."

"But I'm not leaving Stonebrook," he protested.

"You don't have to leave Stonebrook. There are no board meetings scheduled while I'm on my honeymoon, hell, four board members are going on vacation at the same time, and as long as you're sitting in the chair, nobody else can call them either. Only you will have that power. But, you'll have that option if I think it's necessary. You can call a meeting and just listen in over the phone." She looked at the two foxes. "I want that proxy statement on my desk in ten minutes," she demanded. "Kit needs to go back to Stonebrook, and he can't leave until he signs that proxy."

"Give us fifteen minutes," the male said.

Kit could do nothing but pace back and forth across her Oriental carpet, still trying to calm down. It hadn't quite sunk in yet that someone had tried to kill him, but he wasn't worried about himself. All his worry was for Jessie. She was upset and distraught over this, and he wanted to be at home, caring for her, tending her, comforting her. She was his life, and he couldn't stand the idea that she was unhappy. But, this also had to be done. If Vil really was going to go on with her plans, which he knew was necessary and he didn't blame her, then she had to have someone she could trust completely with the proxy power of CEO.

"Relax, bro," she told him, then she grunted. "Though you certainly have every reason to be upset."

“I knew this would happen,” he blurted. “The second I came up here, I knew this would happen. I knew someone would take a shot at me, and I feel sick that Jessie had to see it. See my family at its worst. God, why wouldn’t she go home!”

“Because she can’t live without you, bro,” Vil said calmly. “She loves you. Now sit down.”

He sighed and did as she asked, sitting in the chair in front of her desk. “I hope she’s not too upset.”

“She’ll feel much better when you get home. And tell her that the baby shower will be held right on schedule. We’re not letting those bastards scare us into doing anything differently. We’re having the shower, and tomorrow, I’m getting married.”

The door opened, and Kendall’s entire family rushed in, as well as their friend Charlie. Instead of coming to Vil, however, they all came to Kit and offered him paws, patted him on the back. “Are you and your wife alright, son?” Winston asked in sincere concern.

“Shaken, but alright,” he answered. “Thank you.”

“We Brightons don’t take kindly to someone taking a swipe at our family. And you are our family now, son. What are you doing about this, Vil?”

“I have furs working on it now,” she answered. “I’m going to find out who did this, and when I do,” she said, trailing off ominously.

“If you need any help, dovey, we’re here,” Winston told her seriously. “We have some furs here in America, and they’re at your disposal.”

“I might take you up on that, old male,” she answered. “There is one thing you can do for me.”

“What is that?”

“When my lawyers get back with some papers Kit’s gonna sign, he needs to go home. Can you take him? I don’t want him to be alone.”

“Harry, Mike, you two and Charlie take care of it. Assure little Jessie that she’s well cared for, and while you’re at Stonebrook, talk to the guards and get an idea of what happened.”

“Sure thing, old male,” Harry nodded.

“No problem, Mister B,” Charlie nodded, his ears bobbing in a slightly funny manner. “I like being where the femmes are anyway, and there are a few lookers at Stonebrook.”

“Don’t make me send you home, Charlie.”

“I’ll behave. Mostly,” he grinned.

The two lawyers hurried back in with a folder. “We have it all, Miss Vulpan,” the male said.

“Alright, bro, let’s get you back home.”

“Back to Stonebrook, at any rate,” he grunted.

Chapter 37

Kit liked the Brightons.

They had escorted him home in a company limousine, and he'd had a much better chance to talk to them than he'd had before. Their initial meeting was busy, and the wedding rehearsals didn't really give him a chance to talk to them because he and Jessie arrived literally right as they started, they practiced the ceremony two or three times, then they were immediately taken home so as to minimize their vulnerability. They hadn't had much of a chance to really talk, but when the two younger Brightons and Charlie Duke went home with him, they had a chance to talk in the limo, and he liked what he heard.

For one, all three of the Brighton boys had similar personality traits that Kit felt were admirable. All three were intelligent, a little playful, didn't panic, and what impressed him the most, they were tight-knit. Kendall, Harry, and Michael enjoyed a good joke, enjoyed a fine glass of wine, and enjoyed the company of friends and family. Their family wasn't that large, with just one uncle on their father's side and an uncle and an aunt on their mother's side, which was a strange concept to Kit. His mother had been an only child, and her parents had died before she did, her father of a heart attack and her mother of cancer. Kit had no family on the Stockton side that wasn't two or three places removed, a few distant cousins and a great uncle, but they had little to do with the Vulpans. The Stocktons were as distant with each other as the Vulpans were, so his great uncle and third cousins on the Stockton side really didn't care all that much about Vil and Kit. But it wasn't like that in the Brighton family. Their mother, Abigail Mallory, and her family were very involved in the Brighton family, many of the Mallorys employed by Brighton Industries. They had grown up in a tightly knit family, and that induced into them a powerful family loyalty that had nothing to do with money and everything to do with love.

Kit could be a little jealous of that.

The attack on Kit and Jessie had outraged the Brightons, who considered Vil and her family to be part of the Brighton clan, and their initial response was to fold around them, rally around them, and both reassure them that everything was going to be alright and also protect them. Their smiles were earnest, their pats on his shoulder were sincere, and they made him feel much better by the time they got home.

Thank God that Jessie felt better too. She met him in the courtyard and gave him a crushing hug, but she looked much more composed now. She also hugged the Brighton boys and Charlie. "Dad sent us to keep you company and make you feel better, Jessica," Harry told her.

"So, Mike will get the electric razor, I'll get the silk, and Harry will get the handcuffs," Charlie said with a roguish smile.

"He said make her feel better," Michael said calmly when Jessie gave him a surprised look.

"Oh. Oh, right then," he said lightly, which made Jessie giggle. "So, let's go inside and see the decorations for your baby shower, Jessie. By the by, where are those smashingly lovely bridesmaids?"

"Suzy's at home, Sonya's at her apartment, and Muffy's in the TV room," she answered.

“Oh, good, at least there’s one girl here I can hit on without running from an angry husband,” Charlie said brightly, which made Jessie erupt into glorious laughter.

Kit felt much better about the Brightons being there now.

They went to the TV room and joined Muffy, who crushed Kit in a fierce hug when he came in, as well as Rick, Martha, Allison, and Pat. “God was I worried!” she told him. “Nobody woke me up! I heard about it all just a few minutes ago!”

“So did we,” Rick said, standing up.

“Guys, this is Rick, my boss at the magazine, his wife Martha, Terry’s girlfriend Allison, and Pat, one of the researchers from the magazine,” Kit introduced.

The Brightons and Charlie introduced themselves around, Charlie spending an inordinate amount of time trying to charm Allison, without much success, then Stanley and Dee brought them all tea, scones, and coffee for Rick and Martha. “Thanks, Stan. Is the staff okay?”

“A bit shaken, Master Kit, but otherwise alright,” he answered. “We’re just happy you and Mistress Jessie are safe.”

“We’re okay,” Jessie told him.

“I’ve already called a contractor to come and look into sealing off that tunnel,” Stanley informed him. “I was of a mind to seal it at the pipe side but leave the passage itself intact.”

“It would be too hard to do it any other way,” Kit agreed. “We can just seal the pipe and the little room beyond with a few tons of cement, and nothing else will need to be done. We can just leave the trap door as is, because it won't matter. I'm sure we'll notice someone with a jackhammer trying to get in."

"Truly," Stanley nodded.

"Well, son, you promised us excitement when we got here. I'm not sure this is the kind of excitement I had in mind," Rick said dryly.

"Us either," Jessie nodded.

"Vil said to warn you that the baby shower is still on schedule," Kit remembered. "She didn't mention the last wedding rehearsal, but I get the feeling we'll do that too."

"You sure you're up to it, Jessie dear?" Martha asked.

"If we change our plans, they win," she said with a raised chin. "I won't let them scare me away, Martha. We'll have the shower at four just like we planned, and I'm sure Vil still plans on getting married tomorrow."

"That she does, dove," Harry nodded. "One o'clock in that ungodly Catholic cathedral," he said with a shudder. "Why Kenny caved in on an Anglican wedding is beyond me."

"Vil pretty much well owns Kenny, I noticed," Charlie said with a wicked little smile. "I'm going to have so much fun rubbing his nose in it for the next ten years." He looked lightly at Allison. "I'm going to have plenty of reasons to come to America, I see."

"Down, boy," Michael chided.

"You can let him dream," Allison murmured, which made Kit splutter and Jessie giggle.

Though Kit and Jessie both were a little out of sorts, the gang and the Brightons calmed them down a great deal with friendly talk and stories traded between the Brightons and the Austin gang about daily life. The Brightons explained what they did in the company and Charlie told them about his years as a Royal Marine, then he winked at Allison and offered to show them all his scar. More and more of the gang joined them as the morning wore on, until every seat was taken and a few were standing around. Savid and Nawa were absent, with their kids at the pool. Kit could feel Jessie relax as she was surrounded by friends and family, until her smiles were sincere and her manner was again kind and gentle. He could feel the underlying tension in her shoulders when he touched her, but he could also tell that the Brightons had accomplished their mission and had made Jessie relax quite a bit.

Vil returned about two hours after they did, hobbling in with Winston Brighton, Kendall, and Brian and Ruth Vulpan. “Alright, everyone!” she boomed. “It’s our last wedding rehearsal, then we come back and have Jessie’s shower! So, wedding party, let’s go!”

“Brusque, isn’t she?” Charlie noted.

“Usually,” Kit nodded. “Feel up to a trip to the Holy Cross, pretty kitty?”

“I’ll be alright. I just hope Sam and Sheila get here before the shower,” she fretted.

“They’re in the air right now and on the way,” Vil assured her. “So is the Party Pack.”

Brian stopped them long enough to let Ruth give Jessie a reassuring hug. “We hope you’re okay, honey,” she said in a sincere voice. “When Brian told me what happened, I couldn't believe it!"

"I'm alright," she said. "I'm just a little shocked, that's all. I thought all this kind of stuff wasn't supposed to happen anymore."

"Well, it'll never happen to you again," Ruth declared. "You go do your rehearsal, and we'll talk when you get home, dear."

"Umm...alright," she said, a bit uncertainly.

After they got loaded up in the limos, Kit and Jessie were seated with Vil, Kendall, and Winston, while the other sons rode in the other limo with Muffy. That limo was going to detour to pick up Sonya, and their limo was going straight to the church. Two cars would escort them, holding Nick, Sylvia, Krichek, and Donny, who would make sure everyone was safe.

Vil was on her phone, and she had a strange look on her face. "You're sure?" she asked intently. "You're absolutely sure?" She frowned. "Alright. Find him. Right now." She took the phone and put it on the little armrest beside her, then sighed. "Steve didn't show up for work this morning."

"Steve? Who's Steve?" Jessie asked.

"Zach's eldest son," Vil replied. "He wasn't at work today, and if he's not at work, I want him found now. Either he's skipping work and has no idea what's going on or he knows what's going on and he doesn't want to come in."

"Have I met him?"

"No, sis, you haven't," she answered. "He's supporting his father."

"Could he..." Jessie trailed off.

“It’s possible, I suppose,” Vil shrugged. “He’s as rabid a purist as his father, but he’s a lemming. He works a black hole job just so he can claim he works in the shipyard without doing any real work, but he just does what he’s told. He’s never done a single thing I can remember.”

“What do you mean?”

“He just drifts,” she answered. “Doesn’t take any initiative, doesn’t do anything. He just sits behind a desk and plays World of Warcraft all day, then goes home and cheats on his wife on a daily basis. Then again, she cheats on him because he cheats on her,” Vil mused. “He avoids his wife so completely that he still doesn’t have any kids.”

“That’s almost sad,” Jessie noted. “Who’s he married to?”

“I understand why he does it,” Vil said darkly. “His wife is a total bitch.”

“God, is she,” Kit affirmed.

“She’s related to Alicia through marriage, so that’s probably why,” Vil chuckled humorlessly. “Gloria Morgan of the venerable Morgan family. As in JP Morgan and Morgan Chase. They got rich in banking and stocks. Her sister is married to Alicia’s cousin.”

“That was a real fur?”

Vil nodded. “JP was a real fox,” she answered.

“Aye, he was a nasty brute,” Winston chimed in. “I met him once, when I was but a tyke and he was already sliding into his dotage.”

“Was that before or after you invented the wheel, old male?” Michael asked with aplomb.

“Just before we discovered fire, lad,” he answered with a cheeky grin. “Back when dirt was new.”

Understandably, the wedding rehearsal was a bit tense. The Archbishop had heard about the attack, and he looked honestly surprised when they arrived, and hurried out to the limos. “Are you sure you want to do this today, Miss Vulpan?” he asked her with honest concern. “I would completely understand if you wish to cancel today, maybe even postpone the wedding.”

“Nothing changes,” she said bluntly.

“Very well then. And Kit, Jessica, I thank God you are unhurt. When we heard about it on the news, we were shocked. Just shocked!”

“Thank you, Father,” Kit said, shaking his paw.

“It’s very kind of you, Father,” Jessie said as he patted her on the arm.

“Now, for my own nerves’ sake, let us go inside and get the rehearsal under way. I’m sure that you would much rather be tracking down the criminal who perpetrated this outrage.”

“I have furs working on it right now, Father,” Vil told him as she allowed him to help her towards the side door of the cathedral. “So if we’re interrupted during the rehearsal, I’d like a little leeway.”

“Of course, my child,” he smiled. “I certainly understand. Where is the rest of the wedding party?”

“On the way, the other limo had to detour to pick up Sonya.”

“What an interesting young femme,” the Archbishop noted. “I’ve never seen a lady quite so tall as her.”

“Don’t get on the basketball court with her, Father,” Vil warned. “Priest or no priest, she’ll run you over if you try to block the lane.”

The Archbishop laughed lightly. “I’m afraid my basketball days are over, Miss Vil. But I still play a mean game of backgammon.”

“She’d probably run you over anyway.”

Archbishop O’Malley laughed delightedly.

The rehearsal went smoothly, because after four days, everyone knew what to do. The ceremony would be a mixture of Catholic tradition and a few Protestant tweaks. They would greet the guests at the door as was proper, and follow the Archbishop down the aisle, but Vil would be on Winston’s arm rather than with Kendall. Winston would give her away at the dais and then take his seat, and then it would be more or less completely Catholic up to the end. Instead of the wedding party proceeding in reverse order, since they didn’t enter in Catholic tradition, Vil and Kendall would go first with the wedding party behind them in pairs. Kit and Suzy would be immediately behind Vil and Kendall, then Jessie with Michael, Sonya with Harry, and Muffy with Charlie would bring up the rear. They practiced it three times as the wedding workers worked in a frenzy to install the floral arrangements and other decorations for the wedding, but they were nearly done. The chapel too was decorated in Vil’s favorite, white and yellow roses, with white and red buntings and ribbons decorating the walls and pews, and the workers only had the copious amounts of floral arrangements to put up before they were finished.

By the end of the rehearsal, the news was now completely out that there was an attempt on the life of a Vulpan, and the news crews were out in force and trying to hunt down any Vulpan they could find. One news van, probably working a hunch, showed up at the church and was turned away at the door while they were doing their second run through the ceremony. The church workers stalled the news crew while the Archbishop escorted them out to their limos after the rehearsal. “Remember, try to be here at least an hour before the ceremony,” O’Malley called as he shook Vil’s paw. “And try not to be too nervous,” he added with a smile.

“Why would we be nervous?” Kendall asked airily, then he held up a paw that was shaking violently, which made most of them giggle and chortle.

“We’re all going to the same place, so just follow us,” Vil told the second limo driver and Suzy, who had come in her own car. “It’s about time for Jessie’s shower.”

Nick and Sylvia led them out in their car, and they were on their way back. Kit saw the news crew rushing towards the side lot as the limos pulled out onto the street, and the cameramale swung his camera up and took a shot of the two limos and two escorting cars pass by.

“Well, Vil, you have less than a day to make your peace,” Kendall told her with a smile. “Cause you’re gonna be my property.”

“Oh really,” Vil said mildly.

“Yah. We’ll have you pregnant and in the kitchen where a femme belongs in no time.”

Jessie erupted into laughter when Winston gave Kendall a cool look. “You’re not supposed to tell her that until after the ceremony, Kenny,” he said with a straight face.

“Eh, she already said it’s gonna happen no matter what, so why not give her the truth now?”

“Jessie, do you still have that frilly pink apron?” Vil asked.

“Umm, yeah, but it’s at home. Why?”

“Send it up here. I’m going to educate Ken on a few things. We’ll see who’s wearing it after a month.”

Jessie giggled, and Kit put an arm around her. He was so grateful to them all for making her feel better, helping her get over the trauma of the morning. Everyone was doing their damndest to make Jessie feel comfortable, and he was very happy that she was getting back to normal.

“When you get him in that apron, snap a pic, Vil,” Charlie said, “and send it to me. I know quite a few males who would love to see Kendall Brighton in an apron.”

Sam, Kevin, and Sheila were indeed there when they got back to Stonebrook, since they met them in the courtyard. Sam crushed Jessie in a powerful hug, and blurted “we didn’t know what happened until we got up here, it was on the news on the radio. Are you alright?”

“I’m okay. Feeling a lot better now than I did this morning,” she answered. “Everyone’s being so wonderful!”

“Well, don’t worry too much, Jessie,” Sheila said as she hugged her. “We’re gonna find whoever did it and rip his tail off and stuff it down his throat.”

“Too tame,” Charlie said. “Besides, some of us don’t have enough tail for that to be much of a threat.”

“Sam, Sheila, this is the Brighton family and their family friend. Ken you know. This is his father Winston, his brothers Harry and Michael, and Charlie Duke.”

“That’s sir Charlie Duke,” he grinned, sidling up to Sheila. “I must say, the Vulpan family has its share of lookers. You’re Sheila, right?”

“That’s right. And you’re cute,” she said in a light manner.

Charlie smiled brightly. “Well, why don’t we go talk about that after the shower?”

“Sheila,” Kit called warningly.

“What? It’s not like he’s a relative or anything,” she protested. “I’ve never done an English bunny before,” she said, fixing a predatory look at Charlie.

Charlie actually looked a little uncertain of himself as he stepped back to allow Harry and Michael to greet Sheila.

Kit took Charlie aside as they walked towards the house. “I’d be careful with Sheila.”

“I’m just bantering.”

“She’s not,” he said bluntly. “So tread lightly, and say nothing you won’t back up.”

“She’s not, eh?” he said, glancing back at her.

“I warned you,” Kit said simply, then went back to his wife.

Sheila didn’t just bring Sam and Kevin and Jessie’s family. Lupe came with her, and Janet came on a commercial flight scheduled to arrive at the same time, so she caught a ride with Sheila.

Rather quickly, the femmes swept Jessie up and spirited her away to the sun room, Kit's favorite room in the manor, for her shower, while the males gathered in the TV room and talked, mainly about the attack that morning. Mike, Barry, Pat, Rick, and Kevin looked a little uncomfortable being surrounded by powerful males like the Vulpans and the Brightons, so they were mostly silent and just listened. They discussed it seriously and at some length, then discussed what should be done to find out who did it. Brian was with them, and he pointed out the one glaring truth that made it plain what whoever did it was a Vulpan. "Whoever organized this knew about something that nobody else in this manor knew about," he said simply. "So that leaves just a pawful of furs who could have done this. That fur has an understanding of the manor far beyond even furs who have lived here their entire lives, like Stanley, Clancy, and Dee."

"That brings up a point," Winston said. "From what Vil told me, the Vulpans aren't the only ones who have lived in this manor for long periods. It's possible it could be a servant. Have you done anything to anger any of your staff, Kit?"

"Not that I know of," he answered. "But if there's anyone in the PPC on the staff, then me marrying Jessie was all it took."

"The servants would certainly have enough money to pay forty thousand dollars for a hit," Brian grunted. "We pay our servants handsomely for their work and for their silence. I think the most junior member of my staff makes thirty thousand a year. My chief butler makes a hundred thousand."

"As do we. They deserve it for putting up with us," Kendall chuckled.

“We’ve already thought of that,” Nick said. “I’ve got some mates digging through both the Vulpan family and through anyone who either lived or worked here at Stonebrook for more than five weeks, looking for anything that might connect them to the attack. That’s a lot of blokes, but I have a lot of mates.”

“Being thorough means you don’t have to go back and do it again,” Winston nodded in appreciation.

“What did the attackers have to say?” Brian asked Nick.

“Typical chaff, Mister Vulpan,” he answered. “They didn’t know the name of the fur who hired them, got their money through a wire transfer and instructions emailed over the internet. We’ve already tracked that down,” he noted, taking a paper out of his pocket. “The money was wired from a front bank in the Azores receiving an internet order to do so that originated from Denver, Colorado, and the instructions were emailed from an internet café in France. Nice and spread out, making it hard to track it down.”

“Front bank?” Harry asked.

“A bank that only exists on the internet,” Nick answered. “Like PayPal. They’re used by quite a few criminal organizations. They have official licensing and such, but since they only operate over the internet, they’re hard to track down business done through them. The Azores is famous for these things, since their licensing requirements and regulation is basically nil. Using internet front banks is the new way to launder money.”

A light went on in Kit’s head. “I wonder if that extra money that was in the Stonebrook accounts found its way to the Azores,” he said suddenly.

“We already thought of that, Kit,” Nick told him. “My mates are digging as we speak. It was more than forty thousand that was in the accounts, though. According to what Stan told me, there was excess of two million dollars extra in the Stonebrook accounts.”

“Well, that could still have something to do with it,” Winston noted. “I know a few furs in France. I think I’ll have that café checked out and find out who sent that email.”

“I have a few friends on the net in my line of work,” Mike said tentatively. “A couple of them are hackers. They’re fairly good at tracking things down online. I could ask them for a few favors.”

“Go for it, mate,” Nick chuckled. “This isn’t about a turf war. The more we have looking for the answers, the better chance we have of finding them.”

“Let me go jump online and send a few messages.”

“Here, come with me, I’ll give you the details they’ll need to start lookin’,” Nick said, and the two left the room.

They continued the discussion, but without much more progress, as they basically just rehashed the details over and over. About two hours after they started, the femmes returned, and they all looked quite happy. “It must have been a good shower,” Winston noted as Jessie gave Kit a hug and a nuzzle.

“It was wonderful!” Jessie said. “And the girls didn’t go crazy with presents!” she laughed.

All the girls were there, he saw. Bess, Mary, Lynn, Angela, and Joy had arrived and attended the shower, along with Lilly, Denise, Elly, Allison, Sam, Sheila, and Martha.

“Well, Jessie certainly won’t need to buy anything for Laura,” Vil chuckled as she hobbled in. “And she got the baby seat for the plane too, just like she wanted.”

“We got four baby seats,” Jessie laughed ruefully. “One for each car and one for the plane.”

“And just about everything else she needs for Laura,” Sheila added.

“Well, that’s what baby showers are all about,” Winston nodded.

“It was great!” Jessie said. “I even got a surprise!”

“What surprise?”

“I think she means us,” a voice came behind them.

Kit looked and saw the Williams family, John, Hannah, Jenny, and Ben, standing there.

Kit laughed. “I thought you weren’t coming until tomorrow!” he said, hugging Jenny.

“It was all cloak and dagger so Jessie didn’t know we were coming,” Jenny winked. “Vil was even lying to you to keep the secret from her.”

“Mean sister!” Kit laughed, pointing at her.

“It worked, didn’t it?” she smiled in reply.

“Do you really think I’d miss my daughter’s first baby shower, Kit?” Hannah said archly as he hugged her in greeting. “Now that the shower is over, you can explain what happened this morning.”

“You deserve that much,” Vil told her as Kit shook paws with John and Ben. “But first, let’s introduce everyone. Ken, Winston, guys, this is Jessie’s family. John and Hannah Williams, and their children Jenny and Ben. Guys, these are the Brightons. Winston, my fiancée Kendall, Harry, Michael, and the shady-looking bunny over there is a friend of their family, Charlie Duke.”

“I’m not shady, I’m dashing,” Charlie said with an outrageous smile.

“He will be soon,” Mike murmured to Pat, who nodded.

It was a bit cramped in the room after that, but they made due. Vil then explained what happened to Jessie’s family in detail, and she was sure to mention that the four attackers were Paladins. Vil knew Hannah’s history, and she knew that that would incite Hannah in a way few other things could. Hannah had fought purists her entire life, had been one of the Columbus Twenty, and her brothers had been killed by a purist mob. Hannah Williams did not shy away from a fight when it came to opposing the PPC. “Luckily, though, Jessie found the secret tunnel before the plan could be carried out, and Nick set a trap for the attackers. They’re in jail now, and I’m turning Boston over and shaking it to find who set it up.”

“We’re fairly certain it has to be a Vulpan or someone very close to them, for few would know about that tunnel,” Winston told them. “Not even Kit or the chief butler knew about that tunnel, so it has to be someone that knows the manor even better than them. There can’t be more than one or two others with that kind of knowledge.”

“And you’re certain that Jessica will be safe?” John asked.

“That’s why I’m here, Mister Williams,” Nick said simply. “Miss Vil hired me to keep your daughter and her husband safe, and I take my job very seriously.”

“I absolutely guarantee you, John, Hannah, this will never happen again,” Vil said adamantly. “I’m going to make such an object lesson out of whoever did this that everyone else will wet themselves at the very thought of trying something like this.” She looked to Kit and Jessie. “My brother and your daughter are two of the most important furs in my life, and I can’t even begin to tell you how furious I am right now.”

“She’s not the only one,” Brian said grimly. “If this came from someone in the family, then they have no business being in the family. Fighting Vil over her control of the family is one thing, but trying to murder a member of the family goes about fifty miles too far.”

“Aye,” Winston nodded. “We Brightons protect our own, and the Vulpans and the Williams are now part of us,” he declared. “You need us? We’re here.”

“Here here,” Harry agreed.

“But, we’re only here for those who deserve it,” Kendall added. “We’ll find the rotten parts of the Vulpan family and excise them like cutting the bruise out of an apple.”

“I hope I’m not in that bruise,” Lynn giggled.

“But Ken makes an important point,” Vil said. “If this is what this family has come to, then trying to keep the family united is pointless. So, since keeping the family together is no longer an option, we destroy those who oppose us. We find the undesirable Vulpans and we run them out of Boston. And that starts tomorrow,” she said grimly. “Tomorrow, I put every Vulpan against us on probation at work, and by the time I’m back from my honeymoon, they'll be gone. We will sweep the company clean of everyone not loyal to me, then we get Zach and Jake off the board, then we drive them out of Boston. When this is over, only the true Vulpans will be left here."

"Isn't that a touch drastic, Vil?" Ruth asked.

"Wasn't what nearly happened here fairly drastic, Ruthie?" Vil asked immediately in reply. "This isn't about being careful and maintaining family unity when this is over, about using kid gloves to keep someone from getting too angry so I can herd everyone back under the tent once the dust settles. This is now war. They tried to kill my brother and sister!" she said hotly. "And I'm a firm believer that a destroyed enemy doesn't come back to bite you in the ass five years from now."

"Now I see why you love her, brother," Michael said with a slight smile. "She's cute when she's plotting mayhem."

Quite a few blurted out laughter at that unexpected remark, and Kit saw that Michael was quite prone to those out-of-the-blue zingers. They were funny, though.

Kit felt much better as they all sat around and talked as his friends from the magazine slowly got accustomed to being around rich furs and dignitaries. John and Hannah sat and talked with Kit, Jessie, Winston, and Vil. Jenny and Ben got into a lively chat with the other youngsters, Jessie's friends from Austin, Harry and Michael and the Party Pack, and Charlie spent a lot of time flirting, as well as having his advances bluntly accepted by the Vulpan girls, which startled him a bit. They weren't behaving the way they were supposed to, with playful flirting and remarks, but Charlie had never encountered the Party Pack before. There wasn't a single girl in the Party Pack that would blink even once over dragging Charlie into some unused room and taking tremendous advantage of him, and their bold forward behavior had put him off his usual game. He was used to chasing girls, not having girls basically chase him. Kit had the feeling that before the night was over, Charlie was going to be educated by one of his cousins about putting his money where his mouth was. Bess was going on and on about New Orleans and working, having a real job with real responsibility, and how Terry, who hadn't arrived yet, had been both very kind to her and also teaching her about being a boss, about how to run a division or an office or a section and be both efficient and fair to the employees. Jenny and Sam, who were both in pre-med, struck up an immediate friendship and were talking about things that made no sense to anyone else, and Ben found himself all but surrounded by both Brightons and the guys from work as he described being on the football team at Ohio State and their first game, which was on Saturday.

After a while, dinner was served. Stanley didn't want to use the formal dining room but had too many to fit in any other room, so what he did was have the staff place tables in the main parlor and move the furniture out. Despite being temporary tables, they were covered with satin tablecloths and were set with fine Vulpan china, and the chairs had been pulled from the main dining room, which were lustrously dark wood polished to a shine, and with cushioned seats. Jessie, for the first time, had no paw in the meal served to her and Kit, and the cooks had gone the distance to lay out a meal of veal and Portobello mushrooms in a truffle sauce, shrimp bisque, lobster tails, steamed artichoke hearts, steamed asparagus, baby potatoes in a butter and garlic sauce, and with cheesecake for desert. Stanley had even delved deeply into Stonebrook's wine cellar to serve some very good wine. He looked positively enraptured, Stanley did, for he lived for this kind of thing.

He got to show off Stonebrook and prove that it was the best manor in New England, and the Brightons, the Williams, the visiting Vulpans, and the gang from Austin had nothing but praise for the staff for the wonderful dinner.

After dinner, things settled down...almost. The large group broke up somewhat. The elders, Kit, and Jessie returned to the TV room to talk and give Jessie's parents more time to get to know Brian and Ruth and the Brightons, while the youngsters and the Austin gang all scattered through the manor to do things. Sylvia took a few with her to the range to let them try target shooting, Savid and Nawa took their kids to the pool and were joined by a couple of Vulpans and Harry Brighton. Charlie and Ben went to the theatre to watch a movie with a couple of his cousins and Lilly. Sam, Jenny, Kevin, Janet and Lupe went out on a tour of the manor with Muffy. Everyone was just enjoying the evening, the day before the wedding, relaxing and trying to calm down after the anxiety of the morning.

They were also joined not long afterward. Kit had carried through on his intent to invite the Governor to stay at Stonebrook the night before the wedding, and the Governor accepted. The Governor's limo arrived at about 8:30pm, and Kit, Jessie, Vil, and Winston greeted him in the courtyard. Kit welcomed him to Stonebrook and gave him free run of the place, and not long afterward Stanley escorted the Governor to the garden cottage, a nice and roomy cottage where he and his two Texas Ranger escorts could relax and unwind before going to bed. Stanley dispatched Sally and Benson to serve the Governor, and the Governor left the cottage after changing into a pair of sweats and a tee shirt and joined them in the main house, joining the conversation, and also adding his concern to the others; he too had heard about the attack on Kit and Jessie.

“It’s all over the news,” he said, taking a glass of wine from Dee with a nod of thanks. “They’re calling it the Foiled Wedding Massacre. Any leads yet, Vilenne?”

“I’m still working on it, or more to the point, my furs are,” she answered. “It’s not changing the fact that I’m getting married tomorrow.”

“That did surprise me a little.”

“We have very good reasons for going through with it,” Winston said simply.

“We’re not going on our honeymoon until Saturday afternoon, so I’ll have tomorrow here in Boston. Saturday I’m going to Columbus to watch my brother-in-law play football, then we go on our honeymoon.”

“Ah, yes, Ohio State?”

She nodded. “My brother Ben plays for them,” Jessie told him.

“We have an extra ticket,” Vil said enticingly.

Rick Perry laughed. “Attend a non-Texas football game? I’d be lynched! Besides, I really do need to be back in Austin tomorrow afternoon. I have a formal dinner Saturday.” He turned to Jessie. “I’m very glad you’re alright, you two. You’re not just citizens of Texas, I like to think of you as friends. I did attend your wedding, after all,” he smiled.

“Thanks, Governor,” Kit said, accepting his pawshake.

“Please, call me Rick. When are you coming home?”

“I’ll be here until I legally force my uncle out of Stonebrook,” Kit answered. “We’ll be back in early October.”

“I do hope you’re returning to Texas to have your baby, Jessie,” he grinned. “That way she’s a native Texan.”

Jessie giggled. “Unless something serious happens, I hate to say that I’ll be delivering right here in Stonebrook.”

“Well, I’ll tell you what. We’ll keep the birth a secret until you get home, then we’ll present the baby down there and we’ll issue you a Texas birth certificate.”

“Why would they want to do that? Laura is a Vulpan, and a Vulpan should be born in Massachusetts,” Vil said lightly.

“But, she’ll be a yankee if she’s born up here,” Rick Perry said seriously, which made Jessie laugh.

When the Brightons were about ready to return to Hart’s Crossing, Charlie turned up missing. Kit knew almost immediately what was going on, but he just kept quiet and allowed the staff to hunt him down. All Kit really had to do was count his femme cousins and see who was missing. Much to his surprise, it wasn’t Sheila that had lured Charlie into some deserted room for a little fun, it was Lynn. The two of them turned up about twenty minutes later, Lynn with a smug little smile and Charlie looking quite out of sorts, his shirt buttoned up wrong and his slacks only halfway zipped up. His other cousins immediately drew her off for all the juicy gossip while the Brighton boys couldn’t look at him without laughing.

After the Brightons left, Vil, Kit, and Jessie all decided to go to bed. Vil had a big day ahead of her tomorrow, and Kit and Jessie were both tired, and Kit was a little drained. He was especially considerate to Jessie up in the bedroom, and when he had her snuggled in his arms in bed, he finally dared breach the subject. “I hope you’re alright.”

“I’m a lot better than I was this morning,” she said ruefully. “I feel safe, my handsome fox. I feel protected and secure. I’m a little freaked out, but it’ll pass. I told you, I will not let them drive me away from you, no matter what. You were afraid that they’d be capable of something horrible, and you were right. But that won’t chase me away. I am your wife, Kit, and I will stand beside you through both the good and the bad.

“God, I love you, Jessie.”

“You’d better, because there will be no divorce,” she said impishly, which made him laugh. And then she started to purr, and everything was suddenly right with the world.

Kit figured that someone would wake them up in the morning, and he was proved entirely correct. He figured that it would be Stanley or one of the staff, but he was honestly surprised when it was Vil who woke them up at six in the morning, shaking Kit awake. “Mmph, what?” he asked blearily as Jessie burrowed a little deeper into his arms, or as far as her swollen belly would allow.

“Get up!” she told them in an almost hyper voice. “Get up, sleepyhead, it’s my wedding day!”

He glanced at the clock on the nightstand. “In seven hours,” he answered. “Go back to bed.”

“Only seven hours? Oh my God, I’ll never get ready in time!” she gasped. “Get up, we have a lot to do and no time!”

“Oh God, she’s one of them,” Jessie complained as Vil rushed towards the door as fast as her casted leg would allow.

“One of what?”

“ADHD bride,” she grunted, which made Kit explode into laughter.

Luann, bless her heart, had woken up early enough to put tea and scones by the door for them. He brought them into the room as Jessie yawned and sat up as much as she could with Laura taking up most of her lap. At eight months pregnant, Jessie couldn't seem to get any bigger, yet she did indeed get a little bigger every week, it seemed. Already her belly was very, very round, and she had another month to go! She slid her feet out of bed and picked up her robe from the foot of the bed and slid it on as she stood up. “Well, we may as well get up, because odds are she'll be back,” Jessie complained. “Pour me a cup of tea, handsome fox?”

“Certainly, love,” he nodded as she padded across the large room and into the huge bathroom.

Just as Jessie predicted, Vil stormed back into their bedroom not three minutes after leaving. Kit gave her a cup of tea wordlessly and she walked right by him, then turned, laughed, and took it. “Sorry,” she apologized. “But I'm really excited.”

“I can't tell,” he said blandly. “Go finish up all your paperwork before the wedding, I'm sure there's something you missed,” he told her. “Work off some of that nervous energy. That's what I did on my wedding day.”

“That's not a bad idea,” she said.

Vil scurried out, and Kit carried Jessie's tea to her nightstand and set it down. She came out of the bathroom and picked up the cup with a smile and a nod, then sat down daintily on the bed and took a sip. “I'm going to need this to wake up,” she said wearily. “I never pegged Vil to be the hyper type. She’s always so calm.”

“I guess everyone has the right to be giddy about something sometime,” Kit chuckled as he took a sip of his tea. “She really does love Kendall. She doesn’t show it, but she does.”

“She has a good reason to like him. He’s a wonderful male, and he has a great family. Speaking of family,” she said, picking up the phone by her nightstand, which was a holdover from the old system. Though all the staff and the residents used the cell phones, the original landline phones were still there, and each room had its own phone with its own extension. Jessie dialed the extension for the bedroom where her parents were sleeping. “I know they’re up,” she smiled. “Hi Mom, is Dad up? Good. Want to come up to our bedroom and have a cup of tea, and talk a while? Okay, remember where it is? That’s right. Okay, see you in a minute.”

“I’ll have them send up more tea, and some coffee for your dad,” he said, picking up his cell phone and hitting push to talk. “Who’s in the kitchen?”

“I am, Master Kit, what do you need?” Stanley answered.

“Could you please bring another pot of tea and some coffee up to our room? Jessie’s parents are coming up.”

“I’ll have it sent up immediately.”

“Thanks, Stan,” Kit answered.

“You’d better put on some undies, love,” Jessie winked at him. “As much as I love the chance your robe might untie, I don’t think my mom will appreciate it as much as I do.”

Kit laughed. "I'll bring yours too."

Jessie's parents arrived wearing what Kit felt was typical for them. John was wearing a Bengals tee shirt and tiger-striped sweatpants, and Hannah was wearing a simple yet full length blue robe. Jessie hugged them in turn, and Kit shook John's paw and kissed Hannah on the cheek fondly as Luann scurried in carrying a large tray holding a second pot of tea and a smaller pot filled with coffee. She blushed furiously when Jessie introduced her to her parents as if she were one of her friends and not her maid, then she served them with quiet efficiency as they sat down on the couches over by the TV. "Did you like your room, Mom?" Jessie asked.

"It's...large," she said, then she laughed. "This place is so grand!"

"I think our entire house can fit into this wing," John said sagely. "And God, what would it be like to watch Bengal games on that home theatre screen?" he asked with a laugh. "I thought the Bengal Den had a good TV in it!"

"That's not a TV, it's a projector," Kit told him.

"I still get lost here," Jessie admitted with a slightly rueful smile.

"This is the dirty little secret," Kit chuckled. "This is where I grew up. Right here in this house."

"What's it like to live here, Jessica?" Hannah asked.

"Well, it's a little weird," she answered. "I'm still not used to the servants waiting on me. Thanks Luann," she said with a smile as Luann offered her a new cup of tea. Luann nodded and poured a cup of coffee. "I still cook our own meals and clean our room, so I can feel, well, normal."

Luann hates that,” Jessie giggled. “This room is her responsibility, and I always do all her work.”

“It’s not proper for you to clean, Mistress Jessie,” Luann said demurely. “You’re a Vulpan. Vulpans do not clean.”

“Well, I’ll be cleaning when I go home, so there’s no reason for me to change things,” Jessie said simply. “We’re not really allowed to leave the manor’s grounds because it’s not safe, so I’ve been keeping busy. I’ve learned a few new knitting patterns, we have lunch with Clancy every day he feels up to it, the chefs here have been teaching me new recipes, Vil comes by about every other day to visit, Muffy’s been here to keep us company, and the staff has been so wonderful keeping me busy. Things have been really crazy since everyone got here, there’s been furs everywhere, I’ve been tripping over someone almost every time I turn around. Then there was yesterday,” she sighed.

“Yes, let’s discuss that,” Hannah said seriously. “Tell us again, and don’t leave anything out.”

Kit was the only that mainly described what happened yesterday, with the discovery of the trap door and tunnel to the capture of the attackers. “Though you can’t see it, Boston is in chaos right now,” Kit told them. “Vil is utterly furious, and she’s turning Boston inside out looking for whoever hired those PPC goons.”

“PPC?” John gasped. “I didn’t catch that!”

“They were Paladins,” Jessie said in a slightly quavering voice.

“Paladins,” Hannah said with a sudden growl.

“Whoever hired them had to be someone in the family,” Kit said. “They both knew about that secret tunnel and they knew where to find four furs who were willing to kill us. They could have hired contract killers, but that would have left a trail that Vil could track down. They hired Paladins, so whoever it is has to be involved with the PPC. Given the history of my family, there’s quite a few possibilities. Uncle Zach is the prime suspect, but something tells me that it wasn’t him.”

“What?”

“I dunno, just the way he acted when me and Vil went over and told him what happened. He seemed genuinely surprised. And no doubt right now he’s tearing Boston apart looking for whoever did it.”

“He’s helping?”

“Not on purpose,” Kit chuckled grimly. “Vil threatened to strip him of every penny and ruin him, saying that she was blaming him until proven otherwise, and the only way he can avoid being turned out of his house naked is to find out who did it. So right now, he’s looking for the attacker to avoid losing everything.”

“That girl is one of the most clever furs I’ve ever met,” John said appreciatively.

“Why thank you, John,” Vil said from the door. She was holding a small folder, which she put under her arm as she hobbled in on her walking cast and sat down beside Jessie, and Luann immediately served her a cup of tea. She nodded to the girl and took a sip. “I just got a courier,” she said with a light smile. She held out the folder to Kit, reaching it past Jessie. “And it’s for you.”

“Me? What is it?” he asked, opening the folder. Inside was a stapled trio of pages, and after quickly perusing the front page, he realized that it was the contract which dealt with Zach’s share of Stonebrook. “He signed it away,” she said with a very satisfied little smile. “He gave up Stonebrook to you, brother.”

“You’re serious!” Kit gasped.

“Very,” she answered, taking another sip. “Stonebrook is now yours.”

“No, it’s yours,” Kit told her. “You’re the primary owner.”

“Not anymore,” she told him with a sly smile. “Or I won’t be at nine o’clock this morning. I’m taking this and that other little agreement you and me signed and I’m filing them. By noon, Stonebrook will be in your name. I’ll still be on the deed, but as the co-owner. Now that Zach’s part ownership of the house isn’t mucking things up, I can put things the way they were meant to be.”

“Vil!” Kit said, flabbergasted.

“Kit, this is, was, and always shall be your home,” she told him intensely. “This was never my home. Never. I knew that as soon as I could comprehend things. I moved out and built Hart’s Crossing, and I’m very happy there. That is my home, it’s where I was meant to be. Stonebrook belongs to you, it was always meant to belong to you. You are the true master of this house, brother. Everyone before you was just a caretaker. You may have never been destined to sit in the big chair, but this house was always meant to be yours. And by God in heaven above, if there is any Vulpan who deserves to own Stonebrook, it’s you.”

“Vil, Texas is my home,” he protested vociferously. “I still don’t feel comfortable here. I don’t want to live in Boston!”

“Who said you have to?” she asked with a smile. “Stanley and the staff will maintain the manor to its usual impeccable standards, and they’ll be happy to host you when you come up to visit. The manor has more than enough money in its own accounts to literally be self sufficient. You never have to spend a dime for Stonebrook, Kit, the manor pays for itself, pays all the salaries and taxes, pays for everything. The interest the accounts earn on their investments pays for everything without ever touching the capital, just the way it was set up to make Stonebrook eternally self-sustaining. Consider this to be your vacation house. Or move someone in,” she shrugged. “I think Brian and Ruthie could do well living in the west wing, Hunter would love living here, and Muffy’s already all but moved in. Brian could keep an eye on things for you, I’ll maintain my watch over the accounts to ensure Zach doesn’t try to tamper with them again, the staff would have Vulpans to serve, and what’s most important, you have control of the house. You don’t have to live here to own Stonebrook, Kit. But now that you own Stonebrook, you have control over it. That means that you don’t have to worry about what the past thinks about you anymore. This is your house, and right now I’m sure Dad just sat up in his grave. We’re probably close enough to go outside and hear him scream.”

Kit chuckled without much humor at that thought. Yes, his father was probably rolling in his grave at the idea of his hated son now having possession of the icon of the Vulpan dynasty, Stonebrook.

“Look at it this way, brother. Stonebrook will now pass to your first child, not mine. Doesn’t Laura deserve to own this house?”

“That’s a cheap shot,” he complained, which made Jessie giggle. There was literally nothing he wouldn’t do for his unborn daughter, and Vil knew it. “Wait a minute. If Zach’s signed over his share of Stonebrook, that means we don’t have to stay here anymore. We were only here to force Zach out. If he gave away his share, then we can go home. We can go home, pretty kitty!” he said with sudden excitement.

“Not quite yet,” Vil said. “You’re not leaving this house until I know who tried to kill you and punish them for it. You are much safer here than you are in Austin, because Stonebrook is closed and controlled. I may own Austin, but I can’t stop another group from flying into Bergstrom and driving to your townhouse. And besides, you agreed to sit in the chair while I’m on my honeymoon. You have to be here to do that. But yes, after we get everything straightened out, you’ll be free to go home.”

“Did he resign too?”

“No, he didn’t,” she answered. “I think he caved on Stonebrook because he could see the inevitability of it, and it would mollify me somewhat. I think he realized that Stonebrook was gone, and he’d never outlive us. His only hope was to outlive you and me and both of us remain childless, but his problem was that once he died, the house would not go to Steve. The agreement specifically stated that my children and your children would have priority rights over his. With Laura’s birth imminent and me getting married today,” she said with an excited trill in her voice, “he could see that he’d never get it back. So he surrendered it to soothe me.”

“I don’t believe it, Uncle Zach did something that wasn’t greedy,” Kit breathed, almost in disbelief.

“He’s saving his own ass, and don’t think for a second that it’s anything but,” she said sternly.

“Any word on who attacked my daughter, Vil?” Hannah asked.

Vil shook her head. “Not yet. I’ve got about everyone I could get my paws on working on it, and so far we only have one hint.”

“What’s that?”

“Nobody can find Steve. Zach’s oldest son,” she said, looking at John and Hannah. “He’s disappeared. He didn’t show up for work, he’s not in any of his houses or his dad’s houses, hell, his wife’s even looking for him. However, his bank accounts are still there, there haven’t been any withdrawals we can’t attribute to his wife, and it looks like he just fell off the face of the world. He vanished for only one of two possible reasons. Either he’s involved in the attack, or he wrongfully thinks we’re going to come after Zach’s entire family for it and he went to ground. Either way, I’ve got furs hunting him down as we speak.”

“Or he knows something,” John said impulsively. “And he doesn’t want to get involved.”

“That’s also a possibility,” Vil agreed. “But, that’s enough of that. How is your summer vacation going, John?”

Vil steered them to much tamer conversation, but Kit didn’t listen for a little bit as he stewed over Vil’s announcement. She was taking that agreement he signed to scare Zach into backing off and she was going to file it, along with Zach’s giving up his share of the manor, to redraw the deed so Kit was the primary owner. He...didn’t know how to feel about that. He didn’t want this house, didn’t want the deed, didn’t want the responsibility of it. But, on the other paw, it was just a piece of paper. Stonebrook was not his home, but it would be his. He would return to Texas and let Stanley run things, use the manor when he came up to visit Vil, maybe allow Vil or friends to use the manor when they needed it, offer it as a permanent guest house for whenever any of the Brightons came to visit. He wasn't sure about moving Brian in here, because no matter what, Brian was still an elder, and Kit had not lost his hatred or distrust of his elders. There was no telling if Brian would pick up right where Zach left off after he got into the manor and got a taste of living in the big house, then wanted it for himself.

He couldn't stand the idea of Brian being in here. But Terry....

That was an idea. When Terry returned from New Orleans, he could live in Stonebrook. He and Allison, when they married, could live in the west wing. They were foxes he trusted, foxes that could care for Stonebrook when he wasn't there, and he'd be utterly confident that everything would be perfectly fine. But, the downside of that was that Terry may never return to Boston. He was absolutely furious with the family, and especially enraged with the elders for their attempt to attack Allison. Kit knew exactly how he felt, and that kind of fury may preclude him from ever returning to Boston to stay. Terry very well may stay in New Orleans and run Avondale, staying away from the family that dared attack him and his girlfriend.

If not Terry, who? Someone had to be here. Someone had to be in Stonebrook, because the house served no purpose if there was no Vulpan inside it.

Jessie elbowed him lightly in the ribs, and Kit started. "What?"

"I said, how much does it cost for this place to run?" Hannah repeated.

“Oh. I’m not sure,” he answered, waving a paw.

“About three quarters of a million a year,” Vil answered for him. “Adding up salaries, maintenance, supplies, taxes, and utilities, it’s three quarters of a million. But, the manor’s accounts earn about a million a year in interest and dividends, so the manor earns more money than it spends every year. Yesterday when I checked, there was about thirteen million dollars in the manor’s accounts.”

“And that’s yours now?” John asked.

Kit shook his head. “It belongs to the manor, John. This house isn’t just a house. It’s what you might call a corporate entity. It has its own bank accounts and investments, and no Vulpan owns that money. It belongs to Stonebrook.”

“Wait. This manor gets a return of ten percent?”

“About that,” Vil nodded. “Closer to nine, but more than nine. I know that sounds high, but that’s because of how it’s set up. Some of the best financial planners in America planned out Stonebrook’s investment strategy, and they did it in low or zero risk investments. Hell, John, if the money was just in bonds or something, it’d earn five percent. I could get four percent just out of a money market bank account. The more money you have to invest, the higher the return with less risk.”

“I’ve never heard of anything like that.”

“That’s because you’re not familiar with large value investments and options, John,” she told him calmly. “There’s a different set of rules and opportunities when you’re looking to invest ten million instead of ten thousand.”

“I would imagine so,” John chuckled, sipping his coffee. “So, if worse comes to worst and Kit and Jessie lose their jobs or their house or something—“

“They could live here without owning a dime and never worry,” Vil nodded. “The manor would provide.” She glanced at Kit. “And now that Kit owns Stonebrook, Kit and Jessie never have to worry. They can always come home and be treated in a manner more proper for a Vulpan.”

“The proper manner is to be home with our daughter,” Kit declared. “Away from here. Back in our home.”

“Hovel,” Vil teased lightly.

“Call it what you want, I feel a million times more at home there than here.”

“That can change, brother mine,” she smiled. “Now that all this is yours, it might make you come home.”

“Not unless I come back with bombs,” Kit retorted, which made Jessie giggle.

The conversation drifted to a less momentous but no less important subject...the wedding. Vil described the upcoming ceremony, and then talked about her dress for ten solid minutes. “It’s just perfect,” she surmised. “It cost me forty thousand dollars, but it was worth every penny!”

“Why so expensive?” Hannah asked.

“Designer, maker, materials,” she ticked off her fingers. “And don’t you dare harp on my dress, Hannah! A bride has every right to wear her perfect dress! Mine was just a little expensive, that’s all.”

“I wouldn’t do that, dear,” she answered mildly. “I certainly hope it’s as beautiful as you described.”

“It’s gorgeous!” Jessie beamed.

“She won’t let me see it,” Kit chuckled. “You’d think she was marrying me.”

“I want it to be a surprise!” Vil barked at him. “The only ones who have seen my dress are my bridesmaids.”

“Well, it’s just too bad for you that Jessie took a couple of pictures of you in your dress,” Kit mused lightly.

“Don’t you dare,” she hissed threateningly.

“Sometimes you act married,” John chuckled.

“It’s because we’re close,” Vil said primly. “After Dad died, all we had were Clancy and each other.”

“And now, thank God, Ken is taking her off my paws,” Kit said in relief, which caused the others to laugh.

Vil swatted him on the shoulder.

“It’s just no fun to get henpecked on both sides, John,” he added.

Jessie swatted him on the other shoulder, which made John explode into laughter.

“See what I have to put up with? An abusive wife and a nosy sister. And you wonder why I stay hidden in Austin?”

“Kit. Brother.”

“Yes, sister dear?”

“Don’t make me spank you.”

“When you’re all growed up enough to spank me, Vil, you can be my guest.”

“Brave words, little brother.”

“Naturally. That cast slows you down, I can be as annoying as I wanna be,” he retorted. “And when you come home from your honeymoon you’ll be too giddy to care what I said today.”

“Brother dear,” she said sweetly, “whoever said I would be the one spanking you? I have two big, strong males to take care of those dreadful chores for me.”

“Curses, foiled again!” Kit declared.

Vil’s phone rang, and her face lit up when she read the screen. She accepted the call and put it to her ear quickly. “Ken? Morning, love,” she cooed.

“I think we just lost Vil, and I need to take a shower,” Kit prompted, then he chuckled when she stuck her tongue out at him, stood up, and scurried from the room.

“Yes, so do we,” Hannah agreed. “What time is breakfast?”

“Anytime you call the kitchen and tell them what you want, when you want it, and where you want it delivered,” he answered. “This place is like a hotel, Hannah. They do room service.”

“But they must be busy with the reception,” Hannah protested.

“They’re professionals, Hannah,” Kit assured her. “They can do it. Besides, the last thing I want is for you to come here and have to do anything.”

“Now if only I could get you to do the same thing, Master Kit, Mistress Jessie,” Luann piped in from the side, where she was standing just behind and beside the couch where Kit and Jessie were sitting. “The only thing you let us do for you is put tea out for you in the morning!”

“We’re different,” he winked at her. “I don’t want my guests to feel anything but pampered.”

“Well, in that case, let’s go down to the dining room, dear, and see if they can’t whip us up some eggs.”

“Just tell me what you want, sir, and I’ll make sure it’s there as soon as it’s done,” Luann announced.

“Scrambled eggs, bacon, toast, and some coffee,” John said.

“Same. Oh, and half a grapefruit and some strawberry preserves,” Hannah added.

“I’ll see to it,” she nodded, taking her phone. “Kitchen, Master and Mistress Williams would like scrambled eggs, bacon, toast, grapefruit halves, and strawberry preserves on the side,” she called. “They are en route to the small dining room.”

“It should be ready in a few minutes,” came the reply.

“What about the coffee?” John asked.

“They already know you drink coffee, sir, and it will be waiting for you,” Luann said simply.

“Those are rather useful devices,” Hannah noted.

“The size of the house requires them, madam,” Luann smiled. “There’s always the phones if these don’t work or it’s busy, but these are the fastest way to get in touch. Every room has a phone, and each room has a number. I could have dialed the kitchen using the phone,” she added, pointing to the phones on the nightstands flanking the bed, across the cavernous room.

“Clever,” John chuckled.

“Why don’t you take them down to the dining room, Lou?” Kit asked. “We have to take a shower.”

“Certainly, Master Kit,” Luann nodded, coming around and picking up the tray. “Do you want me to call down breakfast for you?”

“Not for me, thank you.”

“Me either,” Jessie added. “I’m a little full after the tea and scones,” she admitted. “I’ll eat after I shower.”

They broke up. Jessie’s parents went down to eat, and Kit and Jessie took a shower. Their shower was huge, and more than large enough for both of them at once. It was an alcove with showerheads on three sides that sprayed the body while two showerheads overhead sprayed down their hair. It even had a soft rubber-topped bench where a fur could sit and have shower jets massage the back and legs, which was Jessie’s favorite place in the shower. She partook of the massage jet bench while Kit washed his hair. “I’m glad your folks didn’t freak out,” he confided. “I was afraid that Hannah might grab you by the ear and drag you home after she found out someone tried to kill us.”

“Mom hates the PPC, love,” she answered. “They’re the ones that whipped up that mob that lynched my uncles. And she understands that defiance is the only answer. She knows I’m standing my ground, and she’ll respect me for it.”

“Spoken like the daughter of one of the Columbus Twenty,” Kit chuckled, stepping under the nozzle and rinsing his hair, his ears twitching constantly from the spray. “You think things will go smoothly today?”

“Nick has everything under control, and Vil has everything planned. Yeah, I think everything will be alright. Did you see some of those guys he brought in? Wow, are they serious looking!” she declared. “I wonder when they’re going to start closing off the manor and bring in those Valiant furs.”

“Around eight I believe,” he answered. “That Jahal guy is still going to be here, they decided to leave him alone so he doesn’t know they know about him. That’s got me a little worried, but Nick told me that since the attack, they’re going to search everyone who comes in for guns, even the guests. So that Jahal guy can’t bring any weapons, and they’re going to have a camera on him at all times. So I guess it’ll be safe enough.” When Jessie stood up and moved to stand under the other nozzle to wet down her hair, Kit wrapped his arms around her from behind and put his paws on her belly. “Four weeks, pretty kitty,” he hummed as his paws caressed her belly. “Just four more weeks, and I’ll be able to hold both my baby daughter and my pretty kitty.”

“I can’t wait to get my tummy back,” Jessie laughed, then began to purr.

“You know, we’ve never used that massage bench before,” he said huskily in her ear.

“Lead on, love,” she breathed in reply.

The good part about making love in the shower was that they didn’t have to go anywhere to clean up afterward. Jessie was purring in contentment as they dressed, then they went down to the dining room. John and Hannah were long gone, it was more than an hour since they ate breakfast, but the dining room wasn’t empty. Ben, Jenny, Sheila, Janet, and Rick and Martha were there, each of them eating a different breakfast. John and Hannah were eating scrambled eggs, Jenny fried eggs, Ben french toast, Rick and Martha were enjoying pancakes, and Sheila and Janet were eating quiche. “You should see the banquet they have in the kitchen,” Jenny said brightly. “They made all kinds of things for us, just go in and pick what you want!”

“Welcome to living, Vulpan style, cousin-in-law,” Sheila grinned. “What you want, when you want it.”

“I think I like being related to a Vulpan,” Jenny laughed, taking a bite of her eggs.

“I thought you two would be up early,” Sheila noted. “Vil woke me up,” she complained.

“Us too, but we just got out of the shower,” Jessie said.

“Well, we eventually took a shower,” Kit said with a slight smile.

“Kit!” Jessie gasped, her cheeks ruffling, which made Jessie laugh.

“Jess, why are you complaining?” Sheila told her. “If Kit’s still jumping your bones when you’re that pregnant, then he certainly doesn’t love you just for your body.”

“I’d be thankful,” Janet chuckled. “If I had a boyfriend, I’d be overjoyed if he still loved me when I was fat.”

“Janet!” Jessie protested, which made her laugh.

“So, tomorrow’s the big game,” Kit told Ben. “Are you starting?”

He shook his head. Chris Wells is, but I’ll be the reserve back that goes in and plays when he’s resting,” he answered. “I wish you guys could be there.”

“I wish we could too, but with Vil out of Boston, she wants me here in case the uncles try something,” Kit said regretfully. “But we’re going to watch the game.”

“It’s showing up here?”

“It’ll be on College Direct, and we have that,” Jessie told him. “So we’ll be with you in spirit, little brother. We’re even going to be wearing your jersey!”

“I hope I do well. I’m nervous. I’ve never played in front of a big crowd before.”

“There’s nothing but the game, Ben,” Sheila told him.

Vil hobbled in, wearing a dressing robe. “Hey guys,” she called. “Why aren’t you getting ready?”

“Because the wedding isn’t for five hours?” Sheila returned. “All we do is sit there and wait for it to finish, cousin,” she grinned. “You’re the one that has to do all the work!”

“I should make you my flower girl, Sheila.”

“Me? You need a virgin for that,” she snorted, which made Janet almost spit out a mouthful of orange juice.

“Well, everyone needs to be ready to go at ten,” Vil announced. “So you have two hours to get ready.”

“Ten?” Sheila spluttered. “That’s way too early!”

“With as many furs as there are here, it’ll take us an hour to get organized and on the move,” Vil barked in return. “So be ready at ten.”

Governor Rick Perry entered the dining room with Stanley, who was carrying a tray holding a dish popular in Austin, called Texas Mash. It was scrambled eggs made with onions, peppers, potatoes, and ham stirred in while the eggs were cooking, which was served in many diners and restaurants around Austin. “So there you are,” the Governor smiled. “I’m glad I found someone. I got lost this morning!”

“That’s easy to do in this house, Governor,” Kit chuckled. “Please, have a seat.”

“I was just telling them, Rick, be ready to go at ten,” Vil said. “There’s like twenty-five furs here going to the wedding, and it’ll take us a while to get everyone settled in and on the move.”

“That’s fine with me, Vil. I’ll be going straight to the airport after the ceremony, they called me. I have to go back.”

“I’m sorry to hear that, Rick,” she said honestly. “I’ll make sure a limo is available whenever you need to leave.”

“Thanks, I appreciate it.”

“Stanley, make sure everyone knows, be out in the courtyard and ready to go at ten.”

“I’ll make sure of it,” he said with a nod, then hurried from the room after seating and serving the Governor.

“That’s one overworked fox,” Sheila laughed. “He hasn’t slept at all.”

“It doesn’t show,” Janet noted as she took another bite.

“He’s a perfectionist, he wants everything to be absolutely perfect for the reception,” Kit told her. “I’d almost bet that he went out and measured the grass this morning to make sure it was exactly one and a half inches tall, and uniform throughout the lawn.”

“That’s the kind of dedication you expect from a chief butler. Will’s the same way,” Vil said.

“So, you talk to Ken yet?” Sheila asked.

She nodded. “He called me as soon as he woke up.”

“That sounds familiar,” Martha said, looking at Jessie.

Jessie laughed. “I couldn’t stand not hearing his voice,” she protested.

The manor was jumping. There were guests absolutely everywhere, and Kit and Jessie stopped and chatted with someone almost every twenty feet. Barry was coming down to eat. Jeffrey was going to the pool to swim before getting ready. Elly and Lilly were taking a walk after breakfast. Marty was playing with one of the manor phones, singing like Mariah Carey. Savid and Nawa showed their kids off proudly, and their kids had been amazingly well behaved during their stay, having broken not even a single glass while here. Mike had invaded the server room for the manor, which was the computer that both served as the internet gateway and also controlled the telephone system. Mike, being who he was, had went through the house looking for a way to upgrade the wireless network present, but finding out that the network in the manor was both cutting edge technology and utterly secure. Lupe flirted with Allison, Allison ignored him, and then she lit up like a Christmas tree when Terry arrived at Stonebrook, already dressed for the wedding, and gave her a deep, passionate kiss out on the courtyard. Muffy was suspiciously absent, as was Pat, but both of them turned up about twenty minutes to ten already dressed for the wedding, Pat with a stupid grin on his face, and Muffy strutting around her most recent conquest like a victorious general. His friends and family were virtually everywhere, and in a way, Kit was very happy to see it. Their voices and laughter seemed to drown out the ghosts, replaced the foreboding feeling in the manor with a feeling of happiness and inclusion, which the ghosts of his father and ancestors couldn't stand. They didn't like happiness in Stonebrook. They wanted the house to be like a museum...cold, beautiful, inviolate, and the domain of proper British-descended foxes, not a pack of American species, mixed breeds, and others invading the sanctity of this bastion of fox superiority and the dynastic throne of the powerful Vulpan family.

Stanley and Luann did get in on the act. Somehow, Stanley found time to help Kit dress in his tuxedo while Luann helped Jessie dress on the far side of a blind that they'd brought in, so the two of them could talk and be near each other without Stanley violating Jessie's modesty. Kit was wearing an ultra-formal tux, complete with tails which were split by his tail, spats on actual shoes, and diamond-studded cufflinks. Jessie was wearing her bridesmaid's dress, which was cut perfectly for her pregnant figure yet still framed her loveliness and made her seem absolutely radiant. Stanley tied his bow tie as Jessie was fussed over by Luann, having come out from behind the blind now that she was dressed and the young vixen adjusting her dress until it was just so, when the door opened and Clancy ambled in, his cane leading the way. “Clancy!” Jessie gushed, “isn’t my dress gorgeous?”

“I dare say it’s the femme in it that makes it so lovely, my dear,” he smiled. “I see my son beat me to the punch,” he laughed.

“Old age can do that to a male, Dad,” Stanley said with a chuckle. “You got to dress him for his wedding. It was my turn.”

“Indeed, indeed,” he agreed. “So, are you about ready to go see our Vil give herself to another male?”

“Maybe Ken will keep her nose out of my business,” Kit grunted, which made Jessie giggle. “What did you think of Ken’s family?”

“Quite a bunch of males, aren’t they,” Clancy chuckled. “I was enjoying a cup of tea in the parlor when Lynn barged in, dragging that hare with her. I do believe they were looking for some quiet place to be alone.”

“You can stop being delicate,” Kit laughed.

“It’s certainly a good match, both for Vil and for the family,” he continued. “Vil is honestly taken with Kendall, and the merging of the Vulpan and Brighton families forms an alliance that will strengthen both families, both socially and financially.”

“Winston intends for Vil and Ken’s child to own both companies.”

“Yes, that did seem to be the ultimate result. That will be quite a dynasty. I believe that the Vulpan and the Brightons control a very large portion of shipbuilding facilities in the civilized world.”

“About that.”

Stanley appeared in the doorway again, and he looked a little out of sorts. “Master Kit, Miss--” he began, but he was pushed out of the way, and Kit started when he saw by whom.

It was Bridgette.

The eldest of all the Vulpan cousins, the first born of Zach and Alicia, Bridgette was still a very fine vixen. She was both handsome and pretty at the same time, not quite as beautiful as Mary, but definitely a very attractive young lady, with a mature bearing and an elegant demeanor. She was thirty now and had three kids of her own with her husband, Jeff Hart, and it was the first time he’d seen her in nearly ten years. Bridgette was very much a recluse, staying away from everyone and only appearing for important family functions, quietly living her life and not bothering anybody. After the family drew up on two sides, Bridgette had remained stoically silent and on the fence, declaring for no one yet not leaving Boston. Kit was honestly surprised to see her here, surprised she would dare to come to see him given how things were between her siblings and her father.

“Bridgette,” Kit said in amazement. “What are you doing here?”

“Saving my family,” she said bluntly. “Where’s Vil?”

“I don’t know, probably around here somewhere,” he answered.

“Find her. She needs to hear me out.”

“Stanley,” Kit prompted.

“I’ll call her and bring her here at once,” he nodded, stepping out and closing the door.

“Bridgette, this is my wife Jessie. Jessie, this is my eldest cousin, Bridgette,” Kit introduced as Jessie came over to them.

“I still can’t believe you married a cat, cousin,” Bridgette said testily, which made Jessie flare up and prepare to let her have it.

“That’s my business, Bridgette,” Kit said coolly, putting a calming paw over Jessie’s. “And if wasn’t for your father, I’d be in Austin right now instead of being stuck up here.”

“My father,” she said, then she laughed cynically. “God, did he screw the pooch this time.”

Vil hobbled in quickly, wearing nothing but a robe that was hastily belted in the front. Clearly, she had been interrupted while putting on her wedding gown. “Sally said that--Bridge,” Vil said with a nod to her. “What are you doing here?”

“Saving my father,” she answered. “Even though he deserves what’s coming to him for starting this mess in the first place.”

“What’s going on?”

“I know who attacked you, Luke,” she declared. “It was Steve.”

“Steve?” Kit said in surprise. “Steve?”

She nodded. “Steve is the Grand Knight Templar of the Paladins, Kit,” she told him. “That’s supposed to be a secret, but I don’t think it would take you very long to dig it up. If the males that attacked you were Paladins, then Steve was the one that gave the order. Last night he called me and told me that he was leaving Boston for a while. I didn't have to ask why, and I didn't ask where. But if he's running, then it had to be him."

"You're sure it was Steve?" Vil pressed.

"I can't prove it, he didn't confess, but I can put two and two together, Vil," she said shortly. "Steve is the leader of the Paladins, four Paladins attacked Stonebrook, and now Steve's gone to ground since it failed. I was just going to ignore this like I ignore everything else, at least until Dad called me last night and told me you were going to come after him for the attack. It wasn't him, Vil. I can't say if he knew about it, but I'm positive that he wasn't the one that gave the order."

"But how could Steve know about that tunnel?" Jessie asked.

"Probably learned about it from my father," Bridgette said acidly.

"Does Zach know that Steve is involved with the PPC?" Vil asked.

"Vil, both my parents are involved with the PPC," she retorted. "Do they know Stevie is the Knight Templar? I can't tell you. But they both know he's in the PPC. They inducted him."

"So your parents may have been involved," Vil pressed.

"Please," Bridgette snorted. "You should have heard Dad sniveling on the phone, Vil. He wouldn't have raised a paw against Luke, he was too afraid of losing everything."

"And you're sure about that?"

"As sure as I need to be," she answered. "Go talk to Gloria. She knows Steve's in the PPC, and she hates it. That's why she's always screwing around and avoiding him. Gloria's a mongrel lover," she said harshly.

“Say that one more time, Bridgette,” Kit said in a sudden dangerous voice, taking an aggressive step forward. “My wife is mixed, and if you use that word in this house one more time, I’ll make sure you leave here with fewer teeth than you had when you came in.”

“It’s pretty clear you hate me and hate Kit, so why are you here?”
Jessie demanded.

“I’m saving what I can,” she answered flatly, glaring at Jessie. “When Vil rampages through my family in revenge for the attempt on you, I want to be left out of it. I’m here to save my husband and kids from it, Save Louis and Matty, and save my Dad. I’m positive he didn’t have a paw in the attack. He may have found out about it after the fact, but he’d have never allowed it if he knew about it before it happened. If he knows about it now, can you blame him for keeping his mouth shut to save his son?”

“I’ll find a way,” Vil said harshly. “If he knows something and doesn’t tell me, then that’s called an accessory after the fact, and I’ll strip him of every single penny! So you go back and tell him that if I find out he knows who tried to kill my brother and it doesn’t come from him, then I’ll bounce him out of Swan Cove so fast he won’t know what happened.”

Bridgette sighed deeply, then nodded. “Just...just don’t tell them I said anything. Despite everything, I love my brother, and I don’t want him to know where it came from. And I don’t want Dad to know either. It’s his fault all this happened. He’s the one that talked Uncle Jake and Aunt Maxy into trying to take the company from Vil, and when you had your accident, Dad made the mistake of not aggressively declaring his innocence. He thought you’d blame him no matter what, so there was no reason for him to say he didn’t do it and just let the facts come out and vindicate him, which they did. If they wouldn’t have started all this, Luke wouldn’t have come back up, Mom wouldn't be pissed off at being kicked out of Stonebrook and harping the fact at Dad every ten seconds since it happened, and Stevie would never have tried anything. All this mess is on his head, but I still love him. He's my father."

"Alright, I'll give you that much for being honest, Bridge," Vil said. "Consider your family immune from anything that happens after today, and I'll give Uncle Zach a chance to come clean before I lower the boom on him. If he doesn't take it, then it's not your fault. You bought your dad a chance, cousin. Go on home, or even better, go get dressed and come to my wedding."

"If you'll have me, I'll come," she said, giving Kit and Jessie a grudging look.

"Of course I will!" she said brightly. "You're still a Vulpan, Bridge. As long as you don't think coming to the wedding is taking sides, you're welcome."

"It probably will be, but that's alright. Maybe if Dad sees me at the wedding, he'll come to his senses. If he doesn't stop this, his pride is going to get him disowned."

"How will he know you're there?" Jessie asked.

"He's going to the wedding," Bridgette said tartly, glancing at Jessie with barely concealed scorn. "Everyone is, no matter who they're supporting. It would be a scandal if the family doesn't turn out for the wedding, and we're not going to have a scandal. I usually avoid things like this, but maybe if Dad sees me there, he'll realize I'm putting my paw in. Given what I just told you, it might scare him into being honest."

“Why don’t you go to family functions?”

“That’s none of your damn business, cat,” she said stiffly, then she turned and stormed from the room without another word.

“Touchy subject there, sis,” Vil said, then she chuckled. “Bridgette absolutely hates Aunt Sarah. And I mean she’d bury a lobster fork in her eye if she had the chance. Bridgette almost never comes anywhere near her. It is a statement if Bridgette is going to show up at the wedding and come within throwing distance of Sarah.” She looked around. “But that was a fairly illuminating little chat, wasn’t it? Let me go talk to Stav, Marcus, and Nick. They have some things to do before the wedding.”

“Don’t forget to get dressed, Vil,” Kit teased.

Vil flicked her tail insultingly as she hobbled out of the room.

“I dare say, I think that Miss Bridgette was telling the truth,” Clancy said mildly. “Master Zach’s family has had certain sympathies in that direction, and Alicia is vindictive and shallow enough to risk the ruination of her family in order to settle a score. But then again, Alicia isn’t broke. If I recall, she entered marriage with Zach with a sizable fortune of her own.”

“Yes, and maybe Zach felt that Alicia could support Steve after the attack, so he said nothing,” Kit grunted. “By separating things, Zach might just be able to sneak through the clauses in the agreement, if he has no knowledge of what’s going on, makes no attempt to aid or stop Alicia, and his wife is the one doing all the dirty work. And like you said, Alicia does have her own money. It’s entirely possible that he told Alicia to take care of it and not tell him a single thing, so he could maintain his plausible deniability.”

“I think you’re reading too much into it,” Jessie said. “If your uncle is really that afraid, do you think he’d really try to hurt us? Zach is a bully, and like all bullies, as soon as someone cows him, he’s too afraid to try anything else. I think your cousin’s right, and your uncle really had no idea what his son did. If he did it.”

“Actually, it does fit,” Clancy mused. “Your father and Zach grew up in this house as well, and it’s possible they stumbled across the passage. Maybe not the same way Jessica did, but it’s entirely possible. Zach may have told his wife or son about the passage in idle talk, and they used that information. He might be keeping quiet now because he may suspect that someone from his family was responsible, and he’s trying to save them from prison. If Vil can’t prove he knows something, then he only needs to remain silent.”

“Well, I think we can put this on the shelf for now,” Jessie prompted, looking at herself in the mirror. “The last thing I want to do on Vil’s special day is talk about this stuff. Vil’s getting married. We need to celebrate!”

“I guess we can let Vil worry about it,” Kit chuckled.

Kit didn’t say any more, but he did think about it as they padded downstairs, where friends and family were gathering, all dressed in their best clothes. Clancy had something of a point. All Zach had to do was say nothing, insist on being told nothing, and not get curious, and he could convincingly state that he had no idea, he’s just as shocked as everyone else, and Vil can’t come after him because he had no part in it. Vil could go after Steven, but couldn’t go after Zach. If Alicia was the one pulling the strings, well, there wasn’t a whole lot that Vil could really do in that regard. Alicia had her own money, and if Zach and Alicia were smart, they would have kept their fortunes separate for their entire marriage. Some of their marital assets were Alicia's, and Vil couldn't really go after those through the agreement...though she could go after them the same way she crushed Cybil. Last he heard, Cybil was ostracized from British society, she was under criminal investigation, and her fortune had dwindled considerably from the multiple fines she'd had to pay, legal fees from the platoon of lawyers she had to hire to protect her from Vil, and back taxes when Vil had instigated the British government going after her. Any rich fur had a lot of things to hide, a lot of money hidden in both legal and illegal tax shelters, and once those secrets started coming out, there were a lot of questions to answer and a lot of fines to pay for skirting the law and hiding money from taxation. Vil could certainly strip Zach and Alicia of their money, but it would take her longer to drain Alicia's coffers than it would Zach's. Vil could threaten to put Zach in the projects and working minimum wage, but the simple truth of that matter was that she'd also have to contend with the ten or so million dollars that Alicia Guggenheim Vulpan had in her own trusts and accounts, money that was hers before the marriage and as such were not marital assets Vil could attack, as well as the fact that her family would probably bail her out if Vil crushed her. Unlike the Vulpans, the Guggenheims were a bit closer as a family. But the threat was still a viable one. Vil could strip Zach of every penny, and then go after Alicia and leech her using Zach's own former money against her, since Zach's money would go to Vil as per the agreement they all signed.

Alicia wasn't the only one that was like that, but she was one of the richer ones. The daughters of rich families tended to not inherit or be granted as much as males, because they married rich males who would then take care of them. Ruth Astor had come to Brian with only a million dollar trust, and the Astors were worth over a hundred million dollars. Then again, when Maxine married Graham Grant, the Grants all but cut him out of the will because he married a Vulpan, and that was just more money for the other Grants. Graham would be all but destitute if Maxine ever divorced him, because God did she have enough ammunition to use against him in divorce proceedings to ensure he got nothing. The other femme married into the family on the other side that had enough money to cause Vil problems would be Tessa Kennedy Vulpan, Jake's wife, who had her inheritance from the Kennedy fortune of about five million dollars. But the richest Vulpan wife of them all was Justine Leeks Vulpan, who was from a very rich British family and had a fortune of about thirty million pounds in banks in England and Scotland, as well as a share in their family business, which was oil. The Leeks were one of the families that had a major stake in British Petroleum, and Justine's brother and cousin were on the board of directors. However, Tom's family had shown no inkling of being against Vil. They hadn't sided openly with her, but they certainly weren't supporting Zach, Jake, and Maxine.

Most of the guys were already dressed and ready when Kit and Jessie joined them down in the TV room, which was where they'd agreed to meet. Lupe looked just as dashing as he did at their wedding in his zoot suit, and Elly looked absolutely smashing in a gorgeous cream colored dress that went well with her fur and eyes. The Vulpan girls had come to Stonebrook rather than go straight to the cathedral, and they were mingling with his friends from Austin and the Governor, who was chatting amiably with Rick and Martha. Muffy was down, and Sonya and Suzy had arrived, as they were all going together, and Sonya and Suzy looked a bit comical in identical dresses, but such a large differences in heights. Now that Kit thought of it, Sonya was taller than all the Brightons as well. She'd be the tallest one on the dais during the ceremony.

“Hey, guys!” Mike called, waving them into the standing throng. “Is Vil about ready to go?”

“I’d give her about a half an hour,” Kit said. “She got interrupted putting on her dress, so she’s running a tiny bit behind. We might want to help her a little by getting all the seating arrangements ironed out, so we can just get in the cars and go when she’s ready.”

“That sounds like a reasonable idea,” John nodded.

“Stanley, get the limos lined up and ready,” Kit called over push to talk. “We’ll get ourselves sorted out so we’re ready to go when Vil gets her gown on.”

“They’re already arrayed out in the courtyard, Master Kit,” he answered. “The white limo in the garage is the bridal party’s car, and there are ten more behind it lined up and ready to move. The police are already in position to escort you to the cathedral, Valiant is working to secure Stonebrook Drive to prepare it to park the cars of visitors, and some gentlemans from the government are on the grounds inspecting Nick’s security precautions in preparation for us hosting several important politicians. The reception preparations are on schedule, and we’ll be more than ready to receive the guests after the wedding.”

“Sounds good, Stan, thanks,” Kit answered.

Sylvia arrived quietly, and Kit had to admit, she did look quite good in a dress. She was wearing a demure dark blue dress with crossed bands at the neckline that went between and under her breasts and then wrapped around her slender waist to form a bow at the small of her back, just over her tail, and the skirts were ankle length and pleated. Her dress had no sleeves, just straps that attached at the sides and looped over her shoulders, which had blue lace frills on them, and she wore a very stylish beret that almost looked like it didn't belong with a dress, but somehow it just looked right on Sylvia. And somewhere in that form-fitting dress, he would bet, there was at least one concealed pistol. Nick had joked that men had died trying to figure out where she hid them, and seeing her in that dress, he could appreciate the joke. About the only place she could hide a gun in that dress was under the skirts, and any male that reached under those skirts was putting his life in his paws. Nick came in behind her, dressed in a very snazzy tuxedo. "We've got everything ready," he said. "The mates will seal off the house when we leave, and Valiant teams will take up their positions. I have an eight male team going to the wedding, and the rest of the mates will be here on the grounds and in the manor, keeping an eye on everything. I got two mates doing camera duty and Barnett's playing striker."

"Huh?" Jessie asked.

"Barnett will be in command until we get back," Sylvia explained. "Not everyone understands your football terms, Nick."

"Alright, well, let's move out into the courtyard," he called.

It was a beautiful warm late August morning, not a cloud in the sky, with just a faint breeze, and it was a wonderful morning to stand out near the line of limos and chat happily with friends and family as they waited for Vil to get her gown on. Kit and Jessie were surrounded by friends and family, and Kit almost wished that Vil would never get her dress on. He laughed with Muffy, who hung onto his shoulder as they talked with Ben and Jenny, then joked a while with Barry and Mike, both of whom were armed with cameras, and Janet had two hanging around her neck and a third mini-digital camera hanging from a thong around her wrist. Pat and Elly were talking with the Governor, and Marty had somehow submerged himself in with his cousins, and the pack of them were whispering and giggling. Savid and Nawa's kids were laughing and running around, and the two mongooses were both keeping a close eye on their brood and also talking happily with John and Hannah. Sheila and Allison were talking about planes with Jeffrey, who seemed to have no idea what they were talking about, and Lilly was snapping one of her bra straps under her dark dress with a rueful laugh as she complained about it to Suzy and Sonya, who had asked her about her earrings. Stanley appeared momentarily to check the limos and look around, then hurried off with his phone in his paw, overseeing the final preparations for the upcoming reception, and Clancy stood quietly near one of the limos, dressed perfectly, not looking very comfortable at the idea of being a guest rather than a member of the staff. Clancy wasn't the only one going. Sally, Oscar, Bartholomew, and Luann were also going to the wedding, but as servants instead of guests, each of them wearing either a black suit or a sober formal black dress, who would wait on the wedding party and run errands for them before the ceremony.

Then Vil made her triumphant appearance in her wedding gown, and it was gorgeous. It was made of silk and satin, white of course, smooth and shimmering in the morning sun. She had opted for long sleeves, even had pawwraps on the ends with a single silk loop that went over her middle finger to hold them in place, and the neckline of her gown was surprisingly daring for a wedding dress, showing off just a faint hint of white-furred cleavage. The skirts of the gown dragged the ground, but only just, so it could hide her cast, and he could tell that the gown was as is, that there was no detachable train. That only made sense, since she was in a cast. The weight and drag of a train might make her unsteady as she walked, and falling down in the chapel was the last thing Vil wanted to do. The hem was just long enough to hide her cast, but not so long that she could step on her hem. In other words, both beautiful and practical for the stylish bride with her leg in a cast. She had a dainty little tiara on just in front of her ears, with a poof of her lacy veil bunched up around it, ready to be pulled down over her face for the ceremony. Everyone applauded when she appeared, and she looked almost girlish and demure as she smiled shyly for them and let them admire her gown, but then the Ice Queen made her appearance. “What are we waiting around for?” she barked. “We’re behind schedule! Bridal party in the garage, everyone else pick a limo and get in, we need to get to the Holy Cross!”

It took them about ten minutes to get everyone in a limo and settled in. Kit and Vil rode with Jessie, Muffy, Sonya, and Suzy, and the chatter in the limo was under stably girlish and focused on the upcoming ceremony. Vil was calm but happy, anxious to be married but also looking forward to both the honeymoon, and Vil being Vil, the slow but inevitable merging of Vulpan Shipyards with Brighton Industries. “The boys are already at the cathedral,” Vil told them as they passed the fur Jahal, who was sitting under an umbrella with a partner out in the middle of the drive between the house and the gate, out where he was totally visible and couldn’t possibly do anything, then pulled out onto Stonebrook Drive, where the road had been converted to a long parking strip with Valiant guards stationed about every tenth of a mile, two furs in a Stonebrook golf cart, to watch over the cars and also be available to give someone a ride in a cart if they needed it. There were three police cruisers and two motorcycle units waiting for them at the end of the drive, and a fourth unit with its doors open sat by the road, where one of the officers jumped out and into the road and stopped traffic. The cars and motorcycles took up a position in front, and then the bridal party was on the way, a procession of eleven stretch limos holding over 40 family, guests, servants, and guards.

The ride to the church was almost like the victory parade of a conquering army. The police guiding the limos kept them together and also allowed them to ignore all the traffic lights, as a cruiser would pull into an intersection and stop traffic while the limos went through, then race back to the front after they went by, usually passing one or two of the other units who had done the same thing, while the two motorcycle units formed the vanguard of the procession. Because of the police escort, they got into downtown Boston and to the Cathedral of the Holy Cross pretty quickly, with nearly 90 minutes until the ceremony was slated to begin. But Kit knew from his own wedding that getting here that early was almost necessary, to make sure everything was ready and also to take care of the little last minute details that tended to pop up. Besides, Vil needed to preen herself to be ready for the ceremony, and that was best done at the chapel.

Kendall, Winston, the Brighton boys, and Charlie were waiting for them at the side entrance, but they weren't the only ones here. There were five news vans out on the street, and the reporters were already set up and ready to go; two looked to be broadcasting live. There was even a CNN van out there, and more than one camera swung towards the limos as they reached the side parking lot and pulled in, one by one, until the entire parking lot was filled with limousines. This wasn't going to be a Protestant wedding like Kit and Jessie's, and Vil and Kendall wouldn't be staying out of each other's sight until the ceremony began. They'd be greeting guests at the door starting about 45 minutes before the ceremony, a Catholic tradition, so it was only proper that Kendall greet Vil as soon as she arrived. Kendall was the one that opened the door of the limo, and his eyes just lit up and his jaw dropped when he looked inside and saw Vil. She just grinned wolfishly and held her paw out, and he blinked and took it and helped her from the limo. “God, you’re gorgeous, Vil,” he breathed, looking at her with something approaching awe.

“I’d better be on my wedding day,” she answered with a sly smile. “Well, old male, your dream is about to come true,” she chuckled as she gave Winston a kiss on the cheek.

“It’s about time,” he answered. “Finally, the Vulpan family will be under the Brighton banner, where it belongs!”

Vil laughed. “Get your epee out, old male, you and me are gonna be fencing over that statement.”

“Oi, no kissing just the lucky groom!” Charlie protested as Sonya was helped out of the limo by Harry, and Kit got out from the other side and then helped Jessie and Suzy out. Vil laughed and pushed Kendall towards Charlie, as if to kiss him, and Kendall played along, puckering and making exaggerated kissing sounds as he leaned towards Charlie. “Good God, Kenny, mouthwash, mouthwash!” he called, dancing back to a round of laughter.

“I’m glad to see you all,” Winston said, kissing Jessie on the cheek as she reached them. “Are you well, Jessica?”

“I’m alright, Winston, thank you,” she answered. “Did you sleep much last night?”

“Like a baby. A certain son of mine, on the other paw,” he chuckled, looking at Kendall.

“It’s the excitement! In just two hours, my dastardly plan will be complete, and I’ll be able to begin my torment and torture of Villy!”

“If I have to tell you one more time not to call me that, Kendall, there really won’t have to be a divorce,” she threatened.

“You can’t back out now! We’re literally on the church steps!”

“Who said I had to back out? Marry you, take you back home, and they never see you again,” she threatened with a slight smile, which made Kendall laugh.

“I reserve the right to call you Villy up to the beginning of the ceremony. Then it’ll be Vilenne for the rest of our lives.”

“You’re only gonna call me Vilenne once, male,” she warned, pointing at him. “At the altar. Kit doesn’t call Jessie Jessica, you’re not gonna call me Vilenne.”

“Your name is Jessica? Who knew,” Kit said, looking at Jessie, which made her giggle.

“It is when I’m in trouble,” she answered with a wink.

To get a head start on the tradition, Vil and Kendall did greet all the guests from the manor at the side door, as kisses and pawshakes were happily exchanged. Priests and attendants escorted the guests into the main cathedral, which now had its floral arrangements and was fully decked out in roses and silk, which had to cost Vil quite a lot of money. Archbishop O’Malley was at the altar, talking with one of his monsignors and motioning towards the pews, where very soon the entire main cathedral would be packed with guests at one of the biggest social events of the decade in Boston, a marriage that had truly international implications. “Ah, so the entire wedding party is here now?” he asked as Kit and Jessie greeted him.

“All present and accounted for,” he nodded.

“We’re all dressed and ready, Father,” Jessie agreed.

“Good, good,” he smiled. “There’s some refreshments for you in the anteroom back there,” he told them, pointing to the side of the altar. “Where is Vilenne?”

“Outside teasing the Brightons and greeting the guests,” Jessie giggled.

“They’re a very nice family, for Anglicans,” O’Malley noted dryly, which made Jessie laugh.

Kit was right that getting there so early didn’t really mean anything. He found himself being quietly shadowed by a very dapperly dressed Nick while Sylvia stayed close to Jessie, and they found themselves chatting with guests who had arrived early, not long after the Stonebrook party. The first ones to arrive were Brian and Ruth, with their son Jonathon wearing a very nice suit and their daughter Misty, wearing a bronze-colored dress and her ever-present pawheld game system in her paws. Their oldest son, Daniel, was just behind them, wearing a black suit with a silver chain hanging between the pockets of his vest and a fedora; Daniel had a thing for the big band era and he dressed like a 40’s swinger. He even played the saxophone. Kit felt that he and Lupe would probably look perfect together, Daniel in his 40’s cut suit and fedora and Lupe in his zoot suit. Ruth hugged Jessie fondly, then over Kit’s quiet objections, put her paw behind his neck and pulled him down to kiss him on the cheek. “We’re happy to see you,” Ruth told them. “Isn’t Vil just stunning in her gown?”

“She’s beautiful,” Jessie agreed.

“Kit, we’re going to need to talk with Vil at the reception,” Brian told him in a serious voice. “But it can wait until then. Right now, the only thing that matters is this wedding.”

“Amen,” Kit agreed.

More of his family arrived, getting there earlier than the other guests, and to his surprise, Maxine was the next to get there. She was there with Graham Grant, her youngest son Leonard, and her daughters, Wendy and Kate, who were all still teenagers. Graham looked bored, and Kit’s paw clenched into a fist at the sight of him. Kit’s dislike of Graham was a fact that went long before his being disowned, for Graham had hit him when he was seven, and Kit had neither forgotten nor forgiven. It had also gotten Graham permanently banned from Stonebrook, for his mother had seen Graham do it. Graham was very liberal with his open palm, and how Maxine put up with him and his abusive behavior was far beyond him. Just as Bridgette couldn’t stand Sarah, Kit hated Graham, a hate established long before his hatred of his family came to be.

Victor didn’t fall far from Graham’s family tree, for both of them were petulant, spoiled, and cruel.

Kit didn’t exactly greet Maxine’s family, but Maxine did pull him aside as Graham and their young children sat down on the bride’s side of the chapel. “Luke, we did not do it,” she said earnestly. “In fact, I’m starting to doubt what we’re doing. Vil actually put Bess to work!” she said in a wondrous voice. “You were right, Luke, you were right. She really was trying to bring the youngers to heel. I just needed to be a bit more patient. I should have talked it out with her instead of letting Zach talk me into trying to unseat her. I’ve been trying to protect the family honor, and I may have helped damage it beyond repair,” she sighed.

“I’m glad you feel that way,” Kit said honestly. “And don’t call me by his name.”

Maxine chuckled. “I don’t want to intrude on Vil’s day, Lu-Kit. Could you tell her that when she gets back from her honeymoon, she and I are going to sit down and have a long, honest talk?”

“I can tell her.”

“Good. Have you heard anything from Vil about who might have done it?”

“She has a couple of leads, but I’ll let her reveal them,” he answered.

“Alright. For what it’s worth, I’m sorry,” she said honestly. “I’m sorry we got into this mess, and I’m both shocked and furious that someone actually tried to kill you. You may have done something of which I do not approve, but you are still a Vulpan, and you deserved more than that. Despite Vil’s paranoia, we would never have stooped to that level. Trying to take over the family by such brutish force would have just split the family apart.”

“It wasn’t aimed at her, Aunt Max, it was aimed at me,” he told her. “The attackers were Paladins.”

Maxine’s eyes widened. “Is that so?” she asked, an edge to her voice.

“Didn’t Zach tell you? We dropped their shields on his table the morning it happened.”

“Oh, no, he didn’t tell me,” she said, her eyes narrowing. “And I do believe I have a good idea why he didn’t tell me. Excuse me for a minute, nephew,” she said, padding off and digging her phone from her purse.

It sounded like Aunt Maxine was waving the white flag and was ready to surrender. Score one more for Vil.

The next family to arrive was Tom's. To Kit's delight, Dahlia came in with her parents, looking very thin and vulnerable in her black dress, her eyes nervous and a little frightened as she stayed very close to her mother, Tessa. Hunter was with them, who immediately peeled off to go sit with Jonathon, Leonard, Misty, Kate, and Wendy, for they were all around his age, the youngest of the cousins. Kit had nothing against Dahlia at all, for she had been an object of wrath in the family as much as him, the insane Vulpan they wanted to bury in an institution and forget was ever born, but Tom's dogged protection of his daughter had kept her out of the insane asylum and safely with her parents, who loved her and took care of her. Kit greeted Tom and Tessa, and Jessie came up behind him. "Uncle Tom, Aunt Tessa," Kit said with a nod, his voice cool, voicing his underlying anger with his elders. "Jessie, this is Tom and Tessa, and this is Dahlia. Hello Dahlia," Kit said with an honest smile.

"Lucas," she said with a thin smile in return. "This is the cat you married?"

"Yes, I'm Jessie," she said, offering her paw.

Dahlia looked at it a little warily, and Jessie lowered it gracefully. "I can't touch you, I'm sorry," Dahlia said. "I don't want to get needles in my fingers."

Jessie gave her a fleeting look, then nodded quite seriously. "I understand," she said calmly. "Come walk with me a minute, we'll check your seat and make sure it's safe."

“Sure,” Dahlia said with sudden energy, and the two padded down the aisle.

Tessa gave Jessie’s back a profoundly grateful look. “I see you married a good girl, Kit,” she said.

“I married a very smart girl who knows about Dahlia’s condition,” he answered soberly.

“Dahlia didn’t want to take her medicine so she wouldn’t be zonked out for the ceremony,” Tom said, watching them. “So she’s not very good today.”

“I’m just glad to see her out and about,” Kit said honestly.

“She’s really been looking forward to this,” Tessa said. “Are you alright, Luke?”

“We’re alright. A little scared, but alright,” he answered knowingly. “And don’t call me that. My name is Kit.”

Tessa gave him a wry smile. “You’re asking a lot,” she told him, putting her paw on his shoulder. “We just wanted you to know, Luke, we’re with you. We know you hate us because of what happened in the past, but that’s not going to stop us from standing with you now. Whoever it was tried to tear the family apart, but all they’ve managed to do is unify us behind you and Vil. Everyone’s outraged at what happened. Even Zachary,” she said in a slightly disbelieving tone, as if she could barely believe it.

“That might be true,” Kit said ruefully. “Maxine pulled me aside and told me pretty much the same thing. She even hinted that she’s willing to break from her brothers and make peace with Vil.”

“As well she should,” Tom declared. “What they did to you was way, way, way beyond the mast,” he said indignantly. “I sure as hell don’t approve of your marriage, despite the fact that I think Jessie is a wonderful girl, but that’s no reason for what they tried to do,” he bristled.

“We’ll see what Jake and Zach have to say when they get here,” Kit grunted.

Tessa kissed him on the muzzle fondly, and they went to go find their reserved seats.

Kit never got the chance to talk to Zach or Jake, for they slipped in quietly with their families and took their seats, and got quite a frosty reception from Tom and Maxine when they did so. Kit got waylaid by Sarah and her husband, Harland Vance, escorting their youngest daughter Christine into the church. Sarah put her paws on Kit’s shoulders and almost seemed to want to hug him, then she coughed and just patted him gently. “I’m glad to see you, Kit,” she told him. “When I heard what happened, I almost scorched some ears. There’s just no room in this family for something so barbaric,” she said flatly. “Are you and her alright?”

Sarah...had a few issues with Jessie, Kit realized. No doubt she remembered the blistering recriminations that Jessie had unleashed at her over how she treated Sheila and how Jessie had took his entire family over her knee and spanked them when they married in the very chapel in which they stood. Sarah was a very proud femme, and being lambasted by a little slip of a girl, not even out of college, had no doubt stung her pride. And if anything, Sarah was proud.

“We’re alright. A little shaken, but alright,” he answered.

“I think we need to sit down and talk as a family after the reception,” she said seriously. “All of us, even the kids. This proves that things have gone far out of control, and we need to sit down and talk this out so something like this never happens again.”

“You need to talk to Vil about that.”

“I will. But you need to be there, too, Kit,” she told him. “The youngers look up to you. They’ll respect your decisions and obey you, probably more than they would Vil. Sheila all but thinks you walk on water,” she chuckled ruefully.

“I don’t know about that.”

“I do. I’ll talk to you later, Kit,” she said, then she actually kissed him on the cheek, like what she and the others had done to him didn’t even matter. Kit’s eyes turned flat, but she didn’t even notice, hurrying past to quickly sit with Maxine, who had moved over to sit with Tom and Brian, and the four Vulpan elders had their heads together, talking in hushed tones, with Zach and Jake nearby but clearly not invited into their little group.

“You should listen to her, Luke,” Harland said calmly. If Tom was odd and Maxine was intense, Harland was mellow. He was very laid back, and basically allowed Sarah to manage everything. He was just along for the ride, more than happy to allow Sarah to wear the pants in their family. “She was very upset when she heard what happened. I don’t think she ever dreamed something like that could happen, and the only reason she didn’t call to make sure you were okay was because she was afraid you’d think she was up to something, or you’d yell at her. She didn’t want to give you even more stress, so she just left it be, and saved it for today.”

“Upset that it failed more than likely,” Kit said acidly, crossing his arms.

“I know you have no reason to trust any of them after what they did to you, and you have every reason to be angry, son,” Harland said quietly, “but remember one thing. Your father let his hate consume him, and you’re more than aware of what was the result. Don’t walk down Lucas’ path, son. You’ve seen where it goes. You can forgive but not forget, but if you never forgive, some day we’ll bury you beside your father and remark at how much like him you turned out to be,” he said calmly. Before Kit could turn on him angrily, Harland just put his paws in his pockets and strolled down the aisle, like he didn’t have a care in the world.

Harland’s words were casual, but they were devastating. Kit leaned back against the pew’s side and realized, in a moment of clear epiphany, that Harland was a lot smarter than he expected, and he was right up to a point. He could never turn into his father, have that much hate and let it ruin his life, but Harland did have a point. If he let his hatred of his elders poison the family, then he could very well see everything fly apart again, speaking in a moment of anger and turning the elders that did support Vil against her. He couldn’t forget. He couldn’t forgive. Not after what they did to him. They didn’t know what it was like, they couldn’t even fathom what it was like to lay in that hospital bed, his entire body feeling like it was on fire, and be so alone...so alone, then find out that his bastard father had tried to have the hospital literally wheel him out into the back alley and abandon him, leave him to die, it was like someone had reached inside him and ripped his heart out. That had been hell, absolute hell, the pain and the fear and the isolation and the horror of a terrified child finding out his father wanted him dead, and to feel so completely and utterly alone, was like a white-hot needle through his soul. Until they experienced pain like that, until they knew what it had been like for him, knew that what they did to him had scarred him both physically and emotionally, they could never understand, and he could never forgive them. But he could be civil...and keep his mouth shut. He just had to hold out until he could go back home, then he could live his life, they could live up here with their cursed money, and everyone would be happy.

Or at least convinced themselves they were.

His paws were shaking, and almost on cue, Jessie was there. She always seemed to sense when his emotions were getting away from him, and her paw on his side soothed him immediately, soothed him in ways he couldn't even understand. He let her burrow her arms around him and put her head on his shoulder, and he held her close and let her comfort him as raw wounds just under the surface of his soul were torn open again. She understood. She couldn't imagine what it was like for him, but at least she understood why he couldn't let it go, couldn't forgive them, she understood that the scars on his arm and back went all the way down into his soul. She understood that he had lost more than just a piece of his ear, he had lost his innocence, had lost his family, and had lost a part of himself that could never be recovered, and she loved him despite those wounds, wounds that made him both less than other males and more than them at the same time.

"It's alright, handsome fox," she whispered, her fingers tracing the scars on his back over his coat, and they never once wandered off those frosted pathways, she knew them so well. "Just a little longer."

"I love you, Jessie," he breathed, burying his muzzle in her hair.

"I love you too, Kit," she returned, kissing him on the cheek. "Better?"

“Good enough to get through this,” he said wearily.

Fortunately, there were no more family confrontations. The only Vulpan that he greeted after that was Terry, who rushed into the church about twenty minutes before the ceremony was going to start. “Sorry, traffic was a nightmare,” he said. “It took me an hour to get here from Logan. It’s a zoo out there. The streets around the chapel are closed off to traffic, and there’s gotta be ten thousand furs out there.”

“That many?” Jessie gasped.

He nodded. “They all want to see Vil come out of the church after the ceremony. If she doesn’t come out the front door and present herself to Boston as a married femme, there might be a riot,” he said grimly.

“There wasn’t anyone out there when we got here!” Jessie said incredulously.

“They probably had everything blocked off to keep them back while you two got in,” Terry told her. “And after what happened to you two, the police weren’t taking any chances that the Paladins might try again. There are police barricades at every intersection in a two block radius and snipers on every rooftop around the chapel,” he told them. “I saw them when we came in.”

“Woah,” she breathed.

“Welcome to the royal family of New England, Jessie,” he grinned. “This is the biggest social event to happen in Boston since Kit’s father got married. It’s not every day that the ruler of the Vulpan family gets married. This is a once in a generation event.”

“I need to watch TV more I think,” she fretted, which made both Kit and Terry explode into laughter.

It certainly looked like the event of the year, Kit mused as he looked out over the rapidly filling chapel. The main chapel of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross could easily hold a thousand, and it was almost filled to capacity with family, friends, in-laws, and notable furs from New England and beyond. Governor Perry wasn't the only high-ranking politician in those seats. Senator Ted Kennedy had taken time from his brain tumor treatment to attend the ceremony and was sitting with a large contingent of the Kennedy clan, who were also in-laws, as did the Governors of every state that made up New England, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Maryland. Governor Crist of Florida had even come, and Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger of California was sitting with the Kennedy clan, mainly since he was married to Maria Shriver. Every Congressfur representing New England was also in attendance, and a very large contingent of British aristocracy was sitting on Kendall's side of the aisle. The crown jewel had to be the wiry yet handsome Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, a slender meerkat sitting with a few other powerful Washington politicians near the front on Vil's side. Not only were current powerful politicians here, but hopefuls as well. Kit saw the Democratic nominee for President, Barack Obama, near the front row with his wife Michelle Obama and their two daughters, which surprised Kit since the Democratic convention was just this week, and he'd given his big speech just last night in that stadium in Denver. The tall, lanky cheetah-looking mixed breed was smiling and laughing lightly at something his daughter said, and Kit had to chuckle at the sight of him. If the PPC and the Paladins hated Kit and Jessie, they had to be absolutely going up in flames at the idea that a mixed breed actually had a viable chance to become President. They were surrounded by secret service agents, talking in hushed tones. A casual glance showed that every in-law family was in attendance as well, the Stocktons who were his own relatives through his mother, the Astors, the Guggenheims, the Vances, the Grants, and the Leeks.

Kit did meet one new face before the ceremony. Winston came up with a matronly looking, slightly plump older vixen whose long curly hair was held back by a hat, hair stranded through with gray. “Kit, Jessie, this is your new mother-in-law, Abby. Abby, this is Kit and Jessie.”

“My, what a pretty young thing!” Abigail Brighton said fondly, touching Jessie on the cheek. “And when will you be delivering, love?”

“The end of September, Misses Brighton.”

“Oh, please, call my Abby, dear!” she laughed. “Everyone does!”

“Did you just get here, Abby?” Kit asked.

She nodded. “My plane was a little late getting here, and traffic was a beast getting in from the airport,” she answered. “I tried to get here yesterday, but things were so busy at the company.”

“You work there?”

She nodded. “When Winston’s away, I keep an eye on things for him,” she answered. “He knows he’ll get the truth when I’m watching the board,” she chuckled. “I must say, I’m quite happy we’re about to all be one big family,” she said with a bright smile. “Such a strapping tall, handsome young male and such a pretty little femme! I’ll certainly love looking at your pictures in the album. Much better than some of the Brightons,” she said, elbowing Winston lightly. “Sometimes I think I’m looking at pictures of the Loch Ness monster's back end when paging through the Brighton albums."

Jessie giggled uncontrollably, and Kit only had to smile. Their kids certainly didn't get their sense of humor just from their father. It seemed that Abigail Brighton was just as playful and impish as her brood.

"Well, I don't think it'll be boring having you as in-laws," Kit laughed.

"Now, after the wedding, we'll have to sit down and chat," Abigail announced. "I need to learn all about you!"

An altar boy approached them. "The Archbishop wants you to come to the nave so you can be ready," he announced. "We'll be starting in about ten minutes."

"Alright," Kit nodded.

"Guess that's my cue to go sit down. Now don't trip Vil on the way down the aisle, Winston," she winked at him."

"I'll do my best, dovey," he drawled in reply.

Winston, Kit and Jessie ghosted up to the entrance nave and saw Vil and Kendall greeting the last attendees at the door, with the Archbishop beside them, and across the street was the crowd that Terry had described. The police were keeping them on the far side of the street, with what was now ten news crews being allowed on this side of the street but not allowed to leave the sidewalk, and all the cameras were pointed at the front steps, where Vilenne Vulpan and her groom, Kendall Brighton, were resplendent in their wedding clothes, following the Catholic tradition of greeting the guests at the door. Kit found himself shaking a few paws himself as guests greeted him and Jessie after they came into the door, at least until the last few hurried in.

“Five minutes,” O’Malley said quietly as the last guests were greeted and ushered inside by altar boys. “Let’s go ahead and close up the doors,” he told his monsignor aides. “Everyone get into position in the nave, and let’s do it just as we rehearsed!” he said with growing excitement. “Father Abbot, if you’d kindly go warn the organ player to begin at exactly one o’clock on the dot?”

“Of course, Archbishop,” he nodded, then he herded a flock of altar boys to get in position along the aisle, which would be the overt warning to the congregation that the ceremony was about to begin.

“Well, here we go,” Suzy giggled as they fell into place at the very beginning of the line. As best man and maid of honor, they had the honor to lead the procession. They would enter in order in relation to where they would stand at the altar. Jessie and Michael would go in first after Kit and Suzy, since they’d be standing on the inside, then Sonya and Harry, which was a slight change from the way Vil had originally planned it. Harry was the tallest Brighton, so it was decided he’d be best paired with Sonya, so as not to make it look too silly. Muffy and Michael would be the last of the wedding party to enter before the bride and groom, who would wait with O’Malley at the end of the aisle until the wedding party was in place. The honor of coming down the aisle without anyone else stealing their thunder would be reserved for them alone, without anyone in the way. Usually Vil and Kendall would come down arm in arm, but Winston would be filling that role, and Kendall would be walking by himself just behind the Archbishop and off to the side, as if Vil was with him. Winston would give Vil away to him at the base of the dais, and then they would ascend to the altar as a couple. They would leave the altar in reverse order after the ceremony, with the newlyweds leaving first and Kit and Suzy bringing up the rear. “You know, I sometimes thought we’d be arm in arm going to the altar under different circumstances,” she winked.

“Yeah, when I was fourteen,” Kit replied lightly.

“Too bad we’re not Mormons,” she grinned.

“Back off, vixen,” Jessie trilled behind them. “Don’t make me show you the business end of my claws.”

Suzy laughed, and Archbishop O’Malley gave them a cool look behind them. “Be serious, children, or Vil will spank you right in front of half the civilized world.”

“Damn right I will,” Vil warned from the back of the procession. “Sorry, Father.”

At exactly one, the organ’s deep, sonorous tones reverberated through the chapel, and that was the sign to begin. Kit and Suzy led the wedding party towards the altar, Suzy with her paw on Kit’s forearm, and every face in the packed cathedral was on them, as well as three cameras being held by the video production team that Vil had hired to record the ceremony. They walked at a steady and measured pace down the long, red-carpeted aisle in front of an altar boy who was carrying a cross on a pole, the ceremonial cross-bearer. Kit and Suzy reached the altar and took their places, then looked back to see the rest of the party arrive and take their places as well, then all eyes turned to the back as the organ broke into a joyful hymn; the wedding march was not played at a Catholic wedding.

Vil acquitted herself in spectacular fashion, mainly with Winston's help. By leaning on Winston, she was able to make the stately march down the aisle without a limp, almost looking like she wasn't wearing a cast on her leg. She walked behind Kendall and the Archbishop, and Winston looked so proud Kit thought he could die right there in the aisle and die a happy male. Kendall looked equal measures of excited and terrified at having to perform the long and complicated ceremony in front of a huge audience, but Vil was as serene as a summer hammock swaying in the breeze. Only at the base of the dais did Vil's leg become apparent. Her genuflection to the altar was a bit stiff because of her cast, and after Winston kissed her on the cheek and gave her to Kendall, her movements were slightly awkward as she navigated the step using a leg whose ankle was in a cast. Kendall helped her mount the dais as best he could, having her lean on his arm as they got into position as Archbishop O'Malley stepped to his place behind the altar and raised his paws.

The ceremony was long, and it was in the Catholic tradition. There was a homily, there was liturgy, there were periods when they would stand or kneel as the congregation stood or sat, and then, after hymns, the recitation from the Bible, and the sermon, did the meat of the ceremony begin. Kit as the ring bearer moved into action, producing the ancestral wedding rings of the Brighton family and had them at the ready as Vil and Kendall prepared to take their vows. Instead of reciting their own vows, they had elected to use the standard vows, which weren't too different from the ones Kit and Jessie had taken during their marriage. O'Malley recited the vows first to Kendall, who looked deeply into Vil's eyes, paused for a melodramatic second that was not in the rehearsals, then smiled and said "I do." Vil gave him a slightly stern look, but that melted into a glorious smile as O'Malley recited her vows, and she wasted not an instant saying "I do," barely waiting for him to finish. After that came the exchange of the rings. Kit offered Vil's ring to Kendall, and he slipped it onto her slender finger with a gentle smile as he recited the phrase "with this ring, I thee wed." Kit then passed Kendall's ring across him and to Vil, who repeated the rite. Then they kissed, and it was pretty boring as kisses went, since Kendall was too self-conscious to really put much into it.

After that, it would have been over in a Protestant ceremony, but there was still the Benediction to go. Fortunately, though, O'Malley made his benediction short and to the point with only the Lord's Prayer, which echoed through the chapel for a few seconds after it was chanted back by the congregation. O'Malley then raised his paws again, out wide, and smiled. "I have the matchless honor to present to you, faithful parishioners and welcome guests, Kendall William Brighton and Vilenne Amelia Brighton Vulpan. May God bless their union."

Flashbulbs exploded from the chapel as a roar of applause probably audible to those waiting across the street thundered through the cathedral. Vil and Kendall stood with Vil's paw on Kendall's arm there at the altar and gave everyone their photo op, standing for nearly a minute as the applause continued, and then, at Vil's gentle signal, they started down the dais. Vil moved carefully on her casted leg, but managed it with a certain amount of dignity. Kit watched them go, and he could only smile both outside and inside. His sister was now married, wasn't entirely his and his alone anymore, and he could only feel happy for her. She had truly found her match in Kendall, and he was certain that this was the beginning of a long, satisfying, and loving marriage. Vil would understand the unique joy and contentment that came with having a spouse, of being part of a family rather than single, of sharing her life with a male she loved, cherished, and respected. He was sure there were going to be some barnburners between them, because Vil was headstrong and Kendall wasn't afraid of her, but those arguments would only bring them closer together. Where it counted, in their hearts, they loved each other, and that could overcome the wrinkles that would pop up due to Vil's stubborn streak. Vil and Kendall marched as gracefully down the aisle as a femme could in a cast, leading the procession to a cacophony of applause and a blinding array of flashbulbs, and Kit was sure that from this day forward, life both for him and the Vulpan family would never be the same again.

It would be better.

As they led the procession, now Kit and Suzy brought up the end, walking behind Jessie and Michael. They all gathered in the nave for pictures of the entire bridal party, and they all lined up as they'd stood at the altar, with Kit between Kendall and Michael. Then there were pictures of each couple starting with the bride and groom, then pictures of Kit and Suzy, and so on and so on, then pictures of Kit and Vil, then pictures of them and Jessie, then Muffy was added. While the production crew were fussing with pictures of Winston and the Brighton boys, Vil gave Kit a crushing hug. He literally picked her up off the ground and swung her from side to side, which made her laugh. "We did it, bro," she told him. "We're both married, and now they can't touch me. We won, brother. We won!"

"I'll believe that when we're back home in Austin," he told her, then he kissed her on the cheek. "But I think we're almost there."

Vil gave Jessie a fond hug. "Now we can gossip about our husbands, sis," she said with an uncharacteristic giggle. Vil was not a giggler.

"You need to have a baby, Vil," Jessie told her. "Then we can gossip."

“Already working on it, sister dear, already working on it,” Vil chuckled.

“I think it’s about time for you two to go,” Winston said. “Nobody else will leave before you, and we’ve held them up in there for nearly a half hour. Besides, I’m hungry, and it’s hard to plot world domination on an empty stomach.”

“Always thinking with your stomach, old male,” Harry laughed.

Kit and Harry did the honors. They opened the doors of the cathedral with Vil and Kendall standing behind them, literally unveiling the new couple to the city of Boston. The white limo was sitting out on the street waiting for them, with Bartholomew standing by the door waiting and Oscar driving, but it was hard to see them in the swarm of flashbulbs that exploded from across the street and the almost deafening roar of the crowd. Vil and Kendall stood there for a moment, unmoving, giving the Bostonians their chance to get a picture, then Kendall carefully helped Vil down the stairs. The rest of them watched from the front doors as Vil and Kendall strolled down the carpet as if they owned the world, and then when they reached the limo, both Kendall and Bartholomew helped Vil into the limo. It started off as police cruisers moved to escort it, and then it was out of sight.

“Well, we’d better go if we want a spot in a limo, given our ride just left without us,” Muffy said lightly, which made Sonya splutter.

Fortunately, Nick was thinking ahead. As soon as Vil and Kendall were on their way, he collected up Kit and Jessie and the rest of the wedding party and hustled them through the side door ahead of everyone else and got them into a waiting limo, which had Donny behind the wheel. “The armored tank special,” Nick winked as he closed the door behind Muffy, who was last in, and then the huge wolf and Sylvia got in the front seat with Donny. Other limos were now pulling into the side lot to pick up guests, and there was certainly now going to be a large and constant stream of limos and cars going from the cathedral to Stonebrook, for the wedding was over and now the reception awaited them. Kit was fairly sure the police probably just made it easy on everyone and blocked off the route to give them easy movement, which would clear them all out of the city much faster and let them get things back to normal. And when they got going, he saw that his hunch was right. Every intersection through Boston was blocked off, allowing the limos and cars to proceed quickly and effortlessly from the cathedral to Stonebrook.

Odds were, he realized, the precaution might have less to do with Vil and more to do with the fact that there were a good couple dozen very high-ranking politicians behind them, from Congressfurs to Senators to Governors to cabinet-level Secretaries to candidates for President. It was easier from a security standpoint just to block off the route and allow them to pass through Boston. Sure, it would snarl traffic, but that was going to happen no matter what with a constant stream of limos running from downtown out to I-90. The county sheriffs and the Massachusetts State Police had made similar moves on the other end of the trip down Interstate, clearing a path for them all the way to Stonebrook Drive, where a platoon of police and federal agents were stationed. But the police presence ended at the gates of the manor, though Kit did see several FBI agents roaming the grounds, their FBI emblazoned vests glaringly out of place on the grounds.

“You didn’t say anything about the feds being on the grounds, Nick,” Kit called.

“Didn’t really seem important to tell you, Kit,” he answered. “I think you had enough on your mind. Besides, Stanley did tell you there were government males on the grounds this morning, inspecting the security, I think you just missed it.”

“Yeah, he did,” Kit realized.

“They called early yesterday morning and said that some politician had requested the feds check the security at the reception all the sudden, so they had to rush in here and establish security. They got here and realized they didn’t have to do much,” he grinned back at them. “I got everything under control, and the site commander liked my security plan, so they just slid into our plan nice and easy. They got feds and a few Secret Service guys on the grounds to reinforce my own mates and Valiant, which just makes it easier for me, and I’m still in command of the security with Commander Blake backing me up. The only concession we had to make is only the feds are carrying pistols. My mates are all patrolling naked, and they don’t like it one bit,” he noted with a smile. “I had to have everyone stow their guns in the command post, and there’s an FBI agent there guarding them. The PWDs are hidden in one of the secret rooms, cause they’d arrest the lot of us if they saw what we’re carrying,” he laughed. “That Obama bloke wanted to come to the reception, but the Secret Service guys here wouldn’t let him.”

“Why not?” Muffy asked.

“Cause they needed more time to sweep the house, and there’s too much outside security for them to have control,” Nick answered. “They don’t like us mercs too much, dove. They know we have assault weapons hidden somewhere on the grounds, and they wouldn’t let Obama anywhere near us,” he winked. “After what happened with the Paladins, they’d want this place completely under their control before they let Obama in here.”

“Then it’s just as good he’s not coming,” Kit said. “I wouldn’t tolerate the feds coming in here and taking over Stonebrook.”

Vil and Kendall were already inside when they piled out of the limo, and they found them in the ballroom, Vil showing Kendall the decorations anew as they walked paw in paw around, and as Stanley barked frenzied commands to the staff as they rushed about, making last minute preparations and setting out the first of the food, which were trays of bread placed on each table. The musicians were in the corner, warming up, and Kit saw ten Valiant guards and four of Nick’s merc friends already in the room, the guards standing at the doors leading out of the ballroom that led to out of bounds areas and the mercs patrolling. Vil folded Kit into a hug when they reached the pair, and she grinned up at him brightly. “Anything to say before there’s a few hundred furs in here?” she asked.

“I’ve changed my mind, you can’t have the reception here,” he said dryly.

Vil exploded into laughter. “I think Stan would kill you if you did that,” she winked. “I’ve never seen him so happy,” she added, looking the side, where Stanley had stopped in his journey to the kitchen to dress down one of the servants from Brian’s manor about the angle of the folded napkins being laid out over the plates.

“That’s happy?” Kendall asked.

“Yes,” Kit and Vil said in unison.

Kit and Jessie sat at the main table with Kendall as Vil went over to talk to Brian, who had just arrived. Vil and Kendall wouldn't be greeting guests at the door as Kit and Jessie had for their reception, because they'd already done so at the church. Stav and Marcus came over and whispered to Vil, and Kit saw her visibly start. Bartholomew brought a pot of tea out for them, but Kit almost spilled it when he saw Zach come in on the far side of the ballroom. The very sight of Zach standing in the halls of Stonebrook after Kit vowed he would never so much as come inside the gates again sent him into an almost instant fury. He very nearly jumped over the table and charged down there to beat the everliving stuffing out of him, but Jessie's paw on his forearm stalled him. "Don't cause a scene, handsome fox," she said calmly. "Go over and ask nicely, and if he doesn't leave, then you can have Nick tie him in a knot and toss him into the river."

Vil came to the rescue. She swooped in on Zach, with Brian in tow, and a hasty and fierce conversation ensued, done in harsh whispers from the look of it. As Kit, Jessie, Kendall, and Bartholomew watched on, Zach seemed to tense up, his eyes wide, then he turned and rushed from the ballroom. She hobbled back over to them as Brian went out after him, and seeing all of them staring, she gave a dark, sober look. "Maxine invited him," she grunted. "It seems Maxine's decided to call a family-wide conference without discussing the matter with us first, and feels that holding it here after the reception is the best way to go about it. That's going to be on hold, though," she said with a frown. "They found Stevie."

"Did they arrest him?" Jessie asked.

"If he survives they might," she said grimly. "He's in the hospital."

Kit gasped.

“They just found him at the bottom of a hill in Pennsylvania, in what was left of his car. From what Marcus told me, he was speeding up a mountain road leading to a some compound down in the Poconos, probably a Paladin training compound. Either he tried to kill himself, or he was in so much of a hurry to get there that he lost control of his car and went right over the hillside. And on those kinds of roads, you don’t get a second chance if you lose control. Marcus said his car flipped right over the guardrail and went down a sixty foot hill, bouncing off trees like a pinball, and he was down there for almost four hours before anyone found him. Marcus said he’s in bad shape, and they’re airlifting him to a hospital right now. Zach’s on his way to Pennsylvania to see him.”

“Holy God,” Kit breathed, not sure how to feel. Steven had tried to kill him, but to hear that, that he’d spent a few hours laying in the twisted wreckage of a car, waiting to die...God. Kit could sympathize with how that felt, to be in so much pain, and to be so alone...he wouldn’t even wish that on Steven. That was a hell no fur deserved, no matter what they’d done. But it didn’t make him too compassionate. If Bridgette was right, then Steven was the one that tried to kill them, tried to murder his wife and unborn daughter, and for no reason other than the fact that Jessie wasn’t a fox. Jessie had managed to charm so many of his relatives, even ones that hated the fact that she was a cat, like Tom and Travis. Steven refused to see her for the beautiful and special femme she was, all he could see was the shape of her muzzle and the color of her fur. Kit almost felt sorry for him, to be so blinded by unreasonable hate, but his pity ended at the thought that Steven had tried to murder him and his wife.

“Is he going to be alright, love?” Kendall asked.

“Marcus didn’t say, but from the sound of it, he might not make it,” she said grimly. “Which is a pity. I wanted to strangle him myself, not him take the easy way out and die before I get my paws on him.”

“Vil!” Jessie gasped.

“I told you, sis, I’m not nice,” she said in a dark manner, flexing her fingers ominously. “I hold little pity for a cousin who tried to murder the most important male in my life.”

“Well, so much for the marriage,” Kendall said flippantly, which made Vil chuckle.

“Alright, one of the most important males in my life,” she corrected, touching Kendall on the arm fondly.

The news of Steven swept through the family quickly after Vil’s declaration. They too had their ways of getting information, though they weren’t as effective and efficient as the panthers. Most of them knew by the time they got to Stonebrook, and as more and more guests arrived, it was the hot topic of the moment, even over the wedding. Winston Brighton seemed nonplussed when he was told when he arrived, more satisfied than angry that they had a suspect and that suspect had been found. More and more arrived, until the entire ballroom was filled with furs who were sitting, standing, talking, and Kit saw that except for Zach, Alicia, and their youngest, all the Vulpans were present, from Misty to Bridgette and from Brian to Jake. Kit lost track of things for a bit, and even forgot about Steven, when Vil returned and they had a good time talking, pointedly ignoring the news as Vil engaged Kit and Jessie in happier topics, like Laura’s impending birth, their honeymoon plans, and a light curiosity about what gifts the guests were bringing, which were being quietly collected out in the main entry and stored in a side room. Kit had wanted to get Vil and wedding present, but she'd squashed that idea, telling him that him being home was all the present she needed, and besides, rather cheekily informed him that he couldn't afford to get her what she deserved for her wedding anyway.

When the last of the guests arrived, they sat down to dinner. Franny and the cooks, some from other manors, had done a spectacular job, for the busy staff rolled out a five course meal that left everyone's mouth watering from the smells and gave them a meal worth remembering. Kit saw his own staff interspersed with servants from other manors, rushing about, placing plates, filling wine glasses from bottles pulled from deep inside the Stonebrook wine cellar, and the chatter in the room muted as everyone enjoyed the wonderful meal that Stonebrook had provided the guests.

Kit had the traditional honor to present the first toast in his role as the best male, so when the desserts were almost gone, he decided to get it overwith. He stood up and rapped his fork on his wine glass, and the murmuring in the ballroom quieted.

"I'm not very good at toasts," he said in a clear voice, looking down at his sister. "But I'm supposed to make the first one, so here goes. Vil. You've been more than a sister to me. After Mom died, you were like my mom, and now that you're finally married, I'm feeling like I'm being cut from your apron strings," he said with a slight smile. "So, here's to hoping that you're so happy with Kendall that you stop meddling in my life."

Vil and most at the table laughed, and she pointed at him. "Guess again, boy," she taunted, then she took a sip of her wine.

Winston stood up next, and he smiled down at Vil and Kendall. “Here’s to two years of plotting coming to fruition,” he chuckled. “I knew if I threw enough of my sons at you, you’d find one you could love, Vil.”

“Well, I have two others to try out before I make a final decision,” she murmured, which made Jessie explode into laughter and made Harry and Michael grin.

And so it went. The toasts went on for nearly half an hour, as Vil was toasted by virtually the entire Brighton family, the elder Vulpan, and a couple of Governors. After the toasts, the two near tables were removed and seats placed along the walls behind the columns, and Vil and Kendall had the first dance. It wasn’t entirely graceful because of Vil’s cast, but Kendall made up for that by putting Vil’s feet on top of his own and dancing for them, which made her laugh and hold him close. Kit and Jessie watched on with gentle smiles, and Jessie leaned her head against his shoulder. Both couples were feeling quite close and affectionate at that moment, because it gave Kit the most curious sense of peace and happiness to see his sister so happy.

They had reason to be happy. Vil was right about one thing, and that was with her now solidly married to Kendall Brighton, the elders would not dare try to usurp her from the company. Winston Brighton was a powerful fox, and if they angered him, he could reach all the way across the Atlantic and put a paw in that Kit’s family would not like, not at all. The merger of the two families made sense politically, financially, and the fact that Vil and Kendall loved each other was just that much more icing on the cake. Jake couldn’t deny that Vulpan Shipyards would reap tremendous profit from the deal, Maxine couldn’t deny that the merger made the two families, now one, created one of the most powerful, prominent, respected, and feared families on the entire planet, and Zach couldn't deny that now one family controlled nearly half of all large-scale ship production in the Western world. From the Vulpan warships and tankers to the Brighton warships, freighters, and ferries, the Vulpan-Brighton family now literally controlled the seas, just as Winston had envisaged. And when Vil and Kendall had their first child, that child would eventually inherit both companies, and probably be one of the most powerful single furs on the planet. There was so much in it for the Vulpans that they they'd be insane to try to screw it up, and that made Vil absolutely untouchable.

But there was hope in that regard. From the way Maxine talked, she was ready to switch sides. Maxine had been all about the respect of the family, and Vil's single act of reining in Bess had done more to soothe Maxine than anything possibly could. From Maxine's point of view, Vil had pulled off a miracle, and that was get Bess out of the nightclubs and into a business suit, made her respectable and responsible. Maxine would have preferred that Bess marry instead of enter the company, but the results were more or less the same, and that was that Bess would vanish off the tabloids and make something out of herself. With the alliance on the other side broken, Jake would probably concede, which would leave only Zach. Zach might be arrogant or angry enough to continue to fight, but Vil had him dead to rights, with him alone and his son doing the unthinkable, trying to murder a fellow family member. Vil could swat him like a fly now, because she was ruthless enough to use Zach's son against him in the mother of all blackmails. She would force Zach to give in to her every demand, or she would reveal the fact that Kitstrom Zachary Vulpan was heavily involved in the PPC, and that his son was the leader of the Paladins, which were considered a terrorist group. That wouldn't do much to hamstring him in the Boston social circles, since so many of them were purists anyway, but it would be devastating to him if he ever tried to do anything outside of Boston...and if he was the CEO of Vulpan Shipyards, that would destroy any chance that he'd be an effective CEO. Vil dealt with all kinds in her job, including the leaders of nations, and many of them would take an exceptionally dim view of dealing with a PPC member, given that the PPC was banned in almost every European country. Vil could destroy any chance Zach could maintain the chair if he was ever CEO, and that more or less defeated him. Kicked out of Stonebrook and unable to take control of the company, Zach was now effectively neutralized. To continue to fight would be pointless, but Zach was a very arrogant and stubborn male. He might continue to fight just for the sake of fighting.

After the first dance, others joined. Kit danced with Jessie, who laughed when her stomach got in the way, and they glided across the dance floor with eyes only for each other. The orchestra was exceptional, and they played classical to swing to country to more modern music. After that, Kit danced with Vil, whom he made dance by not carrying her, then Suzy, then Sheila, but he was a bit startled when Ruth pulled him out onto the floor during a waltz. "Now that I have you where you can't run away," she said with a smile, "I wanted to thank you for being such a good friend to Muffy. She adores you, Kit."

"That's alright, Ruthie," he answered. "I kinda like her."

"Now, I'd like for you to talk to Brian," she told him. "And I don't mean just glare at him and make snide comments. Talk to him, Kit. I think you'll find that he's not what you think."

"I can't do that," he said seriously. "I will never forgive them for what they did to me. Never, Ruthie. Never."

“Never is a long time, Kit.”

“I’m a very patient fox,” he said simply. “No matter what he might feel about me or might have felt when it happened, nothing changes the fact that he chose his money over helping me in my greatest hour of need, and I can’t ever forgive them for that.”

“Oh, Kit,” she sighed as they turned, “I think if you looked into it, used that marvelous mind of yours, you’d see that Brian was just as trapped as you were. They all were. You remember your father as a tyrant, Kit, and that’s exactly what he was. Everyone was so afraid of him, Kit, so afraid that they were even afraid to go against him after he was dead. He drove your mother’s family away to the point where they completely divorced themselves of you and Vil, and he terrorized all of us in ways I don’t think you know about. I don’t think you understand.”

“I was too busy laying in a hospital bed, alone, trying not to die,” he said flatly.

“You’re not being fair, Kit,” she said gently.

“No, Aunt Ruthie, I’m not,” he admitted bluntly. “There’s no way you can understand what it was like. And if you could, then you wouldn’t be saying these things to me now. Luke Vulpan the child who desperately needed his family, needed anyone when he laid in that hospital bed and nobody came, that Vulpan died that night, Ruthie. The family killed him with their neglect. Kit Vulpan the adult walked out of that hospital six months later. I’m not the same fox, and I have no reason to ever forgive those who killed the boy I used to be. I have every reason to never forgive my family for abandoning me.”

“But you’re not being fair, Kit. Vil didn’t come to see you either.”

“Vil had the only good excuse, because she used Suzy to send her messages, and she took care of me both before and after the accident. Brian had his chance, Ruthie. They all did. They’ll never get another one. I don’t blame Muffy and the youngers because they had no voice or were too young to understand what was going on, but anyone older than me knew what was going on, and they made their choice. They didn’t want me then, and I don’t want them now. I’ll tolerate them being in my house for the reception, I’ll be civil because Vil doesn’t need me disrupting things right now, but when this is all over, I’ll return to Austin and hope that I never see any of them ever again. There is nothing any of them can ever say or anything that they can ever do to change my mind, Ruthie. Even if Brian pulled me out of a burning car, I still wouldn’t forgive him.”

“And that means you won’t forgive me either?” she asked.

“No,” he said in a steely tone. “I like you, Ruthie, but I can’t do it. You abandoned me too. I’ll give you a great deal of leeway because Jessie seems to like you and you seem very sincere, but I can’t forgive you.”

She sighed sadly, looking up at him. “Well, can I at least give you a hug, nephew?”

“If it makes you feel better,” he answered. She slid her arms around him and held him gently as they danced, but Kit didn’t feel too much emotion over the act.

“I know it won’t mean anything, but I am very sorry about what happened to you, Kit,” she said with her head against his chest. “You may not accept my apology, but I feel you deserve one nevertheless. We were very cruel to you, and you showed how strong you are by making it, and how kind you are not to do to us what we did to you. Even Zach respects you because of that, Kit. They may not like you for the choices you've made, but they can't deny that you are probably the strongest of us all."

"It's appreciated, but you're right, I won't accept it," he said gently yet adamantly.

"Well, you may not like it, but I love you, nephew," she told him, patting on the back gently. "And I'm glad you're here."

He couldn't say anything to that without sounding like a total ass, so he finished the dance with Ruth in silence. She pulled him down and kissed him on the muzzle fondly, then she returned to the table where the other Vulpan elders and their spouses were sitting. And all of them had been watching Kit and Ruth. Kit returned to the main table and sat down between Jessie and Vil, who was resting her leg after dancing with Winston. The main table was reserved for the select family of the bride and groom, and was populated by the newlyweds, the wedding party, Abigail Brighton, and John and Hannah Williams. "Well, what was that all about?" Vil asked him.

"Same old same old," Kit answered. "Ruthie trying to sweet talk me back into the family."

"Did she get anywhere?"

Kit gave her a flat look.

"Question answered," she said impishly, then laughed suddenly when Kendall tickled her side.

"Wot, pay attention to me, you silly femme! I'm your husband!" Kendall protested.

"Back in your corner, slave," she said, giving him a wolfish smile.

“Oi, don’t treat him like that in public!” Charlie called. “But when you do do it, have a video camera handy.”

“Aye, we wanna watch our big brother being henpecked,” Harry grinned.

“When you get married, God will there be revenge,” Kendall threatened with a smile.

“It’s not being henpecked, you silly boys, it’s Kendall acceding to the proper order of the universe,” Abigail put in.

“I believe we’re going to get along, Abby,” Hannah said in an unruffled manner, which made the entire table explode into laughter.

“The world knows that a male is only as good as the femme that tells him what to do,” Vil said lightly.

“I can see some interesting discussions in your bedroom,” Charlie laughed.

Abigail looked to John and Hannah. “I must say, you two certainly did a wonderful job raising Jessica,” she complemented. “Jessica is just a little angel. I do hope you boys are paying attention,” she said sharply to her sons. “When you have daughters, they’d better turn out just like this,” she finished, pointing at Jessie.

Jessie’s cheeks ruffled appealingly.

“Thank you. We’re very proud of all our kids.”

“Oh yes, I need to meet the other Williams. Where are they?”

“Over there with the Vulpans,” Hannah said, motioning. Ben was literally surrounded by Vulpan femmes, who seemed to be just as attracted to him as Sheila was, and Jenny was laughing and chatting with Randolph and Duncan with Sam and Kevin beside her. Ben looked a trifle uncomfortable with Lynn hanging onto his shoulder and Joy trying to all but sit in his lap, while Angela was playing with Ben's tail.

"They certainly seem to like your kids," Winston chuckled.

"Perhaps a little too much," Hannah said frostily. "Sheila is, ah, infatuated with Ben, and it seems that the other Vulpan girls share her taste."

"Those girls? The only taste they require is a pulse," Kit noted, which made Charlie squirt wine out of his nose.

"Well, time to go mingle," Abigail said with a smile, then she got up and went over to the table holding the youngers.

Charlie put his fingers to his wrist. "Pulse, check. Excuse me, gents, I have some conquering to do," he said roguishly, then he got up and followed after Abigail.

Kit chuckled. "That boy just does not learn his lesson," he said to Kendall, who nodded in agreement. "By the end of the night, he certainly won't be the one conquering."

Things came to a stop when Stanley, Bartholomew, and Dee rolled out the cake. It was a five tier monstrosity that would easily feed the entire reception and not even touch the top tier, with two little fox figures on top under a trestle made of gingerbread and frosted with sugar. "Alright, it's time to smear icing all over Vil's face," Kendall said, clapping his paws together expectantly.

"Try it, male," Vil teased.

Despite his threat, Kendall actually behaved himself. After they cut the first pieces of the cake, he fed Vil a piece of cake daintily, to a tidal wave of flashing cameras. Vil returned the favor, having to hold the fork up since Kendall was nearly half a foot taller than she was, and then they turned over the cutting to Bartholomew while the guests lined up for cake. Vil sat down beside Kit, giving him and Jessie slices of cake, and Kit took her paw and held it beside his own, their wedding rings visible there on their paws. “My, that looks weird,” he said with a smile.

“It feels weird, but I’ll love getting used to it,” she smiled in reply. “I’m so happy, brother. Now I know how you feel.”

“I’m glad,” he told her with a gentle smile. “Who’d have thunk it, both the Vulpan kids married. Isn’t this the first sign of the apocalypse?”

She laughed. “I hope not, we haven’t taken over the world yet,” she winked.

Because of the length of the ceremony, Vil had opted for a much shorter reception. Almost immediately after the cutting of the cake, they had the last set of dance music, and then the ceremonial bouquet and garter throwing would take place out on the front steps. Vil and Kendall would normally then get in a limo and drive off, but they were instead staying at Stonebrook so Vil could talk to Maxine and the others. The large reception crowd moved through the entry foyer and out onto the lawn facing the large columns and tan granite stairs leading to the almost never-used front door, and Vil made quite a show out of throwing the bouquet. She turned around and faked throwing it over her head several times, until the femmes started to protest, then she hurled it suddenly, catching many of them off guard. There was a scramble for the bouquet, and eventually one of the young Kennedy girls came out of the scrum, jumping up and down with it held high over her head, squealing in delight. Because Vil's casted leg would make it very hard for her to stay stable and allow Kendall to take off her garter, he had carried it out. He apologized to the males for not taking it off in front of them and showing off Vil's sexy legs, which got him bopped, then he hurled the garter like he was shooting a hook shot. Kit had to laugh when Mike came up with the garter, which was something of a streak for him. Mike had caught Jessie's garter as well.

With the throwing of the bouquet and garter, that was officially the end of the reception. Vil and Kendall said goodbye to everyone and posed for several pictures, and then the guests began to file out of Stonebrook under the careful eyes of the guards and Nick's mercenaries. Instead of going to a limo, Vil gathered up Kit, Jessie, Jessie's family, and the Brightons in the entry foyer. "Alright, most of the Vulpans are here, and Maxine has told them all that we're going to have some kind of conference," she explained. "We may as well take advantage of it. So I hope that all of you excuse me and Kit, and Ken and Jessie while we go talk to the family and straighten some things out."

"I think the time for a talk is long overdue, Vil," Winston told her.

"Probably. I'm sorry to cut you guys out, but this is a Vulpan matter, and the others will get really snippy if we aire our dirty laundry to in-laws. Ken and Jessie have every right to be there because they're spouses, but my elders will have a cow if I bring anyone else, I know they will."

"That's alright, dear," Hannah assured her. "I think we can spend our time getting to know your new in-laws."

"I think that's a smashing idea, Hannah," Abigail smiled.

Vil took Kit's phone and pressed the push to talk. "Stan, collect up every Vulpan you can find and send them to the sun room," she ordered. "It's time for a little family conference."

"At once, Mistress Vil," he answered. "I will have extra chairs sent into the room, and tea sent up for you."

"Good enough," she said, then she gave Kit the phone back. "Well, let's go, Vulpans," she said, her voice hardening as she prepared to face down the family. "Let's go put our family in its place."

"That sounds good to me," Kit agreed, taking Jessie's paw and leading her towards the stairs.

Chapter 38

There hadn't been a gathering like since the funeral.

Except for Zach and Alicia, the entire Vulpan family was present in the large sun room, which was quickly being filled with chairs so everyone would have a place to sit. When Vil and Kit entered, they were the last to come in, and Vil was still wearing her wedding dress. That was a statement, a blaring indication to the family that the rules had changed, and Vil was now invulnerable. Then again, everything told them that. Vil was married. She had Kit and Terry on the board, and Jessie was an executive with proxy power. She had Winston Brighton backing her up, and not only that, the merger of the two families had created something that not even the most rabid Vulpan would want to destroy, the chance to create a shipbuilding dynasty unrivalled in the world. Vil had absolute control now, and they knew it. Kendall and Jessie came in behind them, and a few dark looks at Jessie threatened to break the tense silence. But Jessie kept her head high, taking Kit's offered paw and being escorted up to the area between the windows. Kit seated Jessie in his favorite spot in the manor, on the right windowsill, and Vil seated Kendall on the left as servants scurried in with chairs and seated the family, and Stanley, Dee, Weathers, Marge, Sally, and Luann served tea and wine through the room, then stood quietly by the walls.

It wasn't Vil that got things started, it was Maxine. She took a glass of wine from Dee without so much as a nod to her, then stood up. "It's far past time we did this,” she declared. “Things are getting out of control, and it has to stop.”

“Maxy,” Jake protested, but she cut him off with an icy glare.

“Do you think that trying to murder one of our own was an acceptable move, Jake?” she demanded.

“Well, no, but we have to restore the family to its rightful reputation.”

“That can never happen now,” Louis barked. “Not so long as we have a cat among us!”

“You will put a muzzle on that mouth, young male!” Maxine snapped loudly, pointing at him. “What is done is done, and we allowed it! If you have an issue with Jessica, don’t blame Kit. Blame us. We permitted the marriage!”

“How could you!” Louis gasped.

“Because Kit earned the right to marry whoever he pleased!” she called in reply, an answer which honestly surprised him. “And so long as he stayed in Austin, there was little for us to object to!”

“Let’s get to the point,” Vil commanded, standing before them all. “The point is, we think Steve was the one that tried to kill Kit, and right now, they’re not sure if he’ll make it. I’m sure everyone in this room heard what happened,” she said, then paused a moment. When only silence greeted her, she continued. “I always expected that it might get to this point, but I was hoping beyond hope it wouldn’t. Well, here we are. And we’re here to get some things straight.”

“The first thing we get straight right here, right now, is I control this family. I have the company, so I have the responsibility. Is there anyone in this room that has a problem with that?” she demanded, sending a withering glare through the room. She locked eyes with Jake, but he just looked away. “Good,” she declared. “So, I’m waiting to hear the words.”

“You’ll hear them from me,” Maxine said, sitting down. “We were hasty in trying to unseat you, Vil. I thought you were letting the family fly apart, I thought you didn’t care about our family’s honor and reputation, but I was wrong. If you can get Bess out of the nightclubs, then you’re clearly suited for the job.”

“She gave me something you never did, Maxy! She gave me a chance!” Bess said hotly.

“If you’d have behaved with a little more—“

“You treat us like little kids!” Lynn shouted in reply. “We’re not ten years old, Aunt Maxy! The last I checked, I’m an adult!”

“If you’d show some responsibility, we would have treated you with respect!” Jake shouted in reply. “Travis, Patrick, Chris, and Terry don’t act like a sinful harlots!”

“No, he just dates one!” Duncan snapped.

“They’re boys,” Mary retorted. “They can do no wrong! You guys have always given them everything, and all we get is the cold shoulder! They get to have real jobs, do real work! What do we get, huh? Get married, Mary, you’re useless, Mary, only the males should work, Mary, just have babies because that’s what femmes are supposed to do, Mary. Why do you think there's a Party Pack, Uncle Jake! This isn't the eighteen hundreds! Girls actually do things now!"

"The responsibilities of the femmes in this family is to secure the family line and anchor us both to our past and to our future," Jake said stiffly. "You don't think we understand it's a sacrifice for you, Mary? We do. Maxine is just as brilliant and gifted as Lucas was, but her role in the family was clear, and she accepted it. We knew it was a terrible sacrifice for her, but she accepted that sacrifice for the good of the family, and we appreciate that sacrifice every day. But this is the way things work in proper society, and we must retain our reputation and our respect."

"Well, I've got news for you, Dad," Angela said icily. "I'm not going to spend my life crawling in bed with a husband I hate and cranking out babies so you can feel like we're anchoring you."

"And you're not," Vil called calmly. "Effective today, the arranged marriages stop. Things are going to change, and they have to, Jake. This isn't the Victorian age. The idea that the femmes have to marry and have children is no longer a viable family tradition. If the girls want jobs, they'll get them in the company. Real jobs. If they want responsibility, they got it. If they want to do what Kit, Sheila and Muffy plan to do, open their own businesses, try their paws at building their own companies, they'll get all the support they need. The Vulpan Corporation has plenty of room in it for new satellite companies. And I think they'll surprise you a little bit," she said with a smile. "The simple fact of the matter is that Kit's been right ever since he was old enough to see the real family. He left us because we're not a family, and God did we prove that when he was hit by that car. We will be a family again, and part and parcel of that is to relax things a little bit. There will be no more arranged marriages. There will be no more forcing cousins to either work or not work. Every Vulpan will get to make his or her own choices about what they want to do with their lives, and so long as you don't publicly embarrass the family, you'll be given latitude."

"But what will foxes say if we go against tradition!" Maxine protested.

"Maxy, I think the only family left that follows those obsolete traditions is us," Vil retorted.

"They'll say it's about damn time we got out of the dark ages," Kit answered immediately. "Do you really think the other families are being as stubborn as the Vulpans? I've been out there in the real world, Maxy, and I can tell you that trying to hold the family in the past is only ruining it. It drove me away. It's driving the youngers away, and if you don't stop it, there won't be a Vulpan family."

"But you can't go that far," Jake protested. "There have to be rules."

"Of course there will be, but not nearly as strict as before," she answered. "There will really only be one rule. Be discreet. If you want to do something that makes you happy, then be discreet. If you're not sure if it's out of bounds, come talk to me and we'll see what we can do. Terry and Allison are the perfect example of that," she said, nodding at Terry. "I'm fully aware of Allison's past. I interviewed her personally before they went on their first date, and I'm willing to overlook her past indiscretions because I'm convinced she's not a gold-digger and she's sincerely attracted to Terry, and Terry is sincerely attracted to her. As long as they keep their relationship private and quiet, as long as Allison's past stays in the past, as long as I don't see a big headline in the Enquirer some day saying 'Vulpan heir in secret affair with ex-prostitute,' I'm willing to allow them to date. But if they cross the line," she said, snapping her fingers. "It's over. They both know the rules I've put down on them. And I'm watching them carefully." She leaned a little on her casted leg. "But as long as they obey my rules, as long as their relationship stays quiet and low-key, then Terry is more than allowed to go out with Allison. That's the new order," she declared. "Be happy, but be discreet. Hopefully, that will preempt the kind of insanity that happened the last few days. The inflexibility and the dysfunctional condition of this family drove one of our own to attack another, and that's just too far. That's why we're here now, because it has to stop. We are a family, and it's about damn time we started acting like one."

"What are you going to do to Stevie?" Joy asked, a bit fearfully.

"If I prove he did it, he's disowned," Vil answered bluntly. "He'll also be in jail if I have my say, and if he's convicted, he loses his share of the family money. There is no room in this family for those who want to control it by killing others. I know the vast majority of you object to Kit and Jessie, but that's tough. Kit paid his dues to this family ten times over, and he's earned the right to be completely free of us."

"Then why is he here now?" Louis demanded.

"Because they forced me back up here," Kit answered, pointing at Maxine and Jake. "I was perfectly happy back home in Austin, and the last thing I wanted to do was come back up here and get involved in this hellhole of a family. Vil's accident really was an accident, but we didn't know that at the time, and I sure as hell believed that one of you was capable of trying to kill Vil, so I came home to help her. And when this is all over and I feel comfortable leaving, I'll resign my seat on the board and go right back home and pretend the lot of you don't exist, just as I'm sure you pretend I don't."

“Taking Stonebrook is hardly divorcing yourself from the family,” Jake declared.

“Blame her for that, I certainly didn’t want it,” Kit replied, pointing at Vil.

“Stonebrook is Kit’s,” Vil said simply. “It’s the way it should have been from the beginning. This is, was, and always will be his house. I was just putting things right.”

“So you’re not moving back in?” Sarah asked pointedly.

He shook his head. “When I go home, I’ll leave Stonebrook in Vil’s paws for her to manage. She’ll watch over it for me, and she’ll have both control and discretion over the manor. She’s the one that’ll decide who’s allowed in and so on. I’ll use it when I come up to visit, but we don’t intend to live here. More likely than not, I’ll open Stonebrook to the family for hosting special events and giving guests of the family a place to stay when they come visit, like the Brightons and other in-laws. The last thing we want to do is be up here. I’m sure one of you might get the cute idea to try something when Laura’s born, when there’s a mixed breed in the Vulpan line.”

Half the room bristled at that declaration, and Jake nearly stood up in anger, but Vil’s withering stare put him right back in his chair.

“So, if you think I’m coming back to the family, think again. I came up here to deal with a crisis, and that’s it. The crisis is more or less over, there’s nothing holding me here. I’ve agreed to stay at Stonebrook until Vil comes back from her honeymoon, but when she comes back, we go home.”

“Not alone,” Sheila chuckled. “I’m an Austin Vulpan now too.”

“I have you potty trained, Sheila, so that’s fine,” Kit noted, which made her laugh. “But as far as most of the rest of you are concerned, there’s no such place as Austin. It doesn’t exist. So you have no reason to show up there. The ones who are welcome there already know who they are.”

“I think we can dispense with the veiled threats, Luke,” Maxine said shortly.

“It’s no way veiled, Maxine, and don’t call me by his name,” he answered. “I want nothing to do with this family outside of my sister and a few of my cousins. The rest of you can go to hell, and I pray to God I never see you again when I go home.”

“Way to keep it civil there, bro,” Vil said darkly under her breath as several Vulpans stood up or made angry comments. “SIT!” Vil barked harshly, which caused the family to quickly return to their seats. “To put it a bit more tactfully, we’re going to go right back to the way things were before this started. Kit will go home and return to being his own fox, and we will let him,” she said distinctly. “We’ll leave him alone, and outside of an occasional visit to Boston to see me, Clancy, and Suzy, he will stay in Austin. Up here, we will close ranks. For now, we leave Zach and Alicia outside until I ascertain if they were involved in the attack on Kit. Oh. Yes. Let me say this right now, and make it absolutely clear. If anyone in this room is in any way tied to, connected with, or otherwise engaged with the PPC or any of its satellite organizations, like the Paladins, you will leave it. There is no longer any place for the PPC in this family, and if I catch any of you either in the PPC or contacting them or any other purist or supremacist group in any way, I will run you out of this family, out of Boston, and maybe even out of America. And that is not a threat. That is an absolute one hundred percent guarantee,” she said, looking directly at Louis when she did so. “You can live your life and be what you want, but I will not tolerate anyone in this family belonging to the PPC or any other purist group. You can feel however you want, but you will not make those feelings in any way public. And belonging to the PPC advertises your sympathies.”

“You have no right to tell us what we can do in our lives!” Louis protested.

“Oh, don’t I?” she asked immediately. “This is about family unity, Louis. How does it look for you to be in the PPC when your cousin is married to a mixed breed, and the PPC tried to kill him and his wife?”

Louis glared. “He’s going back to Austin!” he finally declared.

“That’s right. But that doesn’t change the fact that there’s just a little conflict of interest if you’re in the PPC and Kit is married to Jessie. That will start rumors, and so long as it remains, the family’s reputation will be stained.”

“Stained? That is the stain on the Vulpan family!” Louis screamed, jumping to his feet and pointing at Jessie and Kit.

Vil looked right at him. “Louis. I’ll say this only once. You will obey me, or you will be disowned. Do I make myself clear?”

He said nothing, glaring daggers at her.

“I said do I make myself clear, Louis. You will say yes or no. Right now.”

He remained stonily silent.

“Alright then,” she said, brushing a paw in his direction. “You’re fired.”

“WHAT?” he gasped.

“I said you’re fired,” she said in a flat tone, staring at him. “And since you sent Matty to her family manor in England, why don’t you just go live there for a while? So long as you insist on remaining in the PPC, you are not welcome in Boston. So get out.”

Louis made several strangling noises, and Jake and Maxine were gaping at Vil in shock.

“Why are you still here, Louis?” Vil called. “I told you to get out. That means GET OUT!” she ended with a sudden scream, which nearly startled several Vulpans out of their chairs. “And stay out until I tell you you can come home, which won’t be until after you’re out of the PPC, and I know you are! So get out of Boston, Louis. NOW!” Louis just stood there, in shock, and Vil blew out her breath. “Stanley, call Nick and tell him to drag Louis out of here and throw him out the front gate,” she commanded. “If he resists, Nick is allowed to knock a few of his teeth out.”

Louis turned and fled from the room.

“Vil, you can’t be serious,” Maxine said pleadingly. “You can’t exile Louis for being cheeky!”

“I can, I will, and I did,” she answered. “If he’s that adamant about staying in the PPC, then how long will it take for him to become the next Steve, Maxy?” she asked simply.

“And how quickly will he want to be if you come down on him?”

“That’s entirely up to him, isn’t it? All he has to do is quit the PPC, and he can come home. I made that fairly clear to him.”

“You’re making a mistake, young lady.”

“It’s my prerogative, Maxine,” she answered calmly. “You’ve heard the new rules, and you just saw that I’m going to enforce them,” she called. “Be happy, be discreet, my door is always open for you if you need to talk, but don’t you dare put a toe out of line in the public venue. This family moves forward united, and I damn well expect to hear all of you marching behind me in lock-step. If you can’t obey the simple and very liberal rules I’ve placed on you, then you really don’t belong in this family.” She swept her gaze across the room. “Any questions?”

There was nothing but silence.

“Then we’re done here,” she declared. “Everyone go on home, and remember I’ll be on my honeymoon starting tomorrow. If you want to talk to me about something, you need help, you have some ideas about starting your own side businesses, or you want a job, come talk to me after I get home. I’m going to be a little busy,” she said, glancing back at Kendall, which made the girls in the Party Pack laugh lightly. “While I’m gone, I’ve bullied Kit into sitting in my chair. And I’m sure he’ll make sure nothing changes or nothing happens while he’s in charge,” she winked. “Oh, you stay, Maxine. I want to have a little chat with you. Graham, you stay as well. This concerns you.”

“Stay, guys,” Vil said when Jessie moved to stand up. She and Kendall both had been completely silent during the entire conference, but for that matter, none of the spouses had said anything either. Even though they were Vulpans, Kit figured they felt that they didn’t want to get involved in this one. When the other Vulpans filed out, only them and the servants remained, who stayed near the door to keep what was obviously meant to be a private conference private.

Vil didn't waste a second. "It's time to right the second greatest wrong ever perpetrated by this family. Graham, I want you out of Boston," she declared. "Consider yourself divorced in everything but name, until I can get an annulment for Maxy."

Maxine was stunned. Graham gave Vil a look of consternation, then rose up to his full height and glared down at the small vixen before him. At that moment, Kit was again taken with how petite his sister was. She was only five feet tall, yet she stood and comported herself like a vixen Sonya's height, and she looked up at Graham with eyes that were both steady and fearless. "How dare you!" he growled.

"I dare a lot of things, and the one thing I will not tolerate a second longer is an abusive prick putting one more paw on my aunt," she said coldly. "You've worn out your welcome in the Vulpan family, Uncle Graham," she said icily. "I want you out of Boston by tomorrow. If you're still in Boston when I leave for my honeymoon, I will have you thrown out. I don't care where you go, I don't care what you do, but understand one thing. Maxine is now forever off limits. You will never see her face to face again, and the kids are Vulpans. They stay with Maxine. Oh, and I'll make sure that no bank in America will allow you to touch a single penny of Aunt Maxine's money before you get out the front gate," she said with a narrow-eyed hiss. "And I will dare take it to that level if you try to steal it. You touch a single penny of Aunt Maxine's money, and you won't live to be arrested for embezzlement. Do you understand me?"

"You bitch!" Graham screamed. "You have no right!"

"I have every right to protect my aunt," she answered in a frosty voice. "So pick one of your vacation houses and go there, and consider it your new home. That's the only gift you're going to get from the Vulpans. Vulpans don't divorce, but you can be as sure as the sun rises that you are now permanently exiled from this family, and I'll do my damndest to get your marriage annulled. Beating your wife is grounds for annulment, Graham, and God knows I have enough proof to take to the Archbishop. Take your little family trust the Grants gave you and live in your new house and don't come within a thousand miles of Maxine or her children, not your children, or I'll make sure they never find your body. Is that abundantly clear?"

Graham answered in a way he usually saved for his wife. He balled up his fist and moved to deck Vil, but to Kit's shock, Kendall moved like absolute lightning. One second he was sitting on the windowsill, the next Graham was on the floor, squealing in pain and holding his muzzle, and Kendall was standing between him and Vil, a look of absolute outrage on his face. Kit blinked and stepped back in surprise. He never dreamed Kendall could move that fast! "You bloody coward, tryin ta' hit a wee lady!" he screamed, his speech turning much more accented, almost Scottish, in his anger. "Get him out of here before I skin him alive!"

Stanley and Bartholomew picked Graham up off the floor, and with eminently approving looks at Vil and Kendall, they all but dragged him from the room. Maxine just stood there, a stunned look on her face, her mind unable to wrap around it. "Now you don't have to worry about sending him away, Aunt Maxine," Vil told her calmly. "If he wants to be mad, he can be mad at me." Maxine stared at her woodenly, then she buried her face in her paws and began to sob.

"The only good he ever was was giving Maxine children she loved," Vil snorted as the door closed behind Graham, but Kit was watching in surprise as Jessie, unable to turn away from someone in need, got up and put her arms around Maxine, saying soothing words to her, patting her on the shoulder. Maxine buried her face in Jessie's shoulder and clutched onto her tightly, maybe not even knowing to whom she was clinging. Jessie urged her over to a sofa, and sat with her, patting her and stroking her hair, as Kendall checked Vil with gentle paws to make sure she was alright. "I'm fine, my knight in shining armor," she grinned at him. "I'll go raid the kitchen for tin foil," he grinned in reply.

Maxine seemed to get control of herself again, sniffing and looking at Jessie with a mixture of surprise and curiosity. Jessie just smiled at her gently, leaned forward, and kissed her on the cheek before getting up and returning to Kit. "All right, Maxine?" Kendall asked.

"Yes, thank you," she said, composing herself, then standing up. "Vil, there was no need for that."

"Oh, there was definitely a need," she said strongly. "I meant it when I said that this family will be a family, Maxy, and that means we take care of each other. This family suffered that ass for long enough, and it was almost a crime that Dad made you marry him."

"Too right," Kendall nodded.

"I doubt you're going to cry over his exile," Vil told her with a surprising smile. "I know you hated that asshole."

"Well, my feelings don't matter when the family--"

"Don't you dare finish that," Jessie flared. "If you don't care about you, no one else will!"

"Jessica, I may object to you marrying Luke, but I certainly can't say that I don't see why he loves you," she said with surprising candor, giving her a slight smile.

“It’s about damn time,” Vil snorted. “Now you’d better go make sure Graham doesn’t burn Oak Hill down out of spite, and I’m going to call around and make sure he’s locked out of your bank accounts. Don’t give him a damn thing, Maxy. He leaves with the clothes on his back, and nothing else. The house you’re going to let him have is all he should ever get from this family.”

Maxine nodded. “I’ll send him to our house in San Francisco. He always did love that place, and I hate it. That way I lose nothing I care about.”

Vil nodded. “I’ll send a couple of the guards here with you, and their big guns will keep Graham on the line,” she winked. “Give me your phone, bro.” Kit laughed when he gave her his house phone, and she hit push to talk. “Stanley, bring a car around for Maxine immediately, and do not allow Graham to leave before she does. Nick, I want the two biggest, scariest looking mercs working in the manor to meet Maxine in the garage, with their pistols in very visible outer holsters. They’re going to be her bodyguards for a while.”

“I’ll send Barnett and Krichek, they’re good at looming,” Nick chuckled in reply.

“Krichek? He’s a teddy bear,” Jessie giggled.

“I’ll call Misses Vulpan’s car immediately,” Stanley answered. “But I don’t think Master Grant will be going anywhere but to hospital. It seems that he has a broken jaw. I believe it may need to be wired.”

“Good,” Vil said vindictively. “You send him there, and make sure he understands this. He leaves the hospital and goes straight to Logan and boards a plane for San Francisco. That is where Maxine said he can go, and that's where he'd better be six hours after he's released. Maxine will pack him a suitcase and have it sent to the hospital." She lowered the phone and grinned at Maxine. "Have your staff fill it with old canvas," she winked.

Maxine laughed ruefully. "I, I don't know what to say, Vilenne," she said.

"You can be happy," Vil told her. "That's the new motto of this family. I'll send the guards with you so you feel safe and you don't have to go in there alone. You want to leave Lenny, Wendy and Kate here at Stonebrook until Graham's out?"

"That is kind of you, Vil, yes, please," she nodded. "I think it's best. I'll explain things to them when I get back."

"Alright. I'll have Stanley settle them in...somewhere," she chuckled. "This place is kinda full right now with all the guests here, but I'm sure we can settle them in if they need to stay overnight." She raised the phone to her maw again. "Dee, could you round up Lenny, Wendy, and Kate and take them down to the TV room? They'll be staying here at Stonebrook while their parents are out. Settle them in. There's a very small chance they may be staying overnight, so prepare rooms for them, just in case."

"Certainly, Mistress Vil," Dee answered.

"There we go. Go get it done, Maxine," Vil told her. "And if there's anything else I can do for you, you know where I am."

"I...I'm, well, grateful, Vilenne," Maxine told her. "I'm a little overwhelmed, but grateful."

"We'll talk when I get back from my honeymoon," she nodded.

Maxine ventured forward and gave Vil a short but sincere hug, kissed her on the cheek, smiled in Kit and Jessie's direction, then hurried from the room.

"I can't believe you let a slime like that in your family, Vil," Kendall fumed.

"Graham? Thank our father for him," she grunted. "He'd just taken over the family after our grandfather died, and his first act was to make Maxy marry that prick, over her objections. He slapped her on one of their dates, and she wanted to break it off, but Dad wouldn't hear of it." She looked over at Jessie. "And you, sis, are an absolute angel. After everything she did to you and Kit, you comforted her. It was more than she deserved."

"From the sound of it, she needs someone to show her some love," she said simply.

The family was all abuzz about what happened, in both senses.

Vil's pronouncements were met with absolute joy by the cousins, but a little trepidation from Sarah and Jake. They were a little worried that Vil might have given the youngers too much leash, but given that the Party Pack was already talking about either working somewhere in the company or starting their own businesses, it was a baseless fear. Joy was even looking forward to starting Harvard now, instead of trying to talk her parents out of making her go. The only one that talked of holding completely to her life of parties and wildness was Lynn, who, like Sheila, was a dedicated, lifelong member of the Party Pack.

The other big news was Vil's banishing of Graham. This was seen as an overall good thing, even by Graham's own children, who were afraid of him. All of them had seen him slap their mother at least once, all of them had admitted that they'd been slapped or hit by their father at least once, and the news that Vil had banished him from Boston made them happy that their mother would be alright more than sad that their father had been sent away. They no doubtedly loved their father, but with Graham and Maxine separated, there wouldn't be any more fights, and no more chances that their father might hit their mother.

But, the aftermath of the Vulpan summit for Kit and Jessie was getting the family out of Stonebrook and leaving them with their wedding guests, and also with three accidental Vulpan kids who were stuck in Stonebrook until Maxine came back for them...but that wasn't a problem. The Vulpan kids found themselves invited out to the pool by Savid's kids, and after the staff scrambled to find swimsuits for them--they kept quite a few bathing suits of various sizes for guests--Leonard, Wendy, and Kate were laughing and splashing with Brua, Gin, Shava, and Avam. Kit and Jessie returned to their friends and Jessie's family, and they sat around the TV room talking about the wedding after seeing Vil and Kendall off to return to Hart's Crossing for a night before starting their honeymoon tomorrow. The Brightons had had their things moved to Stonebrook and were going to stay there so Vil and Kendall had the mansion to themselves, to feel like they were alone despite the size of the place, the family and Charlie taking over four of the available cottages on the grounds. They wanted to stay in Stonebrook for another reason, and that was so Abigail could get to know Kit and Jessie better.

Kit felt...relieved. They had gotten through the wedding and the short yet enlightening conference after the reception more or less unscathed. Kit had only been short once, maybe twice, but he'd stated his case and made it clear he was only here temporarily, and he very much wanted to take him and his wife back home, their real home, Austin. They'd already been gone for months, and he felt keenly homesick and ready to go back to his beloved city, back to their apartment and their friends, his job, Sunday poker, weekend trips in their plane, which no doubt looked like a neglected hulk after so many weeks sitting out at that tiedown spot, and their impending daughter. He was only up here for two more weeks, pretending to be the CEO while Vil was on her honeymoon, but basically just staying up here so someone she explicitly trusted had the power to keep the board from doing anything behind her back while she was gone. With Kit having proxy power, he would be the CEO while Vil was gone, and as such he had the power to call board meetings. There were no meetings on the schedule during Vil's honeymoon, and since Kit was there, nobody except him could call one. That kept everything all nice and controlled, giving Vil peace of mind. Kit would spend his last two weeks in Boston the way he'd spent the rest of it, at Stonebrook. The immediate sense of danger was gone with the discovery of Steven's perfidy, but there was still an open question about what would happen with Steven gravely injured and his parents rushing to Pennsylvania to be with him. Kit felt that it might be safe to allow Jessie out of the manor. He knew she wasn't complaining, but he had the feeling that she was feeling just a little cabin fever. Muffy had been an absolute doll to stick with them, giving Jessie a friend by her side to keep her company, but Kit felt that maybe a short trip here or there might make Jessie feel better. It certainly wouldn't be in Boston, but a little weekend trip to Maine might be nice, take Suzy up to see Corey, who was shooting a movie up there, or maybe a trip up to Canada, since Jessie had never been out of the country before, that should be relatively safe. They could go spend a day or two in New York or Washington D.C., maybe go out to the beach down in New Jersey or Maryland. There were any number of things they could do that didn't involve Boston, all it would take would be money get there, money they didn't really have.

He was glad to see that Jessie's family and the Brightons seemed to be hitting it off. John was explaining American football to Winston as only a rabid fan could while Abigail and Hannah were chatting over in the corner. Jenny was all brightness and sunshine as she and Ben talked with the Brighton boys and Charlie, but she was competing with Lilly for Charlie's eye, which made the hare all but strut for their benefit. The rest of the gang was here, more or less, filling the TV room with sounds of chatter and laughter as the staff scurried among them, offering drinks or taking glasses. Kit left Jessie to talk with her mother and Abigail as he sat down with Rick and Mike, who were listening to Muffy's description of her future "perfect nightclub" for probably the tenth time.

"Well, I can't say the Vulpans don't put on a good wedding," Mike chuckled, twirling Vil's garter around a finger. "Another garter to add to the collection. Now I just need Sam's and Allison's I'll have the whole set."

"You're making some assumptions there," Kit chuckled.

"Nah," he answered. "Sam's already engaged, and I'll put money on the table that Allison is engaged within a year."

"I won't take that bet," Kit chuckled. "And I won't mind either. I'd love to have Ally in the family. She's something special."

"A very smart young lady," Rick said with a nod of agreement.

Suzy sat down by Kit and leaned against him. “Hey guys. Rick and Mike, isn’t it?”

“That’s us,” Mike chuckled. “Susan?”

“Suzy,” she corrected with a smile.

“Or Sue-Sue or Zee,” Kit grinned at her.

“You don’t have the right to call me those anymore,” she said haughtily, though she was smiling. “You lost that right when you married someone else.”

“Pet names last forever, and are always embarrassing,” he winked in reply.

“Oh hush, Luke-daroo.”

Kit burst out laughing. “I was thinking of breaking our imprisonment and escaping to Maine next weekend, before we go home. Want to come with us? We can drop in on Corey.”

“That’s a wonderful idea!” she said with a bright smile. “He’s in pre-production right now, running between some of the coastal towns. He started in Castine, and is moving south down the coast and along the islands, hunting for shooting scenes and interviewing the residents surrounding his four main characters, seeing which ones would like to be in the movie.”

“What’s the movie about?” Rick asked.

“It’s a documentary about the coastal lifestyle of the Down Easters, and the island furs,” she answered. “It’s a very different and unique culture up there, and Corey wants to show the rest of America a tiny little slice of New England. Down Easters are the British foxes and Acadian wolves along the coast, the famous lobsterfurs and fisherfurs, and the island furs are the ones that live out on the islands off the coast, where each island is its own little community. He wants to capture the essence of the cultures and bring it to the viewer. Corey loves to do documentaries about everyday furs and interesting cultures. His last movie was about the lifestyles of the Mexican Baja communities, and not the tourist towns. He spent five months moving from little village to little village, documenting the life and culture of furs who work for a living. It was really good. He wants to break into the big time doing studio movies, and establishing himself as an indie is a good path to that. His last movie was shown at the Sundance festival and got good reviews, and he's putting in his dues until a studio calls him and offers him a film deal." She gave Kit a sly look. "You're his next project," she told him. "He's almost drooling over the idea of documenting the life of the famous Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan the Third."

"Pft," Kit snorted, slapping her lightly on the knee.

"He even had a title for it, From Riches to Rags," she pressed, putting her paws out as if to frame an imaginary billboard.

"He can keep dreaming," Kit grunted.

"He wanted to use your journal title, but it's taken," she grinned at him. "Through My Eyes has a ring to it."

"I don't think the Vulpans would let him do that," Rick noted.

"I doubt it, but it'd be a great movie," Suzy declared.

The party, inevitably, began to wind down. Everyone was tired from the wedding and reception, and they broke up to change, rest, or play around. Kit and Jessie retired to their bedroom for a little cuddling and a short rest, then came back down to have a light dinner with the Williams, the Brightons, and Rick and Martha. Kit felt distinctly out of place among the three older couples, but they accepted the two of them warmly. “I think your friend Savid is going to steal your cousins, Kit,” Abigail grinned when they joined them in the small dining room. “They’ve been with them all day. And I wanted to talk to them.”

“Then go talk to them, Abby,” Winston said calmly as he accepted a glass of wine from Sally with a smile and a nod of thanks.

“So, what do you think of marrying into the Vulpan family, Abby?” Kit asked in a calm yet serious tone.

“I think we got here just in time to save you from them,” she winked in reply. “No offense, ducky, but your family needs therapy.”

“I couldn’t agree more,” Kit grunted in reply.

“They’re not that bad,” Jessie protested. “I think some of your family is very nice, Kit.”

“Love, you’ve got to be the most kind-hearted femme I’ve ever met,” Kit said with a smile at her. “Half of them want to stick a dagger in your back at the first available opportunity. And if you don’t recall, one of them did try to kill us.”

“Well, he’ll get what’s coming to him,” she declared. “But I love Vil and Sheila and Muffy, and Terry’s a great male, and I kinda like your uncle Brian and aunt Ruthie. They’ve been very nice to me.”

“I think Vil has it all under control now,” Winston said. “Kenny told me about what happened up in that room, and it sounds like Vil has a very tight leash on them.”

“I think it’ll be alright,” Kit said. “Some things that have needed to be said were said, Vil laid down the law and made it clear the family’s coming out of the dark ages, and it’s clear now that if Zach wants to continue to fight, he’ll do it alone. Maxine gave up, and Jake was completely silent the entire time. The fact that he never said a word actually said quite a bit. I think he’s regretting it now.”

“No, he talked, but only once or twice,” Jessie corrected.

“He did? I didn’t think he did,” he noted. “When Vil gets back from her honeymoon, odds are she’ll have just about the entire Party Pack banging on her door asking for jobs.”

“Not Mary. She told me that she’s going to go to Britain and look for a husband,” Jessie told him.

“Really? Well, I wish her good luck,” Kit said honestly.

“She said there has to be another Kendall in England,” Jessie giggled.

“I can understand her attraction. You raised a very good boy, you two,” Hannah said approvingly.

“Well, we think you did an equally smashing job with your children,” Abigail smiled in return. “Your children are all wonderful cats.”

“That reminds me,” Winston said, looking at Kit and Jessie. “Where do you plan to deliver?”

“Currently, it looks like it’ll be home in Austin,” he answered. “The day after Vil gets back from her honeymoon, we’re leaving, going back home. That’ll be about two weeks before the delivery day.”

“I need to call Doctor Mac and let her know,” Jessie reminded herself.

“Alright. When you have your plans made, let us know, son,” Winston continued. “We fully intend to be there. You’re family now, and the birth of a child should be a family event.”

“Besides, a day or two just isn’t long enough to get to know you,” Abigail added. “We intend to spend a couple of weeks with you to help you settle in with your new baby and get to know you much better.”

“We?” Kit asked.

“All of us, even Charlie, though I won’t be there quite as long,” Winston nodded. “Charlie’s all but a member of the family as it is, he’s been as close as our own sons since he was six. I can manage a week, but not much more, since I do have a fairly large company to run, and we’ve been here in Boston for a while to boot. I’ve already arranged a week off to spend down in Austin, and I have a broker searching for nice houses in Cincinnati and in Austin to buy so we have vacation homes near our new in-laws.”

Kit laughed. “Terry did the very same thing,” he said. “Bought a house just so he has a place to stay when he comes to Austin to see Allison.”

“You should have no problem finding one,” Jessie added. “There’s a whole lot of houses for sale in Austin right now. There are like four or five signs on every block.”

“The ranch on the other side of Bill’s spread is up for sale,” Martha noted. “About a hundred acres of good ranchland with a watering pond. Bill’s been looking into buying it and expanding his own ranch.”

“Yes, well, this is certainly a buyer’s market,” Winston said sagely. “I’ve been quietly making preparations to expand our holdings into real estate. Just waiting for the market to bottom out over in Britain.”

“I’ve had similar ideas,” Kit agreed. “There are a lot of interesting opportunities right now, and not just in real estate. I’ve taken note of several potential business ventures around Austin that I think will make some good money.”

Abigail laughed. “Your sister said you had the soul of a businessfur, Kit, and all the instincts a businessfur needs to be successful,” she told him. “I see she was right.”

“I’m a Vulpan, Abby,” he admitted. “It’s in our blood. I have just enough capital in the bank left over from the money my mother left me to be tempted to do a few of the things I’ve been thinking about.”

“Well, when the time comes, give me a ring, son,” Winston said. “I doubt I’ll lose a shilling if I’m backing your business venture.”

“No thanks, Winston. I kinda like to succeed or fail on my own,” he said with an honest smile. “After what happened between me and my family, I don’t want any help.”

“Yes, well, I’m not a Vulpan, son,” he said with a wolfish smile. “And I’m certainly not giving you anything. I expect results from my investments.”

“There’s more than just you here, ducky,” Abigail clucked, looking at Jessie.

She laughed lightly. “When it comes to this, I agree with Kit,” she declared.

“Being backed by a rich in-law sorta defeats the purpose,” he explained. “I left the family when I was sixteen, but I would have never made it without my sister and Suzy helping me. All my life others had to help me. Well, I want to see if we can make it on our own, Winston, without my family name or the money, just with what my mother left me, which was a hundred thousand dollars. I want to see if me and Jessie can make it.”

“Ah, well, in that case, I certainly understand, son,” he said with an approving nod.

“We might talk about a few of your ideas, son,” Rick said. “We’re already partners in the magazine. I think I could be persuaded to be a partner in some other things.”

“Sure, Rick. I would have invited you into it no matter what.”

“Now, let’s get back to what’s important,” Abigail said. “The baby!”

“Yes, I’d say that that’s quite important,” Winston smiled. “Vil said that you’re naming her Laura?”

“Laura Beth Vulpan,” Jessie said with a glowing smile, putting her paw on her very pregnant belly. “She’s going to be in so much danger of being spoiled!”

“Oh, she will be,” Winston laughed. “I do so love to dote on grandkids. If only we had some!”

“Three fully grown boys, and not a single baby yet,” Abigail sighed. “You’d think we’d at least have one child by now, even an unplanned child out of wedlock! But no, I had to raise my boys with manners and decency. It’s biting my tail now. I should have raised three lascivious boors, like Charlie.”

Kit wasn't the only one that laughed.

"Dovey, Charlie hasn't managed a child yet either."

"At least he tries," Abigail declared, which made Jessie almost choke on her grape juice.

"Are you going to be present at the birth, Hannah, John?" Abigail asked.

"I'm not sure if I can manage it," John answered. "I'm the English department chair, and that makes me a very busy male when school's in session. I used up my vacation time in the spring to go on a cruise Vil gave us for Christmas. Hannah will certainly be there."

"We have a spare bedroom ready for you, Hannah," Kit told her.

"I'll certainly come down on weekends, and if Jessica's labor falls the right way, I might be able to call off for one day and rush down before she delivers."

"We'll make sure that happens, John," Winston declared. "I'll have our jet sent to Cincinnati and standing by at all times. You just run straight to the airport and jump on and it'll bring you to Austin in a jif."

"That's very kind of you, but you don't need to go to that trouble."

"One can never go to any trouble when helping family," Winston declared immediately. "We certainly won't be using it, so why not put it where it can do the most good?"

"Well, when you say it like that, I'd look awfully ungrateful to say no," John chuckled.

"Good, good!" Winston beamed.

Winston's declaration seemed to say a great deal about the Brightons. They were as unlike the Vulpans as possible, it seemed. No Vulpan would offer a private jet to an in-law, whose contribution to the Vulpan family began and ended with the son or daughter they provided to the Vulpans for marriage. The concept of helping one another didn't really exist in their family. Each family was an individual cell, an internal, private domain, and those domains rarely crossed each other. Oh, they saw each other at work, visited each other in social calls from time to time, but there was no intimacy, no feeling of togetherness. The Brightons were diametrically opposed to that concept. They saw the entire family as their family, even the in-laws, and were quick to offer help as much as they were quick to intertwine themselves into the lives of their new in-laws. Kit had no doubt that Abigail would spend some time with all the Vulpans, not just Kit, working her way through the family to get to know them and make it clear that the Vulpans were now part of the Brightons, just as the Brightons were part of the Vulpans.

Kit saw some potential issues there. The elder Vulpans would not take kindly to Abigail's attempt to get to know them. Some in-laws in his family had never even met members of the Vulpan family, because they weren't directly involved. The Leeks had never met many of the children of the other elders, and Kit knew for a fact that the Gugenheims kept their distance from the entire Vulpan family except for Zach and his kids. His mother's family, the Stocktons, had complete divorced themselves from the entire Vulpan family, abandoning Kit and Vil to their father after their mother died. The Vulpans weren't accustomed to friendliness or generosity, would see an in-law's attempt to get to know the family to be a hostile act, an invasion of privacy or an attempt to schmooze their way into Vulpan money, and Abigail's very generous and sincere attempt to get to know her new in-laws would be seen as nosiness or downright rudeness. Abigail needed to be ready for it, to understand that the Vulpans were like no family she had ever encountered before, and he made a note to himself to pull her aside and have a very frank talk with her before she started doing that. He didn't want to see her get hurt because his family mistook her honest curiosity about the family and her desire to get to know them, be friends with them, was treated with a cold shoulder and an icy stare by his family.

Kit was somewhat amazed that the Brightons, who were considered one of the ten richest families in Britain and like the Vulpans measured their total wealth in the billions, were so untouched by the curse of their money. They were tight-knit, kind, and generous to each other, they cared about their family members. Had Kit not known who they were, he'd never have guessed that they were billionaires. True, they wore elegant and custom tailored clothes, Winston wore a Rolex watch and Abigail wore diamond earrings that had to be worth at least fifty thousand dollars, but their manner was much, much different from their appearance. As the conversation between the three older couples and Jessie continued, Kit observed Winston and Abigail Brighton with a calculating eye and a careful ear, listening not just to their words, but to their inflection, their demeanor, listening for any hint that they were something other than what they appeared to be...but he found nothing. Abigail had quite effectively charmed Jessie to the point where she started calling Abigail "Mum," and she had to be one of the kindest vixens he'd met, as well as being shockingly earthy and easy to like. She was a rich femme, but she didn't act rich, she acted like a middle-class housewife, all chatty and with a wickedly funny sense of humor. She told bawdy jokes that made Hannah's cheeks threaten to ruffle, then mortified Jessie by mentioning that she should have a camera there recording the birth, and she meant recording the birth.

Kit erupted into laughter at the mention of that. Shy, modest Jessie, allowing a camera to record parts of her body that only Kit and her parents had ever seen?

“What’s the matter, dear?” Abigail asked in sincere confusion when Jessie’s entire face and even her tail frizzed.

“Abby, Jessica is a very modest young lady,” Hannah said delicately.

“Oh, is that all? I can tell just by looking at you that you’re quite a dish when not pregnant, ducky, and sexy girls shouldn’t be afraid to show why they’re so sexy!”

“I could never do that,” Jessie said, the fur on her neck threatening to stand up.

“Well, I hope you’re not quite so modest when alone with your husband,” she winked.

Jessie laughed ruefully, and Kit patted her on the leg. “Oh, no, that’s not a problem,” he assured her. “Once I get her alone, she’s very bold. She just doesn’t like being bold for an audience, that’s all. Now, if I was the one doing the taping, and I was the only one who’d ever see the tape, she’d let me tape the birth.”

“Kiiiiit!” she protested, elbowing him.

“Well, that’s only healthy,” Abigail smiled, then she suddenly yawned. “I think it’s about time for us to retire, dear,” she told Winston. “We’ve had a very long and eventful day.”

Winston glanced at his watch. “Is that the time? Dear me,” he said in surprise. “It’s nearly ten! We’ve been sitting here whiling away three hours!

And I've been up since four. Yes, I think it's about time for bed, dovey."

"We should be turnin' in ourselves, we have to be up in the mornin' to head back."

"It's a private jet, so at least there's no schedule," Jessie consoled them.

"We're on enough of a schedule. Vil's bought all of us tickets to watch Ben play, and we're gonna go," Rick answered. "She chartered an outside company to get a jet big enough for everyone. She rented an airliner," Rick said with a chuckle. "We're all goin' to lay over to watch Ben play tomorrow, then we'll be headin' home on the jet while Vil and Kendall fly off to Florida in Vil's private jet. She said she and Ken are leavin' much earlier. They're takin' Ben to Columbus, cause he has to be there by nine."

"I feel rotten that I won't be there," Jessie complained.

"Well, we'll be watching it on the big TV, and we'll be there in spirit," Kit consoled. "Are you going with Vil or going later?" he asked John and Hannah.

"We're going with them," Hannah answered. "Vil said a car will be taking us to the airport at six, so we'll be up and gone before you wake up."

"I feel out of the loop. So many here, all these plans and I don't know about them," Kit laughed.

Quite a few kisses and pawshakes were spread through the room as the four couples said their goodnights, and Kit and Jessie retired to the master bedroom. Kit spent quite a long time massaging Jessie's shoulders and back, which had begun to start aching because of all the extra weight she was carrying, before they slipped into bed with the alarm set so they could be up to see everyone off, including Jessie's family. "Well, this has certainly been exciting," Jessie giggled as she snuggled up with him. "Vil married, your family coming together, and it looks like we'll be home before I deliver."

"Thank God," Kit breathed. "I really, really didn't want Laura born in this house. I didn't want her starting out with a black mark on her."

"Tosh, you were born here. Right here in this very room," she giggled, giving him a gentle squeeze.

"Exactly," Kit said seriously.

"Well, I wouldn't have minded. As long as she's healthy and happy, she can be born in the back seat of a taxi in Mexico."

"I can arrange that."

"Don't you dare!" she giggled. "I'll have to punish you."

"Oooh, let's talk about that. Maybe I can negotiate a fun punishment."

"Then it wouldn't be a punishment!" she laughed, kissing him playfully on the muzzle.

They were up at 5:30, and they were all but running from the moment Darla, the night maid, called them to wake them up.

Jessie's family was already up and eating a light breakfast in the small dining room while the staff packed their belongings in the limo. Vil and Kendall were already at Stonebrook, and they had joined the Williams at the breakfast table. Kendall and Jenny almost looked hung over, but Ben was energetic and anxious, more than ready for his first college football game, unable to sit still and picking at his omelet rather than eating it.

“Well, this is it, your last taste of being waited on paw and foot,” Kit teased as he sat down, and Sally put a plate filled with scrambled eggs, sausage, and wheat toast in front of him. “Thanks, Sal,” he nodded.

“I know where I’m coming when I want to visit,” John chuckled.

“Stonebrook will always be open to you, guys,” Kit said seriously. “Even if we’re not here. You show up at the gates, they’ll let you in and treat you right.”

“Well, now I know where to hide once I become a wanted felon,” Jenny said, yawning.

“At least until they put a reward on you. When your hide is worth more to someone else than it is to you, you have problems,” Kit teased.

“I hope I can sleep on the plane.”

“I have a bed in my plane, Jen,” Vil assured her. “I think I can rent it to you for, say, twenty dollars an hour.”

“What?” she gasped, and when she saw the sly look on Vil’s face, she laughed. “Can I pay you in pennies? I’ll mail you a penny a year until the bill is paid.”

“I’ll take it out of your next allowance,” Vil grinned. “With fifty thousand percent interest, compounded hourly.”

“No fair using imaginary numbers!” Jenny protested, which made Kit laugh.

“Big numbers aren’t imaginary,” Kendall piled on.

“I’ll sell you a naked picture of me instead,” Jenny retorted. “That way if you and Vil don’t work out, I can snag myself a rich husband!”

“Jennifer,” Hannah warned over Kendall’s bright laughter.

“Well, if you want a husband, I think I can find you one,” Kendall grinned, putting his chin on his paw on the table and regarding her with slightly malevolently amused eyes. “I happen to know a couple of rather well-off young chaps that would be overjoyed to have a pretty little thing like you on their arms.”

“And what’s the catch?”

“One is ugly as sin, one has a fair number of rather offensive habits, and the other one thinks that cereal boxes talk to him and tell him to wash his paws, which he does so often he’s rubbed the fur off his paws.”

“Well, which one is best in bed?” she asked.

“Jennifer Ophelia Williams!” Hannah barked, which made Jenny laugh.

“I couldn’t tell you that, but one of them is, ah, rather generously imparted.”

“I hope he’s not the ugly one.”

“It was his compensation for his face,” Kendall said gravely, which made Jessie’s face frizz even as she started to giggle. “I’m sure if you just close your eyes or do it with the lights off, you could always pretend.”

“Kendall Brighton!” Hannah said, shocked.

“What? If she’s old enough to ask, she’s old enough to hear the answer,” he said grandly.

“I knew it was a mistake to marry into this family,” Hannah said crossly, which made Vil and Kit grin at her.

“We love you too, Hannah,” Vil told her.

“Is it time to go yet?” Ben asked impatiently.

“As soon as you finish eating,” John told him. “You need your energy today, son.”

Ben looked at his plate and sighed. “I just can’t eat. I’m too nervous.”

“You’ll feel much better if you do,” Vil told him. “Eat, Ben.”

Winston and Abigail entered the dining room with Frannie and Bartholomew behind them, carrying breakfast trays for them. “Morning Mum, morning old male,” Kendall greeted.

“Morning, morning,” Winston smiled as he sat down beside John. “Did you sleep well, Ben?”

“Not really,” he said with a rueful chuckle. “I’m too excited and nervous.”

“Just the first game butterflies, son,” Abigail told him. “Harry played football too. Soccer I think you call it,” she corrected. “He didn’t sleep at all the night before his first game.”

“He any good?” John asked.

“Harry? Yeah, he was a damn fine goalie,” Kendall answered. “Had a knack for guessing where they’d shoot and was always there to make the save, said he could tell which way they’d shoot from the set of their knees and the curl of their tails just before they kicked. He was the last goalie anyone wanted to try a penalty shot against. He could have easily gone pro.”

“He almost did, but decided to work for the company instead,” Winston chuckled. “I’d have loved to see him in Manchester United.”

“He hates Manchester,” Kendall snorted. “Maybe that’s why he backed out and went into the business.”

“This is why you should never have a split family,” Abigail sighed to Hannah. “Winston, Harry, and Michael all support different teams. It’s like a civil war when they play each other.”

“The only failing in my sons,” Winston grunted. “I don’t know where I went wrong.”

“They think you’re daft,” Kendall chuckled.

“Oh, I could understand that,” Hannah said, giving John a sly look. “Had Kit been a Pittsburgh or Cleveland fan, there might have been more than one cat in this family opposing the marriage.”

“I would not have objected if he was a Browns fan!” John protested. “I’d have doubted his intelligence and character, but I wouldn’t have prevented the wedding.”

“I wouldn’t have felt very welcome in your house,” Kit laughed.

Ben finally began to eat, and Vil was true to her word. As soon as he was done, she announced that it was time for them to go. “We have to get Ben to the stadium before nine,” she explained once again to Winston and Abigail. “And it’s about two hours or so to Columbus from here.”

“Yes! Let’s go!” Ben said with uncharacteristic enthusiasm, his voice almost trembling in excitement.

“Yes, that’s why we got up early, so we could see you off, ducky,” Abigail told him.

“Everything ready, Bart?” Vil asked.

“Everything is packed and ready to go, Mistress Vil,” he answered immediately. “I have tea and scones in the limo and the jet is standing by at Logan.”

“Alright, let’s get this show on the road,” Vil declared.

Kit and Jessie walked with them down to the garage, and they hugged and shook paws all around. “We’ll tell you as soon as we know when we’ll be back home, Hannah, and we’ll have a room ready for you.”

“Good,” she said. “It’s not that I don’t trust Jessica, but I’d like to be there both for the birth and for a couple of weeks afterward, to help her settle into the routine of caring for an infant. It’s not as easy as she thinks it will be.”

“I’m sure she’ll be overjoyed to have you helping,” Kit chuckled. “So will I at two in the morning.”

“I certainly would have loved my mother to be there to help me when I had Jessica. I thought I was ready to care for a baby, at least until I had one.”

Kit laughed. “Like I said, we’ll be overjoyed to have you there to help us get the hang of it.” He smiled at her. “And we’ll put you in the furthest bedroom from ours, so you don’t hear anything.”

She gave him a look, then laughed ruefully. “Such a silly boy,” she teased. “I’m all but consigned to the fact that you’re married, Kit. I’m certain that you’ve figured that part of your life out, else you wouldn’t be having a baby.”

He laughed and kissed her on the cheek.

Kit and Jessie didn’t go with them to the airport. They instead stood in the courtyard in the warm summer dawn and waved as the limo pulled away, carrying the first wave of what would be an invasion of Columbus by the extended family and friends of the Vulpans. Stanley came out to them just as it pulled out, yawning and looking drawn and exhausted, but smiling a warm, glowing smile. “I’m so sorry I wasn’t up to see them off,” he apologized. “But after the reception....”

“I’m glad you finally slept,” Kit chuckled. “How long were you up?”

“About fifty hours. But I had to make sure everything was perfect for Mistress Vil’s reception.

“Well, it was perfect, Stanley,” Jessie assured him. “It was beautiful, and everything was just right.”

“I’m so glad,” he sighed sincerely. “But now comes putting the manor back together, so the staff has a couple of very busy days ahead. I’m taking this opportunity to do a little minor work about the manor. I’ll have a couple of rooms repainted, and the curtains in the west wing master bedroom need replacing. I about died of embarrassment when Master Rick and Mistress Martha took the room before I could get them replaced.”

“I don’t think they even noticed that they’re old, Stan,” Jessie giggled.

“Well, I know, and that’s enough,” he said simply.

“What’s the word on them filling in that tunnel?”

“They will be here today to begin work on it,” he answered immediately. “They will fill in the room and pipe leading out of the tunnel with cement, leaving the rest of the tunnel intact and unreachable from anywhere but the inside. I’ll also have them survey the tunnel and mark it above ground so I know where it is. If there’s any sagging or unusual ground movement over the tunnel, I might have to have the grounds excavated and the tunnel either filled in or repaired.”

“I’d rather just leave it as is unless it collapses,” Kit said. “This may sound weird, but it’s part of the manor, and I’d like to leave it be.”

“I certainly understand that sentiment, Master Kit,” he nodded. “I’ll have a buffet style breakfast prepared for our guests and laid out in the small dining room. According to the day’s schedule, they’re due to be up in about half an hour, so they can prepare to leave.”

“Sounds like a good idea,” he agreed.

Kit ran into Nick and Sylvia as they went back into the house. “Mornin’,” Nick smiled.

“How did it go with the guards?”

“Smooth as silk,” he answered. “The Valiant furs did their jobs well, and we had no incidents except for one fender bender out on the road. One limo backed into another,” he chuckled. “I’ve paid up my mates who came to help with the reception, and most of them left yesterday afternoon to go on to other jobs.”

“I hope they had a good time,” Jessie said.

“They had a ball,” Nick laughed. “They got to more or less showcase themselves to some very rich furs, who just might give them a call when they need some extra security. A merc never passes up the chance to make contacts, and yesterday was a gold mine of contacts, both with clients and with each other.”

“Good, I like to see friends get along in the world,” Kit declared. “Sylvia, where did you get that dress you had on yesterday?”

“I’ve had it a while, Herr Kit,” she answered.

“It was very lovely. I’m still wondering where you were hiding the pistols,” he winked.

Sylvia laughed, Jessie elbowed him lightly in the ribs, and Nick just grinned. “If I told you, I’d have to kill you, Herr Kit,” she said seriously. “And if I showed you, then I’m certain that Fraulein Jessie would kill us both.”

Jessie giggled at that, but dug her claws just a little into his arm, as if to support that observation, which made the two mercs laugh richly. “We do need to talk a little business, Nick,” Kit said as they walked along the halls. “Now that it looks like things are going to settle down, I’d like to break our imprisonment and take Jessie out before we go home, show her a little New England.”

“No worries, mate, we can arrange it,” Nick nodded. “Just tell us where we’re going and when, and I’ll make sure it’s a safe journey.”

“Well, we were talking about going to Maine next weekend with Suzy, to go up and see Corey,” Jessie ventured.

“We’ll talk to Suzy and set it up,” Nick assured them. “We’ll make sure you’re safe as can be, yet still get to see everything and have fun.”

“Sounds good to me, Nick,” Jessie said. “Umm, can you do me a favor and put the trap launcher back up? I think I’d like to shoot some trap this afternoon, after the game. Everyone will be gone by then, and it’ll be back to the routine.”

“I’ll take care of it, dove,” he nodded in reply. “You still have my K eighty, right?”

“Up in our room,” she answered. “Your, um, other one is up there too.”

“And it’s going to stay there,” he said simply. “And Kit, after your guests all leave, I’d like to see you back in the holster.”

“Aww, I hate that thing,” he protested.

“We’re safer, but not safe,” he said seriously. “When things look better is when too many make the mistake of relaxing, and that gets furs dead. You’ll be wearing that holster until the day you go back to Texas, and if I have my way, you’ll be carrying it there too.”

“I can’t, I don’t have a license, and Texas isn’t Massachusetts. The cops up here wouldn’t dare arrest me for carrying a concealed weapon, but Texas cops aren’t owned by my family.”

“Kit, Kit, Kit,” Nick sighed with a chuckle. “You’re thinking like a normal fox. I talked to Miss Vil, and she made some calls. I already have both yours and Jessie’s Texas concealed carry licenses, as well as a special federal exemption for any illegal weaponry you two may own. You’re now officially licensed firearms collectors with a special government exemption,” he said, dittoing with his fingers. “And with that special exemption, you have the legal right to buy and own certain weapons that are considered illegal to everyone else, because you only collect them, you don't actually use them," he winked. "You being a collector even lets you buy illegal weapons from makers legally at list price, not what we pay for them under the table," he chuckled. "But a collector can only legally buy one, and only once in your life. At least legally."

"Gun companies sell guns illegally?" Jessie asked.

"They do," Sylvia nodded. "They charge twice what the gun is worth, but I can buy nearly any weapon from any maker, and you will never find any paperwork that shows that I did. It just comes down to knowing who to contact within the companies, Fraulein Jessie. Know the right number to call, and you can buy anything."

"Wow," she breathed.

"I've told you many times, pretty kitty, the rules are different for the rich," Kit told her. "You don't think that Vil couldn't buy military grade weapons if she wanted them? Hell, if she really wanted to, she could build her own private navy. She does run a shipyard," he chuckled.

"That's a scary thought," Jessie said. "Steve could have bought machine guns for the Paladins, because he's a Vulpan and would be able to do it."

"He could have," Nick agreed honestly. "And I'd bet that he has, though they didn't bring them here. Guess they didn't think they'd need them. But take it from me, dove, buying one machine gun is easy, but buying a crate of machine guns is an entirely different animal. The gun makers tend to look the other way until you start to order larger numbers of weapons, then they start getting curious. And when they get curious, the governments get wind of it and they start looking into why someone is amassing an arsenal within their borders. If Steve was arming the Paladins, he had to be very careful about it and do it very slowly. Not even being a Vulpan would have hidden what he was doing for long if he moved too fast. That's how gangbangers out in the big cities can get their paws on Mac tens and Uzis, a single disgruntled male can track down a used submachine gun, but you don't see the separatist militias all sporting around assault weapons. It's all about numbers."

"One at a time," Sylvia nodded. "Never buy more than one at a time."

Allison was the first one they met. She came down the back stairs and into the kitchen as they entered it, yawning while wearing a rather skimpy pair of panties and a tank top shirt that only went to her ribcage that read Bad Girl. Nick stopped to admire Allison's very svelte form. "Oh, sorry, I just came down for some coffee," she said, seeing them.

"Love, come down like that anytime," Nick grinned, looking her up and down boldly.

"Ally, the phones up in your room are there for a reason," Kit chuckled. "Call and have it brought up next time. That will save you from being drooled over by certain wolves."

"Look all you want. Never touch," she said dismissively as a slightly disapproving-looking Frannie handed Allison a cup of coffee, who obviously knew how she liked it. "Thank you. I'll go back to my room now and get dressed."

"That might be a good idea, dear," Frannie said in a slightly stern tone.

Allison padded back into the hall leading to the back stairs, which led more or less right to her door. Hers was the closest bedroom to those stairs. Nick couldn't resist watching her pad out, and his eyes were locked on her very shapely backside and her thick-furred, luxuriantly bushy tail that swayed from side to side as she walked. "I do love the perks of this assignment," he said, which earned him a jab from Sylvia.

"I'm about to give you an assignment, wolf," she grated.

"Why Sylvie, dove, are you jealous?" he teased.

"Disappointed. You spend all that time chasing me, then drop me like a cold fish? Now you have to start all over again."

"But it's the chase that's fun. After I catch you, then what? You're a bit too dangerous to keep."

She gave him a cool stare which made Jessie burst into a fit of giggling.

Allison was the first up, but she wasn't alone long. Rick and Martha came down a few minutes later, and others quickly filed suit. They'd all been awakened by the staff so they could eat before leaving. Kit and Jessie stayed with them and had their last visit, because the limos were being loaded and everyone was going to leave as soon as they finished breakfast. Kit and Jessie stayed as close to them as possible, mainly because both of them had felt like they were home with the gang there, and Lupe and the neighbors, and Sheila and Allison, and now they were all going back home, and they'd be more or less alone again, with nothing but the house, the staff, and Muffy. Not that the staff and Muffy weren't good company, but they weren't home the way the Austin furs were. Rick and Martha and the others were a tactile sense of what they'd left behind, lazy afternoons sitting on the deck, Sunday poker, date night, the sorority girls over to cook and gossip, the occasional trip in the plane, all the things that made Austin their home. All that was leaving in just a little while, and both of them wanted to cling to it as long as possible before it was gone.

But, they could only make it last so long before everyone had eaten, and it was time. They escorted them out to the courtyard, where five limousines were arrayed and waiting to take them to Logan, where a privately chartered Boeing airliner would take them first to Columbus to see Ben play, and then take them on home to Austin. Jessie was hugged almost every time she turned around, and Kit shook quite a few paws and kissed several cheeks. “Be good now, dear,” Martha told him as she kissed his cheek, and then he shook Rick’s paw, then was surprised by a hug from Allison. Terry was going to meet them at the airport and attend the game, then fly back to New Orleans with Bess and the boys to get back to work.

“We miss you two very much,” she said in her usual calm manner. “I hope you’ll be home before Jessie delivers.”

“Believe me, I do too,” he said fervently. “The last thing I want is for Laura to be born in this house.”

“Aww, come on, don’t you want half the family to die of outrage?” Sheila grinned, nudging him.

“Your mother would be one of them.”

“She needs more excitement in her life anyway. Me and Ally took care of some of that. We left a DVD in her limo that had some pictures on it.”

“Pictures?”

“Oh yes, I forgot about those,” Allison hummed. “Charlie was very happy to do us a favor, and Janet lent me here camera with no questions asked.”

“Like I said, pictures,” Sheila winked, which made Kit laugh helplessly.

“You’re awful!”

“Thank you. I try.”

“We’ll be back here tomorrow to see you, then we’ll be returning to Britain so we can arrange to come back for your delivery, dear,” Abigail told them as she hugged Jessie and kissed her on the cheek.

“You’re going to go watch the game?”

“Yes, Vil talked us into it,” Harry said, shaking Kit’s paw. “We’ll see how well your brother plays, Jess, then we’ll be stopping by here tomorrow afternoon for dinner before we head back home the next morning. We’ll be staying over at Hart’s Crossing, I think your staff could use a break.”

Kit chuckled. “I’m sure all of them but Stanley would agree with you,” he nodded.

“Vil even bought us replicas of your brother’s jersey to wear, dove,” Winston proclaimed as he hugged and kissed Jessie.

“We’re getting the old male into jeans and a jersey,” Michael grinned.

“It’s not like I haven’t worn them before,” he harrumphed in reply. “I’ll just need someone to explain the rules of American football during the game, so I don’t look like an idiot jumping up and cheering the wrong team or something.”

“You’ll be sitting smack dab in the middle of Ohio State fans, Winston,” Jessie giggled. “When you see the ones in red cheer, you cheer too. It’s that easy!”

“See, she sums up in five seconds what you lot tried to explain in two hours, and poorly!” Winston declared, pointing at Michael and Charlie. “And mind you, boy, that I was onto your little game about throwing beer cups!”

“I guess he really isn’t as gullible as he looks,” Charlie noted to Michael, who laughed.

And before he knew it, they were gone. Kit and Jessie stood in the courtyard with a hastily awakened Muffy and waved to the limos as they drove around the house and out of sight, and then it was back to the bizarre circumstances that approached normal for them since coming to Boston almost in the blink of an eye. “Well, there they go,” Jessie sighed. “And we’re alone again.”

“What am I? Thumbelina?” Muffy protested.

“You’re alone with us, Muffy,” Jessie told her, putting her arm around her shoulders. “Back to our own private little world, I suppose.”

“Not so much now,” Kit said. “We’re going to Maine next weekend, and we will go out now,” he declared. “I’m not hiding in the manor anymore. Nick and the others will have plenty of time to make the arrangements so we’re safe, but we will go out, and we will have a life again.”

“Easily done, mate,” Nick assured them, as he and Sylvia stood behind them. “Just say where and when, and it’ll happen.”

“How about tomorrow, and to the mall?” Jessie asked. “I want to buy a wedding present for Vil.”

“Doable,” he nodded. “How about after lunch?”

“Sounds good to me,” Jessie nodded to him. “You know, I barely had a chance to talk to Sam or Kevin. It was almost like they were avoiding everyone.”

“I know, they did seem to stay to themselves,” Kit said with a nod. “I hope everything’s okay with them.”

“I’ll call Sam tonight,” Jessie noted to herself.

“Stan,” Kit called over the phone, “They’re gone, and everyone did fantastic. Everyone take the rest of the day off.”

“But Master Kit!” Stanley objected. “There are things to do! Things to put back to normal!”

“They can wait until tomorrow,” he said firmly. “Everyone worked very hard, and they deserve a little rest. So everyone take the rest of the day off, and that includes you, Stan,” he said adamantly, which made Jessie giggle. “And we’ll have none of that servant’s hours crap, either. The manor is on holiday. If anyone’s going out, you can buzz in and out from the manor, so that means you take the day off too, Oscar.”

It was almost something of a let down to have everyone in the manor, and then have it empty, even empty of the servants since most of the staff vacated to take advantage of the surprise time off. The place felt empty and foreboding again, nothing but silence and the occasional distant sound of a servant that didn’t go out and was partaking of the amenities the manor offered. The mass departure of friends and family had returned Stonebrook to the feel of a cold, uninviting hotel where they were only barely tolerated by the old ghosts that called the manor home. But, they had things to do to occupy themselves. While Nick put the trap launcher back up, Jessie sat down for a while to take the stress off her back and Muffy got ready to go back to school. She'd already missed two weeks of the start of the semester at Yale, and had been doing her homework and getting notes from the professors of the classes where she intended to show up, and after Kit and Jessie went home, she'd be returning to Connecticut to attend classes. She was honoring her word to stay with Jessie until she went home, and she wasn't about to go back on it. Kit wrote quite a few thank-you emails to friends and family and sent them off, then he started making a few discreet calls around Austin, looking at a few potential business opportunities he'd been noticing around town.

Since the staff had been released for the day and Jessie was resting her back, Kit did the cooking for both lunch, and intended to also cook dinner. It felt rather nice to have the big kitchen to himself as he broiled up some salmon for his hungry wife and cousin, and made some of Jessie's specialty spiced potatoes and sirloin tips, and set out the makings for pork chops, cheese-baked potato chunks which was another Williams recipe he'd learned, vegetable medley, salad, and he was even going to bake a German chocolate cake for dessert. Muffy was rather surprised that Kit could cook, her eyes widening as she tried each course and amazed to find that it tasted good.

"I knew how to cook before I met Jess, but she trained me up to where she likes my cooking," Kit grinned at her.

"It didn't take much," she smiled in reply.

After lunch, it was time. They retired to the theatre room along with Clancy, Stanley, Bartholomew, Dee, Luann, and Maxine's children, Leonard, Wendy, and Kate, and they all watched the game. Ohio State against West Virginia University, at 3:30pm, piped in off DirecTV using the College Game Day package which Stanley had ordered specifically for them, for this one game. One of the advantages of a huge manor like Stonebrook was that it had cable and DirecTV, and each one had absolutely everything that each had to offer outside of pay per view. Kit and Jessie settled in wearing Ben's jerseys, with a big bowl of popcorn on the stand between their stadium seats.

Leonard, Wendy, and Kate were a bit quiet as they sat with the others, but Jessie did her best to make them open up a little. Muffy helped her, engaging her cousins in conversation and then smoothly involving Jessie into it. Jessie wanted to be a school teacher, and Kit knew that she knew how to talk to kids, and she more than proved it. Within 15 minutes, Kate and Wendy were babbling away with her, but Leonard, the oldest of the minors still living with Maxine, was much more distant and reserved.

And the game was momentous in ways that Kit saw would impact the rest of their lives, for early in the first quarter, after only his fifth play from scrimmage, Chris Wells, all-star running back for Ohio State, went down with a very broken leg. The replay was grisly, the leg could literally be seen snapping, and flopping wildly as he went down. Just like that, Ben Williams, true freshman, was suddenly the starting running back.

And Ben was amazing! The sudden injury to Wells seemed to bring out the very best in Ben. Ben was tall, lithe, and sleek, but he was also as strong as a bull ox, and that combination of power, speed, and agility was just devastating. Kit saw Ben run absolutely wild all over West Virginia's defense, not once being tackled for a loss, moving like a dancer behind the line, then exploding into the linebackers and knocking them literally on their butts on his way to the secondary, where the smaller, faster cornerbacks and safeties had to find a way to tackle someone bigger, stronger, and just as fast as they were. The only way they could bring him down was to cheat, to grab his armored tail sheath, which all football players wore to protect their tails in the rugged game, which was a 15 yard penalty in college football. The tail sheath was a sleeve that went over the tail made of kevlar and aluminum ribbing and stiff joints to provide stiff resistance if they landed on their tails, else a football player would be breaking his tail almost every game...and even with the sheath, tail fractures were the most common injury in football. Some football players had their tails wrapped around their waists and tied down like a belt under their uniforms, and others went to the extreme of having their tails amputated to rob defenders of a potential pawhold, but Ben's long tail flowed behind him almost defiantly in its armored sheath, a taunting symbol to the defense that he was long past them and on his way to a big gain.

Thanks to Ben's domination of the ground, it was a rout. Ohio State beat West Virginia 35-7 because Ohio State absolutely dominated time of possession, keeping Pat White and the West Virginia offense off the field. Ben gained a very impressive 163 yards in 28 carries, his longest a 56 yard race down the sideline only to be tackled at the three yard line, and included two rushing touchdowns, four pass receptions, and he even recovered a fumble by his quarterback when he fumbled the snap. If Ben ever needed to have a breakout, look-at-me kind of game, it was that game, and he'd played his best at exactly the right time. Kit had no doubt that Ben's name would be all over ESPN tonight, and there were going to be highlights all over sports all week.

“Wow, your brother Ben is good, Jessie!” Wendy gushed after the game was over.

“I thought he was cute,” Kate said girlishly, “even though he’s not a fox!”

“I think he just became their permanent starter,” Kit chuckled. “I don’t think Wells will win the job back after his leg heals. Not if Ben keeps playing like that every week. They’d be insane to take him out of the starter spot.”

“Yeah!” Jessie giggled. “We gotta call him and congratulate him!”

She did just that. She put the phone on speaker so all of them could hear, and she congratulated him in glowing praise after getting him on the phone, hearing him in his locker room with his teammates whooping and calling in the background, and then it became suddenly quiet. “Vil’s in the locker room!” Ben said with a nervous laugh. “There were guys in the shower, and they walked out naked to look her in the face!”

“Well, she’s married now, so I think she can manage it,” Kit laughed.

“Tell her to get some pictures of those hunky football players out of their jockstraps!” Muffy called, which made Jessie break out into fits of giggling.

Kit could barely hear her in the background. “You played a fantastic game, Ben,” she told him. “I’m glad I could be here to see it!”

“I’m talkin’ to sis and Kit right now, they watched me on TV,” he told her.

“I hope they got it on Tivo!” she said.

“We did!” Jessie called. “We got it all, and we’ll make a few DVDs if she wants them.”

When Ben repeated that, she laughed. “I had Will record the game for me, but thanks for the offer. We’ll be on our way now, Ben. A week in Florida, a week in Europe. I’m looking forward to it,” she chuckled. “So you be good, and keep playing hard.”

“I will. Thanks for coming, Vil.”

“For my brother-in-law? Any time,” she answered.

“Okay, she’s gone,” Ben said almost conspiratorially into the phone, which made all three of them laugh.

“You played really good, Ben!” Kate gushed.

“Who’s that there?”

“Ben, that’s Kate, my youngest cousin,” Kit introduced.

“Oh. Hi Kate! I’m sorry I didn’t meet you at the wedding, but there were so many furs everywhere!”

“That’s okay, Mom kept us away from you and Jessie,” Wendy laughed. “I’m Wendy.”

“And I’m Lenny,” Leonard introduced.

“Nice to meet all of you, and thank you for watching!” Ben said modestly. “I hope you liked the game.”

“Liked it? I loved it!” Wendy beamed. “Vulpan girls like football, Ben, and you’re good!”

“I’ve noticed that Vulpan girls like football,” Ben laughed. “Your cousins Sheila, Muffy, Bess, and Mary like football too. We talked about it during the wedding,” he continued.

“Just another sign of our superiority over other femmes,” Muffy said loftily.

“Suuuure,” Ben drawled.

“When’s your next game, Ben?” Muffy asked.

“Next Saturday, but it’s on the road. We play Pitt at one o’clock, then we play Michigan State at home the week after. Then we start conference play after that.”

“Isn’t that the big rivalry?”

“No, that’s the last game of the season, and it’s Michigan, not Michigan State. We’re already preparing for it,” he laughed. “A bowl, heck, even the national championship isn’t as important as beating Michigan. Coach said if we only won one game all year, as long as that one win was against Michigan, then it was a winning season.”

“Sounds like Harvard and Yale,” Muffy giggled.

“Or Army and Navy,” Kit agreed.

“Ooh, I hope I can get Mom to get the game on TV for us!” Wendy said excitedly.

“I’m pretty sure you could, Wendy,” Jessie nodded.

“Umm, can you send me a copy of the game? I want to see it without an audience, to make sure I didn’t look like an idiot out there,” he said nervously.

Jessie laughed. “Brother, you were amazing! You’re gonna play in the NFL, Ben, mark my words!”

“I have to get there first,” he said ruefully. “But thanks sis. Uh oh, Coach is calling us, I gotta go.”

“Good luck, cousin-in-law!” Muffy called.

“Great game, Ben, talk to you later,” Kit added.

“I’ll call you tonight,” Jessie promised.

“Thanks guys. Talk to you later, gotta go. Bye-bye.”

“That’s the most modest male I’ve ever met,” Muffy laughed. “He thought he looked like an idiot out there? He ran the other team into the ground!”

“He’s cute!” Kate repeated.

“That’s why he’s so special,” Jessie said simply. “My brother’s the sweetest male you’ve ever met, Muffy. He’s gonna make some girl deliriously happy someday.”

“Sheila’s still trying to be that girl,” Kit laughed.

“She’ll never pull that off. Ben’s a sweetheart, but he’s not dumb,” Jessie declared. “He’ll never fall for her so long as she’s, well, Sheila.”

“You know, it’s weird. The big burly ones are often the ones who are sweet. I guess they can afford to be. They can clobber anyone who calls them a sissy,” Muffy noted clinically.

Kit and Jessie erupted into a fit of laughter.

After Jessie rested a bit, she went out to shoot trap with Muffy as Kit cooked dinner. Pork chops weren't something he made often, but he knew enough not to give them food poisoning. He got them browned and in a skillet to boil off the water, then got the cheese-baked potato chunks and the German chocolate cake into the ovens. He was cutting up the veggies for the salad when, to his surprise, his aunt Maxine padded into the kitchen. She looked at him with shock for a moment, as he was paws deep in food and he chopped up a cucumber with practiced ease. "Kit," she said with a nod. "I've come for the children."

"I think they're out with Jessie," he answered. "She's shooting trap out on the corner of the lawn."

"I heard the gunshots but didn't see where they were coming from."

"West side, front lawn, down at the edge of the hill." He brushed the cucumbers into a bowl. "How did it go with Graham?"

"He's gone," she said shortly. "His jaw is wired shut, which made it a blessedly quiet affair. He's in San Francisco now, and he's already threatening to sue."

"Sue for what? With what?" Kit snorted.

"He threatened to sue for custody, and is threatening to file for divorce."

"Didn't he even read his prenup?" Kit snorted. "Right there in the first paragraph, there will be no divorce. Let him file, Aunt Maxine. It'll just seal his own fate."

She gave him a curious look. "You are surprisingly...civil, nephew."

“I’m in a good mood,” he shrugged. “By the way, your daughters want to watch Ohio State football games for the rest of the year. I suggest you arrange it or they’ll nag you for half of forever. I think Kate already has a crush on Ben.”

“He played a very good game, and clearly earned the right to start next week,” she said almost automatically, and then her cheeks actually ruffled a bit when Kit gave her a penetrating look. “I watched the game as well,” she admitted. “After hearing so much about Jessica’s brother, I wanted to watch him play. He’s very talented.”

“We’ll agree on that, Maxy,” he nodded as he started chopping up a tomato.

“Why on earth are you doing that?” she asked.

“I gave the staff the day off because they worked so hard on the reception,” he answered. “They deserved it. And I’m not afraid to do for myself, Aunt Maxy.”

“So I see.” Her phone rang, and she quickly took it out. “Hello? Yes.” Kit watched as her eyes seemed to turn haunted for a second, and then she closed them and bowed her head. She closed the phone without another word, then she sighed. “Kit. Steven just died.”

Kit gave her a steady look. “Don’t expect any sorrow from me, Maxine, but thank you for telling me,” he said simply as he brushed the chopped tomato into the bowl. “Was that Uncle Zach?”

“His chief butler,” she answered. “At least he and Alicia reached the hospital with enough time to see him and say goodbye,” she said mournfully. “I should go to him, Kit. Even though you have no reason to love Steven, it's a terrible thing for a parent to lose a child. Imagine how you would feel if you lost Laura. That is what Zach is feeling right now."

That was a fairly good description. Kit would be devastated if Laura somehow died during childbirth or some other tragedy befell them, and in that context, he could understand a portion of what Zach must be feeling. Even though Zach was a rotten fox and his son was just as rotten, Steven was still his son, and Zach had loved him, loved him far more than he'd loved his daughters. Steven was his first born son, his pride and joy, the favored son of his family, and now he was gone. "Then you should go," he told her. "But you can leave the kids here. We'll be glad to have them."

"I...thank you, Kit. If it wouldn't be a burden, can you keep them overnight?"

"I'd be happy to," he said with a nod, putting a bell pepper on the chopping block. "But you really should go see them and break the news, so they don't find out you came and went without even seeing them."

"Yes, of course. Thank you, nephew," she said. And then, to his surprise, she came around the counter, put a paw on his shoulder, and kissed him on the cheek. "I hope we can be civil to each other more in the future."

"Catch me in a good mood, and maybe," he said with a steady look. "But don't ever mistake it for forgiveness."

"Fair enough, nephew. Fair enough."

Chapter 39

The news of the death of Kitstrom Steven Vulpan swept through both the family and the nation like a firestorm.

It was on the cable news channels before it could reach the entire family. Someone in the hospital out in Pennsylvania leaked word to the press that Steven had died against hospital policy, and that worker was quickly looking for another job after Zachary found out that the sad news had hit the press before it even got to Aunt Sarah, that Sarah had heard it over the radio. Stonebrook again, oddly enough, became something of a nexus for the Vulpan family, as calls poured in from the family. With Vil gone on her honeymoon and pointedly keeping herself unavailable to the family, the family turned to Kit to act as the primary figure, and much to his own distaste and annoyance. Steve had tried to kill him and Jessie, and now the cousins, even the elders, were calling him to find out what was going on, where they needed to go, what was going to happen next. The only one that didn't call him was Zachary, and it wasn't like Kit really expected him to do so. Steven had died in a car accident, but he was out there on the road because he tried and failed to assassinate Kit and Jessie. Had Zachary had the nerve to call Kit, odds were he'd have blistered Zach's ear with a vituperous recrimination and gotten himself in very hot water. It was best for Kit to stay very separate from Zach's family right now, even though Travis and Bridgette did call to tell him the grim news.

It was Travis that seemed the most introspective about it. "I don't really know how to feel, cousin," he said over the phone in a strange voice.

“Steve was my brother, but we were never really that close. I was the second son.”

“Always the first to be passed over,” Kit grunted. “Bridgette said much the same thing. Zach never really treated her like anything but a placeholder until Steven was born. Then she was the afterthought.”

“Isn’t that God’s own truth,” Travis said darkly. “Listen. I don’t know if anyone told you this, but I’m sorry. Sorry about Steve, and what happened. I hate that he died, but it wasn’t really your fault. It was just a stupid accident.”

“Thanks, Trav,” Kit said as he took the cup of tea that Jessie offered with a nod. “Are you coming up?”

“No, not yet,” he answered. “I’ll come for the wake, but Dad is...I dunno. He sounded, sounded, I dunno. Weird. It wasn’t like him. Kit, I’d be careful. I think Dad’s about two steps from the cliff.”

Kit did not laugh. Zachary was a very, very dangerous fox, and what Travis was suggesting wasn’t something that Kit thought was impossible. After all, he’d thought that Zach had tried to kill his sister. It turned out that he hadn’t, but now that his precious son was dead, and Kit was fairly sure that he’d find a way to blame Kit for it, Travis’ warning was a viable one. “I’ll warn Nick, and Vil if I can,” he said.

“I can’t get through to her.”

“Neither can I. She’s making it clear that she’s not leaving her honeymoon. She’s sending Zach a message by washing her paws of Steve.”

“He won’t like that.”

“That’s his problem, Trav. This is all his fault.”

“That’s a stretch, Kit.”

“Is it? Zach’s probably the one that brought Steve into the PPC. Bridgette told us Zach’s a member, and so is Alicia. Zach inducts Steve into the PPC, Steve becomes a Paladin, he tries to kill me by ordering the Paladins to do the deed and providing them with information that would have made it very easy for them to do it, then he crashes his car while on the run from Vil after he gets exposed. This traces back to the fact that Zach brought Steve into the PPC. If not for that, none of this would have happened.”

“If you want to paint with that brush, if you’d not have married Jessie, none of this would have happened.”

“True, but the difference there is I acted out of love, while Steve acted out of hate,” he said simply. “Which is the more noble sentiment, Travis?”

Travis was silent a long moment. “I don’t think there’s an answer to that I want to accept,” he said quietly.

“The truth is often hard to accept,” Kit said calmly. “Purism makes no sense if you sit down and look at it with impassive eyes, Travis. Hate rarely makes any sense if you look at it impartially, from the outside rather than the inside. I figured that out when I was twelve, when I was presented with the facts, and didn’t just listen to the sermon.”

“I didn’t call for a philosophical discussion, cousin,” Travis said, a bit stiffly.

“Maybe not, but it’s something for you to think about,” he answered. “Do the others down there know?”

“Yeah. Terry heard it on the television,” Travis said with honest outrage. “Who the hell told the press?”

“It wasn’t any of us, that’s for sure,” Kit said. “Someone at the hospital had to do it.”

“I hope they nail his tail to the wall,” he growled. “Damned vultures.”

“I’ll agree with you there,” Kit hummed. “I’m going to have to go, Trav. Keep in touch.”

“I will.”

Kit hung up the phone and tossed it on the table of the TV room with a grunt. Maxine’s kids were watching TV, and they knew. Maxine had broken the news to them, but it hadn’t had much impact. Being the youngest of the cousins, they didn’t really know some of the older cousins very well. The Vulpans weren’t the only family where cousins separated by large age differences weren’t really too close, since they didn’t have as much in common with each other as cousins their own age. Zach’s family especially had been more pompous than the rest, because after Kit was disowned, Zach was almost certain that he could take control of the family from Kit’s father by taking over the company, and then passing the company to his own son, Steven, after he passed away. Zach had been grooming his kids to be “the royal family” among the Vulpans, the same way Kit’s own family had been, but then all that came crashing down when Dad passed the company to Vil instead of giving it to Zachary.

He could also tell that in the two days that they’d been in Stonebrook, Maxine’s youngest kids were put in an unusual position of having to live around Jessie, who did not simply ignore them. She talked to them, seemed to be very interested in them, and that confused them to no end. Jessie was a mixed breed and they knew it, and he could see the confusion in their eyes when they regarded her. Jessie was not the mixed mongrel that they'd heard about from their parents and their friends, who was supposed to be dumb, belligerent, crude, rude, and inferior. Instead they found themselves dealing with an intelligent, kind, gentle, sweet femme who was virtually impossible not to like, because she was just so nice. She was as much unlike what they expected a mixed to be that it made them uncertain, because, to be simple about it, they had never really met a mixed before, not in an uncontrolled situation where they could say whatever they wanted, and they interacted with the mixed breed in a social situation. The kids were very sheltered, all their friends carefully controlled, and taught to be pompously silent and condescending when in a public setting, like shopping down in Macy's or Nordstrom or some other upscale rich-fur boutique. Kit doubted any of them had ever so much as set foot in a Wal-Mart or a McDonald's before. Just as Kit had had his moment of epiphany in a Burger King, being fed by a kindly mixed who stopped and listened to him, Jessie was, in her own away, assaulting the image of a mixed breed that the kids had in their minds. He couldn't tell if they were changing their minds, but they were certainly facing nothing like what they thought a mixed would be.

“Why do they keep calling me?” he protested.

“Because Vil put you in charge,” Jessie said mildly as Stanley brought in a tray holding tea and three small glasses of wine. Jessie gave Stanley a hard look when he served it to the Vulpan children, but said nothing. She knew that Vulpans started drinking wine before puberty, it was a family tradition, and Maxine's kids weren't hers. She hadn't said much when Sheila or Muffy drank, but Kit could see that it rubbed her fur the wrong way to see 12 year old Kate drinking wine. “When bad things happen, furs are looking for someone to reassure them or tell them what to do. With Vil gone on her honeymoon, that's you now, handsome fox."

"Leading a family I hate. What a world," he grunted, which made Wendy giggle. "Don't start, young lady, or I'll sell you to a Russian circus."

She laughed. "Such a liar."

"Alright, I'll sell you to a Texas rodeo," he amended. "They'll make you clean out horse stables all day."

"I ride a lot," Kate told Jessie. "Mom let me do riding lessons, and she even built a stable on the manor so we can keep our horses there."

"Really? Are you like Muffy and just take lessons because you like it, or do you want to be an equestrian when you're older?"

"Just because I like it," she answered. She looked at Jessie a little strangely, then blurted something out. "Are you really, well, you know... mixed?" she asked.

Jessie nodded with a slight smile. "All my relatives are cats except my grandfather. He was a fox," she answered. "He's why I have these," she winked, holding up her dark-mittened paws.

"That's going to make all the difference," Kit noted lightly as he took a cup of tea from Stanley with a nod of thanks. "Laura has fox on both sides of her line."

"I still say you're wrong," she challenged, pointing at him.

"About what?" Kate asked.

"Well, we're not entirely sure what our baby is going to look like," she said, putting a gentle paw on her very pregnant belly. "Well, we already know that she'll have a fox muzzle from the ultrasound, but outside of that, we just don't know. She might have fox markings, or have my fur, or if she'll have claws or what. She might come out looking completely like a fox, or like a cat with a long muzzle. But we'll find out in a couple of weeks," she said with a dreamy smile. "Then I'll be a mommy. I can't wait!"

"I wonder if she'll have Vulpan eyes," Wendy speculated.

"Another thing we've been wondering about," Jessie chuckled. "Kit's convinced she will. I'm not so sure."

"If she's even a tenth of a Vulpan, she will," Kit snorted. "She'd better, or I'll think you were cheating on me."

"Kit!" Jessie gasped, then laughed ruefully when she saw his slight smile.

"What's wrong with that?" Leonard broke his silence. "Dad says that marriage is for having kids, but other girls are for having a good time."

"Why can't you have a good time with your wife?" Jessie asked simply. "You heard Vil, you get to marry who you want now. So pick the kind of girl you like, not who your mom wants you to marry."

"I certainly have a good time," Kit winked at Jessie.

Her cheeks ruffled. "Not in front of the kids," she said primly, motioning at Kate.

"That's okay, we had sex ed," Kate said, which made Jessie's entire face frizz, and Kit to laugh raucously.

“You’re dealing with Vulpans, Jess,” he reminded her. “I’ll bet money that the only virgin in this room is Kate.”

To her intense pique, Wendy blushed, which made Leonard burst out laughing.

“Oh, go on with you!” Jessie said, shaking a finger at Kit. “Teasing your cousins like that. Shame on you!”

“I’m relatively shameless. I thought you knew that by now,” he said lightly.

“Kate,” Jessie said, snapping her fingers and pointing. Kit saw where she was pointing, and burst out laughing even as he quickly scrambled off the couch and ran for the door. Kate, giggling, passed over the throw pillow to Jessie, who then launched it at the door in his wake.

Travis and his warning didn’t change their plans.

The next day, they still went to the mall. Nick and Sylvia escorted them, and several other mercs had disbursed themselves through the River Gardens mall innocuously to keep an eye on things as Kit, Jessie, and Maxine’s kids were escorted by Nick, Sylvia, and were attended by Bartholomew, who had driven them down. Maxine’s children had been more than happy to accept Jessie’s invitation to go to the mall, and they just as quickly separated themselves from the adults to go shopping. Kit and Jessie, however, had a quandary on their paws...what do you buy for the femme who has everything?

It was a tricky proposition, that was for sure. Vil was rich, successful, and her life was full. She really wanted for nothing. Her hobbies were fairly straightforward as well. She played golf, enjoyed opera, loved football and hockey, enjoyed yachting and sailing, was learning how to play the violin--though she was more or less competent now and was just learning the advanced nuances of the instrument--and she had a guilty love for tactical and strategic games that allowed her mind to shine. She enjoyed games like Civilization and SimCity, when she had the time to play them, and she was probably the only Fortune 500 CEO that had an X-Box in her office.

It was a problem. Kit knew Vil probably better than anyone, but that wasn't a help when it came to getting her something that both wouldn't bankrupt them and also would be something that she would enjoy. Vil would dress to impress, but she really had no love of gaudy jewelry or stylish clothes. Business suits and tasteful yet elegant jewelry were her motif, so buying her clothes and jewelry didn't really send the right message. She'd get plenty of those. A real gift had to be from the heart, something that meant something to her. Sure, they could buy her something meaningless and she'd enjoy it because they sent it, but that didn't mean that it would matter. It had to be something she would both enjoy and use, not something that would warm her heart, then end up on a shelf in a room she never visited.

Kit and Jessie both wracked their brains for nearly an hour, wandering the mall aimlessly looking in shops to try to get some ideas or inspiration... and then it came, when they looked at a picture of a spa tub. They looked at it, then looked at each other, then they both smiled as they thought the same thing. The one thing that would make Vil happy, and also mean something to her, would be to bend just a little bit when it came to her meddling. What if their gift to her was to allow her to do something for them they wouldn't otherwise allow?

“Are you thinking what I’m thinking?” Kit asked.

She giggled. “We give her a present by letting her give us one?”

“The very thing,” he nodded, which made her laugh. “We can either allow her to buy us a vacation house somewhere, or we can let her buy us a house in Austin, which we can then more or less set aside for your folks for when they visit. But we make it clear we’re not living there.”

“You think she’d do that?”

“In a heartbeat,” he answered.

“How about we allow her to pick what she does, but it can’t cost too much,” Jessie offered.

“A one free meddle card, eh?” he asked, which made Jessie giggle and nod. “Well, we’ll have to do it right, I suppose,” he said, scratching his muzzle. “Nick, track down the kids. We’re going to the office.”

“Bart’s with them. I’ll have them meet us at the car,” he said with a nod, taking out his phone.

They needed to go to the office because Kit needed the resources there. He led Jessie and the kids into the cavernous building and up to what Vil had said was his and Jessie’s adjoining offices...and they were. Vil had given him one of the old board member’s offices, which had a lovely view of the back bay, and was literally next door to Vil’s own corner office. Jessie’s office, as it were, was the office leading into his own, for he was in a suite of offices. The outer office held the secretaries and the executive assistant, the office partitioned between the two, and Kit’s board office was beyond theirs, which forced anyone who came to see him to go through the secretaries and the assistant first. Vil’s suite was much the same, but she had no executive assistant. Instead, she had three secretaries that assisted her, which consisted of a receptionist and two general secretaries, who did everything from fetch her tea to make her reservations. Kit had Bart give the kids a tour of the building while he and Jessie used the computer in his office to do the thing right. Using Photoshop and the instruction he'd gotten at work, he designed an "official" card, nice and fancy, that read The bearer of this card is entitled to one (1) act of intrusive meddling, and of a nature of which is determined by the bearer of this card, a value of which shall be indeterminate but not exceeding the outrage level of the beneficiary of the meddling, and is redeemable at any time. Under that, in fine print, it read Offer good only in the continuous United States. Certain conditions may apply. Void where prohibited. Violation of the terms of this offer will get you slapped. After designing the card, with a flowing font and lots of embellishing flourishes and designs, he printed it out on a nice printer, laminated it, then wrapped it in a box and gift wrap they'd bought before coming to the office. After they were done, he then called on a service that Vil had used for him many times. He called up one of the company's couriers, gave him the box, and told him to deliver it to Vil at her vacation condo in Florida. They knew where that was, and though he knew that Vil wasn't taking any calls, he also knew that she would accept a courier's package.

"I'll have it in her paws before sunset," the courier said with a nod.

"Well, that takes care of Vil's gift," Kit said as the courier left. "Let's round up the kids and go see a movie or something."

That "or something" was unplanned, but was actually rather nice. Nick and Sylvia were conspicuous, but the others with them were inconspicuous as they watched over the five Vulpans. They didn't just see a movie, though, they stopped at Burger King and had something to eat, which mystified the kids. None of them had ever been in a Burger King before. Kate didn't seem to like it very much, but Leonard and Wendy discovered that they rather liked Whopper Juniors.

Things weren't nearly as fun when they got back to Stonebrook. Maxine was there waiting for them, and she gave Kit and Jessie a rather cold look when her three youngest jabbered at her about their day of shopping, a movie, and eating at a fast food restaurant. "Zachary should be back tonight," she told them in a slightly affronted tone. "They're bringing Steven back, and the arrangements have been made. The wake is Tuesday at Swan Cove, and the funeral is the day after."

"We won't be there, Maxine," Kit said bluntly.

"They are family, maybe we should, Kit," Jessie said.

Maxine fixed her with a cold stare. "Steven's wake and funeral are not places for you," she announced. "And at this moment, it is not the place for you either, Luke. Zach is quite distraught over the death of his son, and it is no surprise that he blames you for it."

"Steven got himself killed," Kit growled. "I certainly didn't yank the steering wheel of his car and make him crash."

"Be that as it may, for now, I would avoid Zachary and his wife. I'm sure their minds will clear after time and they see that it truly was just an accident, but right now you should give them a wide berth."

"I wasn't planning on having tea with them, Maxy," Kit grunted dismissively. "We have certain differences of opinion."

Maxine glanced at Jessie, but said nothing. “Let’s go, children,” she called. “I’ll have Wordsworth make anything you want for dinner as a reward for being so well behaved while you stayed with your cousin.”

“Kit took us to Burger King!” Wendy said excitedly. “And it wasn’t bad!”

“I didn’t like it,” Kate sniffed. “Their chicken tasted terrible.”

“You took them to eat in a fast food restaurant?” Maxine gasped.

“I was hungry and it was there,” Kit shrugged.

“Well, I think I’d best take all three of you to the doctor so make sure you didn’t catch any diseases,” Maxine sniffed as she herded her kids out of the entry room off the garage. “I’ll send a servant for their things!” Maxine called as an afterthought as she guided them into the garage.

“Diseases!” Jessie huffed, crossing her arms over her pregnant belly.

“The only disease they have is mom-itis,” Kit grunted, which made Jessie burst into a fit of giggling.

Muffy was still out, so they were on their own, but Kit didn’t mind that at all. He made more calls down to Austin to friends to arrange for their return in two weeks, called Alice to make sure their plane was alright, and then he and Jessie both had a long conference call with Doctor Mac as they arranged a hospital room down in Austin General and had Doctor Mac prepare for Jessie to deliver in Texas. She also told them that she’d be up early Tuesday, that Vil had arranged the appointment and had already paid for her travel, and Jessie would have her last exam in Stonebrook. Doctor Mac would examine her again almost as soon as they got home, her last exam before the delivery. After that, they just enjoyed a quiet evening, winding down from the chaos and events of the weekend, cuddling in the bedroom with a pot of tea on the warmer by the TV and Hope Floats playing in the DVD player, which was one of Jessie's favorite movies. Kit was enjoying the fact that the family stopped calling, most likely after Zach had made the plans and had probably spread the word himself, but the phone just had to ring one more time. Kit was very disgruntled about being pried away from Jessie, but he had to chuckle when he saw it was Vil. "It's Vil," he announced as he answered it by putting it on speaker and holding out so they could both hear it. "You shouldn't be calling here," he announced. "You should be busy!"

"I am busy!" she answered. "I got your wedding present, guys, and do I have plans for you!" she laughed.

"You'd better read the fine print, Vil," Jessie giggled.

"He wouldn't dare slap me with Stav and Marcus around," she answered pugnaciously, which made Kit laugh. "But, really, thank you! You certainly know how to give gifts! Who thought of it?"

"We kinda thought of it at the same time," Jessie answered. "How is Ken?"

"Exhausted," she said with a wicked little tilt to her voice that made Jessie giggle again. "He's taking a little nap right now. We just got back from a Broadway show they had down in the theatre, it was a nice diversion."

"Your cast causing problems?"

"Not in any way that matters," she chuckled. "I should be out of it in a week. They'll take it off of me just in time for us to hit the beaches in Monaco. I take it you've already heard the news?"

"Maxine told us, when she came to get her kids," Kit answered.

"I've already been bombarded with calls," Vil grunted. "I think I've pretty much well burned my bridge with Zach, because I refused to come to the wake. I'll not honor Steve in any way, not after what he did."

"And you harp on me not to cause problems, sis."

"I meant it, Kit. As far as I'm concerned, Steve is disowned. I'm even going to move to posthumously prove he tried to kill you, which will force his estate to surrender Steve's share of the fortune."

"That's being vindictive, sis."

"I am vindictive," she said honestly. "Him dying won't change the fact that he's guilty of trying to kill you, and he'll pay for it. Even from the grave, he'll pay."

"But what about Gloria?"

"What about her?" she challenged. "Little Miss Morgan is a rich girl without Steve's money. I wouldn't throw her out in the cold, that's a given, but she's out of luck as far as Steve's share of the fortune goes. The agreement was explicit and set in stone, and she doesn't have even a whisper of a chance to challenge it in court if she tries to sue for Steve's share of the money."

"Won't attacking his son's memory really make Zach angry?" Jessie asked.

"Oh, it certainly will, but there's nothing he can do about it," Vil said calmly. "His son broke the agreement, and the agreement is very clear. I can have the matter brought before a judge, and if the judge determines that Steve violated the terms of the agreement, he'll be all but convicted of the attempt to kill you. He'll be tried and convicted posthumously by the judge, and then his estate has to surrender his share of the family fortune. Besides, Zach will have other things to worry about, mainly the firestorm that's coming. As soon as the tabloids get wind of this, God, there'll be headlines for years."

"We haven't seen anything like that around here," Jessie said.

"That's because I'm putting my foot on some necks in the press to keep it quiet, at least up until now. But with Steve dead, now I want the truth to come out, so Steve can't be martyred. I want the public to know that he died in a rather stupid and pointless car accident, but he died while running after trying to arrange a cold-blooded murder. Steve will be the infamous Vulpan, which is more than appropriate given what he tried to do. Zach will be besieged by the press and paparazzi, and any hope he ever had of continuing his affiliation with the PPC will be destroyed by the scrutiny. For the next year, Zach won't be able to so much as sneeze without it making a headline in the Sun or the Inquirer. The only way he could continue it is to do it in the open, and that's something he'd never do. No matter how proud he is of being in the PPC, it's not proper, and Zach will hang himself before he loses face in our social circles. Which is nothing but hypocritical bullcrap, since the vast majority of furs in the upper crust are purists as it is. But publicly being in a group like the PPC isn't socially acceptable. That's why the Vulpans have always kept their involvement a secret. It's all about appearances," she snorted.

"You know, I've always wondered why you're so different from your family," Jessie said impulsively. "I know why Kit has a different viewpoint, but what changed your mind?”

“Logic,” she said simply. “When I was a girl, I heard all the rhetoric and believed it for a while, but then, when I got older, I sat down and analyzed what I’d heard and compared it to what I knew, and it just didn’t match up. I’m not as liberal as my brother, Jessie. I’m a purist in that I have absolutely no attraction at all to any male but a fox.”

“That’s not being a purist,” Jessie discounted.

“Call it what you want, only a fox can make my motor run,” she said, then she laughed. “Though I’ve worn my male out,” she said slyly. “That’s right, worn out! You let a little vixen in a cast run you into the ground, you lightweight! Exercise more! Oh, you should hear the excuses,” she said scathingly as Kendall’s voice called plaintively in the background.

“He’s young, he’ll bounce back quickly,” Kit said dryly. “If he doesn’t, well, who’s next in line? Harry?”

Vil laughed brightly. “Kit said if you can’t live up to my expectations, I should try out the next oldest Brighton brother,” she told him, and Kit clearly heard the call of sudden indignation, which made him laugh. “Just keep that in mind, male, I have two more Brightons to choose from if you can’t make the grade!”

There was a sudden commotion, and a great deal of laughter, and Kendall’s voice came over the phone. “Stop giving her ideas!” he protested. “I won her fair and square, and I’m not sharing her with any of my brothers!”

“That’s up to you, isn’t it, Ken?” Jessie teased. “She’s yours to lose, so you’d better treat her right!”

“I’m trying, but she’s practically an old maid. Years of pent up sexual tension has just exploded on me here, and it’s not easy to weather the--ow!” he squeaked, then Vil was back on the phone again.

“I think it’s time to take a certain male somewhere and teach him some manners,” she said in a frosty tone which made Jessie explode into laughter.

“Have fun with him, sis,” Kit chuckled.

“Oh, we’ll have fun after he’s punished,” she declared. “Talk to you two later.”

“Be good!” Jessie giggled, and Kit turned off the phone. “Those two are something else,” she laughed.

“They’re definitely a good match,” Kit nodded. “But we’ve been saying that for a while.”

“Yeah, we have,” she agreed as she nuzzled against him. “Two more weeks, my handsome fox, and we go home. Then just ten days after that, and I’ll be holding my baby instead of her making me fat.”

“You’ll never forgive her,” he said sagely, which made her laugh.

“I miss seeing my toes!”

“You couldn’t see your toes to begin with,” he scoffed. “There’s a lot of something else in the way,” he teased, prodding her breast brazenly with a finger.

“Well, I could if I looked down the middle,” she corrected coquettishly, then giggled. “I wonder when Muffy will get back in.”

“Probably just before she leaves for Yale tomorrow,” he answered. “But she’ll be right back on Tuesday for the wake. I don’t see why she’s leaving, really.”

“We should really thank her for giving up the start of her semester to stay with us. She’s been a very good friend.”

“She likes you, Jess. She has good taste,” he told her easily. She erupted into surprised laughter when he leaned over and licked her cheek. “You do taste good,” he noted.

“Ewww!” she protested, rubbing her cheek with the back of her paw. “Stop giving me fox germs!”

“It’s a little too late for that. You’ve been infected!” he laughed, pulling her into his arms and giving her a deep kiss. “You have this little parasite in here that’s all fox,” he teased, putting his paw on her stomach.

“You’re wrong,” she protested with a smile.

“I won the muzzle. And when a Vulpan wins the battle, he wins the war!”

“Well, we’ve proved that the one thing a Vulpan can’t stand up to is a Williams cat,” she winked. “I’ll prove it to you when Laura shows you her crème fur, claws, and blue eyes.”

“Then I’ll know you were cheating on me,” he teased.

She laughed. “As if!” she protested. “There’s only one male on this earth that has ever been in my bed, and he’s in this room!”

“So, you’re hiding them in the secret room now, eh?” he said seriously. “I guess I’ll have to prove I’m better than him!”

She laughed helplessly and surrendered to his attention. “I love you, Mister Vulpan.”

“Not as much as I love you, Misses Vulpan, future mother of my daughter.”

“And more to come,” she said, then started purring.

Vil was right about the press attention. The news about the death of Steven Vulpan was already all over the news, but the more sinister nature of his death erupted into the news the next morning. Kit guessed that Vil had either leaked it herself or allowed the story to move forward, for the Boston Sun, a local gossip newspaper, had for a blaring headline Steven Vulpan Behind Attempt on Luke Vulpan III, and the first paragraph was to the point and damning:

The news of the death of Kitstrom Steven Vulpan was released yesterday, but further investigation has revealed that it was in fact Steven Vulpan who was the mastermind behind the attempt on the life of Kitstrom “Kit” Lucas Vulpan III, rebel of the Vulpan family and brother to the CEO of the family business, Vilenne Vulpan. Independently verified sources reveal that Steven died in an auto accident in Pennsylvania while in fact fleeing from Boston because his duplicity in the plot to kill his cousin had been discovered. The details of the attempt on the life of Kit Vulpan and his wife Jessica, who is a cat, cast a dark and ominous shadow over the Royal Family of Boston, for Kitstrom Steven Vulpan was in fact the leader of the Paladins, a violent splinter group of the PPC that has been listed as a terrorist organization by the Department of Homeland Security.

Verification of this fact has been supplied by Gloria Morgan Vulpan, widow of Steven Vulpan, whose distance from her husband had been a well known fact within the social circles of Boston. “Of course I knew he was a Paladin,” she admitted in a phone interview. “Why do you think I stayed as far away from him as possible? I hated it, and I hated him. If I’d have known he was a purist psycho, I wouldn’t have married him, Vulpan or no Vulpan. I’m relieved that everyone knows, because now I don’t have to pretend anymore.” When pressed, she elaborated on her statement. “I was threatened by his father to keep my mouth shut,” she confided, referring to Kitstrom Zachary Vulpan. “He said if I left Steve, or if I said a word about his activities, he’d destroy me and my family. What else could I do?”

The article went on to give details about Steve and again described the plot to kill Kit and Jessie, which was leaked from the police, no doubt with Vil’s blessing. Now the whole world knew that Steven had tried to kill them, and he had no doubt that Zachary was almost insane with rage over this exploding into the limelight not two days after Steven died.

But he had little sympathy. Zachary had made this bed, and now it was time to lay down in it.

The only thing that worried him, as he read the article, was Travis’ warning. Vil was pushing Zachary to the brink, piling this on top of the grief he was feeling from the death of his son, and if she wasn’t careful, she was going to make Zachary snap. If Zach snapped, then there was no telling what he might do, or what might happen. He might retreat from the world and turn into a recluse, or he might hire an army to storm Stonebrook and kill everyone.

But there was little he could do about that right now. All he could do was talk to Nick about it, who promised to keep an eye on things.

But Kit also refused to let that keep them trapped in Stonebrook. They'd been stuck in the manor for nearly two months, and with going home in sight, he was determined to take Jessie out. Now that Muffy was gone, having left that morning for Connecticut, Jessie needed activity, she needed to be treated like a lady and a Vulpan, and not a prisoner. She would never complain, but he knew that she was running out of things to do. She'd learned nearly all the recipes the cooks could teach, she had gone through her knitting book twice, and shooting trap and surfing the internet and watching movies and reading books could only go so far until a change was needed. Kit himself was feeling a touch of cabin fever. Though he had the work the guys sent him and he wrote articles for the magazine, he too felt the need to go out and do something in the short time they had left in Boston, make it feel more like a vacation and less like being in a gilded cage. But, in the interest of safety, he definitely agreed with Nick that from now on, Boston itself was more or less off limits. Boston was the playground of the Vulpans, and it wouldn't be safe to roam the streets with an angry Zachary lurking. But areas outside Boston, on the other paw, were accessible to them. As long as they didn't say where they were going and went far enough away from Boston, they could go out and have a good time.

So, they piled into a limousine with Stanley and Clancy and hit the road. Oscar drove them all the way down to Portland, Maine, and they spent the day sightseeing with Stanley waiting on them, Clancy puttering around in a rented scooter, and Nick and Sylvia keeping a close eye on things for them. They visited antique shops, took a sightseeing cruise on a boat that ran them out to some rocky islands where seals basked in the sun, and they saw a whale on the way back. After that, they went to a mall south of the city and pattered around until Jessie's feet got tired, then they got into the limo and drove about twenty miles north to Freeport, home of the famous L.L. Bean retail store. They spent nearly two hours in and around the store, looking at their merchandise, watching the trout swimming in the indoor pond under the stairs, doing a little shopping, then they milled around the city of Freeport to take in the unique architecture and eat Ben and Jerry's ice cream from a stand outside L.L. Bean. When both Clancy and Jessie got too tired to go on, they got back into the limo and drove back to Stonebrook. Kit hadn't seen Jessie that happy in a while, and he knew that despite the danger, they had done the right thing.

The next day started off with an exam. Doctor Mac had arrived the night before and stayed in the manor, and they welcomed her as a guest. But in the morning, she went from being a guest to being a doctor, and Jessie was given a thorough examination by Doctor Mac, who had access to all the medical equipment Vil had brought into the manor when they thought that Jessie was going to be delivering in Stonebrook. "Well," the gray vixen hummed, feeling Jessie's stomach. "Any back pain, Jessie?"

"A little," she said. "I feel like my tummy's going to pop any minute now," she laughed ruefully. "And I still have over three weeks to go!"

"Welcome to your last month," Doctor Mac chuckled. "Your baby is going through her last bits of developing right now. She could be born right now and have no trouble surviving, but she'll stay safely in your womb until she's finally ready to face the world," she smiled. "You'll get maybe just a tiny bit bigger, but not much."

"I hope not!" Jessie laughed. "I can barely get out of a chair now!"

“You won’t have much longer to go,” she said clinically. “I’d say you’re right on schedule, or maybe even a couple of days ahead. I’m going to open up your delivery window by a couple of days forward. I’d say now that you could deliver anywhere from the twenty-third to the thirtieth.”

“I thought you were infallible, Doc,” Kit teased.

“Predicting a birth isn’t an exact science, because there’s a lot of factors that can alter development at this stage,” she answered with a smile. “Physical or emotional stress in the mother, changes in diet, changes in surroundings or environment, those can affect the development of the baby. But in this case, I think those circumstances have actually accelerated Laura’s development a little bit. This seems to be an ideal environment for a pregnant femme,” she chuckled. “So I’m going to move your window up a few days. Once you get back to Texas and I give you your final exam, I’ll know for certain when to have you keep your suitcase packed.”

“The sooner the better,” Jessie giggled. “I love being pregnant, but I’d like to see my toes again!” She pointed a quick finger at Kit. “And not a word, you!” she threatened, which made him explode into laughter.

“Say, Doc, you have a pressing need to get back to Austin?” he asked.

“I don’t have any appointments today, why?”

“Well, we were going to go out today, and there’s plenty of room in the limo. We were thinking of going to Niagara Falls.”

“How far is that from here?”

“About four hours,” he answered. “It’s a nice drive through some pretty country, and we can arrange it so you fly out from there instead of here. That way you don’t have to drive back with us.”

“Well, I think I could manage that,” she said, tapping her muzzle. “And I’ve always wanted to see the falls.”

And so, after the exam, they were again on the road. Clancy didn’t feel like going, and Stanley wanted to stay at Stonebrook, so it was Kit, Jessie, and Doctor MacNair attended by Bartholomew and Luann, with Nick, Sylvia, Krichek, and Barnett escorting them. There were too many for the limo, and Nick wanted some extra security and mobility, so Krichek and Barnett rode in two Ford Expeditions in front of and behind the limo as Bartholomew drove them to Niagara Falls. They left the manor around ten, and after several pit stops so Jessie could relieve herself and a lunch at a turnpike rest stop McDonald’s they reached Niagara Falls around three. And once they reached the falls, they had a great time. They got on a boat that went out to the edge, getting them soaked by spray from the falls as the sound thundered in their ears, then they went up to scenic overlooks at the tops of the falls, on both the American and Canadian sides of the river. It was the first time that Jessie had ever been out of America, and Kit had to celebrate the event by buying her a little pewter bookmark at a gift shop on the Canadian side. After they took plenty of pictures, they had an excellent dinner in a nice restaurant that had a spectacular view of the falls. Around eight, they took Doctor MacNair to the regional airport and got her on her way home, and then it was a long drive through the late summer night back to Stonebrook, arriving back around one in the morning.

Kit had made sure to make it a day-long excursion, because he didn’t want to be anywhere near Boston. They had the wake today, and he wanted to not only be unavailable, but out of Massachusetts.

The next day, they did the same thing. He got Jessie up early, and after a nice breakfast made by Frannie, he pulled out the atlas and started looking at where they could go. “Hmm, how about another trip to Canada?” he offered. “We could make Toronto in six hours.”

“We could stay here, too,” Jessie laughed. “Two straight days of running around. I’m getting a little tired.”

“We can rest tomorrow, love,” he said seriously. “Today’s the funeral. I don’t want to be anywhere near Boston today.”

“Oh. Oh, that’s right,” she said, giving him a compassionate look. “Well, maybe not Toronto, but how about we go to Cape Cod? I’ve always wanted to see it.”

“Cape Cod it is,” he said with a smile and a nod. “Feel up to another trip, Nick?”

“Surely,” he grinned. “But only if we get Sylvie in a bikini on the beach.”

Sylvia gave him a cool look. “Mein Gott, didn’t we go over this already?”

He gave her a sly look. “You said I had to start over again. Well, I have to start somewhere, don’t I?”

Sylvia grumbled something in German that Kit didn’t quite hear, but he didn’t need to understand the words to understand the meaning in her voice.

Kit got something of a surprise when, after they again piled into the limousine with Bartholomew driving, Luann attending, and Nick and Sylvia escorting them, they stopped over at an ATM so Kit could withdraw cash. He’d used up the last of the cash reserves he’d brought from Austin at Niagara Falls, and though he didn’t have to pay for the gas for the limo, that was paid for by Stonebrook, he wanted money for a ride on a boat, or maybe the ferry to Nantucket, and things like that preferred cash over a debit card. He withdrew $200, and when the receipt printed out, he was a bit startled to see a balance of $33,407.77, when the balance was supposed to be $5,701.98. He immediately suspected Vil was meddling, so he got back into the car and called the bank and had them email a copy of his transaction record to his Blackberry. He went through it as they left Boston and headed for Cape Cod, and found that Vulpan Shipyards had deposited nearly $14,000 into the account, divided up into deposits every Friday, and there was a lump sum deposit for $12,157.70 that was deposited into the account two weeks after he got to Boston. That number looked pretty familiar, because there was that exact same figure, $12,157.70, withdrawn from the account when he flew up to Boston by charter. Clearly, Vil had refunded him that money, and done it without telling him she was giving it back.

That, Kit honestly didn't mind. He'd spent his own money to get up to Boston to see her, and she seemed to take offense to that. Her giving him that money back, that he didn't mind, mainly because Laura was on the way and he wanted a nice fat bank account just in case there was some kind of emergency. The other money deposited by Vulpan Shipyards, that it took him a little bit to figure out. It was deposited in Jessie's name, and that let him puzzle out that it was that salary that Vil had talked about, the salary she drew as an executive assistant to him. She was an official employee of the shipyards. Kit had honestly forgotten about that, but again, he would say nothing. What went on between Vil and Jessie was their affair, and he wouldn't say a word. Jessie knew how he felt, and again, deep down, he didn't mind seeing that money in the account right now, not with their daughter three weeks away from coming into the world. He wanted a nice healthy bank account built up to take care of any unforeseen problems that might arise. The excess, after he felt comfortable, would be going into investments for their children, both Laura and those to come, so they would have quality educations and be financially stable should some sort of disaster befall Kit and Jessie and left their children without parents.

After he got that figured out, they had a very good day, a day staying far away from Boston. They toured Cape Cod, looking at many of the old houses and villages, then they took a ride in a sloop, a vessel with no engines at all, only sails. Yachting was one of Vil's hobbies, and he had to admit, it was rather interesting to watch the crew propel and guide the ship using nothing but sails and a rudder. After that, they had dinner at a seaside restaurant before returning home after dark with lots of pictures and a very sleepy wife. They also returned to a house that wasn't empty. Sheila, Muffy, and Bess were in Stonebrook and met them at the garage when they pulled in, Sheila wearing a bikini, Bess wearing a one-piece, and Muffy wearing a sports halter and boy-style shorts. All three had clearly been swimming, for their hair and fur were wet and matted from the water. "Hey cousin, hope you don't mind," Sheila said. "But I didn't feel like staying at Mom's."

"Not at all," Kit said as he helped Jessie from the limo. "I take it you were at the wake?"

Bess snorted. "What passed for it," she said. "Alicia spent most of the time cursing you and Vil, and Zach didn't say a single word the entire time. He just kept staring at his wine glass. You'd think that you had held Steve down while Vil poured acid into his eyes, from the way that bitch was railing about how you killed Steve."

"Bullshit," Sheila grunted. "Steve was driving too fast and ran off the road, which is a rather stupid way to die if you ask me."

“It’s not a good time to be around the parents right now,” Bess said darkly, pulling at the shoulder strap of her swimsuit. “That’s why I’m here instead of over at my parents’ estate. They’re all in a pretty bad mood.”

“Why?”

“Because of how Alicia was acting,” she answered. “It was almost embarrassing, and I left the wake after about half an hour. We all know what happened, but Alicia just yelled and screamed that her son was murdered, and conveniently forgot that it was Steve that tried to kill you and Jessie.” Bess looked at Jessie. “You look tired, Jess.”

“We were in Cape Cod,” she answered. “Staying far away from Boston.”

“Which I see was a good idea,” Kit grunted.

“Well, I’m going to go up and have a rest,” Jessie announced.

“Guess we’ll go back to the pool,” Sheila said.

“Why are you swimming in the dark?” Jessie asked.

“The gym pool is indoor, plenty of light,” Muffy reminded her.

“Oh yeah, I forget about that. I don’t like to use that pool, I always smell like chlorine when I’m done, no matter how long I spend in the shower,” she noted.

“We’re about done anyway,” Sheila said. “You guys eaten yet?”

“At a nice restaurant in a little village,” Jessie nodded. “They had lobster taken right from the dock and straight to the table!”

“I hope they cooked it along the way,” Bess giggled. “I don’t think I’d like to arm wrestle a lobster before I eat it.”

“Of course they cooked it, silly,” Jessie laughed. “We got some nice pictures, too.”

“Ooh, pictures! Lemme see!” Muffy said excitedly.

Jessie’s rest was delayed as they transferred the pictures they took off the video card in the camera and into a laptop, then showed them. “I’ve never seen anything like this out there,” Bess said, looking at a picture of an old fox sitting on a porch of an old, weather-beaten house.

“We saw the real Cape Cod, not the area around the Kennedy compound, Bess,” Kit chuckled. “There are quite a few little villages out there, and even some farms. Here, I need to send these to the office. I have an article, comic scripts, and some research to send as well.”

“I keep forgetting you work,” Bess laughed.

“We’re part owners at the magazine,” Jessie said proudly.

“You know, I read those comics you write, Jess, and they’re great!” Bess told her.

“What, School Daze? That’s Kit’s.”

“I read both his and yours. Kit’s is good, but I really like yours. You have so pegged that relationship between Missy and Cutler. It’s both funny and entertaining to watch those two.”

“Well, before you ask, no, it’s not based on me and Kit,” she grinned.

“It should, then you’d have a lot more fun,” Sheila laughed.

“I think that would take a miracle,” Kit said.

“No, it’d just take Jo-Jo,” Sheila retorted.

“You earn money from the comics?”

“Oh dear yes, we do,” she answered. “How much are the royalties now, love?”

“I think we’re up to about fifteen hundred dollars a week,” he answered. “School Daze is running in fifty-nine other publications all over the southwest and southeast, and Missy and Cutler runs in ten papers and two magazines in Texas, Louisiana, and New Mexico on top of ours. We could be making more, but with the recent economic downturn, we lowered our royalties to attract more papers, and it worked. Since Jessie’s comic is only weekly, it hasn’t picked up quite as fast, but at least Jeffrey does them the same size and length any other Sunday comic, to try to get papers to pick it up.”

“He hates coloring them,” Jessie laughed. “He makes Elly do it.”

“You make fifteen hundred a week?”

“No, the comics do,” Kit answered. “That money gets split three ways, between Jeffrey, us, and the magazine. We make about five hundred dollars a week off it, and we keep it all. We were very smart not to go through a distributor like King, who would have taken most of the royalties as their fee. We do the distribution ourselves, so the entire royalty goes in our bank.”

“That’s not bad,” Sheila mused. “If you could go national, you’d make a lot of money.”

“That’s the idea,” Kit chuckled. “But the strips are catching on. I think we sign on a new paper or magazine every week. Not to sound boastful, but both strips are pretty good. We work hard on the scripts, and Jeffrey is an awesome artist.”

“You should sell stuff from the strip on the magazine website,” Sheila said. “I’d love a tee shirt with Razz on it, wearing her little Chinese outfit. She’s my favorite.”

A little light turned on in Kit’s brain. “You know, cousin, that’s a damn good idea,” he said. “I wonder if Jeffrey would do a nice artistic drawing of Razz, and we could silkscreen it. Produce the units at six dollars, sell them at twelve.”

“Not just Razz,” Sheila said. “There should be a shot of Jo-Jo standing there with her face fur all blackened, and ‘Oops!’ scrawled across the top in jittery, bold letters. Or a picture of Missy and Cutler standing back to back all huffy, but their tails wrapped around each other’s, or a picture of Oxnard in his football uniform, and one of his Shakespeare sayings along the bottom just under a pair of shoes hovering in midair.”

“Or a picture of Buck. He’s so cute!” Muffy interjected.

“Why don’t we sit down and talk about this,” Kit offered.

“Well, I’m going to go take a nice relaxing bath,” Jessie laughed.

With Sheila and Muffy as knowing consultants and Bess as a neutral subject to test their ideas, they sat around his laptop and went through the archives of the strip looking for some of the most classic images, like the Oxnard-shaped hole in the side of the dorm with Jo-Jo standing there holding her smoking invention, a confused look on her face as she called for him. Or a picture of Zeffier on his beloved bike, chomping a cigar, saying “What’s your #%&$@*% problem?” They found the perfect image of Razz, the introductory strip with Buck and Oxnard standing there looking at her, in her cute little white silk tunic, her hair done up in two buns just to the sides of her ears and wrapped in white silk cloth, holding a basket and looking utterly adorable. They found a panel that made Bess literally fall over on the couch laughing, with Buck sitting in a chair, a metal colander on his head, staring wild-eyed at a foot-long probe in Jo-Jo’s paw, whose shape subtly hinted that it was some kind of invasive body probe. Sheila also suggested that Jeffrey draw a beer can with the label “Jo-Jo’s Explosive Beer,” and under that the tag line “It’ll Blow Your Socks Off!” And they found the perfect panel of Jo-Jo, her face blackened as the smoldering wreckage of an experiment gone wrong rested in her outstretched paw, a look of befuddled surprise on her face, and the infamous “Oops!” in a text bubble over her head. They even found a panel with Jo-Jo pointing a laser cannon the size of a bazooka at Cutler with the angry shout “NEVER CALL ME JOSEPHINA!” scratched over their heads. Another good panel, and also another one of the running jokes in the strip, showing vapor trails scattering from Jo-Jo as she held up some weird device, on the verge of pressing a big red button on the side, and called absently, “I wonder what this does.” Then Sheila pointed out several other panels that would look good on a tee shirt, more mundane panels, like a panel of Jo-Jo, Razz, Missy, Rose, Cherry, and Linda all standing around, a similar picture of Oxnard, Buck, Cutler, Dan, Frank, and Grady, or a picture of Oxnard holding the gazelle skull of his hated college Algebra teacher and arch-nemesis, Ms. Vilkenstein, lamenting “2B, or not 2B, that is the equation,” or even an image of Jo-Jo’s eternally malfunctioning and often rebuilt robot, JON-JON Version 19.1 with the title (you don’t want to know what happened to numbers 1 through 18) under it. When Jessie finished her bath, she joined them, and pointed out several more good ones, until they had quite a portfolio of ideas for tee shirts built up. After nearly two hours of both finding panels and fleshing out ideas for unique scenes, he bundled them all together and sent them to Jeffrey's laptop at work. But he also called Rick as his femme cousins went to the kitchen to have the cooks make them dinner, and Jessie tagged along to grab a light snack before bed. He told Rick about their ideas, which made Rick chuckle.

"I think it's a good idea," he said. "We can produce a first run of only like a couple dozen each and see if they're popular, and if they are, we can order more. We won't make much money off the first run, but if they're popular, we can order in bulk to knock down our unit costs and then sell at a profit."

"That's what I was thinking," Kit answered. "We already have the strip page on the magazine's website, we can just have Mike add a new page to that, and the magazine can advertise the tee shirts once they're ready."

"I'll call Jeffrey and see what he thinks," Rick said. "If I can pry him away from Sandy, that is."

"Ah, yes, she's back now, isn't she?" Kit laughed.

"And making up for lost time," Rick chuckled in reply.

"I'll send you my next article, both me and Jessie have new scripts to send to Jeffrey, and we have some pictures we took around New England," he added.

"What's the article about?"

"What else?" he asked. "The wedding."

“Nice, it’ll be interestin’ to read about it from the inside,” he noted. “You haven’t done anythin’ about what we heard about? About your cousin dyin’?”

“No, I’m leaving that alone for right now,” he answered. “Vil’s being kinda pushy about it, and the last thing I want to do right now is look like I’m piling on. I just want to get through the next ten days and come back home quietly.”

“Ah. Well, guess there’s no fault in that, son,” he surmised.

“I just hope that Vil doesn’t go too far. I’ve been warned that things are getting kinda volatile, and what I heard about what happened at the wake today didn’t give me much confidence.”

“Mind explainin’ it?”

“Well, the short of it is that Vil is going after Steve, regardless of the fact that he died,” he answered. “She intends to have him disowned posthumously so she can strip his estate of his share of the family fortune, but more so because she wants the world to know what he did and that Vil won’t tolerate behavior like that in the family. She also refused to leave her honeymoon to come back for the wake and funeral, which is a huge slap in the face to Uncle Zach. From what Travis told me, Uncle Zach is not entirely stable at the moment, and Vil pushing him isn’t going to help. His favorite son just died, and before he’s even in the ground, Vil is already setting up to attack his memory. That’s not a very smart idea in my opinion, but I learned long ago that you just can’t tell Vil what to do. She’s going to use Steven as a very ugly and graphic object lesson about what happens to Vulpans who don’t toe the line, and her going after him even after he’s dead gives you an idea of how ruthless Vil can be.”

“Is there ever a quiet day in your family, son?” Rick asked.

Kit laughed richly. “Nope. What you see is just about normal around here,” he answered cheekily. “But I’d appreciate it if you keep that to yourself.”

“Surely will,” he affirmed.

The day of the funeral was again a day where Kit and Jessie stayed far, far away from Boston. They were in New York City taking in the museums with their eternal chaperones, Bartholomew, Luann, Nick, and Sylvia. They left before dawn and caught a train down in the city, and instead of a limo, they rode around in taxis and the subway as they went from museum to museum, then they went out to visit the Statue of Liberty, then Ground Zero, then they swung by Broadway and Times Square before Kit took them to the New York Stock Exchange, where the Vulpans owned a box suite that overlooked the trading floor, which was something of a tradition for the oldest, richest families. The Vulpans, the Kennedys, the Astors, the Grants, and several others owned similar box suites along the upper floor that overlooked the main trading floor, a vantage from which network news often shot scenes of floor activity for broadcasts. Those suites weren’t all owned by news networks; in fact, a minority of them were. The Vulpan suite was literally next door to the “open” suite which was available to any news team to set up and shoot within, and they literally owned the suite. Arthur Vulpan had bought them literally at the opening of the original Wall Street exchange building, just as his shipyard had started making real money, back when it only cost him a one time fee of five hundred dollars to permanently own what Vil could now probably sell for over a million. The building had been remodeled and even replaced over the years, the exchange had moved, but that initial investment had endured for over a hundred years, for Arthur Vulpan had wisely drawn up the contract that stated that the Vulpans would own that suite or a similar suite in relation to the trading floor in the event the exchange was moved, for perpetuity. The Vulpans did have to pay an annual fee and some taxes on the suite, but that suite was like a condo or a house, it was permanently owned property. Jessie had never seen the exchange in action live before, and she was mystified by it, staring down with the window open and listening to the machines and the voices calling over them.

“It used to be way louder, back before computers,” Kit said as he looked out with them. “I remember coming here once with my parents, before the place was really computerized. There were like three times as many traders down there, all yelling and screaming and waving pieces of paper and using sign language to send messages around. It was pretty weird,” he chuckled.

“It’s like chaos down there,” Jessie giggled. “I wonder how they even know what’s going on.”

“Practice,” Kit said sagely, looking at his watch. “About ready for lunch, pretty kitty?”

“Don’t you mean dinner?”

“Late lunch, early dinner, whatever,” he grinned. “Our train leaves at five, and we’ll be back in time for Frannie to make us a real dinner.”

“Frannie, eh? And what happened to not getting used to being waited on?”

“That went out the window the second you said you were getting tired,” he said simply. “When we go home, I’ll be cooking for you until Laura’s born.”

“I can still cook!”

“Not when bending over to get pans and hunching over cutting boards makes your back hurt, you won’t,” he told her adamantly. “Doctor Mac warned you that it might happen.”

“Well, yeah, but I’ll feel helpless if I can’t cook.”

“You’ll be treated like the queen you are,” he told her. “Now, given this is New York and you can buy any kind of food you want, what are you feeling like today, pretty kitty?”

“Seafood,” she grinned.

“I know just the place, Mistress Jessie. Let me warn Martin we’re coming,” Bartholomew declared, opening his cell phone.

Instead of some fancy bistro or restaurant, Bartholomew took them to a little diner in lower Manhattan, a little corner diner that didn’t even have a sign outside, yet was jam-packed busy within. It was truly a diner, and was in desperate need of remodeling. The tables were old and worn and chipped, the padding on the booth seats was cracked, and the napkin holders were battered and were about ten years past needing to be replaced. Jessie and Kit both looked a little uncertain about the place, at least until they caught whiffs of the smells of the food around them, and it was heavenly. “An old friend opened this diner,” Bartholomew explained. “Martin Fischer. He was a five star chef who grew tired of the snooty restaurant scene and opened this deplorable-looking establishment where he could cook food that furs would enjoy, not fuss because one shaving of a carrot was a centimeter out of position on the plate. The funny thing is, he says he makes more money here running the place as a short-order cook than he ever did running the kitchen at one of the most expensive restaurants in town.”

“A male after my own heart,” Kit laughed.

The place looked like a seedy dive, but the crowd and the smells hinted that it was just a front, for the sake of appearances, and Bartholomew did not steer them wrong. The food was about four times as expensive than one would expect from a corner diner, obviously how the chef made his money, but his food was worth more than what they paid for it. Jessie ordered grilled tuna and Kit a hamburger, and the food was outstanding. The hamburger was lightly, almost delicately seasoned with mesquite and smoky spices that gave it a “home grilled” taste, and Jessie’s eyes closed almost reflexively when she took her first bite of her tuna. “Wow,” she breathed.

“I see Martin’s quality hasn’t diminished since working as a greasy spoon,” Bartholomew chuckled.

They lingered maybe too long relishing the excellent food, so much so they were almost late for the train back to Boston. Bartholomew called the manor from the train so the limo would be waiting for them as Jessie reclined in their stateroom to rest her back from another busy day on the move. “I need to sleep for at least a week,” she laughed.

“You have two days. Suzy’s already made the reservations for our trip to Maine.”

“Really? Where?”

“At a bed and breakfast in Castine,” Nick answered. “Krichek and Donny are up there already getting it ready for us. You’ll be going up Saturday morning and returning Sunday night.”

“Sounds fun. I hope Corey will be there the whole time.”

“Probably. We’re coming up to see him, he’d better be there,” Kit chuckled.

When they got back to the manor, though, there was a bit of serious business, and that was the funeral. Muffy had already returned to Connecticut, but Sheila was still in Boston, and she was at the manor waiting for them. “Hey guys,” she said as she helped Jessie out of the limo.

“How did it go?” Kit asked immediately.

“Tense,” she answered. “Given Alicia’s explosion at the wake, we were almost expecting it. But, the wake was private, where they allowed one news team’s cameras in for the funeral, so she was very quiet. God forbid she cause a scene in public,” Sheila grunted. “After the funeral is another story.”

“What happened?”

“Well, I’m still trying to get the entire story,” she answered as they headed in. “Travis and Dave gave me pieces of it, but from what I’ve heard, Alicia and Zach came to blows when they got back to Swan Cove.”

“What?” Kit asked in surprise.

She nodded. “That much both of them supplied. Alicia is furious and wants revenge, but Zach won’t do it. Davey said they’ve been fighting about it since the minute they got back from Pennsylvania. Travis said that Alicia literally slapped Zach and called him a weakling in front of Josh and Crystal, and she's sleeping in the north wing of their manor tonight."

"Doesn't Alicia realize that Vil's already beaten them?" Kit asked with a sigh.

"Evidently not. I guess Vil's going to have to step on her neck before it's over."

"Well, I'll warn Vil. That's not something she should ignore."

He wasn't sure if she'd answer her phone, but he tried anyway as Jessie told Frannie, rather sheepishly, that she wouldn't mind a little light supper, and if it wouldn't be too much bother, if Frannie wouldn't mind cooking for her just this once...that almost got Jessie laughed out of the kitchen.

"Hey bro, what's up?"

Kit went over what Sheila told him rather curtly. "I think you'd better put a paw in, Jessie. If Alicia is that angry, she might do something stupid."

"No argument there, bro," she said seriously. "Leave it to me."

"Thanks, sis. You pregnant yet?"

She laughed richly. "We're seriously trying," she answered. "We'll be leaving for Monaco tomorrow night, so we can get there Friday morning without losing a day. A week in a private villa on the beach. It sounds heavenly," she said lingeringly.

"Florida's not good enough for you?"

"This is a condo. Ken says that what's down there is completely private. It's one of the Brighton holdings." She clicked her teeth. "Speaking of Brighton holdings, Ken told me that his parents have bought a house in Austin,” she noted to him. “They closed on it this morning. It’s just down the street from the house Terry bought. Five bedrooms, four baths, fenced compound, four car garage. That skinflint, he had his broker buy it at auction, it was a foreclosure,” she chuckled.

“Terry did the same thing. I guess that cleaned out the suckers.”

“Just about,” Vil chuckled. “Austin is a rich town, bro, with quite a few millionaires. A few rather overenthusiastic land developers were cranking out luxury houses, and then the credit crisis slammed them against the wall. I looked into some of those houses myself looking for a house I can use when I come visit. The house Terry bought had only been occupied for a few months. The one Winston bought was never occupied at all. Some Dallas magnate bought it as part of a land investment scheme, and then the property values crashed,” she said simply.

“And he’s not a magnate anymore.”

“I would think not,” she said in a slightly predatory manner.

“So you were looking into houses?”

“Of course. I need someplace nice to stay when I’m there.”

“And what did you find?” he asked.

“That none of them were up to my standards,” she said loftily. “So I bought a nice little five hundred acre ranch about ten miles down seventy-one from Bergstrom towards Bastrop, had them raze the house, and build something more suitable. They promise to have it done in two months, given I hired a small army of contractors to make it happen.”

“More suitable, eh?”

“Naturally. A nice eight bedroom vacation house built on a smaller model as Hart’s Crossing, with a tennis court, racquetball court and gym, pool, helicopter pad, stables for horses, and I’m having a private skeet shooting range installed just for Jessie when she comes to visit. There’s plenty of room behind the house for her to practice driving golf balls, too. It even came with five horses and twenty head of longhorn cattle that had been at the ranch before I bought it. I convinced Janice to take up the position of head of household down there, and she’ll be hiring and managing the staff and the estate. I’ve decided to name it the Double V Ranch.”

“You actually convinced a Boston servant to move to Austin?”

“She liked the promotion and the pay raise,” she laughed. “I gave her carte blanche. She’ll do all the decorating and designing and make all landscaping decisions inside my requirements, and I’ve given her authority to hire a butler who’ll double as my chauffeur, two maids, three groundskeepers, a wrangler for the horses, and a cook. I like her taste, so I’m sure she’ll create me a wonderful vacation house that I’ll enjoy using when I’m there.”

“And when were you going to tell me about this?”

“When I was going to force you to move into it,” she said shamelessly. “But, I think I’m not going to get you out of that hovel condo, so I’m just going to claim it for my own.”

“Vil!”

“What? Did you really think I was just going to let it go, brother mine?” she asked impishly. “Besides, I rather like the location, and I won’t mind keeping it for myself. I’ll just find some other place for you and Jessie and force you to move into it.”

“You’re terrible!”

“Yes, I know,” she said gravely, which made him laugh despite himself.

Kit had no idea what Vil said, but one thing was abundantly clear, and that was the message was received.

Kit heard it from Sheila, who heard it from David, which was the oldest of the three children of Zach and Alicia that still lived with them. From what Kit had picked up, Vil had called at exactly 9:00 the morning after Kit warned her, and instead of talking to Zach, she instead talked to Alicia. David was in the room when the call was received. It lasted less than three minutes, and Alicia was barely able to put a single word in. David had no idea what Vil said, but when Alicia hung up the phone, she looked so spooked that her fur could have turned bone white. Not an hour after taking that phone call, Zachary and Alicia had shipped their three youngers off to Weston a day earlier than planned, boarded Zach’s private jet, and flew out of Boston without a single word to anyone.

That said something. Weston was a boarding school, to be sure, the most elite private school east of the Mississippi. It was only thirty miles outside of Boston, and the Vulpans had always lived at home and commuted to school, ferried by chauffeurs in nice cars. Kit had made that trip many times from Stonebrook, an actually pleasant thirty minute ride along winding country roads to the tree-covered grounds of that venerable old school. Zach and Alicia, however, preferred to board their children at Weston rather than allow them to live at home and commute, though they returned home every weekend.

Clearly, Vil had put the fear of God into Alicia Vulpan. Few femmes on earth could say so much in such a short time, and then scare someone into literally fleeing the city. But that seemed to be exactly what happened.

That was just fine with Kit. He just wanted all of this over, so he could go home with his wife and be in Austin for the birth of their daughter. If it took Vil calling and threatening Alicia with something so dire that it would make her flee Boston, that was just fine with him. It wasn't his fault that Steven died, it was Steven's own fault. Steven had tried to kill him and Jessie, so he had no love for his late cousin. But Kit had learned over the years that hate, especially unreasoning hate, was an emotion that could only be trumped by one thing, and that was fear. Vil had made Alicia more afraid than hateful.

They spent the next two days resting and preparing for Maine, as Jessie recovered from their gallivanting around New England and Kit continued to make calls to Austin. He was working on a new business idea, and that required research, research, research. Fortunately, though, researching was something with which he had a little experience. There was money to be made in Austin, and that money was in real estate.

Certainly not anytime soon, but with the severely depressed real estate market and the rash of foreclosures, there was definitely a huge business opportunity there for him, or anyone that had cash reserves at a time like this. The Vulpans had actually become filthy rich during the Great Depression, because in an economic climate like that, those that had money had the ability to buy up deflated assets and simply wait for their value to mature, among other things. There was a time, in the late 1930s, when the Vulpans literally owned half of Boston, but had sold off a majority of the real estate over the years, when it became profitable to sell. There were also opportunities to start businesses and make money during economic downturns, if one knew what businesses to open.

Kit's idea was a relatively simple one that would both make him money and also do some good in his adopted home city. What Kit was doing was researching the idea of becoming a real estate magnate, buying foreclosed property, but not selling it off. Kit's idea was to find the right houses and approach the distressed owners with a proposition; allow the house to go into foreclosure and Kit to buy it, then stay in the house as a renter. The rent would be cheaper than their mortgage, but structured in such a way that Kit would earn a profit on the property. He would also give the furs the chance to buy the house from him for a reasonable price that would allow him to earn a profit, but also would be less than their original mortgage. The profit on a single house wouldn't be all that much, but if he did that enough, he could generate some real income through sheer numbers. The trick of it would be to allow the houses to foreclose, which would allow him to buy them on the cheap and also drive down the property value of the house, which would reduce the taxes on the property. The scheme would be a short-term loss at least on paper, for the value of the house would go down in the short term, but then it would rise again over time. And this wasn't about making a quick buck. Any time one dabbled in real estate, one had to have their eyes on the horizon, not the road.

His idea would do three things. It would make him money, it would prevent families from being thrown out of their houses, and it would also prevent urban blight by putting furs in those empty houses, preferably the same ones that had been there before. By investing a little money now, he could see Laura coming into quite a handsome sum of money when she graduated from college, for she'd own dozens of houses and properties all over Austin and have a stable and reliable income rolling in through rent.

His research had shown him that the idea was feasible. Austin was being hit hard by the credit crisis and the housing collapse, and there were plenty of target properties out there to choose from, properties that would sell at auction for a greatly reduced price, but whose former mortgage holders would have the resources to pay the reduced rent Kit planned to charge. Much like Lupe, Kit would become a landlord, but instead of an apartment building, Kit would own a series of houses all over the city. The profit projections were 14%, which was a small yet consistent profit margin that would appreciate over time. The cost of the initial buying of the house at auction added to maintenance and taxes would be covered by charging a pro-rated rent of about 50-55% of the original mortgage payment. The trick would be choosing the right houses, houses that the big real estate companies might overlook. The big houses like the ones that Terry and the Brightons bought would be fought over by the holding companies and wouldn't be profitable for what he had in mind, but Kit was looking at the lower middle class houses, the working family houses he could buy for $25,000-$45,000 at auction, then rent out and make that money back. Kit would himself be mortgaging that property, but so long as the rent charged exceeded the 30 year mortgage payments at the current mortgage rate of 5.5%, he calculated that he only had to charge about $300 in monthly rent in order to turn a very modest profit, or $400 a month for a reasonable one. For middle class houses, which would auction from $60,000-$80,000, he'd have to charge a monthly rent of about $550 to turn a profit, but would probably set the rent at about $700, depending on the value of the house and how much he had to pay for it at auction.

What really, really made his idea work was the simple fact that the housing market in Austin was inflated right now. The average rent for a cheap two bedroom apartment was $500. When Kit made the offers to the families in distressed houses, they'd see that the rent they'd pay to Kit would be far cheaper than what they'd get elsewhere, and they'd jump all over it.

But, he also had to admit, that the idea would be tricky to initiate. For him to be able to compete with holding companies that might be after the same property, he'd have to pay cash on the spot for the houses, which always beat out any bid that relied on financing, even if it was higher. That was how it worked in Texas. Someone could outbid him by $20,000, but if Kit could write a check on the spot for the house, he'd get it. This was why most holding companies that made a business out of foreclosed properties always had an agent on the courthouse steps with a checkbook ready. He'd have to gamble his nest egg on those first couple of houses, buy them, then turn around and mortgage them at the deflated property value in order to recoup his cash payment, which he would then use to buy the next house. In order for it to work, he had to have agreements in place with the families before the houses came up to auction to ensure he'd have rent-paying tenants immediately, which would allow him to quickly flip the house into a mortgage and then recoup his capital for the next transaction. He'd also have to be able to mortgage the property for at least the money he paid for it, or he'd lose his operating capital and wouldn't be able to continue. This, Kit felt, wouldn't be a problem. So long as he was sure not to spend more on a house than he could successfully mortgage it to recover his cash, his plan would work. And he could accomplish that by being very careful about which houses he bought and what kinds of agreements he could reach with the prior owners before the auction. Holding companies went for value, what they could see getting for that house on a resale. That was their business plan. Kit was going to be operating in a different manner, and that meant that he'd be going after houses that the holding companies wouldn't want. They wanted the yuppie houses, the nice and modern houses yuppies bought at inflated prices and then lost when their ARMs reset to a payment too high for them to pay, then they would immediately turn around and try to sell the house at a profit. Kit would be after the real houses, lower and middle class family homes that he could buy cheaply then simply rent out and make a steady and reliable income over years.

It certainly looked feasible on paper...but that was on paper. When he got back home and investigated the idea further, he'd know if it would be practical.

That and fooling around with Jessie took up the rest of the week, and helped pass the time until the weekend. When Saturday did roll around, Suzy was at Stonebrook at seven, almost waking them up, wearing a tee shirt with the Canadian maple leaf on it and a pair of khaki shorts, and anxious to go. "Good lord, femme, you saw him just three days ago," Kit scoffed as she tried to rush them through breakfast.

"So?" she challenged as she wolfed down her breakfast at Jessie-like speed.

Suzy was hosting, so it was Suzy's travel plans...which were exotic. She'd spent a lot of money by hiring a jet to take them to Portland, and from there they would ride in a limo to Castine along U.S. 1, which would be a very scenic drive through the forests which would be starting to turn colors in just a week or two before the early Maine winter. But they'd still be green now, maybe one or two trees just starting to hint at golden leaves, but that'd be just about it. Suzy could spend her money any way she wanted, and if she wanted to hire a helicopter to take them, then that was her business. She'd made sure to plan for more than just the three of them, for though none of the Stonebrook staff was going, Nick and Sylvia were certainly going, but thankfully Suzy wasn't the type that needed servants around with her all the time. They'd taken Bartholomew and Luann along on their trips out of Boston mainly at Nick's request, and the two had barely done any work at all, along more as passengers and friends than as servants. Bartholomew had done some driving for them, but Luann had spent most of the trips sightseeing along with the Vulpans.

It was a nice flight in a clear, warm morning, accented by Jessie running to the nearest bathroom as soon as they landed at the airport in Portland. "It's the baby, she's pressing up against my bladder," she laughed in apology when she came out. Jessie managed to hold out for the lovely 90 minute drive to Castine in Suzy's father's limo, which she'd had sent up early to be waiting for them when they arrived. Suzy's family was rich, but they were by no means anywhere near close to being as rich as the Vulpans, and the limo showed it. It was basically a stretched Lincoln Town Car, just big enough to be a limo, but without many of the perks or toys that a Vulpan limo would carry. It did have a small TV screen and a DVD player in it, which were always lifesavers on long trips.

Castine was like a postcard come to life. It was situated at the very edge of a peninsula that jutted out into the Penobscot Bay and situated at the mouth of the Penobscot River, several blocks of typical New England architecture mixed with a few more modern buildings, but it had land on both sides, land that was separated from Castine by fjord-like channels that reached miles and miles inland. They could get in a boat and cross a hundred yards of water in minutes, but if they drove a car, it would take over an hour to get to the other side. The small village was much more than it appeared, however, for it had a Merchant Marine training center there as well as a small oceanographic institute, and it was the mainland side of a small ferry service that went out to one of the populated islands where Corey was going to be shooting some of his documentary. The bed and breakfast that Suzy had booked was literally on an island, and they took a boat over to it. It was across from the ferry landing, about fifty yards out, on a small grassy island dominated by a very large house. A dock with five boats tied up to it jutted out from a rocky coastline, and there were gravel pathways along the small island, benches and chairs in strategic places, and there was a small group of seals sunning themselves on rocks at the very tip of the island, which was fenced off to keep furs from bothering the seals. Corey was waiting for them on the dock along with a smaller, wiry badger and a femme prairie dog. He gave Suzy a healthy kiss when she bounded out of the boat and into his arms, then he kissed Jessie on the cheek in greeting. “Did you have a good trip?”

“It was nice and smooth,” Jessie answered. “Thank you so much for inviting us!”

“Hey, for you guys? Any time,” he smiled. “Guys, this is Dewey Martin and Iris Marshall, they’re my film crew. Dewey runs the camera, and Iris does about everything else,” he chuckled. “Guys, this is Kit and Jessie Vulpan. They’re friends of ours.”

“Well, I finally get to meet a legendary Vulpan,” the prairie dog grinned at him, shaking Kit’s paw. “Isn’t this place cool? A hotel on an island!”

“I was surprised to have to get in the boat,” Kit laughed. “How big is this island?”

“It’s like having a very large and very private yard,” Dewey said as he shook Kit’s paw. “This used to be some rich guy’s private summer house, but he sold it and they converted it to a B and B.”

“Let’s get you guys checked in and then hit the boat,” Corey said. “We’re going out to Islesboro Island so you can see one of the populated islands and meet some of the residents.”

“That sounds interesting,” Jessie nodded as one of the hotel workers started unloading their luggage from the water taxi.

“Well, it’s not exactly typical of the year-round island communities. Islesboro is more like Nantucket,” Corey noted. “There are a lot of rich fur summer houses there, but there are about three hundred permanent residents. Places like Long Island are more typical of the island communities. Long Island is one of the last year-round island communities that isn’t dominated by rich fur summer houses. We’ll be going out there after we visit Islesboro. I had my cousin send up his boat,” he chuckled.

“Boat?” Kit asked.

“Yeah, my cousin lent me one of his boats,” Corey said. “It’s moored on the other side of the island. It’s perfect for island hopping.”

That boat was more than just some little boat. It was a fifty foot long, sleek waverunner style speedboat, almost looking like a smuggler’s boat given it was built for speed and was large enough to carry passengers or cargo. It had a very nicely appointed deck with seating for eight, a raised steering deck above and behind it with seating for two that served as a shade for the back half of the sitting area on the deck, but it also had a small and comfortable combination galley/cabin below, with two futons built into the walls that served as couches during the day and beds during the night. There was a gruff looking mutt of a dog with wiry tan fur sitting up at the wheel already when they dropped off their luggage after checking in and went back out, and there was a mate standing by the quay waiting for them, a thin, whip-like ferret. “Are you ready to go, Mister Reeves?” the ferret asked.

“We certainly are, Vick,” he nodded. “Let’s board up and head out.”

“Where to, Mister Reeves?” the dog asked.

“Islesboro, Shocksley,” he called back as Nick helped Jessie over the gulf between boat and dock and settled her in.

“I’ve never been on a boat like this before,” Jessie said in both excitement and trepidation as she settled in, and Suzy sat beside her. Nick helped Iris over, then he and Sylvia stood under the steering deck as Dewey pulled out a camcorder and swept it across the deck, getting shots of them settling in as the ferret untied the boat from the dock.

“It’s been a Godsend,” Corey laughed. “There’s a lot of islands out here, and this boat is anything if not fast. It saves us a ton of time.”

“It’ll do seventy knots on calm seas,” the ferret said grandly as the boat pulled away from the dock.

“Damn,” Kit said in surprise as Jessie gave a similar start. As a pilot, she knew how fast that was.

“We don’t take it that fast all the time, since it’s a bit dangerous,” the ferret chuckled. “We’ll do a nice forty knots to Islesboro. Maybe fifty if it stays this calm once we get out of sheltered water.”

“How long will it take to get there?”

“At forty knots? About half an hour, given we have to circle the island to get to the dock we’re using,” the ferret answered.”

“It’ll take us about an hour to get out to Long Island,” Corey added. “But that’s because it’s up the coast a ways.”

It was a very nice trip out. Despite being mid-September, it was still surprisingly warm in Maine, and it was a very smooth trip on calm seas to Islesboro, with the wind in their hair and fur and good conversation taking up the spaces when they weren’t looking out at the coast, or out to sea. Several puffins flew by the boat, heading for a small rocky island about half a mile off the starboard bow, and the captain pointed out some dolphins to them. Jessie had enough time behind a plane’s yoke not to get seasick on the boat as they sailed to the large island not far from Castine, but the seas were too calm for seasickness to really be an issue.

Islesboro was a curious place. Corey took them around in a Jeep that looked to be surplus from the Korean War, but still ran well, as Iris and Dewey stayed behind at the dock to go take some shots of the airport on the island. Corey showed them the new, “modern” houses built and owned by the rich, then took them to the north side of the island, where much less grand houses stood along narrow streets in need of paving, typical New England houses with minimal windows that all faced south and a weathered appearance, houses whose paint had seen better years. Kit noticed that the streets were indeed paved everywhere, but then again, Islesboro was a big island and had rich furs living on it, but what he didn't see anywhere were traffic signs of any kind. There weren't even stripes on the asphalt. Kids were playing in the yards and the street, and he also saw that very few houses actually had a car in the driveway. Certainly some had them in the garages, since garages were very popular in the bitter New England winters, but in the late summer those cars would be parked out in the driveway.

“How do they get power out here?” Jessie asked as they passed by a house that had its porch light on.

“Underwater cables,” Corey answered. “They come ashore at the airport and branch out from there. That's one reason why they built the airport there.”

“Do they have gas?”

He shook his head. “The gas company never laid pipe out here, and that's fairly common in Maine. Much of the state is rural, and it's just too expensive for them to lay pipes that go for miles and miles just to service like ten customers. The gas companies are generally local to the bigger cities. Look around, Jessie, see that every house has a chimney? Well, wood stoves are a big here. But most houses don't rely just on a wood stove, they usually have a furnace or stove heated by heating oil, propane, or electricity.”

“Propane?”

He nodded. “Propane is big around here, folks use it for heating and cooking and hot water heaters. It's Maine's form of natural gas,” he said, pointing at a large gray tank by the side of one of the houses. “Propane tank. Tankers come out here and supply propane and heating oil, and a fuel service company brings it to the houses. It can be expensive, but then again, it's a lot cheaper than some alternatives. Wood's about the cheapest fuel, that's why wood stoves are so popular, with the other furnace just supplementing the wood stove. You can buy a cord of wood for about a hundred bucks and that lasts for quite a while."

"That's pretty cool," Jessie said. "In Cincinnati and Austin, everyone just uses gas or electric. I'd never heard of propane being used like natural gas before."

"Just one of the many ways New England is superior to the rest of the country," Corey said with a slight smile.

She laughed. "Hush, you."

Corey introduced them to several families from Islesboro as well. Kit wasn't surprised that every single fur that lived permanently on the island was a fox, while the "summer doves" were many different species. The foxes were all surprisingly friendly, inviting them into their houses for tea or coffee, houses that were all unlocked even when they weren't home. The summer doves, on the other paw, were more distant and aloof, and many of their houses were surrounded by fences, and were locked. A very striking difference in the cultures between the visitors and the permanent residents, and one that Corey went out of his way to demonstrate both to them and in his upcoming movie.

After about two hours touring Islesboro, they met up with Dewey and Iris again, piled into the boat, and took an hour-long trip to Long Island, home of one of the oldest permanent island communities, and home to the annual Lobster Festival that attracted furs from all over New England. It was a surprisingly hilly little island filled with old houses, streets that were poorly paved or gravel, and filled with cars that looked about ready to fall apart at any moment. “There are no inspection requirements for cars that stay on the islands, so they don’t care as long as they run,” Corey chuckled as a beaten, battered old Chevy Nova pattered by uncertainly, then backfired twice as the car slowed to make a turn at the corner as they came up from the pier, where a much newer Ford Escape was waiting for them.

Corey took them on a tour of Long Island, from the small, old lighthouse to the chapel at the top of the hill, and again took them to many different houses to meet the residents, many of which would be in his documentary. Just like on Islesboro, they were all foxes, and they were all exceptionally friendly and generous. They received dinner invitation at every house, and just about every femme fussed over the very pregnant Jessie and made her both very happy and a little embarrassed. Corey had something of a plan, though, for when they visited a large, worn-looking saltbox at the end of a street and paid a call to an elderly couple, Kit realized that the elderly vixen was cooking, and Corey accepted the old male’s invitation to stay for lunch immediately.

Corey had introduced them as Woody and Rebecca Sawyer, and they had the look of foxes who had lived in their old saltbox for so long that the house had all but conformed to them rather than them conforming to the house, and if their accents were any more Down Easter, they wouldn’t be speaking English. As they sat down in the living room with Woody and Rebecca as the lobsters boiled, they found out that Woody was a fisher, one of the venerable and celebrated lobstermales, who had plied his trade for forty years out in the Atlantic. Rebecca had been born and raised on the island, and was a schoolteacher her entire career, teaching on the island, until she retired two years ago. Woody had also been born and raised on the island, taking over the lobster boat from his father, but their sons hadn’t exactly gone into the family business. Their sons, all three of them, were fishers, but they weren't lobstermales. They jointly owned a fishing boat that sailed from Long Island, and were currently out swordfishing off Labrador. "Just like A Perfect Storm, but without the sinking," Woody had chuckled. "That's the kind of boat they own, a commercial fishing boat. They make a good living at it, too. My boys can smell a fish from twenty miles away," he said proudly.

"Is it as dangerous as they say?" Jessie asked.

"It can be dangerous, honey, but we're a tough breed Down East," he winked. "Takes a special breed to live out here, where the work is hard and the weather unforgiving. But I wouldn't live anywhere else in the world. If I were to die tomorrow and go to heaven, why, I'd still be on Long Island. Just with streets paved in gold," he chuckled.

"I can identify with that kind of loyalty to home," Kit said honestly. "We love where we live too."

"You're a Vulpan from your eyes, but I don't think you're talking about Boston."

"Austin, Texas," he said with a nod.

"Ah, you must be Kit Vulpan then?"

He nodded again with a chuckle. "In the nefarious flesh. What, this didn't give me away?" he asked, pointing at his half-missing left ear.

"We don't keep up much with mainland gossip," Rebecca smiled. "If it doesn't concern the island, it doesn't really concern us. But, I don't think there's a fox in New England that doesn't know about the Vulpan."

They stayed for lobster and talked about the island, and Kit found out that Corey had specifically picked this couple because they knew everything about Long Island. Woody knew the history of the island with such incredible detail that he could recall on what day of the week and what kind of weather it had been some events happened. Rebecca was the hub of the island's gossip machine, and she knew absolutely everything about the current events on the island, an island where everyone knew everyone, but Rebecca Sawyer knew everything about everyone. Woody and Rebecca were the royal family of Long Island, the longest-lived residents and as much a foundation of the island as the bedrock upon which it rested. Both of them had been born on the island, had never lived a single day off of the island, and their families were still here, all three of their sons and their daughter, who was a school teacher just like her mother had been. Woody was amiable and chatty, but Rebecca was very intent, asking very involved questions that dragged everything she wanted to know about Kit, Jessie, and Suzy out of them with amazing efficiency. After their rather amiable interrogation, Rebecca seemed to warm to them considerably, and announced that Corey was a fool if he didn't propose to Suzy before sunset.

Kit was honestly surprised when they left the couple's house and it was sunset. "Dear Lord, we were there for hours!" Suzy laughed as they returned to the car.

"Every time I go in there, I lose track of most of my day," Corey agreed with a chuckle. "Let's go back to the bed and breakfast."

"What's on the agenda for tomorrow?" Suzy asked.

"I didn't really plan tomorrow. Whatever you guys wanna do," he answered.

After a late dinner, Kit and Jessie talked with Suzy and Corey down in the common room for most of the night, then they retired to the nicely appointed room with a large, quilted bed that looked entirely too soft for him. He tested it gingerly as Jessie got ready for bed, then she gasped and put a paw on her belly. “Pretty kitty?”

“One of those false contractions,” she said with a laugh. “Laura’s been really energetic today.”

“Guess she likes going out,” Kit chuckled. “Back okay?”

“A little achy, but I’m not surprised,” she answered. “Just two weeks, handsome fox.”

“Actually, any time,” Kit corrected. “Remember what Doctor Mac said? We’re now officially in the window.”

“And here we are on an isolated island far from a hospital,” she laughed. “She seems pretty convinced I won’t deliver early, though.”

“She did say that Laura’s more developed than she expected,” Kit warned. “I think she’ll be early.”

“I think she’ll be on time,” Jessie countered.

“Oh-ho, that sounds like a bet,” he said challengingly. “I say she’ll be born before the due date.”

“You’re too broad,” she shot back as she climbed into bed. “Name a day or give up!”

“The twenty-fifth,” he declared immediately.

“And I still say she’ll be born on the thirtieth,” she retorted.

“So, loser does all crying baby calls after midnight for a week,” Kit offered.

“That’s not fair! I still have to get up to feed!”

“Well, there’s not much I can do about that. If I could, I don’t think you’d have wanted to marry me in the first place.”

She gave him a look, then laughed brightly. “I think you’re right about that. But if I win, you have to wake up and stay up whenever I’m up,” she challenged.

“I think that’s fair terms,” he said, “mainly because I’m gonna win.”

“You always lose against me, Kit Vulpan,” she teased. “And I’m the one that’s pregnant, you know. I think I can predict things better than you.”

“Pft, Laura’s gonna be a daddy’s girl.”

“Oh really?” Jessie challenged with a playful smile, flicking him on the nose. “Trying to steal my daughter from me before she’s even born, are we? Well, I’ll have to do something about that!”

Kit laughed as she hooked her little claws in him and pulled him down and wrapped her arms around him. “All you have to do is love me, pretty kitty, and I’m yours forever,” he told her.

“Well, at least you’re easy to please,” she purred as she kissed him. “I guess I’ll keep you. You’re my ticket to the big money, you know.”

Kit laughed. “So now you’re a gold-digger,” he declared.

“What can I say, living for months in the biggest manor in New England has made me see the light,” she said with utterly insincere haughtiness. “I am old money now!”

He gave her a look, then laughed so hard he almost broke his own ribs.

They had no plans for Sunday, but that was what made it so good. They spent the entire day with Corey and Suzy, and they started it on, of all things, Woody Sawyer's sons' fishing boat. Woody called and told Corey that the boat was back in, and they invited them onto it for a tour and a quick trip out. Jessie sat in the wheelhouse with Jack Sawyer as Kevin and George Sawyer and their crew of two foxes and an Acadian wolf showed them what it was like to be a commercial fisher. Their boat was a modular one that could adapt to fishing different types of fish, from net-fishing smaller fish like cod to the hook-fishing done with long strings for larger fish like marlin and swordfish. Jessie actually steered the boat for a while as the crew went through a mock fishing run with them, showing Kit just how hard the work they did was. They had lunch on the dock at Long Island with the Sawyer family and several others from the island, an impromptu fish fry and barbecue with lots of good food and some good conversation and companionship. Kit saw that Corey had worked very hard to be accepted by this small, tight-knit community, and seeing them together on the dock as lobsters boiled and fish and steaks were grilled. It also showed Kit what Corey was looking for with his documentary, the feeling of community that existed here, and was unique and strong.

After leaving Long Island, they became complete tourists. They took a water-borne tour of the lighthouses and sight-seeing points of Maine visible from a boat, spending most of the afternoon on the water as the captain took them from interesting point to interesting point. The ship took them from Portland to Acadian National Park, a trip that was much faster on a boat than it would have been in a car, because the seas were again calm and Corey's family's boat was able to run at 40 to 50 knots between the points of interest, all but flying over the surface of the sea...and pulling in several times so Jessie could run to the nearest bathroom. Kit spent much of the day watching Suzy and Corey, and what he saw pleased him. Corey was very attentive to Suzy, and she always wanted to be close to him, near him. Suzy honestly loved Corey, and thankfully, Corey seemed to be in love with her. They would be a good couple, once Corey finally proposed to her.

They returned to Castine after sunset, a sunset enjoyed on the trip back from Acadian National Park as the sun slipped behind the rugged shoreline of Maine, but they wouldn't be staying. The proprietors had checked them out but allowed them to store their luggage there to pick up later, and after they recovered their luggage, they were on their way back to Portland for a fifteen minute flight back to Boston. Corey said goodbye to them at the airport, and Nick carried their luggage into the Lear for them. "We had a wonderful time, Corey," Suzy told him, giving him a long kiss. "Thank you so much for the tour!"

"So, did Rebecca make you give her your phone number?" he asked with a slight smile.

Jessie laughed. "She did!" she admitted.

"She'll use it, trust me," he chuckled. "But she won't be annoying about it. I actually look forward to her calls."

"Yeah, she was really nice."

Suzy spent a very long moment saying goodbye to Corey, then she hurried up into the plane. "Well, I hope you guys enjoyed it."

"It was a great weekend, thanks Suzy," Kit said as she sat down across from him in the back of the Lear, and the pilot closed the hatch behind Sylvia.

“So, you’re going home this week?”

“Saturday,” Jessie answered. “Vil gets back on Friday, and we’re going home the day after. I’m going to miss Stonebrook a little bit.”

“Oh dear,” Kit said grimly, which made her burst out laughing.

“Not because of the house, but because I’ll miss Clancy and Stan and Luann and Bart and everyone,” she answered.

“Well, you won’t miss me,” Sylvia said simply.

“Huh?”

“Fraulein Vil hired me to go back to Austin,” she told them. “She texted me about an hour ago finalizing things.”

“Krichek, Barnett, and Donny say anything?”

“Krichek is going to accept. I don’t know about Barnett and Donny.”

“Wait a minute, accept what?”

“Fraulein Vil feels that Nick needs help in Austin, so she hired a few of us to go back and be there to discourage anyone from getting any ideas,” Sylvia told them. “We’ll be operating as Nick does, behind the scenes. You should never see us except when you want to, and you will be safe.”

Nick nodded. “It should be fun,” he grinned, which made Sylvia snort and sit down by the hatch.

“Wow, guess we can’t get rid of you guys,” Jessie laughed.

“Not unless you pay us more to leave than Vil did to stay,” Nick said with a sly smile.

“Get into a bidding war with a Vulpan! Please,” Jessie said, which made Nick laugh.

Chapter 40

It was their last week at Stonebrook, and everyone seemed to sense it.

For one, Clancy was much more active. Usually the old fox would have lunch with them and tea about every other day, but in the two days since they returned from Maine, he was a virtual fixture. He had all three meals with them and would often walk with him or Jessie, or come out of his apartment to spend quiet time with them in the TV room in the evenings before he went to bed. Kit was happy that he was willing to ignore that invisible line he himself had put up between “Vulpans and servants” and acted much more like what he really was, an old, old friend and someone whom Kit saw as a father figure.

Clancy wasn't the only member of the staff that was reacting to the impending departure of their young master. Luann seemed quite despondent over the idea of Jessie leaving, having become a friend to the young cat in addition to being her maid. Bartholomew and Stanley as well looked unhappy in those two days, but for different reasons, Kit figured. Stanley was going to feel like Stonebrook had no purpose if there was no Vulpan to serve, even one like Zach, while Bartholomew, like Luann, had become much more than just a servant to the young couple, had become a friend as well as an employee, so much so that it was to him that Kit took his mortgaging idea for a neutral second opinion. The MacArrens were more than just head butlers, they also were masters of accounting and had keen business sense, and Bartholomew was a solid fox to approach with his idea. Frannie and the other cooks were already complaining that they were going to miss their daily cooking lessons as they taught Jessie their recipes, including some Stonebrook exclusives, and some of the other mercs on the manor were quietly getting ready to move on to their next assignment with a little bit of reluctance. Nick had confided that all of them had enjoyed Stonebrook, but they also liked Kit and Jessie.

They really must, because every guard that Vil offered a position in Austin had taken it. There would be three guards moving to Texas on Saturday along with them. Sylvia, Krichek, and Barnett had all accepted Vil's contract to move to Austin and act as quiet background security for Kit, Jessie, and their coming daughter. Krichek had already left to arrange things, prepare Austin for Kit and Jessie's return while Nick and Sylvia stayed with them, and also while Barnett was transitioning all the increased security over to Stanley's control so the head butler could keep the security measures and know how to use them. All of them would be moving into the complex, scattered through the complex to provide complete coverage, and their job would generally be to keep Austin under strict Vulpan control and ensure that nobody with any hostile intent got within ten miles of the Vulpans. Kit wasn't sure he liked the idea of how much it must be costing Vil to hire four very professional and very expensive security guards, but on the other paw, he wanted absolute security for his daughter. Nick and the others would keep them safe, and Kit wasn't so naïve as to think that it was all over. Zach and Alicia were still a threat, and they wouldn't stay cowed forever. They had lost their eldest son, and he had no doubt that they blamed Kit for it. No, they would need help to be protected and safe in Austin, so Kit was not going to say a single word if Vil hired an entire army of guards. So long as they didn't feel like prisoners in Austin, he would welcome Sylvia and the other guards with open arms.

There were other plans to make as well. Jessie wouldn't be attending the fall semester because of Laura, but she would be back in school in January. When that time came, Kit would be the one caring for Laura, most likely taking her to work with him. He had a nice office that was more than large enough for a crib and a changing table. They also had an appointment in Kansas that Amanda wasn't letting them forget, given the package that arrived today with more stuff in it for their flight training. Amanda had literally already penned them in for two weeks in November where Jessie would get her commercial and Kit would get his ATP. He wasn't sure if they were going to make it, but he did still study his ATP material every night, and Jessie still picked up her commercial manuals with almost daily regularity. She wasn't as adamant about her flight training as he was, but she did enjoy it enough to want to improve herself...and if she was going to fly, then there was no earthly reason for her to not get a commercial. A commercial rating was the gold standard of sorts among pilots, opening a large number of doors for a pilot. Thankfully, she was also rather taken with the idea of getting her flight instructor's license, mainly because of the idea of being able to officially train friends and family in flying. Both Ben and Jenny had professed interest in learning to fly, Sandy, Danielle, and Lisa also seemed quite taken with flying now that Jessie, Sheila, and Allison had licenses, and if they had a couple of instructor-rated friends, they could literally learn to fly for free.

The other package he'd received that morning made him laugh. Vil had been in Monaco since Saturday, but she'd also been to the doctor the day before she left, and had had her cast removed. She was fully healthy again, but she'd had her cast very carefully taken off, put back together, and she'd shipped it to him. She'd had it mounted on a walnut stand, and it had a little brass plate on it that read My leg, your arm. We've paid the piper. Kit laughed when he read it, and vowed to hang his sling off of it to complete the adage pay an arm and a leg. She also sent a little gift box with a little crystal bell with the coat of arms of the ruling family of Monaco, which only remained separate from France so long as it continued to produce male heirs to the noble house, a little vial of sand taken from the beach, and a DVD filled with pictures of the Brighton villa, Vil, Kendall, and one picture at a dinner party with them and Kendall's brothers and Charlie Duke. It was small as villas went, but it was richly appointed and right on the beach, a very private beach where, in Vil's little scribbled letter and later a picture on the DVD supported, bathing suits were entirely optional. Kit had a rather scandalous picture of his sister and Kendall sunbathing in the nude on the beach, but the picture was taken from the rear at an angle, so all Kit saw was Vil's bare shoulders, an arm, a peek of the outside slope of her breast, the lounge chair, then her now uncasted leg...and the gaps in the lounge chair made it blatantly obvious that Vil was wearing nothing, while also not revealing anything to the camera that she wouldn't show on an American beach. All he could see of Kendall was his shoulders and tail, but Kit didn't have to go far to guess that he too was sunbathing nude.

The rash of socializing wasn't limited to the manor. Suzy had come over after work both days since the trip to Maine, and she showed them pictures yesterday of a house in Austin she fully intended to buy as a vacation house for her visits to Austin. Kit had to chuckle at that when he realized that he and Jessie were supporting a sudden boom in rich New England and British foxes buying vacation houses in Austin. Terry had bought one, the Brightons had bought one, Suzy was going to buy one, and Vil was having one built.

That was about halfway done. Kit told Rick about it, and the clever dingo, who knew the ranch country east of Austin very well, was able to track down the ranch and take some pictures of it. It was about five miles off 71 and about ten miles east of Bergstrom, out on the ranch roads and very well hidden if one didn't know the area very well. The house's frame was already up, covered in wallboard, the roof was up and shingled, and three other buildings were being erected behind and beside it...the gym, exterior garage and storage shop for the landscaping equipment, and pool house, Kit reasoned, with the horse stable and two barns visible behind the construction that Vil obviously intended to keep. Vil wouldn't build a manor without a poolhouse or some other outside dwelling, since it was all but a fixture on any manor. Judging from the pictures, Vil had a couple of hundred workers out there building her vacation house, and Rick noted that they'd be done with the major construction in about two weeks, going by the progress he could see. If they had the exterior wallboard up, then they were almost done with the exterior and were working on the interior. When they had the interior finished up to a certain point, they'd finish the exterior. The other pictures showed that the pool was already done, covered with a tarp and planking to protect the concrete from the construction of the pool house on the far side of it from the main house. Kit was surprised at how fast they'd done so much work, but then again, it shouldn't have been too much of a shock. Vil had a small army there, and Rick told him that a good crew could build a house from foundation to finish in three weeks if they had the foundation ready and had all the materials available.

The biggest surprise visit of them all was Sonya. She was back in Boston and attending Harvard for her final semester, which would be the semester she completed her Master's thesis and got her MBA. She called that morning and asked if it would be alright to come see them after class, and Jessie all but fell over herself inviting Sonya to dinner. That dinner was very warm and intimate, for Clancy and Suzy were also there, and it was a chance to remind himself just how tall Sonya was, and for the earthy coyote to get to know Kit and Jessie much better...and Kit liked what he saw, even if he did have to look up to see it. Sonya was new money, but she was very smart and had a great deal of common sense. She was like him, a common fur in the rich fur's world, and like him she didn't give a flip what proper society thought about her. She would be going back to Nebraska when she graduated, so she couldn't care less about her reputation among Boston blue-bloods. They showed her all the pictures Vil sent them and the cast, which made her laugh, and they spent a very pleasant evening with friends and family.

Wednesday started real work for them. They would be on Vil's private jet and on the way home on Saturday morning, and there was plenty to do. They had to pack up everything Lupe had sent up to them and everything they'd accumulated since coming to Boston, but they also had to go through it and decide what they wanted to keep, and what they wanted to leave behind. The manor was his as was everything in it, so he had some serious choices to make. The huge private DVD collection was a perfect example. Kit rather liked having a few thousand movies at his fingertips and he could easily take it home with him, but the serious issue of just where he'd put the four shelf units that held the DVDs at home reared its ugly head. But, in the end, Kit and Jessie decided to go through it and select about 100 DVDs to take home with them, taking the movies they liked the most and leaving the rest at Stonebrook. There were a few other instances of them taking a small part of Stonebrook home with them. The cooks went through the kitchen and picked out a few things that Jessie didn't have back home, then Stanley went out and bought them and had them shipped straight to Lupe. Luann had the bedspread and mattress apron on the bed, which Jessie adored, boxed up and sent to Austin, along with four of the warming tea plates and two tea stands, which Kit found rather useful and knew exactly where he'd put them at home. They also had to pack up the gifts Jessie received during her shower, which had been stored in the manor until such time Jessie either had the baby or went home.

They spent all of Wednesday both packing up their own things, and having the staff secretly or openly add things to it, to the point where their townhouse was going to be cluttered with stuff until they could get rid of some of their old things...which would all be shipped to Stonebrook for storage or given to the sorority, depending on how much they wanted to keep it. The only thing that Kit didn't mind going home with him was a healthy supply of Stonebrook blend tea, and a promise from Stanley that replacement boxes of the custom blended tea would arrive in Austin every Friday to replace what he used the week before. If Kit was going to own Stonebrook, then he may as well take advantage of it by getting an unlimited supply of real tea, loose-leaf custom blended tea, not Lipton in teabags. There were a few oddities thrown in there, that was for sure.

The first was Nick's K-80 competition shotgun, which was worth a hell of a lot of money. When Jessie put it back in its case and took it to him, he just laughed and waggled his paw at her. "Keep using it, dove," he told her. "You like it, you'll actually use it, and I can always sell it later. So consider it to be on loan to you, because I live just twenty meters from you, you know," he grinned. "I know where it is."

"That's true," Jessie admitted. "And you know where to come get it when you finally sell it."

Nick's shotgun wasn't the only gun that was going home with them officially rather than with Nick. The wolf hadn't been joking when he said that there would be some serious firepower in the Vulpan townhouse, because Nick told him, rather casually, that Vil had bought the MP7 currently sitting in the secret room from him, and Vil had bought the Glock that Kit had been forced to carry around and had bought a Beretta 92 exactly like Sylvia's for Jessie to carry back in Austin, and they were now theirs. Vil had set up that collector's permit along with Kit's and Jessie's concealed carry licenses--under the table of course--which would allow Kit to own that gun legally, even though submachine guns were illegal and Heckler and Koch assault weapons were illegal to buy, sell, or possess in the United States. But Vil had set it up with the ATF that Kit was a collector, and that weapon was part of a collection, which gave him the ability to possess it legally, even buy other illegal weapons legally under the condition that he could only buy one, and could never buy another of that make and model again in his lifetime. The ATF wouldn't have made that special exception for just anyone, even established and avid collectors. Vil's name and connections made it happen, and so long as Kit didn't take it down to the range and use it, he was within his legal rights to own it, and even allowed him to buy more legally so long as he only bought one. He could never buy another MP7A1, but there was nothing stopping him from buying a MP7A2, or one of every model there was of the MP-5, because his collector's license allowed him to buy one and only one of any make and model of firearm.

The rules were much different for the rich.

Another oddity going home with them wasn't so much an oddity as it was a guilty pleasure. They didn't own any TV as nice as some of the “junk” TVs scattered through the manor, so Kit arranged to have one of the 52 inch plasma TVs in the manor sent home with them, but Stanley, feeling that just a TV wasn’t good enough, threw in a Dolby 5.1 Surround Sound system that doubled as a component audio system along with it, which was paw over fist better than the stereo system they had at home. Jessie found it amusing that a fox that didn’t watch much TV wanted to steal one of the home theater systems from Stonebrook, until she realized that watching the movies they were taking home and Ben’s football games on that TV would be much better than the 34 inch LCD TV they had now. He’d move the TV they were using now to the bedroom, move the stereo to the bedroom or give it to the sorority, and then they’d have a home theatre nice enough to make Lupe unbelievably jealous.

So, Kit and Jessie were going home with a machine gun, a Glock pistol which was his, a Beretta 92 for Jessie, Nick’s K-80 which would make Jessie the envy of every skeet shooter down at the range, an unlimited supply of Stonebrook tea, and one home theatre system complete with a substantial expansion to the DVD collection they had at home. And concerning the guns, Kit wouldn’t say a word. He was already resigned to the idea that he’d be carrying his Glock even at home, and he sure as hell didn’t want Jessie going anywhere without her Beretta in her purse, even on top of the protection that Nick and Sylvia provided. Back in Austin, the guards wouldn’t be escorting them everywhere, so they would need some means to protect themselves if the unthinkable happened and they were attacked. Kit had not forgotten and would never forget that it was Rick’s concealed carry pistol that had literally saved his life. If ever put in that position again, he wanted the ability to protect himself, and for Jessie to be able to protect herself and their daughter, from attack. So, when he got home, Kit was going to look into a concealed belt holster for when the shoulder holster wouldn't be hidden.

It took them almost all day to finish packing up that which they wouldn't use for the next couple of days...which was only their toiletries and enough clothes to last until Saturday. The manor provided duplicates of everything they packed away immediately, so they wouldn't be sacrificing anything. Stanley would have it all shipped to Austin in the morning, where it would be waiting for them when they got home.

Suzy and Sonya both came over for dinner again on Wednesday, and Clancy again came out of his apartment to join them, so they had another enjoyable night.

Thursday, the sense of impending change was heavy in the air, for Barnett left that morning along with the packed boxes. Barnett was going to go join Krichek in Austin, and thanks to a call to Lupe, all of them already had their apartments. They were unfurnished, but Krichek was taking care of that. Instead of buying furniture when they got to Austin, Krichek had sent pictures of different furniture sets up to Stonebrook, and Barnett and Sylvia used them to pick out the furniture they wanted, which Krichek then bought. The apartments would have all the furniture they'd need before they even set foot in them, leaving them only to buy the little things that would make the apartments more like homes. Sylvia was having some things sent from Germany, for unlike Nick, she had a permanent house just outside of Berlin. Nick lived out of his plane. Kit rather thought he'd like to see what kind of things Sylvia had, what kind of taste she had in home decor. Sylvia was a soldier and a mercenary, but she was also a femme, and she had a femme's tastes if her taste in dresses was any kind of indication. She definitely had a very elegant sense of style.

Thursday evening, they had another pleasant surprise, for Muffy had come up from Yale to stay overnight. “I’m blowing off class tomorrow,” she told them. “Besides, I kinda promised to stay til you leave.”

“And I made you go to school!” Jessie said imperiously even as she hugged the shorter vixen.

“Yeah, well, I’m not missing anything tomorrow,” she grinned. “I’d much rather be here. Tomorrow’s your last day here, you know. Back to the slums!”

“I can’t wait to go back to my slum,” Kit said fervently, to which Jessie laughed and nodded.

“This has been almost surreal, and I’ll be glad to be home,” she mirrored. “There must be an inch of dust all over everything!”

“Lupe promised to take care of everything,” Kit protested.

“Have you seen his house?” she countered. “He has no idea what Pledge is!”

“Point,” he admitted.

“And Mom will be there next Friday!” she said, almost worriedly. “I only have a week to get the house clean!”

“Your mom is going to Austin?”

Jessie nodded. “She wants to be there when I deliver. Mister and Misses Brighton said they were coming too.”

“And I seriously doubt that Vil’s going to miss it,” Kit added. “She won’t come down early, but the instant you go into labor, she’ll be on her jet and have it go full throttle to get here.”

Muffy settled into the same room she'd been using, but she had barely managed to come out before Suzy and Sonya arrived again, looking for another free meal. They took them in and promised them dinner, but the real motive was revealed when Bartholomew brought in a few boxes. "What is this?" Jessie demanded, pointing.

"Oh, we're throwing you a farewell party tomorrow, as soon as Vil gets home," Suzy told them. "Those are the decorations."

"We're doing it all ourselves, no servants," Sonya added.

"Well, I'll certainly help, and not as a servant," Bartholomew snorted. "So will just about anyone in the manor. Master Kit and Mistress Jessie are more to us than employers."

"Pick a nice room for the party, Bart, and put them in there. We'll put them up tomorrow morning. And keep those two out of it!" Suzy barked, pointing at Kit and Jessie.

"I'll put them in the sun room. That room has locks on the doors, and naturally, me and my father are the only ones with keys to the locks," he said with a slight smile.

"I pay your salary, you know!" Kit threatened with utterly insincere outrage in his voice.

Bartholomew wagged his tail at Kit as he and Oscar carried the boxes towards the back stairs, which made Jessie giggle.

"We'll have the party as soon as Vil feels up to it," Suzy announced. "Has she changed her plans?"

“Not that I know of,” Kit answered. “She’s supposed to get in tomorrow around ten or so, give or take.”

“That’s what she told me, too,” she nodded. “To think she’ll be in the air for six hours and it’ll only be three hours after she left,” she laughed.

“The perils of jet travel,” Kit shrugged. “At least they’ll be traveling west, and the pilots won’t have the sun in their faces the entire trip. I wonder why she’s flying in in the morning rather than the evening.”

“Probably so she has a long weekend to get settled in before going back to work,” Suzy guessed.

Jessie put her foot down that evening, and refused to allow the cooks to make dinner for them. She did it herself, making goulash, broccoli, and salad, which surprised Suzy a little bit. “What is this stuff?”

“Just try it,” Kit said mildly as he spooned a large helping onto his plate.

“I haven’t had goulash in years!” Sonya said brightly, taking her turn with the ladle.

“It sounds like a moldy boot,” Suzy declared, which made Jessie laugh.

“Well, I did use leather in the recipe,” she winked.

“Hush, mean kitty,” Suzy said, then she took a testing bite. Her eyes lit up. “This is good!”

“Then eat,” Kit told her. “Just mind the shoestrings.”

Suzy elbowed him. And she wasn’t gentle.

The combination of Muffy, Suzy, and Sonya made it a late night for them, and they managed to make it to bed around midnight. Kit settled in with Jessie and sighed. "Tomorrow's our last day here," he noted. "Full day, that is. What do you think?"

"I think I'll miss the furs here, but I won't miss Boston," she answered. "I want to go home, my handsome fox."

"That's the second best thing I've ever heard you say," he said with relief, nuzzling her.

"Second best?" she challenged. "And just which is better than that, 'I love you' or 'Yes?'"

"Well, I don't really care if you love me now that we're married," he said flippantly, "so I'd have to put 'I love you' at number three. You saying yes ensured I have a free maid for the rest of my life. That was what was really important, you know."

She laughed so hard that she missed when she tried to bop him with the pillow. He wrapped her up in his arms and pulled her down to the bed, then put his head on her upper chest and a paw on her distended belly. "I know what'll knock those out of the top three," he said gently, feeling a little thrill when he felt Laura kick against his paw. "The sound of our baby."

"Amen, handsome fox," she agreed, putting her paw over his and her chin on the top of his head, just over his damaged ear. "I love you."

"I love you too, pretty kitty," he returned immediately and with utter honesty in his voice.

Vil was nothing if not punctual. For a femme who took her commitments seriously, the promise to be at a certain place at a certain time was a serious matter, and it reflected bad on her when she was late, even as it annoyed her that she had failed to keep her word.

However, two complications to her rigidly scheduled life had intruded themselves into her ordered and highly structured domain; a somewhat irreverent husband and the fact that she was coming home from her honeymoon.

In that respect, Kendall was the best thing that ever happened to his sister. She was so orderly and organized that he wouldn't be surprised if she put bathroom time in her Blackberry's daily planner. Kendall would disrupt that scheduled life, introduce elements of pure randomness, even some silliness, that she desperately needed to help decompress her from the stresses of running a multi-billion dollar conglomerate of companies, two of which were multi-billion dollar companies all by themselves, Vulpan Shipyards and Vulpan Steel. She needed someone that would take her Blackberry and throw it out the window and make her live a little, someone that would surprise her, challenge her, even make her a little angry from time to time. Kendall was the perfect male for Vil, because he was an intelligent young fox with a mischievous streak, and he'd urge Vil to not just bring home the bacon, but enjoy it in ways far more than simply enjoying the perks of being rich. He'd make her appreciate life, make her look forward to coming home from work every day because she would be going home to a loving husband who would both make her laugh and make her feel wanted and cherished.

So, when they were late, Kit suspected that reluctance to leave Monaco had something to do with it. Vil called them from the jet at 8:30, as they were having breakfast with Muffy, a breakfast of scrambled eggs and sausage made by Jessie. “Hey bro,” she called over the faint hum of the jet’s engines. “We’re running a little late.”

“Late? Vil? Late? Look outside, pretty kitty, and make sure the sky isn’t falling,” he said, which made both femmes laugh.

“Oh hush you,” Vil snorted. “We’re only about an hour behind schedule. I just wanted to call and warn you, so you don’t get all ready to go and then have to wait.”

“Who said we’re coming to pick you up, femme?” he teased. “I think you know the way from the airport all by yourself.”

“You’d better be standing on that tarmac when we get there,” she said darkly, which made him laugh. “Besides, we have to go to the office as soon as I get back.”

“That’s true,” he realized. “I have to file a letter of resignation.”

“Well, I’m not accepting it,” she said bluntly. “I want to keep you on the board for a while longer, brother.”

“We had a deal!”

“No, you had a plan, I never agreed to it,” she countered. “Besides, to be very blunt about it, I want you on the board because I want one Vulpan on the board that I absolutely know beyond any shadow of a doubt will never backstab me. I trust Terry and Brian, but I don’t know if I can trust them in ten years. You, I never have to worry about, brother mine.”

He couldn’t refute her logic, but he also saw that it was recent events that were influencing her position. He knew better to argue the point for now, but in five or six months, when things were much calmer, he felt he could talk her into letting him quit. But right now, that was a brick wall just waiting for him to try to ram his head against it.

“That’s one reason why we’re going to the office. With Steven dead, things have changed a little bit. He had stock, and if you recall, stocks revert back to the company on the death of the owner, so I have to deal with them. I have to schedule a Monday meeting to have the stocks held by the board redistributed equally among the seats, minus myself, and I’m going to give back the stocks I took from them to sell to you, which should make them happy. Since the dividends were disbursed just a couple of weeks ago, this is the perfect time for it.”

“You know, I didn’t get my dividends this quarter. I checked my bank account last week, and it’s not there.”

“What? They damn well have better paid your dividends!” she barked. “Ken! Get the office on the other phone right now! You should have received your dividends on the sixth!”

“Kit, love, you checked the checking account. Did you have them send you the records on the money market account too, or just the checking account?” Jessie asked.

Kit laughed suddenly. “You’re right, pretty kitty!” he realized. “Don’t declare war yet, sis,” he warned. “Jessie pointed out that I didn’t check the money market account, and that’s where the dividends are deposited.”

“That could be it,” Vil said. “Did you get your money back from the charter?”

“I did, that’s why I had to have them send my transaction records in the first place,” he answered. “Too much money in the bank. They’re depositing Jessie’s salary into the checking account, but the dividends should be going to the money market account.”

“That’s what they should be doing, I wanted Jessie’s pay going to the checking account. Let me call and make absolutely sure your dividends were disbursed. And you call your bank and make sure it’s there. I don’t want this hanging over my head the rest of the flight home. I want to make sure it was done right.”

“Alright. Call you back in a few minutes.”

A call to the bank confirmed Jessie’s suspicion. The dividends were indeed paid on the 6th of September for the third quarter, but what startled him, and what he forgot, was that he had more stock right now because he was on the board. His one dollar a year salary didn’t encompass stock dividends, and Vil warned him that he’d be earning dividends off the board stock in addition to his own so long as he was on the board. So, instead of the usual approximate $31,000 he was expecting, his dividend payment for all the shares of the three companies he currently controlled came to $122,947.39.

Over a hundred twenty thousand dollars for just one quarter! He earned triple from the board stocks than he did from his personal stocks!

“Holy hairballs,” Kit gasped when he hung up the phone, which made Muffy burst into laughter.

“What’s wrong, love?”

“Vil is what’s wrong,” he said. “I completely forgot about how she set up my board membership. She found a way to sneak us extra money,” he said as he speed-dialed Vil. “Sis. I got the dividends, and if I wouldn’t have signed that contract, I’d be waiting for you to get off the plane so I could slap you.”

She laughed brightly. “Finally figured it out, didn’t ya?” she teased. “I told you you’d get a bigger dividend!”

“I was expecting a few thousand dollars more, not triple my usual dividend on top of my dividend!”

“That’s because you’re earning board rate on all your stocks,” she said dismissively. “You are on the board, Kit, and not just on paper. Just throw it in a T-bill or something, bro. You need that money for Laura.”

“Well, I can’t argue with that right now. It’s hard to argue about money when my daughter is only days from being born. I want a nice big bank account on paw just in case we need it,” he declared, to which Jessie nodded emphatically.

“Good. You just saved yourself getting chewed out in front of your wife.”

“Suuuure,” he drawled, which made her laugh.

“We should be there in about four hours. I’ll call right about an hour out, so you can get here.”

“Alright. Talk to you later, sis.”

“See you soon, bro.”

Kit hung up the phone and blew out his breath. “I am so glad I hired that accounting firm,” he grunted. “Our taxes are going to be murder next year.”

“That’s a good thing,” Muffy chuckled.

“You’ve never done your taxes before, Muffy,” he said accusingly.

“Well, you’re not doing yours either,” she retorted.

“No, but unlike you, I have to keep track of everything. Who do you think keeps all the paperwork in order?”

“Oh. Well, sucks to be you then,” she said flippantly, then she squealed with laughter and rushed from the room when Kit lunged at her.

They didn’t spend the time waiting for Vil idly. They were leaving tomorrow, and despite everything being packed, there was plenty to do. Both Kit and Jessie spent a lot of time on the phone calling down to Austin, getting everything ready. Jessie called Doctor Mac and reaffirmed her appointment on Tuesday, Kit called about half the gang but focused on Rick and Pat to organize his return to the office, and Jessie also called through most of the sorority to arrange her return to the fold...in a matronly sense. In some ways, Jessie was almost like the sorority mom now, cooking for them, being the shoulder they could cry on when they needed it, and just generally always being there for them, which was one reason why every femme in the sorority loved Jessie. She had been their little sister when she arrived, always looking out for her, but now she was their mom, and she was the one looking out for them. Jessie’s compassionate, kind nature was one of the most endearing things about her, and to Kit, it marked the inner strength he had always seen in her. It takes a strong femme to care as much about others as she does herself.

Jessie also spent an inordinate amount of time on the phone with Sheila and Allison, and she looked a bit miffed when she got off the phone. “Your cousin is a sneaky rat!” she declared.

“What’s the matter?”

“She had our townhouse cleaned by her maid service!” she cried.

“So? I think that was very sweet of her, and now we don’t have to do it,” Kit said. “We won’t kick up a dust storm when we open the door.”

“But, strangers were in our house, love! Looking through all our stuff! What if they found the box?” she asked with a gasp, mentioning the box in the closet that had the DVD with the pictures they took on their honeymoon.

“I think that you feel you were cheated out of doing a whole lot of unpleasant work you felt you had to do because you haven’t been doing it lately,” he said sagely. “Luann has cleaned the room a couple of times this week.”

Her cheeks ruffled almost immediately, then she laughed helplessly. “We’ve been so busy,” she said defensively.

“And you forgot to do it, so Luann just came in behind you and tidied up,” he finished. “Besides, you shouldn’t be doing any heavy work right now, in your condition.”

She laughed again. “Don’t get all protective on me now, Kitstrom Lucas Vulpan!”

“Who said I was being protective? Cute girls should do housework naked. I’ve told you that over and over again. Strip off those clothes and wiggle that cute little butt of yours as you bend down to make the bed, and you'll be in proper condition to clean."

He ducked to avoid the pillow that was launched at him.

Because they had so many plans to make and so many friends to call, they were busy right up until Vil called to give them about an hour's warning. "We're somewhere over the Atlantic, but Avery says we're about an hour out," she told him. "So, come get us, bro. We need a ride home."

"Liar," he laughed.

Two limos pulled out of Stonebrook about fifteen minutes later. One of them was empty, but the other had Kit, Jessie, Muffy, Sonya, and Suzy inside. Kit and Jessie were still making calls to Austin as they finalized everything, and Lupe was the last one he called. "So, what time you pullin' in, brah?"

"We're not sure yet, because we don't have a set departure time," he answered. "Just whenever we get up and get to the airport."

"Need me to come get ya?"

"Nah, Rick's gonna take care of it. He has my truck, after all," Kit chuckled. "How is the car?"

"I've been drivin' it about once a week to keep it good, brah," he answered. Rick had Kit's truck and Martha had been using Jessie's van, but Lupe had Jessie's car. "Ain't good for a car to just sit."

"True enough," he agreed. "Do me a favor and go into the house and turn down our air conditioning."

“Already taken care of, brah,” he said. “We got your house all set up for ya, and all that stuff that got shipped down from Boston is in boxes in the living room waitin’ for ya to go through it. Sheila had her maid service go in there and clean it yesterday.”

“Yeah, she told us. That was nice of her to think about it. We weren’t looking forward to battling the dust bunnies.”

Lupe laughed. “They can get vicious if you give them time to grow,” he agreed. “And I put back all your stuff I borrowed while you were gone, brah,” he added.

Kit chuckled. “Well, as long as nothing’s broken.”

“If it’s broke, you’ll never notice.”

“Oh, can you smell the lawsuit,” Kit taunted.

Lupe laughed suddenly. “Brah, don’t be mean to your best bud!” he protested.

“That’s what friends are for. To use and then throw away.”

Lupe laughed helplessly.

Vil’s jet landed about ten minutes after they arrived at Signature’s hangar, and they were all standing out on the tarmac as it taxied up and came to a stop. The ground crew ran out and chocked the wheels and opened the cargo hatch after the engines were powered down, and then the hatch opened and the stairs extended. Avery stepped back, and Vil appeared in the hatchway, wearing a tee shirt and a pair of shorts of all things, and she was not in a cast. Her fur was a tiny bit lighter than usual, bleached by the Riviera sun. She walked maybe a tiny bit less certain than usual as she came down the steps with Kendall right behind her, in a tank top and a baggy pair of Bermuda shorts, but Kit didn't think that was unusual for a femme who had had her leg broken and had only been out of the cast for a week. Her leg had to get its strength back, and that wasn't something that happened the day after the cast came off. It had taken Kit's arm and shoulder over a month to fully recover after he was out of the sling, and that was with weekly physical therapy. He had no doubt that Vil's doctors had her on a physical therapy regimen to get her leg back up to par, or they would start one now that she was home from her honeymoon.

Kit folded her into a big hug when she got off the stairs. "You look like a beach bum!" he laughed as he greeted her.

"I was enjoying being one," she laughed in reply, patting him on the back. "I'm glad to be home, though."

"We had a great time," Kendall said as he shook Kit's paw after Vil moved on to hug and greet Jessie.

"You'd better, or we'd be attending Vil's wedding to Harry next month," Kit told him, which made him laugh brightly.

"We had a great time outside the bedroom as well as inside," he corrected with a wolfish smile. "Vil even came home richer."

"Eh?"

"We visited Monaco's casino," he laughed. "She won fifteen thousand dollars in there. Never play that femme in poker, Kit. Never ever ever."

"So, she cleaned out the suckers?"

“More like scared them into folding repeatedly,” he said as he hugged Jessie. “There you are, you beautiful girl! Ready to throw over the Vulpans and run off together?”

Jessie grinned at him. “Sorry, you’re not fox enough to make me give up my Kit.”

“Rejected again,” he sighed, which made Jessie burst into a fit of girlish giggling.

“I’ll show you some rejection, you femmanizer,” Vil said, slapping him lightly on the shoulder after hugging Sonya in greeting. “Well, let’s not spend all day out here on the tarmac. I heard there’s a farewell party in the works back at Stonebrook.”

“Just waiting for you, Vil,” Suzy told her.

“We’re getting rid of Vil already? Why don’t you guys tell me these things?” Kendall demanded. “I haven’t even made her meow like a cat yet!”

“That’s your fault, not mine,” Vil said in a voice that made just about everyone crack up.

Suzy and Sonya rode in the second limo with Stav and Marcus, giving the Vulpans a chance for a little private conversation on the way back to Stonebrook. Vil and Kendall fell over themselves describing their honeymoon, from their week in Florida spent mainly in the bedroom and on sloops and yachts on the water, to the week at the villa in Monaco, lazy days spent lounging on the beach and nights spent club-hopping or staying in the villa. Vil had her camera with her, and she showed them quite a few pictures of Monaco that she didn’t send on the DVD, its beaches, its architecture, and the swimsuit optional public beaches that made Jessie's cheeks ruffle.

“Who took that picture of the two of you without suits?” Kit asked with a chuckle.

“One of the servants in the villa,” she answered. “Unfortunately, someone got a much better picture of us that ran in a French tabloid,” she grunted. “It was taken from a boat offshore with a telephoto lens. They had to use some black bars, though. And a pretty good-sized one,” she said, giving Kendall a sidelong look that made him laugh. “We were walking along on the beach.”

“They took naked pictures of you? That's awful!”

“It also pissed off the old male,” Kendall said. “He took steps.”

“He's going after the tabloid,” Vil said with a nod. “He intends to run them out of business. They broke French law when they printed the picture without our permission, part of the paparazzi reforms after Princess Di was killed. The paper is claiming that since it was taken in Monaco the law doesn't apply, but it'll be a moot point. Winston will simply put a legal team on them with orders to litigate them into the ground. You do not cross the Brightons if you're in Europe.”

“Too right, love,” Kendall nodded. “The old male will have that tabloid out of business by Wednesday, you mark my words. And the photographer that took it will never work in photography again.”

“I just hope that the tabloids over here don't print the picture,” Jessie said.

“The French put a legal injunction on it,” she answered. “The tabloid can’t sell or redistribute it, and the French confiscated every copy of it they could get their paws on. They even somehow managed to prevent the tabloid from putting the picture on the internet, but I have no idea how they pulled that off. I certainly don’t mind that.”

“I wouldn’t,” Jessie agreed with a nod. “Did you have much trouble after getting your cast off?”

“I limped a little the first couple of days,” she chuckled. “The doctors are going to start me on physical therapy on Monday so I can get my leg rehabilitated. They wanted to start it the day after I got my cast off, but I was on my honeymoon,” she said, bristling slightly. “Besides, I didn’t spend all that much time on my feet,” she added, giving Kendall a slight look that made him clear his throat, and made both Kit and Jessie explode into laughter.

“I’m going to need some physical therapy for my back,” the British fox complained. “I wasn’t kidding when I was talking about all that repressed sexual tension.”

“Well, you’ll have to keep working on me so I can let it all out, Kenny,” she told him. “Because until I’m pregnant, you get no rest.”

“Oh trust me, I’ve already been told that by the old male,” he retorted. “I’m being dragged to the bedroom by both sides of the family!”

“Oh, keep talking like it’s a chore,” she said in a frosty tone.

“Well, it can be,” he said with utterly insincere sobriety in his voice. “All you do is lay there, femme. I do all the work. You reap the rewards of all my labor!”

Jessie spluttered, then almost fell sideways on the seat in laughter at the cold stare Vil leveled on her husband. He winked at her, and she laughed despite herself as he put his arm around her and kissed her fondly on the side of her muzzle. “But it’s a labor of love,” he said in a gentle voice. Kit saw his sister melt against her husband, fit herself against him and accept his attention, and that told him more than anything that Vil truly did love Kendall Brighton.

Fortunately, they weren’t at the office very long. Vil stormed in unannounced, putting the building on its ear, and went straight to her office. All three of her secretaries rushed in with her, a red vixen, a male fox, and a gray vixen, and while they stood by and listened, Vil gave the male a flash drive holding the board change proposition proposal, and had the red vixen schedule a board meeting for 10:00 on Monday morning. “Get everything that needs my attention organized and have it on my desk Monday morning,” she commanded the third. “Anything that’s critical, give me right now, and I’ll go over it over the weekend.”

“I have it all ready for you, Misses Vulpan,” the young gray vixen said immediately, offering Vil her briefcase, which she had left at work before her wedding. “Organized by importance.”

“Very good, Miss Harmon,” she nodded. “I’m not available until Saturday afternoon. So don’t even try.”

“Yes, ma’am,” the three secretaries said in unison.

“Get it done, good work while I was gone, and see you on Monday,” she commanded, then she led them right back out of her office as quickly as they entered.

“That was fast,” Jessie laughed.

“I’m not known for chitchat when I’m at the office, Jessie,” Vil said with a mild chuckle. “They may be young, but Harmon, Bell, and Thatcher keep the whole company running smoothly.”

“You don’t have an executive assistant?” Jessie asked.

She shook her head. “It would be too much work for just one fox, so I have three assistants, and each one more or less specializes in one aspect of keeping my office going. Harmon arranges my in-box paperwork, sorting it by importance and making sure it’s all correct, Bell deals with my out-box paperwork, making sure my orders are carried out, and Thatcher manages my calendar, schedule, and appointments. Oh, and don’t let the secretary title fool you, sis, those three make even more money than you do, and they are executives. But those three back there have more power in this company than just about anyone else,” she laughed. “Everyone knows they have to get past Thatcher to get to me, they know if they so much as don’t dot an I on something they send to me, Harmon will be giving them a call, and they know that Bell will be like a pit bull making sure my orders are carried out to my satisfaction.”

“Which one does your research?” Kit asked.

“All three do, handling the research for their role in the office. Harmon always knows what’s most important because she researches every piece of paper that hits my in-box, Thatcher researches all furs I do business with and all locations I visit before I go, and Bell researches past action of my office and the board and analyzes its impact and success. If it’s something outside those, whoever notices it does the research on it. If it’s something I don’t want showing up in the books, then Stav and Marcus do it, for an additional fee, of course.”

“Efficient.”

“The most efficiently run office in the company,” Vil said proudly.

They left Boston quickly after that, and in almost no time, they were back at Stonebrook. The entire staff was in the courtyard, lined up to greet Vil, and she fell in among them with smiles and pawshakes. To Kit’s surprise, Brian and Ruth came out of the garage, and they had Jonathon and Misty with them. “We heard you’re leaving tomorrow, and they’re throwing you a party, so we decided to crash it,” Brian chuckled as he reached them.

“We can’t let you go home without saying goodbye!” Ruth declared, kissing Jessie on the muzzle fondly.

“You’re looking a tad bleached there, Vil,” Brian remarked as she came over.

“A week in the Florida sun and then a week in the French Riviera can do that to a fox, Uncle Brian,” she chuckled. “We spent a lot of time on the beach.”

“You’re looking well, Kendall. Not too exhausted?” Ruth asked with a slight smile.

“A little bandy-legged, but otherwise fine,” he said seriously, which caused Ruth to erupt into laughter.

“We have the sun room ready for the party,” Stanley announced. “Which will begin at your leisure, Master Kit.”

The party wasn’t so much a party as it was a gathering of Vulpans, friends, and staff in the sun room, his favorite room in the house, amid tasteful decorations and a banner reading We’ll miss you! hung between the windows. The cooks had made ordeurves and a large cake, and it was attended by the entire house staff and the friends and family. There were no gifts given, because they didn't need anything else, but there were plenty of hugs and kisses and pawshakes spread through the room as the staff got a chance to mingle with Kit and Jessie in a social situation before they went back home. Kit had spent a lovely couple of hours sitting around talking with the staff, as Jessie made promise after promise that she would send them lots of pictures of the baby when she was born. Kit had such a good time that he didn't really even object to Brian and Ruth being there.

There was some business discussed, though. "So, it's official?" he asked Vil.

She nodded. "Zach had it on my desk when I came back, just as I warned he'd better," she affirmed. "He's out. That means I have to hire at least two more board members, one to replace Zach, and one to fill the new spot on the board. I'm having it expanded by one and the shares redistributed through the board seats, everyone but me."

"How many shares is that?" Jessie asked curiously.

"There are eighteen thousand total shares of board-distributed stock, six thousand from each company, which is ten percent of the original sixty thousand shares issued from the when the stocks were first created. I own forty thousand of each, and the rest are spread through the family. Originally there were twelve board members, so each one had five hundred each. The board's size has contracted and expanded over the years, and then I stripped each of the current board members there are now of a combined thousand shares of each stock to sell to Kit. Well, Kit's going to surrender those thousand shares back to the board, because Steven had shares, and those will be awarded to Kit."

“Vil--”

“Hush,” she interrupted Kit before he could say another word. “Those shares reverted back to my control when he died, no matter what. That’s how they’re set up and have been set up since the thirties, and we never changed it. I’m returning a thousand shares each to the board pool, and you get the remainder.”

“How many did he have?” Brian asked.

“Twenty five hundred of each, so Kit and Jessie will gain five hundred shares of each company,” she answered.

Brian whistled. “Why did Steven have so many?”

“Zach sold some of his own stock to Steven on top of what Steven got from the family. Too bad for him he can’t claim those stocks now that Steven’s dead. They were in Steven’s name through a legal sale, and when he died, they came back to the company. They’re mine now, and I can sell them to anyone I please. Odds are, Steven was using the dividends to fund the Paladins, and that’s why he needed so many shares, since he doesn’t have his father’s rate, and Zach had to keep his involvement secret. Came back to bite him in the ass,” she said vindictively. “With twelve board members, that means each seat will get five hundred shares of each company, going back to the way it was originally set up. When all is said and done, you and Kit will control two thousand shares of each stock.”

“But if our dividend was three times what we usually get for even less stock--” Jessie started.

“Board members earn a weighted dividend,” Vil interrupted. “So do I. We earn more per share on the dividend, almost as if we owned more stock than we do. It's how it was set up, to allow the dividends to be paid out at different rates while the number of stocks in each company never changed, to reflect the holder's worth and value to the family and the company when facing the fact that only twenty thousand shares of stock per company could ever be available. Every registered owner of stock is tagged with a multiplier to his dividend, what we call a rate," she continued. "Depending on who it is. Some earn face value, like you and Kit. Some earn a weighted share, like me, the elders, and the board members. There are even different multipliers in the board, based on rank and seniority. A stock can change paws, but the multiplier is tagged to the holder, not the share. When Kit was put on the board, his multiplier went up on all the shares he owns, both his private shares and his board shares, because he became a member of the board. That's why even though he only gained an extra three hundred sixty-two shares from holding a seat on the board, he earned four times his usual dividend. He has the lowest rate of all the board members, the minimum rate allowed by our rules, but it's still applied to all his shares."

"Oh, I see. That makes sense," Jessie nodded.

"It was our grandfather's solution to the fact that such a limited number of shares would be available," Brian added. "There are only sixty thousand shares of each company, and only twenty thousand of those are available. That number can never change. It's literally written into the company's charter. If not for the weight system, each single share would earn a huge dividend."

"It's zero sum," Vil elaborated to Jessie's slightly confused look. "For every point of rate one fox earns, that means that the rate, in a way, goes down for everyone else. It's based on the lump sum cash paid out in a dividend cycle. There's only so much money, so it's divided per share and per weighted rate to disburse it evenly and fairly. What one fox earns over the baseline has to be taken away from the others.”

“Ohhh, okay!” Jessie said in comprehension.

“One of the ways Grandfather kept control,” Brian chuckled. “He couldn’t force someone to give up their shares, but he could adjust their rate to ensure they earned virtually nothing for them.”

“Back when the CEO had direct control of the rate system,” Vil sighed. “I’d love to have that power.”

“It’s controlled by the board now, isn’t it?” Jessie asked.

“Yup. So I’d have to have support to get a rate change through. That’s why I didn’t simply give you one share of stock and stick a ridiculous rate on it,” she winked at Jessie. “To make the shares pay off for you, I had to sell you a large number of shares.”

“And they weren’t cheap,” Kit grunted. “It was a huge chunk of my inheritance to buy the Vulpan stocks.”

“Pft, they paid for themselves with the first dividend,” she declared.

Kit chuckled. “They did.”

“Well, you’ll get more of a dividend as a board member. Your rate is about three times face value, give or take, which is the minimum rate allowed to a board member. Controlling two thousand shares per company, you’ll be looking about a hundred fifty thousand a quarter in dividend payments.”

“Which is why you won’t let me quit.”

“Mmmmaybe,” she said with a coquettish smile, which made Jessie giggle and him laugh helplessly.

“Then give me the card.”

“Oh, no way!” she laughed, pulling her paws away and over her shoulder as if holding it. “That doesn’t even qualify as meddling! I gave you a very logical reason for keeping you on the board! I need you on it, silly male! You’re my strongest anchor!”

“Card?” Brian asked.

“My wedding present,” Vil grinned. “I’m entitled to one act of meddling with no repercussions, a one free meddle card.”

“Within reason,” Kit stressed.

“Your concept of reason and mine are two very different things,” she said sweetly. “And since I’m the one who got the present, it’s my sense of reason that counts.”

Kit gave her a strange look, then laughed helplessly.

It was a very nice party. It lasted about two more hours, filled with conversation and laughter, and also a chance for Brian and Ruth to get to know Sonya better, and then it slowly broke up. Staff left one by one to return to their duties, then Brian and Ruth left with their kids, then Vil declared that she was ready to go home, to return to Hart’s Crossing...and that was that. The party wound down, and they walked Vil and Kendall out to a waiting limo that would take them home. “I’ll be back over here around seven,” she promised, “so I can take you to the airport. I doubt you’ll be awake before then, but I know you’ll be too anxious to go home to sleep much past it.”

“Are we so predictable?” Kit laughed as he hugged his sister.

“About some things, yes,” she winked. “I’ll see you tomorrow, little brother.”

“I’m glad you’re home, sis, because now I can go home too.”

“More’s the pity. I was hoping exposing you to your birthright would soften you up a little bit,” she said with a shameless wink.

“I’m Vulpan enough to be stubborn,” he chuckled in reply as he kissed her on the side of her muzzle.

“See you in the morning, taller sis,” Vil said, hugging Jessie. “I’m very disappointed in you, you know.”

“What? Why?”

“Because you were supposed to be completely seduced by his money and demand to stay here,” she declared, pointing at Kit. “You let me down!”

Jessie laughed. “I’m so sorry that I’m a normal girl at heart,” she answered. “It was fun to be here, and nice, and I can’t deny that there were times I really enjoyed it, but I want to go home, Vil. This is just a glorified vacation. My heart belongs in Austin, and it’s time the rest of me went back to it.”

“Well said,” Kit said with a nod.

“Good, that means I won’t have any competition for my wife’s attention,” Kendall chuckled as he hugged Jessie, then shook Kit’s paw. “See you two tomorrow.”

“We’ll be ready,” Kit answered.

“I guess we’d better wander off too,” Sonya said. “We still on for dinner tomorrow, Vil?”

“Sure are,” she answered.

“We’ll be back tomorrow to see you off,” Suzy promised as she hugged Jessie, then kissed Kit on the tip of his nose playfully.

“Wait a minute, you’re leaving us with Muffy?” Kit suddenly demanded. “No! Take her too!”

“Why you jerk!” Muffy retorted, which caused everyone, even Muffy, to crack up.

Muffy didn’t really factor much into things after everyone left, because Kit and Jessie were too busy, and she had her own things to do. She was staying at Stonebrook overnight and would leave for Connecticut after they left in the morning, and that left Kit and Jessie to finish getting ready to go home. Both of them had a few more calls to make, and Kit went through the manor with Stanley and a checklist to make sure that everything that was going to Austin was either already there or boxed up, and everything staying at Stonebrook was accounted for and didn’t accidentally get packed. Stanley was quite reserved and pensive through the whole thing, so much so that Kit had to ask him what was wrong. “It’s going to feel quite unnatural to have no Vulpans here to serve, Master Kit,” he said quietly. “We’ll have no purpose. We’ll be keeping the house up, that’s for certain, but it won’t feel like we have a reason to do it.”

“Oh, I’m not so sure about that, Stan,” Kit told him. “I think you’ll find that you’ll have plenty to do when we leave. For one, weren’t you talking about remodeling the kitchen?”

“Oh yes, I’ve had the funds set aside for that project for a while.”

“Well, with no kitchen demands, I think this is the perfect time to do it.”

“True, true. And there’s the landscaping project that Daniel wants to undertake in the garden, to smooth out that hill behind the fountain, and Bartholomew mentioned the other day that the Autumn cottage is due for an inspection and repainting.”

“Well, this is a good time to get most of the maintenance out of the way, mainly since you won’t have to listen to a bunch of Vulpans whine about all the dust, noise, and disturbance,” he noted, which made Stanley chuckle a little bit. “After you get that done, I think you’ll find that Vil will keep you busy. I told her to use Stonebrook as she sees fit, and you have to admit, this place so kicks Hart’s Crossing’s ass when she’s trying to make an impression.”

Stanley laughed. “That, Master Kit, is certainly true. We did not embarrass Mistress Vil at her reception.”

“So, I’d expect to be doing a lot of planning over the winter, Stan,” Kit noted. “I guarantee you, after you get the repairs and other maintenance done, Vil will not let you get lazy.”

“I certainly hope so,” he said honestly. “Master Kit, I want you to promise me something.”

“What?”

“If you run into any kind of difficulty at all down in Austin, please, don’t hesitate to call. This is your home, no matter how you feel about Austin, and the manor and its resources are always at your disposal.”

“I appreciate that, Stan, I really do,” he said sincerely, patting the older fox on the shoulder. “And it’s more of a comfort than you can ever realize to know that if all else fails, I can always return here, even if I’m broke and homeless.”

“You will never be homeless, Master Kit,” Stan told him. “For this is your home, and it will always be here for you. And if you are indeed broke, why, I’ll simply send a car for you,” he declared.

Kit laughed. “The way the economy is tanking, that’s always a distinct possibility,” he said sagely.

“Pft, to a Vulpan, a weakening economy isn’t a crisis, it’s an opportunity,” Stanley declared. “As I recall, your grandfather truly solidified the family fortune during the Great Depression, and then it skyrocketed at the onset of World War two.”

“True,” Kit nodded.

After they got everything squared away, the staff didn’t allow Jessie to cook her last dinner at Stonebrook. All three chefs all but ran her out of the kitchen, and they prepared a dinner of lobster, crab, tuna, and salmon, a true fisherfur’s feast, which made Jessie almost swoon in delight when they put it on the table. Jessie was all cat when it came to seafood, and fortunately Kit shared her taste for it...or he’d be in big trouble come dinnertime in the Vulpan household. Three or four dinners out of seven were seafood within their house, though usually not anything quite this extravagant. Muffy certainly wasn’t complaining either, for lobster was her favorite food in the entire world, and they had made sure to make her a very large one.

“Alright guys, I’m going to go out and see some friends,” Muffy said. “I think you two probably want to be alone on your last night here, so I’ll clear out.”

“Whatever gave you that idea?” Jessie asked. “We love having you here, you silly vixen!”

“If I were you, I’d like a little privacy on my last night in that big bedroom...with that big bed,” she said knowingly, and she laughed when Jessie’s cheeks threatened to ruffle. “Besides, I do have a couple of friends to see tonight.”

“And a few parties to go to, and a couple of clubs to visit,” Kit added.

“Yeah, those too,” she agreed with a laugh. “So I’ll see you tomorrow if you’re not awake when I get back tonight, okay?”

“Don’t you dare oversleep!” Jessie warned.

“Who said I’d sleep? I just need to make sure I’m back by seven,” she said with a bright, toothy grin, then she laughed when Jessie shooed her from the table.

“She’s a Vulpan, all right,” Kit chuckled lightly.

There was something to be said for Muffy’s gesture. Kit found himself walking the halls and rooms of Stonebrook after Jessie went to go take a bath, to enjoy that huge spa tub in the bathroom one more time before going home to the much smaller jacuzzi tub they had in the master bathroom. He’d lived in this house for sixteen years before walking out of the house and the Vulpan family, and though there were enough bad memories to last a lifetime in this place, there were a few good ones. Memories like listening to his mother sing, dancing with her in the ballroom before a Christmas party, just the two of them, or sitting on the edge of the pool, before they remodeled it and made it bigger, watching Vil being taught how to swim by

Clancy. That was one of his earliest memories, when he was just two years old, sitting there in a pair of swim trunks and floaters on his upper arms. He recalled that his mother and father had hated the water, and so it was usually Clancy that went with them when they went swimming. He walked through the grand entry foyer, where his father had issued the ultimatum when he was sixteen, and he looked at the front door that Kit had stormed through almost immediately afterward, storming off into a bitterly cold late winter night wearing nothing but a dress shirt and a pair of slacks...and nearly freezing to death walking away from Stonebrook. The nurse to which the police had taken him said his thick fur was probably the only reason he didn't die out there in that storm. His thick, handsome fur was more than a matter of vanity, that night it had saved his life. He opened the front door and looked out over a huge front lawn where he used to play in the summer, and sled down its slope in the winter, since it was the steepest hillside that wasn't covered in trees on the grounds...but that wasn't saying much. He did remember once, when he was twelve, when the snow had frozen over with a sheet of ice from freezing rain, getting on his sled and absolutely flying down the hill, so fast he had to bail out before his sled zoomed into the trees between the hill and the front wall. Then there was that ice storm when he was fourteen, with ice so thick that he put on his hockey skates and skated around the courtyard. The whole city lost power for days after that, but Stonebrook had its own generators, so they hadn't gone without power. He remembered that Sheila had been over before the storm and was stuck with them overnight, and how she had fallen on her butt and slid halfway down the road towards where the chopper pad was now, and then spent nearly twenty minutes trying to waddle her way back up the hill, having to use the sawpoints of her figure skates to literally claw her way back up to the courtyard. Good grief, was she pissed that he hadn't helped her, had done nothing but stand there and laugh, so much so she hauled off and whacked him a good one and knocked him down. Sheila was much younger than him as the cousins and kids in general reckoned such things, but since his father and her mother were the closest of all the Vulpan elders, she was over at their house so much that he knew her better than most of the other cousins, her and her siblings. Sam and Randy were happy-go-lucky troublemakers and Randy was Kit's own age, and they'd gotten themselves into all kinds of mischief when they were over...but never on purpose. Will and Duncan weren't quite so adventurous as Sam and Randy, but Kit rather liked them, too. Will wanted to go into the family business even at a young age, and was working hard to be ready for it, but Duncan wanted to be a painter. That hadn't panned out, because his bastard father had forced him to give over art and take up business, just as he tried to do to Kit, but Duncan was taking quite a few art classes in addition to business classes at Harvard, and he was a very good painter. Sheila was the true hellion of Sarah's kids; where Sam and Randy just liked to have fun and got into trouble as a byproduct, Sheila was the type that intentionally went out of her way to stir things up. That was why they were such good friends when they were kids, despite their age difference, and the only reason why Kit had given Sheila a chance in the airport down in Austin when she barged back into his life.

There were some good memories here, but the problem was that they were drowned out by the intensity of the bad ones. He and his father had had so many fights in this house, in almost every room, and he still felt like the ghosts of past Vulpans stared at him from the walls disapprovingly for him marrying Jessie.

Well, they could all go to hell. Jessie was his match, the femme he was put on this earth to find and marry, and he didn't give a damn if they didn't approve of the fact that she wasn't a fox.

He returned to the bedroom after a last, lonely tour of this house that he hated yet was now his, to see Jessie sitting in the body dryer, on the ventilated seat as twelve air nozzles oscillated around here to dry her fur. She was so pregnant that the bottom of her belly was pressing against the top of her legs, hiding the best part of her he liked to view, and he had to agree that she could pop any day now. She was drying her hair, and the warm, loving look she gave him when he stepped in was like sunshine, basking him in its radiance. "Hey, my handsome fox, mind getting the comb for me?"

"Only if I get to use it," he said.

She smiled. "Of course. Where do you want to start, tail or feet?"

"The tail, of course. That way I can paw your butt and just pretend I'm clumsy."

She laughed. "You're anything but clumsy, you naughty boy," she declared as she stood up, a bit awkwardly, then turned and around and presented her tail to him, flicking it at him in a manner that was considered an insult among the youngers of Cincinnati.

"Aat, you're about to lose your valet," he chided as he went over to the sink and got her body comb, one of the few possessions they'd left out.

"Suuure," she teased as he came over, stepped into the blowing air, and sat down on the damp seat despite his jeans and started combing her tail out to its usual long-tailed, silky, gorgeous perfection. Jessie was very beautiful, to more than just him, and her vanity was one of her little quirks. She wasn't obnoxious or arrogant about it, but she was beautiful, and she knew it, and she liked to stay pretty. She didn't stay pretty to attract males or make her friends jealous, she stayed pretty because she liked to feel good about herself, and the fact she was pretty was one of the things that she felt good about. Hers was a private vanity of self-image, not a preening one meant to impress others, which kept her on a strict exercise regimen so she kept her figure and caused her to always want to make sure she didn't look like a mess when she went out in public. She didn't have to be beautiful to go out, but she did want to be presentable. And her presentable made almost all male eyes turn her way and made girls annoyed, because it didn't take much for a girl as pretty as Jessie to be "presentable." When she wanted to be beautiful, males gawked and femmes glared...and she didn't seem to understand just what kind of effect she had. That was part of her alluring charm, a ravishing beauty who was both modest and innocent enough to not fully comprehend just how gorgeous she was.

And she loved a plain, scarred, scruffy-looking male like him. Life was funny sometimes.

She laughed when, instead of pulling the comb through the fur of her tail, he instead pressed it up against her furry backside and sawed it back and forth "It's looking better already," he hummed.

"Stop being silly and start combing, or I'll fire you!" she commanded, whacking him on the side of the head with her tail.

"Hey, hey, watch it!" he called. "You already have five appendages that end with sharp pointy things, I don't need to be attacked by the only one that doesn't!"

“Five? Five? Where do you get five?”

“Don’t you have teeth in your pretty little maw?” he asked, slapping her on the rump playfully before he bent to the task of combing out her tail.

“My head is not an appendage,” she said primly. “You make it sound like I have an arm coming out of my forehead.”

“And if you did, that would have claws too,” he noted, which made her giggle, then gasp.

“Oh!” she exclaimed, putting a paw on her swollen stomach. “Oh my, that was a sharp one!”

“Another pang?”

She nodded. “I hope that’s not an omen that we’ll be landing somewhere in Tennessee,” she laughed. “The last thing Laura needs is the stigma of being a hillbilly on top of being a Yankee!”

“She won’t be if she’s born in Texas,” Kit mused.

“Sure she will, because her father’s a Boston blue-blood,” she winked down at him. “That makes her half Yankee.”

“And half what? Alley cat?” He barked in surprise when her tail swatted him again, then he laughed.

“Watch yourself, buster,” she warned in a thoroughly insincere dangerous voice. “You know what happens to little foxes that wander into the wrong alleys.”

“I’m not worried, because I have this cute little bruiser that’ll be there to save me.”

“Bruiser!” she said in outrage, then slapped him a third time with her tail, which nearly made him fall off the seat laughing. “I give you the best years of my life, I’m bearing your daughter, and I’m a bruiser? Comb, you ingrate!”

He laughed brightly at that declaration. “Yes, dear,” he said mockingly. She moved to swat him one more time, but he was ready for her. He opened his mouth and intercepted her tail, and when he bit down on it, just hard enough for it to register, she squeaked in surprise and put both paws on her shapely backside. “You rat!” she declared hotly. “Leggo!” She gasped when he put a little more pressure on her tail between his jaws, then she put her open paw in his face and extended her claws for his benefit. “Let go right now, or you’ll be playing with one of the pointy ends!”

He released her tail, then spat out a stray hair from her tail. “Bleh, next time wash all the soap out of your tail,” he complained, spitting the taste out of his mouth. “Cat hair and soap is not a good taste combination. Ick.”

She almost fell over laughing.

It was their last night at Stonebrook, and as they climbed into bed, after watching a DVD, it felt a little strange, but it also felt like the end of a long ordeal, almost like he’d been sent out of state by Rick to do a long job. But it was over now, and they’d be going to bed in their own bedroom tomorrow night, back in their own house, and a house that would take a day or two to get straightened up after they unpacked everything. Jessie snuggled in against him, and all he could feel was her large belly against his side, almost feeling Laura’s heart beating through her abdomen. He wrapped his arm around her, and she sighed and nestled her head against his shoulder and chest. “We’ll be home by this time tomorrow, handsome fox,” she said quietly. “I can’t wait to go home.”

“Me either. And thank you for wanting to leave this place.”

She giggled. “It was nice. Almost like a vacation. But we don’t belong here, love. We belong in Austin, in our house, with our friends, and where our daughter will be born. It’s home.”

“Amen, pretty kitty. Amen.”

Vil knew Kit very well, but in this instance, she didn’t know him well enough.

Both Kit and Jessie were awake at 5:30am, and they couldn’t go back to sleep, despite honest attempts to try. The excitement at the idea of going home was like a kid at Christmas, and they were much too anxious to go back to bed. So, it was with honest annoyance that they got up, ate breakfast, looked at the clock, and realized that they were stuck there until Vil arrived. If they left without giving her the chance to take them to the airport, they’d be hearing about it for the next ten years. Hell, Vil would fly down to Austin just so she could smack them. So, after eating, getting dressed, and packing their laptops and their carry-on bags holding their toiletries and other necessities they’d left out, they had nothing to do but wait.

They tried to make the best of the time. Kit checked the weather in Austin and on their projected flight path using a manor laptop to see how things would be, and Jessie distracted herself with knitting, since she’d kept out her knitting bag and was carrying it with her. Then Kit pulled out the camera and took some final pictures of both the manor and those inside it, including a very nice picture of the sun rising over the forest to the east, and a picture of the manor house bathed in the golden light of the dawn.

Nick and Sylvia woke up not long after them and also got ready, and there were a couple of suspiciously large and ominous-looking cases stacked by the door. After they were ready, they joined Jessie in the TV room to keep her company, but Nick spent most of that time on the phone, making sure that the drive to the airport would be safe; as a last act, some of the mercs on the manor were spread out along the route to make sure nobody tried anything, and Donny and Grizz were at the airport, already at Signature's hangar, keeping their eyes open for anything out of the ordinary. After Kit and Jessie left, the mercs would pack up their bags, get their final pay, and then move on to their next assignment. But, they'd all go with a bag of Jessie's homemade cookies and a paw-written note of thanks from Kit for their effort and their service.

Fortunately, Vil wasn't quite as late as he expected. Around 6:30, Vil and Kendall arrived, buzzing in through the gate since Oscar hadn't made it out there yet. Stanley went to go hurriedly wake up Muffy as Kit and Jessie went to the garage to greet them. However, when they got there, they found out that Vil and Kendall weren't alone. Stav and Marcus were helping them out of the limo, Will, Vil's head butler, was with them, and even more of a surprise, Abigail Brighton was helped out of the limo by Stav as they came through the door. "There you are, duckies," she said with a bright smile, folding Jessie into a hug before Vil could reach her. "Why, you're even more radiant now than at the wedding, my dear," she said to Jessie, kissing her on the cheek.

"It's nice to see you again, Misses Brighton," Jessie said, a bit modestly.

"Aat, aat, you call me Abby!" she declared.

“Be nice, mum, they’re not used to pushy femmes like--oh, nevermind,” he said, looking at Vil. Kit laughed as Vil elbowed him in the ribs.

“I just got in last night,” she said as she hugged Kit. “I’ll be in Austin in just a couple of days. We took possession of the house on Friday, and I’ll be down around Tuesday to oversee the furnishing and decorating.”

“So you’re really coming down?” Kit asked.

“Of course we are,” she said dismissively. “Winston will be down sometime late next week or the week after next, and he’s bringing the boys. We can’t miss the birth of our daughter-in-law’s first baby!”

“I have tea prepared, and can have breakfast made if you’re hungry,” Stanley offered.

“I think we have time for a spot of tea,” Abigail declared. “But not long! I get the feeling that our duckies are anxious to go home!”

“That’s the truth,” Kit chuckled as he hugged Vil.

Brief was a good word for it. As the staff loaded the last of their things in Vil’s limo, Luann and Bartholomew served them tea in the TV room near the garage. Vil and Kendall didn’t look entirely awake once they sat down and stopped moving, but Abigail was just as animated and funny as ever, peppering Kendall with jokes and sly observations that made it clear that Kendall inherited part of his sense of humor from his mother. Muffy joined them, looking very haggard, not long after they sat down for tea, dragging herself in and flopping down beside Kendall and yawning widely. “Mornin’,” she mumbled.

“GOOD MORNING!” Abigail all but screamed, which made Muffy flinch violently and most of the others laugh. “Out a bit late last night, were we?”

“You mean this morning,” she said weakly. “I got in around four, but I made sure to be back in time to see you off. I thought you’d be leaving at like five,” she chuckled, then winced.

“We would have if not for the fact that Vil would have called her plane back in midair if we left without her seeing us off,” Kit said.

“Damn right I would have,” Vil affirmed with a sharp nod. “My plane, my rules.”

“Delta?” Kit said to Jessie.

“United,” she answered with a slight smile. “They have better peanuts.”

“It seems your services are no longer required, Vil,” Kit told her grandly. “It was so nice of you to get up to see us off, but we’ll be on our way now.”

“I don’t think so,” she shot back with a smile. “Besides, why are we still sitting here? I thought you wanted to go home.”

“Can I finish this first?” Abigail asked, holding her tea up. “I do so love the tea you serve here, Stanley. You absolutely must arrange to send some of it to us.”

“It’s a secret proprietary tea blended specifically for the estate, madam,” Stanley told her with a bit of regret in his voice. “I’m afraid that giving away the recipe is quite impossible.”

“Who said I want the recipe? Just send me a box, you silly male,” she retorted.

“She’s family, I think that’s alright, Stan. Besides, I get the feeling she’ll make your life hell if you don’t,” Vil said with a sly smile at the older vixen.

“It’s the femme’s way. Males threaten and bluster, femmes nag,” she said shamelessly. “And our way gets much better results.”

“Playing on the inherent annoyance factor of the female,” Kendall said sagely.

“So says the most annoying male on earth,” Vil snorted.

“But you married me anyway,” he teased.

“I’m desperate for a baby, and you were barely adequate,” she sniffed, which all but paralyzed the room with laughter.

After Abigail finished her tea, they were indeed off. Nick and Sylvia helped pack their carry-ons in the limo as the entire staff lined up in the garage to say goodbye to Kit and Jessie. Clancy was up and about, and he joined them to ride with them to the airport, so he skipped standing there and hugging the pair as they more or less went down the line to say goodbye to each and every member of the staff, and there were many promises that they’d take care of themselves and keep in touch. Frannie and the cooks made a light lunch for them to eat on the plane, and a very large thermos of Stonebrook tea was put in the limo for them to enjoy. After they said goodbye to everyone, Stav and Marcus helped them into Vil’s largest of her three limos. She owned three, a small one she used for daily business, a larger, more luxurious one for receiving guests and business associates, and this two-seater stretch limo she used for groups. This one, with its two large seats that faced each other with plenty of legroom between and a utility third seat between the driver's seat and the passenger area, was more than large enough for all the Vulpans, Abigail, Clancy, and Nick and Sylvia, who had to ride in the middle seat because there was no more room up front. Abigail made quick work of making Clancy feel comfortable and welcome among them, and she engaged him in stories of the Vulpan kids' youth as Kit looked out the window and saw Stonebrook sliding by, as they went around the manor house and down the hill towards the front gate.

He felt relieved to be leaving it behind, but there was a small part of him that felt a touch nostalgic. After all, he had been born in that house, in the very bedroom where he'd been staying since coming up here. It was not his home, but it did belong to him, a final legacy of the Vulpan family, the final payment for the way the family had treated him. It was a bit of ironic justice that Kit would be the one to end up with possession of Stonebrook, the one Vulpan who wanted the least to do with his family. And yet, Vil had found a way to get her claws in him when he rushed up here to be with her and to help her when the family went after her, which said much about his sister's personality. Even in the midst of all that, she found a way to rope him into taking a seat on the board, and had acted in a very sneaky manner by making him the owner of the manor. She'd taken what he did in good faith and used it to alter the deed, and there was nothing he could do about it. Like it or not, and certainly it wasn't a matter of like to most of the elders and many of his cousins, Kit Vulpan, the renegade outcast of the Vulpan family, now owned the bastion of family power, and in many ways, the very icon of the Vulpan family. Stonebrook was the seat of the family power, so much so that Zach had moved in there to try to establish his dominance over Vil...and now no Vulpan would be living within it. It wouldn't be forgotten or unused, that was for certain, for Vil would find ways to use the manor, but the staff would have something of a reprieve in the fact that there would be no Vulpans to serve for a while.

“Regrets?” Vil asked him quietly as he watched the manor go by.

“Only that it took this long to leave,” he answered immediately. “I’ve told you over and over, Vil, Austin is my home. It’s where I want to be, and it’s where we’re happy. I don’t belong in Boston, sis.”

“Well, excuse me if I disagree with you,” she said simply. “No matter where you want to be, brother, you are a Vulpan, and that means that Boston will always be your home. I will absolutely guarantee you that eventually, maybe twenty or thirty years from now, you will come home.”

“That’s a bet you’ll lose, Vil,” he said with a slight smile.

“We’ll find out, won’t we?” she said with a quirky smile.

Clancy entertained Abigail, and mortified Kit and Vil, with stories of their adventurous youths for the entirety of the trip to Logan. Donny and Grizz were standing by Vil’s private jet as they pulled up to the hangar at Signature Services, and the big bear opened the door when the limo came to a halt. Avery was standing in the hatch, and the jet looked ready to leave at any time. Ground workers rushed out to load the luggage into the jet, and Kit and Jessie hugged and kissed everyone goodbye. “You know, I’m surprised Brian isn’t here,” Kit chuckled as he hugged Vil and kissed her on the muzzle.

“He wanted to be, but I told him that you wouldn’t have appreciated it very much. So, he sends his regards.”

“I’m glad you thought to mention that,” he nodded as he accepted a hug from Abigail.

“I’ll be down early next week, ducky,” she told him, kissing him noisily on the cheek. “Tuesday, unless plans change.”

“Need me to pick you up, Abby?”

“I’d love it, that way I can show you where the house is,” she told him as she held her arms out wide to Jessie. “Don’t you dare pop before I get down there!” she warned as she kissed Jessie on the cheek.

She laughed. “I’ll try not to, but I don’t think I have much say in the matter, Abby,” she warned.

“Alright then, Laura, no early appearances!” the matronly vixen demanded sternly, wagging a pointed finger at Jessie’s stomach. “Or it’s no birthday presents for you for five years!”

“Such a mean mum,” Kendall teased as Clancy shook Kit’s paw, but then chuckled when Kit dragged him into an embrace.

“Be good, Clancy,” Kit told him. “And remember that we always have a spare bedroom reserved for you any time you want to come down and see us.”

“I’ll be down when Laura is born, my boy,” he promised. “And I’ll always remember that you keep a room ready for me.”

“Be good, pest,” Kit told Muffy as he hugged her. “Don’t drive them too crazy down at Yale.”

“As long as they don’t bore me in class, I won’t,” she laughed in reply, then winced. “I’m going right back to bed when we get back to Stonebrook.”

“Who said you can go back?” he grinned at her. “You might try to steal the silverware.”

She laughed and slapped him on the arm. “Say hi to Sheila and Ally for me.”

“I will, I promise,” he assured her.

After all the goodbyes were said, Nick and Sylvia preceded them up the stairs and into the jet, carrying their carry-ons and Jessie’s knitting bag. Vil and the others stood back from the jet and waved as it started moving, and Kit and Jessie waved back through the window as Avery taxied them out and towards the runway. “Well, pretty kitty, we’re on our way home,” he said with an explosive sigh.

“And I can’t wait to get there,” she said, leaning her head on his shoulder. “I hope everything in the house is alright.”

“It should be, I doubt Lupe stole too much out of the house he had to put back,” Kit laughed. “Though I’ll bet money the big TV we sent down mysteriously found its way into his townhouse for a couple of days.”

“I wouldn’t take that bet,” Jessie giggled. “Did you get your apartment all fixed up and ready, Sylvia?”

“Ja, Jessie,” she nodded. “It has enough furniture for me to function until I can get it furnished. Barnett bought a cheap bed and some kitchenware and a chair, and that’s all I need until I can furnish it and have some of my things sent from Germany.”

“Well, if it’s not good enough, you can always stay in our spare bedroom until it’s ready.”

“Dunca, but I’ll be fine.”

“Well you can stay in my apartment, Sylvie,” Nick grinned. “My bed’s big enough for both of us.”

“No bed is big enough for your ego, wolf,” she told him darkly, which made Jessie giggle.

“I don’t think he’d fit on the bed we bought for the spare bedroom,” she agreed, smiling at Sylvia.

“It’s good they have their own apartments. We would have had to keep Nick in a closet or something until we needed him,” Kit said, giving Nick a sly smile.

“Just try and put me in a closet, mate,” he replied. “I don’t think you can make me fit.”

“I could after I broke your back and folded you in half,” Sylvia noted, which made Jessie laugh.

“Sylvie, don’t you love me anymore?”

“Did I ever to begin with?”

Chapter 41

It was an easy and enjoyable flight home.

Between the TV and their carry-ons they had plenty to do, but they ended up spending most of the flight playing bridge. Both Nick and Sylvia knew the game, and any self-respecting rich kid knew how to play, so all they had to do was teach Jessie, who had never played before. She did know how to play spades, however, so she was able to quickly grasp the fundamentals of the game. Like any beginner, however, she had absolutely no idea how to bid properly, but that was fine. They were playing to have fun, and even though Kit and Jessie lost more games than they won as Jessie learned the art of bidding, they had a good time and it made the time fly by while they were in the air.

It was a smooth flight, with nothing but sunny skies and calm air all the way home. Kit called Rick when they were about 90 minutes out to warn him that they were coming, when they were somewhere over Tennessee, and Jessie dramatically put her paws on her belly when he told her where they were and cried “Land the plane, land the plane, our daughter wants to be a hillbilly!” Nick and Sylvia had no idea what she was talking about, which made it that much funnier.

At 10:43 on a sunny, warm mid-September morning, their jet touched down at Bergstrom Airport, returning them home. Kit was almost pacing in the jet as it taxied up to Signature’s hangar at Bergstrom, but he smiled broadly when he looked out the window and saw Rick and Martha standing outside the hangar beside Barnett and Krichek, and they waved animatedly as Vil's jet pulled into the temporary parking place. "Alright, we're here, Mister Vulpan," Avery's voice called over the intercom. "We'll disembark you in just a moment. Welcome home!"

"Thank goodness!" Jessie said with a bright smile, waving to those outside through the window. "We're home, handsome fox!"

"I won't feel like it til we're back in our apartment," he chuckled as the antlered co-pilot came out and began to open the hatch.

Kit all but ran down the stairs as soon as they were extended, and he laughed and embraced Martha as they came towards the jet. "I'm so glad to see you!" he said excitedly, then he reached out and took Rick's paw without letting Martha go. "God, I'm so glad to be home!"

"We've missed ya, friend," Rick said with a gentle smile. "The office just didn't seem the same without you there raggin' on everyone."

"I'm just glad you didn't fire me," Kit laughed as Jessie waddled down the stairs. Martha rushed over and embraced her, and put a paw on her huge belly with a bright smile.

"How can I fire you, you're a partner," Rick noted, then he laughed. "And you certainly kept your work up even in Boston! I think I should send you up there more often, you sent back way more material than you do down here."

"Boredom can do that," he grunted as Nick and Sylvia came down, carrying the carry-ons as the ground crew retrieved a couple of suitcases from the cargo hold. "Rick, Martha, I think you remember Sylvia Wagner.

Vil hired her to help Nick down here in Austin, just like Barnett and Krichek.”

“It’s good to meet you again,” Sylvia said with a smile, offering her paw to Rick. “Herr Kit and Fraulein Jessie think the world of you.”

“Well, it’s nice to see you, Sylvia,” Rick said for both of them. “We never really did have much of a chance to get to know you. I’m glad we’ll get the chance.”

“I’m surprised, though. You certainly don’t look like a bodyguard,” Martha noted. “I thought you were just one of Jessie’s friends from Boston until they corrected me.”

“That is the idea, Fraulein Martha,” Sylvia said with a wolfish smile.

“Don’t let the fact that she’s short and wimpy looking fool ya, Martha, our little Sylvie’s one of the best,” Nick said, grinning at the German pinscher. “Even I’m afraid of her.”

“You have reason to be,” Sylvia growled, giving him a cool look that caused both Barnett and Krichek to erupt into snorts and chuckles.

“I will get the bags,” Krichek offered.

Kit and Jessie didn’t waste any time at the airport. Once Krichek had the bags separated and loaded into the cars, they piled in and headed home, Rick and Martha riding with them, with the four guards in Nick’s Expedition, which had been sitting idle in the parking lot since they left. Kit made sure to pass by Avia to check on his plane, and much to his relief, it was sitting at its tie-down, and looked just fine. Alice looked to even had it washed while they were gone.

It was a fast and easy drive home, along roads that were familiar and, in a way, inviting. The mesquite trees and golden grasses of the low hills of south Austin had never looked so beautiful, traffic was light on U.S. 71 and then Congress Avenue, then 14th, then Guadalupe, as they turned onto the road that led to their house, slightly hilly, straight in that section, and with traffic lights on every other corner. Even the lights cooperated with them, staying green as they went through, until they pulled up to the gate of Westwood. Jessie made a flourish out of pressing the remote that opened the gate, which made Kit laugh, and they drove through and into their driveway. Jessie's car was sitting in the driveway, and the van was just behind it. Kit parked behind the van, and then a veritable pack of furs boiled out of Lupe's front door. Lupe, Dan and Mickey from the complex were there, Sheila and Allison, Sandy, Charlotte, the other Jessie, Danielle, and Lisa from the sorority, and Sam and Kevin filed out quickly, and Kit laughed as the gang from work rushed out behind them. The whole gang was here to greet them!

They never really even made it to the front door. They were swarmed as soon as they got out of the truck, and pawshakes and hugs and kisses were exchanged for long minutes on the front lawn as Kit and Jessie felt a little overwhelmed at the enthusiastic greeting they received from their friends and family. "Brah, we got brats and burgers and chicken and steaks ready to grill!" Lupe called as he shook Kit's paw. "We're welcomin' you home in style!"

"Didn't you think we'd be tired after being away so long?" Jessie asked with a laugh. "My house is a mess! I need to get it sorted out!"

"We thought you'd love to see your real family again after months," Sheila retorted as she kissed Jessie on the cheek. "And you have until Friday to get things straightened out,” she added.

“Dude, where are the pictures?” Dan demanded. “I know you got a bunch from Boston!”

“Oh good lord, Dan!” Kit barked, which caused an eruption of laughter.

“Charlotte, start the grill! Mickey, roll the keg over from the center!” Lupe called. “It’s party time!”

“Can we get our luggage in the house first?” Kit said archly.

“No!” came a unified shout of reply, which nearly made Kit fall over laughing.

Despite their declaration, they did manage to get into their front door as the gang went around to the back deck to start setting up for the welcome home party. The large stack of boxes and crates in the living room was definitely unusual, but everything else was exactly as they left it, the house was nice and cool thanks to Lupe getting the AC on, and Kit had never in his life felt so relieved to be home in his life. He and Jessie padded into the kitchen and found everything just as they left it, Jessie nodded when she opened the refrigerator and found no congealed messes, just sparkling clean yet empty shelves, and it was a sight for sore eyes to see the big restaurant-style oven, the island, and the hanging rack over it Kit had bought Jessie for her birthday. That started an impromptu tour of the house, as he and Jessie went into every room both to make sure everything was alright, but also to see it, feel it, just be there so they could really feel like they were home again. They went through every room in the house, from the basement to the attic, but they spent a long time in their master bedroom, as Jessie checked every drawer to make sure everything was as she left it, and she surreptitiously checked the “naughty” DVD in the closet to make sure it had been undiscovered, which could only make Kit laugh as she peeked into the box, then blew out a sigh and put it back on the shelf in the closet. “I had to make sure!” she said petulantly, which made him laugh even harder.

They met Sylvia in the living room as they came back downstairs, as she and Nick put their bags on the couch. “Your pictures don’t do your house justice,” she told them. “This is a very nice townhouse.”

“Now you see why we love it so much,” Jessie told her with a nod. “This is our dream house, Sylvia. Lupe may have built it, but we decorated it, and we tweaked its design until it was just right.”

“And as soon as Laura can crawl, she will destroy it,” Nick said, which made Jessie laugh.

After dropping off their bags, they enjoyed a gorgeous Texas late morning and early afternoon grilling on the large patio and barbecue pit that stretched behind their and Lupe’s townhouses, taking up much of what would have been a grassy yard. Mickey rolled the refrigerated keg tap dispenser over from the community center, Charlotte, Sam, and Danielle took command of the grill, and they had a wonderful couple of hours mingling with friends and family not seen since Vil’s wedding and even then not nearly long enough, getting the chance to catch up. Sandy had been home for the summer, so she, Sam, and Jessie spent nearly an hour sitting at one of the erected picnic tables, gossiping and giggling like schoolgirls as Sandy told them all about her summer...not that they didn’t already know, since Sandy called Jessie at least every other day. When she wasn’t doing that, Jessie was laughing and talking about the impending birth, often putting her paw on her large belly and bemoaning the fact that now that they were home, she wouldn’t mind going into labor right now. Kit made the rounds through the complex gang and the work crew and Sheila and Allison, catching up on the news and feeling just fine, being back where he belonged, and among friends and family for whom he cared deeply. This was his home, this was where he belonged, in the townhouse with his wife, with Lupe nextdoor and Sheila, Dan, Mickey and Kevin just down the way, and knowing that when he went to work on Monday, Lilly, Barry, Jeffrey, Marty, Mike, Janet, Pat, Savid, Rick, Elly, Denise, and the new interns would all be there, working hard and having fun at the same time. Where Martha might come to call at any time carrying a covered dish, or the sorority girls might crash their townhouse looking for a hot meal and a little conversation.

This was home, and nothing could compare to it. Nothing.

Though the party was planned, it also wasn't meant to last all day. Everyone was aware of the fact that Kit and Jessie had just gotten home after months away, and they knew that they would probably like to have most of the afternoon to unwind, decompress, and start settling back into their familiar and comfortable surroundings. But, the guys did do some little things for them. Dan and Lupe vanished for a little while, and when they returned, they were loaded down with IGB bags carrying all the staples Kit and Jessie would need so they wouldn't go hungry. Lupe knew what brands they bought and what they usually kept in their pantry and refrigerator, since he raided them so often, so he brought back more than enough for them to feel like they wouldn't have to go out to eat until they hit the store themselves. Martha was one step ahead of him, though, for she had cooked them up a full dinner, all covered and needing only to be heated, her famous country fried steak, mashed potatoes, green beans, and spinach. The party had started around 11:00am, but it was most definitely over by 2:00pm, as Lupe stood up on a table and called for them to start cleaning up. “Alright, we done held them up enough!” he barked. “Let’s clean up so Kit and Jessie can settle in!”

The whole gang helped clean up the patio, and then they started drifting home...at least mostly. Sam and Kevin lingered after most of the others left, as did Sheila and Allison. “I think they have news for us,” Kit laughed as he helped Lupe cover the now cool grill.

“More or less, yeah,” Sam laughed. “I’m moving in.”

“Well, we have two spare bedrooms, but Hannah’s going to be using one of them,” Kit said, which made Kevin laugh.

“No, I’m moving into the complex with Kevin. Together!” she told him, a bit tartly. “I don’t have much, so I’ll be moved in by tonight.”

“She made sure to wait until I had the townhouse fully furnished and we set a date,” Kevin teased, which made Sam laugh. “She wanted that concrete commitment before moving in.”

“And the sorority loses another one to marriage,” Jessie laughed. “Congratulations! When?”

“October tenth.”

“Ten-ten should be easy for him to remember when it’s anniversary time,” Sam said, which made Jessie giggle. “We already have the church reserved. Southside Baptist, down on seventy-one.”

“Yeah, I know where that is,” Kit nodded. “What are you doing for a honeymoon?”

“A weekend in New Orleans,” Kevin laughed. “Your cousin Terry offered to get us a nice hotel room. But, with my work and Sam’s school, we just can’t take any more time. We do intend on taking a trip during Thanksgiving,” he said strongly. “We’re going skiing in Colorado.”

“I’ve never been skiing before, I’d love to try it,” Sam said.

“Skiing is fun, I’m going to take Jessie this winter,” Kit nodded. “When she doesn’t have that little problem there.”

“This is not a little problem,” Jessie said primly, cupping her pregnant belly meaningfully.

“Vil owns a nice cabin in Aspen, I’m going to see if she’ll let us borrow it,” Kit said. “So, what earth-shattering news are you just waiting to tell us, Sheila?”

She laughed lightly. “Not much, just that we decided on our plane,” she said. “I put in the order for it on Friday, and they promised to have it ready by October first.”

“Nice, what did you buy?”

“A Cessna four hundred,” she grinned. “Me and Ally are gonna share it.”

“Actually, Sheila’s going to pay for most of it, and I’m going to pay her back in installments,” Allison corrected. “I have some money of my own, but not enough to pay for half of plane that costs three quarters of a million dollars.”

“Hey, that’s what friends are for,” she said simply, pushing lightly on Allison’s shoulder. “You have a damn good reason to use it, anyway.”

“Yes,” she said with a glorious smile. “Terry offered to buy me my own plane, then pay my half of this plane, but I told him no. I don’t want your family to have a single reason at all to think I’m after him for his money. But, he did rent a parking place for the plane at Lakefront in New Orleans so I have a place to park it when I go see him.”

“So, I’ll have a plane I can take up for joyrides or down to South Padre Island when I feel like going to the beach, and you’ll have a quick way to go see Terry whenever you have the time. That’s win-win.”

“As long as you don’t fight over it,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, after we’re both trained on it by Cessna, I can always borrow yours if Ally has ours,” Sheila grinned. “After all, I’ll be Cessna trained. Won’t you trust me then?” she asked with an outrageous smile.

“So that’s why you picked a four hundred,” Jessie declared, which made Kit laugh and Sheila wink.

“Nobody’s going to be doing anything in that plane til I have it overhauled,” Kit declared. “Monday. After months sitting out on the tarmac, I want it thoroughly inspected before we go anywhere in it.”

“What, you don’t trust Cessna?” Sheila asked.

“I trust Cessna. I just don’t take chances,” he answered. “Two months exposed to the elements can seep into the plane, Sheila. I want the mechanics up at Georgetown to check it out and make sure sitting for so long didn’t cause any damage.”

“Oh, well, nothing wrong with being careful,” she nodded.

“When my life depends on it running properly, nothing at all,” he answered seriously. “When do you go for your training?”

“We’re not going anywhere,” Sheila chuckled. “Cessna is sending two instructors down here tomorrow, and we’ll do our training every afternoon for three weeks starting Monday. We traded the mechanic training with a second pilot training. I think they’re the same instructors that taught you two. David and Luke. And some supervisor is also coming down with them, Amanda someone, the one that set up our training. She said she has a bunch of customers down here she wants to visit, and she’s just gonna come down with the instructors.”

Kit laughed. “That’s them,” he affirmed. “It sounds suspiciously like they’re trying to be nearby when you deliver, pretty kitty.”

“I’ll have to cook them something,” she said with a smile.

After they said goodbye, Kit and Jessie bent to the task of getting the house back to normal...and that was going to be a daunting task. The living room was filled with boxes they had to go through, much of it clothing and things from the house they had sent up from Austin, but some things that they’d brought home with them from Boston. They rested a little bit, then tackled the large stack of boxes in a methodical manner. Jessie would unpack them, organize the contents, and Kit would put them away. The dumbwaiter got quite a workout that evening as boxes of clothes and other items were moved upstairs, to the basement, or to the attic as necessary, either put back where it belonged, placed in storage, or replacing something in the house that would be dealt with later. Kit did install the TV and audio system that evening, replacing the TV and stereo in the living room. That TV would go up to their bedroom, and the TV up there would go to the sorority. The stereo they gave to Lupe for the community center, something he intended to put on a cart so it could be wheeled into the community rooms if someone wanted music. The weapons that they'd brought home from Boston were secured away in the gun cabinet, and Kit made sure to put the MP7 down in the storage cabinet section under the glass doors, where Jessie put the K80, deciding to just leave it in its case rather than assemble it and put it in the rack. Fortunately, the model of gun cabinet came with both the large storage area under the glass display, and also a pistol drawer, where they placed the Glock and Beretta, their resting places when not carried about. And all of it, ever single door, drawer, and cabinet, locked, which Kit was sure to do, and he placed the key in Jessie's jewelry box where it was easily accessible to both of them yet not easy to find by someone who didn't know where to look.

They rested a while to eat Martha's dinner and finally get around to calling Jessie's parents and Clancy and the staff to tell them that they were indeed home, they were very busy, and they were alright, then they got back to work. They had focused first on the clothes and the things they needed in their everyday lives, and they had finally gotten it all back where it belonged. The clothes were back in the closets and drawers, the bathroom was restocked with their toiletries and back in working order, and the tools and items they'd taken to Boston with them were back where they belonged. Kit also went through the laptops to transfer everything they'd done in Boston to the desktop, things like their articles, comic scripts, research, everything they'd done in Boston. All the pictures and video they'd taken were also put on the desktop, some of it zipped up and sent to the office, the rest copied onto a DVD they'd take into the office on Monday. After that, they got down to the business of deciding what to keep and what to replace with the things that they'd brought from Boston, which was what really took up most of their time. They'd not realized just how much they'd brought home from Boston until they had to sort through it and find places to put it all. Jessie's shower gifts, the DVD collection, odds and ends they'd collected while up there, it all had to go somewhere, and it took until nearly 11:00 that night to figure it all out.

After they were all done, when the boxes had been broken down and set on the front porch for them to put in the community center for whenever someone needed a box, they flopped down on the couch in front of their new home theatre system--though absolutely nothing compared to the one in Stonebrook--and gave a great sigh of relief.

"Well, we're all done, handsome fox," Jessie said wearily. "I think my back doesn't like doing housework when I'm carrying so much weight down here," she said with a chuckle, patting her belly.

"That's why I'm doing the housework until you and Laura are two different furs," he told her.

"I can still do my share of the chores!" she protested.

"You can, but you won't."

"Don't go and get all protective on me now!"

"Now is the perfect time," he said calmly. "Doctor Mac told you to slow down, and you're gonna slow down. That reminds me, we didn't call her and tell her the Tuesday appointment was a go."

"We can do it tomorrow," she said, sliding up to his side, tucking her legs under her sedately, and snuggling with him. "I can't believe we're home, handsome fox. Finally. It feels so wonderful."

“Tell me about it. I miss Stan and the others a little bit, but nothing compares to this. Nothing compares to home. I’m just so glad that Laura will be born here, and not in Stonebrook. This is where she belongs.”

“A true child of Texas,” Jessie giggled. “Even though her parents sound nothing like a Texan.”

“I dunno, you’re starting to get that Texas drawl a little bit,” he told her, putting his arm around her. “Much better than that cockneyed Ohio accent.”

“I don’t think you, mister bah in the cah, has any right to make fun of anyone else’s accent,” she declared.

“Hey, hey, hey, leave the true English alone!”

“That’s not true English. I should know, I’m going to be an English teacher,” she said primly. “You, sir, would get an F in my class!”

“Well, I think I’m just going to have to bribe the teacher in ways that would get you arrested for statutory rape if I were a real student,” he said, nuzzling her as she giggled.

“There won’t be any bribing and sweet-talking this teacher, mister,” she declared. “Just wait til I tell Vil you failed English!”

“She’ll laugh in your face, because everyone knows that us Boston furs were here first, so we make the rules about what’s proper English,” he teased.

“The Vulpans weren’t on the Mayflower,” she retorted.

“Nope. The Vulpans came to America in sixteen forty-two as part of the non-Puritan first wave of colonists, settled in Boston, and have been there ever since. Of course, they own Boston now, but that's beside the point."

Jessie laughed. "Well, I've never been more glad to take a city back and exchange it for a better one."

Kit snorted, then burst out laughing at the idea of it. "We should have got a refund," he grinned down at her.

"And do what? Go to McDonald's? We got the better deal."

"I can't argue with that," he chuckled as he kissed her on her temple. "About ready for bed, love?"

"In a bit. I just want to sit here and cuddle for a while."

"I think I can manage that," he said, snuggling deeper into the couch with her and just being with her. No TV, no radio, just the ticking of the grandfather clock and the wonderful sound of her breathing, and the soft warmth of her silky cr me fur.

Jessie thought Kit was joking about taking over the house, but she found out very quickly that he was dead serious.

It actually annoyed her by dinnertime, because after a relatively easy day of hanging out around the house and going over to the community center for poker day, she came back and waddled into the kitchen, reaching for her apron to get back to the warm and comfortable surroundings of her own kitchen, her private domain, and found an invader already wearing the very apron for which she had been reaching. "I can cook!" she protested indignantly.

“Mmm-hmm,” he said as he shook some salt into a pot of boiling water. “Why don’t you get the big saucepan then?”

She moved to go to the island, where many of the more-used pans hung just over her head and within easy reach. Jessie hung that saucepan directly across from the stove, as it was one of the ones she most often used, so she kept it within convenient reach. It should have been hanging just over her head, within reach, but it was gone. They were all gone, mysteriously, and she realized that Kit had put them all in the lower cabinets, where she would have to bend over to get them...and bending over was the one thing she couldn’t really do very well.

“Cheater!” she accused.

“Point. Game. Match,” he said calmly. “Go knit or something.”

“Revenge is a dish best served cold!”

“So is beer,” he said, flicking his tail at her. “Now shoo.”

She took great offense at the word shoo, so much so that she grabbed the hose from the sink, pulled it out, and called sweetly, “oh Kit, dear.” When he looked over at her, she let him have it. He spluttered when he got a face full of water, then retreated quickly away from her, getting out of range of her weapon. He gave her a shocked look, then laughed despite himself as she calmly replaced the hose, turned, and waddled away. “Since you’re doing all the housework, you can clean that up, too,” she said over her shoulder as she marched victoriously from the kitchen.

Jessie was utterly unrepentant at soaking her husband, and she ate dinner with a nearly disapproving aire, as if trying to find something wrong with his cooking to harp over. But she had taught him well, perhaps too well for her own taste, and he provided a meal that was both nutritious and tasty. However, she couldn't be angry with him forever, especially not when he was just doing what he was doing because he loved her, and she offered something of a truce that night by sitting with him on the couch, sidling up to him, and putting her head on his shoulder. He chuckled and put his arm around her. "Going into work tomorrow?"

She nodded. "I have a lot to do," she answered. "Talking with Jeffrey over the phone only goes so far, since he can't show me the boards."

"I know the feeling," he grunted in reply. "Having to describe faces and positions was getting old, especially since he won't email unfinished strips. He doesn't want them getting out until they're officially released. How about that article?"

"It's almost done. It'll be nice to be there when Rick edits it rather than trade drafts back and forth."

"Welcome home, pretty kitty," he chuckled. "I almost can't wait to go to the office tomorrow. It'll feel like my first day at work all over again. I feel so out of the loop."

"That'll last about an hour," she assured him.

"It won't be all work, though. I need to call up to Georgetown and see if they can take our plane for an inspection. And I'll call Alice and see if they'll pull it into the hangar and have Tom go over it to make sure it's safe to fly up there. I'm sure they'll do it for us."

"They will," she agreed. "Are you going to keep working on that house idea?"

He nodded. “Now that I’m home, it’ll be much easier to research it thoroughly and see how feasible it is.”

“I think it’s a good idea,” she told him, “and I also think it’s a very good thing to do, helping furs who are in trouble through no fault of their own. I know I’d be devastated if someone showed up and evicted us from our house.”

“Isn’t that the truth,” he agreed, nuzzling her lovingly. “Just think, pretty kitty, we’re home. And we’re all alone. That means you can wander the house naked again.”

She laughed. “Only in the safe upstairs areas,” she corrected. “Besides, you can’t really see anything, I have too much baby in the way.”

“Well, I can always go by memory,” he said dryly, which made her glare shortly at him, then laugh ruefully. “Besides, if Doctor Mac’s prediction is spot on, you only have thirteen more days of not seeing your feet, then you’re mine again. All mine,” he said, brazenly patting the outside of her breast.

“I’ve always been yours,” she said lightly. “I wonder how long it will be until we can make love again.”

“I’m patient, pretty kitty. Until you’re totally recovered, I’ll be waiting for you.”

“You’d better.”

“Well, I could always go to the Top Hat,” he mused, then gasped and laughed when she slapped him on the stomach, just hard enough to sting.

“And if you do, you don’t want to come home,” she told him.

“You’d throw me out?” he gasped.

“In a heartbeat,” she answered calmly.

“Meanie.”

“But you love mean girls, or you wouldn’t have married one,” she countered.

He laughed. “Point.”

“I just hope it won’t take long.”

“Oho, is my pretty kitty feeling a little frisky?”

“I just don’t want Laura to be an only child for long,” she answered.

“That’s a good reason,” he chuckled, snuggling a little more with her.

Jessie was right in that it took him only about 30 minutes to get back into the swing of things at work.

They were met with donuts and tea when they arrived at 9:00 on Monday morning, as they chatted and got back to a sense of normalcy with the gang, but then they went to their offices and got back to work. Neither of them had stopped working when they went to Boston, but being back in the office made it feel like they were truly back at work. Instead of passing articles, research, and scripts back and forth via email and direct transfers to the servers, having to pick up a phone to confer with the others over research, article subjects, scripts, or edits, they instead just walked to an office. Kit had a long meeting with Rick first thing, as they went over the books and the projects and the plans for the future in detail, since Kit had over two months to catch up on as far as work went. They went over the financial health of the magazine in great detail, which was surprisingly good despite the downturn in the economy and the more serious outlook among print media. The expansion Kit had engineered when becoming a partner had more than paid off, and circulation was higher than ever. Despite print being a dwindling media in the age when furs could surf the web on cell phones, Lone Star managed to keep high interest among a large block of age groups, from high schoolers all the way up to baby boomers. A mixture of highly interesting weekly features, School Daze and Missy and Cutler, and excellent writing and investigative reporting kept readers coming back week after week. Barry and Marty had made names for themselves in the realm of investigative reporting, and Lilly had truly come into her own as a staff writer. Even Mike, whose writing was restricted mainly to technical issues, had a very successful article.

Kit wasn't surprised, however, to find that Jessie's articles were among the most popular, especially with femmes. Jessie may be an English major, but she had a style of writing that was both highly understandable and extremely communicative, and her background as an English major gave her a vast vocabulary with which to work. She could make someone feel something in her writing, able to convey mood and emotion with amazing clarity, and she had the rare gift of being able to describe an object, scene, or setting in minimal words yet convey the texture of the object or place in a way that made one feel like they were actually there. Jessie wrote her comic strip and her weekly feature, which was Austin, life, and just general things that mattered to femmes, written by a femme. Her pregnancy and her preparations for motherhood had been the focus of many of her articles over the last few months, and there were also quite a few articles about Boston, Stonebrook, and the staff as well. Kit wasn't the only one who had described their adventure in Boston through writing. Kit had told his side of it, and Jessie had told hers.

Outside of the writing, things were still good for the magazine. They raked in more royalties than ever as they sold rights to their articles and features to other publications, and the website was making a great deal more money than even Rick and Kit had expected through ad revenues and a few pay features. School Daze was now officially a nationally syndicated comic, and Missy and Cutler had even begun to spread into Sunday comic sections throughout Texas, Oklahoma, and Louisiana, as papers who ran School Daze found an audience for the spin-off. They had decided to lower their royalties a little more for the strip, and the result was they got even more papers to sign on...but they would go no lower. An average strip earned $10 in royalties, but they were standing pat at $25 per week. Despite the downturn in newspaper profits and circulation, papers couldn't deny that the strip was worth $25, because in some cities, like Dallas, furs bought the paper just to read School Daze. In addition to the royalty revenue, Jeffrey had designed several tee shirts and coffee mugs, and from the looks of the pre-orders that had started rolling in on Friday night, the idea of merchandising the comic was a huge success. Jeffrey had offered four different tee shirts and three coffee mugs, and in just one weekend they had thousands of orders filed for them. They had contracted with a local silkscreener for the shirts, and a glass and crockery company down in San Antonio had agreed to do the coffee mugs for them. And were those contractors happy they took the job, since they had 4,384 orders for tee shirts and 1,093 orders for coffee mugs, more than making it economically feasible to produce them. Rick had wisely decided to order 1,000 of each tee shirt and 1,000 of each style of mug after seeing the initial orders, confident they'd sell the stock. It was more than worth the $17,044.80 it cost them for the shirts and the $4,674.60 for the coffee mugs. That seemed like a big chunk of money, but given that they were buying the tee shirts at $4.02 per unit and coffee mugs at $1.47 per unit, and selling them at $10 per unit and $4 per unit, that was just pure profit after they deducted shipping costs out of it. They got that good of a deal on them because, like in most things, buying in quantity resulted in a lower cost per unit, which would have been $6.28 per unit if they'd ordered 200 or less. By ordering 1,000, they'd pushed the cost per unit way down, and that widened the profit margin provided they could sell out. Processing the orders and shipping out the tee shirts was going to be a time-consuming process, so much so that Rick decided to hire a temporary office worker whose sole function would be to fill the orders. Rick had space for the boxes and boxes of shirts and mugs on his ranch, and they had a large storage room in the office where they could keep a supply of them, so the temp's job would be to mail out those tee shirts and mugs to their customers. The first shipment of 200 of each shirt and 100 of each mug was due to arrive on Thursday, and one of the things Rick had to do was clean out his barn and get it ready to handle a four large boxes of tee shirts and coffee mugs.

Once Kit was confident their capital and cash flow were stable, they discussed their future plans, which expanded the meeting to include Savid, Barry, and Mike, who were the heads of the other major departments. Now that Kit was back, Rick intended to expand the staff again, expand circulation, increase the pages of the magazine, and offer a few more features both in the magazine and on the website. Rick intended to hire another researching assistant, two more writers, one more artist, one more computer fur, and definitely another office worker to take some of the strain off Denise and the interns. Each of those hires would cut into their profit margin, the expansion of the magazine to 52 pages would cost more to produce, but a business that did not aggressively expand faced the possibility of failure. Lone Star was hot, and they had to strike right now, while the magazine was popular. They had to keep their readers and attract new ones, and that was done by offering more and more for them to read and experience if they bought an issue and still maintain their high quality of writing and features. If they didn't take advantage of the magazine's success and popularity, they'd be shooting themselves in the foot in the long run.

They didn't finish the meeting until lunchtime, so the entire gang went down to the Olive Garden and enjoyed a nice lunch, and got back to the office a little later than a standard lunch break. After lunch, though, Kit settled back into his office and his routine, at least after setting up a maintenance appointment for the plane and having Alice pull it into the hangar to have the mechanics make sure it was safe to take to Georgetown. She did that for him gladly, for it would take any one of the mechanics only five minutes to inspect the plane and ensure it was safe for the ten minute flight up to Georgetown. By 2:30pm, Kit felt almost as if he'd never left Austin, for he was fully back into the routine of the office, and Pat was again spending almost as much time standing by his desk looking over his shoulder as they discussed a project as he did at his own desk out in the big room.

"I can't tell ya how nice it is to talk to you face to face again," Pat laughed as they discussed the requirements for a new project Lilly had put in their inbox, which dealt with a change to Austin's bar zoning laws that would make it harder for new bars to open. She wanted to do a piece investigating the impact of that law on the college social scene, and for that she needed the researchers to dig up some facts for her, mainly on how similar laws had affected other cities with similar college populations.

“A lot nicer than using the phone or Skype, isn’t it?” Kit laughed.

“I’m surprised Jessie’s been here all day,” he noted when they saw her through his open office door, heading for Jeffrey’s office across the way. The two of them had been closeted up most of the time Kit and Rick were in their meeting, and she’d obviously not gotten everything settled with him if she was going back now. “She must be due any day now.”

“In about two weeks,” Kit told him. “Her mother is supposed to be here on Friday, but my sister’s mother-in-law’s going to be down here tomorrow.”

“Abby’s coming here?” he asked with a sudden grin. “We met at the wedding,” he said quickly.

“They bought a vacation house down here just so they have somewhere to stay when visiting, as if they’ll ever visit after Jessie delivers,” he snorted. “She said she’d be down tomorrow, and I think she’s bringing her sons, but I’m not entirely sure. I’ll call tonight and ask.”

“Harry and Mike are coming too?” he asked with a sudden smile. “I hope they bring Charlie!”

“You really mingled while you were there, didn’t you?” he asked with a chuckle.

“Sure did,” grinned in reply. “I’ll get busy on this. I’m pretty sure that Rick’s gonna keep you busy with other stuff the rest of the day.”

“I’m done with Rick for now,” Kit told him. “But if you want it, I won’t argue. I haven’t had a good chance to roam yet.”

“That’s another reason I’m taking it,” he chuckled as he filed out of the office.

He spent the rest of the day doing just that, more or less roaming around the office and chatting with everyone. He’d talked to everyone in the office quite a bit while he was in Boston, but it wasn’t quite the same as padding into an office and gabbing, or hanging out at Elly’s desk, or teasing the interns as they went about their tasks. He more or less wasted the rest of the day, but since all his work for the day was more or less finished, it was his first day back, he was one of the owners, and everyone tended to do it which made it part of office culture, nobody really said much to him about it.

By 5:00, however, he was ready to go. Jessie had been at the office all day, which was unusual for her, and besides they had something else to do. Martha had brought Jessie’s van, and they had to take that home as well as go to the airport...which took a bit of maneuvering. Kit followed Jessie home, then he got in her van and she took him to Bergstrom. “See you in Georgetown, love,” she told him, kissing him. “Don’t waste too much time jabbering with Alice.”

He laughed. “I won’t, I promise,” he said as he climbed out of the van. He went into Avia’s hangar and saw Mike and Alice near their plane, which was in one of the front maintenance spots, spent a few minutes saying hello, then Mike used the crawler to tow his plane out onto the tarmac. Once out there, he gave the plane a thorough walk-around inspection to make sure there was no damage from it sitting at the tiedown for so long, then climbed in and performed the full preflight checklist, paying very close attention to everything as he worked his way down the checklist, listening, waiting, even smelling from time to time to make sure everything sounded and acted normally. The Garmin seemed a touch sluggish as he worked through the onboard computer startup section of preflight, but that was from it sitting so long. It spent nearly four minutes as the XM section of it negotiated with the servers to search for updates and do all those other computer things, but he let it do that on its own as he continued the preflight. When it came time to start the engine, though, he had no problems. It started right up on the first try, and it purred as smoothly and easily as he remembered.

Once he was done with preflight, he taxied out and quickly got back into the swing of flying. It had been months since he'd been in the cockpit, but everything came back to him almost immediately as he fiddled with the Garmin to set it up for the very short flight to Georgetown, then negotiated with air traffic control as he entered the queue for takeoff from the short runway, 36 Right. He'd be taking off due south and would have to swing around and head up to Georgetown, but that wasn't a problem.

His caution seemed a bit silly once he got the plane in the air, for it was smooth and easy and felt just like it always did, responsive and effortless. He was swept up in the momentary joy of flight as he executed a banking, climbing turn to head for Georgetown, using ground landmarks to navigate rather than bother to use his Garmin as he leveled off at 1000 feet for the short jump over the city, the minimum allowed altitude for flying over the city when not actively landing at Bergstrom, and he saw a gorgeous view of Lake Travis and the hill country out his left window, and the rolling low hills of the eastern ranchlands sprawled out from his right window. He flew over I-35, and much to his amusement, he actually saw Jessie's van as she left north Austin heading for the airfield. He passed over her as he got clearance to land at Georgetown and lined up with the runway, and touched down smoothly and easily 12 minutes after taking off from Bergstrom. He taxied over to Georgetown Cessna, which was the maintenance shop, and parked the plane at a tiedown just in front of their hangar. A short ferret scurried out from the small hangar as he tied it off. "This the Vulpan Cessna four hundred?" he asked.

Kit nodded. "I have an appointment for nine tomorrow morning. They said I could tie the plane down here today."

"Surely surely," he nodded. "Just wanted to make sure it was you, that's all. We'll take her in and do the inspection and two hundred hour maintenance first thing in the mornin'. Should be done sometime Wednesday. Since you're here, we can get the paperwork out of the way."

"Sounds good."

Jessie arrived just as they finished up. The mechanics would perform a thorough inspection of the plane, inside and out, and since it was close, they'd also do the preventive maintenance planes needed from time to time. Cessna had a very rigid schedule of inspections of maintenance based on the number of hours flown, but Kit and the mechanics both agreed that since the plane had sat for so long, going ahead with the next maintenance was a good idea. "When will it be done?" she asked.

"Sometime Wednesday, ma'am," the mechanic answered. "We're gonna go ahead and do the two hundred hour scheduled maintenance on it while we have it in."

"But it's only got a hundred fifty hours on it since the last maintenance."

“It’s also been sitting for two months without so much as being turned on,” Kit countered. “And since they’ll have it open to do the inspection, it’s not much extra work for them to go ahead and do it now.”

“Ah. That’s a good reason,” she nodded. “I was thinking of taking a joyride tomorrow, but I can wait until Wednesday.”

“You’re a pilot, ma’am?” the mechanic asked.

“Yes I am,” she said with a smile. “I love our plane so much, I learned to fly it myself!”

“Nice planes can do that,” he chuckled.

It turned out, though, that Jessie was indeed taking a plane ride that evening. When they got home, Nick came over and finally upheld his promise to take Jessie up in his Beech King. He too wanted to check his plane after being gone for a couple of months, but unlike Kit, he’d had it done there at Bergstrom, which had a Beech mechanic there that had towed his plane in and checked it over for him last week. Kit and Sylvia ended up going along for the ride, sitting in the back seats as Nick explained the Beech to Jessie, almost a flying lesson, teaching her how it was different from the Crusader twin in which she’d earned her multi rating. Kit was already rated on Beech Kings, but not one quite so new or nice. This was a Beech King Air C90B, where he’d been flying the old steam gauge models. Nick’s Beech had glass panel displays and a flight computer, a Collins suite which Kit had never used before, so he listened almost as intently as Jessie as Nick explained how his Collins differed from the Garmin. Sylvia was both quiet and relaxed as Nick taxied them out, and they were airborne soon after.

They flew around for about an hour, and Kit found that Nick had made a good choice. The King was a good plane, rugged and dependable, and these new Beeches were also a very smooth, comfortable ride, stable in the air, and looked to be very easy to fly. Nick's hold on the yoke was almost negligent, hinting that the controls were soft and responsive, a suspicion confirmed when Nick let Jessie take over from the right seat. She had no trouble at all flying the plane, and hearing the questions she asked made him smile in pride at just how much of a pilot his pretty kitty had become.

When they got home, however, they got roped into helping Sam move. She only had a few boxes of stuff, but Kevin got caught up at the firm and hadn't come home yet, so Jessie and Kit helped her pack her things in the van and Jessie drove them back. Sam already had keys and the alarm code, so she opened the door of her new townhouse and saw that within it was clean and neat, with new furniture, but almost no sense of style at all. There were no curtains, just Venetian blinds, nothing in the walls, just a blank house that almost looked like a hotel room.

"He bought furniture, but not much else," Jessie noted as she carried a box in behind Sam.

"Yeah, well, he's been a little broke lately," Sam answered. "I guess you two know what it takes to furnish a place this big."

"Sorta, since most of our furniture was gifted to us," Jessie laughed. "But I remember how much it cost Kit to furnish the old apartment. I can imagine how much more it'd cost for one of the townhouses."

"Yo, you guys need help?" Mickey called from the door.

"A few boxes left in my van, Mickey," Jessie answered.

“No sweat, your work mule has arrived!”

With Mickey’s help, they got everything stacked in the living room in a matter of minutes, and visited with Sam for a few minutes before leaving her to the task of moving her things in and making the townhouse her home as much as Kevin’s. Kit had no doubt that Sam would use the bare nature of the townhouse to stamp her style on it, which was already half hers, since Kevin had bought the furniture of which Sam approved. He’d rented the townhouse fully knowing that he was renting their new home, and he made sure Sam was fully involved in its furnishing.

Lawyers were smart. Good ones were, anyway...and Kevin was a good lawyer.

By dinner, it was like they’d never left. Kit and Jessie both felt fully and completely home, and though Kit wasn’t letting Jessie do any chores, they both felt completely acclimated to being back where they belonged.

That was a relative feeling, however, for Boston and their time up there quickly intruded into their lives, in the arrival of Abigail Brighton. She arrived without telling anyone when she was arriving, wanting to surprise them, and surprise them she did. She did, however, get hold of Vil, who got her in touch with Nick, who sent Krichek to go pick her up and escort her around town. Vil’s sending extra guards wasn’t just about Kit and Jessie. She had originally hired Nick to act as a general security consultant and agent for all Vulpans and guests visiting Austin, and though there was more threat and more guards, they still fulfilled that other part of their duties of being available to guests. Krichek drove Abigail to the office, where both Kit and Jessie were; Jessie had come in again that day to work on next week's article and work with Jeffrey on a new tee shirt idea about Missy and Cutler.

That had led to an expansion of the crew by one. Rather than hire a worker, Rick went through a temp agency he knew and trusted, and Lou Yetz was the result. He was a small, willowy calico mouse, but he was a hard worker who understood the duties for which he'd been hired. His first act that morning was to work with Mike and Kit, the resident IT guru and accountant, to set up an efficient yet simple system for filling orders and keeping track of everything. That was ready by lunch, and after lunch, he started. Tee shirts and coffee mugs were quickly packed and stacked, addressed by paw, and then a FedEx driver swung by at the end of the day to collect up four boxes worth of outgoing orders. But Abigail interrupted that around 1:20pm, when she arrived without warning with Krichek in tow. She hugged and kissed her way through the office, since she had met nearly everyone there, pausing only to be introduced to Lisa, Paula, and Lou. "And why are you working, dove?" Abigail chided when she kissed Jessie in greeting.

"Well, I can sit around at home or sit at my desk here," she winked in reply.

"At least here she isn't tempted to do housework, which she's forbidden from doing until she delivers," Kit added as he hugged Abigail. "When did you get in, Abby?"

"Just now," she answered. "Krichek here is going to take me to our new vacation house. My staff is supposed to be there by now waiting for us."

"Where are the boys?"

“Coming in later this week,” she answered. “Winston has them on something of a world tour. He’s promoted both of them to take over for Ken, so they’re going around meeting everyone they need to know to do their jobs. I think they’re in Singapore right now. But Charlie’s supposed to be flying in tomorrow.”

“I was hoping Charlie would come!” Pat said in excitement.

“You think he’d miss this?” Abigail smiled. “He’s all but a Brighton by name, he’s been hanging around for so long. Besides, he still hasn’t got a job since getting out of the Marines,” she laughed. “He’s still going through his ‘I don’t want to work’ phase. He’ll get over it soon.”

“I didn’t realize that Ken had a job like that,” Janet mused.

“He was a globetrotter, dove,” Abigail smiled. “He’d be in London one day, Paris the next, Cape Town the next, Bombay the next, and so on. But with him being married now, he doesn’t have the time to run all over the world, so Winston fired him. He has a much more important job now... giving me a grandson!”

“What if it’s a girl?” Marty asked with a chuckle.

“Well, Jessie here is already providing the granddaughter, so Ken had best not disappoint us!”

“He might rebel and give Vil a daughter, you know,” Kit chuckled.

“Well, we could forgive him for that. It’s not like he only has one chance,” she grinned. “Now, I’m going to go take charge of our new house. Krichek dear, time to go!”

“Da, Misses Brighton,” he said with a nod. He glanced at Janet and chattered at her in Russian, and Janet laughed and answered.

“I didn’t know you speak Russian, dove,” Abigail laughed.

“I’d better or I wouldn’t be able to talk to half my family,” Janet smiled in reply. “I’m the true daughter of immigrants, Misses Abby.”

“I’ll see you two tomorrow, duckies,” Abigail told them.

“Why not tonight? Want to have dinner?” Kit asked.

“Not if you’re cooking,” she answered with a light smile, which made him laugh.

In actuality, Abigail wanted that evening to get their vacation house set up and meet her new staff. She had four workers at the house; a butler/chauffer, a cook, a maid, and a groundskeeper/general handymale... though in a house that size, those were just titles. All the staff would do whatever was needed. Kit had seen pictures of the house, and it was what Kit would consider to be very large and luxurious, but to someone as rich as the Brightons, it would be “small and cozy.” While Kit and Jessie spent the evening getting the nursery completely ready and training themselves in the mysteries of car seats and diaper tables, Abigail was getting the vacation house prepared for the Brightons to arrive to inhabit it.

Wednesday, Jessie stayed home with Sylvia keeping her company while Kit went to work, and now that he had most of his work fully caught up, he was free to pursue some other matters. After the morning meeting with Rick and ensuring that the issue was ready, he delved into his real estate idea. He spent most of the day researching the feasibility of the idea by making some calls, searching through records of properties that were in danger of foreclosure, and studying the families that lived within those houses. He found what he considered to be his test case, one Juan Ortiz, naturalized American citizen from Guatemala, who had a wife and two children. Juan had worked at an auto dealership as a service writer until the dealership closed, and it took him four months to get another job; he was now working at Baxter Ford as a service writer. But those four months of unemployment had been crushing because his wife had been on maternity leave for the first month, and then forewent the rest of her leave to return to her job at Wal-Mart. Juan had had an exemplary credit history up until he got laid off, and his financial troubles weren't really his fault. He was three months behind on his mortgage and was saddled with credit card debt incurred trying to keep his family treading water during his unemployment.

Their house was exactly the kind of property he envisioned when he got this idea. It was a very modest three bedroom in south Austin, down near 71 and only about two miles from the church where Sam and Kevin were going to marry. It sat on a .45 acre lot, which was quite small, and the house looked absolutely normal. A house like that was going for $85,000-$140,000 or so before the housing crash, but the three other houses for sale in that neighborhood were on the lists in a range from $52,500-$94,000, the average of which was almost half of what they'd been going for just a year ago...which was because there were two foreclosed houses in the immediate neighborhood, which drove down the value of the surrounding property. The house, when he drove by, looked well-worn but also maintained, with a very small fenced-in yard in the front where a little collie puppy ran back and forth playing with a frisbee by itself, the idyllic "lower middle class" modified ranch style house with a garage. At auction, a house like that would, if it followed the statistical trend, go for about $45,000. Given that the house was easily worth $45,000, Kit talked to a couple of bankers in town and found that getting a $45,000 mortgage would be easy for him, because he had rock-solid credit and strong collateral. When he talked to his own bank about mortgages, they almost laughed. They had absolutely no doubt it would be paid back, and the loan officer offered him a rate of 3.25%. The current going rate was 5.25%, but the name Vulpan was worth shaving some percentage off that number. The bank had no qualms about giving Kit a very generous rate, because his family had $6.73 billion when the entire family was taken together. Both because he was a Vulpan and he had some $162,756 in his bank accounts at that moment, and because the bank would not want to anger his family, they were more than willing to give him a rate far below what others would receive.

Just another way the rich profited from being rich.

Insurance wasn't as bad as he thought. The house wasn't in a flood-prone area, so he wouldn't have to buy flood insurance, which was a good thing. For the house insurance, buying a policy that basically only covered fire and unintentional damage, such as storm damage, and only having to insure for $45,000, he'd only have to pay $47 a month given where the house was and the kind of policy he intended to take out. That wouldn't add much to the base rent at all.

Adding it all together, mortgage, insurance, putting back a little each month towards annual taxes and repairs, and adding $60 to guarantee a profit, Kit came to a final rent of $350 a month.

Comparing that final rent total to the Ortiz family's annual income, Kit found that the deal would be quite workable for them. It would reduce their house payment by $550 given that their mortgage was currently underwater in relation to the value of the house, and that reduced payment was more than within the financial constraints of the family. They had a lot of credit card debt to pay down, but the rent they would pay to Kit would be cheaper than rent they'd have to pay on a house or apartment large enough to house the family. So long as Juan didn't lose his job, it was definitely doable.

Talking with Kevin over the legal ramifications of it, however, considerably changed his plan. Kit went to his firm and the two of them sat at his desk, which was still a cubicle near one corner of the main office area, within easy sight of Delores Kittimer's door. Kevin hadn't yet earned an office of his own, but that wouldn't take long given that he was one of their best rookie lawyers. Kevin listened to the entire idea, read over the conditions of the lease agreement that Kit had brought him, then leaned back in his chair. "Legally, it's pretty safe," he declared. "It would all come down to the lease agreement, which I could write for you in about ten minutes given you've laid everything out in this word file. But why risk buying at auction? I suggest you go straight to the bank and offer them what you think you'd pay at auction as a short sale. Given the bank wouldn't have to pay the costs of foreclosure, odds are they'd jump on it."

"A short sale, eh?" Kit mused, putting his elbows on the desk. "I hadn't considered that."

"Didn't you research it?"

"Of course I did, but I thought I could get a cheaper price at auction."

"I think you could easily get what you intend to pay at auction if you approach the bank directly. Banks never want to foreclose, and if they can get as much from a short sale as they can from an auction, they'll take the short sale. They recover more that way since they don't have to pay to foreclose."

“Hmm. I think that’s a good idea.”

“I’ll draw up a legal lease agreement while you go threaten the bank,” Kevin grinned. “I’ll make it more or less ironclad, but also with a couple of logical outs for both sides. You’re sure you want to lock in the rent?”

He nodded. “I want the only way it can raise is as a flat percentage based on increase in annual taxes. The idea isn’t to make money off one house, it’s to make money off a series of them, and an ironclad rent that can’t be raised on a whim is a solid indicator to the renter that I’m serious about it.”

“Ah, got it. I’ll go talk to Rogers, he’s our resident real estate law expert, and make sure your conditions are legal. If they are, this lease will protect both you and the renter.”

“The best kind.”

“Should be done by the end of the day. I’ll swing by and drop it off at your house after work.”

“Well, that’ll be easy now given you live four doors down,” Kit chuckled. “How’s it with Sam?”

“Much better than I thought it would, even if my bathroom is suddenly inundated with bottles.”

After talking to Kevin, Kit went to the bank holding the mortgage and had a little talk with them. They were a little surprised by Kit’s interest in the house, and as he expected, they initially turned down his offer to buy the house at what he thought was a fair price. That, however, was simply how banks worked, and he knew it. They would try to sell the house for the most possible, to recoup as much as possible. Kit, however, was a Vulpan, and he knew how to haggle. They went back and forth over the price of the house for an hour, and Kit set a price lower than his original auction estimate and told them they could buy it from him now, or they could foreclose and get the same amount when he bought it at auction. Either way, they'd get the same amount of money, but the difference was they'd pay more to foreclose on the house, and therefore get less profit, than they would if they simply executed a short sale.

An hour after he left the bank, they called him back, and reluctantly agreed. They would sell him the house at $42,500 as a short sale.

So, on his side, the idea was feasible and workable. It would come down to the Ortizes to find out if it would fly, because the other half of the plan was to have the prior owners sign a lease to live in the house. Kit wouldn't go through with the sale unless he had an agreement from the occupants.

Coming close to closing time, Kit picked up the phone and made the initial contact. "Service, this is Juan, may I help you?" Juan Ortiz called in his Spanish accent, but he spoke excellent English.

"Hello, Mister Ortiz, my name is Kit Vulpan. I know that this is coming right out of the blue, but I wanted to talk to you about your house."

"Are you from the bank?" he asked immediately.

"No, I'm what you might call an independent entrepreneur," he answered. "I wanted to talk to you about a plan that would let you stay in your house and convert from an owner to a renter."

"What do you mean?"

“It’s a little difficult to explain over the phone, and you’d probably think I was a scam artist regardless,” he chuckled. “So, how about you come by my work after you get off and listen to what I have to say?”

“Well, give me the basics so I know whether to show up,” he countered.

“What I was of a mind to do was to buy your house, then turn around and rent it to you at a reduced rent,” he said. “If it works right, you don’t have to move out, and it would cut down your monthly payment quite a bit.”

“That sounds...weird,” he said after a moment.

“It’s simple, actually, but I’d like to talk to you about it face to face. Show you exactly what I have in mind.”

“I, I think I can do that. I’m off in a half hour for lunch, how about then?”

“That’s fine. I work at Lone Star magazine, our office is on third and Congress.”

“You’re that Kit Vulpan? I read your magazine!” he said with a sudden laugh.

“Yeah, that’s me,” he chuckled. “So, at least now you know I’m not a con male. Swing by our office on your lunch break and I’ll show you what I’m working on, and we’ll see if it’s workable.”

“Si, yes, I’ll be there!”

Juan Ortiz was punctual, showing up exactly thirty minutes later. He was a gespato, which was a term for Spanish wolf mixed breeds that were quite common through Latin America, the result of Spanish settlers and Conquistadors taking native wives. Juan was part wolf and part feline of some kind, and he had a wolf's muzzle but had cat ears and spotted and banded fur that was actually quite attractive. He shook Kit's paw when he arrived in his office, and with Kevin right there to listen in to make sure what they talked about wasn't illegal, and also with the lease agreement in paw, Kit explained his plan in detail to Juan, stressing that the agreement included signing a lease. "The bank is going to sell me the house for forty two-five, which is about what they'd get for it at auction. After I convert that into a thirty year mortgage, you'd be paying three hundred fifty a month in rent. That rent would be enough to cover mortgage, taxes, and put a little extra back each month for big repairs, but you'd handle small repairs yourself. When it's something big, we'd work together to get it done."

"Only three hundred fifty?" he asked in surprise.

"A thirty year fixed for forty or so thousand averages out to about a hundred twenty a month," Kit told him. "But there's also annual taxes, insurance, putting money back for repairs, and let's face it, I do have the right to earn a small profit from the deal. I'm not doing this entirely for charity, Mister Ortiz. But as you can see, my profit will be very small out of this agreement, sixty dollars a month. And I don't think you're going to find anything in Austin big enough for your family for three hundred fifty a month."

"You're right about that. Seven hundred was the cheapest I could find, and that was a rathole."

"We've already drawn up a lease," Kevin told him. "We'll let you take it home and read it."

“What does it say in general?” he asked.

“Mainly, it’s simply an agreement that you don’t move out two months from now. Kit’s putting his own money on the line, so the lease agreement is initially for five years, with options to extend. The rent is a flat percentage over the mortgage and the annual taxes, and it can only change if the government changes the tax rate. So, you’re locked into the lease, but you’re also guaranteed that the rent won’t increase, and you’d pay less rent than you would if you moved out of the house and rented an apartment. It states that you’re responsible for small repairs of up to five hundred dollars and also non-necessary remodeling, you split the cost with Kit of necessary repairs over five hundred. There is a clause, though, that states that the rent can increase if excessive repairs have to be made, to cover the cost of those repairs. But the rent returns to its base after that’s paid back.”

“That’s a strange clause.”

“It’s to prevent a tenant from getting the bright idea that one way to get Kit to help pay for non-necessary remodeling of the house is to knock holes in the walls and make a claim for it,” Kevin answered. “Basically, the lease more or less states that though Kit will own the house, you’ll be responsible for its upkeep up to a certain point. Kit will help pay for big repairs because you may not have the money to afford it, but little things are your responsibility. There’s also an option in the lease that basically allows you to rent to own,” he finished. “You get credit for mortgage payments Kit makes from the rent you pay him, and after five years, you have the option to buy the house from Kit by paying what’s left owed on the house, or sign a new lease to continue the agreement.”

“But my credit will be ruined.”

“Not as ruined as you think,” Kit told him. “By selling the house to me, you avoid the foreclosure. That won’t hit your credit. Pay off your other debts, and you should have solid credit by the end of the lease, and could probably buy the house back from me.”

Ortiz’s eyes lit up, and he leaned back in his chair, nodding. “I’d like to read the lease.”

“Here you go,” Kit told him. “Read it over, talk about it with your wife, heck, talk to a lawyer if you want to, then call me,” he said, taking one of his cards and passing it to the wolf-looking mixed breed. “I don’t want you agreeing unless you feel absolutely sure it’s what you want to do.”

After printing out the lease, Ortiz said his goodbyes hastily and rushed from the office. Kit glanced at Kevin, who only chuckled. “He’d be an idiot not to agree,” Kevin told him. “He won’t get three hundred fifty a month anywhere in Austin. That’s half what he’d pay in rent.”

“Probably.”

Charlie arrived more or less as they finished up at the office, storming into the office all chatty and happy, shaking paws, making all kinds of suggestive, flirtatious comments to every unmarried femme in the office—which was every femme but Jessie—and making his presence known. Charlie had made friends of just about everyone while at the wedding, and he roamed the office, delaying everyone going home, then stormed out as quickly as he’d arrived. “Gotta go see Abby and settle in at the vacation house, then I’m meeting Sheila, she’s taking me clubbing! Said something about a club called the Top Hat.”

Kit and Jessie exploded into laughter. “She’s taking his innocence right off the bat,” Jessie snickered.

“Look who’s talking,” Kit teased.

“This proves I’m not innocent anymore,” she countered, pointing down.

“And if I took you to the Top Hat, all your cheek fur would fall out,” he noted. “You just think you’re not innocent because you’re married. You are still the vestal virgin in some ways. And I like you just the way you are.”

She kissed him on the muzzle. “Well, what more does a girl need?”

“Oh, a thirty-eight D chest, maybe an inch longer legs, a practicing contortionist, and a totally depraved mindset that’ll make her try anything,” he said casually, which earned him a swat. “What, you asked!”

“There are some questions that have no right answer, buster,” she told him.

“Don’t I know it,” he sighed, then laughed as she swatted him again. “At least I can make due with you!” he added as he backed away from her.

“Make due? Make due?” she protested, and Kit ran for his office. The gang laughed as Jessie waddled after him, and he made it to his office and shut and locked the door. “Rick, get me my purse!” she called. “He forgets I have a key to that office!”

“Bring it on, you fangless weenie!” Kit shouted through the door.

“Such a brave male when he’s hiding!” she called back.

The gang decided to watch this bit of entertainment, as Marty brought Jessie her purse, and they exploded into laughter when she rolled up a newspaper and advanced on the door. She unlocked it and pushed the door open, then squeaked in surprise when Kit grabbed hold of her and pulled her into an embrace, then kissed her with enough passion to make her drop the newspaper and clutch onto him for dear life, one of her feet rising up and bumping into her tail.

“That’s one way to get out of a punishment,” Mike laughed.

“The only way,” Janet added.

Kit didn’t have long to wait to hear back from Juan. He called back while he was cooking dinner, and Jessie brought the phone in. “Handsome fox, it’s someone named Juan. Is that the guy?”

“That’s him,” he nodded, putting down the wooden spoon he’d been using to stir browning ground beef and taking the phone. “This is Kit.”

“Hello, Mister Vulpan. I talked it over with my wife, and we’ll take your deal.”

“Well, that’s good to hear, Mister Ortiz.”

“We already signed the lease,” he laughed. “I can bring it back to you. I’m about to test drive a customer’s car to make sure of the repairs, but I can swing by wherever you are and drop it off.”

“That’s fine with me. I live in Westwood. Sixteen forty-two Guadelupe. If you’re facing the pool, the second townhouse past the gate, on the right.”

“That’s not far from the dealership,” he mused. “I should be over in about fifteen minutes.”

“Good, you can meet my wife,” he said with a chuckle as he slapped Jessie’s paw away from the spoon.

Juan was anything if not punctual. Almost exactly fifteen minutes later, the doorbell rang. Jessie answered it and invited him as he mixed the sauce with the ground beef and dug the other ingredients out of the refrigerator, which he'd cut up the night before. "Tacos are ready!" Kit shouted as he put the bowls on a platter and started carrying it towards the dining room. He met Jessie and Juan in the dining room, as Jessie giggled and thanked Juan for his congratulations for the impending birth of their daughter. "My wife delivered just four months ago," he added. "A week after I lost my job at Turnpike, when it closed down. That was very stressful," he said.

"I can imagine. A baby on the way, your wife can't work, and you lose your job. It sounds terrible!"

"Well, thanks to the generosity of you and your husband, Misses Vulpan, I think we can get back on our feet," he said with sincere gratitude.

"My handsome fox always says the best kind of deal is the one that benefits both sides," she answered as he set the platter down. "You get to keep your house, and we earn a little money we intend to put back for little Laura's education," she said, patting her stomach with a smile.

"Si, yes, it is," he nodded. "Here's the lease, Mister Vulpan," he said, offering a manila folder. "My wife and I both signed it. She came to work to do it," he laughed.

"Well, tomorrow, I'll call you bank and get things moving," he answered. "Odds are, I'll close on it by the end of the week."

"That fast?"

"I have certain advantages, Mister Ortiz. I'll write them a check. That clears up a lot of the red tape that slows things down."

Juan laughed. "I can imagine!" he said. "But you said you're getting a mortgage?"

Kit nodded. "I only have so much cash, Juan. I buy the house with cash, then mortgage it for exactly what I paid for it. I get the cash back, which I can use to buy another house. That's how it works in real estate. With just a little capital, I can buy a whole lot of property, so long as I can get banks to offer mortgages, and pay those mortgages."

"Ahh, si, I get it," he nodded. "So we shouldn't pay our mortgage payments?"

"Forget them," he said immediately. "As you saw in the lease agreement, your rent won't be due until the fifth of the month, and the rent won't start until after I get the mortgage on the house from my own bank. So you should look at starting to pay rent in November."

"You mean we live in the house for a month for free?"

"More or less," Kit shrugged. "I think you could use that month to sit down and look over your other debts and work out a payment plan. And remember, your first month's rent is actually you paying your security deposit. The rent you pay from the month after the first are the ones that will count towards the mortgage."

"I'll remember," he answered with a nod.

"Would you like a taco, Mister Ortiz?" Jessie asked.

He laughed. "Si, I gave up my lunch to talk to your husband, Misses Vulpan. If you're offering, I would very much like a taco. But since I'm in a customer's car and I should be on the road right now test driving it, excuse me if I don't stay. I can always take it back with me and eat it at work."

“Mean fox, making him go without food,” Jessie accused. “I’ll make you up a plate, Mister Ortiz.”

“Oh, here,” Kit said, taking out his wallet. “I’ll give you my card, it has my work number on it.” He fished out a pen from his portfolio and scribbled on the back. “The number on the back is my personal cell phone and home phone. That way you can get in touch with me.”

“I’ll give you our home phone number as well. I take it I just bring the rent by?”

“Or mail it, whatever works best for you,” he answered. “I’ll call you and keep you up to speed on what’s going on. I’m sure you’d like to know.”

“Oh yes, please,” he affirmed.

The door in the living room banged open from the sound of it. “Hey cousin!” Sheila boomed. “Where are you?”

“Well, you get to meet Sheila before you go,” Kit chuckled. “Dining room!” he called back. When she arrived, Kit saw that she was dressed to kill and ready to go clubbing, wearing a glorified bikini top and a pair of shorts, that showed off most of her lithe form. “Juan, this is my cousin Sheila. Sheila, this is Juan Ortiz. I just bought his house.”

“Ah, your real estate plan, eh? Well, nice to meet ya,” she smiled, shaking his paw. “I feel sorry for you, being in the thrall of my cousin. He’s a bastard.”

“Sheila!” Kit barked, to which she laughed.

“He may be so, but the lease agreement I signed definitely was not,” Juan answered.

Sheila laughed. “Oooh, tacos! Hope you made enough for one more!”

“Aren’t you going out with Charlie?”

“Of course, but a femme needs her energy for what we’re doing tonight,” she purred in a predatory manner. “I warned him to eat before we leave, there’s no restaurant there.”

“True.”

Jessie returned, and Juan was politely quiet as Sheila and Jessie bantered a little, as she made Juan a couple of tacos and put them in a disposable Ziploc container, one of the cheap plastic ones. “Here you go, Mister Ortiz,” she smiled. “Just be careful. Kit cooked, so I can’t promise you won’t get sick.”

“Ya, ya, ya, you’re just jealous because I won’t let you cook,” Kit countered, which made Sheila laugh and Juan smile. “Just for that, the next meal gets doused with stuff off the top spice rack. Liberally.”

“You’re the one that has to live with it if you make me sick, buster,” she countered. “I’ll throw up on the carpet and watch you clean it up.”

“I think she’s got you on this one, cousin,” Sheila grinned.

“Oh, make your taco and scram,” he told her shortly.

“I do need to go. Thank you for the dinner, Mister Vulpan, Misses Vulpan, and thank you very, very much for calling me out of the blue today. I thought we were going to be thrown out of our house for sure, but then you show up like a guardian angel. I can’t thank you enough.”

“Just make sure you pay your rent on time,” Kit chuckled.

Juan shook their paws, then nodded to them and let Jessie walk him to the door. “So, did you rape him?” Sheila asked.

“Nowhere near,” he answered. “I’ll make about sixty dollars a month off the deal I made with him.”

“That’s it?”

“Yes, that’s it. But Juan’s won’t be the only house I buy. I may only make a little money, but after I buy about twenty houses, do the math.”

“Oh. Ohhhhhhh,” she said, her eyes widening. “Hell yeah, cousin! As long as you can make them pay their rents, you’ll make a killing!”

“The beauty of it is, as long as I’m very careful about which houses I buy and the furs that live in them, it’s guaranteed money. Even if a tenant ends up violating the lease or moves out, I still bought that house for far less than market value, and I can rent it out much more cheaply than anyone else.”

“But that’s a lot of legal mess, dealing with real estate. My mom had a few rental properties, but it was such a headache she sold everything and got out of the business.”

“That’s why I have Kevin and the law firm. They have a couple of real estate lawyers,” he answered. “And once I have about ten houses, I’m going to organize things a little. Lupe’s already signed on to have his handymales go out and do service calls on the houses for far cheaper than I’d get through a contractor, and me and him are talking about turning the idea into a real estate company. He was talking about working on finding the right kinds of houses out of his office in his spare time. Lupe has a lot of spare time on his paws even with the complex, and he really knows the real estate business.”

“He should, he’s in it, in a way,” Sheila chuckled. “And that’s not a bad idea. Maybe I should buy in,” she mused. “We could start the Vulpan Real Estate Company.”

“Sixty dollars profit per unit isn’t much.”

“But after we own five hundred houses, it’ll split nicely,” she countered. “And my money would go to good use, helping furs down on their luck because of the recession keep from getting kicked out of their houses.”

“What is this? Sheila showing she has a heart?” Kit teased.

“Yeah, it’s right under this,” she retorted, grabbing her left breast crudely.

“Make your taco,” Kit commanded.

Abigail was everything he expected her to be. She was affable, charming, kind, sincere, and maybe just a touch nosy, but she had a good heart and sunny disposition. And he knew that she would drive his family insane. She intended to go to Boston after Jessie delivered and get to know the in-laws, and Kit was certain now that Abigail would upend the Vulpans in the worst way, for she acted nothing like Vulpans did...and since she was old money, they couldn’t even snub her for not knowing the rules.

But for Kit, she was a delightful femme that he enjoyed having down in Austin. She threw a dinner party the day after Charlie arrived at her vacation house, now that she had it all settled in, and she invited not just Kit and Jessie, but all their friends, the guys from work, just about everyone that had come to the welcome-home party they threw when they got back from Boston. Abigail was intrigued by the tradition of the Texas barbecue, and her house had a very large and almost sinfully luxuriant barbecue pit near the pool, so they had a nice afternoon cookout. Jessie was still the absolute center of attention, and that just made Kit happy, for she deserved every bit of it. There were a few amusing things to watch, though, like the deer-in-the-headlights look Charlie had. Sheila had introduced Charlie to a level of sin and debauchery he probably hadn't known existed, and he looked a little scattered even nearly a day after she took him to the Top Hat. Sheila wore a smug little smile, and Charlie almost flinched every time she draped her arm over him. Charlie had had a taste of the infamous Vulpan girls up in Boston--probably literally--and Sheila had proved to him that the Vulpan Party Pack really was like that.

They had a very good time over at Abigail's, and were maybe a little late getting home given that they had to go pick up Hannah at the airport in the morning. Jessie's back was hurting, so Kit gave her a long, gentle backrub and then sent her off to the bathroom to take a hot bath. Kit had some writing to do, so he retired to the den to get it done, working on an article that would be in the issue two weeks from today, dealing with how it felt to be an impending father, the feeling of responsibility and all the new worries, and a humorous little anecdote about how he and Jessie had had trouble putting the crib together, and various other little mysteries that had entered their lives now that they were about to be parents. He got most of the article written, then glanced at the clock and realized it was nearly ten. Hannah was set to come in around nine, flying in on the Brighton's private jet that Abigail had sent up for her. Jessie had set up the guest room for her mother that morning, so at least that was ready to go.

“Kit,” Jessie called from the living room. “Kit. Kit!”

“I’m in the den, love!” he called.

“Well, get in here!” she called. “And call Doctor Mac!”

“What? Why?”

“Because my water just broke!” she answered.

He knocked the chair over in his rush to get into the living room. Jessie was wearing a bathrobe, and had both paws on her stomach as she stood, her face just a touch concerned. “Are you alright?” he asked urgently.

“I will be in a second, I think I just had a labor pain,” she answered. “My water broke as I was drying off,” she told him. “Call Doctor Mac, love.”

He snatched up his phone from the shelf and used speed dial to get in touch with her. “Jessie’s water just broke, Doc!” he called as soon as she answered the phone.

“Good!” she said brightly. “Earlier than I expected, but good! Put her on so I can talk to her while you go get her suitcase, Kit.”

He did just that, giving Jessie the phone and rushing upstairs. They had a suitcase packed for Jessie holding everything she’d need for her trip to the hospital, and hurried downstairs with it. “Just a little, but not much,” Jessie’s voice reached him. “No. At least I didn’t ruin any clothes, I was drying off from a bath when it broke,” she said with a laugh, then winced slightly. “Okay, now I’m feeling a little something,” she announced. “I thought I wasn't supposed to start feeling real labor pains for a while after my water broke. Oh, okay." She pushed the phone at Kit. "She wants you."

"Yeah, doc?" he asked into the phone.

"It's the real deal," she answered. "Jessie has a little time before she goes into full labor, so take her upstairs, help her put something on other than a robe, then take her to the hospital. I'll call ahead so they're waiting for you, and I'll be down in just a bit, alright?"

"Okay, Doc. How long til she goes into labor?"

"It's not a set time, but from the sound of what she told me, she has enough time to get dressed."

"Alright. See you there, Doc."

Kit was both wildly excited and very concerned as he helped Jessie go back upstairs, taking each step one at a time, then all but literally dressed her himself. Jessie looked to be in a little discomfort, but no outright labor pain as he helped her into a pair of stretch pants and a tee shirt, and for some strange reason, she insisted on wearing a bra. Kit put a paw on her belly and literally felt Laura moving around in there. "Yeah, I know," Jessie said with a weak chuckle. "Alright, handsome fox, let's get going." She winced again. "I think we should really be on our way, love. That wasn't just a back spasm."

He helped her down the stairs as quickly and carefully as he could, then grabbed the suitcase and helped her out the door. He helped her over and into the passenger seat of her van, then hurried around and got in. He backed out with one paw while his phone was in the other, after quickly dialing Vil. "Sis," he called.

“It’s a little late, bro, what’s going on?”

“Jessie just went into labor,” he announced.

“So soon? Oh, hell! Ken! We gotta get to Austin now!” she boomed, clearly not meaning to shout into the phone. “I’ll call John and Hannah, bro. Abby said she was sending a plane up for Hannah, right? Is it already there?”

“I have no idea.”

“I’ll call her and find out,” she declared. “You just get Jessie to the hospital, I’ll call out the cavalry.”

He chuckled. “Sure thing, sis. Want to talk to Jessie?”

“Sure!”

He gave Jessie the phone as he pulled out onto Guadalupe, then fished Jessie’s phone out of her purse while Jessie talked to Vil. “Nick,” he said when the wolf answered the phone.

“Yeah, mate?”

“I’m taking Jessie to the hospital, she’s going into labor,” he said. “We’re already on our way.”

“Oi, so soon?” he asked in surprise. “No worries, I’ll spread the word, and I’ll have Sylvie there as soon as she can make it!”

“Okay. Excuse me if I cut this short, I do not want to drive and talk on the phone right now.”

“No worries, hang up and get that femme of yours to the hospital!” And to reinforce the order, Nick hung up.

Kit drove like a little old lady, but also with a certain urgency. He was the epitome of a defensive driver, keeping well away from everyone else, as Jessie continued to chat with Vil, mainly Vil keeping her distracted, as they made the three mile trip from the house to Austin General. Doctor Mac was literally as good as her word, for an raccoon orderly bustled out as soon as Kit pulled up to the emergency room door, pushing a wheelchair before him. Nick's Expedition screeched to a halt behind the van, and Sylvia, Krichek, and Barnett boiled out of it before Nick pulled out to go park his truck. "Here you are, Misses Vulpan," the orderly said as Jessie transferred from the van to the wheelchair. "Doctor MacNair is already on her way, and we have a room waiting. We'll just roll you past the admission desk and let your husband take care of the paperwork."

"I will park van, Kit," Krichek told him, holding his paw out for the keys. "Go!"

Kit nodded gratefully as he gave Krichek the keys, then rushed in with Jessie with Barnett and Sylvia behind him, Sylvia holding Jessie's suitcase. Kit was held up at the admissions desk as he more or less signed Jessie in. They'd already made the arrangements to have the baby here, so all the big information for which Jessie would need to be there was already done, so all Kit really had to do was sign a couple of papers and then move on. Jessie already had a room literally just down the hall from the delivery room, a short wheelchair trip from the admission desk and to the elevator. Austin General's maternity ward was on the fourth floor, the biggest in Austin and one of the best in Texas, and Kit was ushered into the room in time to see two nurses, a bobcat and a young sable, helping Jessie undress, a hospital gown waiting for her. Kit quickly opened the suitcase and made sure everything was in it, but almost immediately he realized that they hadn't packed the cameras into it yet. They hadn't expected to be doing this for another ten days!

Easily solved. As one paw put Jessie's things away in the dresser provided in the room, he called Lupe. "Lupe, get up," Kit called.

"Brah, what you calling so late for?" he asked.

"Jessie's water broke, she'll be going into labor any minute," he declared.

"Already? It's too soon!"

"Tell that to Laura," Kit chuckled. "Listen, I need you to get my camera and video camera and bring them to the hospital. I hadn't packed them yet, and I didn't have time to think about it."

"Sure, brah, sure! They still in the den?"

"Yeah, in the shelf right by the computer desk. The spare batteries are on the charger on the bottom shelf, and there's a little pack of cards right by the cases."

"No prob, brah. What room she in?"

"Four twelve," he answered. "If we're not in the room, then Jessie's delivering, so just wait in the waiting room."

"Sure, sure! I'll warn Dan and the others before I head out."

"Don't wait too long, I'd like to be able to take some pictures!"

"No sweat, I'll do it the mean way."

Doctor Mac strolled into the room, wearing green scrubs and with a stethoscope hung over her shoulders casually. "I see you made it," she chuckled. “You two, go wait in the waiting room,” she commanded Sylvia and Barnett. “Lay down, Jessie,” she ordered as the two guards filed out, a bit sullenly, grabbing the stethoscope in a paw and setting it in place in her ears.

“The doc’s here, so I gotta go. Get over here,” he told Lupe.

“I’m on the way, brah,” he answered, then hung up.

Jessie submitted to the doctor’s examination, which included an examination of her pubic regions. “Well, you’re dilating, so Laura’s serious about blowing my delivery date out of the water,” she chuckled. “You’ll be going into labor any time now, hon. We’ll let you stay here until Laura’s ready, then roll you down for the delivery, alright?”

“Okay, doc,” she answered.

“Remember your La Maz, Jessie. And you’d better spend some time helping her instead of being on the phone the whole time, Kit.”

“I do have to call a few furs, but I’ll make it quick,” he assured her.

“Alright. Don’t make me take your phone, though. I’ll do it,” she warned, which made Jessie laugh, then she winced.

“Ow! Ow ow ow ow!” she gasped. “That was--ow!”

“I think you’re starting labor, Jessie,” Doctor Mac smiled. “Just remember to breathe, and you should be alright. And I’ll either be right here with you, or just down the hall talking with the nurses. Now let me go talk to the floor manager about the delivery room. I’ll be right back.”

Kit sat on the bed and held Jessie’s paw as he called Rick. “Rick,” he said even before Rick could fully answer the phone.

“You wouldn’t be calling this late if it wasn’t serious,” Rick noted.
“Jessie?”

“Yup, she’s just started labor,” he answered. “Can you do me a favor and let everyone know? Doctor Mac threatened to take my phone if I did it.”

Rick laughed. “I’ll take care of it, son. Need me to call Vil?”

“And have her spank me for not calling her first? Please,” he snorted, which made Jessie laugh.

“I know who you’re talking about,” she grinned, then she sucked in her breath and winced.

“I’ll have Martha call around while we’re on our way up,” Rick assured him.

That was the start of a very, very, very long night for Jessie. She went into full-blown labor not long after Kit called Rick, and it was not fast. Kit was right there with her, holding her paw, brushing her hair back, doing anything he could to make her feel comfortable as she endured the painful contractions, urged her to practice her breathing, and it seemed to go on forever to both of them. And much to her credit, Doctor Mac was there with them. She gave Jessie a quick exam about every ten minutes or so, timed her contractions herself, which never seemed to come any shorter which was an indication that birth was imminent, but other than that she was a quiet, reassuring presence in the room, and that was very much unlike what most doctors did. Most doctors let a nurse take care of such things and only showed up for the important parts but Doctor Mac wasn’t like other doctors.

Jessie was in labor long enough for her family to reach Austin, and Kit was startled to see John and Hannah rush into the room to see them while Doctor Mac was out talking to another doctor. “We made it in time!” Hannah said with an explosive sigh. “Thank God!”

“I’d rather not thank him at this particular moment,” Jessie said weakly, her fur and blond hair matted from sweat and the cool cloths Kit had been putting over her forehead. “I’ve been in labor for four hours!”

“I was in labor for nine hours with you, Jessica, and even longer with Jennifer and Ben,” Hannah told her casually. “Long labors are something of a curse that runs through our family.”

“I knew there was something to be said for using birth control,” Jessie grunted, which made Kit laugh despite himself.

Doctor Mac strode into the room. “Get your scrubs on, Kit,” she declared.

“It’s time?” Jessie asked, then she winced and her grip on Kit’s paw became almost crushing as she suffered another contraction. “Oh, please say it’s time.”

“It will be soon,” she said calmly, coming over and sitting on the bed. “Your contractions are at three minutes now and shortening, so you’re just about there,” she said with warmth, patting Jessie on the shoulder. “So, let’s get Kit ready, and we’ll be taking you to the delivery room as soon as your contractions are about a minute apart.”

“Okay,” Jessie said, panting a little. “I didn’t expect it to take this long.”

“It’s worth it, though, isn’t it?”

Kit dressed in green scrubs not too much different from the ones Doctor Mac wore, and he again sat by Jessie and comforted her as best he could. Her parents, like everyone else that had tried to visit, had been banished to the waiting room, leaving him with her as he tried his best to nurse her through the pain of labor. When not wincing, gasping, or groaning in pain, she gave him weak smiles and kept firm hold of his paw, often running her fingers along the scars on his forearm, the jagged white lines that ran up from his dark mittens and into his reddish fur. He hated seeing her in pain, and in a strange way, she was trying to comfort him, ease him through seeing the femme he loved enduring a long labor.

God, did he love her.

But finally, blissfully, Doctor Mac called for a gurney. Jessie's contractions had narrowed to whatever threshold Doctor Mac felt was necessary, and in a surprisingly short time, Jessie was wheeled from the room to a delivery room, which was surprisingly small, with a intimidating-looking table with stirrups flanked by several pieces of medical equipment. A nurse helped Jessie onto the table, and Kit took his assigned spot at her right side as Doctor Mac put on a surgical mask, called in a nurse, and seemed to get ready to deliver the baby.

Doctor Mac was clearly someone who had a lot of experience with such things, for not two minutes after Jessie had been put on the table, she seemed to go into real labor. Her contractions narrowed down shockingly fast, and a nurse put a blanket over Jessie's distended belly. "Alright, let's make this smooth and easy, Jessie," Doctor Mac called. "When you feel an overwhelming urge to push, don't ignore it. Just say it's time and do it. You'll know when that is," she said when Jessie lifted her head to look at her.

“Handsome fox,” she panted from the table.

“Yes love?”

“If you take a single picture of me in here, I’m going to kill you.”

Kit laughed despite himself, then leaned down and kissed her on the forehead. “I won’t take a single picture until Laura’s in your arms, I promise.”

All those long hours in labor seemed to prime Jessie for delivery, for when it started, it happened. Jessie’s eyes snapped shut and she gasped. “It’s time!” she declared, then she gritted her teeth and her grip on Kit’s paw was like a vice.

“Push, Jessie, push!” the doctor ordered. Jessie seemed to obey that command, because Kit feared for the bones in his paw. He put his other paw on her shoulder and patted it as he looked down at Doctor Mac, who had her paws between Jessie’s legs. “Well now, here she comes,” she announced, “I see a little nose! Push, Jessie!” Jessie cried out for the first time, a real scream of pain and not just a grunt or groan, and she hunched her shoulders and pushed, her eyes shut tightly and a look of dreadful concentration on her face. She drew in her breath and then hunched again, giving a strained, growling cry, then she cried out again. “Almost there, Jessie, one more push!” Doctor Mac called. Jessie dropped back to the table, panted, then sucked in her breath and gave the doctor that push, again hunching up her shoulders and lifting her head off the table as she pushed. Kit actually saw Jessie’s stomach suddenly heave, then deflate noticeably, and Doctor Mac shifted from her concealed position at the base of the table. “And here she is, Laura Beth Vulpan!” Doctor Mac announced happily as the nurse rushed in. Kit saw his daughter for the first time, and she was a wet, stained, streaked little thing that looked like a hacked-up hairball...but he expected that. Babies weren't all that pretty until after they were cleaned up. His heart lurched when he realized he heard no crying, and was shocked to see the nurse hold Laura up, the umbilical cord still attached, and hold her upside down just enough to tilt her head down. A thin stream of liquid issued from Laura's nose, draining from her lungs, then she took a gurgled breath, then began to cry. The nurse wrapped Laura in a blanket as Jessie held her head up to look, and Doctor Mac used forceps and a pair of scissors to cut the umbilical cord close to Laura's stomach. "Nurse Winters will go clean her up, measure her, and bring her right back, but we're not done here, Jessie," she warned. "Let's deliver out the afterbirth, and then you can hold your daughter."

At least they never took her from the room. As Jessie expelled the placenta from herself, which seemed much easier on her than the birth had been, they watched as the nurse cleaned up Laura. Kit saw almost immediately that Laura had fox markings. She had dark mittens on her paws and feet, and her tail had a three-banded tip, the Vulpan tail, a dark end with a white tip. As she was cleaned up more and more, Kit saw that she had fox coloration as well as the mittens. Most infants were born with fur on the tops of their heads rather than hair, which then grew out to become hair, but Laura wasn't like that. She was born with hair, a head full of blond hair not too far from the color of her mother's hair. The nurse looked down, then gasped and smiled as she looked into Laura's face. "Well, that's certainly a lovely pair of eyes you have, little lady," she told Laura as she finished cleaning her up.

"What color are they?" Jessie asked.

"She has her father's eyes," she answered.

“Vulpan eyes breed true!” Kit laughed, patting Jessie on the shoulder.

“Now for the important part,” the nurse said with a chuckle, measuring Laura’s length. “Twenty-one inches,” she announced. “Six pounds, eleven ounces,” she added after putting Laura on a small scale on the counter. “Completely healthy, from the looks of her. And ready for you now, Misses Vulpan.”

All cleaned up and wrapped in a blanket, the nurse brought Laura over to them. Kit’s heart melted when he saw his daughter up close for the first time, and she was all fox. She had fox coloration, fox markings, and she had Vulpan eyes. The only real unusual thing about her from a fox perspective was her blond hair. But that didn’t matter. If she came out all cat, Kit would have loved her just as much. After all, she loved Laura’s mother, and Laura’s mother was all cat herself. Jessie gave a happy little squeal as she gingerly took her infant daughter from the nurse, and Laura’s crying seemed to ease. Her eyes opened, her left eye amber and her right eye green, and she looked up at her parents with a startled yet sober look in her eyes, as if she was mystified by the sight of them.

“Hello, my little Laura,” Jessie cooed in a voice so tender it made Kit’s heart melt anew for his wife. “Am I glad to finally see you!” Jessie touched Laura’s face gently, lovingly, and Laura freed one of her tiny arms from the blanket and reached up for Jessie’s paw. Kit clearly saw that she had inherited at least one thing from her mother...claws. She had retracted claws on the tips of her fingers, which extended as she touched her mother’s dark-furred paw. Jessie blinked when the flash went off, Laura blinked as well, and almost started crying again had Jessie not rocked her gently on her breast.

“Now that I have the picture,” Kit chuckled, leaning down. Jessie smiled lovingly at him and helped him take hold of Laura, and he held her in the crook of his arm, gazing down at her with gentle wonder. This was his daughter. She was so tiny, so tiny...and so beautiful. Kit fell in love for the second time in his life, looking down at his infant daughter, Vulpan eyes staring into Vulpan eyes for a fleeting moment before Laura yawned and closed her eyes, content to be held. He held her for a long moment of utter contentment and joy, and then tenderly, carefully, and gingerly settled her back into her mother’s arms. “Happy mother’s day, my pretty kitty,” he told her with a smile. “And happy birthday, Laura Vulpan.”

“At five twenty seven a.m. on Friday, September twentieth, two thousand eight,” Doctor Macnair told them with a smile. “That makes your little girl a Virgo, you know,” she added. “Now, as soon as I get the post-partum exam out of the way, we can get Jessie back to the room so everyone can get a look at Laura.”

The post-partum exam didn’t take very long. Doctor Mac had the nurse check Jessie’s blood pressure and pulse as she performed an exam of Jessie, making sure Laura’s birth didn’t do any damage to her birth canal. It only took about ten minutes to complete, the entire time. After the exam and Doctor Mac signing off on Jessie to return to her room, with the nurse and Kit helping, Jessie very gingerly moved from the table to a waiting wheelchair, never letting go of their infant daughter. Laura didn’t wake up during the move, and Kit was the one that pushed her out of the delivery room, with the nurse and Doctor Mac right with him. They only had to go about thirty feet to get to Jessie’s private room, which had its own crib. Austin General, and Doctor Mac, were of a mind that it wasn’t good to separate the babies from the mothers after birth, so each room had a crib for the baby. In double rooms, babies crying and keeping mothers awake might be a problem, but Austin General also didn't believe in keeping mothers in the hospital any longer than absolutely necessary. Jessie would be discharged 24 hours after the birth, during which time both mother and child would be given complete exams and check-ups to ensure they were healthy and there were no hidden complications. But once they were sure of it, mother would be back home 24 hours after delivering, with her new infant.

They helped her into her bed, and then Doctor Mac went out and allowed visitors, but she set very strict limits on time, because both Jessie and Laura needed to rest. Naturally, the first ones in were Vil, Kendall, Rick, Martha, John, and Hannah. They gathered around the bed and fussed over both Laura and Jessie. Vil laughed when she touched Laura's tiny paw. "I see you left your mark on her, Jessie, and more than just the hair," she remarked.

"She'd better have claws, or she's not my daughter," Jessie said with a weary but light smile.

"Does she have--"

"Yes, she has Vulpan eyes," Kit cut her off, which made her laugh ruefully. "Looks like I won the war," he added, smiling down at his wife and daughter. "Laura's all fox except for her claws."

"I'll beat you next time, love," Jessie smiled up at him.

"I told you the fox in you would make it certain."

"We'll see with the next one, won't we?" she challenged.

“Well, I’m just glad both you and the baby are alright,” John told them. “That nazi of a doctor of yours said we only get two minutes, so let me get a couple of pictures of the new parents and our granddaughter.”

“Too right, we need pictures,” Kendall nodded, taking out his camera.

Laura took the entire camera thing rather well. She didn’t wake up as the flashes went off, as all three couples took pictures of Jessie in bed, Laura in her arms, and Kit sitting on a stool just beside them, a paw over Jessie’s, which was over Laura. And when two minutes were up, Doctor Mac showed up and bullied them all out of the room. They were replaced by six more almost immediately, Sheila, Terry, Allison, Sam, Kevin, and Sandy, and they too were only given two minutes to visit, and the cameras came out quickly. Mike, Lilly, and Janet, who came in with the third group, made no pretenses, for their cameras were out and ready, and Mike and Janet both were already literally snapping pictures as they walked in. Kit was a bit surprised as the groups came and went every two minutes, for everyone they knew in Austin was there, and more than just them. Abigail and Charlie were among those who visited, and after kissing Jessie on the forehead, she patted her arm. “Winston should be here soon, and the boys will be here as soon as they can,” she promised. “Winston before the boys. He’s flying in from London, but the boys are flying in from Singapore. That’s a much longer flight.”

“That’s alright, I’m happy knowing they cared enough to drop everything to come running,” Jessie assured her.

“Why, you’re family, dear!” she said. “What family wouldn’t drop everything at the drop of a hat for such a happy occasion!”

It turned out that the Vulpans were that kind of family. Unlike the Brightons, the Vulpans saw the birth of Laura to be the first sign of the Apocalypse, and none of his family outside of Vil, Sheila, Muffy, and Terry came down, which was just fine with him. The presence of his family would have just been salt in his wounds, and he was just as happy that they hadn't come as they obviously were at not having to look a mixed breed Vulpan and know that the family "purity" had been compromised.

It took a while, but eventually the two minute rotations of visitors reached its end. The last ones to visit, Sandy, Lisa, the other Jessie, Danielle, and Pat, were herded out by Doctor Mac, and she closed the door meaningfully. "I want you to get some sleep now, Jessie," she commanded. "You had a very long night, and you need to recover. Just put Laura in her crib and get some sleep."

"But I don't want to let her go yet," she protested, gazing down at her sleeping daughter.

"She'll sleep better in the crib, Jessie, and take it from an obstetrician, sleep is good for her right now. She had something of an ordeal today too, after all, and she needs to rest. It's hard on more than just you, you know," she smiled. "She'll sleep a little bit, then she'll be hungry and you'll get your first opportunity to breastfeed her. So, let Kit put Laura down for a short nap, and get some sleep yourself. And no more pictures!" she declared.

Kit laughed. "I don't have to take any more, I'm sure I'll have a few thousand to choose from once the others get them all burned on DVDs."

With Doctor Mac's professional observation and advice, for the first time, Kit put his daughter in bed. He collected her up from Jessie carefully, making sure to support her neck and head since it was very vulnerable right now, then held her for a long moment, gazing down at her with both love and wonder. But a touch on his arm reminded him he had a task to perform, so he carefully placed her in the crib bed, then carefully smoothed her fur and hair back over her eyes, between her impossibly tiny little ears. She was so small, so defenseless, Kit felt a powerful need to protect her rise up inside him, an instinctive parental response to seeing his tiny daughter lay there, so small and in need of him.

Fortunately, the crib was literally against the side of Jessie's bed on the other side of the stool, so Laura was literally within reach of her. She seemed to want to reach out for her daughter about ten times in the first minute, as Kit sat on the stool and took her paw, then he leaned over her and kissed her tenderly as Doctor Mac quietly withdrew from the room. "Congratulations, my pretty kitty," he said in a gentle voice. "We're parents."

"Isn't it wonderful?" she asked dreamily. "I never thought this day would get here."

"I'm just glad it's over. I hope you never go through a labor like that again."

"It was so worth it," she said immediately, gazing over at the crib, where her daughter was sleeping, then she yawned. "I am a little sleepy."

"You were up all night," Kit smiled at her.

"So were you."

"That's alright, I'm a Vulpan," he said with a sly smile. "I'm ten times better than other males. A little lost sleep? Ha! I can--" he cut off and dropped his head down against her chest and made exaggerated snoring sounds, which made her laugh. “There, that’s one of the best sounds in the world,” he said as he raised his head, and he kissed her again. “Now get some sleep, pretty kitty. I’m going to go out there and face the rampaging horde, then take a little nap myself.”

“You know I can’t sleep without you near me,” she complained, reaching out and grabbing hold of his forearm.

“Then lay back and go to sleep, love. I’ll be right here until you do,” he told her, stroking her hair back from her face. She leaned back, and her expression softened and relaxed when he sang her a lullabye.

She was asleep before he was done.

Austin General’s approach to the maternity ward was definitely unusual as far as hospitals went, for they preferred mother empowerment. Babies were kept with the mother instead of a mass baby room much like what furs would see on TV. They didn’t hold a mother for any longer than absolutely necessary, sending them home usually 24 hours after childbirth, and only holding them for that long to ensure there were no complications to the mother or the baby, though they did require the mother and baby return for three exams over the two weeks after the birth. But during that time, they conducted what Doctor Mac called “life lessons,” where a nurse and Doctor Mac herself would assist the new mother with the baby for that first day to show her exactly what to do. The vast majority of mothers came into it with extensive advice or experience either with prior children or others, but it still was a good thing for the mother to see a nurse bathe a baby, or feed a baby a bottle, and Doctor Mac was there to give her patients a practical lesson in breastfeeding.

Jessie's first day with Laura was filled with both hospital activity and quiet observation. She got to see how the nurses and Doctor Mac handled Laura, and she learned the best techniques for picking her up, holding her, and putting her down. From the nurse, she learned the most effective method of sponge-bathing a newborn, and she also got her first opportunity to breastfeed Laura after they both woke up, under Doctor Mac's watchful eye. Despite Jessie's intent to breastfeed Laura, she learned the proper technique for bottle feeding from the nurse as well, and Jessie was the one that had the dubious honor to be the first fur to change Laura's diaper.

But it wasn't all about the mother. Kit too underwent these simple lessons, which were simply real-life demonstrations of things he'd already been taught using his own daughter as a test subject. Jessie may have been the one to do things first, but Kit was right there watching, oftentimes taking pictures, and he too learned first by watching, then by doing. Kit was the one that got to change Laura's second diaper, and he bottle-fed Laura while Jessie was being given a couple of tests down the hall.

It was such a magical feeling to sit there holding his daughter as she nursed from the bottle, held at an expert angle, but also under the nurse's watchful eye. He still couldn't quite get over the feeling, the idea, that this exceptionally tiny little female was his daughter, and he felt like he was the luckiest male on earth to have such a perfect wife in Jessie, and now to have a healthy, happy, serious little baby daughter.

And oh, was she serious. Outside of when she was born, Laura had yet to truly cry. She made a few fussy sounds now and again which were instantly quelled when she was fed, but outside of that, she was a quiet little girl. Her Vulpan eyes gave her a penetrating stare, and it also gave one the impression that she was a very intelligent and sober little femme, regarding everything and everyone around here with that serious gaze. At least when her eyes were open, anyway. Newborns slept far more than they did anything else, Doctor Mac had told them, and thus far Laura had proven the doctor right. In the ten hours that Laura had been born, she had been asleep for about nine of it. She'd woken up three times to eat, and after eating, she'd gone back to sleep after only a few minutes of activity, where she would look around, move her arms, legs, and tail, and then as if that little bit of activity tired her, she would settle down and go to sleep.

There was a constant flow of visitors in and out. John, Hannah, Vil, Kendall, and Martha had all but taken up residence in the hospital, coming in and visiting for a while before being herded out by Doctor Mac to give Jessie a little rest. Rick had gone on to work, but he dropped by with most of the gang from work around lunch to check up on them, and also so Mike, Lilly, and Janet could take even more pictures of Laura, this time by herself in her little crib. Winston Brighton arrived not long after Laura had been born and had taken his turn holding her, and the Brighton boys had arrived around noon, crowding around the bed where Jessie held Laura and showering her with praise even as they made funny faces at Laura.

When not being visited and taking care of Laura, Kit caught little naps here and there in a chair by the window. He'd sat vigil by Jessie's bed that morning until she was sound asleep, then had retreated to the chair to get a short nap. He'd been returning to that chair throughout the day, at least until Doctor Mac literally threw him out of the hospital around sunset, so he could get some rest. Not just Jessie's room, not just the fourth floor, the hospital. She sent him home and told him in no uncertain terms not to come back until tomorrow morning, when he could come pick Jessie and Laura up and take them home, and he had better get some sleep. He would have gone crazy, but Vil took him in paw and kept him busy, kept his mind occupied, dragging him to the Brightons' vacation house to visit with his in-laws, a private affair of just Kit, Vil, Terry, and the Brightons, which was the new core of what Vil considered close family.

Naturally, they spent most of the time going through all the pictures everyone had taken, which Vil had collected up and compiled.

The pictures didn't stay private, either. The very first thing Mike did after he left the hospital was run to the office and hastily post the best of the lot he'd taken showing Kit, Jessie, and Laura on the magazine's website, which formally announced the birth of Laura Beth Vulpan to the general public. And because of the nature of the internet, it wasn't long before that picture started showing up on other websites, mainly gossip sites, and quite without Mike's permission at that. A picture of Laura even managed to find its way onto the CNN website.

Vil sent copies of the pictures back to Stonebrook by courier at Clancy and Stanley's request once Mike had a DVD of every picture everyone took compiled, which he paw delivered to the Brighton house just before they sat down to dinner.

After a distractingly pleasant dinner with the Brightons, Kit returned home to his empty house and tried to sleep, but about all he managed was to doze off on the couch with his laptop showing a slideshow of the picture DVD. He just could not get over the fact that he was a father, and he constantly wanted to look at pictures of his wife and daughter since Doctor Mac threatened to do some very mean things to him if he showed up at the hospital a second before 8:00am.

He disobeyed her anyway.

He was at the hospital bright and early at 7:30am, and luckily for him, Doctor Mac hadn't arrived yet. The nurses let him into Jessie's room, and he gave her a crushing hug. "Feeling better?" he asked her.

"Some, yes, thank you handsome fox," she answered. "I'm still pretty sore and a little tired, but I'm ready to go home."

"Where's Laura?"

"The nurses have her, they're giving her an exam. If she passes it, we can take her home," she answered. "I've already been cleared to go home, we just need Doctor Mac to sign me out."

"Good. Well, how does it feel to be able to see your feet again?" he asked, putting a very gentle paw on her recently deflated belly. He felt a tiny bit of residual fat there, but he knew his wife, and knew that she'd be back to her sleek, trim self as soon as she felt up to exercising.

"Feet, pft, I'm just glad I can get up out of chairs again," she laughed. "And I love holding our daughter much more than having her under my heart."

"Any of those symptoms Doctor Mac warned about?"

She giggled. "A couple," she answered. "My nipples are sore, but Doctor Mac said that would ease once I got used to feeding, and I'm wearing these pads they gave me because the milk keeps leaking out," she said, touching her breast gingerly. "It beats having dark spots on my shirt."

"Well, at least I'd know where to keep my eyes," he teased lightly. "Your folks have all but taken over the house," he told her. "Hannah brought pots and pans,” he grunted.

Jessie laughed. “She’d better not hog my kitchen. I fully intend to go back to cooking now that you can’t use my pregnancy as a leash.”

“I’ll just have to get a real one,” he told her, kissing her lightly on the muzzle.

A nurse padded into the room, pushing a wheeled gurney that was more like a stroller than anything else. “And here we are, Misses Vulpan,” she called. “Laura passed her exam with flying colors, so all you need is your doctor to sign you out, and both of you are on your way home.”

Kit literally blocked Jessie from the rolling crib, reaching down and gingerly picking up his daughter. She opened her eyes and regarded him quite seriously, then she yawned impassively. “Hey, little angel,” Kit cooed to her, touching her gently with the tips of his fingers. “How was your first night free of your evil mother’s womb?”

Jessie laughed. “She had a very quiet and comfortable night,” Jessie told him. “She woke up around one because she was hungry, but outside of that, she’s been a very happy little baby.”

“In other words, a quiet baby,” Kit smiled.

“Enjoy it while you can,” the nurse said lightly. “They start quiet, but just get louder and louder as they age.”

“That’s what duct tape is for,” Kit said immediately and seriously enough to make both Jessie and the nurse gawk at him, then both erupted into laughter, which made Laura open her eyes and fuss just a little bit, voicing her displeasure at being woken up. Kit rocked her slightly in his arm until she calmed down, which only took a few seconds, then she yawned and again closed her eyes and seemed to fall asleep.

“Is everything ready at home, love?”

Kit nodded. “I couldn’t keep your mother out of our room, but I didn’t sleep there anyway. I fell asleep on the couch watching the picture DVD Mike made. He gathered every picture everyone took of Laura and put them on one DVD.”

“Oh, good!” she said happily.

Doctor Mac filed into the room, then stopped at the doorway and chuckled. “I warned you about showing up early, Kit,” she said with a teasing smile. “But it’s good you’re here. Both Jessie and Laura have passed their physicals with flying colors, and I’m going to let them go home.”

“That’s good to hear,” Kit nodded. “When’s their next exam?”

“Monday,” she answered, “here. Then they have another exam on Thursday, and another one a week from Thursday. Hospital policy,” she added absently. “After that, Jessie’s going to have weekly appointments with me for about a month so I can make sure she recovers completely, and then I’ll be referring her to a general practitioner. I’ve already scheduled Laura an appointment to see Doctor Lewis Wilstein, the pediatrician I recommended to you. He’s the best pediatrician in Austin.”

“As long as it keeps the two most important girls in my life healthy, I won’t say a word,” he answered.

“Did you put a baby seat in your car?”

He nodded. “Already installed,” he answered. “Do I need to go get the stroller?”

“No, the hospital provides them,” she told him. “And you have to use it. They won’t let you carry Laura to the car.”

“Why on earth not?”

“Because they were sued five years ago by a mother who dropped her baby,” the nurse answered. “So, now the policy is the baby has to leave in a stroller.”

“Stupid furs, suing over every little thing and ruining it for everyone else,” Jessie fumed with uncharacteristic heat.

Jessie packed up her things from the hospital room as Kit signed the papers that released Jessie and Laura, and in a surprisingly short amount of time they were ready to go, but they weren’t alone. Jessie had called Vil to tell her she was being released, and Vil and all the Brightons had rushed over to the hospital to attend the happy event. Nick and Sylvia were also there, quietly accompanying Jessie, doing their jobs as guards but not being overt about it. Rick and Martha were also there, and Rick took quite a few pictures of the Vulpans exiting the hospital and moving towards their van, which Sylvia had kindly retrieved and brought to the drop-off circle outside the main entrance. A hospital nurse supervised and gave a few words of advice as Jessie transferred Laura from the stroller to the baby seat, and once the nurse was satisfied she was safely and snugly secured, Sylvia gave over the van to Kit, though she did ride in the front seat while Jessie sat in the back seat beside Laura, not wanting to even be separated from her by a car seat. Vil and Kendall were also riding with them in the third row, behind

Jessie and the baby, and the Brighton limousine was waiting to follow them back to the house.

“Ready to go?” Kit called, looking at Jessie through the rearview mirror. She gave him a thumbs-up, so he pulled out and headed towards home, driving slowly and carefully.

Sheila, John and Hannah were waiting for them at the townhouse, opening the door and rushing out as Kit parked the van. Jessie hugged her parents in tandem as the Brightons and Nick pulled up in front of the house, then the two cats gawked and marveled at the newborn infant napping in her car seat. “I have everything all ready for her,” Hannah announced as the Brightons joined them.

“Then let’s take our daughter inside,” Jessie said with a beaming smile.

“Not without pictures!” Sheila protested, taking out a video camera and rushing towards the front door. “Okay, Laura comes home, take one. Annnnd, action!” Sheila barked, putting the camera up to her face.

“Take one?” Winston protested. “I don’t believe that this is so difficult we have to practice!”

“I dunno, old male, you can’t seem to do anything right the first time,” Harry teased.

“Eh?”

“Wot, look at Ken,” he said, pointing at Kendall. “You definitely had to try again to get it right.”

“Jealous,” Kendall said airily.

“Very,” Michael agreed.

“I blame that on your mother.”

“Don’t put this on me, Winston!” Abigail protested. “You named him, so he’s your mistake!”

“Ken’s not a mistake,” Charlie said with a sly smile. “He’s more of an accident than a mistake.”

“A catastrophe,” Harry corrected.

“Oi, you’re not even in our family, Chuckie!” Kendall pointed out.

“I’m the son Winston wishes he’d had instead of you,” he answered smoothly.

“Aren’t you so glad you married into my loving family, Vil?” Kendall asked blandly.

“Yo, you’re holding up the show, here!” Sheila called from the door. “Stop preening and get moving!”

With a little fanfare, and with Lupe, Dan, Sam, Kevin, and Mickey wandering over when they realized they were home, Jessie carried Laura into the house. Hannah had moved the crib that they’d put down in the dining room into the living room, but that was easy given it was on wheels and was going to be moved around to wherever it was needed downstairs. Jessie gently placed Laura into the crib, and they all crowded around the crib to look down into it. Laura endured all the attention like a champion, looking up at them all with her calm, sober eyes, then she yawned and closed them and promptly went to sleep.

“Isn’t she just a little angel?” Sam asked in a whisper.

“She’ll be a little devil in about two years,” Kendall chuckled.
“They’re cute and lovable at this stage so you don’t murder them later.”

“Just for that, there will be no nanny, Ken,” Vil warned. “I’ll have you care for our first born.”

“I’m up to it,” he said with a smile. “Just you wait, little Laura, you’re gonna be spoiled sooo rotten. Billionaire grandparents-in-law, millionaire aunt, Kit and Jessie will have to buy a warehouse just to hold all your presents.”

“Shh, don’t give it away,” Abigail protested.

“I was going to buy her Rhode Island, she can put her presents there,” Vil said lightly, which made Kit laugh.

“Hey, feel like spoiling a poor yet honest lawyer?” Kevin grinned.

“There is no such thing as an honest lawyer,” Sheila countered lightly.

“We’ll let Kit and Jessie give your first born all Laura’s paw-me-downs,” Abigail said with a roguish smile.

“Hey, I’ll take ‘em,” Kevin said immediately.

“Make room, sheesh,” Lupe protested, elbowing Dan and looking down into the crib. “What a cutie!”

“She is off limits, Lupe,” Mickey said lightly.

“I think she’s a bit too young to go on a date, Mick,” Lupe countered.

“She’s almost your size,” Dan said calmly.

“Ahh, cork it, ya overgrown cat,” Lupe snorted, which made Jessie giggle.

“Thank God you got home in time to deliver her here, Jessie,” Dan said. “She’s not a Yankee.”

“You’re about to offend half the room, Dan,” Sam chuckled.

“True Yankees are proud of the title,” Vil told them. “I am a Yankee. Anyone born and raised in New England is proud to be called a Yankee. We’ll have to make Laura an honorary Yankee. She should have been born in Stonebrook.”

“Not in this lifetime,” Kit snorted. “This is her home, Vil, this is where she belongs, and here is exactly where she needed to be born.”

“Well, that reminds me. Have you hired a nanny to take over when Hannah goes back home?”

“Why would we need a nanny?” Jessie asked. “We can take care of Laura just fine ourselves!”

“But what about when you back to school in January?”

“I’ll be taking her to work,” Kit answered. “There are plenty of paws there to help out if I need it, and my office is big enough for a crib.”

“Besides, a nanny wouldn’t have anything to do when I’m home. And I don’t think I’d like a stranger living in our house. That would be creepy,” Jessie added.

“That’ll work until she starts crying,” Vil said. “I think you need a nanny, guys. Or a dependable babysitter if you don’t want to go the nanny route.”

“Well, I’ll hire a dependable nanny, and you can drop Laura off at our vacation house when you need a babysitter,” Abigail announced. “That way the nanny doesn't live in your house, but you can still have that option."

"That's what I was going to suggest," Vil chuckled. "Bringing Laura out to my ranch, once it's built. I already have a nanny lined up that's going to move to the ranch when it's finished, and that way you'll always have an option if you need it."

"But it would be a stranger," Jessie protested.

"I think Luann would be offended if you called her a stranger," Vil chuckled.

"Luann?" Jessie asked in surprise.

Vil nodded. "She asked to be transferred down to the ranch, and I approved. Luann's taking classes and training with some professional nannies as we speak so she can do the job. I think Laura would be safe with Luann."

"Well, that's very kind of you to think of it, Vil."

"It's not just for you," Vil smiled. "When I have a baby, I'll need a dependable, trustworthy nanny here in Texas too, so Luann's going to be an asset to both of us. Luann misses you guys, and unlike Stanley, she doesn't have huge responsibilities that hold her in Stonebrook. When she heard about the ranch I'm building, she asked to transfer down to it so she's closer to you two."

"Aww, that's so sweet of her!" Jessie said with a smile.

"Besides, that way Laura's also close to the Arabian thoroughbred I'm going to buy for her," Vil grinned.

"Behave," Kit chided.

“Make me, brother,” she winked in reply.

“I think that’s a solid idea,” Winston agreed, reaching down and touching Laura. “Trust me, Jessie, when you’re a very busy woman, having a nanny available to help can be invaluable.”

“We had nannies to help with the boys,” Abigail agreed.

“So that’s what happened to them,” Charlie grinned. “I always wondered.”

“I think we can move this somewhere we’re not bothering the little angel,” Mickey said quietly when Laura stirred. “I think she’s trying to sleep.”

“I’m about to make breakfast,” Hannah announced. “You’re free to stay if you want.”

“She’s so free with our food,” Kit noted to Jessie, who giggled.

“Nah, I’m good, but thanks for the offer, Misses Williams,” Lupe said.

The others drifted away, one by one, until only Kit and Jessie were left. They stood by the crib, Jessie leaning into Kit and with his arm around her, as they gazed lovingly down at their infant daughter. “She’s so beautiful,” Jessie whispered.

“Almost as beautiful as her mother,” Kit answered, kissing her on the temple. “I’m just glad you’re okay and she’s okay.”

“So am I,” she answered, her fingers tracing the scars on his back absently. “Are you ready, handsome fox?” she asked cryptically.

He understood exactly what she meant. “I think I am, pretty kitty,” he answered. “We’ve waited nearly a year for this moment. With Hannah here to prevent me from doing something stupid, I think I'm ready for this job."

"It's not a job, it's a labor of love," she said with a light laugh, leaning against him. "Emphasis on the love."

"Well, I think we're ready, pretty kitty. After all, this is what I was born to do."

"Get me pregnant?"

"Be your husband and the father of our children, and love both you and them with all my heart, for ever and ever."

She sighed in contentment. "I think you're right, love," she told him lightly, leaning against him. "I'm sure you're right, actually."

"I'm so glad," he drawled, reaching down into the crib. Jessie leaned in with him, and they both laid their paws gently and lovingly over their infant daughter. Laura stirred slightly, but remained asleep. For her, all was right with the world.

And it was also for her parents.

Chapter 42

It was strange having so many furs in their house, but then again, they were all more than welcome to be there.

Having Hannah in the house was definitely interesting, at least for him. He'd wondered if she'd be as pushy as usual in the house, but it turned out that she was quite a bit less pushy being their guest rather than them being a guest in her house. She did take over in some ways, such as pushing Jessie out of her own kitchen, but all in all Hannah was a very polite houseguest.

But Hannah was the only permanent fixture among a swirl of visitors. In the three days since Jessie had delivered, the Brightons, Rick and Martha, Vil and Kendall, and quite a few others had cycled through the house day after day to see the baby, visit her parents, or just hang out. Some visits were quick, such as John and Winston's. Both of them were very busy and couldn't make protracted visits, and had to return to their jobs the day after the delivery. Harry and Michael as well had to leave, one to go back to work and the other to return to school, the day after their father left, leaving Abigail with only Kendall for immediate family around her. Clancy had managed to come down to see Laura, but he went back home the next day because he wasn't feeling all that well. Suzy too came down to see Laura overnight, but she was about to embark on a business trip before the delivery and didn't have any extra time to visit.

It was most certainly a magnitude shift in their lives. He knew that Laura would become the absolute core of their family, the hub around which all other activity revolved, and he was a bit surprised just how true that turned out to be. Nothing really had been done in the house since before they went to Boston that didn't have Jessie's impending birth in mind, and now that Laura and Jessie were separate, all that attention had shifted from Jessie to the baby. In the three days since the birth, Kit could barely have a single thought in his head that didn't directly or indirectly involve his little girl, and those few that escaped Laura's grip were about her mother, her beautiful, gentle, perfect mother.

For her part, Jessie had adapted very quickly to the idea of no longer being the most important femme in the house, and had done so with grace and enthusiasm. She shared Kit's devotional love to their daughter, and she had picked up quickly the core change in her daily routine to bring Laura into her life. It had only been three days, but already a pattern of sorts had surfaced. Laura was remarkably mellow for a newborn, and didn't fuss very much. She made few sounds, and those sounds were always quite serious, almost as if she were too dignified to babble or gurgle, but when she was hungry, the entire house knew it. She didn't cry so much as make a fussy sound, and that sound ceased the instant she was held to Jessie's perfect breast. She made that sound first around two in the morning, and Kit honored his promise to wake up and stay up with Jessie while she fed their baby. After Laura was satisfied, all three of them went back to sleep, at least until about seven. Kit usually woke up about then because work waited for no one, and he'd gone back to work the day after Laura was born, showing up in the afternoon on his day off to get some work he'd neglected done and resuming his schedule the day after that by taking Sunday off. And this was where Hannah had disrupted their daily lives, for every day since she arrived, he'd come downstairs to find her in the kitchen, cooking. She had learned very quickly when Kit woke up, and made sure to have breakfast all but waiting for him when he came downstairs. Kit didn't think she needed to cook for him, but it made her happy, and he wasn't going to push things. Around eight or so, Vil and Kendall would show up, and Abigail would arrive only about ten minutes later, and they stayed all day both days. Saturday, Winston and the Brighton boys were with them all day, but he had to return to England and Singapore. John was with them all day Saturday and most of Sunday, but he too had to return to work, since he had to teach a class at 8:30 Monday morning and he was out of vacation time. Vil and Kendall too had to return to Boston by Monday, so by Sunday night, the only one left in the house outside of them were Hannah and Abigail, though only Hannah was staying in their house.

Over the weekend, they were together, adapting to the idea of being a family. They kept Laura in a rolling crib downstairs while they were awake, keeping her close but also keeping her in the den so the bustle and noise of a filled house didn't wake her up. She'd wake up about every four hours or so and demand to be fed, but outside of that and being awake when they changed her diaper, she slept almost all the time. This was normal, Kit had come to find out. Newborns slept almost constantly just after being born, for their bodies were focusing on growing. She was active before and after feeding and before and after her diaper changes, almost like she was exercising, then she would go back to sleep. After the day was done, they moved Laura to her crib in their room, where they intended to keep her for about two weeks before moving her to her own room. They'd intended to keep her in the room longer, but both Hannah and Doctor Mac told them that the faster Laura adjusted to being alone at night, the less trouble it would cause both her and them. Hannah and Abigail spent nearly as much time teaching Kit and Jessie about how to care for an infant as they did anything else, and both of them proved to be quick learners. Between what they were taught in the hospital and what the matrons taught them, by Sunday night Kit felt completely comfortable picking up and holding his daughter, changing her diaper, and had bottle fed her twice

But Kit and Jessie weren't the only ones who wanted to learn. Vil seemed quite acutely attentive when the two older femmes taught the new parents the tricks of the trade, and she too learned how to pick up and care for an infant. Kit didn't miss that, not one bit, and neither did Jessie. Both of them giggled a bit over it that night in bed, for Vil was demonstrating her intentions like blaring trumpets. She may be the CEO of a multi-billion dollar conglomerate, but her primary goal from the day of her marriage onward was to get pregnant and have a baby. Luckily for Kendall, that was what he wanted as well, else going to bed with her might be something of a chore.

All during the weekend, they were either constantly visited or they hosted family members. Abigail would come over as soon as she woke up and stay all day, as did Vil and Kendall. Lupe and the complex gang also found just about any reason to step over and visit, spending a few minutes cooing at Laura and the rest of the time in the living room chatting it up with the Vulpans and the Brightons. Mike and Janet both also showed up, and they took enough pictures of Laura in her crib to wake her up with the flashes and put her in a fussy mood, which got both of them coolly banished to the living room. Thank the Lord above, Laura seemed to not like excessive media attention, a trait that would make her get along very well with her parents.

That morning, Kit woke up to go to work and again found Hannah in the kitchen, fixing him a plate of Texas Mash, a local breakfast dish that was basically an omelet's ingredients scrambled into eggs instead of made into an omelet. “Morning, dear,” she told him, setting it on the kitchen table for him as he padded in.

“I don’t think John will appreciate you calling me that, Hannah,” he teased lightly.

“Sit and eat your breakfast,” she barked commandingly, which made him laugh and exaggerate his dash to the table. Hannah sighed and shook her head, but chuckled despite herself. “Are you going to work?”

“For about two hours,” he answered. “Jessie has an appointment at the hospital at eleven, so I’ll be back around ten thirty to take them. I need to have a little chat and training session with Julie.”

“Trouble?”

“No, not trouble per se. It’s just that she was hired while I was up in Boston, and I wasn’t here to train her to our archiving system. Pat understands it, but he’s not a very good teacher,” he chuckled. “So me and her are going to go through it this morning.”

“I don’t think I met her.”

“She didn’t come when Laura was born, she has this idea in her head that she shouldn’t attend things like that until we get to know her. Silly, but she’s a very, well, proper young lady.”

“Sounds like a good girl.”

“Just a little insecure,” he countered. “She’s never really talked to Jessie, and didn’t know how Jessie would react to a total stranger coming to the hospital.”

“Ah, when you say it that way, you can at least understand her trepidation.”

“She’ll lose it quickly,” he chuckled. “It’s Rick’s fault more than anyone’s. He’s the one that sent Julie and RJ to San Antonio for that piece he’s doing, and they’ve barely been in the office since we got back. They barely got the chance to so much as say hello to us when they got back before Jessie went into labor. Jessie didn’t even realize we had new furs in the office until the day before Laura was born,” he chuckled. “I’ve been working with Julie over the phone and Skype since she was hired, but Jessie totally forgot Rick hired them.”

“Why did he send a researcher to work with a reporter?”

“Because Julie’s more a researcher than a writer, and he wants her to get exposure to the rest of the business. Though, we’re getting so big now, I guess everyone doesn’t really need to be a jack of all trades anymore.”

Jessie padded into the room, yawning, and Kit stood up and kissed her on the cheek. “Morning, ball and chain,” he teased.

She laughed. “Morning, pain in the butt.”

“Laura still asleep?”

“Yah, I wanted to sleep but Mom’s cooking smells too good,” she said with a smile at Hannah. “You going into work?”

He nodded. “I’ll be back in time to go to the appointment. I need to walk Julie through the archiving system.”

“Well, don’t forget,” she told him.

“Like you’ll let me forget,” he retorted. “Besides, I’m too afraid of Doctor Mac to not show up.”

She giggled. “So, now I know who to call when you need to be punished punished,” she noted lightly.

“That’s what she’s for,” he countered, pointing at Hannah.

“Don’t make me spank you, Kit, as I’m sure you’ve noticed, we Williams cats are not afraid of Vulpans,” she warned, which made him laugh.

“Duly noted. Lemme get dressed and head in.”

He couldn’t resist spending a good five minutes just watching Laura sleep after he got dressed, then he kissed the femmes goodbye—getting swatted by Jessie for daring to kiss her mother on the cheek—and headed into work. Rick was the only one in the office when he arrived, and he stuck his head into Rick’s open office door. “Hey boss,” he called as Rick stared at his computer monitor. “When did you get here?”

“About two minutes ago,” he answered. “Get any sleep last night?”

“Sleep isn’t the problem, Laura’s actually pretty quiet,” he chuckled. “The problem is Jessie waking up every hour to check on her when she doesn’t need to be checked on.”

“Typical new mother reaction,” Rick chuckled. “Just let her settle down some. Doesn’t Jessie have a doctor’s appointment today?”

“Yeah, I’m just in to go over some things with Julie before she goes to San An.”

“Today should be the last day they have to go. RJ’s almost done with his interviews. But, they always leave really early, so I’ll just send Pat with him today.”

Julie was almost always a half hour early, according to Rick, and she proved it by coming in about ten minutes after Kit arrived. Julie was a fellow Yankee but in name only, for she was born in Vermont and her parents moved to Austin when she was five. She was also a mixed breed; her mother was a New England red fox and her father was an Acadian wolf, which gave her a husky yet surprisingly attractive appearance. She had pattern fox markings, but she had a broad, stocky muzzle and a shaggy-furred tail that had a black tip. She was sturdy, maybe a little husky, but she was not in any way fat. Some jokingly called fat furs “big boned,” but in Julie’s case that was a pretty accurate description. She was an inch taller than Jessie and had a proportional figure for any thin, slender femme, she was just taller and a bit huskier, almost like a Nordic wolf rather than an Acadian wolf. She was also deceptively strong, and had played softball while in high school and college, so she was pretty athletic. Kit had rather liked her when he interviewed her over the phone, because she reminded him in some ways about Jessie. She had the same kind of old-fashioned propriety. The fact that she always dressed in ankle-length skirts reinforced that concept of her to many. The truth, however, was actually quite different. She was very proper to strangers and dressed modestly, but once someone got to know her, she was witty, sharp, and a trifle bit naughty, but never dirty or improper. Abigail would find Julie to be a wonderful femme.

“Morning, morning,” she called to them as she looked into the office. “Kit! Welcome back, boss!”

“I should say welcome back to you,” he chuckled, standing up.

“Julie, you’re staying here today, and I’m sending Pat with RJ,” Rick said.

“No problem, boss,” she nodded. “I’m almost tempted to ask what I did wrong,” she smiled.

Kit chuckled. “It’s what Pat did wrong, not you,” he answered. “He didn’t train you right about the archiving system. We’re gonna fix that this morning.”

“Oh, okay. Lemme get my stuff organized so Pat doesn’t have any trouble.”

In that respect, the three of them almost shared the same brain...which was another reason why Kit picked her. Kit could pick up almost anything Pat was working on and know exactly what he was doing, where he was, and usually how much work he had left, as could Pat with him. Julie had proved during her interviews that she could do the same. Using their notes, any of them could pick up where another left off if they swapped jobs going only by their notes and work.

After about twenty minutes, they got started. It was a bit different working with Julie in the office rather than over the phone or Skype, but it was much better. Julie took the chair Kit had behind his desk most often occupied by Pat, and they went through the archiving system thoroughly. The office filled up as the two of them worked, and Kit had to wave off multiple attempts by the gang to talk to him on his first day back, since he wanted to get this done before it was time to go to the doctor’s office. Julie was very smart, and she quickly picked up where she’d been making her mistakes, things Pat hadn’t taught her very well because Pat wasn’t a very good teacher.

They started at around 8:30, and they were done by 10:00. Julie had corrected her mistakes quickly, and they had a good fifteen minutes to just prattle. Julie was a modest young lady to strangers, but she had a barbed sense of humor, and their talk quickly degenerated into gossip as she told him all about some covert flirting that had been going on between Mike and Janet. "I think they're on the verge of dating," Julie noted in a conspiratorial whisper as Janet passed in front of Kit's door, pausing to wave to them.

"I don't see anything wrong with that," Kit chuckled. "But I have a minority view around here."

She chuckled. "You're one of the old males now, boss," she winked. "You need to gray your chin and wander around lamenting about the old days, then snapping at us that we'd have never made it back in your day."

"Watch it, little missy, you're only a year younger than me, and you dress like an old lady already."

She laughed. "Leave my skirts out of this!"

"Oh no, there are no out of bounds in war," he retorted. "That reminds me. You busy tonight?"

"Not particularly."

"Good. Six o'clock, my townhouse. Bring wine."

"Boss! Are you asking me out? And you just had a baby girl!" she gasped in mock astonishment.

"You need to get to know Jessie so you don't have to think you're not the same as the rest of them," he answered, motioning towards the door.

"So, you want me to become a drunken reprobate?"

Kit laughed. “Yes, time to seduce you to the Dark Side.”

“Ohhhh, you’re gonna seduce me. I’m all aflutter.”

“Go finish Pat’s project,” he told her curtly, but he was grinning.

“Yes, boss,” she answered flippantly, then bounced up from the chair and all but skipped out of his office.

Yeah, Julie was gonna fit in perfectly around here.

But he wasn’t done yet. He called RJ’s Blackberry as he got ready to leave. “This is RJ,” his bass voice intoned.

“RJ, it’s Kit. When are you getting back from San An?”

“We’re almost there now. I have one interview to do, and we’re coming back,” he answered. “So maybe around two or three.”

“Good. You busy tonight?”

“Not really.”

“Why don’t you come to dinner at my house? You need to get to know Jessie, and she’d love to talk with you.”

“And you can show off your daughter?”

“Well, that too,” he said honestly. “Six o’clock good?”

RJ chuckled. “Sounds good. I’ll be there.”

Kit hurried home after hanging up, where Hannah and Jessie were already getting Laura ready for her first trip out of the house since coming home. To his surprise, Sylvia was there as well, holding the baby bag Jessie had decided to carry when taking Laura out. “Your furniture arrive yet, Sylvia?”

“Ja, Herr Kit,” she answered.

“Need help getting it set up?”

“Nein, the boys helped me.”

“The boys?” he asked.

Sylvia smiled slightly. “The wolf, Krichek, and Barnett. I made sure to make them rearrange the living room five times before settling.”

Kit laughed. “Keep ‘em on their toes, Sylvia.”

“Always,” she murmured.

“What are you doing over here? Just visiting?”

She shook her head. “Fraulein Jessie never leaves the house without an escort,” she answered. “Nick’s rules,” she added quickly. “He felt it was safe to allow you to leave the house alone because you aren’t overly distracted, but since Fraulein Jessie has the baby, he felt that she needed extra eyes with her at all times.”

“You know I’ll never complain a bit when it comes to keeping my Jessie safe,” he assured her.

“Good,” she nodded.

“You made it on time, handsome fox,” Jessie noted as she came into the room holding Laura in a clever little handled carrier, their daughter safely tucked in with a blanket over her, already asleep.

“And have Hannah skin me if I’m late, then face the wrath of Doctor Mac when we get there? Please,” he snorted, which made Jessie giggle. “Oh, by the way, love, I invited RJ and Julie over for dinner tonight so you can get to know them.”

She laughed. “Then we’re gonna be crowded, because I invited over Amanda, Luke, and David, and Abby said she’d be over after our appointment!”

“We have a big table,” he shrugged. “I’ll do the coo—“

“Aaaat!” she barked, pointing at him. “You can’t keep me out of my kitchen anymore! I’ll cook!”

“Alright, alright, I know better than to get between you and your favorite toy.”

“That’s right,” she said, blowing him a kiss, and making Sylvia snort to suppress a chuckle.

Hannah accompanied them as they piled into Jessie’s van, her mother watching carefully and only giving advice once as Jessie and Kit placed Laura in her car seat. Kit drove them to Doctor Mac’s office, for one of their last month of appointments with her before Jessie was referred to a general practitioner who was well versed in post-partum femmes. Laura had already been referred to a pediatrician, a doctor named Assan Sahib, and Jessie was supposed to schedule an appointment for Laura this morning. Hannah and Sylvia were stuck in the waiting room as Doctor Mac examined both Jessie and Laura, checking Jessie for any complications after her delivery and checking Laura to make sure she was alright and developing normally. But, to Kit’s delight, both mother and daughter were rosily healthy, leaving Doctor Mac to nod approvingly when she scribbled on a chart. How she wrote with those claws mystified Kit, but then again, he was equally amazed she could do her job as an obstetrician without clawing up her patients. “Next appointment is Thursday, same time,” she told them. “Did you call and schedule your first appointment with the pediatrician I recommended?”

“This morning,” Jessie answered with a nod. “Our first appointment is tomorrow.”

“Good. You’ll like Doctor Sahib.”

“I hope I can understand him.”

Doctor Mac chuckled. “He’s from Brooklyn, hon, son of immigrants. He’s also the best pediatrician in Austin. I think you’ll like him.”

“As long as he keeps Laura healthy, it’s all good,” Kit said simply.

As Jessie carried Laura out of the exam room, Hannah and Sylvia stood up. “How did it go, Jessica?”

“Just fine, Mom, we’re both healthy.”

“Disgustingly healthy,” Doctor Mac added, which made Jessie giggle. “Confirm the appointment with the receptionist, and I’ll see you on Thursday.”

“Sure thing, Doctor Mac,” Jessie answered. “Have a good day.”

“Two new patients today. Two new husbands to train,” she grunted, which made Kit laugh.

“Get out the whip.”

“I may need it.”

“Whip?” Sylvia asked.

“Doctor Mac has certain standards she expects out of the husbands,” Kit explained as Jessie talked to the receptionist, a rather perky poodle. “Things like showing up at the appointments with the wives, being engaged and involved with the wife’s pregnancy, that kind of thing.”

“Ah. I can see why she may need a whip.”

Kit had his family back home by one, and he returned to work to finish out the day. He still felt a little scattered, and had to really focus to get things done, since he constantly started musing and daydreaming about his new daughter, about his new family, and all the plans he had for them. He also had to chuckle a little ruefully when he checked his bank account, now full to overflowing with Vulpan money.

Odd how suddenly having a daughter to care for could change a male’s morals. A year ago, Kit would have simply shipped that money right back to Vil, and done so with a few very ugly words to her about her meddling. But now, with Laura laying in a crib back home, he found that his towering morals about making it on his own, without any help from his sister or family, were wavering slightly. Kit still wanted to make it on his own, to prove to himself and his family that he could be successful, but he now had more than just himself and Jessie to consider. He had a daughter, he had a baby, and that single fact made that money sitting in the money market account look much less threatening and ominous. He would not use that money in the business, but he would keep it in there just in case.

He tended that bit of business after getting settled back in. He called the bank and discussed the available options for trusts, for he fully intended to take most of the money Vil had tricked him into taking and put it in a trust for their children. That money was not his or Jessie's, it belonged to their children, and he intended to keep it separate from their money. Vil may have managed to push money at him beyond what he wanted, but she was going to learn that that money was only his for as long as it took him to deposit it into a trust.

He settled on one of the bank's blind trusts, that would stay open-ended so that when they had more children, their names could be added to it. It also had attractive options, reasonable fees, and no penalty for early withdrawal so long as the trust had over $100,000 of total balance and they took out no less than 10% of the balance, which also wouldn't drop the balance under $100,000. Given that about $400,000 would be going into that trust per year until Kit freed himself of Vil's claws and resigned from the board, he felt that it was the trust with the best options.

He called Jessie, and she reluctantly left Laura with Hannah as she met him at the bank. The manager went over all the details for Jessie's benefit, and in about an hour, they had the trust opened with an initial deposit of $125,000. "And, there we are," the thin white mouse manager noted as Jessie signed the forms. "When you receive your quarterly deposit from the Vulpan company, all but thirty thousand dollars of it will automatically be deposited into the trust. In addition, all but two hundred dollars of your weekly deposits will be deposited in the trust, Misses Vulpan."

"That's exactly what we want," Jessie said.

"Yep, that way I don't have to come down here every three months and mess with this," Kit agreed.

Kit walked Jessie out of the bank, into a hot but dry later summer day. "No separation anxiety?" he asked with a chuckle.

“A little,” she admitted, then she giggled when he patted her on the shoulder compassionately. “This is the first time I’ve left her alone.”

“She’s not alone, Hannah’s with her.”

“You know what I mean,” she replied.

“You’ll live,” he grinned.

“Mom’s throwing me out of the house tomorrow,” she protested.

“What do you mean?”

“I mean she called Sheila and told her to come get me after class tomorrow and take me out, without telling me!” she told him. “She told me to go play golf!”

Kit laughed. “Now that’s the Hannah I know and love. Any reason why she did it?”

Jessie’s cheek fur ruffled slightly “She said I have to remember that there is life outside of Laura,” she answered. “She said I should still do my hobbies, and that she knows me and I wouldn’t take a single foot outside unless she makes me.”

“That seems only healthy to me, love,” he told her calmly. “You do need a little time to yourself, and as long as you feel recovered enough to go play some golf, it’ll be good exercise for you.”

“I think so. I’m still just a tiny bit sore,” she told him.

“You can’t spend every waking moment with Laura, if only because it prevents me from subverting her and making her a daddy’s girl.”

“Cheater!” Jessie accused with a giggle.

“I never pretended to be fair,” he grinned. “So, tomorrow you and Sheila and Ally can hijack Sam and go play a round, and me and Laura will be there waiting when you come home.” He glanced at her. “And she was right that she had to kick you in the butt to get you out of the house.”

“I can’t help it,” she laughed as they approached Jessie’s van. “I love her so much, I don’t want to leave her for a second.”

“Hey, where’s the sympathy for me?” he challenged. “I have to go earn us a living, you treacherous femme! You just sit home and get all the time in the world with our daughter and spend my money!”

“Just the way it should be,” she said primly. “That’s the only reason I married you, after all.”

“You cheap little gold-digger,” he accused, then she laughed when he tickled her. “I’ll deal with you when I get home!”

“So brave when he’s in public,” she taunted as she unlocked her van. “We’ll see how brave you are when I have a pillow handy!”

“You’ll see,” he wagged a finger at her. “Need me to bring anything home?”

“Nah, I’ll pick it up myself on the way home. We’re having lasagna.”

“Sounds good. Remember, you’re feeding nine.”

“More like twelve, since someone’s bound to crash dinner,” she amended, to which he could only chuckle and nod in agreement. “I’ll enjoy it. Finally, allowed back in my own kitchen!” she exclaimed, kissing him on the muzzle. “See you at home, handsome fox.”

“I should be home on time, pretty kitty. Drive safely,” he told her as he helped her into the van, then closed the door for her. She blew him a kiss after starting the van, put on her seat belt, and he watched her pull out and onto the street. And just behind her, Barnett pulled out of a parking spot driving a Toyota sedan, probably an Altima or Camry, waved to Kit, then followed her out.

Nick was serious about not letting Jessie go anywhere without an escort. And it was darn considerate of him not to have Sylvia follow her around all the time, to make her feel like she was under constant scrutiny. Jessie may not even be aware one of the guards was following her, and Kit rather liked that idea.

Kit ended up simply bringing RJ and Julie with him when he left work, having them follow him back to the townhouse. He could see that Abigail was already there when he parked behind his Pathfinder, for she was sitting on the front porch with Hannah, sipping a glass of wine as the two matrons talked. “Hannah, Abby, I’d like to introduce RJ and Julie, from work. Guys, these are the evil mother-in-laws, Hannah and Abby.”

“I’m not evil, I’m just a nagger,” Abigail said cheekily as she stood up. “Nice to meet you, duckies! Kit’s friends are my friends.”

“That’s a lovely dress, Julie,” Hannah said as she took her paw. “Quite proper.”

“I’m just a proper girl, Misses Williams,” she said with a bright smile, showing off her long fang-like canines.

“It’s the proper ones that cause the most trouble,” RJ noted dryly to Kit.

“Tell me about it, I’m married to one,” Kit agreed with a nod, which earned him a tart look from Hannah.

Julie was in her pattern “wait and see” mode when they went in, being friendly but a little quiet, feeling things out as Jessie talked to her and RJ, then showed off Laura to them. RJ, on the other paw, was asking about a thousand questions of Abigail, trying to learn what it was like for her to be the wife of one of the most powerful foxes in Britain, the venerable and formidable Winston Brighton. RJ even referred to him as such, which made Abigail burst into laughter. “If you called him venerable, he’d box your muzzle for being cheeky,” she told him. “He’s only fifty-four, RJ. A fox doesn’t have to be old to run a company, you know.”

“If you called Vil venerable, she’d have one of her panthers brain you,” Kit added, which made Julie laugh, then quickly cover her mouth with her paw and look a bit contrite.

“Besides, Winston gets enough of that from his sons,” Kit said lightly.

“Part of the eternal Brighton War,” Abigail laughed. “It starts when they start pecking at each other over their football teams, then it descends into pranks and names. Never live in a house where all the males support different football clubs, Julie dear. It’s a recipe for disaster.”

“That’s your fault for not pushing your team at them when they were young and impressionable,” Kit noted.

“Yes, John made sure to infect our daughters with their love for the Bengals at a young age,” Hannah agreed.

“And you don’t cheer when they score a touchdown,” Kit teased.

“It’s cheer or sleep on the couch,” she retorted, which made him laugh.

David, Luke, and Amanda arrived about a half an hour later, and Jessie waited not five seconds to proudly show Laura off to them. Amanda held the infant while the two instructors took pictures and cooed at her, then she carefully gave her back to her mother. “Well, now that my maternal instincts are mollified,” she laughed. “I haven’t held a baby like that since my son got too big to fit in the crook of my arm.”

“How goes training the clueless?” Kit asked as Jessie scurried back to the kitchen after placing Laura in her crib.

Luke laughed. “It’s not that bad. We’re not training quite as many as usual thanks to the recession, but there’s enough traffic to keep me off the unemployment line.”

“Sad to say,” Amanda sighed. “Word is they’re going to consolidate the factories. Close the Columbia factory and move it to Kansas. They say it’s costing too much to run factories halfway across the country from each other. They want to move the four hundred production into the prop factory.”

“They’re not discontinuing the four hundred, are they?” Kit asked in concern.

She shook her head. “No, they sell too well for them to drop it. But, rumor is that they might suspend the production of the Columbus until the market improves. That might be a good idea. I’d hate to see them shelve the program, but if there’s no market for them when we start building, it’s best not to spend the money on the program now. Just wait until the economy rebounds and restart the program.”

“Yeah, sounds smart,” Kit agreed. “Just hold off until you can sell them.”

“At least the Vulpans are keeping us in the black,” Amanda laughed. “We sell two four hundreds to you and your cousin, and Vilenne bought two CJ ones and a CJ three for the shipyard. We should be making delivery of the first one in about two weeks.”

“I figured that was coming,” Kit chuckled. “I wonder why she bought three, since she already has two jets.”

“From what I heard, she’s basing two of the jets in Boston, and one in New Orleans,” she answered. “Not that that’s really my department, since I’m the training manager, but word gets around. It’s easy when we’re all within a hundred miles of each other and most of us have pilot’s licenses,” she chuckled.

“She’s giving Terry a jet,” Kit reasoned. “I guess he needs one, since he’s on the board. He’d need a way to get back to Boston when he’s needed and not have to wait for a jet to come down from Boston, and board execs don’t fly commercial,” Kit snorted. “She probably gave him the CJ three.”

“I wouldn’t want to make that trip in a CJ one over and over,” David agreed. “That’s a long trip in a one.”

“Enough with the shop talk,” Abigail said. “Us normal furs have no idea what you’re talking about!”

“Oh, we can fix that for you, Misses Brighton,” Amanda said with a wolfish smile. “You say the word, and I’ll have David here personally train you up for your own pilot’s license.”

“So you can sell me a jet, eh?”

“Well, wouldn’t you want to buy what you learned in?” she asked with an innocent smile.

“Clever girl, I wasn’t born yesterday! I was born last week, but could talked into being born yesterday when it comes to pawbags,” she said in a surprisingly close imitation of Kendall’s airy demeanor.

“Quit trying to sell everyone in this house a jet, Amanda!” Jessie called from the kitchen. “And someone come set the table, dinner’s almost ready!”

RJ shifted his grilling of Abigail to grilling just about everyone around the table, his reporter’s instincts going into overdrive as he tried to sniff out anything he could turn into a story, but that stopped after about his third bite of lasagna, when he realized that it was good. They enjoyed Jessie’s first uninterrupted meal cooked in her own kitchen, and she went out of her way to make it as sumptuous as possible. “Oh dear, Jessica, you outdid yourself,” Abigail said with a contented sigh as she finished dessert, which was a mousse recipe taught to her by the Stonebrook chefs.

“Thanks, Abby,” she said, then she laughed when Laura started fussing from the den, placed in there so the noise wouldn’t disturb her. “At least she let me eat a hot meal,” she said as she stood up. “I’ll be back in a while. It’s time to bring her back out anyway.”

“She’s just unhappy she missed this meal,” Julie told her.

“Too bad there’s so much left over,” Amanda noted.

“Yes, you can take some home with you,” Jessie said as she pushed in her chair. “And there’s a big box of pastries for you to at least pretend to take back to Kansas with you. I doubt any will make it out of Texas.”

“Dang, she knows us too well,” David laughed.

“Hey, it’s our treat for actually coming down here,” Luke added. “We put in the miles, that means we get the goodies.”

“How are those two doing, by the way?” Kit asked curiously.

“Marvelously,” Luke answered. “Sheila plays a lot, but she learns quick and she’s honestly interested. I think Dave has too much trouble keeping his eyes on the MFD to really teach Allison very much,” he said with a sly look at his partner. “We flipped a coin for who gets to train Allison, and he cheated.”

“Not that it matters, she’s taking her qualification ride tomorrow,” he answered. “I think the fact that my student is going to be qualified days before your student demonstrates just who is doing the better job.”

“Allison has a very good reason to be certified as fast as possible, since that’s her ticket to New Orleans,” Kit mused. “I’ll bet money that if you certify her by noon, she’ll come beg to borrow our plane, then be in New Orleans by six.”

“She has relatives there?”

“Terry is there,” he answered. “My cousin. They’re dating. The entire reason she learned to fly was so she could fly to New Orleans and see him, since he’s very busy and doesn’t always have time to come here.”

“That sounds like there might be another wedding in the Vulpan family soon,” Julie noted.

“I’d be shocked if there wasn’t,” Abigail said. “You can tell by looking at them that they’re mad for each other.”

“I can hear the screams from Boston already,” Kit said with a dark chuckle.

“Why is that?” Julie asked.

“Allison isn’t the right type for a Vulpan, Julie,” Kit said scornfully. “She’s not rich, she’s not from an established family, and they disapprove of her. The only thing they see as a saving grace is that she’s a fox. If another Vulpan married outside the breed, I think they’d have apoplexy.”

“Just goes to show that background doesn’t make the fur,” Abigail said sagely. “I’ve never met a smarter girl than Ally, except maybe Vil, but that’s a serious toss-up. She’ll do well with Terry. That boy is just too smart for his own good, he needs a femme that can shake his tree when he gets too smug.”

“Enough talking about my dysfunctional family,” Kit snorted. “How have things been in Kansas?”

“Fine, fine,” Amanda said. “We still have a waiting list for training, so that means we’re still selling planes, so that means at least we keep our jobs,” she laughed. “I need to get you and Jessie on the schedule, though. When in November are you coming up?”

“Oh, I dunno, we haven’t really talked about it yet,” he answered.

“Have you been studying your manuals?” David asked.

“When we can,” he answered. “Jessie’s been studying more than me,” he admitted with a rueful chuckle. “Then again, she had all kinds of time. After we got back from Boston, I had work, and she just sat around the house doing nothing.”

“Ducky, she’s gonna whack you,” Abigail laughed.

“Oh, I know,” he grinned. “It’s about time she needs to punish me anyway,” added dryly.

Jessie brought Laura out from the den after feeding her and let everyone gawk and coo and pay attention to her, and Kit got the rare opportunity to hold his daughter for more than a few minutes as Jessie got settled on the couch. “Alright Jessie, you need to pick a date for your commercial,” Amanda announced after they sat down.

“Oh, I don’t really know,” she answered. “Laura will be close to two months by then, so I think she’ll be old enough to handle the transition.”

“Are you ready?”

“You mean have I been studying? Yeah,” she answered, giving Kit a cool look. “I had to do something while sitting around doing nothing, you know.”

“Busted,” David laughed.

“I’m holding Laura, she won’t dare hit me.”

“You won’t be holding her long,” Abigail noted.

“I’ll just hold her hostage until Jessie forgets all about it. She’s flighty, all I have to do is dangle a shiny trinket to save myself. It’s a cat thing, I think.”

“Oh really?” Jessie asked with an edge in her voice.

“Yup,” he answered with a sly smile. “You’ll even forget about this conversation.”

“I think you forget there’s more than one cat in this room, young male,” Hannah noted sharply.

“I think we need to give him a bigger shovel,” Julie giggled.

“Nah, popcorn,” RJ answered, which made Julie laugh.

“Actually, I think this is part of his clever plan to gently push us all out of here so he can have his daughter all to himself,” Amanda said with a light smile. “And he has a point. It’s getting a little late, and I have an appointment in the morning to finalize the sale of a CJ one to AAIA.”

“They’re going through with it?” Kit asked.

She nodded. “Yup. They might even call you to see if you wouldn’t mind doing a little instruction from time to time,” she told him. “You’re one of only three certified CJ one flight instructors in the Austin area. At least right now,” she chuckled. “AAIA’s sending three of their CFAs to Kansas for training.”

“Lucky dogs, I bet they fought over which three get to go,” Kit noted.

“Not entirely, since AAIA is making them pay for the training,” Amanda said.

“Wow, and they’re standing for that?”

“I guess they are, since half of what I’m doing down there tomorrow is putting their CFAs on the schedule. And only two of them have to pay. The third is going as the free pilot trainee.”

“How much will it cost them?” RJ asked curiously.

“The CJ one rating program is two and a half weeks, and costs seven thousand dollars,” Amanda answered.

“Wow, that’s a lot.”

“That’s about average for a small jet rating. If they were training to the ten, it would be twelve thousand.”

“Well, the ten’s not for the meek,” Kit noted, staring down at his daughter, who was falling asleep. “It’s for serious pilots only. And I think it’s time to put a certain someone down for a nap.”

Laura’s needs also broke up the party. Jessie boxed up the leftovers for the Cessna gang, and they all said their goodbyes and went back to their hotel. RJ and Julie hung around about half an hour longer, talking with Jessie, then they too said goodnight and went home. Kit cleaned up after they were gone, as Jessie and her mother were talking in the living room, and Jessie caught up to him in the kitchen as he was washing the pans too big to fit in the dishwasher. She looped her arms around him and hugged him around the waist, putting her chin over his shoulder. That wasn’t that hard for her to do, since she was only about three inches shorter than him and could get her head to his level by standing on her toes. “So, I wonder what I should do since I do so little around here,” she said in a barbed voice, digging her claws slightly into his lower stomach.

Kit laughed. “I’ve been far too good lately, and needed to find some reason to be punished. Laura just makes me too respectable,” he surmised as he rinsed the pan.

“Well, I think I can find a suitable punishment for a naughty fox later tonight,” she breathed near his ear in a manner that made his tail threaten to stand straight out. It had nowhere to go, though, so it jammed up against her hip and made her laugh.

“Feeling well enough?”

“I’m not sore anymore,” she said huskily, “and maybe you wouldn’t be naughty if I saw to a few of your male needs.”

“And a few of your female ones,” he teased lightly.

“It’s your duty as my husband to see to those needs, and you, sir, have been slacking on the job!” she declared, caressing his stomach, almost kneading her claws against his fur. “You should have sensed that I’ve recovered and been there, but noooo, you were too busy being a bad boy to be sensitive to me!”

“Digging your own grave,” he teased in a singing voice.

“We’ll see who’s digging who’s grave tonight,” she whispered.

Jessie gave him motivation to turn in far too early for Hannah not to be a little suspicious, and it was certainly a little...awkward. Neither of them had really considered the thought that Laura was in the room with them when they put her down for the night and climbed into bed, and Hannah and Abigail’s insistence Laura be in a room of her own suddenly made a lot more sense. But, urges overrode propriety.

Jessie woke him up an hour before he was supposed to be up. She was all but laying on his back, a finger unerringly tracing the scars on his back and her head and muzzle nuzzled in against the back of his head. She was purring in contentment, and it was that purring that awakened him. It was one of the sounds she made that instantly got his attention no matter if he was awake or asleep, and he was content to just lay there and listen to that wonderful music.

Jessie, however, was just as sensitive to him as he was to her. She knew he was awake, but didn’t say anything, just kept stroking the scars over his back with her fingers. He laid there and submitted to her tender attentions for nearly fifteen minutes before she finally spoke. “Morning,” she whispered.

“Morning love,” he said quietly back. “Feeling alright?”

“Just fine, no soreness, no pain,” she answered. “Sorry I woke you.”

“You can wake me up any time, silly kitty,” he told her with a low chuckle. “Especially when you’re feeling kittenish.”

“I’m going to hold you to that,” she whispered, nipping playfully at his damaged ear.

“Oh, are we feeling frisky?”

“Not really, I’ve just missed snuggling. We haven’t really snuggled much since Laura was born.”

“Exhaustion and your mother,” he chuckled, worming under her until he was on his back, and she settled into his arms. “But we’ll find some couch snuggle time tonight after you get back from golf, I promise.”

“Golf, yeah,” she said. “Mind if I’m late getting in?”

“Not at all. An idea?”

“There’s that public course down in New Braunfels. Remember it?”

“Oh yeah. So, my pretty kitty’s feeling the flying bug biting her butt, eh?”

She giggled. “I haven’t flown the plane for a while. I hope I’m not rusty.”

“You should have plenty of time,” he told her. “Sheila might have to bow out of her flight training after school today to do it, though. And if Allison passes her certification, you know she’s gonna fly to New Orleans as soon as Dave signs the form, in our plane.”

“Well, New Braunfels is only like fifty miles from here so we can drive, and I think I’ll see if Sam and Kevin want to go. Sam’s pretty good, and Kevin’s been talking about learning. May as well get him started. It’ll give them something to think about other than the wedding,” she grinned. “Unless you want to go, that is.”

“Nah, I’ll stay here with Laura and work on making her Daddy’s girl,” he answered, which made her giggle. “I like golf, but my back doesn’t.”

“Vil said you’re actually really good at it.”

“I’m not bad, but like I said, my back starts twinging by the fifteenth hole.”

“Well, think you can play nine holes with us this weekend? You’ve never once came to play golf with us, not even to just watch.”

“Never?” he asked in surprise.

“Not once,” she answered.

“Well, we’ll fix that,” he told her. “I can probably handle nine holes. What, trying to keep me away from Laura?”

She grinned at him. “Keeping you from spoiling our daughter,” she winked in the darkness. “Besides, I want to play golf with my husband,” she cooed, kissing him languidly on the muzzle. “Even if you only golf for two holes and then drive me around in the cart afterwards.”

“Oh, so you just want a chauffer,” he retorted, putting his paws on her sides and tickling her, which made her giggle and writhe atop him.

“I want to spend a little time with my husband doing something we both like to do,” she answered. “I know your back won’t let you play a full round, but that's no reason to play a little and quit before it starts hurting. Just promise that you'll stop if it hurts, Kit. And I mean promise."

"My word as a Vulpan, I'll stop if it starts to hurt," he answered immediately.

"Good enough for me," she said, giving him a long, lazy kiss. "It keeps me off the tennis court."

"Ha, I knew you had ulterior motives!" he accused.

"Too late, you're playing golf instead of beating me up on the tennis court now," she teased.

"Can't even beat a cripple, you're such a pathetic tennis player," he taunted.

"Oh, you're getting it now, buster," she giggled, and they woke Laura up as they wrestled on the bed, laughing. Laura gave a fussy sound that quelled both of them instantly, and they looked over in the darkness to her crib. "Uh oh, we're being scolded," she giggled as she got out of bed and went over and picked her up, calming her.

Kit yawned, watching his wife comfort their infant, and for a moment he felt as if life was complete. This was all he had ever wanted out of life. Not a wife, not money, not really even a child...he had always wanted a place where he knew he belonged. And that was this place. With the love of his life, the first of hopefully many children to come, a good job he enjoyed and the potential to spread his Vulpan fingers through the business world of Austin and eventually take control of it—he was a Vulpan, after all—and the opportunity to prove to himself that he could make it on his own, this was where he belonged. This was what he always wanted out of life.

He was an Austin Vulpan.

Jessie looked at him, and as usual, her sensitivity to him told her that he was having weighty thoughts. She smiled at him, bouncing Laura in her arm, then she sat on the edge of the bed. “Look at her, my handsome fox,” she whispered. “If we ever did one thing right in our lives, it’s right here. She’s going to be special. I can feel it. I don’t know how or why, or what she’s going to do, but she’s going to be so special.”

“I think you’re right,” Kit breathed, putting his arm over her shoulders. “How can any child of Jessica Vulpan be anything but special?”

She gave him a heart-melting look, and leaned against him. “I love you, Kit.”

“I love you more, Jessie.”

“Not possible,” she said with a slight smile, glancing at him. “Because nobody on Earth could love anyone more than I love you.”

“Well,” he said in a slightly teasing tone, then he chuckled and kissed her on the cheek. “I won’t challenge that declaration, if only because it makes me feel good.”

She kissed him, then stood back up. “Well, I’m up and I’m not really sleepy,” she complained. “May as well start breakfast.”

“I’ll be down in a bit,” Kit told her.

“Any requests?”

“Pancakes?”

“I’ll have a stack ready for you,” she told him as she picked up her robe from the back of the vanity’s chair, then pulled it on as she started for the door.

Kit dozed a little, then went down for breakfast, bringing Laura down with him. To his surprise, both Abigail and Sheila were at the kitchen table with Hannah, and Sheila was chowing down on pancakes. “What are you doing up so early?” Kit asked her as he placed Laura in the rolling crib by the table.

“Big day today,” she grinned in reply. “I have my first project in culinary arts today. We have to plan a menu.”

“Wow, already? I thought they saved that kinda stuff for the later semesters.”

She shook her head. “Half of it is learning the business of being a chef,” she answered. “And stuff like multitasking. They don’t just teach me how to cook, they teach me how to cook three things at once while listening to a waiter bitch.”

Hannah gave her a frosty look. “Watch your language, young lady,” she warned.

“You’re guarding a glassless window there, Hannah,” Abigail chuckled.

“I’m a bad girl, Hannah,” Sheila grinned shamelessly at her. “You’ll never change me.”

“You’ll find out how wrong you are,” Hannah retorted.

“It’s your gray hair,” Sheila shrugged, then she glanced at her watch. “Shit, I’m late!” she barked, jumping up quickly. “Later cousin, thanks for the pancakes Jessie, and bye old femmes,” she said as she rushed out.

“Where are you going at seven in the morning?” Kit called after her.

“Working out before class, won’t have time after!” she shouted as the door opened, then slammed shut.

Hannah looked a bit miffed, but Abigail just laughed. “She’s a plucky one, daring to call us old,” she grinned. “I think we have to take little miss young thing down a peg or two, Hannah.”

Hannah gave her an ominous little smile. “What do you have in mind?”

“Not sure yet, but I’ll think of something,” she answered, then she looked at Kit. “Say, do you have a key to her apartment, Kit dear?” she asked, which made Kit laugh.

“Actually, I do,” he answered.

“Alright, that opens up the possibilities,” Abigail grinned, which made Jessie splutter, then start giggling over the stove.

Around two, David called and told him that Allison was taking her check ride. At around four, he called back and told him that she passed. “I thought I was check riding someone who’d owned that plane for ten years,” he chuckled as Kit was letting Julie and Pat argue over a piece of research Julie did. “That girl is almost frighteningly intelligent, Kit.”

“That’s why she’s perfect for Terry, who’s an honest-to-goodness genius. So she’s certified?”

“Yup. I already filed the paperwork with her insurance carrier, so she’s certified in a four hundred.”

“Which means I should get off the phone because I’m about to get a begging phone call.”

“You should hear the call waiting beep any second,” David answered with a chuckle. “She said she was going to fly there if she passed, and since she won’t get the plane til next month, yours is the only one around.”

“I feel sorry for Sheila. She more or less bought that plane, and if she gets to fly it once a month, it’ll be a miracle.” He then heard the call waiting beep. “And there she is.”

David laughed. “Well, make her beg for it.”

“I can do that.” He ended his call with David and picked up. “Ally,” he called.

She laughed. “He ratted me out, didn’t he?”

“Yup.”

“Well, I’m flipping him off as we speak,” she told him, which made him laugh. “So, Kit, seems I just got my four hundred rating, and our plane isn’t here yet,” she trailed off hopefully.

“Yes, you can borrow the plane,” he said, which made her give a happy little squeak. “Meet me over by our parking spot so we can at least go over my plane. It has a few little quirks you need to know about.”

“Sure thing. I’ll be waiting for you.”

He hung up and got his juniors’ attention. “I’m leaving a bit early, you two have your epic battle and tell me how you want to do it when I get home. Ally passed her check ride, and I’m letting her borrow our plane to go to New Orleans tonight.”

“Cool, tell her grats from us!” Pat said with a smile.

After walking Ally through the little things unique to his 400, he watched her take off without a single worry. If David said she was certified, he had no worries at all that she would bring the plane back in one piece. After sending her off to see Terry, Kit ended up watching Laura, which he was actually looking forward to doing, while Hannah pushed Jessie out of the house. Allison had probably landed in New Orleans by the time Jessie left, so she ended up taking Sam, Kevin, and Sheila to play golf at that public course down in New Braunfels while he got his chance to subvert Laura to his camp. Hannah and Abigail just seemed amused as he kept hold of her most of the time, cooing to her, holding her gently as she slept, feeding her, then parking himself on the couch and spending nearly an hour just looking at her, in gentle-eyed wonder.

She was feeding again when Jessie got home, her golf bag on her shoulder and looking maybe just a touch tired. “Hey, handsome fox,” she smiled as she set the bag in the foyer. “How is she?”

“Just fine, and I’m stunned you didn’t call once an hour to check up on us.”

She laughed. “Sheila took my phone the first time I tried,” she admitted, which made Kit grin at her. “You’re still here, Abby? Did he at least remember to cook dinner for you?”

Abigail grinned. “He hasn’t so much as put her down once since you left,” she retorted, giving Kit a sly look. “Hannah was the one that cooked dinner.”

“Kit!” Jessie declared.

“Hey, you have her all day, and she’s asleep most of the time when I get home,” he said defensively. “How can I make her Daddy’s girl if I don’t get bonding time?”

Jessie just laughed helplessly. “Well, put her in her crib. You have a promise to keep.”

Hannah and Abigail decided to leave them be, and they truly appreciated it. They snuggled on the couch with Laura in her crib by the couch, the lights low, no TV, no radio, just them enjoying the nearness and touch of the other. They hadn’t done any real snuggling since Laura was born, and in a way it felt like they had come full circle, back to that first night they snuggled on his couch in his old apartment, an apartment that now no longer existed, with his piecemeal furniture. He could spend hours, days, just nestled against her and listening to her purr. But Jessie was tired, and she fell asleep not long after they started snuggling. Kit just put his head against hers and held her close, until he dozed off himself.

“I think they’re asleep,” Abigail whispered as she looked in from the dining room.

“Jessica stopped purring, so I know she is,” Hannah answered.

“Quite the couple, aren’t they?” the British fox asked as they went back to the kitchen and their game of rummy. “You can’t look at them and not see the love there.”

“I find it hard to believe I objected to their wedding,” Hannah said ruefully. “I didn’t believe they’d ever stay together more than a year.”

“I guess they acted differently back then.”

“No, pretty much the same,” she admitted with a chuckle. “I didn’t doubt that Kit loved my daughter, but I didn’t believe it would last.”

“And now?”

“They’ll still be married in eighty years, if they live that long,” she predicted. “I’m happy I was proved wrong.”

“That’s true love in there on that couch, Hannah,” Abigail smiled. “Laura’s going to be such a lucky girl, raised in this house.” She elbowed Hannah lightly. “Maybe that’s why Jessie turned out so good, because her parents have the same thing she does,” she grinned. “I think true love runs in your family.”

Hannah blushed slightly. “Oh, go on with you,” she retorted, sitting down at the small table. “Like you don’t talk about Winston every other minute.”

She laughed. “I’d love him even if he wasn’t a billionaire,” she winked. “What was it like for you, marrying into the Vulpan family? I’m sure it was a shock.”

“It was, but not because of money. Remember, Kit doesn’t really have his family fortune. My shocks came from how they treated him, and how they still treat him. That boy would bend over backwards for a family he hates because he’s still loyal to them, but they treat him like garbage.”

“He’s loyal to Vil, Hannah, and not a single other Vulpan,” Abigail answered. “She really needs to work on him, though.”

“Over what?”

“They shouldn’t be living in this apartment,” she said. “They should be in a nice house with a big yard where their kids have plenty of room to play.”

“I thought you liked this apartment.”

“Oh, it’s nice, there’s no doubt about that, and it’ll do so long as they only have Laura. For a family with one child, this townhouse is ideal. But I have no doubt I’ll be back here about this time next year to welcome my second grandchild into the world, and a large family needs a good house with a large yard so the kids have plenty of space to play. One child could do well here, but they’re going to have at least five, and so they need more space. They should move while they’re still small, so they can be all settled in by the time their family gets big. This place will certainly do until we talk them into a house.”

Hannah smiled. “I do believe that we have some common ground here, Abby,” she declared. “Five, you say?”

“At least,” she answered. “Big families run through Kit’s side of the family. I think they might have as many as eight.”

“I was thinking four. Martha thinks they’ll have three.”

“I smell a wager coming,” Abigail grinned.

“I don’t bet with someone who can buy my entire state, Abby.”

Abigail laughed. “Clever girl,” she grinned. “Now deal.”

Kit had more than one mission the next morning, at least after he got all the assignments worked out. Barry had dropped five different research projects on them, ideas for upcoming articles that RJ and Paula would be writing while Barry and Lilly kept working on the Election Special, which was coming down to the wire, so Kit put two each on the juniors and did the hardest one himself, which took him the majority of the morning. After lunch, he sat in with a meeting of the department heads about future plans, then he exercised a little boss leeway to do some private research...country clubs.

Jessie was getting more and more serious about golf, and it was about time to let her play on a nice course. Country clubs could be pretty expensive, so the objective of his research was to find the nicest club with the best perks and most acceptable rules that had the most optimal fees. Austin wasn't the biggest city in Texas, but it probably had more rich furs in it than Dallas and Houston, so they had 12 different country clubs scattered in and around the city. All of them had websites, and all of them had contact information, so he spent the afternoon calling around, investigating club rules and services, and looking at pictures of courses. Of course, those pictures always put a course in its best light, so the only real way to check them out was to look at them...and Kit could do that from the air. He first called Allison to make sure she was back in Austin, and after making sure she'd brought back his plane, he left work early to get his keys from her at her house. He'd never been inside her house before, but he knew where it was, and he'd stopped by a few times. She met him out by the curb, looking very happy. Now that she'd finished her flight training, Allison really didn't have much to do. She was graduated, and really didn't need to work. "When did you get back?" he asked.

"About ten," she answered. "Your plane flies like a dream."

"Thanks. I kinda need it."

“Oh? What are you up to?”

“Gonna overfly some of the golf courses around town. I’m looking into a country club for Jessie.”

“Ohh, want a copilot? I’ll get a membership wherever you do. Sheila and Jessie are getting me into golf too,” she laughed.

“Sure, hop in,” he told her.

They drove down to Bergstrom and chitchatted about nothing in particular, her telling him about her date with Terry the night before and her staying at a hotel overnight before flying back, at least until he brought up her future plans. “I haven’t really decided yet,” she answered. “I was going to find a job as a chemist somewhere around town, there are plenty of places that are hiring, but if I get a job, I might not be able to go see Terry,” she hedged.

Kit laughed. “You are so hopeless,” he teased. “Terry really has your leash, doesn’t he?”

She gave him a little glare with that gorgeous face of hers, then she laughed ruefully. “Hey, it took a lot of time and courage to finally find a male that accepts me despite my past,” she said.

“Well, if you don’t feel like getting a real job, maybe you can help,” he mused. “Me and Lupe started a real estate company, you know.”

“Yeah.”

“Well, from time to time I’ll need someone with a good eye to go out and look at houses. Feel like being an errand girl?”

She grinned. “Well, since you’re letting me borrow the plane, I guess I can help out a little,” she winked.

“Just mind that Lupe might go with you,” he warned.

She laughed again. “I can handle Lupe,” she replied in a calm voice. “I have Alice’s number.”

Kit looked at her maybe half a second too long for him to be driving, then he burst out laughing. “How did you get it?”

“Jessie gave it to me,” she said in a purring tone. “I know how to deal with pushy flirts, Kit. I go for the throat.”

“I should say so,” he laughed. “But you can do me a favor and call Jessie and tell her we’re going on a quick spin around. If she finds out me and you were out alone, she might get the wrong idea.”

“I can do that,” she nodded, digging for her cell phone.

Judging a golf course from the air wasn’t the best way to do it, but it at least let them a good idea of its layout and see how well it was maintained. They traded off flying, as Kit flew them to each course, then Ally took over so he could check it out with binoculars. Going by what he’d already researched, he’d narrowed his search down to five clubs, two very close to town, two near the lake, one on the south side, and one up near Georgetown. Allison looked as best she could while she was flying, pointing things out, until they’d checked out the last club up near Georgetown. Kit let Ally fly the rest of the way back as he went over his notes. “Looks like Oak Lake is the winner,” he said. “A bit more expensive than the other four, but they have more amenities and their course looked pretty good.”

“It looked pretty hard.”

“You don’t expect to get good playing on easy courses,” he scoffed. “Besides, the harder courses are better maintained.”

“That Vulpan superiority is starting to ooze out there, Kit,” she teased.

“Yeah yeah, excuse me if I expect the best,” he replied with a light smile. “So, what’s Sheila saying about her birthday? It’s just a few days off.”

“She was wondering if you remembered,” Allison chuckled.

“I’ve been waiting for her to tell me where she’s having the party.”

“Parties,” she corrected. “She’s having a tame one in the community center there at Westwood, then she’s having a big bash at the Top Hat.”

“Naturally,” Kit grunted, which made Allison giggle.

“She’s inviting most of her cousins to the Top Hat party,” she warned. “She’s even invited Terry, but he’s not sure he can make it. That’s why she hasn’t really told you about it yet. She doesn’t want any friction between you and them. She did tell Vil that she invited the cousins down, though. She said she’d get in a lot of trouble if she did that and didn’t warn Vil.”

“Well, she’s thinking ahead, I’ll give her that,” Kit noted, then glanced at her. “So, going back to the Top Hat, eh? Sure you can do it?”

“I can manage,” she said calmly. “I look a lot different with my clothes on, you know.”

Kit spluttered, then started laughing.

Allison landed them and they tied down the plane, then he went home after dropping her off at her house. He got in just as Laura was being fed, so he got in some baby cuddling time after feeding, as Hannah cooked dinner, enough to feed six. Rick and Martha were going to come to dinner, and Hannah wanted to cook for them. Kit opened his laptop and went over his research one more time, as Jessie came back in after putting Laura down for a nap. “So, what did you have to do that Ally had to fly you around?” she asked.

“Looking at golf courses,” he answered. “Since you’re getting into golf so much, it’s about time to join a country club, so you can play on a nice course that’s not so crowded you’re either hitting balls at other golfers or ducking them yourself.”

“Why, that’s sweet of you, handsome fox,” she said, kissing him on the top of his head. “Why did you need the plane for that?”

“I wanted to look at the courses,” he replied. “See how they were laid out and how well maintained they looked.”

“Oh. Always thorough,” she teased, pinching his injured ear.

“I’m a researcher, Jess, we define thorough,” he replied lightly. “I also blackmailed Ally into helping us with the real estate idea, go out and look at houses. She’s got a sharp eye. Once we show her what to look for, she’ll pick us winners.”

“Blackmail?” Jessie laughed.

“Hey, she’s using our plane. Vulpans never do favors for free,” he replied flippantly. “There’s always a hook in it somewhere.”

“And here I thought you weren’t like Vil. You two are just the same!” she declared lightly.

“Face it, love, you married a pirate.”

“At least he’s a handsome pirate,” she replied, patting his shoulders. “And he’s going to make us rich someday, all on his own, without Vil helping him!” she added, kissing him on the top of his head, then scurrying off to the kitchen to help cook.

Kit chuckled, happy that she had such confidence in him, and also happy that she got it.

Sheila crashed in on them after she got out of class, dropping her bookbag by the door and coming to the den, where he was finishing up some work. “Ally said she ratted me out,” she declared.

Kit chuckled as she looked up at her from his desk. “I was wondering if you were even having a party,” he said. “Four days away and not a word!”

“I had to make the arrangements, but it’s on now,” she answered. “A tame family party in the community center after class, then the real party over at the Top Hat.”

“How many cousins are coming?”

“Just about all the Party Pack but Mary, she’s over in England right now, my brothers, and Danny,” she answered. “Terry said he’d try to make it, but he’s not sure. He’s buried up to his ears in work over there right now. I asked Dahlia to come, but Uncle Tom won’t let her,” she frowned. “I think it’d be good for her to take a trip, have a little fun. Chrissy’s coming too.”

“Chrissy? You’re taking a sixteen year old into the Top Hat? Sarah will blow a fuse when she finds out!”

“Oh, get off it, cousin, you know she’s nowhere near a virgin,” Sheila protested. “And what kind of sister would I be to snub her? She’s old enough, at least by Vulpan standards.”

“I’m not coming anywhere near this one, Sheila,” he warned. “When Sarah finds out, it’s your head.”

“Mom won’t care,” she shrugged. “She was doing even wilder shit when she was fourteen. Anyway, I only invited Muffy and Terry to the community center, since Laura will be there. Them and all our friends here in Austin.”

“At least you thought ahead that much,” he noted.

“So, wanna go to the real party after the one here?” she asked with an outrageous grin. “You and Jessie?”

“Don’t ask that around Hannah, or she’ll whip you,” he warned.

“Why do you think I’ve been keeping it secret?” she asked with a laugh. “I’m not tangling with Hannah, nuh-uh.”

“Well, you have the sense to be afraid of Hannah,” he noted, which made her laugh again. “So, Ben turned you down, eh?”

She glared at him. “He has a game on Saturday!” she said, a bit sharply. Sheila’s birthday was on Friday, exactly one week after Laura’s, so that was true enough.

“And he still turned you down despite that,” he surmised.

“Oh, bite my furry ass, Kit!” she barked, which made him laugh as she stormed out. That girl would never learn. Having a wild party at the Top Hat would just tell Ben that she was nowhere near ready to commit to him, so he’d just keep his distance from her. Sheila was actually pretty bright, but she was still too selfish to think that she’d have to seriously change if she even wanted a chance to date Ben.

But, that was her problem. Jessie had told her what she had to do. If she wasn’t willing to do it, she had no one to blame but herself.

Dinner turned out to be more than just Rick and Martha. Nick and Sylvia dropped by to talk to them, but ended up staying for dinner themselves. The guards had done exactly what they said they would do, they melted into the background, but they were always there, and they always ensured that Jessie never went anywhere alone. Either Sylvia went with her, or one of them quietly tailed her from a discreet distance. Kit felt very safe and comfortable with them in the complex, ready at a moment’s notice in case there was trouble, but also just there to hang around with. Kit rather liked all four of them. In the weeks since they’d been home, they’d fully integrated into the complex and into Austin, and Nick was again more or less in the middle of everything, one ear with the police and the other listening to the city. Sylvia remained the other primary “visible guard” outside of Nick, and Barnett and Krichek had melted into the background, always close by if they were needed and working their own angles. Barnett was gaining a foothold with the tech-heads and computer geeks in Austin, since he was so skilled at computers and electronic systems, and was watching the internet for any chatter or sign that there was a threat incoming against the Austin Vulpans. Krichek was making very discreet connections with Austin’s criminal element. Not to commit crimes himself, but to listen for anything that might threaten Kit and Jessie. Krichek's father was involved with the Russian mob and he'd been in America long enough to know how to go about such things, so he knew how the underworld worked. Krichek was the ear on the dark underbelly of Austin, Nick kept his ears open to the police, Sylvia concentrated on protecting them, and Barnett used his skills and growing contacts to keep an eye on Austin's cyberspace.

"I was wondering if you two were still around," Martha noted as Nick sat down at the table.

"We're good at hiding, Martha," Nick grinned back. "Even someone as big as me."

"It's called blending in, Martha," Sylvia said mildly. "I still escort Fraulein Jessie around if she needs to go out and she's alone, but we try to be as unobtrusive as possible. If anything, I'm an extra pair of paws for the baby."

"But packing a pistol somewhere in those stylish, form-fitting clothes of hers," Nick smiled at her.

"Nowhere you will find it, wolf. Not if you want to keep your fingers," she replied, which made Kit laugh. He had no doubt both of them had at least one pistol on them at that moment. Kit himself still gritted his teeth and strapped on his own Glock every morning, never forgetting the fact that it was Rick's concealed carry permit that had saved his life. He hated carrying that gun, but he'd do it to protect himself and his family, if it came down to it.

"Well, since you're here, Nick, we've decided to join a country club, so Jessie has a nice place to play," Kit told him.

“Ah, which one?”

“Oak Lake.”

“I’ll go up and look it over tomorrow,” he nodded. “Talk to their security, you know, do my job,” he smiled. “I’ll call you tomorrow when I’m done. So, when are you going skeet shooting again?”

“Not with you, I’d like to look like something other than an idiot,” Kit called, which made him grin.

“You’ve gotten quite good at shooting trap, Herr Kit,” Sylvia protested. “I think you’d do well on a skeet shooting range now.”
“Listen to you two, pretending we don’t have a baby!” Jessie laughed.

“They’re talking sense, dear,” Martha said calmly. “You don’t just drop your life after your baby’s born. Yes, your life revolves around Laura, but you need time for yourself as well. You’ll burn out quickly if you stop doing what you love thinking you have to spend every waking moment watching after her.”

“I know, it’s just not easy,” she said, her cheeks ruffling a bit. “When we went golfing, Sheila took my phone so I couldn’t call and check up, and I felt so...I dunno. A little afraid that something might happen.”

“That’s new mother syndrome, dear,” Martha said with a smile. “Trust me, you’ll learn how to trust Laura with your husband. Though I know how hard that can be,” she added, glancing lightly at Rick.

“Hey now, all our sons lived to adulthood,” Rick protested. “Sure, I mighta addled Brian a little, but that was his fault.”

“I come home and find them playing some game that involved them breaking my lamp,” she noted.

“She never lets me forget that lamp,” Rick complained.

“It’s how we keep you males under control, Rick,” Hannah told him with a slight smile.

Abigail joined them near the end of dinner, blowing in like a cheerful tornado. “Hello duckies!” she called as she came into the dining room. “Damn, I was trying to get here on time,” she said. “I’ve had the longest day!”

“I was wondering where you’d gotten off to, Abby,” Kit chuckled. “What happened?”

“The furniture they delivered for the pool deck was all wrong!” she complained. “I’ve been getting it all straightened out. These Texas furs can be so dense!” she complained, looking right at Rick and Martha as she said it.

“The door’s right over there, Abby,” Rick told her with a slight smile.

“Anyway, that was the last of the furniture, and I’ve been getting it all arranged just so. The house is all together now, and it looks smashing! You need to come over and see it!”

“I think we can swing that tomorrow,” Kit said, to which Jessie nodded. “We’ll take Laura. Her first trip outside the house that doesn’t involve the doctor.”

“Sounds lovely!” she beamed. “I had a nursery installed just in case you came over, so she’ll have a nice place to nap while I give you a tour.

Hopefully, Kenny will give me a little something to put in that nursery himself,” she added.

“I’m sure Vil’s making him work,” Kit chuckled. “She’s dead set on getting pregnant.”

“Trapped in a house with a militant femme. We should send him some consolation cards or something,” Nick grinned.

“Vil has him pretty much well leashed, I noticed,” Abigail said with a cheeky smile. “Just where a male should be!”

“Hey now, Abby, I think we might have something to say about that,” Kit protested.

“Hush, slave,” Jessie chided him with a wink.

“Charlie’s still spreading the stories back home,” Abigail laughed. “Kenny’s gonna murder him when word gets back across the pond what he’s saying.”

“I hope they put that on pay-per-view, it should be a fun fight,” Kit noted, which made Rick and Nick laugh. “Kendall has one hell of a right hook.”

“I dunno, Charlie was in the army, so he’s probably tougher than he looks,” Rick speculated.

Sheila came in without knocking, as usual, carrying her backpack. “Hey!” she called from the living room, then she came into the dining room. “Hey guys,” she called. “Glad to track you down, Abby,” she grinned at Abigail. “I’m having my birthday party in the community center on Friday afternoon, after I get out of school. So, you’re invited.”

“A party, eh? And how old will you be?” Abigail asked.

“As old as my driver’s license says I am, Abby,” she winked.

“Twenty,” Kit supplied. “As in still not legal.”

“Pft, I’m a Vulpan, my name is all the legal I need,” she snorted.

“Anyway, it’s gonna start around two, and just about everyone’s invited. I didn’t want you to think I snubbed ya,” she grinned.

“Well, I guess I can make it. If an old femme like me won’t drag down your party,” she replied lightly.

“That’s why I’m having the tame party here, so you old fogeys can keep up. The real party will be somewhere else that night,” she replied with a smile dripping with sweet, honeyed venom.

“Listen to this,” Martha declared, giving Sheila an amused smile.

“I know you can go all night, Martha, but Abby? She’d keel over by ten, and I won’t be responsible for murder,” she dug.

“I’m so glad you think so, ducky,” Abigail chuckled.

“Anyway, I got stuff to do, plans to make. I’ll see you guys on Friday. Two o’clock, don’t be late! Later guys, later old femmes!” she called, then rushed right back out.

“That girl needs a serious reality check,” Abigail said, her eyes narrow and deliciously wicked. “So, Kit, what’s this other party about?”

“She invited a bunch of our cousins and probably the younger furs she knows around Austin to the Top Hat,” he replied. “From what I’ve heard, she rented the whole place for the night. Knowing Sheila, it’ll be the epitome of debauchery and excess.”

“Oh really?” she asked brightly. “And where would this place be?”

“I know where it is, Abby,” Nick told her.

Abigail gave him a long look, then a malicious smile graced her muzzle. “Nick, ducky, how’d you like to do a little job for me?”

Nick laughed, glancing at Kit. “I’m already under contract, Abby.”

“Oh, I’m not going to steal you from Kit, he needs you,” she replied. “But I think a male like you has just the connections I need to take Little Miss Young Thing down a few pegs. So, why don’t we go take a trip to this Top Hat place?”

Kit laughed, giving Nick a smile. “Go ahead,” he told him. “She’ll nag us into it anyway.”

“Hannah, Martha, get your purses, girls. We have a mission,” she declared, standing up. “The Society of Old Bats must avenge this insult!” she cried, thrusting a fist into the air, which made Jessie almost fall out of her chair laughing.

“This sounds interesting,” Martha said with a light smile. “I’ll call when I’m ready to be picked up, dear.”

“Have fun, love,” Rick told her with a chuckle.

“A chance to get back at Sheila? I’m in,” Hannah declared, standing up.

The three femmes filed out with Nick, leaving Rick, Jessie, and Sylvia to finish dinner. “Why do I get the feeling that this is gonna be memorable,” Rick noted, taking another bite, then chuckling.

“Because Abby’s a lot more dangerous than Sheila thinks she is,” Kit replied, which made Jessie go right back into peals of laughter. “I get the feeling that Sheila’s party is going to be unforgettable, and not for the reasons Sheila thinks.”

“Fraulein Abigail is rich and smart, and she has a very quirky sense of humor, like most of the Brightons. That is not such a good combination for Sheila,” Sylvia noted.

Laura started to fuss from her crib by the table, and Jessie was there before she had much of a chance to get going. She picked her up and cooed to her, rocking her in her arms a little, but when she continued to fuss, she looked at the clock. “Oh dear, someone needs a new diaper,” she told Laura in a gentle voice. “And I think it’s about time Laura had her own dinner, she’ll probably get hungry before I finish changing her,” she told them. “I’ll be upstairs, love. Mind keeping my dinner warm?”

“Sure thing, pretty kitty.”

“Sylvia, tomorrow, find out from Nick what Abby has up her sleeve,” Kit said after Jessie left. “Not that I’m going to stop her, but I do want to know what’s going to happen before it happens.”

“Certainly,” she nodded. “I’ll stop by your office tomorrow afternoon.”

“Works for me.”

Kit more or less put the party in the back of his mind the next day, because work called, and not all of it was the magazine. Allison had started her first day as roving real estate appraiser, stopping by his office that morning with Lupe as they went over a few properties he’d found that were on the verge of foreclosure that fit the model Kit had made: owned by more or responsible furs who could make the payments if he bought the houses and rented them out, and were in dire straights basically through bad luck. Lupe and Allison headed out in her beat-up old Camry, her puttering car, then Kit did some real magazine work before lunch. After the department head meeting Rick had after lunch, he started investigating his other idea, T-hangars. There was a massive shortage of T-hangars, and even with the impending financial downturn that Kendall was predicting, furs with planes still needed places to put them. His movement on that idea wouldn't be until after he saw if Kendall was right, where he might be able to pick up some cheap real estate abutting an airport and convince the airport to allow him to run a taxiway from their network out to his T-hangars. The other option was to find enough empty area in an FAA approved area and build his own T-hangar complex, and just pave a long enough runway for pilots to take off and land there.

He certainly had the time. Between Pat and Julie, he really didn't have all that much research to do anymore. There was enough to keep two researchers hopping, but not three. They did the majority of the routine work, and he did the most important research projects, picked up whatever slack when the work overflowed Pat and Julie's in-boxes, and focused on what Rick called the management aspects of the magazine when he got his research done.

Sylvia came in as he was checking out stand-alone hangar location options, which were mainly in the ranch country south and east of the city, and she just couldn't help but smile. "Uh oh."

"Fraulein Abigail is a monster," she declared, which made Kit burst out laughing.

“Close the door,” he told her. She did so, and sat at the chair behind his desk, leaning against it and giving him a wolfish smile. “Alright, what’s she going to do?”

“Scare Sheila half to death,” she replied. “She asked Nick to find some burly, scary-looking males in the profession that are between contracts for a quick and easy job. She intends to have them raid the Top Hat while dressed as SWAT police.”

Kit bent over, he was laughing so hard, then looked at her. “That’s a bit illegal,” he noted.

“She doesn’t really care,” she replied. “And she’s already arranged it with the owner of the Top Hat. The club will know it’s coming, so they don’t panic. They intend to raid the club about two hours after the party begins, looking the part all the way down to badges and uniforms, and they will do it professionally. You know, blocking all exits, rounding up everyone, acting like cops. Then, after everyone is suitably shaken up, Fraulein Abigail will show up and simply call them off and join the party herself.”

Kit just couldn’t help but laugh some more, then he wiped his eye as he finally got control of himself. “That femme is the devil,” he declared. “I knew I liked her!”

“She is an evil femme, but that’s part of her charm,” she murmured, which made him nod vigorously while trying not to laugh again. “Oh, she intends to have our comrades video the entire thing, which she’ll give to Sheila after it’s over. I’m sure she’ll give you a copy as well.”

That sent him right back over the edge. Sylvia started laughing herself when he just couldn’t control himself, pounding his fist on the desk and knocking Jessie's picture over. "Oh God, the Vulpans attending the party are going to have a cow when they find out it was a joke!" he wheezed. "Vulpans aren't used to being made fun of!" Then he went right back to nearly maniacal laughter.

"There might be some friction with your family's elders, but what can they do?" Sylvia shrugged, which made Kit laugh harder, and her join in.

This, Kit knew, he had to keep secret, after he got control of himself. He sent Sylvia back to the complex so she could return to her duties of being nearby for Jessie. A plan like this was complicated, and the more who knew about it, the better the chance it could go wrong. It was pretty mean, and it would probably cost Abby a few tens of thousands of dollars to hire a raiding party of mercenaries and outfit them in Austin-style SWAT uniforms, but she was rich and could afford it. But still, the sheer audacity of it, hiring mercs to crash someone's party, that was just mean. Brilliant, hilarious, but mean. His respect for Abigail went up a few notches, as well as a bit of healthy fear.

There was one femme that did need to know, however, if only so she could weather the storm when the furious elders got wind of what happened to the kids. He called Vil at work, and to his surprise, it was Kendall that answered the phone. "Oi Kit," he called lightly.

"Where's Vil?" he asked.

"In the loo, she'll be out in a minute. We were about to go home."

"What are you doing at the office?"

"Picking her up. We're going to theatre down in New York tonight. Part of my coddling for when basketball season starts," he said eagerly. "I have season tickets at half court now, the seats right beside the Vulpan family seats.”

“Who did you have to kill to get those,” Kit chuckled.

“It wasn’t cheap,” he said seriously. “But I didn’t want to tie up the Vulpan seats and infuriate your family with me being there every single game, so I bought my own. So, our families now control about half that row, your six and my four,” he said with a laugh.

“Every single game? Uh oh,” he noted.

“We’ve already had that fight, and I won,” he declared triumphantly. “And Vil will be there with me as much as she can. She knows how much I love the Celtics.”

“So that’s why you married Vil. Because she lives in Boston.”

“She wouldn’t have been half as attractive if she lived in New York,” he replied, then he cried out. “Ow!”

“Is that so?” Vil barked in the background, and there was a commotion that made Kit laugh. “Hey bro,” she finally said into the phone.

“Stop beating that poor male or he’ll get an annulment,” Kit teased.

“It’s his own fault, being such a weenie,” she replied, which caused Kendall to make some indignant remark Kit couldn’t quite make out. So, what’s up?”

“I’m calling to give you a warning,” he said, then he explained what Abigail was going to do. Vil broke down in helpless laughter after he explained it, and it took her a couple of minutes to get her composure back.

“Dear God, I love that femme,” she finally said. “I’ll handle the outrage up here, but I want a copy of that video!”

“I’m sure she’ll pass them out on street corners if only to further dig on Sheila,” he chuckled. “Our cousin bit off more than she could chew this time.”

“It’s good for her, it teaches her that there’s such a thing as the real world,” Vil said dryly, which made Kit laugh. “Hate to cut it short, bro, but we gotta go. We’re going to New York for a show.”

“Ken told me. Have fun, sis.”

“You know it. I’ll call you tomorrow.”

Kit hung up the phone, and just had to smile to himself. It was going to be an eventful weekend.

Friday arrived, and Kit almost couldn’t keep still. He went in that morning to get the paperwork done and handle all the end of week stuff with Rick, who also came in early on Fridays. Rick knew, of course, because Martha told him, but they’d kept it completely quiet outside of them. Jessie didn’t even know. The two of them plowed through all the figures and reports, then Kit left to go up to Oak Lake to finalize his buy of the country club membership. It was pretty expensive, but it had the most bang for the buck, and besides, it was for Jessie. And what Jessie wanted, Jessie got. They gave him a tour, explained their rules, and after they treated him to lunch, he agreed to a one year membership for him and Jessie. The manager all but fell over himself when he realized that Kit was a Vulpan, since the upper crust rumor mill told everyone in that tax bracket that Vulpans had started colonizing Austin, and it was a matter of prestige for Oak Lake to land a Vulpan member. Snobby country clubs used the worth and social reputation of their members as measuring sticks, and Oak Lake was one of the swankier country clubs in the city...but despite that, they had reasonable fees for what services they offered, an excellent golf course, and all the little perks that a member expected for his considerable membership dues. Such a member would attract other members, and that was more profit for the country club. The fact that Kit had joined would bring Sheila, and possibly Terry as well, who would probably join just for a nice place to play while visiting Austin.

They shook paws, Kit was issued membership cards and parking decals for himself and Jessie, and that was that. He and Jessie were now members of Oak Lake, and were granted access to their numerous and excellent services and facilities, from their small on-site gym to their hot tub to their restaurant, and had unlimited access to their excellent golf course, a course so good that it had hosted four PGA events over the last ten years. He bought the club package that included unlimited course access without additional greens fees, because he never wanted Jessie to have to pay a dime for anything but refreshments when she came here to golf. She wouldn't have to pay for herself, and she wouldn't have to pay for four guests who golfed with her, though any guests past four did have to pay a much reduced green fee; none of their packages offered greens fee waivers for guests past two. It was expensive to get the four guest option, but since Jessie often golfed with three others, it was more or less mandatory so Sam could golf with Jessie and not have to cash out her savings bonds to pay the pretty steep greens fees at Oak Lake.

He called her on the way home and told her the good news. “So, now you can take Ally and Sam to a nice golf course the next time you go,” he told her. “You can take up to four guests and you don’t have to pay greens fees.”

“Ohhh, I’ll have to drive up and look at it before the party!” she declared.

“Heck, call Sylvia and have Hannah watch Laura, I’ll turn around and meet you there so you can get a tour.”

“Okay!” she said enthusiastically.

Jessie’s van arrived at Oak Lake about half an hour later, and Sylvia got out of the passenger’s side and waited just by the driver’s side for Jessie to get out and lock her van. Sylvia padded along just behind them, a quiet and reassuring presence, as Kit went back in with her, the manager just happened to meet them in the lobby of the clubhouse, and he happily gave Jessie her own tour of the clubhouse and grounds. The manager basically fawned all over Jessie, and she endured it with a good-natured smile, though being treated like that never failed to make her a little uncomfortable. “We have a PGA level golf course, eighteen holes, par seventy-two, which I’m sure you’ll enjoy,” he said. “I’ll get us a golf cart and take you on a drive through it.”

“How long are you open in the winter?” she asked.

“We stay open year round, Misses Vulpan, though the course does close for three weeks in late January and early February for major maintenance, landscaping changes, and course alterations,” he answered. “Outside of that maintenance, the course is open seven days a week, from noon to dusk Monday through Thursday, and from seven a.m. to dusk on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. We can, however, arrange to have the course available for a morning tee time on weekdays by special request, as long as you submit your request at least seven days before your planned tee time.”

“Guess you have to rearrange the lawn mowers,” she noted.

“Just so, ma’am,” he nodded. “We do most of our landscaping and divot repair before opening, but if we can arrange it, we can work around golfers when a member requests a weekday morning tee time.”

“So, when I want to golf, do I schedule a tee time or can I just show up?”

“Both work, ma’am,” he told her with a smile. “If you know your tee time, you’re welcome to make a reservation so you can bypass the walk-on line, if there is one. But you’re welcome to walk in at any time and play a round. You might have to wait, sometimes we do have a few too many golfers show up at once, but you never have to wait long to get to the tee. That’s a promise,” he smiled.

Kit played with his Blackberry as the manager did the second tour, not paying much attention, but Jessie was very impressed with the course, if not a little intimidated by how hard it looked. “The objective is to have fun, Misses Vulpan. And you can always just not keep score until you get better,” he winked.

She laughed. “I might have to. I think my first score on this course might be three hundred.”

“We won’t tell if you won’t.”

“Deal!” she giggled.

They were there so long that it was time to go to Sheila's party when they finally left. She invited a whole lot of furs, so the community center's deck was packed. Everyone from the office, most of the girls from the sorority, and a lot of furs from Sheila's classes over at U.T. were there, and there was plenty of catered food and lots of beer. Dan was there, Mickey got there about an hour late due to work, and Kevin managed to pop in right at the tail end, but Kit spent most of the time trying not to laugh every time he looked at Sheila, knowing what was coming, which irritated Jessie quite a bit. Abigail showed up near the tail end as well, all happy and bubbly smiles, but the knowing smirk she shot at Kit as Sheila opened her presents made him burst out laughing.

"What? What is going on?" Jessie demanded.

"I'll tell you after the party. I don't want to ruin the surprise," he replied.

There were a few crashers at their party as well. Just after Sheila finished opening her gifts, Muffy arrived, waving frantically and running up. "Where's Laura, I wanna see her!" she declared.

"Hey, this is my party, bitch!" Sheila protested, then she laughed and hugged her cousin.

Jessie couldn't resist showing off their daughter, so she picked her up from her stroller and held her gently. "This is little Laura," she cooed. "Laura, this is your second cousin Muffy."

"She's adorable!" she gushed. "The pictures I saw just don't do her justice!"

"Who showed you pics?" Kit asked.

“Vil,” she answered with a smile. “She has a huge album she pulls out any time anyone asks. Mom demanded a DVD.”

“Your mom? Ruth?”

“Yeah, she thinks Laura is just a little dollbaby,” she laughed. “Dad thinks she’s cute too.”

“I’m not sure I like the idea of Brian and Ruth wanting pictures of my daughter,” he said darkly.

“Oh, lighten up, Kit!” Muffy protested. “Mom and Dad like you, what’s wrong with them thinking your daughter is cute?”

“The fact that she’s the first mixed breed in the family, maybe,” he replied immediately. “I just don’t like the idea of about anyone from the family outside of you, Sheila, Terry, and Vil showing any interest at all in my daughter.”

“Well, loosen up and given at least some of us a chance,” she told him.

The other crasher was Terry. He arrived and immediately gave Allison a hug, kissed Sheila on the cheek, then came over and gave Jessie a kiss on the cheek. “Alright, trot out the kidlet,” he demanded.

Jessie laughed, but she did again pull Laura from her stroller and present her to Terry. Terry smiled down at her, then put a very gentle finger under her paw, holding it up. “She’s so tiny,” he mused.

“She’s a newborn, she’s supposed to be tiny, dink,” Muffy teased, nudging him.

“How much hell has she made out of your life, cousin?”

“Not much at all, she sleeps most of the time,” he answered. “The hell comes when she works out of her sleeping phase and gets more active.”

“Getting much sleep, Jessie?”

“Three hours at a time,” she laughed. “Laura wakes up about every four hours and wants to be fed. She’s got her own little schedule, and we all live by it.”

“That’s the way of babies, just taking over everything,” he said sagely, carefully removing his finger from under her paw and letting her snuggle back down and close her eyes, content in her mother’s arms. “I’m glad I got here early enough to see her.”

“How’s it going at Avondale?” Kit asked as they all sat down.

“Pretty smoothly now,” he replied. “I’ve got their departments reorganized to be more efficient, and they’re starting to learn the system. I’m still having small problems with the union, but they’re about one step from falling apart.”

“You busted them?”

“They busted themselves,” he answered. “Once the workers saw the pay scale, pension, and health insurance plans we offered, they basically revolted against the union. The union told them to vote no on the contract, but it passed with ninety percent. The union wanted it all, wanted to strike and hold us hostage until we caved in, but now the workers see that as long as they live up to our expectations, they’ll get paid even more than they did under their last contract.”

“Money can do it every time,” Kit chuckled as Jessie carefully put Laura back in her stroller.

“Well, the union’s teeth were pulled, but they’re still trying to make noise. If they’re not careful, though, they’ll see a mass exodus. Furs are starting to get used to the new routine, and though they don’t like the new training and new QA inspectors, they don’t mind the paychecks.”

“Hey, this my party, dweeb, stop spending all your time over there!” Sheila called sharply to Terry, which made him laugh.

“Queen Sheila calls,” he said with a slight smile.

The party wound down, and only when Kit got Jessie back home and behind closed doors, he told her Abigail’s plans. It made her collapse into helpless fits of laughter, so loud that it woke up Laura. “I can’t believe she’s going to do that!” she squealed in mirth.

“Where Abby’s concerned, I would,” he laughed.

Kit stayed close to the phone that night, quietly counting down the hours, then the minutes, and then he got the phone call he was expecting at about 11:00. It was Nick, and he was laughing when Kit picked up the phone. “So, how did it go?” he asked.

“Oh God!” he laughed. “I was watching from the control van, it was classic! Just classic!” he rumbled. “The mates had them all but peeing their boxers! They put everyone in the lounge and made them sit there for nearly twenty minutes, never said a word, scared the ever-lovin’ crocpiss out of ‘em. A few of your cousins tried to bribe them, and every time they did, they just pulled out pawcuffs like they were going to cuff ‘em and ship ‘em off to jail. Then Abby strolls in and calls them off, looks right at Sheila, and asked her if she was about to keel over. The music started back up, and all the mates started dancing right there, holding their PDWs and in their SWAT uniforms! You shoulda seen the look on Sheila’s face when she realized it was all an elaborate set-up, she looked right ready to go on a rampage! It was absolutely classic!” he wheezed, then started laughing again.

“Dude, I want a DVD as fast as you can get it here,” Kit told him, laughing himself.

“I’ll have it in your paws in an hour, as soon as I compile all the video and edit it,” he promised.

An hour later, said DVD was in Kit’s paws and being loaded into the player. Nick and Sylvia stood behind the couch, Nick in a black paramilitary uniform and Sylvia in a tee and jeans. “I think I got a good edit on it, I took it from the three cameras the mates were using. I got most of the looks of horror,” he grinned hugely. “And there’s a good one of Sheila whining like a little girl as she was put in the lounge. Sheila’s going to be pissed for years.”

“Just goes to show, never mess with a billionaire with time on her paws,” Sylvia murmured, which made Kit laugh.

The laughter reached uncontrollable proportions as they watched the DVD, as he saw his cousins rounded up by big males in black uniforms just like Nick’s, big SWAT patches on the chest and shoulders to make them look real, and all of them armed with submachine guns, just like a real SWAT unit would be. His cousins looked shocked, flabbergasted, scared out of their minds, or drunkenly indignant as they and the other guests and club workers were rounded up, and it was more hilarious to see the calm looks on the club workers, since they knew it was all an elaborate joke. Then Abigail struts in, dressed to the nines in a glittery party dress, calls off the mercs, and looks right at Sheila. “Who’s the one keeling over now, ducky?”

she called with a wicked smile, then she snapped her fingers. The DJ started the music back up, and all the mercs started dancing in place. And just like Nick said, the look of horror on Sheila's face turned to indignation when she realized she'd been had, then she got furious, shaking her fist at Abigail, who was dancing with a merc Kit knew, it was Donny from Stonebrook. The Vulpans slowly started to realize it was some kind of joke, and not a single one of them except for Terry looked amused at all. Terry just leaned back in his chair, watched Abigail a minute, then burst out laughing.

“Herr Kit, your stepmother is almost good enough of an actor to be German,” Sylvia murmured, which made Kit almost fall off the couch laughing.

“She’s certainly somethin’,” Nick agreed with a big grin.

“Oh, there’s going to be a reckoning for this,” Kit laughed. “But it won’t be until Sheila feels brave enough trying to take on Abby.”

“Then it’ll be a few years,” Jessie giggled. “I think the Vulpan-Brighton war just begun.”

“Oh yeah,” Kit agreed, then he laughed.

Kit knew he was going to get a visit that morning, so he got up early enough to unlock the door and started breakfast as Jessie fed Laura. And sure enough, Sheila barged in without knocking and stalked into the kitchen. Kit took one look at her, still in the clothes she wore the night before, her hair all out of place, and he almost dropped the frying pan on his foot laughing.

“You...you KNEW!” she screamed at him.

“Yup,” he replied, smiling at her, then laughing again. “I had to warn Vil so she didn’t think something went terribly wrong and Nick had let a bunch of maniacs into the city. Speaking of Nick, he dropped off a wonderful DVD of Abby’s night out with the girls.”

“That BASTARD!” she screamed. “I’m going to get her for this, I swear I will! Even if it takes me a hundred years!”

“Are you sure you wanna tangle with her again, Sheila?” Kit asked, then he sputtered and laughed again. “I think you’ve learned not to call Abby old, haven’t you?”

“That bitch! She almost scared the piss out of me!” she complained. “And Joy nearly had a seizure!”

“Oh come on, cousin, it was funny,” he told her.

“I’m so glad you think it’s funny, she didn’t do it to you!”

“I’m not dumb enough to be sassy to her, either,” he replied. “Besides, you know what the Brightons are like, Sheila. Does it surprise you she’d prank you?”

She looked about beside herself, then blurted out in helpless laughter. “That crusty old bitch! I’m gonna get her, I’m gonna get her, and I’m gonna get her good!”

“Did the party go on after Abby’s little stunt?” he asked.

“Sorta. A few cousins left, but enough stayed around to get drunk with me so we could forget about it,” she answered, which made him laugh again.

Abigail sauntered in, wearing a Texas tee shirt and a pair of slacks, and she gave Sheila the biggest smile Kit ever saw on a femme. “Why hello, Sheila! I’m so glad you invited me to your party last night, I had so much fun!”

Sheila glared at her, then gave her a grudging smile. “I’m gonna get you, you old battle-axe!” she declared.

“Go right ahead and try, ducky, my purse is bigger than yours,” she replied easily, which made Kit burst out laughing again. That earned him a punch in the shoulder from Sheila, who then stalked out with as much dignity as she could muster.

“Abby, you are one mean femme. I love you,” Kit told her.

“I’m so glad you enjoyed it,” she winked. “I’ve already sent copies of the DVD to Kenny and Winston. I’m sure they’ll get a good laugh out of it.”

“I don’t think my aunts and uncles will find it very funny, but it was worth it,” he said.

“They need to take the steel rods out of their butts anyway,” she shrugged. “So, what’s for breakfast?”

As much as they loved having Abigail in town, and as much fun as her little joke with Sheila was, the needs of her own family took hold of her after they held Laura’s two-week birthday celebration. She’d said she would be around for a couple of weeks, so after two weeks, she was preparing to return to Britain. She was going to stay to attend Sam and Kevin’s wedding on Monday, but was planning on flying home on Monday evening, after the reception.

Kit was sad to see her go, and was surprised when Hannah told them that night that she too would be leaving to go home. “I was here to teach you how to take care of Laura. Well, I don’t need to teach you anymore,” she announced. “I’m confident you will do just fine, and I would like to go back home,” she smiled. “I’m sure John has completely destroyed the house by now. I should have never left him alone this long.”

Jessie laughed. “How are you doing getting used to the empty house?” she asked.

“It’s been a challenge,” she answered honestly. “The house is so quiet now. No loud music blaring from upstairs, no weights crashing on the floor, and John says that watching away games just isn’t the same. Ben and Jennifer do come down for home games, though.”

“Gotta enjoy those awesome seats Vil gave him,” Kit chuckled.

“I think that has something to do with it,” Hannah agreed. “So, I’ll be leaving on Wednesday, so I can stay to babysit Laura while you go to the wedding. By then, I expect to see you find a competent babysitter for when you need one.”

“Oh, I think Martha will cover that,” Jessie laughed. “She already said she’d watch Laura for us if we needed it, and I feel safe leaving her with Rick and Martha. But, we do owe Ben something.”

“I’m smelling a road trip,” Kit noted.

She giggled and winked at him. “We missed his first game, and we owe him a game. So, how about this. Mom, we’ll take you home in our plane while we fly up to see him play. We can leave next Friday, if you can wait around for another week, watch him play on Saturday, and come home on Sunday after the Bengals game.”

“I like that idea,” Hannah said immediately. “When is his next home game?”

“Saturday,” Kit and Jessie said in unison. “But next Saturday is also a home game,” Jessie added.

“It’s a home Bengals game as well,” Hannah mused.

“Yeah, I’ll be up in the skybox with Laura,” Jessie said. “But I’ve missed going to the game. I’d like to see one.”

“I can swing a day off from work, and I like the idea of you logging some cross country hours,” Kit agreed.

“I should be in the back with Laura,” she said. “She’ll need to be fed.”

“That’s what bottles are for,” he replied immediately. “You need to log the hours, so you’re flying.”

“But—“

“What, you don’t trust me or your mother?” he asked pointedly.

She gave him a slightly annoyed look, then laughed ruefully. “You just want more spoil time.”

“She will be a daddy’s girl,” he declared without a whit of shame.

Laura was still the focus of their lives, but the outside world had slowly started working its way back into their routine. Sam and Kevin were going to be married next week, and that was very important to Kit and Jessie, since they were in the wedding party, and everyone was starting to gear up for the wedding. They'd attended two rehearsals after getting the news that Abigail and Hannah were leaving, and Sam had a bridal shower on Thursday, followed up by a bachelorette party on Friday night. Kevin had deliberately gone out of his way not to have a wild party like Kit's, and they were going to hold his bachelor party in the community center at the complex on Saturday night. But, Lupe being Lupe, he did arrange for a few strippers to be there. "It ain't a bachelor party without naked femmes," he declared to Kit after telling him about it.

"Yeah, and if Sam catches Kevin with a naked femme, she's going to do something to him," Kit chuckled. "She's going to be right across the street, Lupe."

"Ain't my fault he's whipped, brah," Lupe grinned.

"Lupe, someday Alice is gonna show us her leash."

Lupe laughed brightly, slapping him lightly on the shoulder. "I got Alice under control, brah. Trust me."

Hannah did help them out by babysitting on Saturday morning, because Kit owed Jessie a round of golf. Sheila was busy that night, and Allison was again in New Orleans in their plane, so Kit and Jessie asked Sam and Kevin to go, to help them take their minds off their impending wedding a little bit, to have one relaxing afternoon before the chaos began, since they were going to be married in two days. It did require a little next-day air, though. Kit had had a set of golf clubs at Stonebrook before he was disowned, and while he had outgrown them, he was sad to say that his father's clubs were just about perfect. They were top of the line Callaway clubs, and had been gathering dust in the basement for years. Clancy overnighted them down to him, and Jessie had signed for them and pulled them out of the box about an hour before he got home from work. “Whose are these?” she asked him.

“They were my father’s,” he said with a dark look as he pulled the driver out and took hold of it, finding that it was pretty much well perfect. He was almost exactly the same height as his father. “Well, they were sort of, that is. My dad never even touched these. He bought them just before he found out his heart was bad, so Vil says, and they literally went into storage without ever being taken out of their shipping box. If I knew he’d used them, I’d take them out back and melt them down in the barbecue pit.”

“Callaway. Is that a good brand?”

He nodded. “Eagle is just as good, though.”

The doorbell rang, and Jessie went over and opened it as Kit pulled the bag out of the box, the original Callaway shipping container. Clancy had just dusted off the box and had Fedex throw new shipping labels over the old ones. “Hey Jessie, hey Kit,” Sam called as she came in. “You bought clubs, eh?”

“They were at Stonebrook, been sitting in the basement for about three years,” Kit answered, seeing that they were didn’t come out of it free and clear. The rubber grips were a tiny bit dried out from being stored in the box for so long, but they’d do. “Which course are we going to?”

“Lakeside,” Jessie answered. “It’s pretty nice.”

“I really need to look into getting you a country club membership, pretty kitty. Private courses are much nicer.”

“Kevin ready?”

“He’s getting our clubs,” she answered. “He said you’re doing this on purpose to make him look stupid.”

Kit laughed. “We all start somewhere.”

“He said he needs to learn, since lawyers are supposed to play golf,” Sam grinned.

“Doctors too,” Jessie reminded her.

“He any good?”

“He’s about as good as me,” Jessie answered.

“Then this should be easy enough,” he said with a slight smile at her.

“That’s starting to sound like a bet,” Jessie challenged.

“Only if it’s nine holes.”

“We’ll see after nine holes, then,” she winked.

Kit packed the golf bags while Jessie and Hannah cooed a bit over Laura, then he got his turn when Kevin got home. “We shouldn’t be gone too long, Hannah,” he told her as he kissed Laura and put her back in her crib. “Want us to bring you anything back?”

“I’ll have a late lunch or early dinner waiting for you when you get home,” she answered. “Just call when you’re getting close.”

“Thanks, Hannah. And thanks for watching Laura for us.”

“I told you, dear, you do need a little time to yourselves from time to time. After I leave, I had better hear Martha telling me she’s babysitting at least twice a month.”

“That’s how you did it?”

“As well as we could. We tried for once a week, our weekly date night. Sometimes we managed, sometimes not. Just because you have a child doesn’t mean you shouldn’t keep working on your relationship, dear.”

“Then I’ll be guided by you, Hannah, else you might spank me.”

“Oh, go on with you,” she retorted, whapping him lightly on the rear as he danced away.

“I get spanked anyway, even for doing the right thing! It’s so unfair!” he said teasingly as he hurried to the door.

Sam and Kevin had their own clubs now, but Sam’s were used clubs and Kevin’s were new, but he only had about eight clubs in the bag, which was used. Sam had found a good deal on a set of very well maintained used clubs that fit her, but Kevin was buying his set one club at a time, filling a used bag with them. It would have been cheaper in the long run to buy a set, but he couldn’t afford a full set, where he could afford the absolute minimum number of clubs he needed to golf at least without embarrassing himself. He only had two drivers, four irons, a pitching wedge, and one putter in his bag, where the standard set was three or four drivers, nine irons, two wedges, and one or two putters. Kevin and Kit loaded their bags in his Pathfinder, and then after waving goodbye to Hannah, and seeing Nick and Krichek quietly pull in behind them in Nick’s Expedition, they were off to Oak Lake, their first golfing trip to their country club. “How much practice have you had, Kev?” he asked.

“I’ve been going down to the driving range during lunch,” he answered. “At least when I can. Delores plays too, and I’ve actually gone down with her and emptied a couple of buckets after work as we talked about one of my cases. I can hit the ball just about every time, it's just making it go straight that's the trick."

Kit chuckled. "It comes with practice," he assured him as he put Jessie's bag in the cart. "I used to play with Vil a lot when we were kids."

"She's good?"

"She's very good," he nodded. "Terry's the best golfer in the family, but Vil is no slouch."

They had a reserved tee time, but there wasn't a line waiting to walk on either, so they went basically straight from the truck straight to the tee, after warning Sam and Kevin that they were going to play a PGA level course, so it was going to be difficult. "So, two more days," Kit said teasingly.

"God, you were so right," Kevin laughed. "All I can think of is why aren't we married yet?"

"Told ya," he grinned. Kit felt a little sorry for them. Because Sam was in school and Kevin was still proving himself at the firm, they had almost no time for a honeymoon. They were also very tight on cash. Sam's parents had paid for the wedding, and the reception was being held in the community center to make it as cheap as possible, but Kevin had no money for a honeymoon even if he did have the time off work to take Sam somewhere. Their honeymoon was going to be a weekend down in San Antonio a good four days after they were married. Sam didn't mind, though, because she knew that they didn't have either the time or the money for anything serious. After they were earning money, they'd make up for the lost honeymoon with some extravagant vacation.

The demands on a first year associate were harsh, and little leeway was given. Kevin had to all but beg to get the day off for his wedding, and they expected him right back at work on Tuesday. If he wasn't one of their most promising rookie associates, they wouldn't have even given him that.

"Sounds good," Kit said as Jessie hurried out of the office and waved them forward.

Kit let the others tee up and go first after they waited their turn, and gave the couple playing ahead of them enough time to get down to their balls and hit them forward. Jessie teed off first, and Kit was pleasantly surprised to her drive a very nice shot, a good 150 yards and almost straight down the fairway, her ball landing close to the left rough. He knew from Sheila that Jessie had some natural talent on the links, but seeing it was a surprise. Sheila said that Jessie had a nice drive, but her short game and her putting were her weaknesses. Well, Sheila was right about her drive.

"Wow, way to make me feel like packing my bag and waiting in the bar, Jessie," Kevin laughed as he stepped up to take his turn. He managed a fairly decent shot for a new player, which meant that his ball went further than Kit expected, and was solidly in the rough. Sam's ball ended up close to his, since she was just learning too, and then Kit teed up and felt them watching. He hadn't golfed in years, but he remembered enough to send the ball down the fairway, rolling to a stop near Jessie's ball.

"I've been playing longer and have had more practice, Kev," Jessie winked at him. "Don't worry, I'm sure you'll be a golfing lawyer real soon."

"Delores plays, and she's pretty good," he said as they got into the golf carts.

It had been a long time since he'd golfed, and it came back to him much faster than he expected. He three-putted the first four holes, but managed to two-putt the fifth, and actually pulled double bogey on the par 4 seventh hole, the lowest score of any of them thus far. By the time they reached the back nine, Kit's back actually felt pretty good, and he was already 37 over par...which was the best score among the four of them, and Kit felt proud of it since it was such a hard course. Jessie was four shots behind him, and Sam and Kevin weren't even keeping score. Sheila was right about Jessie's game, though. She did drive a nice ball, able to hit a much straighter drive than most other beginners, but once she was within 50 yards of the hole, she started having trouble. This wasn't unusual for starting golfers, though. But what was unusual was that Jessie could chip better than she could putt.

"Back alright, love?" Jessie asked as they rode the cart over to the tenth tee.

"Doing fine, pretty kitty," he answered. "And you're four strokes back."

She laughed. "I'll win when you quit," she winked.

"Oho, that sounds like a challenge."

"Only so long as you don't hurt your back trying to finish," she warned seriously.

"I won't do that."

"Alright, then, it's a challenge, handsome fox," she grinned.

The last time he tried to play golf, almost two years ago, his back started hurting around the tenth hole and forced him to give up not long after that. But unlike the last time, his back didn't even start twinging until they got to the 17th hole, a long par four. He felt it when he made his initial drive, the torque on his back, but he knew he could finish out. Maybe two years of healing and exercising his back playing tennis had helped mitigate the pain-inducing motion of swinging a golf club. Jessie actually managed to pull par, jumping up and down and squealing in delight when she sank her second putt. It was her first ever par, and they all applauded her for her achievement. She'd managed to pull within one stroke on the eighteenth hole. "Down to the wire," she grinned, putting her paw on his lower back. "Doing okay?"

"Twinging, but no pain," he reported dutifully. "I'll be able to finish so long as I don't put ten strokes down."

"Good. I'll give you a nice massage when we get home...if you let me win, anyway."

He laughed and nearly drove the cart off the path. "Such blatant bribery!"

"I'm not bribing you, I'm offering you a deal," she winked at him. "You give me something, I give you something. It's a fair trade," she said in a completely insincere serious voice.

"I have got to keep you away from Vil," he complained as they stopped after the very short ride from the 17th green to the tee area of the 18th hole.

The 18th here was a par five, and Kevin winced when he saw that the green was behind a pond. The five water hazards on the course had punished Kevin severely so far. "What is it with golf courses and ponds?" he complained.

“At least you’re brave enough to go after the balls,” Kit chuckled, looking at his damp feet and slacks.

“At twelve dollars for a little box, you’re damn right I’m going after the ball,” he retorted instantly, which made all of them laugh.

By the time they finished, Kit’s back felt alright. A little twingy, but alright. They’d had a good time, and Kit was glad that Jessie had really enjoyed the course despite the fact that it was so hard. “That was fun,” Kevin said as they walked off the 18th green, back towards the car. “I felt like an idiot most of the time, but it was fun.”

“It’s a PGA level course, Kev, you did just fine for your first time playing it. And someone owes me a little something for losing,” he said lightly to Jessie.

“I’m a femme of my word. I promise not to be mad at you for beating me at golf,” she grinned, which made him laugh helplessly.

Kit drove them back home, and after Sam and Kevin headed back for their townhouse, Jessie headed in as he got the clubs. His phone rang, and he saw that it was Vil. “Hey sis, what—“

“I’m PREGNANT!” she screamed in glee, so loud it hurt his ear. “I’m pregnant, Kit! I’m gonna have a baby!”

Kit laughed in delight. “Congratulations! You two certainly didn’t waste any time,” he teased.

“I just found out this morning! I realized I missed my period and a doctor came over and gave me a test, and I’m pregnant!”

“I’m so happy for you, sis! Have you told Kendall yet?”

“He’s right here, goof! Put Jessie on, I gotta tell her!”

“She’s inside, lemme head that way. So, that was fast,” he noted again.

“The doc said we must have conceived during the honeymoon or immediately afterward,” she replied, calming down just a little bit. “I just can’t believe it! I need to get the best obstetrician I can find, we need to start making plans! I’m so happy, I’m just beside myself!”

“It’s easy to tell,” he laughed as he went in. “Jessie! Vil needs to talk to you!” he called.

She came out of the kitchen, the smell of some kind of beef or meat heavy in the house, and took the phone from him. “Hi Vil!” she called cheerfully. She listened only a second, then screamed and actually jumped up and down in place a few times. “Oh my god! That’s so wonderful!” she gushed into the phone. “I’m so happy for you, Vil! When did you find out?”

Jessie wandered off with the phone, her tail slashing behind her as it tended to do when she was happy, and Kit could just lean against the doorframe and chuckle. Vil hadn’t wasted any time getting pregnant, and now that she was, things were going to both settle down and heat up in the family. An heir had been secured, and that heir would eventually own both companies...and become one of the most powerful furs on Earth in the bargain. That was a lot of pressure to put on a kid, but he couldn’t doubt that his impending niece or nephew would ever want for love from Vil and Kendall. He was happy for her, for he knew exactly what kind of happiness and joy would soon come into her life. The anticipation during pregnancy, then that beautiful day when she got to look her baby in the eyes for the first time, and all the love and contentment and joy that she would feel the entire time. The fulfillment that came with having a child was a wonder and a joy unlike anything other in the world, and he was so totally happy that his sister was about to experience that fulfillment herself.

As usual, Vil got what she wanted, quickly and efficiently. Though, he was fairly sure that Kendall hadn't minded the chore of getting her pregnant all that much.